THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert

BARBARA'S BROTHERS

BY EVELYN EVERETT GREEN.

CHAPTER I.—THE DOCTOR'S FAMILY.

"AND SO, BAB, YOU THINK I OUGHT TO GO BACK TO MY BELOVED OFFICE-STOOL?"

ABOUT a mile-and-a-half from the picturesque sea-coast of the west of England, and some half mile from the flourishing town of St. Hilda, stood a comfortable family mansion, substantially built of red brick, and shut in behind solid walls, that had evidently not been built yesterday. There was a rather extensive garden enclosed behind these walls, a garden gay with flowers during the greater part of the year, and lawns as smooth as velvet that sloped gently down to the river's brink, and rose again on the other side in thickly planted shrubberies.

There was a conservatory too, a greenhouse, and a range of hot-houses: the stables boasted their two or three sleek, well-kept horses, and the whole aspect of the place bespoke a comfortable opulence without any ostentation or actual extravagance.

Had you chanced to inquire of a passing rustic whose house it was, he would have eyed you with a kind of surprise at the dense ignorance displayed by such a question, and in his roundabout loquacious way would have proceeded to tell you that it was the doctor's house—Dr. Meynal's—the first physician in these, or indeed in any other parts; that there had been Dr. Meynals at St. Hilda as long as the oldest inhabitant could remember, and that each doctor had to keep one more horse that his predecessor, to meet the demands of his increasing practice; but that it was only the present Dr. Meynal who had bought this large house on the outskirts of the town, and he did so on his marriage with the Hon. Miss Talbot. Until that time a family mansion in the town itself had been the doctor's home.

And at the time my story opens, he would have added with a very grave face and a lugubrious shake of his head, that Dr. Meynal was just dead, and that nobody knew exactly what was going to happen.

All St. Hilda had been thrown into consternation by the sudden death of one of its most popular inhabitants. Dr. Meynal had grown up amongst them, like his father before him. He was a genial friend as well as a kind physician to each one of his patients, gentle or simple; and at fifty-five he had appeared to be still in the prime of life, when he had suddenly collapsed before an attack of pneumonia, and was dead before the town had awakened to the knowledge that he was even seriously indisposed.

And now the questions in everyone's mouth were—What will happen? What arrangements would be made? What provision had been made for the family? What would become of the Meynals themselves, and of St. Hilda without a Dr. Meynal to prescribe for all its many ailments?

Those who knew the family best shook their heads when the question of provision was broached. Dr. Meynal was known to have expended his patrimony in the purchase of the Cedars, when he married his beautiful young portionless wife, and surrounded her with all those luxuries that her loveliness and fragility seemed to demand. True the practice was large and lucrative—most likely it brought in some two or three thousand a year—but then the expenditure of that household could not be much under that, and there seemed little probability of any substantial provisions having been made.

The misfortunes of some people appear to afford a sort of gloomy satisfaction to their neighbours and acquaintances, but this was not the case with the Meynals, who had always kept open house, and shown a great deal of kindly hospitality to all comers. They were popular people in St. Hilda. Mrs. Meynal's helpless dependence and gentleness, Celia's beauty, Gerald's genius, and Barbara's frank impetuosity, had all won favour in the eyes of the inhabitants, and each one felt a real and keen sympathy with them in this time of sorrow and suspense.

Of the eldest son Wulfric, St. Hilda knew little. His father was known to think highly of his talents, and the young man had spent the greater part of his time in London, where he was said to be carrying all before him, and laying the foundations of a brilliant and successful career.

Although Wulfric had adopted the medical profession with the true Meynal instinct, St. Hilda had been somewhat astonished and half scandalised by Dr. Meynal's assertion that he did not intend the lad to succeed him in the practice. He believed that his son had a great career before him; the senior physician of his hospital had written many letters, loud in his praise; and as time passed by, and Wulfric obtained hospital appointments, filled them with great success, and became an acknowledged rising young man in the profession, Dr. Meynal was heard to speak more and more strongly of his determination never to allow him to waste his talents, and give up his scientific studies, for the daily drudgery of a country practice, and he sometimes even spoke of taking a nephew as assistant to the exclusion of his son.

This arrangement was understood to be contemplated with the full concurrence of the son, and Barbara, who was the most outspoken of the family was sometimes heard to explain that "Wulf hated the country, and said one might as well be buried alive as be a doctor in a place like St. Hilda." He only cared for London, and was certain of getting fame and wealth there if he only had a fair chance, and were let alone to make his way upwards as he had already begun to do.

Just lately he had taken his M.D. at an unusually early age, and at the time of his father's death he was travelling in America, and his own people had been unable to communicate with him. He was due to return however in a few days, and much interest was caused by the speculation as to what his future course of conduct would be. Would he take up the practice as he found it, all ready to his hand (for St. Hilda was intensely conservative and loyal to old traditions, and would rally to a man round Dr. Meynal's son), or would he return to his favourite studies, and his own career in the great city which he had so long made his home, and leave his family to do as best they might, and shift for themselves on Mrs. Meynal's scanty jointure, and the sum that would be realised by the sale of the house and of the practice?

Wulfric, from being such a stranger, was not much of a favourite with St. Hilda, and his supposed contempt for that place added to the distrust and suspicion with which he was regarded. St. Hilda was incapable of understanding the question from a professional standpoint, and the fact that young Dr. Meynal considered a country practice as a very contemptible thing, and far below his talents, gave rise to the belief that he was a very vain and pushing young man, who thought himself too good for what had been quite good enough for his fathers before him. Dr. Meynal's laughing explanations on the subject, his talk about his son's scientific studies and analytical researches were wasted upon uncomprehending ears. To country minds a practice was a practice, and the remedies required by St. Hilda were surely just as scientific and particular as those bestowed upon Londoners, and why Wulfric should hold them in such contempt they absolutely failed to understand. But with all his faults and failings he was a Meynal, and as such he should receive the favour and countenance of the place, if at this juncture he should decide to settle amongst them, and take up the work his father had so suddenly laid down.

And whilst this subject was being eagerly canvassed without, a family conclave was being held within the walls of the red-brick house, upon that identical point—the future conduct of Wulfric. Dr. Meynal had been buried a full fortnight ago. The house had resumed its usual appearance; the keen edge of a deep grief had begun just to wear off; and questions of practical import, and of ways and means had of necessity come to the fore.

Wulfric was expected home very shortly. If he had seen his father's death in the papers any day might bring him, but even if not, the ship he had named as the one by which he meant to return, was due at Liverpool in a few days. He was a bad correspondent, and had kept them little informed as to his movements, but his ways were punctual and methodical, and as he had not written to advise them of any change of plan, he might be confidently expected by the vessel he had named previously.

And whilst he was on his way to his darkened home, unconscious of the loss that had robbed him of a father, his future career was being talked over and mapped out for him by St. Hilda in general and his own family in particular.

"There is only one way possible," said Mrs. Meynal with a languid gentleness that covered a good deal of latent determination and force of character. "Wulfric must settle down and take the practice; there will then be no break up of the home; and everything will be simplified."

Mrs. Meynal leaned back among her cushions with a long drawn sigh and drew her vinaigrette towards her. She was a delicately made fragile-looking woman with indications of what had once been great beauty, until time and ill health had left their traces upon her. Beauty of a kind she still had, a graceful figure, languid and refined manners, a musical voice, and clear, if somewhat sallow complexion. Many people admired Mrs. Meynal very much for her fine eyes and delicately chiselled features, but hers was not the type of face to which advancing years gave an added beauty; for such charm as it possessed was all outward and physical, not the beauty of the soul beneath shining out in that sweetness of expression that bespeaks a nearness to God, which makes so many old faces increase in beauty as the bloom of youth and health depart. She might be a woman to win admiration and liking, but hardly that reverential loving respect that should be the tribute of advancing years. Nor would Mrs. Meynal have wished to be looked upon with any such feelings. She wished still to pass for a young woman, and was often a little vexed to think that her eldest son was actually seven and twenty and looked even more. She had never been fond of Wulfric; but just now she saw a way of making him extremely useful and intended to bring about that result.

It was to her two daughters that she had just made the remark expressive of her determination, and it was received in very different fashion by the sisters. Lovely, lily-like Celia, her mother's daughter in every respect, accepted the verdict as the expression of an inevitable fact about which there could be no manner of doubt; whilst dark-eyed Barbara flushed up hotly and pushed back the short dark curls that clustered boy-fashion about her head, with a gesture common to her in her moods of impatience or vexation.

No two sisters could have presented a greater contrast than did Mrs. Meynal's daughters. Celia, with her limpid blue eyes, golden hair, tea rose complexion, and all the languid graceful elegance of her beautiful mother; Barbara with her gipsy-like face, with its damask bloom and glowing dark eyes, short curly hair and her quick abrupt movements that bespoke an impetuous, impulsive nature. Barbara had been a great pet with the father whom she had passionately loved, but her mother felt with her rather as the hen is supposed to do with the proverbial duckling to rear.

When Mrs. Meynal had made her comment upon the future and Wulfric's share in it, Celia roused herself to add,

"Yes, of course he must take the practice; what a good thing he has taken his degree. It will give people confidence in him and they will like to think that there is still a Dr. Meynal in the place."

But Barbara looked up quickly and said,

"It is easy to say that Wulf must; but it remains to be proved if he will. He is his own master, and has his own career before him."

Mrs. Meynal smiled and said nothing; Celia looked at her sister and spoke rather impatiently.

"His career will be at St. Hilda now. He ought to be very glad to get such a good berth for himself and to be helpful to his family at the same time,"

"Glad!" echoed Barbara in an indignant undertone, as if she were not quite sure whether or not she meant to make herself heard. "Glad to have all his cherished prospects crushed just when they seemed opening out before him so brightly! Glad to give up the life of wide interest and the companionship of kindred spirits that has made London so delightful to him, and settle down to the narrow, petty round of duties of a country doctor—to have nothing more exciting to think of than the ailments of St. Hilda! How many times has father told me of his thankfulness that Wulf was not tied down to the daily drudgery of a country practice. 'I was born and brought up to it,' he would say; 'St. Hilda has been my home and all my roots have been struck into her soil; but I have brought Wulf up differently. He has had an education and training perfectly different from mine. What is enjoyment to me would be hopeless drudgery to him. Please God he shall never have to eat out his heart in the little world of St. Hilda.' That is what father used to say."

Mrs. Meynal turned away her head and said nothing. Celia spoke with much reproach in her tone.

"Barbara, how can you? You have no feeling."

"Yes I have," returned the girl in the same low, eager tone; "but I can't bear for Wulf's whole career to be spoilt, and his prospects blighted just that we may live a little more comfortably now. If the house and practice were sold, and I went out as a governess, and Gerald went back to Mr. Dart's office—you know he offered to take him again—I am sure you and mother could live quite comfortably, and Wulf make a name for himself in his own way."

Celia quite roused up to answer such absurd propositions.

"I think you are perfectly crazy on the subject of Wulf. Pray who would have you as a governess, you careless, harum-scarum child? As for Gerald—you know he cannot endure the law. Mr. Dart's office would kill him, it nearly did before."

Barbara smiled disdainfully.

"Wulf is to do what he will detest, as a matter of course; but Gerald would be killed by a little distasteful occupation."

Celia was getting angry, but she restrained herself as she felt that an outbreak of temper would impair the dignity of her position.

"The two cases are not in the least parallel. Wulf is a qualified medical man, and an M.D., and it follows as a natural thing that he should take up the practice at a time like this; but Gerald in a lawyer's office—the thing is too absurd. He must live for his art."

"Gerald's art seems to me to be a pretty device for being idle and amusing himself."

"For shame of yourself, Barbara! Gerald has undoubted genius. Some day when he has made a great name, you will be ashamed, I hope, of the slighting way you speak of him now."

Barbara's lip curled slightly.

"When!" she repeated with a scepticism she made no attempt to veil. "Ah, yes, when that day comes I will be very humble; and meantime he is to live in clover and do nothing, whilst Wulf slaves for the whole family, and wastes his talents and eats out his heart in the drudgery father was so determined he should be spared. Well, it will be just like Gerald to acquiesce in such an arrangement. So long as he is comfortable, he cares for nothing else."

Both sisters were growing excited by this time, when Mrs. Meynal stopped the discussion by plaintively complaining that they made her head ache with their chatter. She added that Wulfric—like a sensible man—ought to be very thankful for so good a start in life, and have learned by this time how unlikely it was for him to get anything better. Competition was too keen in these days for young men to indulge in high-flown notions.

Barbara was silenced but not convinced. She gave up the battle, but brooded in silence a good deal over the matter all the rest of that day. She was haunted by a sense of the injustice and selfishness of those about her. She rose next day feeling an unwholesome bitterness at heart. She determined to bridle her tongue if she could; but it seemed as if the subject was to haunt her.

"And so, Bab, you think I ought to go back to my beloved office-stool, and the delightful society of quill-pens and parchment, in order that the great Wulf may set the Thames on fire at his leisure—eh?"

The speaker was a very good-looking fellow of five-and-twenty, who was lounging in an indolent attitude upon one of the many cushioned couches of Mrs. Meynal's drawing-room, and turning the leaves of an illustrated magazine with an air of critical discrimination. Celia was engaged in some delicate bit of fancy work, and the pair had evidently been exchanging confidences, for as Barbara chanced to enter before starting for a walk in the clear spring sunshine, this was the greeting she received from her brother Gerald.

She flushed a little but answered boldly, "If I were a man I should not like to be dependent upon my brother when I had an opening for gaining my own livelihood."

Gerald laughed good temperedly enough.

"Babies and girls are always very grand on that theme. So you thought of turning governess yourself, eh, Bab? My dear child, you don't seem in the least to realise the fact that if we are somewhat indebted to Wulfric for his ability to take the practice, he is quite as much in debt to us for giving it to him."

Barbara evidently did not realise it in the least and looked so very much astonished that Gerald laughed again.

"Don't you know, my child, that Wulf's modest patrimony has been entirely exhausted in his very expensive education, his allowance all these years, and the travels he has taken? He has cost double and treble what all the rest of us put together have done; and that being the case, and he being in a position to make his own way, father left him nothing but his library and instruments, whilst house, practice, money, all come to us and to mother."

"Well?" asked Barbara, as Gerald paused.

"Well, can't you see even yet? Wulf, with no practice, and no money to buy one, and only his talents and the uncertain patronage of friends to depend on, would be in a very poor way; but we offer him a comfortable home and a lucrative practice, only burdened by the conditions that the home is kept up for the benefit of all. Business is business, you know, even in families, and if Wulf is not a very obliged person he is a greater fool than I take him for."

Barbara was so astonished at this utterly new way of stating the case that she was some time in answering.

"If the obligation is all on Wulf's side," she said by-and-by, slowly and reflectively—"I don't believe it is so really—but if it is, I think you will find that he will prefer poverty, and hard work, and London. He will not be poor long. I don't believe he will be poor at all. He could get a hospital appointment, I am certain, at any time. He always likes hospital work. If he isn't urgently wanted here to keep a home over our heads, I am certain he will stay in London."

Gerald flushed a little, but only said carelessly: "That is a point that Wulf must settle for himself. I did not say the obligation was all on one side; I said it was mutual. As a man of common sense, he will see the only rational course open to him. Wulf is a good fellow enough, Barbara, but he is not a hero of romance. He knows quite well which side his bread is buttered, and how to take care of himself. A certain practice and large income are not to be despised."

"Especially when the income is not to be his own."

Gerald smiled gently.

"Wulf will be able to look after his own interests, most fiery of Babs. Don't you be afraid for him. I only wish I had such a chance."

Barbara laughed a laugh that was less good tempered than Gerald's had been.

"You, indeed! As if you would ever avail yourself of any chance that involved hard work! You will be dependent on Wulf to the end of the chapter—you will never make a penny by your precious art."

"Barbara, for shame!" cried Celia; but Gerald only smiled in his tranquil fashion.

"Let her talk—it amuses her, and does me no harm. For the rest, my dear child, Wulf is very well able to look after his own interests. When he is tired of my society, he can pay me off, and turn me out. He is quite capable of it."

"You know he is no such thing," flashed out Barbara, hotly. "You know he is generosity itself, and you presume upon what you pretend to despise. You always sneer at Wulf—call him a diamond in the rough——"

"So he is, my dear child," interposed Gerald, calmly, "very much in the rough indeed."

Barbara caught her breath with a sort of angry gasp, and proceeded hotly—

"Yes, that is always the way you talk—as if you were a superior being, and Wulf the dust beneath your feet. You jeer at him, and hold him up to ridicule all the time you are planning to live luxuriously upon the proceeds of his talents. I scorn such meanness and such ungenerous subterfuges. You make me scorn you too."

And Barbara, as if afraid to stay longer in the room, flung herself out as unexpectedly as she had entered.

"Whew!" whistled Gerald, "what a storm in a tea-cup, to be sure. The superfluous energy of our little sister is quite fatiguing to witness;" and then he strolled to the piano, and began singing softly to himself, as if nothing in the world could ruffle his placid spirits.

Barbara meantime pursued her way, hot indignation flushing her cheek and lighting her eye, until rapid exercise began to relieve the pressure of her mind, and she relaxed her speed by degrees, feeling a little ashamed of her outburst of passion, though in no wise shaken in her own opinions of the case at issue.

"I wish I could conquer my hasty temper," she said to herself, with a little sigh. "Father spoke to me about it as he lay dying, and I promised him I would. I felt then as if I never could be angry again, and now, in less than a month, I feel just as passionate and angry as ever. I wonder what it is makes me so hasty. I sometimes feel like an Ishmaelite amongst them all, and I am afraid they feel the same about me themselves. I wonder whose fault it is. Mine, I suppose. Yet Gerald and Celia are very, very provoking, and so selfish. I do hate selfishness."

And then the girl stopped short, and some words her father had spoken to her not many hours before his death recurred to her memory.

"And you, my dear child, will struggle, I know, against your besetting sins—hasty tempers, and unkind judgment of others."

Had she been doing so to-day?

THE INNER LIFE OF LORD SHAFTESBURY.

PART I.

IT would have been an irreparable loss to literature had Lord Shaftesbury carried out his fixed intention of destroying his journals and private papers, but the loss to the Christian Church would have been still greater, as, without them, the true story of his inner life could never have been known—the life of one of the most honoured men of the century; a man who ever sought God in all that he undertook, however small, and throughout a long life of intense labour in the defence of the poor, the helpless and the oppressed, never hesitated in the belief that he was "directly called of God" to his mission, and persistently, from youth to age, set "the great end of Christ" always before him.

In the preparation of "The Life and Work of the Earl of Shaftesbury," the author, Mr. Edwin Hodder, had the inestimable advantage of many months of personal intercourse with the good Earl, and from his lips heard many of the incidents related in the three large volumes comprising his Biography.[1] But the charm of the work is in the extracts from the diaries, in which every phase of thought and feeling, every movement of the times, every subject uppermost in men's minds throughout a period of sixty years, extending from 1825 to 1885 is noted by Lord Shaftesbury in chaste and beautiful language, and with the vigour of a man intensely in earnest.

We propose in these papers to follow the course of the narrative, as it gives us glimpses into the soul of the man whose labours have done more than those of any other to alter the condition of the working classes, the poor and the friendless, and to bring about the great social reforms which have marked the history of the past half century.

The simple story of the consecration of his life to God, while yet in early childhood, is full of important lessons. His father was a cold, stern and hard man, engrossed in public duties, and caring little or nothing for the well-being of his children; his mother was a thoughtless woman of the world, given up to fashion and gaiety, who saw but little of her children, and never sought in any way to influence them for good. The tone, the conversation, the amusements, the opinions, the spirit of the home, were all opposed to the early bent of the boy's mind, which from the days of infancy was in the direction of the career he ultimately made for himself.

But "God did not leave Himself without witness." There was in the household a faithful old servant, one Maria Millis, who had been maid to young Ashley's mother when she was a girl at Blenheim in the home of her father the third Duke of Marlborough. This old nurse took a tender interest in the gentle, serious, and neglected child committed to her care; she read to him the sweet story of old, and taught him the first prayer he ever learnt, the music of which made melody in his heart even in old age. Into her ear he poured all his childish troubles, hopes, fears, and aspirations, and from her lips he received the only words of kindness, comfort, and Christian counsel he ever heard in those days. Although not seven years of age there was a distinct yearning after God, and to his old nurse, Maria Millis, he was indebted "for the guidance and the training under which the longing of his heart was ultimately developed into a settled and intelligent faith."

The early days of young Ashley's life were utterly miserable. At the age of seven he was sent to the Manor House School, at Chiswick, about the worst place in the world to which a nervous sensitive child could be sent. He lived in a state of constant terror from the cruelty of the elder boys, and suffered exquisite misery for years through the neglect and inhumanity of the principal of the school in failing to provide, sufficiently, even the necessaries of life. Seventy-five years afterwards he visited the place, and he said, "The memory of it makes me shudder; it is repulsive to me, even now. I think there never was such a wicked school before or since. The place was bad, wicked, filthy, and the treatment was starvation and cruelty."

It was while he was at this Dotheboys Hall that his first great and bitter grief came to him. His old friend Maria Millis, "the only grown-up person in the world he really loved—the only one to whom he had dared to speak of the misery of his school-life—the only one with whom any bright and beautiful ideas were associated"—was called to her rest. Very grievously the boy mourned for her, and then, "without a soul on earth to whom he could go for comfort, he turned with a child's simple faith to the Old Book that she had loved, and spread his sorrows before the heavenly Friend whom she had taught him to regard as full of pity and tenderness."

At the age of twelve, young Ashley was removed from the Manor House School, and happier days began to dawn upon him at Harrow, where he was placed under the care, and in the house of Dr. Butler, the Head Master. Silently, slowly, but surely, the divine life had meanwhile been growing in the midst of what would have seemed the most adverse circumstances, and without any of those influences which are generally considered all important to nurture it.

When he had been at Harrow about two years, an incident occurred which arrested his floating impressions of good, and concentrated them into a fixed and steadfast purpose. He was one day walking alone down Harrow Hill when he was startled by hearing a great shouting and yelling in a side street, and the singing of a low Bacchanalian song. Presently the noisy party turned the corner of the street, and, to his horror, he saw that four or five drunken men were carrying a roughly made coffin, containing the mortal remains of one of their fellows for burial. Staggering as they turned the corner, they let their burden fall, and then they broke out into foul and horrible language. It was a sickening spectacle. No solitary soul was there as mourner. A fellow-creature was about to be consigned to the tomb with indignities to which not even a dog should be subjected. Young Ashley was horrified, and stood gazing on the scene spell-bound. Then he exclaimed, "Good heavens! Can this be permitted, simply because the man was poor and friendless?"

Before the sound of the drunken songs had died away in the distance he had faced the future of his life, and he had determined that, with the help of God, he would from that time forth devote his life to pleading the cause of the poor and helpless.

Seventy years afterwards when reviewing his career, he wrote, "God called me to the work, and gave me the strength to do it. And I can see now the very spot, and I could almost tell the hour of the day at which the thought first entered into my mind, when a boy of thirteen or fourteen years of age, at Harrow School."

It was not for some years that the thought that then "first entered his mind" was put into effect. Meanwhile, he was still in the midst of the old "high and dry" school of orthodoxy. He had learned to regard it as a "meritorious thing to hate Dissenters"; he had been taught to look upon the Bible Society as "an evil and a revolutionary institution, opposed alike to Church and State," and there had not come to him that "call of God" which should inspire him to active practical service.

After leaving Harrow, he spent two years under the care of a clergyman in Derbyshire, who neither taught him anything, nor was required to do so. They were idle years in one sense, and yet not really idle, for "he was laying in a store of knowledge, on which he could hereafter draw; he was drinking in influences which were to mould and discipline his future; and his character was forming, not by violent and abnormal means, but by the gradual, steady development which culminates in true and abiding strength."

At eighteen he went to Oxford, where he greatly distinguished himself by bringing out that energy and perseverance which were ever afterwards among his leading characteristics. Three years later he took a first class in classics, and in 1826, at the age of twenty-five, he entered Parliament.

Throughout these years he never forsook his habits of prayer, and of diligent study of the Word of God; and in a journal he notes his thoughts and hopes, his plans and aspirations. He has "visions without end"; now fancying himself "in wealth and power, exerting his influence for the increase of religion and true happiness;" now with "a great mind to found a policy on the Bible; in public life observing the strictest justice, and not only cold justice, but active benevolence." On his twenty-fifth birthday, he wrote: "I will entreat God to raise up for Old Britain young and aged saints and sinners, high and low, rich and poor, who may act as well for her interests as I always fancied I wished to do."

There were numerous temptations surrounding Lord Ashley in the early years of his parliamentary life. He had all the advantages of a singularly attractive person, a well-stored mind, a high social position, a fascinating manner, and troops of friends. The great Duke of Wellington sought his company, and loved to have him at Strathfieldsaye. Lord Brougham was loud in his praises; Southey was his constant correspondent; leaders of men in all the higher walks of life were among his friends and companions, and all society threw open its doors to him. Amid them all, the young member of Parliament calmly pursued his way, travelling on towards the light. What his ideas of duty in the public life he had chosen for himself were, may be gathered from his opinion of what a Prime Minister should be. "I have decided in my own heart," he wrote in his Journal, "that no one should be Prime Minister of this great country unless deeply imbued with religion; a spirit which will reflect and weigh all propositions, examine each duty, and decide upon the highest; be content to do good in secret, and hold display as a bauble compared with the true interests of God and the kingdom; have energy to withstand political jobbing, and refuse what is holy as a sacrifice to faction. He must calculate advantages to arise in a century, and not shows to glitter at the moment; he must appoint that which is best, and not that which is most capable of appearing so. He must leaven every deed with the feeling of religion. All things must be done to edifying, and if he do not call in Scripture and holy aid to assist him in the discharge of each office, be it important, or be it trifling, he must do it in that frame of mind and heart which is caused by long and genuine delight in the lessons derived from the truths of wisdom and Christianity."

When the time came for him to steadily face the future of his own parliamentary career, and decide on a line of action (for a year passed before he had made his first speech in the House), he wrote: "I must make an essay; not merely for party's sake and earthly power and place, but for the resuscitation of honour and British principle, with their handmaids, dignity and virtue: and if I fall I shall fall in no ignoble cause; but may I, as I have ever endeavoured to do, begin in God, and, having throughout desired nothing but His glory and the consummation of His word, conclude in the same to the advancement of religion and the increase of human happiness."

In 1828 the Duke of Wellington was called upon to form an administration, and he at once wrote to Lord Ashley offering him an appointment in the Government as Commissioner of the India Board of Control. The spirit in which he entered upon his new duties is thus shown:—"God protect me and encourage me in a career of honour and right-mindedness, and may He give me also discretion and calmness to reflect, and now that office can no longer be avoided, I pray the Heavenly Father to give me the will to discharge my duty, and the strength to perform it; to found all in His glory, and, by seeking the welfare of mankind, to render my public and my private thoughts a means of furthering the love of His religion."

From that time forth, everything he undertook was entered upon in the same devout and earnest religious spirit. He was determined that his conduct should be based upon Christian principles, and that everything should be done in a Christian character to a Christian end. It was thus he exercised the trust confided to him as a member of the Government, in relation to India; it was thus he entered upon the great question of the lunacy laws—the subject of his first important speech in the House of Commons, and on which he was one of the chief authorities to the end of his life. Before that first speech was delivered he says "I prayed most earnestly, as I ever do, for aid and courage;" and when the ordeal was over, though the "cheers and compliments were abundant," he "hastened home to throw himself upon his knees in gratitude."

As the flower opens to the sun, so, without any great revulsion, the germs of spiritual life that had been seen in the little child of seven, grew and spread until the whole life was full of fruit. For him to live was Christ, and the little unconscious touches in his diaries reveal how completely his heart was set on heavenly things. Into those diaries he was in the habit of throwing every passing thought and feeling—in them he is thinking aloud, talking to himself, dreaming, as it were, and yet recording all that he thought and said and dreamed. Through them all, there is breathed the very spirit of the Christian life. For example, when "he longs to quit the hot and dusty town" (London), it is that he "may roam in the valleys and plains to meditate on things immortal." At Brighton he walks on the cliffs and has an opportunity of what he loves, "a silent prayer in solitude and contemplation." He gives money secretly "to rescue a tempted girl"; he contributes to a fund to perpetuate the memory of Bishop Heber whom "no man ever equalled," and gives a hundred pounds to King's College "to raise an embankment against the overflow of irreligion;" he urges by precept and example the "quiet observance of the Sabbath;" he assists in giving freer circulation to religious literature, and expostulates against science taking the place of Revelation. In these things, and in many more, he shows the bent of his thoughts and feelings, and foreshadows his future labours.

The study of the Bible was daily his delight. While staying at the Royal Lodge, the guest of the King (William IV.), he writes:—"I do believe that if the mind be indelibly stamped with the precepts and wisdom of the Bible, it will acquire a force of analysis and judgment to extract from the labour of a day more than the scorner or neglectful could attain by the watchings of a century. I have had my solitary walk, and a short period of holy meditation. I prayed with all the fervour I could command, but all prayer is infinitely cold to express what is felt, or rather what one wishes to feel."

The unwritten word of God he studied with great diligence. One of his great pleasures was to spend his evenings with Sir James South, the astronomer, in observation of the heavens. "I may be a wicked man," he writes, musing with himself in his diary, "and one regarded by God as 'deceitful upon the weights,' but still there is within me a spirit of love and adoration which bursts forth at the sight of any of nature's glories. My soul is so filled that it cannot find vent but in aspirations towards a higher Being. Unless the mind be turned to contemplate some vast, indivisible, everlasting, omnipotent Superior, it wanders restless, unsatisfied and ignorant through the immensity of imagination, and, having begun in conceit, ends in satiety or despair. But, as for myself, my heart is so touched when I view the sweet magnificence of the Creator, that I could fall to weeping in tears of gratitude and joy. O, Great Parent, keep me ever in this frame of thought and feeling! I fear the advance of age with its coldness, its obstructions, its worldly pursuits, its hard and worldly common sense."

In 1830, Lord Ashley was married to Emily, daughter of the fifth Earl Cowper, "a wife as good, as true and as deeply beloved as God ever gave to man;" a wife, who, three years later, when the Factory Question came before Lord Ashley, and he had to decide whether he would give up ease, influence, promotion, to associate himself with the most unpopular question of the day, and to become the victim of a virulent opposition from all parties, said, "It is your duty, and consequences we must leave. Go forward, and to victory!"

Into the history of Factory Legislation, and the great struggle in which Lord Ashley was engaged for so many years, we shall not enter here. It will be enough to say that he acted up to the principles he had set before himself at the outset of his career—the glory of God and the welfare of man.

THE ART OF GIVING.

"THE poor are always with us," and yet there are certain seasons, such as the festival of Christmas and the celebration of the New Year, when the heart, in realising the Divine Fatherhood, is specially drawn to the recognition of the brotherhood of man. If Christmas good-will and New Year's greetings have their tragi-comic side, in the contrast which they present to much that goes on through the year, they are not therefore to be despised. At least, they set a standard which is not to be rejected because it is not uniformly maintained. It is something accomplished when we get poor dirty bodies to wash, and don clean garments, even for one day. They will possibly do so again, and then again; they will probably be never more so satisfied and sunk in dirt and squalor. May it not be the same with souls? It is something to have felt one gentler feeling, thought one kinder thought, or refrained for one day from selfish habits.

It is very well that the season of secular reckonings-up and new beginnings follows so hard upon the time of sacred devotion and aspiration. The heart is prepared to move the hand where the head is ready to direct it. In all ages, the Church of God has taught that the spirit of love must make itself manifest in practical mercy and almsgiving. And at the beginning of another year, when we know what we have, and what we can spare, when we take opportunity for considering our ways, it is then most natural for us to reflect on the best purposes to which we can direct our surplus, and on the bearing which our actions and habits have for good or evil.

It is never well to scoff at old customs, though it is sometimes wise to cease from them. A thing may have been good in its time, though its time may now be gone by; and surely we do not have to search far to find out how much good there was in the old system of bounties and doles, and even in the quaint parochial bequests, whose singular conditions must sometimes provoke a smile. Six old women picking up six fourpenny pieces from a worn-out tombstone is not an edifying spectacle to-day, nor are the twelve charity boys receiving sixpence each "after reciting the Creed and the Lord's Prayer," likely to be increased in devoutness by their performance. But these are survivals from a day when thought and feeling and effort flowed in far different channels, and at least they bear testimony to a touching longing for human remembrance, and an honest endeavour to store the youthful mind with what is best worthy its consideration. Let us preserve the spirit though we change the forms, and even in changing the forms themselves, let us remember that a wise writer of to-day has said that if an angel took up teaching in one of our public schools, he would certainly begin first to inculcate reverence and good manners!

There are other old forms, less rigid, which will change of themselves, so far as they should be changed, if their ancient spirit really remain. Such are the bounties and observances of the festive seasons, which every "householder" should feel to be his proud prerogative, according to his degree and his power. Pounds of tea and yards of flannel, red cloaks and sacks of coal, were very real blessings and benefits, as dispensed from castle and hall and farm "in olden times," when village shops were scarce and lowly, and village commerce was chiefly carried on in "kind," often not within the compass of poor old good wives or struggling widows. It is not so to-day in the same sense or degree. And yet "the poor are always with us," and the command "to do good and to distribute" surely holds as strongly as ever.

Now the good old spirit was that of helping others to get what was good for them, and which they could scarcely get without help. We have to consider how this can work to-day. For, as Bishop Taylor says, "The particulars of mercy or alms cannot be narrower than men's needs are," and even in his time "the old method of alms is too narrow to comprise them all." We will not, just now, go down into the deep social problems, about helping people to get work so that they may provide for themselves, which prove emigration societies and labour organisations to be a form of charity as much higher than eleemosynary aid, as God's goodness in teaching men how to make shoes and bread is greater than His kindness in providing sheep with wool and grass! We will, to-day, leave aside those who can direct and lead these great projects, as being the legitimate successors of the famous knights and pioneers of the past, whom most of us must be content to admire at a distance. But while they are doing their work, we want to know how we can tread in the steps of the ancient "loaf-givers," how we can still keep ourselves in true, warm touch with those who are poorer, or weaker, or more ignorant than ourselves, even when we are forbidden, in their own real interests, from subsidising them with the mere necessaries of existence.

Why should we not give gifts of pleasant useful things which without our help would not be enjoyed? We hear that the lower classes in England do not care for art,—why should we not try to make them care? Remember, all tastes need cultivation, and we must not be disheartened, if our endeavours in this direction are at first met by blunders not unlike that of a poor old woman of old times, who, getting her first gift of tea, and hearing that it should be boiled, put it in the pot and then ate the leaves, telling the giver afterwards that it was "nice enough" but "she could not say she liked it better than cabbage." Let us remember that "in giving should discretion be," and instead of aiming at once at Botticellis and Blakes, let us begin with good photographs or engravings from Nicoll and Faed, or Israels and Millet: subjects which workers can understand and appreciate, and which show the dignity and beauty possible in their own sphere. Or, on a humbler scale, there might be photographs of the scene of the squire's last trip to Norway or Italy—making distant scenes real and proving kindly remembrance. The dozen recipients of such gifts might be all invited to meet, when they would see each other's treasures, and might receive a little friendly elucidation of their merits.

The same could be done in literature. Good books could be sought out, of a higher and different calibre from the red and blue bound volumes which generally find their way into humble homes as school prizes. The clergyman of the parish might excite interest in such books by judicious quotations or remarks in his week day lectures or Sunday sermons. It is very sad to think how the great wealth of English literature lies unknown to the great bulk of her labouring classes,—and how they follow wrong leaders and are led captive by crude oratory and arguments, because they do not know that "Shakespeare was of them; Milton was for them."

Here again, "discretion" must be used: the mental standard or "turn of thought" of a class or a neighbourhood must be first gauged and met, and then idiosyncrasies may be studied. A strong and well-considered effort in this direction is surely needed in these days, when reading and writing, those tools of the mind, are made the property of every one, and, unless some guidance in their use be added, are likely to be employed rather in waste and destruction than in cultivation and building up. Working people would often feel a great deal more interest in great books, if they could first know a little of the writers' real lives; and how many of them have felt their own needs and struggles, and even shared in their employments. Why should not every farmer's boy in Great Britain know about Bloomfield and the Bethunes, and every labourer, of Hugh Miller, and every journeyman baker, of Reboul, the French poet, and Dick of Thurso? Let each see what his own class can do, and has done, and then in time he will feel that "Labour compels" may be as lofty a standard as "Noblesse oblige."

Think of the beauty, too, that timely gifts could introduce into cottage homes—soundness of fabric, and truth of pattern and colour not yet too commonly found in village shops—and not likely to be found there, till gifts create a demand for them. Think of a substantial Turkey red covering for the old "settle" chair in place of gaudy chintz; of honest cocoa-matting in lieu of flaring drugget, of hand-knit counterpanes, or home-made screens. It seems to us that the young "chatelaines" would be often doing better charitable work in making things like these to be bestowed, warm with kind thoughts and words, on humble neighbours, or old servants, than they are, when stitching the richest crewel work or the daintiest macrame to be sold below cost price at some flaring fancy bazaar.

Only we would warn anybody who thinks to give heed to these hints, that their right carrying out will involve real care and pains and expenditure of time or money, or both. We have seen some efforts on these lines which have been worse than nugatory, resulting in the dissemination of cheap oleographs of over-dressed children, and simpering "beauties," of worthless story-books and insipid compilations, of cardboard "decorative plates," and bottles of evil-savoured "scent." Let the realism of that last item prove us realistic. We speak only of what we have actually smelt! We cannot forget the occasion. It was in an old schoolhouse, in a wild, outlying country district. The low, brown room was filled with healthy peasant children, over whose heads, peered older faces, many grand with life's deepest experiences, while through the wide windows, we looked out on the afternoon sun sinking behind the bare blue hills. And the chatelaine, shopping in the cheaper districts of some capital city, had bought her trumpery gifts by the pound, whether of weight or of cash—and had sent them down to this place and to these people! O, I think the squires of olden time did not give shoddy flannel nor adulterated tea. I think there was no flannel so warm as theirs, and no tea so good! When we flatter ourselves that we are going on to better things, let us take this leaf out of their old book; let us be heedful that our gifts are as sincere and as sound as theirs.

Again there is a class which needs help as sorely as ever, though it is sometimes apt to be overlooked and pushed aside in the march of modern ideas. This is the class of beaten men and women—of the old, the weakly, the utterly worn out, to whom bracing "help to help themselves" often means no help at all. Their day is over; their life's journey is drawing to a close; the most that kindness can do is to light a candle for them in the gathering twilight, or to remove a stone that threatens to trip their stumbling steps. For these people, the very consciousness of such a protecting, providing supervision, as others are likely to resent, is in itself the greatest benefit and blessing. To be summoned to the Hall, or the Great Farm, to sit awhile in the comfortable dining-room, and be asked a few kindly questions, does them quite as much good as the little gift they carry away with them. Who does not know the grim story of the poor childish old crone, led out to be burned as a witch, who, rubbing her hands, and looking round with a smile, said: "Eh! it's long since I saw sic a bonny fire, and sic a pleasant company!" What a picture of dumb chill and desolation is here suggested, and yet it does not much exaggerate the tenor of many a poor "old body's" life.

Why should not the squire, or the rich farmer, or, for that matter, the great manufacturer, or the big shopkeeper, having made up his mind how much he can spare to cheer these old folks, send for as many of them as his means will reach, and try to find out on what they have set their hearts, or where the shoe pinches sorest? He will find, probably, that in the fulfilment of some little wish or the removal of some pressing need, he will give them an unlooked for and exquisite pleasure at a lower cost than he would have expended to satisfy his own sense of fitness and generosity. (There is no reason why he should not give "what is over," or extend his economised largesse to another old lady). The writer has heard a hard-working old fishwife say, as she looked at a dilapidated "family" chest of drawers: "If I could see that done up, real nice, I'd die happy!" One pensioner would be made prosperous by the gift of a few fowls; another by payment for a little help in her garden, for whose heavier labours she has grown unfit. A third wants a pair of spectacles of rather a costly make; a fourth would like a bed rest for an invalid daughter, and so on, till, perhaps, one worthy woman whose hard-working life has secured some provision for her still industrious age, thankfully accepts a "school fee" for the benefit of some orphaned child with whom she cheerfully shares her cup of milk and her loaf of bread, and binds that apple-cheeked urchin to industry and well-doing, by reminders of his benefactor's interest in him, and certain disappointment or pleasure, in his disgrace or progress. And influence such as this, is surely the true glory of all "giving," for as St. Chrysostom says, "To know the art of alms, is greater than to be crowned with the diadem of kings; and yet to convert one soul is greater than to pour out ten thousand talents into the baskets of the poor."

And above all, let us never forget that "it is more blessed to give than to receive." Our gratitude to God who enables us to bestow, should far exceed anything we expect from those who take from us. Yet let them on their side, remember that by their thankful reception and right use of our gifts and good offices, they are giving us the greatest of all gifts. For it has been pertinently asked "If it is more blessed to give than to receive, then are not those who receive the greatest givers after all, because they give up the best part of the blessing?"

The Door.

"I am the door; by Me if any man enter in he shall be saved, and shall go in and shall go out and find pasture."

BE Thou to me the Door of every day—
Lord of my life—which I, with footstep due
And head bowed low in reverence, may pass through,
Feeling Thy early breath around me play;
And as I pass, Thy hand upon me lay,
Which like the lintel bears a sanguine hue,
And bid me, trusting in Thy grace, pursue
The destined windings of my unknown way.
Thus meeting each new morrow I shall find,
Amid the rocks which round my path are strewn,
Some green retreat secure from sun and wind—
Where I may rest and ruminate at noon
Or peaceful eve, and bless the guidance kind
Which with the burden sends the healing boon.

WONDROUS WORKS.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that believeth on Me, the works that I do shall he do also; and greater (works) than these shall he do; because I go unto the Father."—John xiv. 12.

THIS promise would be sufficiently wonderful if given only to the Twelve, as a pledge of supernatural grace and apostolic power. But when Christ speaks thus, as the words evidently imply, to all who believe, and rests the fulfilment of the promise on the sole condition of their faith, the magnificence and mystery of the assurance become almost overwhelming. "Greater works" than the works of the Son of God! Is the disciple then to be beyond his Master, and are the achievements of the finite and the sinful to surpass the deeds of the Incarnate God?

The explanation, however, is simple. The "works" are still the works of Christ Himself, accomplished through His servants on earth. When He adds as the ground of the promise: "because I go unto the Father," He does not mean as some superficial expositors have read the words: "You must henceforth carry on the work in My absence:" but He means that His presence with the Father would imply His presence with His people also, to fill them with His own Spirit and arm them with His own might. "I go away," was but half the truth. In a sense most deep and true, He came again to His bereaved disciples; and their lives and works were henceforth all His own. "Those things which Christ wrought through me" is an apostolic phrase: and in this lies all the secret. His presence was real though invisible; and never, in Bethany or Jerusalem, or on the mount of Beatitudes, or by the still waters of Gennesaret, was He so near to His disciples, as He was when He had ascended to His Father's throne. Their enemies "marvelled at their boldness, and took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus." Yes: it was that, and something more. They were "with Jesus" still—with Him who lived, and spoke, and acted in them, with a power more mighty and beneficent than miracle.

It was plainly the purpose of Christ to raise the thoughts of His followers from the "signs and wonders" which accompanied His earthly ministry to that yet diviner working which should through all time attend the preaching of the Gospel and the testimony of His Church.

"I go unto the Father." On earth His presence and work were necessarily restricted by limitations of time and place. He was in Galilee, or in Jerusalem, or beside the well of Samaria, or in the home at Bethany. Often those whom He visited sought to detain Him, but He must depart. "Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also, for therefore came I forth." Nor only so, but he belonged to one people; to the vast world without He was unknown. "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Wonderful were His miracles; but they too were localised, restricted. We gaze in reverence and affection upon His form, as in divine compassion He stands before imploring mothers, and gives back their darlings in life and health to their embrace; but we think of other wistful mothers, who may have waited, vainly longing that the Healer would come that way. How many a funeral passed through other city gates than those of Nain! How many sisters besides Martha and Mary sadly mourned their dead! To end all such restrictions, to manifest His presence always, everywhere, to all, was the purpose of the Ascension. And the forms of beneficent activity, partially displayed on earth, reappear in yet more wondrous works of love. For every miracle, in what it wrought and in what it left undone, was a type of something greater than itself, of a larger, holier, mightier ministry.

The physical is ever a type of the spiritual. Miracles were intended for a threefold purpose; to arouse, to attest, and to symbolise. The two former functions we recognise and earnestly maintain. There is in our day a tendency to undervalue these mighty deeds, as though, instead of confirming the great message, they themselves needed confirmation. Such disparagement is contrary to the reason of the case, as well as to the plain teaching of the Gospels. It was fitting that a new revelation should be heralded by signs and wonders, if only to arouse the attention of mankind. In miracle, to use the bold comparison of John Foster, the great bell of the universe was solemnly rung, that men might give heed to the sermon that was to follow. And with this there was attestation also. The miracles were a manifest token of beneficent Omnipotence, and therefore of the Divine. "If I do not the works of the Father," said the Saviour, "believe Me not." All this we maintain, while still we repeat that the physical, in this case as in others, was for the sake of the spiritual; and miracles both prepared the way, and helped to unveil the meaning, of that which was greater than themselves.

We add another thought, which throws light on many things in our Lord's ministry, as well as on the progress of revelation in the New Testament. While His earthly life continued, the glad tidings of His love could not be fully told. He came not simply to declare a truth, but to accomplish redemption: and until this had been accomplished, the truth could only be partially declared. "Behold," He says, "I do miracles, and work cures, to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected." "I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened until it be accomplished!"—straitened, fettered, repressed; as by some stern present necessity, keeping back the pent-up flood of love! We wonder sometimes that there is so much more on the way of acceptance with God, and the doctrines that accompany salvation, in the Epistles than in the Four Gospels, as though Christ's disciples had more to tell of the glad news of eternal life than had Christ Himself! Through these days of His earthly ministry His hour had not yet come. He calls the weary and heavy laden to seek their rest in Him, but as yet they cannot understand how He has assumed their burden: He says to the heartbroken penitent: "Thy faith hath saved thee, go in peace," but as she weeps and trusts, she cannot know the greatness of that salvation and the warrant for that perfect peace. He depicts the Shepherd going forth into the wilderness in quest of the wanderer from the flock; but it is impossible yet to describe the pangs which the Shepherd must endure, and to beseech the erring, by all the love and sorrow of the Cross, to turn to God. "My spirit breaketh with longing," He may well have said. And meanwhile, we discern in His miracles the glimpses and foreshadowings of His redeeming work. These miracles, as continued by His Apostles for a time, still served the old purpose of arousing attention and confirming faith; but their great meaning as symbols of spiritual power gradually became less important as that power was more directly manifested. So they passed away—the vibrations of that "great bell of the universe" became fainter and fainter—then died into silence, that the air might be filled only with the music of salvation.

And still in the greater works wrought by the Gospel there is the answering reality to those deeds of wonder. To-day, as of old, the sinner loathsome in his guilt, comes to Jesus with the appeal, "Lord, if Thou wilt, Thou canst make me clean," and the Redeemer's answer is still as ready and as gracious as to the leper of Galilee, "I will; be thou clean." And on the ears which sin had deafened, He pours the music of heavenly love; and the lips which sin had sealed in almost hopeless silence He loosens to utter a celestial song. To the weary and hungry in life's wilderness, He imparts in rich profusion the bread of everlasting life. To Him the mother brings her child, and cries, like her of Syrophenicia, "Lord, help me," not in vain to Him who still imparts with a richer sweetness "the children's bread." And blind Bartimæus still sits by the wayside as "Jesus of Nazareth passeth by." Still, out of ignorance and spiritual night, he utters the appeal, "Jesus, have mercy upon me!" Still do the ready messengers of the Saviour's love say to the suppliant "Rise and come, He calleth thee,"; and still does the newly-enlightened spirit hear with bounding ecstasy the words "Thy faith hath saved thee!" Or if, to complete the parallel, we may pass to yet sublimer wonders, we may behold the Christ in the omnipotence of love, beside the grave of spiritual death, and may hear Him say to the sleeper there, as to Lazarus in his corruption, "Come forth." These are the wonders of the Gospel—the works greater than miracles, which His ministers and witnesses accomplish amongst men, "because He has gone unto the Father."

And these are the credentials of His Church. Once in the Saviour's earthly life there came to Him the messengers of one whose faith perhaps had faltered, with the anxious question: "Art Thou He that should come, or look we for another?" The answer of Jesus was an appeal to the works that He had wrought. "Go and tell John the things which ye do hear and see; the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have good tidings preached to them." That question of the Baptist is still the appeal of a longing world: Art Thou He that should come?—the Saviour who can remove the guilt, the Healer who can assuage the sorrow, the Friend who can bind up the broken heart? Sometimes the question is asked in cold scepticism, sometimes in despairing anxiety, sometimes with awakening hope. But in whatever tone it may be presented, it is the mission of the Church to reply, "It is He: and we are His witnesses." How, then, shall this assurance be made strong, beyond all possibility of cavil? It is good to construct elaborate arguments on this high theme, to write our books of evidences, to confute, as we can, triumphantly, the allegations of unbelief. But has not the Master taught us a still more excellent way? Let us tell what things we "have seen and heard." The true demonstration of the Gospel is, as of old, the enlightening of the blind, the raising of the dead, the proclamation of glad tidings to the poor. Dr. Watts has a homely verse which sums up many arguments:

> Learning and wit may cease their strife
> When miracles with glory shine:
> The voice that calls the dead to life
> Must be Almighty and Divine.

The years, as they quickly pass, witness new forms of opposition to the truth, and the defenders of the faith are often anxious how best to meet the forces of unbelief. Let them, amid all their wise endeavours, be assured of this: that the most effective way will be to set forth Christ Jesus in His power and love. What has He wrought for the world? What has He wrought for ourselves?

> "He is His own best evidence,
> His witness is within.
> No fable old, nor mythic lore,
> Nor dream of bards and seers,
> No dead fact, stranded on the shore
> Of the oblivious years:—
> But warm, sweet, tender, even yet
> A present help is He;
> And faith has still its Olivet,
> And love its Galilee.
> The healing of His seamless dress
> Is by our beds of pain;
> We touch Him in life's throng and press,
> And we are whole again.
> O Love! O Life! our faith and sight
> Thy presence maketh one;
> As through transfigured clouds of white
> We trace the noonday sun.
> So to our mortal eyes subdued,
> Flesh-veiled, but not concealed,
> We know in Thee the fatherhood
> And heart of God revealed.
> Alone, O Love ineffable!
> Thy saving name is given;
> To turn aside from Thee is hell,
> To walk with Thee is heaven." S. G. G.

HEART'S-EASE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "VIOLET'S MISSION," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"ETHEL, darling, I cannot stay a moment longer. I shall loose my train. Good-bye!"

It was Colonel Seymour who spoke. He was standing at the foot of the staircase, in his fine old-fashioned country house, in Holmsdale, calling to his daughter who had not yet made her appearance, although it was nine o'clock on a delicious morning in August, and all the house had been open to the sweet summer air hours ago.

"She is coming, Reginald," said the Colonel's sister, who just now emerged from Ethel's bed-room, and came slowly down the stairs, a tall, somewhat severe-looking lady, who bore upon her face the story of a life of suffering. "She will not be a moment, but I do so fear your having to run for your train. It is so bad for you to have to hurry," she said.

"Well, my dear, if I am to catch it at all, I must go now. The child wished so much to say good-bye, that I should like to gratify her, but I really cannot stay another moment," and he inclined his head towards his sister as she approached him, and imprinted a kiss on her cheek.

"Good-bye, Regina, be patient with the child," he said.

"Of course I shall be patient, Reginald," Miss Seymour said, but with such a look of wounded affection as showed that her brother's words had stung her a little. "You quite spoil the child. It is altogether her own fault. She would not get up when she was called and she ought to be reproved. I think it would do her good if you did not say good-bye to her."

They had walked together out on the gravel path, where Colonel Seymour stood for a moment, tapping his boot impatiently with his stick, as though he was much disturbed in mind at having to go without seeing his daughter. Then, there was a sound of a door being opened within the house, not as doors usually are, but violently, and suddenly, and there came rushing down the stairs, three steps at a time, a tall dark-haired girl of thirteen, who, to judge by the manner in which she ran out of the house, seemed much more likely to be going to a train than her father.

"You are in such a dreadful hurry, papa!" she cried, as she followed the Colonel, who was by this time well on his way down the garden. Miss Regina saw the vision flash by her, as she stood looking after her brother, and she sighed as she watched the slight and graceful figure disappearing down the drive.

"She will always be the same wild, and impulsive child," she said, as she turned back into the house, and took refuge in the little sunny breakfast-room, to await Ethel's return.

Panting from the exertion, Ethel soon overtook her father, and putting her arm through his, she clung to him with that child-like dependence which always touched his heart, and made him tender.

"I am so sorry I kept you, papa darling! I know I'm a bad, bad, girl, but you must not be very angry with me. I'll try to be better," and she turned her sunny face up to his, with such an arch look of love in it that he could not do otherwise than he did. He kissed it. She was just then, he thought, so very like his dear dead wife. The same dark eyes, and splendid hair, and above all, the same wealth of affection, which in Ethel, however, was almost boisterous. For a moment, a shade seemed to rest on his fine face, and then he said seriously, but lovingly, "Ethel, darling, you give me much anxiety of late. You are getting a big girl now, and I grieve to see you so inconsiderate."

"Oh, papa, how can you say such horrid things?" she asked, looking up with anxiety and reproach.

"But they have to be said, Ethel. Your aunt is constantly complaining of your thoughtlessness, and indifference. It troubles me, more than I can tell you."

"Oh! but Aunt Regina is always complaining of somebody. You know she is awfully cross when she is not well, and that is nearly always. She is as cross as two sticks to-day." And Ethel, as she said this, clung closer to her father's side, and looked up in his face with the most blithe and merry expression. Then her manner changed, and she said more gravely, "She is not a bit like what darling mamma was. Nurse says she was always gentle and kind to every body." Then she stopped suddenly, seeing a look in her father's face which she knew only too well. She had touched a chord that made him quiver. It was as though he had received a sudden shock of pain. She would not willingly utter a word that could wound one whom she loved so well, but this was just one of those instances of thoughtlessness, of which Aunt Regina complained, and not without reason, you may be sure.

No one knew how terrible a blow it had been to Colonel Seymour, that loss to which Ethel had just alluded. Some said it had changed him completely, and that his grief was excessive. Certainly he seemed to lose interest in his home, and to choose rather to go abroad than to stay at Holmsdale after that event. He walked on in silence for a few seconds, and Ethel was watching his face intently, for the moment when the cloud would disappear. She tried to hasten its departure by saying, "I wish Aunt Regina was like you. I never can understand your being twins. She looks so stern always that I believe she ought to have been a man. She would make a fine soldier. Used she to fight with you when you were both in the cradle together? I'm sure she had all the toys to play with."

Colonel Seymour smiled. Ethel's merry chatter had often lifted the cloud from his heart, as it seemed to have done now, and all trace of pain disappeared from his face, as he took her dark hair in his fingers, and told her she was talking treason as well as nonsense.

"One would think, Ethel, to hear you talk, that you did not love your aunt," he said.

"Oh, yes, I do. But she never laughs at me, as you do. She sits up straight in her chair, just like a man in a sentry-box."

Colonel Seymour could not help laughing. The picture was very deftly drawn, for, indeed, Miss Regina had an air of stiffness and severity about her, which her brother had often alluded to, but which was more the result of her bodily ailments, than of any real stiffness or severity of nature.

"I know one thing," he said, as he laughed, and drew the long hair through his hand. "Aunt Regina would need to be a sentry when she has the care of such a wild creature as this."

"And don't you think that I have a great deal to put up with? Think how she worries me—as she did this morning, because I was not ready before you started." But although Ethel tried to look aggrieved, she only succeeded in looking saucy.

"My darling, you must really try to be a little more obedient and considerate. You know how dearly Aunt Regina loves you, and how great a sufferer she has been. I am sure you could help her, if you tried."

"And I do try, papa, but she won't let me, She says I spoil everything I put my fingers to. Is not that unkind?"

"It may be true, you know," her father said, smiling, but with a troubled look on his face, as though the relations between his sister and his child, were not quite what he would wish them to be.

They had now reached the gate which gave access from the grounds of Holmsdale, to the high road, and about a mile away, through the amber woods, the railway station was visible.

"I must hasten my steps, Ethel," her father said, "and on my return this afternoon I hope to hear a very good account of you."

The parting was very tender and affectionate on both sides. For a moment or so, Ethel clung to her father, almost passionately, as though she would not let him go. Indeed, he had to use some little force to disengage her arms, and when he looked at her, he noticed that her eyes were full of tears.

"What is the matter, darling?" he asked.

"You are going away angry with me," she said.

"No, no, Ethel!" he exclaimed, "you must not think that I am angry, because I tell you what is good for you. I only want you to be happy, and there can be no real happiness without obedience. Now good-bye, darling. Trains will not wait, even for my Ethel," and with a parting kiss, he strode away, erect, and military, so that Ethel, as she looked after him from the gate, could not but smile, and wave him a kiss, as he turned at the corner to wave her one in return. Then he was gone, and she turned back, stopping every now and then to pluck a few flowers, which she bound into a pretty bunch, and carried into the house.

"Ethel, Ethel, darling! your breakfast is getting cold. Come at once," cried Miss Regina, from the sunny breakfast room, where this morning, as always the earliest glimpses of the sunshine were welcomed by the canary which hung just now by the open window, piping his morning song with wild pleasure.

Ethel tossed her head impatiently. She would not have car d for Aunt Regina to see her tossing it, but it was a very common practice of hers lately. She called back in reply to her aunt, "All right, aunt, I am coming," and immediately went off in the direction of the drawing-room.

I really think it was growing upon her, this habit of doing just what she was asked not to do. She knew quite well that breakfast had been waiting for her for more than an hour, and that Aunt Regina greatly disliked keeping the breakfast things on the table longer than was necessary. She was beginning to feel that her influence over her father was enough to shield her against any serious displeasure, and she was foolish enough to indulge the hope that she could be her own mistress in everything, even over the authority of her aunt.

You will not need me to tell you, what you have found out by this time for yourself, that Ethel was a spoiled child. She had been petted from her cradle, but more than ever so since her mother's death. Aunt Regina was the only one who tried seriously to counteract this state of things. She did her best to be at once kind and strict, but having had much trouble in her life, and her health not being of the best, she found it hard to combine both, and her slight erect figure, so like her brother's, gave one the impression of stiffness, which did not belong to her. Ethel's description of the sentry-box was really life-like, excepting that the sentries do not, as a rule, sit in their boxes, and Aunt Regina seldom stood for any length of time.

Then, Miss Regina's duties were very much those of a sentry. She had to exercise watch over her niece, as seriously as any sentry on duty. Of late years, indeed, she had hardly a minute's peace. All day long she had to act her part of guardian with as much forbearance as she could command. If she sometimes failed in her efforts to be kind, the fault was not so much hers as Ethel's.

She rose from her chair, now, somewhat impatiently. She was in pain to-day, and the exertion of moving was in itself a trouble.

"She might have come when I called her," she said to herself, with tightened lips, as she walked towards the drawing-room. She knew that Ethel would in all probability be there. When she reached the door, she found it ajar, and looking in, without attracting her niece's attention, she saw her holding a very delicate and valuable vase in her hand, and filling it with flowers. At another time she might have considered the effect of calling out suddenly and sharply, but now she was irritated and in pain, and her only anxiety was to get the child to her breakfast.

"Ethel! you are exceedingly troublesome. Come to your break——"

There she stopped and uttered a little cry of alarm, for with a start and a scream, Ethel dropped the vase, which fell in pieces on the carpet.

"Oh, Ethel, Ethel! your father's favourite vase. It was a present to him from your mother!" Aunt Regina exclaimed, as she hastened to the scene of the disaster.

"You made me drop it, Aunt Regina. How could you call out like that?" Ethel asked, turning her flushed face to her aunt and speaking rapidly.

Aunt Regina made no reply. Already she was on her knees trying to gather up the fragments of the prized vase, which was broken beyond all hope of restoration.

HOMELY LIGHTS ON HALLOWED TEXTS.

NO. I.

"He that keepeth thee will not slumber. . . . The Lord is thy keeper."—Psalm, cxxi. 3.

I HAVE called these papers, in which I hope to speak very simply to the boys and girls who may read them, "Homely Lights," for two reasons. They are meant to be just such words as may be spoken during the quiet Sabbath hours when our thoughts rest upon the truths which are able to make us wise unto salvation.

It is my privilege to speak to children, in public very frequently, on those hallowed subjects, and I have always found that the most homely words are the most welcome. Now, I shall try to speak in these pages, just as I should if I had my readers to listen to what I said, but I am reminded that if all the readers of the SUNDAY AT HOME were gathered together, no human voice could make itself heard to the limits of so great an assembly.

These then, are to be "homely lights." I know a young gentleman who possesses an exceedingly good microscope, given to him by an eminent astronomer, and he spends a good deal of his leisure time in procuring and examining specimens, such as drops of pond-water full of life, the legs of insects, not torn from the poor living victims, as I have heard of some boys doing, but taken from dead objects, and so forth. Sometimes I am invited to peep through the eye-piece at the object, and it frequently happens that I fail to see anything but a dim and meaningless mass. When I express my dissappointment, the young gentleman in question says at once, with an air of authority, and as though he knew all about it, "Oh! you have not got the light on it," and he generally proves to be right.

Just so, we want the light if we are to understand the wonders of the microscope; and how much more do we need the light when we seek to understand God's Holy Word. We are promised the Holy Spirit if we ask for it, and He is the great enlightener, the great teacher. May He enlighten both the writing and the reading of these homely words!

Sometimes a very simple illustration will throw much light on deep and holy truths. An illustration is like a picture, and we are all fond of looking at pictures. They bring things before us so clearly, that we seem to understand them as we never did before.

I read in the Times newspaper of the 22nd November last, the following account headed "A Hero's Funeral."

"Captain Grace, of the Atlantic liner America, and commodore of the National Line, was interred at Bebington cemetery on Saturday, in the presence of a large concourse of people. During the recent heavy gales in the Atlantic, Captain Grace remained at his post for forty-eight hours, though almost frozen to death, and drenched with the waves. When the gale moderated, he went to his cabin, took to his bed, and died in a few hours from inflammation of the lungs."

This hero did not slumber. When I read the account of his devotion and death, it brought to my mind the words of another captain, a dear friend of mine (who I am glad to say, is a disciple of Him who is the great "Captain of our salvation"), when describing the terrors of the passengers on board his splendid steamer, during a gale in winter. When the storm was at its height, and the timbers creaked, and the good ship tossed terribly, many of the more timid made anxious enquiry for the captain. They were told that he was at his post of duty on the bridge, and that as long as the gale lasted he would remain there. Such a post of duty is no light one, when the storm is out upon the waters, and, as sometimes happens, the captain's waterproof coat is blown to ribbons by the gale. Not light, you may be sure, with the icy waves sending their blinding foam in drenching torrents over the bridge where he stands—with the care of hundreds of precious lives to add to his anxieties—knowing that upon his watchfulness and skill greatly depends, under God, whether the groaning ship shall weather the storm, or go down with all hands. The captain's post of duty, then, is a post of danger such as few can realise, for he must be ready, like noble Captain Grace, to sacrifice his own life for the salvation of those under his care.

He must not sleep. Yet our text speaks of one mighty to save, as well as mighty to keep. The most heroic captain cannot always save his ship. A sudden break in the machinery may render all his watchfulness of no avail, and with every willingness to die to save his passengers and crew, all may be lost. Yet even then, when all earthly hope is lost, how cheering to remember, "The Lord is thy keeper." "He that keepeth thee will not slumber." He holdeth the waters "in the hollow of His hand," and if we are His, we are safe there. We know of whom it is written, "He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him."

And are not our lives—yours and mine—just like a voyage? We are sailing out upon another year, and we may have to encounter storms and trials. Oh! that we could feel that the great Captain of our salvation was really directing our lives, that His watchful eye marked every danger, and overruled it. So that whenever the storms of life shall come, we may be able to say with the confidence of trustful children, whose Father holds the helm of their lives, "He that keepeth me, will not slumber . . . The Lord is my keeper."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. I.

The town where Elymas was stricken low?
Father of Mordecai's relentless foe?
Where did the heathen house of Dagon stand?
(God's ark was brought there out of Israel's land.)
Town by two kings beseiged: one fell in fight,
Pierced by an arrow in its random flight?
First-born of one who Canaan's country trod
To spy it out—he "wholly followed" God?
In Matthew's Messianic line find one,
The sire of Achim—he was Azor's son?
A woman whom an angel drove from home,
And sent her in an unknown world to roam?
The tribal name of him who vainly tried
To utter "Shibboleth," and, failing, died?
The church to whom there came this warning word:
"Remember how thou hast received and heard?"

Initial letters and the finals tell
Two names in Gospel story;
On both the Saviour's condemnation fell,
In all their pride and glory.

The Best Hundred Hymns.

The Editors of the SUNDAY AT HOME offer Prizes to the amount of £5, £3, and £2 for the most approved Lists of ONE HUNDRED ENGLISH HYMNS; the awards being to those Lists which shall most nearly correspond with the Hundred that receive in the aggregate the highest number of votes.

No restrictions are placed upon the choice of the Hymns. Metrical versions of the Psalms may be included: also Translations from ancient and modern languages. It is confidently believed that the collective judgment of many readers will yield very interesting and valuable results. Not that a vote could be regarded as a test of absolute excellence; it would be but an index to comparative acceptance, popularity and usefulness; and would assuredly point out much that is choicest in Christian Psalmody. The list of the approved Hundred Hymns will be printed in the SUNDAY AT HOME; and some articles on Christian Hymnody will follow.

Lists must be sent in by the 1st of February, and the award will be made as soon as possible afterwards.

Only the first line of each Hymn, with the Author's name, where ascertainable, should be written. It is suggested that competitors should employ quarto ruled paper, and write only on one side.

Lists should be addressed to The Editors of the SUNDAY AT HOME, 56 Paternoster Row, London, with the word Hymns on the lower left hand corner of the envelope. The Editors cannot engage in private correspondence on the subject, nor can they return any of the Lists.

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

LUTHER IN THE PULPIT.

A SERMON IN THE OLD TIMES. Pattersen.

"OH, how I trembled when, for the first time, I had to go into the pulpit; but they forced me to preach." "Under this very pear-tree," said Luther, "I have opposed Doctor Staupitz, with fifteen different arguments, against my having a vocation to preach, and at last I said, 'Herr doctor Staupitz, you want to kill me. I shall not live three months.' He replied, 'Well, so be it, our Lord has many important things to be done; clever people are wanted up yonder.'"

Thus began a preacher whose ministry occupies such a place in history that it might, without impropriety, be described in the words of the Apocalypse: "And I saw another mighty angel come down from heaven, clothed with a cloud, and a rainbow was on his head, and his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire: and he had in his hand a little book open: and he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot on the earth, and cried with a loud voice as when a lion roareth: and when he had cried, seven thunders uttered their voices."

In a tumbledown little wooden chapel that had been put up in the market-place of Wittenberg, while the church of the Augustines was being built, Luther first preached the Gospel as it had been revealed to him. The man who then occupied the leading place in the university of Wittenberg—Pollich—said, "This monk will revolutionise the whole system of scholastic teaching." He did more, for when he was allowed to leave Aristotle for the Bible, his mode of explaining the Scriptures seemed like the dawn of day after a long, dark night. "One would have said," reports Melanchthon, "that Christ, the apostles and prophets, were coming forth from darkness, and a loathsome dungeon."

"Coming forth" was Luther's own descriptive phrase of the first characteristic required in the preacher. Did he not get it from the eighty-eighth psalm, which so exactly expressed the deep dejection in which he had for years existed at Erfurt? "I am shut up, and I cannot come forth," was the burden of his cry to Staupitz.

But the keys of his prison-house had been found, the line of the creed—"I believe in the forgiveness of sins"; the passage from Habbakuk—"The just shall live by faith," had delivered his soul, and he had come forth like Lazarus from a temporary grave. Yet it is evident that Luther attached a still higher meaning to the phrase, for he said, "the preacher should come forth, that is, prove himself one called to preach, one who can and must preach. He must come forth as Moses from Mount Sinai, as John the Baptist into the country round about Jordan. He must in short be sent with a heavenly message."

If Luther had such a character, it was singularly obscured by his personal peculiarities. His body was anything but angelic, nothing but his eyes spoke of heaven. Those who looked into them felt they were in the presence of a soul whose springs were deeper than their's. But, oh! the perplexities of that profound mind, it saw the opposed sides of truth, but with all its efforts it could not reconcile them, and his expression was thus at times, chaotic and obscure. These apparent contradictions characterised his discourses, and greatly perplexed his hearers. Dr. Jonas once said to him, "Herr doctor, I can't at all follow you in your sermons." Said Luther, with child-like candour, "I can't do it myself."

But if he was clothed with a cloud, there was a rainbow upon his head: if his doctrine was at times wrapped in obscurities, the Gospel he proclaimed was nothing less than the everlasting covenant between God and man, a covenant declared and secured by the coming of Christ in the flesh.

To use the simple summary of Melanchthon:—"He pointed out the difference between the Law and the Gospel. He refuted the error then prevalent in churches and schools, that men merit forgiveness of sins by their own works, and are rendered righteous before God by means of external discipline. He thus brought back the hearts of men to the Son of God. Like John the Baptist, he pointed to the Lamb of God who had taken away the sins of the world. He explained how sins are pardoned freely for the sake of the Son of God and how man receives this blessing through faith."

In preaching these doctrines he was most happy. If we forget his obscurities and set aside his bursts of anger against those he conceived were doing the work of the devil, who ever spoke in a more buoyant, radiant manner of divine things? It was evident that he himself loved the God whose praise he delighted to proclaim.

MARTIN LUTHER AS PREACHER.
From a Contemporary Sketch.

He who studies the portraits of Luther will see that such was the sincerity of his character that his feet as truly manifest the man as his face. Never did a human being seem more firmly planted than Luther when he stood up to speak. His attitude recalls the words:

> His back against a rock he bore,
> And firmly placed his foot before:
> Come one, come all! this rock shall fly
> From its firm base as soon as I.

And what was the rock upon which Luther leant but the Bible? In all his full-length portraits he is represented with "a little book open in his hands." It is the sacred volume which it was Luther's peculiar work to induce men once again to study.

The passage we have presumed to apply to Luther says, "And he cried with a loud voice as when a lion roareth." Such indeed was the impression his sermons left even on himself. "My style," he says, writing to a friend, "is awkward, rough, breaking forth like a deluge; a chaos of words; turbulent and impetuous as a wrestler who struggles with a thousand monsters one after the other; and if I may dare compare little things with great, it seems to me that something of the double portion of the Elijah-spirit has been given me: rapid as the wind, devouring as the fire, rending the mountains and breaking the rocks asunder."

Those who can only think of pulpit power in association with vast congregations will be surprised to learn that all the inhabitants of Wittenberg together—men, women and children—were not equal in numbers to more than two-thirds of Mr. Spurgeon's congregation. Nor were there ever scenes attending Luther's preaching such as have often been the case in all lands and under different creeds. No doubt there were times of great excitement in connection with Luther's career, but we can only remember one in connection with his preaching, and that was caused by his attitude towards the Anabaptists and the revolt of the peasants.

Yet his word has had more powerful results than that of any preacher since the days of the Apostles. The commission which Pope Innocent II. openly affirmed to be his:—"Behold I have put my words in thy mouth. See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms to root out, and to pull down, and to destroy, and to throw down and to build and to plant"—was never more manifestly realised than in the case of Luther. For he undoubtedly gave the signal for that series of great revolutions which brought about in so many countries the overthrow of the old Church and the old State and the erection of new ones in their place. No preacher more manifestly brought a sword into the world than Luther. If Luther were only Luther, and not manifestly the representative man of the Reformation, it would sound like wild exaggeration to connect with his preaching such stupendous events as the Peasant Revolt of 1523–1525; the first German Religious War of 1546–1555; the Civil Wars in France, 1562–1595; the Revolt in the Netherlands, 1568–1609; the Thirty Years' War in Germany, 1619–1648; the Civil War in England, 1642–1645; the Great Revolution in France, 1789–1794.

Those who reflect over these things will see that there must have been something more poignant, more searching in the word of Luther than in that, for example, of Savonarola. The great preacher of Florence seems in appearance a more revolutionary character, yet nothing follows from his word comparable in point of destructiveness or constructiveness to that of Luther. The preacher of Wittenberg was in the profoundest sense a reformer, he went to the root of things. morals were bad enough in his days, the corruptions of the Church were as manifest as ever, but he soon saw that to attack the surface of things was not worth the effort. For what then did he labour? To give the people of Germany a new conception of religion. And to give them a new conception of religion, he gave them a new conception of God.

For Luther knew that here was the end of the whole matter: on the thought men have about God rests all they are, and all they do. On this, states, empires, churches, societies, are built up: the character of the God worshipped, necessarily comes out in all done in His Name. So he troubled himself but little concerning man compared to what he did about God. To proclaim the praise of God, this he declared ought to be the chief aim of the preacher; to teach men His commands according to His word, comes next; and lastly to exhort them to obedience. The glory of God was his first, his all-absorbing thought; the benefit of man only came in a secondary and quite subordinate sense.

This summary, however, covers much, for Luther's gospel and the pith of his teaching is to be found in the words of the apostle, as recorded in Acts xiii. 38, 39. "Through this Man [the risen Christ] is proclaimed unto you remission of sins: and by Him every one that believeth is justified from all things."

Yet how different to our idea of the object of preaching. Perhaps we deem it an old and exploded notion. Rather believe that Luther's is the old, the universal way, and one specially needed in great crises, and at moments when the world needs to be made young again by drinking deep at the Fount of Life.

RICHARD HEATH.

Trust On.

TRUST on, O doubting heart, though the mists gather—
Hope hides from eyes that are blinded by tears—
Trust on, O failing heart, knowing the Father
Tenderly scans all Thy doubts and Thy fears.

Trust on, O weary heart, though the mists gather,
Hiding each step of the way from thy sight;
All that thou findest will come from the Father,
All that He sends thee will surely be right.

Should'st thou find joy, then, O happy heart, take it
Gratefully, prayerfully, owning His love;
Should thy joy vanish, submission can make it
Shine in the star-crown that waits thee above!

Should it be ruth, 'twas thine own will that made it;
Should it be sorrow, then sorrow is sweet;
Trust on, and falter not, till thou hast laid it
Patiently, prayerfully down at His feet.

Sweetest the herb that a careless foot crushes:
Lay bare thine heart for the stroke of the rod:
Trust on, the fragrance from heart wounds that gushes
Wafts the tried soul to the bosom of God.

HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER II.—FRIENDS AND NEIGHBOURS.

BARBARA'S walk that day was taken with a purpose, and that purpose was only stimulated by the rather stormy interview she had just had with her brother. She felt as we all of us do, especially when we are young, that she wanted help and sympathy, and it did not seem to poor Barbara as if either of these good things was to be had within the walls of her home.

Her present destination was a small house in a very well-kept garden that stood amongst tall pine-trees not far from the cliff. It was a pretty and picturesque cottage, over which an atmosphere of peace and calm seemed to brood, as if, for its inhabitants at least, the battle of life were over, and the burden and heat of the day merged in the rest of eventide.

Barbara was evidently quite at home in this quiet home. She did not pause to ring the bell, but walked into the hall, and opened a door to the right that led into a small, but exceedingly quaint and pretty drawing-room. This room had two tenants; the first an old lady of nearly seventy summers, with a snowy mob cap and spotlessly neat attire, who was knitting in an easy chair with an open book before her; the second a young girl of perhaps two and twenty, who was also reading and making pencil notes as she did so, and whose face expressed by its lines and general expression, a kind of chronic restlessness and dissatisfaction. Both looked up as Barbara entered and greeted her with affection; but about the girl's manner there hung that inevitable constraint that generally makes difficult the first interview after a heavy trouble.

Mrs. Granby however had grown out of such embarrassments. She drew the girl towards her, and asked after all at home with a quiet composure of manner, that expressed sympathy without obtruding it; and Barbara was not long in finding out what a relief it was to have a friend like Mrs. Granby to whom she could pour out all her heart.

So out it all came—the difficulties of the position, the difficult choice that lay before Wulfric, the opinions of the majority, and Barbara's own indignant feeling that her favourite brother would be called upon to make a great sacrifice on behalf of his family, and be burdened with claims that must be an incubus upon him all his life, whilst all the time the fiction would be kept up that he was a lucky fellow, and that the debt of obligation was at least equally divided, if not altogether on his side.

"And you know, Mrs. Granby, they all said he had such a career before him in London. His senior surgeon and physician at the hospital both think so very highly of him. One of them has almost promised to take him into partnership in a few years' time. He has done so well in his examinations too; and to think of his being forced to give up everything he cares for, and sacrifice all his prospects to come and settle down as a humdrum country doctor. Oh, I can't bear to think of it!"

"He won't do it!" cried Juliet. "He ought not to do it. One might as well be buried alive as live in a place like this. Oh, if I were a man, I would be off to-morrow—be off, never, never return any more!" And Juliet clasped her hands together, and her eyes glowed almost fiercely.

But Barbara was looking at Mrs. Granby. She had heard Juliet's views on St. Hilda and its life many times before. It was the grandmother's opinions on the case she was anxious to have. Mrs. Granby had smiled a quiet little smile at Juliet's vehement speech; but now her face was grave and thoughtful.

"Your brother has not come home yet? You have not been able to learn his own wishes?"

"Not from his own lips; but there is no need of that to find out what his wishes will be. He has chosen his career for life, and his choice did not fall upon life at St. Hilda. The only question is whether he will be coerced into it now through force of circumstances."

"Or from a sense of duty," added Mrs. Granby quietly.

Barbara looked at her quickly.

"Do you think it is his duty to sacrifice everything for us?" she asked rather blankly.

"I think the question would require very close investigation. I should not like to pronounce hastily upon it; but, my dear, so long as a son has no wife to think for, his first duty is to his mother. Your mother is a widow now, and in feeble health, and Wulfric is the eldest son, and has qualified himself to take his father's place at the head of the household."

"He did not qualify himself for that," murmured Barbara almost resentfully.

"Man proposes, God disposes," answered Mrs. Granby with a smile that was very still and sweet. "We try to map out our lives for ourselves sometimes, but if we insist on taking the management out of His hands, He shows us our mistake later. Let us try to do duty first, and leave the rest to Him. His blessing will more than make up for all we seem to renounce. It seems a hard creed to us when we are young, but as we grow old and see our lives in perspective, God shows us the truth of His own words, that without Him we can do nothing, whilst with Him we can do all things. To do as His will seems to direct should be the aim and object of our lives."

Barbara made no reply, but Juliet broke in hastily, "I don't see that religion has anything to do with it, grandmother. I can't bear always mixing things up together. Wulfric may have to give up his own ambition possibly—though I think it would be a horrid shame if he has—to take Dr. Meynal's place; but if he does it, it will be just from a simple sense of duty. It hasn't got anything to do with religion, any more than the ordinary everyday things of life."

Juliet spoke with a good deal of covert irritability, and Mrs. Granby smiled as she said quietly, "Perhaps if our religion entered a little more into the everyday things of life, we should be wiser and happier than we are now."

But Juliet turned away impatiently, whilst Barbara said, "I think Wulf will try to do his duty."

"I think he will too."

"Only I do so wish it could be his duty to go back to London, and go on as he and father always meant him to. I'm afraid you think his duty is to stay here, Mrs. Granby," and she looked half wistfully into the old lady's face.

"I never like to pronounce judgment hastily, and there may be points connected with Wulfric's affairs of which I am ignorant; but I confess, it seems to me the wisest course open to him at present. He is the only member of the household that can keep things going, and he has no ties upon him—only a professional ambition to sacrifice. We all have to make sacrifices at some time in our lives, and we are generally the better for them afterwards. We have one great example always before us in Him who pleased not Himself."

A softer look crossed Barbara's face.

"I will try to think of that," she said, "but I am afraid I never shall be good. I do try, but I forget so soon as it all goes—and I have such a hasty temper."

Mrs. Granby smiled, and patted Barbara's clasped hands which lay upon her lap, as the girl sat at her feet. Barbara was a favourite with her, and had been from her babyhood upwards. The frank brightness of the girl pleased her, and she had plenty of sympathy for her wilful, wayward moods. She did not answer now, but looked in Barbara's face, and her eyes said a great deal.

And if the girl did not get quite the kind of sympathy she had hoped for, at any rate she went away soothed and comforted; and another little incident that occurred on her homeward way gave to her an additional sense of pleasure.

She was pursuing her road from the coast to the town, when she saw advancing towards her on horseback a girl of about her own age, and she said to herself, "Miss Dumaresq—how pretty she is!"

Mr. and Mrs. Dumaresq had lately taken and settled down in a large house near to the coast. It was the ill-health of the former that had induced them to give up their gay London life and come to this quiet place, and as they were "county people," and reported to be exceedingly wealthy and well connected, St. Hilda had been somewhat diffident in making their acquaintance, and at present they were but little known.

Dr. Meynal had attended Mr. Dumaresq, and calls had been exchanged between the ladies of the different houses; but no sense of intimacy had so far been established, and as it happened, Barbara had never exchanged a word with the daughter of the house. She was the more surprised, therefore, when the girl reined up as she reached her side, and looked down at her with a peculiar shy sweetness in her dark eyes.

"Please excuse me," said Reinée Dumaresq in a very gentle, musical voice, "but I felt I could not pass you without telling you how very, very sorry I am—for your sad loss."

The genuine ring of sympathy in the words brought unexpected tears to Barbara's eyes. Reinée saw them, and held out her little gloved hand, an answering glitter on her own long lashes.

"I am so sorry," she said again; "I have such a dear father—and he is ill—" and then her voice quivered a little, though she smiled bravely and sweetly as she moved away, as if half afraid of trusting herself to say more.

"That is Barbara," said Reinée to herself, as she rode along in the sunshine, "the one whose face I like in church, though the other sister is prettier. Juliet Granby says she is clever, and I am sure she is nice—she is so fond of her father. I should like her for my friend. I must ask mamma if I may invite her—she let me know Juliet directly. I think I like her face better than Juliet's. Perhaps she will help me to realise my ideal."

Barbara Meynal, Juliet Granby, and Reinée Dumaresq were all the same age—twenty-two—an age when childish things have been put away, when the soul begins to be stirred by the infinite possibilities of life, and yearns after all that is high and holy, beautiful and lofty, with a confidence in its own powers of realising an ideal that experience often sadly shakes and too often annihilates altogether. It is a time of mental growth and change, a time when life and its responsibilities assume new meanings and new importance, a time when the character often takes a decided bent either for good or ill, sometimes the motive power being from within, sometimes receiving an impression from the world without—an impression often stamped so deeply that the mark of it is never afterwards effaced. But whether for good or for evil, the impressions received at such a time do much to mould the unfolding mind.

Barbara and Juliet had led lives of great and unbroken seclusion at St. Hilda and had never known another home; but Reinée's life had been one of ceaseless gaiety and variety. The only daughter of her parents, she had been indulged and petted from her babyhood upwards, and her peculiarly bright and engaging disposition as well as her grace and beauty had made her a universal favourite wherever she had gone. Even in her nursery and school-room days she had never been shut up as many children and young girls are, and soon after she was seventeen she emerged from her nominal seclusion and went everywhere with her parents.

Courted, flattered, caressed and admired, with every wish of her heart gratified, and every fancy indulged, Reinée stood in great danger of being utterly spoiled, and of growing into a mere pleasure-seeker, with no thoughts above the enjoyment of the hour and the gratification of flattered vanity. It would have been small blame to her had she grown selfish, frivolous and conceited, for she had everything to make her so; and yet, in some wonderful way, she had been saved from being spoilt by the dangers of her position, or from falling into the snares spread around her.

Perhaps from seeing so much of the gay world of fashion Reinée had early been able to see that the glitter was not all gold. Possibly she had observed that there was not so very much of happiness amongst all these busy pleasure-hunters: that they were weary, discontented, capricious and full of grievances, often far more tired and worn out than the real workers who had not time to spare for over-much lamentation or grumbling at their lot. She might have observed much of this without analysing at the time what it meant or to what conclusion it pointed. At any rate, she had not grown dependent upon the ceaseless round of pleasure to which she had been used; and when a sudden failure in her father's health had necessitated an immediate removal into the country, Reinée had not one regret for the life she was leaving behind, and was sorry only on her mother's account for the change that had become inevitable. For herself the idea of calm and quiet, of the silent monotonous life in a country house, of its daily round of simple pleasures and duties was a source of great pleasure, for it seemed to bring her nearer to a vague ideal existence of which she was always dreaming, but to which she had never attained.

What this ideal of Reinée's was, she would have found it hard to define, and yet it was seldom long absent from her thoughts, and had helped her almost more than anything else to keep her from growing shallow and frivolous.

Reinée had never had any religious teaching, save of the most conventional kind, yet her nature was deeply devotional. She had yearnings after the great infinities that surround our little span of life, and all her thoughts and actions were tinged by a little mysticism that gave to her a subtle charm, that few had been at pains to analyse. She had a deep belief in good, both abstract and concrete, and the hollowness of much that she had heard called good in the life she had led, had not shaken her convictions one whit. But she was deeply conscious of her own ignorance; she knew that she was feeling about in a semi-darkness for the light that was bright enough somewhere, and she wanted to find some friend in whom she could confide, some friend who would understand her vague aspirations, and would be able to give them more tangible form. She would have to find out what her ideal was before she could hope to live up to it.

She began to form rather more definite ideas here in this quiet country place than she had ever done before, and her mind was very active to-day, as she enjoyed her evening ride, and during the dinner hour that day she was a little abstracted, though rousing herself to talk to her father of her ride, and the loveliness of the country she had seen. Mr. Dumaresq idolised his daughter, and delighted to look at her and to hear her talk. He forgot his languor and weakness when she was at his side.

When mother and daughter were alone together after their return to the drawing-room, Reinée began to lead up to a question that had been a good deal in her thoughts of late.

"Mamma," she began, "I met Miss Barbara Meynal when I was out to-day. She is the younger daughter, you know. I think she was very fond indeed of her father. Her face was so sad, I could not help stopping to speak to her."

"What to say?"

"Oh! only to tell her how sorry I was. Just leaving cards at the house seems so cold and formal. I think I should like Barbara Meynal, mamma."

"Well, my dear, I have no particular objection. I do not care, as you know, about rushing into intimacies with people before one knows anything about them; but all we hear of the Meynals is quite satisfactory. She was a Talbot before she married, I hear, and his family is very much respected here. Do not be precipitate; but if you and the Meynal girls get on together, I have no objection to the friendship. You must, of course, have some friends, and as there is no society, in the ordinary sense of the term, you must make the best of such people as we find here for the present; and as soon as your father is better we can ask people down, and, in the course of time, I hope to be able to leave this place and resume our old life."

Reinée did not look as if she reciprocated this hope. She half smiled, and shook her head slightly.

"I think I like the country, mamma."

Mrs. Dumaresq looked languidly amused.

"It is the change you like, Reinée. All young things like variety, and it so happens that quiet and seclusion are just the experiences you most lack, and therefore now enjoy; but you will have a different tale to tell six months later, when the novelty has worn off, and we have winter before us instead of summer."

Reinée made no answer. She never argued with her mother; but she was not convinced. She was silent for awhile, and then screwed up her courage to say what was on her mind.

"Mamma," she began, speaking quietly and easily, "I have a favour to ask of you."

"Well, Reinée?"

Mrs. Dumaresq eyed her daughter rather keenly, for Reinée was so much in the habit of having everything given that she wanted, that this formal way of asking a favour seemed rather odd. The mother always had a latent suspicion that her child would some day or another surprise her by new and unexpected developments, that their inner life was less in accord than that upon the surface; but she was not in the least aware that Reinée was far more conscious of this than she was.

"Mamma, I want to know, now that things are so different from what they were in London, whether I may not be a little different too? You see I have such a great deal more time on my hands than ever I had before."

Reinée spoke very quietly, and without any visible excitement. She had chosen a time to make known her request when she and her mother were alone together, and had done so from a sense of duty that showed no little conscientiousness. She knew that her father could never bear to deny her anything, and was certain to take her side; but she had long ago determined never to allow herself to act on the authority of one parent contrary to the wishes of the other, or to use her father's easily-won consent to any scheme of hers, to set at defiance her mother's wishes. By steadily adhering to this resolve, Reinée, though often placed in a difficult position, had always avoided being a bone of contention between her father and mother.

"Indeed, you have," replied Miss Dumaresq; "we could all well spare a good half of the time we have on our hands now. What plan have you in your head for getting rid of yours?"

"I thought I should like to know a little more about the poor people who live around us," said Reinée, in the same quiet way. "In London, I had no time; besides you would not have liked it, and one never knew how to begin even. But it is different in the country, and the cottages look so pretty and clean. I should like to know something about the people who live in them."

Mrs. Dumaresq's eyes were fixed steadily upon her daughter; but Reinée did not falter; she only wondered a little what made her mother look like that. It seemed almost as if there was suspicion in her gaze.

"What has put the idea into your head?"

"I hardly know; partly seeing the people in their houses, partly because I always thought it would be nice to live in the country and be friends with the poor people. You see, mamma, I have never done anything all my life but enjoy myself —I think I have got quite tired of it."

Reinée spoke simply and frankly, and Mrs. Dumaresq smiled and her face relaxed a little.

"Well, Reinée," she said, "there is something in that, I admit. Everything palls upon us at times and youth craves variety at all costs, even exchanging better for worse. You are sure you have no ulterior motive?"

Reinée looked up innocently.

"I don't quite understand you, mamma."

"No? Well, I do not know why I should not explain. You are old enough now to understand. I was afraid for a moment that you had perhaps got hold of some fantastic religious notions."

Reinée coloured a little; but her eyes did not waiver.

"Is there any harm in religion, mamma?" she asked quietly.

"No, not in the ordinary use of the term. Religion is a very good thing in its way, a very right and proper thing, and does a great deal of good. You have been religiously brought up, in so far as is necessary, and, on the whole, you do credit to your training. But this is an age of extravagance and enthusiasm, and people find it very convenient to mask their eccentricities, their self-will and vagaries of all sorts under a mask of religious fervour, that will, they think, save them from criticism and rebuke."

Reinée's eyes were fixed inquiringly on her mother's face. She listened with great attention; but could not see the personal bearing of the matter.

"What has that got to do with me, mamma?" she asked, as her mother paused. "I don't think I quite understand you."

"Well, I am glad you do not. It shows my suspicions to have been unfounded."

"What suspicions, mamma?"

"That you might be inclined to shift into a sort of pseudo-religious state of mind that would probably unfit you for your future life."

Reinée was a little perplexed.

"I thought religion was to help us on in life, mamma," she said.

"Yes, my dear, so it is; but there is a kind of religion that has just the contrary effect, and that gives rise to a very great deal of trouble."

"How?"

"Well, I will explain if I can. You have asked to be allowed to visit the poor people round here. I may, or may not, consent to your following out this fancy, according as I am satisfied as to its origin. If you are actuated by a love of variety, a wish to occupy your time profitably, and a feeling that it is right and proper to show kindness to those about you, I should have no objection to countenance such a proceeding. If, however, I found you entertaining extravagant ideas of universal brotherhood, believing that every woman ought to be a sort of sister-of-mercy in disguise, and feeling that some religious vocation must be the aim and object of every life, then I should feel constrained to nip in the bud any experiment likely to prove so dangerous."

"Dangerous, mamma, how?"

"It is dangerous to allow any one idea to have the mastery, and nothing is more insidious than the belief, so rampant amongst girls just now, that they must do some great 'work' in the world, and set all law and order at defiance. They tell themselves they are obeying and pleasing God, but they are very plainly paining and disobeying their parents. How they reconcile this to their consciences is not for me to say; I can only say that I have often heard stories that make me say 'Preserve us from religion,' and make me determine that my daughter shall never be exposed to like influences."

Reinée rose and crossed over to her mother and knelt down before her.

"Mamma, dear," she said softly, "I do not think religion would ever make people disobedient —not real religion."

"Perhaps not: but that which passes under its name does, and I am not versed in subtleties."

"Things are not always called by their right names," observed Reinée thoughtfully. "Mamma, I will do just as you decide about that. I would rather please you than myself."

Reinée at any rate was not spoiled by over-indulgence. Mrs. Dumaresq smiled as if well pleased as her eyes rested on her daughter's face.

"You are a good child," she said, patting her on the head. "You deserve your own way for being so ready to give it up. I will think things over and give you an answer later. I have no objection to a little of the Lady Bountiful in the place, and you would play the part well."

Reinée was not quite sure if that was exactly what she herself wished: but her ideas were a little vague, and it was no use to press matters on unduly. She might begin by playing Lady Bountiful; but she had a dim consciousness that that part would not satisfy her always. She felt that she would like to be a friend as well as a benefactor to those about her.

But for the present no more was said, and Reinée hardly knew whether or not her request had been granted.

THE MARTYRS.

BY THE REV. PROFESSOR GIBB, D.D.

"This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."—St. John.

THE annals of the church are richer in variety than any other. Compared with the varieties of human character which they exhibit, there is a sameness in the characters of the men who appear in the annals of war, literature and art. Soldiers are all fighting men, artists and men of letters all belong to the cultivated classes; and the largest section of the human race is of necessity unrepresented in their annals. But there is no condition of human life, no type of human character which has not its representative in the portrait gallery of the church. The king and the slave, the scholar and the artisan, the woman and the child—all are there. The church has in the past laid the whole of humanity under contribution, and has thus made good its title to speak to all mankind. Toleration and large-heartedness, as well as other lessons, are learned from the contemplation of the varieties of Christian character. Those who now enjoy a common reverence did not always honour one another while they lived; and legacies of controversial hatred make it difficult for some good men to honour aright all the faithful servants of God of whom they read in the history of the church. But in history as in life intimate knowledge of good men speedily dissipates prejudice.

In the following papers sketches will be given of some personages who figure in the history of the church, and an attempt will be made to estimate their influence upon society. Some of them lived in remote periods, and perhaps are not known, even by name, to many readers. There is a German proverb which says: "Behind the mountains there are also people." We hope to be able to prove that some of those behind the mountains are worthy of being known.

We begin with a group of Christians who are not forgotten, and who stand upon the threshold of church history. "The Martyr first," in the order of time, and according to a general and natural sentiment, first likewise in dignity; for he gave the crowning proof of love and devotion.

Honours have been paid to the martyrs which belong not to man, but none will grudge to the early sufferers for the Faith the proud and tender reverence in which their memories are held by the entire church throughout the world. By publicly dying for the faith, the martyrs served their generation as they could not have done by holy living or by zealous preaching. In Rome, and in all the great cities of the Empire, the lower classes were so debased by a life of idleness and indulgence that argument and entreaty were almost lost upon them. The higher classes were scornful and sceptical. They had listened to all the doctrines which had come to them from many quarters, and they had learned to distrust all. They too would hardly listen to the voice of the preacher. But high and low were devoted to spectacles. Impressions reached their jaded and frivolous minds, through the eye alone. The martyrs, with no intention of making a theatrical display, but simply in obedience to what they deemed high duty, offered to the Romans the great spectacle of men voluntarily accepting death because they believe in life eternal. The death of the martyrs was an acted sermon from which many went away convinced of the truth of the martyrs' faith. The biographies of the martyrs cannot be written. With few exceptions they step forth for the first time, before the tribunal of the magistrate, or at the place of execution, from the obscurity of unrecorded lives. A few words of Christian faith and hope spoken in the presence of death is all that history records. But the subject of the death of the martyrs appealed strongly to imagination, and unfortunately attracted to it the dangerous pens of romancers, who in later ages invented many fabulous details. This is specially unfortunate for the honour of the martyrs' story in our times; for men are now sensitive to the presence of fable in history, and narratives are summarily rejected which bear marks of exaggeration or romancing. The later romances were, however, built upon well-authenticated history. From the close of the first century, when Rome became fully aware of the presence of the church, until the reign of Constantine, the church was under the ban of the Empire. During the whole of the period the sword of the persecutor hung over it—isolated acts of persecution were never wanting—and sometimes persecution of the Christians was violent and general in the Empire.

Not by evil emperors alone, who tormented all men, were the Christians persecuted; they suffered not less severely under emperors who were models of princely justice and humanity. Christian homes were desolated during reigns which eminent historians have pronounced to be the most tranquil and happy period in the history of the human race. We get an authentic glimpse of the principles by which the persecutors were guided in the correspondence of the younger Pliny, who, at the beginning of the second century, was governor of a province in Asia Minor. Pliny was a favourable specimen of a Roman gentleman of the period—a kind husband, friend and master, patriotic, benevolent and just. He wrote to the Emperor Trajan to consult him as to measures to be taken to check the superstition of the Christians, which was spreading, he said, like an infection from city to city, and from the cities into the country; and in some places it had emptied the temples. Christians were brought before his tribunal; he examined them as to their practices, and ascertained from their confessions that they were in the habit of meeting together on a stated day before it was light, when they addressed a form of prayer to Christ as to a god, and bound themselves by a solemn oath not to commit wickedness. In order to elicit fuller information, he put two female slaves to the torture, who appear to have been the deaconesses of the community; but he was able to discover nothing, save that the people were victims of an absurd and excessive superstition. In these circumstances he judged it right to adjourn the enquiry, and to consult his imperial master. The emperor replied that the Christians were not to be sought for, and that if those who were accused as Christians before the tribunal either denied the accusation or abjured Christianity by invoking the gods of Rome, they were to be dismissed without punishment. If, however, they remained obstinate, they must be punished. It would appear from the emperor's words that Christianity was already an offence amenable to capital punishment. But why should it have been so, and why should Trajan by his rescript have continued such stern treatment of harmless people? Roman rulers were commonly contemptuously tolerant in matters of religious faith and worship; and Trajan was not only a philosophic Roman, but he was a humane man, and considered humanity as the glory of his government. In another letter to Pliny he writes that it is his fixed maxim not to render himself an object of terror by severe and rigorous measures of government. Trajan must have considered Christianity a danger to the empire, or he would not have issued a rescript to the effect that its simple profession was criminal. We find that it was the most sagacious and foresighted emperors who disliked Christianity most. The explanation is this. The Roman state owed its greatness to the immense egotism of the Roman people. They believed themselves to be an imperial race destined to endure, and to rule, for ever. Animated by this idea, they proudly trampled on nationalities all over the world, and substituted their own rule, which they said, and said truly, was better than that which they overthrew. Their faith in themselves and in their own destiny had enabled them to overcome the world. The rulers of this great victorious Empire were troubled with misgivings when the head of the rapid rise of a sect, who spoke of another kingdom and another king, and predicted the speedy downfall of the Empire. The nocturnal meetings of the Christian church, and the terms of intimate brotherhood in which the members lived, increased the suspicion of the rulers who, like all despots, lived in constant fear of conspiracy.

The Christians made several attempts to convince the emperors that their suspicions were groundless. In the form of petitions, defences of Christian doctrine and practice were addressed to the emperors. One of the most remarkable was written about the year A.D. 139, during the reigns of Antoninus Pius, and his adopted son, Marcus Aurelius, the philosopher on the throne. The writer, Justin, had been himself a philosopher, and still wore the philosophic habit. In his Apology he complained that Christians were condemned simply for bearing a certain name; but justice, he said, required that their actions should be enquired into before they were visited with punishment. Three accusations were commonly brought against the Christians. They were said to be atheists, evil doers, and bad citizens of the Empire. Justin could not deny that the Christians did not believe in the popular gods; but they were not atheists, for they believed in an Almighty Father, maker of heaven and earth. He reminded the philosophic emperor that Socrates, whom all philosophers held in reverence, had also been accused of atheism. In answer to the second charge, Justin replied that he challenged investigation, and, if Christians were proved to be evil doers, let them be punished; but their crimes ought to be brought home to them by the regular processes of law. As to the charge that Christians were bad subjects because they spoke of another kingdom, this charge, according to Justin, arose from a misconception. The kingdom of which they spoke was not an earthly kingdom, but the kingdom with God. He assured the emperors that they would find in Christians, and in Christian doctrine, their best allies in preserving the stability of the Empire; for Christians taught that all men live under the eye of God, and that wicked persons and conspirators will not escape Divine judgment. Justin did not flatter the emperors, nor did he for a moment forget the dignity of his cause. "You may kill us," he exclaimed; "but you cannot injure us!" He did not fear to say to the emperors that if they continued to persecute the Christians they would abuse their power.

The emperors were not moved from their purpose by the pleadings of the Apologists, and persecution went on. Marcus Aurelius could not understand that good citizens should wish to set themselves above the law, and refuse to worship as the law ordained. In his meditations he writes that the end of a reasonable being is to conform to whatever is imposed by the reason and law of the most ancient and honourable city. That there is a sphere into which law should not enter—the sphere of conscience—was an idea that a Roman Emperor could not understand. Perhaps Marcus Aurelius was nearer the truth than Justin, when he came to the decision that Christianity and the Roman state could not live together. How could Rome with its proud claim to rule the earth, its traditions of violence and oppression open its gates to a religion which taught it to put aside the sword, and refrain from robbery? Constantine, it is true, placed the cross above his standards and professed Christianity, but the seeming conformity of Constantine to a religion whose laws he did not obey, would have been impossible to a sincere soul like Marcus Aurelius.

The Christians suffered not only from the rulers of Rome, but also at the hands of the people. The mobs were more hostile to the Christians than the magistrates. The court was often disturbed by angry cries for the death of the accused, before the magistrate had time to investigate the case; and the mob sometimes became the executioners. The Christians were hated by the people as enemies of festal joy, and disturbers of the peace of households. A Christian's foes were often those of his own household; and husbands sometimes denounced their wives before the magistrates.

Persecuted by the rulers and by the people—defeated in their attempts to obtain a fair trial—the Christians had to choose between the alternatives of death or apostasy. Some apostatised and apparently with a light heart; others obtained their acquittal by means which savoured of deceit; but many stood firm and endured the ordeal of torture and death.

The most painful part of the ordeal were the opposition and pleadings of their loved friends. Martyrs were sometimes surrounded by weeping relatives and friends who besought them to live for them, if they would not live for themselves, and to make the easy compliances which would loose their bonds. The measure of martyrdom is filled up, says one of the Fathers, by those who endure not only outrage, mockery, and the contemptuous pity of those who term us madmen, but who likewise withstand the love of wife and children. They were sustained in their mental and bodily sufferings by the thought, almost by the open vision of the blessed world, into which, as they firmly believed, their spirits would pass immediately after death. In the lonely dungeon and even at the place of execution their hopes shaped themselves into dreams and visions, and they seemed to see and hear the welcomes of heaven, and to behold the Risen Saviour awaiting them in the other world. They were likewise upheld by the thought that Christ Himself had trod and made holy the Via Dolorosa. They followed in His footsteps without murmuring, and often with joy. Their fellow Christians recognized the fellowship of the martyrs' sufferings with those of the Lord, and were wont to say when a martyr was condemned that sentence was afresh pronounced upon Christ. From their fellow Christians the martyrs received unceasing marks of sympathy and affection; the dungeon and the place of execution were crowded with men and women who regarded not the danger to themselves, in their eagerness to show sympathy with the sufferers.

The later romance writers dwelt much upon the tortures inflicted upon the Christians, and gave descriptions of the ineffable torments which they suffered. Most of the martyrs probably died by the ordinary Roman method of decapitation preceded by scourging; but many were thrown to wild beasts. The cruel sports of the arena, in which men fought with one another or with wild beasts, had the attraction for southern races which the chase has for the more vigorous nations of the north. They delighted in such spectacles, and even in a still baser sport in which helpless men were cast into the arena to be devoured by beasts ravenous with hunger. The crowd was jubilant which witnessed such spectacles, the air rang with their shouts, but what of the victims? It was a doom of special cruelty, not only because it might be lingering, but because it appealed so strongly to the imagination beforehand and the sufferer died many deaths in the mental torture he endured in the dungeon while picturing to himself the coming scene in the arena. "Waiting" for such a death was worse than the death itself.

In the Roman arenas two classes of men were prominent—the fair-haired German gladiators from the Danube and the Rhine; and the Christians who were thrown as passive victims to the ravenous beasts. Had the veil which hides the future been uplifted on a Roman holiday, and the complacent spectators been permitted to look into the coming times, they would have seen the representatives of the victims of the arena playing an unexpected part in another tragedy. It was the tribes from the Germanic forests who overthrew the Western Empire; and avenged the long martyrdom which their countrymen had suffered in arenas of the Empire. The Christians too, without intending it, contributed to the downfall of Rome. They failed to reform the Empire and to give it Christian hopes; but their words gave to it a guilty conscience and a divided heart which made it an easy prey to the sword of the barbarian marauders.

Clean Hands.

I HAD been busy; dusting, sweeping, rubbing,
And then—alas! for my poor grimy fingers!
With soap and brush I gave them patient scrubbing
(The soiling touch of toil so plainly lingers).
Next came in downcastly my little daughter—
"Mamma, my doll has fallen on the street,
Just see her dress! oh, here is soapy water,
Do wash it for me, then she will be neat."
To please the child, I did my very best,
Then hung it up, and lo!—my hands were white.

Then thought I of the folks who take no rest
From sitting in their own soul's grimy sight;
At prayer-meeting and church, aye hearing, hearing—
Some other soul if they'd be bravely cheering,
Forgetting all their cherished doubting, fearing,
Maybe an Eye might see spots disappearing
And stains fast fading—in a blessed pureness nearing.

M. B.

THE INNER LIFE OF LORD SHAFTESBURY.

PART II.

IN the pauses of his exhausting labours Lord Shaftesbury's great delight was a tour, either at home or abroad. The special journals devoted to the record of his wanderings are singularly interesting, and a few musings of his soul may be given here. At Rome, he writes, on the 21st December, 1833: "The shortest day. It may be called the midnight of the year, as, after this period, the advance is to light, and not to darkness. It is a singular coincidence, and morally a most just one, that Christ, 'the Light of the World,' 'the Dayspring from on high,' should have been born in the depth of winter, the full period of human darkness; and yet precisely at the commencement of returning light, and warmth and happiness." A visit to Ripon Minster calls forth this reflection. "The crypt is now turned into a species of catacomb, and garnished with skulls and cross-bones. 'Gracious God, what is man?' exclaimed Lord Bolingbroke, as he stood weeping and disbelieving on the death-bed of Pope; how much more true, how much more exalted the exclamation of the Psalmist. 'Lord, what is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that Thou regardest him? Thou madest him a little lower than the angels, to crown him with glory and worship.' I know not what scoffers and sceptics may feel in the contemplation of these, and the like exhibitions of mortality; had I not, by God's blessing 'a sure and certain hope of a joyful resurrection,' I should lose my senses with disgust and terror."

His mind was always open to receive the lesson which the history of any place he visited might teach him. Thus, at Antwerp, he says: "Contrast the city with what it once was and with what Napoleon intended that it should be; and see the vanity of human wishes. Let us Englishmen take warning, and, while we quote our imports and exports; the amount of our tonnage, and the number of our capitalists, call to mind that Antwerp, in her palmy days, could boast of a trade with half the world; count at one time 2,500 vessels in her harbour, and exhibit on her 'Change 5,000 merchants whose business required their presence there no less than twice every day! 'Oh Lord,' well may our nation say, 'make me to know the number of my days that I may be certified how long I have to live!'"

He was an intense lover of the beauties of Nature, which always inspired devout religious thought, and his frequent exclamation is "God be praised" as fresh scenes of beauty are described. "It sounds sometimes like freedom or affectation," he writes at Carlsbad, "to say, 'God be praised for this' and 'Thank God for that' which men may consider a mere trifle; yet I cannot but feel it. And surely every moment of innocent pleasure, every moment of averted mischief (His unknown mercies are endless), affords new cause of thankfulness and joy. If, in addition to these delights, the soul be lifted up to communion with the spirits above, there is the foretaste of another life, and, so far, a preparation for it. I can never see a fine prospect, or a sun setting in glory, without blessing God for the wonders and beauties of His creation." At the same place, a few days later, he says: "Walked up the hill to enjoy the view. I love the open prospects; give me always an expanse of sky; I value not a handful of it. I can then fancy the dawning glories of the Second Advent. 'Behold He cometh with clouds.'"

The lessons of history he reads and interprets in the light of Revelation. Thus, when visiting the palace at Heidelberg, he notes: "It is one of the many standing monuments of the oppressions perpetrated by the French monarchy on Germany and mankind. This gorgeous residence was first desolated, when the most polished villain that ever possessed and prostituted the gifts of God, sent forth an army to ravage the dominions of his enemy, the Palatine. Fire, the sword, with their necessary results, starvation and disease, laid waste towns, plains and valleys. Thousands of men, women, and children who had never offended, even in thought, this unprecedented monster, experienced the most horrid sufferings, and died by the most cruel deaths. Which is the more hateful in the sight of God, the wretch who perpetrates these crimes, or the authors who bepraise him? The great day of judgment will exhibit some fearful reckonings. If Herod be arraigned for his Massacre of the Innocents, so will King Louis the Fourteenth for the blood of the numberless children whose souls are still 'under the altar,' crying for inevitable vengeance."

Great cities interest him, not more for the wealth of information they supply, than for the great moral questions they cause him to debate with himself. Thus, when visiting Paris at a time when violence and revolution were threatening, he says; "The immorality of the nation lies at the root of all the evil and all the danger; it is not misgovernment, oppressive taxation; it is not religious persecution, or denial of freedom; it is not the presence of a griping Church, or a monopolising aristocracy; it is not any political defect, or any civil abuse or blunder; it is the utter want of all religion, all sense of God, all respect for man. The domestic system, the prime ordinance of God for human society, is nearly extinct, 'In Thee and Thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed.' Mark the expression; not the nations, not the people, not the individuals, but the 'families' of the earth. This, however, is cut up at the very roots; their mode of life, their dwellings, their amusements, their tastes, their passions, all are incompatible with the cares, the toils, the duties of domestic existence."

Holding the views he did, aflame with a burning zeal for the glory of God, his heart overflowing with sympathy for the poor, the suffering, and the sad, with a fiery indignation for every form of oppression and cruelty, Lord Ashley placed himself at the head of almost every great religious and philanthropic movement of his time. It is not proposed to refer to his great public efforts in this place, but rather to the motives that inspired them, the phases of character developed by them, and the sources of his success. But it may be remarked here that, until the publication of his "Life," very few who heard him speak in Parliament, and on public platforms, ever had the least idea of what those utterances cost him. It was quite a common thing for people to say, "What a life of self-sacrifice Lord Shaftesbury's is," but those who said it never dreamed in what that self-sacrifice consisted. He was a man of a fine, sensitive, nervous organism; oppressed with an almost morbid sense of his own insufficiency; shrinking from the fierce light of publicity thrown upon him; smarting under the scourges of a hostile public opinion and a hostile public press; yearning for rest and literary and social enjoyment; yet ever impelled by the spirit that was in him, to stand in the forefront of every battle; to forego every personal gratification, and to spend days and nights, from youth to age, in labours from which his whole nature shrank.

The manliness of Lord Shaftesbury touched the highest point of heroism. Nervous and sensitive, he yet conducted one of the greatest and most vigorous agitations of the century; delicate and refined, he visited every loathsome haunt in London; retiring and diffident, his whole life was aggressive; from first to last it was a career of self-surrender and self-sacrifice.

There was needed some strong sustaining power to enable him to persevere in his career, and the secret of his strength we know. That strength was maintained by unceasing prayer. "Prayer to begin, prayer to accompany, and prayer to close any undertaking for His service is the secret of all prospering in our ways," he wrote, in his diary in 1843; and, years later, in a letter to one of his sons, he says: "You ask me how I get through so much work? why, as I hope that you will, hereafter, by hearty prayer to Almighty God before I begin; by entering into it with faith and zeal, and by making my end to be His glory and the good of mankind. In hoc signo vinces."

Throughout his diaries there are scattered some very beautiful references to prayer. Thus, in 1848, when in Scotland, he writes:—"Oct. 26.—Surely no sun ever rose more beautifully than this morning; viewed it with delight. Yet there was a coldness in my affection and a formality in my prayer which seemed little to accord with such a display of God's works. But we must be careful not to estimate the state of our hearts towards God merely by the rapture we may feel at occasional periods; religion would then be measured by enthusiasm; it must be tested by its fruits, by our real and inmost desires, by our daily walk, by our Scriptural belief, by our constant faith, and by our practical life."

Not only do the diaries abound with references to prayer, but, occasionally, there are the words of special prayers recorded, relating chiefly to great national events. The following was written, in 1854, during the Crimean War:

"O Lord, Almighty God, protect those gallant men of both nations by sea and land, from the pestilence, the battle, and the flood. Give them a speedy and joyous victory; a speedy and a lasting peace; restore them safe and happy to their homes and that right soon. We pray not, O Lord, in malignity or revenge, but for the peace of nations and the security of freedom; restrain the ambition of this man, stay his encroachments, confound his devices and turn his heart. Rend from him his ill-gotten gains, the acquisitions of fraud and violence, confine him within his own limits of race and language. Save a Protestant land from idolatrous rule, and enable us to do some great work for Poland of justice, mercy, and retribution; and thus, by Thy grace, both in the East and in the West, Thy word shall have free course, and be glorified, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

That was a prayer written in a great national crisis. The following was written in a crisis relating to his own career. In January, 1846, for conscience' sake, he had been obliged to resign his seat in Parliament, and the conduct of the Factory Question in the House of Commons. In June of that year there was a probability of his soon re-entering Parliament, and as the future began to shape itself with some distinctness, he resolved upon a plan of action, and committed it to God in a prayer of exquisite beauty.

"June 1, 1846.—I will take first the long-agitated, much-desired, and most blessed Ten Hours' Bill; this, with a parliamentary effort on behalf of the ragged children will constitute the work of next session. I will then proceed with Church Reform—a reform that shall restore it to the scheme of Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, and revive, if possible, the primitive examples; and the last that I dare to contemplate will open a series of exertions to aid, spiritually and physically, the oppressed, forsaken, and heathen children, described and reported by my Commission of 1840—a vast and foul mass, which our avarice has engendered, and our luxurious indolence overlooks and increases and perpetuates. 'Who is sufficient for these things?' Not I alone, but any one, if God be with him. And now, O God, the Father of the forsaken, the help of the weak, the supplier of the needy, who hast diffused and proportioned Thy gifts to body and soul, in such sort that all may acknowledge and perform the joyous duty of mutual service; Who teachest us that love towards the race of man is the bond of perfectness, and the imitation of Thy blessed Self; open our eyes and touch our hearts, that we may see and do, both for this world and for that which is to come, the things which belong unto our peace. Strengthen me in the work that I have now undertaken; give me counsel and wisdom, perseverance, faith and zeal, and in Thine own good time, and according to Thy pleasure, prosper the issue. But, O Lord, pour into me a spirit of humility and fear; let nothing be done in a vain and wicked notion of righteousness and merit, but in devout obedience to Thy will, thankfulness for Thine unspeakable mercies, and love to Thine adorable Son, Jesus Christ, with a constant and hearty confession of sin and unworthiness, and everlasting hope through His merits alone, our only Redeemer and Saviour."

Things New and Old.

BE NATURAL.—When the Rev. Mr. Tennent was a minister at New Brunswick, N.J., a pastor in a town some distance off who had heard of the wonderfully holy man Mr. Tennent, came down to spend a few days in the place and learn of him. Impressed deeply with the power of awful sanctity that he saw in Mr. Tennent, he returned to his parish with a firm resolution to be like that blessed man of God. Spending the close of the week in devout retirement, he went to church on Sabbath morning, greeting those who met him at the door with a solemn air and tone that was all unusual in their genial and cheerful pastor. He conducted the services in the same profoundly serious manner, so serious as to be unnatural unless he were under some peculiar pressure. As he came from the pulpit one of his elders gave him his hand and kindly asked if anything was the matter with him; was he unwell, or his family, or had he heard any evil tidings. To all these inquiries the pastor replied "No"; and at last the elder, unable to penetrate the mystery, exclaimed, "Well, if nothing is the matter, then the devil's in you!" The good pastor confessed the fact on the spot. He was trying to be like Mr. Tennent, and not himself. He was acting a part, and he resolved to be hereafter himself, and as much better as possible.—Dr. Prime's Autobiography.

PERSONAL EVIDENCE.—An infidel once asked a lady if she believed the Bible. "Yes." "Why do you believe in that book?" "Because," said she, "I am acquainted with the Author."—Christian Remembrancer.

THE POVERTY OF THE POOR.—The mystery remains how many manage to live at all. One solution is that there exists among irregular workers a kind of communism. They prefer to occupy the same neighbourhood, and make long journeys to work rather than go to live among strangers. They easily borrow and easily lend. The women spend much time in gossiping, know intimately one another's affairs, and in time of trouble help willingly. One couple, whose united earnings have never reached fifteen shillings a week, whose home has never been more than one small room, has brought up in succession three orphans. The old man, at seventy years of age, just earns a living by running messages, and by selling wirework; but even now he spends many a night in hushing a baby whose desertion he pities, and whom he has taken to his care. The poverty of the poor is understood by the poor, and their charity is according to the measure of Christ's. The charity of the rich is according to another measure, because they do not know poverty, and they do not know because they do not think.—Rev. S. A. Barnett, in the Nineteenth Century.

HEART'S-EASE.

CHAPTER II.

ETHEL'S breakfast that morning was a very dreary affair. The incident of the vase had completely taken her appetite away, and Miss Regina looked more than ever like "a man in a sentry-box," for she sat erect and silent, occupied with the work she had in hand, but casting a look of inquiry every now and then at her niece, who sat with a ruffled look on her face, pecking at the food before her.

I do not think that Miss Regina would have spoken first. She was deep in her own thoughts, and deep too in an affectionate desire to be helpful to Ethel, whose state of mind gave her the greatest possible anxiety. She felt that if the child was to grow up to be useful and helpful, she must be taught to see the folly of her present conduct. As for the broken vase, she felt that all the blame could not attach to Ethel, who was really startled by the sudden call, and could hardly be held responsible for the shock to her nerves. Indeed, Miss Regina was lamenting her own infirmity of temper, and saying to herself that it was hopeless for her to act as a teacher, until she could control her irritation better than she had that morning. If only Ethel knew all that was passing through Aunt Regina's mind just now, she would never again have thought her cross or overwatchful, or in the least like the picture she had drawn of her to her father.

At length Ethel put down her cup, and, with a little preliminary rattle with her spoon, addressed her aunt—

"Aunt Regina, you don't think I was to blame about that vase, do you?"

"In what way, Ethel?"

"Why, in every way. It was certainly not my fault that it was broken. When papa comes home I shall have to tell him that I could not have helped it. Nobody's nerve could stand being called at so suddenly." And Ethel pouted her lips, and looked very much aggrieved.

Miss Regina took no notice of the evident want of respect which her tone showed. She answered the question as best she could.

"I quite think with you, Ethel, that your letting the vase fall was quite an accident. If any blame attaches to any one, it must to me; but, if you had come to breakfast when I called you, the accident would not have happened."

"I only wanted to put these flowers in water. You know how soon they die this hot weather."

"But that little word 'only' is a very dangerous one, Ethel dear," Miss Regina said, in a very much more gentle voice than Ethel was usually prepared for.

"A very dangerous word!" echoed she in surprise, as she laughed. "How can it be so, aunt?'

"Because, my dear, it excuses what ought not to be excused, and prevents you seeing the danger that there is in disobedience."

"I was not disobedient, aunt," she answered, her dark eyes growing large and angry.

Miss Regina was silent. There was not the slightest use in reasoning with an angry girl, she knew, and when that girl is a spoiled child into the bargain, the case is hopeless. So she remained in silence for some few minutes, during which Ethel glanced across the room at her frequently, to see whether she was about to answer her. The momentary storm of anger died out of Ethel's eyes presently, and she addressed her aunt again.

"You don't say anything, aunt. I suppose you think I was disobedient."

"I have nothing to say, Ethel. You maintain that you were not, and I must leave it so. I have no wish to enter into an angry discussion with you." And Miss Regina spoke so quietly, that Ethel felt somewhat touched and ashamed by the words. After another pause, Ethel said, in a milder tone: "I did not intend to be disobedient, Aunt Regina. If you think I was so, I am sorry."

"My dear Ethel, it does me good to hear you speak like that. Come and let me kiss away all misunderstanding."

Ethel was at her aunt's side in an instant, and with her arms round her neck, kissed her many times with real affection.

When she looked at her aunt again, she noticed that tears were in her eyes.

"What is the matter, Aunt Regina?" she asked impulsively.

"My dear, I am thinking what little things spoil our happiness. A word, or a look sometimes, is enough to make a long chain of misery for people."

"I know it does!" Ethel exclaimed, with all the authority of one who has had bitter experience of the truth. "I often say to myself, that if I hadn't said something or the other, that made you or somebody else angry, there would have been no unpleasantness."

"We must try very hard to avoid saying such things then, darling."

"Yes," said Ethel, in a dreamy way, as though she were not quite sure of being able to follow this advice.

"Do you think it is very difficult, Ethel?"

"Awfully difficult, Aunt Regina. I try and try, but no good comes of it."

"Perhaps you have no one to help you, my dear child."

"Who could help me, Aunt Regina? It's all in my own thoughts. No one can help us when we must think wicked things——" But she stopped, seeing a reproof in her aunt's eyes. "Oh, you mean that God can!" she added reverently.

"Yes, Ethel, if we ask Him for His help He will give it. Perhaps you have not always thought of that when you were tempted."

A contrite "No" was the answer, and Ethel kissed her aunt again, with affectionate eagerness, as though to express in that way, feelings she could not put into words.

"Now go, dear, and finish your breakfast. You have eaten very little this morning."

"Hardly anything, aunt—how could I? I felt miserable."

"You feel better now, darling, I hope?"

"Ever so much. I'll try to do what you say, aunt dear."

And she imprinted another kiss on her aunt's forehead, and went back to the breakfast-table, where, indeed, everything had got cold, except her own heart, which was warmer than it had been for some time. She finished her meal, chatting to Aunt Regina about all sorts of things, from the canary that sang above her head, to "Nero," the great Mount St. Bernard dog that lay basking in the sunshine in the yard outside.

She felt happier now that the cloud between herself and Aunt Regina had disappeared. I wonder, do spoiled children know that they are being spoiled? I think they do. I think it comes into their minds very often that they are really being spoiled so that their lives cannot be as happy as those of children who have been wisely, and even strictly, brought up. I think Ethel knew. Although she liked to have her own way, even when she knew that her's was the wrong way, she was not happiest when she had it. Down deep in her heart, she felt that it was all wrong, and even this little "making up," as she called it, with Aunt Regina, put her into better spirits than usual.

After breakfast they had their reading of the Bible, as usual. The servants came into the breakfast-room, and Miss Regina read for them some passages from God's word, and explained it. Then they all knelt, whilst Aunt Regina asked for a blessing on the day for each of them; her reading just now was about Absalom, and Ethel listened with marked attention as she heard the story of that handsome but foolish and wicked son, who was, I fear, a spoiled child even from his youth.

Even Aunt Regina thought within herself that the lesson was full of wisdom for all who had the charge of children, as well as for the children themselves; and she asked in her prayer that all who were placed in authority might be given wisdom and grace to act for the honour of God, and for the well-being of those over whom they were placed.

After morning prayers came lessons. They were not regular lessons, for since Colonel Seymour came down to Holmsdale a month ago, Ethel had not had her usual governess. These were really her holidays. Sometimes she protested against having any lessons at all, but Aunt Regina was so firm on this point that she had to be content with grumbling to her father, and paying as little attention to the lessons she did with her aunt as she could. She was better to-day. Once, indeed, she stopped, and asked a question.

"May I take Nero for a run, as soon as lessons are over, Aunt Regina?"

"Yes, Ethel, if you promise very faithfully not to go beyond the park."

"Oh! of course, Aunt Regina," said Ethel, looking up at her aunt with wide-open eyes.

Nero was, I must tell you, a very great favourite with all the household, and Ethel's special pet. To look at him, you might imagine that he was fierce, and dangerous. He had a large head and beautiful eyes, but most people who were not actual friends of his appeared somewhat timid of him, and whenever Ethel was out walking with Nero by her side, she needed no other protection, I assure you.

He seemed to share not only his young mistress's love, but her confidence also. She talked to him when they were out together just as she might have talked to a very familiar friend. She told him much more than she would have ventured to tell Aunt Regina, but he was only a dog, and could not answer back, or reason with her, and she found that just what she wished. He would sometimes look up at her, with those large, solemn, faithful eyes of his, as though wishing very much that he could speak, and she always understood, or thought she understood him, for she would call him her dear old dog, and pat his broad shaggy head much to his satisfaction.

Ethel Seymour had no young friends of her own age, in Holmsdale, to whom she could talk as freely as she did to Nero. Her father spent much of his time in London, and she was always more willing to leave the pleasures of the country house, and even the society of Nero, than she was to leave London, when the season was at an end and the Colonel shut up his town house. Sometimes they went abroad. She knew much about most of the large cities on the Continent, and could speak French very fluently, and purely, and of course there was much about a life of constant change to educate her mind, although it made her restless and dissatisfied with the quiet of the country.

She had been greatly disappointed at not going abroad this year. It was necessary that Colonel Seymour should remain in England, but that seemed no sufficient explanation for Ethel. To hear her talk about her disappointment, you might well suppose that she considered herself as of much greater importance than her father, or Aunt Regina—but then, I have told you that she had been a spoiled child from her cradle, and that explains it all. And so she said in reply to her aunt: "Of course not, Aunt Regina. What makes you think I would?"

She asked this with a look of astonishment, as though the idea of her going beyond the park was as absurd as her going to the moon.

"Well, my dear, I am glad you think it strange my naming such a condition, but when you and Nero get out together, there is no knowing where you may get to," said Aunt Regina, with a smile.

Ethel smiled too, for the recollection of other days, when she and Nero had wandered beyond bounds, and had to be searched for like a pair of runaways, came back to her, and made her think her aunt's condition not quite so unnecessary, or unwise as she at first thought it.

"We will both be very good to-day, Aunt Regina," she said, with a serious look in her face, as though she really meant to be obedient, and careful. And after lessons she started off to let Nero loose. With great mutual delight they went into the delicious meadows which stretched away from the house, and Nero disported himself in the long rich grass, just as though he were plunging into the cool waves of the sea. There was a delicious breeze blowing, and the larks were singing high in the blue heavens, and from every bush and tree there sounded out the music of the birds. No wonder that both Nero and his mistress felt glad.

The meadows, which were called the Park, stretched away to the high road in one direction, and in another, they extended down to a shady lane that led to a pretty village, or hamlet, that lay hidden among the tall elm-trees, for which Holmsdale was celebrated. Being in the park itself, was almost as safe as being in the more private garden. Even Aunt Regina had no anxiety with regard to Ethel as long as she felt sure that she was in it.

She evidently felt quite easy in her mind about her to-day, for she settled down to work in the drawing-room on some delicate embroidery, and it need not be a secret that she enjoyed the perfect quiet of the house, much as she loved the motherless child who had been given to her to tend and watch over, by the young mother as a last passionate charge.

Nero went on, through the sea of ripe, golden grass, snapping at the bees that crossed his path, and dashing after imaginary objects, only to return to his mistress with renewed tokens of devotion and submission. Presently they both came to the shady lane which led into the hamlet, and Nero dashed through the high hedge at a point where it was less dense, and with great glee started off along the road, leaping and barking in the wildest and happiest way.

"Nero, Nero, come back, sir!" Ethel cried, as she scrambled through the hedge somehow, and stood on the road looking after Nero, who either did not hear her, or did not care to obey his young mistress just now.

She was very excited at the moment. She did not notice that a bramble had torn her dress, and another had scratched her hand. She had eyes only for Nero, and he was already half way down the lane. She might have turned back again, and left him to find his way home, as he would have done, perhaps before she had got very far on her return journey—and if she had remembered her promise to Aunt Regina she would have done so, I have no doubt; but, when her mind was full of any one thing, she forgot everything and every one else, in her excitement. By this time Nero had disappeared, and she went at full speed down the lane, calling to him in angry tones.

He had evidently intended only to have a game with his mistress, for he appeared suddenly from behind the high hedge, and came bounding towards her.

"Oh! you naughty dog, you bad Nero!" she exclaimed, half enjoying the surprise and fun, but speaking severely. "Come here, sir." But Nero had no such intention. He wanted his mistress to accompany him down the lane, and his antics were all directed towards that end.

Ethel was as willing to go now as he was, and so together they walked on side by side, until they came in sight of a group of picturesque cottages, standing a little way back from the lane, and looking as though they had been put there to make a beautiful picture, with their frame of elm-trees, and the duck pond close by.

One of the cottage windows was wide open, and on the sill outside sat, in contented idleness, a white kitten, which looked like nothing so much as a ball of pure white fur, with a bit of pink ribbon tied round it.

Nero and his mistress caught sight of pussy at the same moment, but before Ethel could lay her hand on the dog to keep him at her side he had dashed off furiously, going straight in the direction of the ball of white fur.

THE SUNDAY ALBUM.

Let our young readers get a blank book, eight or nine inches square and unruled, so as to be suitable either for drawing or writing. This is to be the "Sunday Album." We shall give from time to time a subject for study, illustrated by a picture. This picture our young friends may copy, or ask their friends to copy for them, to put into the Album. Then on Sunday afternoon or evening let them gather with their Bibles in their hands, and find out as many verses as they can in which the subject for the day is to be found. Some of the children will recollect one verse and some another. Even little ones who are not able to read, can help in this exercise by remembering the Bible stories in which the word in question is to be found; and those who cannot draw can perhaps find an engraving which will serve. Then some one should write out the verses; or, at least the most important of them, around the drawing in the centre, marking below each verse the initials of the child who found it. In former years we have had many such exercises for the family, and now propose to resume them. The first subject of this new series will be "Fig Trees and Figs," of which they will find a frequent mention in the Bible. We shall have something to say ourselves about it.

FIG TREES.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER III.—WULFRIC'S RETURN.

"BUT O FOR THE TOUCH OF A VANISH'D HAND."

"IT'S Wulf!" cried Barbara, suddenly throwing down her book and springing to the door. "He has come, after all!"

The Meynals were sitting together in the drawing-room after dinner, and had just calculated that it would be impossible for Wulfric to reach St. Hilda that night, as his ship was only expected to reach Liverpool that morning, when the sound of a voice in the hall drew from Barbara's lips the foregoing exclamation.

Hardly had she spoken when the door opened and the traveller stood before them.

"Well, how are you all? Don't strangle me, Barbara. Mother, how are you? Were you expecting me to-night? Did you see that my ship was in?"

He spoke these words in a deep, powerful voice that was quite in harmony with the massive proportions of his figure. He stooped to kiss his mother and his sister as he spoke, and shook hands with Gerald, who answered his question.

"We did not think you could be here before to-morrow. We thought you would sleep the night in London."

"No, I came by Bristol. I found I could just manage it. I was anxious not to lose time."

"I dare say you have had nothing to eat all day," said Barbara, who was of a domestic turn. "I will go and see about some dinner for you."

"Thanks," answered her brother; and as Barbara vanished a silence fell upon the little group.

Wulfric stood with his back to the fire, his face set in lines of deep thought, and a heavy cloud resting upon his brow. At no time was he much of a talker, and now, coming back to his bereaved family, with only a few hours' notice of their common loss, his words seemed even less ready than usual.

"You got my letter?" asked Gerald at length.

"Yes, in Liverpool this morning, when we got in."

"Was it the first intimation you had? You had not seen it in the papers?"

"No; I had been out of the beat of papers for some weeks. I knew nothing till I got that letter."

"You left us so long without an address," said his mother plaintively.

"I could not help it. My movements were quite uncertain. When did it happen?"

"Nearly a month ago."

"It was very sudden, you said?"

"Yes. He was only ill for a few days. It was inflammation of the lungs."

Mrs. Meynal put her handkerchief to her eyes with a little sob. Wulfric drew his bushy eyebrows together.

"So a telegram could not have brought me in time, even if you had had my address," he observed slowly, and there was something of relief in the tone.

"No, I suppose not," sighed Mrs. Meynal; "but if you could have been summoned home immediately it would have saved us immense anxiety and difficulty."

"Difficulty about what?"

"About the practice. It has been waiting for you all this time—it has been very inconvenient to many people."

Wulfric stood very still, looking fixedly into the lamp burning on the table opposite. He was a very tall, powerful man, broad-shouldered and deep-chested, with clean-cut muscular limbs and a physical strength in proportion to his unusual stature. His face was striking in expression, from its determination and force of will, but most people at a first glance would have called Wulfric Meynal an ugly man. His features were cast in a rugged mould and were without regularity or symmetry of form. His hair was very dark and thick and invincibly curly, and unless cut very close, which it seldom was, somewhat resembled a lion's mane, and gave him a shaggy and characteristic appearance that made Gerald shrug his shoulders in a sort of fraternal despair. His eyes were very dark and piercing, large, deeply set in his head, and overhung by thick black brows. He wore neither beard nor moustache, so there was nothing to soften the stern set of the square jaw, or the resolute determination expressed by the lines of the mouth. Wulfric Meynal would never pass unnoticed, go where he would, but his was a face likely to inspire fear rather than affection.

Wulfric had never been a favourite at home, save with his father and Barbara. He had been much away from boyhood upwards, and had always been something of a stranger, even to his own people, but his youngest sister had always had a warm admiration for him, and if she stood a little in awe of him, it did not hinder her from being his staunch champion and ally.

There was a certain subtle resemblance between those two, both in outward appearance and in disposition, but it was not a likeness that was generally recognised; for her impetuous vivacity was so strongly at variance with his silence and reserve that few would detect any similarity between them, and they certainly were not aware of it themselves. Wulfric was fond of his little sister. He was not demonstrative, nor very susceptible, yet he had always had a soft spot in his heart for Barbara; and although her determined and not too well-judged championship of him, in season and out of season, had been the cause of some annoyance to him at times, he had never allowed her to see how very gladly he would have dispensed with it.

And now that he had come back to this changed and shadowed house, he was quite aware that it was with Barbara he wished to talk matters quietly over; that it was to her that he must look for any real confidence, comprehension or sympathy.

He stepped across the hall in a few minutes to the dining-room, where he found Barbara waiting for him with a substantial repast spread upon the table. He sat down to it mechanically, yet did not at first attempt to eat, but rested his head on his hand in an attitude of deep abstraction. Barbara came up slowly and stood close beside him without speaking, and presently Wulfric put his arm about her—an unusual demonstration from him, and for some time the silence between them was unbroken. At length he moved, put her gently away with a long-drawn breath like a sigh, and began slowly and absently to help himself to what was before him. His face wore a look that Barbara did not quite understand. She stood regarding him earnestly.

"Are you very tired, Wulf?"

"No, not particularly."

"Something is the matter?"

He raised his eyes slowly to hers.

"Remember that what is a month old to you, is new to me. You are used to the blank in the house—but I am not."

Barbara was silent and the tears gathered slowly in her eyes.

"I don't think I shall ever get used to it!" she said unsteadily. "It seems like losing everything."

Wulfric made no answer; but Barbara knew he understood. He and his father had been always deeply attached.

She busied herself with attending to his creature comforts, and he let her wait upon him, and ate more to please her than from any sense of hunger. Both knew well how many times she had waited thus upon their father, when he had come in late and weary from a heavy day's work. It had always been Barbara's greatest pleasure to sit with him whilst he took his repast and chatter to him of all the simple events of the day.

But she did not chatter now; she felt tongue-tied and constrained. There was much that she wished to discuss with her brother, many questions she was longing to ask, but for the moment she was as silent as he.

As at length he began to sip the coffee she had made for him, in the way she knew he liked it, and turning a little away from the table, he said quietly, "Now tell me all about it."

Barbara commanded herself as well as she could whilst she related the short story of her father's illness and death.

Wulfric listened with close attention.

"Did he leave any message for me?"

"His love—his love and blessing. I think you were very much in his thoughts. Ah, why were you not here? Why did he die just then?"

Wulfric was silent for some time, and then he spoke again: "Did he leave no message as to his wishes respecting the future? Did he say nothing as to what he wished me to do about the practice?"

Barbara hesitated, and twisted her hands together.

"In his will everything was left to mother and to us."

"I know, that was arranged between us. I had my portion spent upon my education. What I mean is, did he express any wish—did he say whether or not he thought it advisable for me to succeed him here?"

"He said that was a point you must decide for yourself. He said you would be certain to act rightly towards all. It was not for him to settle, he said, his mind was not sufficiently clear; but you were sure to see your duty, and do it, whatever it might be. He left the decision to you without a single misgiving."

Wulfric was silent. His dark eyes were fixed upon his sister's face, and yet he did not seem to see her. Barbara had spoken as if under compulsion whilst she had told him her father's words; but when these had been spoken she drew her breath hard, and suddenly broke out with great impetuosity; "Oh, Wulf, Wulf! Don't do it! don't do it!"

He started out of his reverie and looked at her in surprise.

"Don't do what, Barbara?"

"Take the practice and bury yourself at St. Hilda. Don't do it, Wulf—don't!"

He smiled a little grimly and made no reply, but went on asking questions.

"How have things been going on since? Who has been looking after people?"

"The surgery assistant has done what he can and people have just been waiting—"

Barbara stopped short suddenly, and Wulfric concluded with great composure, "Until I came back to take my father's place."

"No!" cried Barbara quickly, "till you came back to see what was to be done: I say, let the house and practice be sold. Then we shall have plenty to live upon, and you can go and make your fortune in London."

Wulfric smiled again, in the same rather grim way.

"And is that the expression of the general opinion of the family? Does that embody the public wish?"

Barbara hung her head and pressed her hands closely together, sighing impatiently.

"Ah!" said Wulfric, and said no more.

Presently Barbara looked up quickly. "Wulf," she said, "you must make a firm stand. They do want to sacrifice your career to their present ease and comfort; but you ought not to allow it; I'm sure you ought not. They can't make you, and you ought not to submit. You would so hate the life."

"Possibly; but that's not the question."

"But it ought to be. There is no reason on earth why you should be sacrificed to us. We shall get along very well somehow, and you will grow rich and famous in London, as you could never do here, and will be much more useful to us in the end. You must not sacrifice yourself for us. It would be such folly in the long run—you with your talents to rust away down here!"

She spoke impulsively, but Wulfric's face never moved from its set lines of care and thought.

"Life is a great lottery, Barbara," he said slowly and almost sadly. "Very few men live to realise their ambition, or to reach their goal. Fame and fortune are not won in a day, and at best they are fickle mistresses to serve. You have no idea, little sister, what a hard battle is life in these hurrying days of crowding and competition; and so long as I have health and strength to work for you, you never shall know."

Barbara looked at him, her lips compressed, her eyes aglow. Was that the expression of his real determination? Was his mind already made up?

"Wulf!" she cried catching her breath, "do you mean that your mind is really made up? You have had no time to think it over. You should not decide in such a hurry."

Wulfric smiled in his enigmatic fashion.

"I have had a whole day to think," he answered quietly, "and some days are like a lifetime."

Barbara sighed impatiently.

"Suppose father had left a message telling you not to?"

"He did not do anything of the kind. The message he did leave is clear enough to me. He saw my duty, as I see it, plainly enough."

"I don't believe he did—"

"But I am sure of it, and it is in my hands that the matter lies."

"I think too much fuss can be made about duty. Duty is not everything."

Wulfric made no reply.

"Wulf!" cried Barbara almost angrily: "Don't be so impenetrable. Don't you see that you have a duty to yourself to think of too?"

Wulfric turned upon her the sombre light of his eyes.

"There will be time enough to think of that when I have done my duty to the mother who is left dependent upon me, if not for the necessaries of life exactly, yet for the ease and luxuries which have become to her almost necessary, and with which, in her delicate state of health, she could ill afford to dispense. You who know so little of the difficulties of life, may talk glibly of the capital raised by the sale of house and practice; but when you come to try to live upon the interest of the money, you would soon begin to learn a great many new lessons as to the relative value of things. No, Barbara, so long as I can keep the practice together, and give my mother the home to which she has been accustomed, so long my place is here, and here I shall stay. What may happen in the future I cannot tell, but, during her lifetime, St. Hilda shall be her home as long as she wants to stay, if any exertions of mine can keep her there; and Celia and you will be with her as a matter of course. I dare say you will both be married long before there is any break up of the old home."

Wulfric spoke with a quiet decision that Barbara felt it useless to combat; moreover, his words brought home to her a certain sense of conviction.

"What about Gerald?" she asked by and by. "Are you going to keep him too?"

"I must see about that. I suppose with his talents he will soon be making name and fortune for himself."

Barbara laughed oddly.

"Wulf, surely you do not believe in Gerald's art?"

"It's a subject I know nothing whatever about. All I know is that everybody sings in praise of his genius; he is said to be a rising star in the world of poetry and art."

"Everybody!" repeated Barbara with scorn. "That means Gerald himself and the disciples he teaches. Mother and Celia believe in him because they take him at his own valuation, but I know better. He idles away all his time in talking of his unrivalled genius."

"You were always down on Gerald," remarked Wulfric very calmly. "He isn't in your style or mine, I admit; but in his own way he may be a very clever fellow for aught I know."

"It is an intolerably conceited one," answered Barbara hotly. "You should hear the way he talks of you, and the lofty airs he gives himself. If you're wise, Wulf, you will make him go back to Mr. Dart's office and work for a living. He will never do anything by himself."

Wulfric's jaw was set in lines expressive of a sort of grim amusement.

"You forget that Gerald is of age, and not my slave to do my bidding. If he declined the law when my father wished him to take to it, he is not likely to go back at my instigation."

"You could say you would not keep him in idleness."

"This house is not mine; the practice is a sort of gift from all of you. I have no right to take a high hand with anybody. Come, Barbara, we have discussed this matter long enough. I ought to be thought a lucky fellow for getting such a chance of a practice."

"You know you always said you should hate to be a country doctor."

"Grapes were sour then."

Barbara tossed her head impatiently.

"You can say what you like, but you know you are simply sacrificing yourself for us."

"I know that I am availing myself of a capital opening, and that you are a little goose."

"It is easy to talk. Of course I know that you will be earning a good income; but who will have the spending of it? It will do you precious little good. It will all be spent in keeping up the house as mother likes it, and in supporting us."

"Very well, so much the better. You don't suppose I want to spend a couple of thousand a year upon my wearing apparel, do you?"

Barbara was surprised into a sudden laugh. Wulfric's carelessness about his outward man and disregard for appearances were proverbial.

"And I don't even believe you will really take the position of master of the house. Gerald is always on the spot, making himself out to be the great man of the place."

Wulfric laughed carelessly.

"He is very welcome to the distinction."

"It's all very well for you to talk so coolly; but it will be hateful. Gerald can be horrid, and he always is where you are concerned. He will try to put you down, and patronise you, whilst all the time he is a sort of pensioner upon your bounty."

"Don't get into a nasty, sneering way about Gerald, Barbara. It's ungenerous and unsisterly, and I don't like it."

Barbara flushed hotly, yet she was not vexed with Wulfric for the reproof, and hazarded a final shot.

"You will just sacrifice life and prospects and everything, and you will not even be thanked for it."

Wulfric rose leisurely from his seat.

"Well, if you wanted to hold out an inducement, Barbara, you could not have picked upon a better one."

The group in the drawing-room waited for Wulfric's return with a certain suppressed anxiety. They felt a good deal of uncertainty as to how he would behave under the altered circumstances of his lot; and his decision was of such practical importance to each one of them, that they could not but feel some excitement until it was announced.

When he opened the door and re-entered, all faces were turned upon him with a sort of veiled yet eager scrutiny, of which, however, he did not appear at all conscious.

He sat down beside his mother, and asked after her health. Wulfric was never demonstrative in any way, but there was a sort of filial tenderness in his manner towards her, that Barbara was not slow to observe. It was as if the eldest son had taken up his position now, as in his father's lifetime there had been no need to do, as his mother's protector and the mainstay of the house.

Mrs. Meynal seemed dimly aware of something new in his manner. She looked into his face with a sort of helpless appeal, as she said: "I suppose you will stay at home now, and take your dear father's place?"

"I will take his duties, at least, if people will allow me that privilege. I fear I shall be but little qualified to fill his place; but I will do my best."

Mrs. Meynal heaved a sigh of relief. Gerald and Celia exchanged glances of satisfaction.

"It will be a capital thing for you, old fellow," said the younger brother, rising leisurely and standing with his back to the fire. "You didn't expect to step into a first-rate practice all ready to hand at your age, I'll be bound!"

Gerald did not speak with intentional flippancy or callousness: but his instincts were not fine, and he often shocked the feelings of others without intending to do so.

Wulfric raised his eyes to his brother's face with a glance that said more than any words could have done; and then he laid one hand gently upon his mother's. She had pressed her handkerchief to her eyes, and when she spoke, it was to say, in a plaintive voice, half choked by emotion: "I don't want anybody to be sacrificed for us. You must choose for yourself, Wulfric."

"I have chosen," answered Wulfric quietly, "for us. I have chosen St. Hilda. It is no sacrifice, mother."

And yet his brother and his sisters knew perfectly (determined as some were to ignore it) that it was a sacrifice, and a heavy one too. Perhaps it was the very readiness and coolness with which it was made that helped them to realise this, or perhaps it was the settled gravity and resolution of the sternly moulded face and the absence of every sign of vacillation; but from whatever cause it came, both sisters were impressed by the conviction that a great sacrifice had been uncomplainingly made, and were each affected in a different way by that same conviction. Gerald was never affected by anything that did not relate to his personal comfort.

Barbara's pillow was wet with tears that night as she thought of Wulfric's quiet resignation of his cherished hopes and ambition. But she was proud of him, and loved him all the better for his generosity and nobility of nature, and vowed deep down in her heart that whatever she could do to brighten his path and cheer his life should not be lacking to him.

Celia sat a long time over her fire that night; and very much astonished would her younger sister have been could she have read the thoughts passing through her mind.

Celia's nature was idle, inert, vain, and almost frivolous. She made no profession of being anything better, imitated and encouraged Gerald in all his habits of idle extravagance and folly, and had apparently no higher aims in life than he.

And yet, deep down in her heart, undeveloped and dormant, were germs of better things; and to-night these feelings, of whose existence she was as yet hardly aware, had been stirred within her, and as she sat over her fire her calm and usually listless face was more full of thought and expressed more of longing and purpose than perhaps any one had ever seen there before; for Celia was not wont to disclose her feelings to any one.

"He does not like doing it—he hates the thought of it; but he is going to do it all the same," she said to herself half aloud. "Gerald will laugh at him and ignore him, and so shall I; and mother will plague him by ceaseless complainings, and Barbara will worry him by defending him when he would much rather be let alone. He will hate the life; and yet he takes it up of his own accord. Why is it? Why do people do what they so much dislike? It is past me to find out; and yet sometimes I wish I did know. After all, what does it matter to me? It is no affair of mine; and yet—" Celia roused herself with a sigh, turned and looked at herself in the glass, and uttered a little laugh. "I must not take to thinking," she said. "It does not become me."

In his father's study Wulfric was seated alone, his head resting upon his hand in an attitude of deep thought. Presently he lifted himself up, and stood erect before a portrait of Dr. Meynal that hung over the fire-place. The picture was strikingly like the original, and the eyes seemed to the young man to be looking straight into his own.

"Father," said the young man aloud, "I will take the trust you have left behind for me. I will fill your place, so help me God, in as much as it is possible for me to do so."

THE HYMN-WRITERS OF WALES AND THEIR HYMNS.

I.—CAPTAIN MIDDLETON—EDWARD KYFFIN—EDMUND PRYS—DAVID JONES.

A NATION without a hymn on its lips must have a very cold and empty heart. "Psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" are the flowering of piety; when they appear in sweet and beautiful abundance "the winter is past, the rain is over and gone." It is a day of the Divine life. The unholy silence is broken; the songs of the sanctuary enter the palace and the cottage, and become the entertainment of fireside gatherings on many a long evening. The dawn-light has touched the harp of Zion, and the music fills the land.

Wales in the sixteenth century seems to have been without hymn or psalm. But the spiritual awakening which resulted in a translation of the whole Bible into Welsh, turned the mind of contemporary poets to the study of hymnology. There were pious patriots who sorrowed much that while England, Scotland, France, and Italy had each its voice of praise in the temple of the Christian faith, "poor little Wales" stood at the gate hymnless and forgotten. So it came to pass that in the last decade of the century two poetical versions of the Psalms were published. One was by Captain William Middleton, who joined to the congenial task of fighting the Spaniards this gentler exercise of translating the Psalms into the language of his beloved motherland, "keeping as near as he could to the mind of the Holy Ghost." No doubt the warlike tones of many of these sacred ballads of the Hebrew nation found a ready response in his heart, as he pursued those whom the theology of the day classified as enemies of the Lord. In 1591, six ships were told off under the command of Admiral Howard to go and plunder a portion of the Spanish fleet on its return with large booty from America. Captain Middleton's ship was one of the six, and he was charged to watch the arrival of the enemy. He found, however, that the Spaniards had obtained large reinforcements to defend their treasure, and the mission of plunder had to be abandoned. The captain, we are told, was worthy of a place, even among the brilliant array of brave soldiers that made England's name a terror to the terrible Armada. But in the midst of his naval duties his heart was secretly devoted to a far nobler purpose. He wanted to give his country the book of Psalms in verse, that the praise of God may no longer be silent. The work was finished at the island of Scutum, in the West Indies, on the 24th day of January, 1595. But, alas, for good intentions without due regard to practical results! His metres were all so intricate that no music could fit them, and no mouth could sing them. So the book has always remained a pious failure; one of the many fruitless works of well-meaning devotion which lie on the road to heaven, like broken columns of white marble, covered with dust—of very little value here, but in heaven surely accepted "for the Name that is dear."

While the soldier-poet was finishing his version in the West Indies, another kindred spirit at home—Edward Kyffin—was preparing some of the Psalms "for such of his beloved countrymen as love the glory of the Lord and the cherishing of their own mother tongue." He reminds them that Englishmen were not only zealous to rob and kill the Spaniards, but had also an anxious desire to save their souls; for had they not printed a large number of religious books in Spanish, and distributed them very diligently—when not otherwise engaged? If a foreign nation merited so much Christian consideration, how much more his own nation? for assuredly no people had been so favoured of God for long centuries, and were they to be last and latest in speaking of His glory? He only versified thirteen Psalms; but he prays most earnestly that this may be an incitement to some other mind to finish the work: "hoping that since God has kept us so long, He may have in His thought some chef-d'œuvre and mighty conquest for the increase of of His own glory among the ancient Britons whom He has so miraculously preserved until now in liberty and safety." The introduction breathes throughout a spirit of exalted devotion: and after three hundred years every sentence seems as if the touch of Heaven were fresh upon it. "Let no true Welshman give sleep to his eyes, or slumber to his eyelids, as the prophet David said, until he has seen the glory of the Lord, by facilitating the completion of this godly task in the language of his own country!"

His appeal was not in vain. Edmund Prys, before twenty years had passed, published a complete Welsh Psalter. He was an archdeacon of Merioneth, a man of scholarly attainments, and an eminent poet. Born in the romantic neighbourhood of Harlech, the fellowship of nature in the charming ruggedness of hill and glen, and in the shining blue of the sea, would establish a community of thought and of sacred fancy between him and the poet-king of Israel, who read the signature of the Divine hand on every page of creation. I am afraid, nevertheless, that his poetic genius was sometimes scarcely under control. Among all the bardic quarrels of Welsh literature, his quarrel with William Cynwal must be counted as its iliad. The latter was a smith by trade, and received one day a message in verse from the archdeacon asking for a steel bow to be sent to a friend according to promise. The smith—who was also a poet—made a long delay, and sent his excuses back in verse. So the battle went on, poem for poem; then the archdeacon began to treble his blows, sending three satires together, and receiving the same number of fiery missiles in return. The archdeacon then thought he would finish his adversary with a fusillade of nine poems, but the sturdy blacksmith was sufficiently alive still to reply with another nine. Three times nine poems was the next onslaught, but when the archdeacon had finished sixteen of them, a messenger brought him tidings that his rival had reached the dark and silent land where "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom"—nor any noise of warfare! He threw his sword far into the sea; and there and then commenced an elegy bewailing the loss of so brave a foe, so skilful a poet! But in turning the Psalms into verse—and verse that could be sung—he has given all coming ages cause to bless the regeneration of his muse. It is said that his custom was to prepare a Psalm for each Sunday to be chanted in the church. His intimate knowledge of Hebrew helped him to give sometimes a better rendering of the original than that even in the authorised version of the Welsh Bible. The whole was published in 1621. While the version has suffered somewhat from a lack of variety in its metre, it has nevertheless been, ever since its first appearance, one of the chief treasures of Welsh hymnology. Many a single verse, rugged and massive of form, has done yeoman service on "the field of the Association" (maes y Gymanfa); when, as in the earlier part of the present century, it was uttered by the lips of a John Elias, and taken up by the large assembly in unison, at first in slow and halting tones, gradually rising and swelling, till at last with overwhelming force it seemed to break on the shore of ten thousand souls like the splendid rush and roar of a mighty sea.

His version of Psalm cxxi. 1, 2, has a memorable incident connected with the singing of it. One of the evangelist preachers of the eighteenth century ventured to cross over to Anglesey to publish the glad tidings of God. His appearance was the signal for violent opposition; and how it fared with him on one occasion shall be told in the words of one who ought to know :—

"Saul of Tarsus was never more determined to imprison the disciples of Jesus than I, and the persecuting band that had gathered together with staves to meet the Roundhead who was coming to preach at Penmynydd. We had all agreed, if he tried to preach, to make an end of him there and then. When he had arrived, we began to push forwards close to him; and when he had mounted a large stone which stood beside the house, and turned his face toward Carnarvon, and gave out this stanza, to be sung by his scanty followers :—

I lift mine eyes unto the hills
Whence willing help shall come,—

we, supposing him to be expecting some armed men from the hills of Arvon, began to retreat a little. And after consultation, some of us decided to hear what the preacher had to say; and so we went over the fence, and crept slowly and noiselessly under cover of it till we came over against where he stood. He could not see us, and we did not want to see him; but we could hear every word he said as plainly as if we stood beside him. Under that sermon, on the most wonderful day of my life, I came to know myself as a lost sinner—lost everywhere, and in everything, outside of Jesus Christ, and Him crucified."

A century passed away from the death of Edmund Prys before Providence in its own strange way found another sacred poet; this time in the person of a cattle-dealer. David Jones, of Cayo, Carmarthenshire, was accustomed to buy cattle from the fairs about his home, and take them over to Barnet and Maidstone to sell. He had received a fair education in his youth, and being quick-witted and sociable, he soon obtained a considerable command of the English language; and so he must have been a rara avis in his native district, when "no English" was the order of the day. During his travels he picked up many a marvellous tale and choice bit of gossip: this made him a charming and valued guest in the country inns far and near. His ready verse also was "violin and harp" for merry comrades during the long evenings of winter. But an unexpected change came over him—came in a simple but wondrous fashion. One Sunday morning when he was returning from an expedition into England, he caught the sound of singing in the old Independent chapel of Troedrhiwdalar, Breconshire, and was attracted thereby to enter. A message from God was there for him that morning. He left the chapel with the old life of vanity and sin for ever judged; and before him rose the hope of Jesus Christ, like a summer dawn on the hills which sheltered his vale of Towy. His heart once changed, his poetic talents were soon touched by the fire from the seraph's hand. The minstrel of the public-house became the sweet singer of Zion. His first undertaking was the translation of Dr. Isaac Watts' Psalms and Hymns; and in this he achieved decided success. Many of his verses remain the most popular and homely of all versions of Israel's national songs, and are household treasures of Welsh piety. But he was not satisfied with merely doing the work of a translator: he composed several hymns of permanent merit, touched with the spirit of the Great Revival of the eighteenth century. It was the day when the living gospel had to be preached in some humble cottage or on the public street. Once when a service was being held near Lampeter, where David Jones had gone according to his wont to accompany the evangelist, a band of hired ruffians set on the house and dragged the worshippers out to the street with great violence. There the poet knelt down on the ground, and began to pray. He was a man of prayer; and in that hour of trial every word seemed to find the Almighty God. The persecutors stood still; they were startled; they became terrified. Without waiting further they escaped for their lives, lest they should be smitten by the God of the man who prayed in the street.

It was also the day of religious ecstasy. He himself used to break out sometimes into exalted expressions of religious fervour, praising God aloud in the assembly, and "laughing tears" in the vision of Divine Love. Belonging, as he did, to the "dry Dissenters"—a term of contempt applied to the quieter religionists of the day—he was sometimes called to task by his brethren for what they considered his extravagance. His reply to all such accusations is given in some characteristic verses, of which the following is a free translation :—

Men of the world are asking,
Much wondering at me,
When I my Lord am praising,
"What can this folly be?"
I am released from bondage,
And though the mockers throng,
The precious blood of Jesus
Shall always be my song.

A cloud once darkened o'er me,
No praises could I sing;
Sin and its guilty sorrow
Pierced through me with its sting.
But that has been removèd,
And all its weight of pain—
The precious blood of Jesus
I sing, and sing again.

I stood at Sinai trembling,
Where God upon me frowned;
Dark threatenings broke in thunders,
The lightning flashed around:
I came to peaceful Zion—
How can I songless be?—
The precious blood of Jesus
Is all the world to me.

What, though I leap rejoicing?
Sweet reverence guides my thought;
Like David's godly dancing
When home the ark was brought:

Or, like the lame man's rapture,
Healed at the temple gate,—
The precious blood of Jesus
Brought health and good estate.

The flowering of piety is never the same: in the garden of the Lord the maiden reserve of the lily and the passionate glow of the rose harmonise into one living fulness of beauty. The fervent song of David Jones has room in the temple of God; and so has the tranquil heart which murmurs heavenly music to itself alone.

H. ELVET LEWIS.

SOME HINDU DEVOTEES,

AS PHOTOGRAPHED.

I.

THE most attractive and significant objects at the great fair of Hardwar are the richly dressed boys seated on the sacred steps leading down to the Ganges. In their silk robes and gold-embroidered shawls, with the circular fan of peacock feathers surmounting their caps, they form a range of colour quite dazzling in the blaze of the sun, as, squatted before the brass dish, they stolidly acknowledge the gifts of the visitors towards the service of Krishna—the god they represent.[1]

[1] The portraits that illustrate these articles are from "The People of India," an eight-volumed series of photographs by Mr. J. F. Watson, published under the auspices of the Indian Government.

In the Hindu pantheon there is no more popular deity than the incarnation of Vishnu appearing in the Maha-bharata as Arjuna's charioteer. The high philosophy of the Vedas seems gradually to have been coarsened into symbol, and broadened and thinned as it sank to suit the feebler intellects of the conquered masses. A material worship was thus provided by the Brahmans for the humblest to appreciate; and, of the various forms which this necessarily took, none has proved so attractive as that of the son of Devaki. Full of picturesque legend and miracle, the story of Krishna was spread by zealous missionaries all over India, and his worship has now almost entire possession of the women whose sympathies he holds from his birth to his death.

In the tenth book of the Bhagavata-purana, we learn how he was the eighth son of Vasu-deva, and was born with the mark S'ri vatsa on his breast. It having been predicted that Kansa would be killed by one of Vasu-deva's sons, the King of Mathura kept his cousin Devaki, and her husband in close imprisonment, and killed their first six children; the seventh, Bala-rama was saved by a miracle; and with the eighth Vasu-deva escaped. He left him with Yasoda in exchange for her newly born daughter, with whom he returned to Devaki. In Vrindavana, Krishna and his elder brother grew up among the herdsmen's sons, and while still a boy he destroyed the serpent Kaliya, and raised up Mount Govardhana on his finger to shield the Gopis from the wrath of Indra, who had tried to destroy them by a flood. For Krishna was no ordinary mortal; he was simply Vishnu incarnate. Such is the main legend from which have sprung the thousand fictions and symbols which form the mass of the Hinduism of to-day.

Krishna is the most popular incarnation of Vishnu, and Vishnu is the most gracious person of the Hindu trinity, the only one of the Trimurti who clothed himself in flesh for the good of the world in times of peril. Strangely suggestive is the story of his twenty-two incarnations, when read beneath the symbolic veil. Among those that strike most home are his appearance as the fish Matsya, when he towed the ship out of danger in which Manu the progenitor of the human race, with the seven patriarchs and the seeds of all things living, had taken refuge from the flood; and his appearance as the tortoise, Kurma, when in the milk sea he served as the pivot, round which the gods and demons twisted the serpent Vasuki, and churned up the fourteen precious things, including the lovable woman, the first horse, the first cow, and the first elephant, the moon, the immortalising nectar, and the unerring bow. These incarnations took place in the Satya, or first age of the world's four ages; in the second, or Treta age, we have Vishnu as the dwarf, Vamana, who deprived the demon king, Bali, of his dominions, appearing before the demon as a pigmy, and asking for as much land as he could step over in three paces. At the request being granted, he strode in two steps over heaven and earth; but, compassionately refraining from his third stride, left Patala, the lower world, in Bali's possession. It was in the same age that he afterwards appeared as Rama with the axe to clear away the Kshatriya class, and destroy for ever the tyranny of the fighter over the thinker; and in the same age he came again as Krishna to destroy the principle of evil as represented in the tyrant Kansa.

Strangest of all is the way these incarnations end in their unmistakable testimony to the suppleness of the Hindu. One of the last is Buddha, on the ground that the great reformer was really Vishnu come to delude the wicked into bringing destruction on themselves by neglecting the caste duties, and denying the existence of the gods! And, last but one, is Christ Himself, now adopted by many of the Brahmans, probably for the same reason as they adopted Gotama. The last incarnation is to appear at the end of the fourth age, when the world will have become wholly bad. Then Vishnu as Kalki will be revealed in the sky, seated on a white horse, with a sword like a comet, come to destroy the wicked, renovate creation, and establish the reign of righteousness. The devotees of Vishnu, as Krishna, may all be known by the trident mark on the forehead, the sides of which are red, and the centre white. The boys have it, as shown in our illustration, and in the medicant friar the photograph has brought the mark out more clearly, for all the sketches with which these notes are illustrated, are from photographs taken on the spot, and owe nothing to imagination.

A BAIRAGI.

A picturesque character is this Bairagi, welcome everywhere for his tales of travel and adventure and his Krishna legends. His name is Ramanundi, and he is a Jat, who, like many others, has left his wife and children, to become a Bairagi. On his head is a tinsel crown worn over a skull-cap instead of a turban. On his shoulder is a bamboo pole covered with red cotton cloth, decked with peacock feathers and wild flowers. To the pole are slung tin baskets covered with orange cotton cloth and containing pots of Ganges water, which he may have filled at the great festival at Hardwar. He is on his way to Dvaraka in Gujerat, one of the seven sacred cities, the others being Kasi or Benares, Mathura or Muttra, on the Jumna—Kansa's Capital; Hardwar, where the Ganges first enters the plains; Fyzabad, anciently Ayodhya or Oudh—the city of Rama; Avantika or Ujjaiyini; and Kanci, otherwise Conjeveram, near Madras.

At Dvaraka, which was Krishna's own city, he will pour the holy water over the holy image; and thither he jogs along with his bells bright as gold, going tinkle, tinkle, to cheer him on his way and call attention to his piety. From Dvaraka he will wander to other shrines, for there is no rest for him in this life; he will be always on the move, received by the settled monks, and by them fowarded on his way.

India is the land of pilgrimages, and sacred places can be numbered by the hundred to which the pious and heavily laden go. The great rivers are the chief attractions, and of these the Ganges as the mightiest is the holiest. No sin is too heinous, no character too black, no sorrow too deep, for its waters to wash away. And one of the chief forms of pilgrimage is the following of a river from its source to its sea. In this way is the Ganges treated by very many who set out from Gangotri, by the left bank to the Ganga-sagara, and then by the right bank return to Gangotri, thus accomplishing the Parikrama which is supposed to occupy six years.

A GOSAIN.

Some of the Bairagis — who, by the way, are generally Sudras, and have for their spiritual teachers, the Nagas, who are the representatives of the old snake worshippers — instead of perambulating the country live in a lonely ravine or cave on a hill-side, or even at the foot of a tree; but, as a rule, they wander about, trusting to be helped by the monasteries on the road which are the head-quarters of the Gosains.

The fraternity of the Gosains extends all over the country. They are mendicant friars who ask and receive charity only from Hindus. They feed not on meat, but on bread, pulse, vegetables, sweetmeats and milk, and when they act up to their vows—the word gosain means "one who masters his passions"—they often live to a great age.

The old gentleman whose portrait we give, was an inhabitant of Aligarh, the land of the indigo factories, where his ancestors had dwelt for many generations. The colour of his turban, tunic, and waistcloth was a dark orange, which he dyed himself with the bark of the mimosa, this peculiar orange shade being the colour of his order. The initiation of a Gosain is an impressive ceremony. At the outset, the novice is shaved with water brought from a tank in which the image of Siva has been soaked, and he is given the mantra, or sacred text, in the presence of all the Gosains in the neighbourhood, assembled to bless him, and eat laddu; then, during three days at Benares, he is given the original mantra of Siva, by some famous Gosain, at what is called the Vijanja Hom. On the first day he is shaved, leaving only the chundi at the top of the head, and being then considered as a Brahman has to beg a little; on the second day as a Brahma charya he wears coloured clothes and the janeo, or sacred thread; and on the third day he loses the janeo, and has the chundi cut off, and the mantra of Siva given to him. He then abandons the secular world, and either betakes himself to a solitary place to practice severe ascetic rites, or enters a monastery to be ruled by an abbot, and share in the advantages of a wealthy foundation, much as if he lived in Italy. Some, however, of the fraternity live in cities, and carry on business as bankers, very much on the Shylock principle, taking large usury, and in the native states, enforcing their claims with considerable violence; and some trade in gold and silver, in brocades and shawls, and in jewels, especially pearls. Many are of great wealth, and have extensive transactions all over India. A Gosain does not marry; he must adopt disciples from any caste or sect. Before his death one of these disciples is declared his heir, and when the old man is dead and has been buried, sitting as if at work, with the tomb built over him, in the centre of which for his refreshment there grows the plant of sweet basil, the fortunate disciple takes all the wealth, except such as is needed to support his brother disciples as before. Sometimes Gosains make excellent soldiers. Baji Rao had a number of them in his army, and the King of Kanuj's bodyguard is famous in the traditions of India. One great point in the Gosain's character is his unfailing charity. The wealthier classes give largely to the poor, and a daily dole of good bread is the customary ceremony of every prosperous house. Even the poorer brethren share the produce of their daily alms with the distressed, nor will any hungry traveller ever be turned away without food from a Gosain's monastery, whatever his caste may be.

THE INNER LIFE OF LORD SHAFTESBURY.

PART III.

LORD SHAFTESBURY'S religious opinions shaped themselves very gradually. At the age of twenty-five he was still within the borders of the "high and dry" school. The idea of any real good being done in the world outside the sphere of that "Church and State" party, and especially by Dissenters, seemed monstrous, if indeed the possibility of such a thing ever occurred to him. "As to their having any views of their own worthy of consideration," he says, "it never crossed my mind until one day I got hold of a copy of some Commentary, and, after reading for awhile with great interest, it suddenly struck me, 'The writer must have been a rank Dissenter!' and I instantly shut up the book, recoiling from it as I would from poison. One of the first things that opened my eyes was reading of Doddridge being condemned as a Dissenter, and I remember exclaiming, 'Good Heavens! how will he stand in the day of judgment at the bar of God, as compared with Pope Alexander VI.?' It was not till I was twenty-five years old, or thereabouts, that I got hold of Scott's 'Commentary on the Bible,' and, struck with the enormous difference between his views and those to which I had been accustomed, I began to think for myself."

From that time forth there was a growing intensity in his religious life—habits of meditation and prayer increased; the spirit of ardour, confidence and love shone forth more conspicuously in public and in private, and his studies were more constant in religious literature, with a view "to obtain deeper acquaintance with critical theology." At the age of thirty-four, when visiting Oxford, eleven years after quitting it, he records his gratitude to God for his "advantages of sound and religious learning," and that he has, "by God's grace, a deeper sense (and yet how shallow!) of His religion."

In that same year we find him meditating on Church Reform, and, although his meditations took no practical form at that time, they were soon to bear fruit in various ways and places. In the following year (1836) he presided at a meeting to discuss the best methods of "extending the means of grace in and to necessitous parishes, in strict conformity with the spirit, constitution and discipline of the Established Church." The result of that meeting was the formation of the Church Pastoral Aid Society, with whose operations he was intimately identified to the end of his life.

It is a very noticeable feature in the life of Lord Shaftesbury, after his religious opinions were once formed, that the views he expressed in early years were identical with those he held even to old age. His diaries evidence a remarkable consistency. He described himself as "a Protestant of the Protestants, and an Evangelical of the Evangelicals," and in these aspects we will now regard him.

His Protestantism was not political; it was not asserted simply as the source of freedom and the basis of civil and religious liberty; it affected the very springs of his spiritual life. "True Protestantism," he says, "asserts the right of private judgment; but it asserts at the same time the inspiration of the Scriptures." One of his favourite mottoes was, "The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible." He grudged no labours to spread its circulation everywhere and at all times; it was daily the "man of his counsel"; it was his hope as the source of all individual and national safety, of all individual and national greatness. "Amid all the conflicts of the nations that are coming on the earth," he said, "that Book shall be our life, our light, our security, our pillar of cloud by day, our pillar of fire by night, our guide through all our perils, and none but those who have the Bible in their hands and in their hearts will be able to meet the great conflict, and stand in their lot at the end of the days."

Lord Shaftesbury's Protestantism was, as we have said, spiritual rather than political. He regarded the doctrine of Justification by Faith as "that grand doctrine, the very life of the Bible and the keystone of the Reformation." "I hold to that doctrine," he said to his biographer, "and go not only the whole length of Luther, but farther still; I accept the axiom of Doddridge. 'The best act that the best man ever did contains in it that which is worthy of condemnation;'" and it was his constant lament—a most significant fact when his own life is borne in mind—that "the prominence almost universally given to works apart from doctrine, to deeds of charity and benevolence, to a good life, to philanthropy so-called, to splendour and liberality in sacred things, to love of the brethren, to labour for others, to everything where the notion of merit of one form or another, consciously or unconsciously, could enter in, marked the spirit of the day, and indicated a relapse into the civilisation of Athens and Rome, with much brilliancy and softness of exterior, worshipping heroism, science, commerce, wealth, art—everything human and superhuman, save the one true God." He writes in his diary :—

"How, in logic or common sense, can a man have merit in the sight of God? To have merit, so as to constitute a claim, or the possibility of a claim, on another, must rest on an independence between the parties; a power in one to do something to which the other is not already entitled. God created man, and gave him all his faculties of body, soul, and spirit. God has unlimited right to every act, word, and thought of the being He has formed. What can a man offer to God that is not already God's own? God gave the faculties, and to Him must return every operation of them. If a man devoted to God perfect obedience, perfect love, from the beginning of his life to the moment of his death, without a moment's suspension or a particle even of infirmity, he would simply have cleared himself of God's anger; he would have done nothing at all to establish a right on God's favour."

Lord Shaftesbury's Protestantism was aggressive, and for half a century he stood forth as a champion on every occasion of assault. Thus in 1841 we find him engaged in warm controversy with the leading members of the Tractarian party; and ten years later he was in the thick of the fight, when "Papal Aggression" stirred the country to its depths.

Later still, when the Grand Duke of Tuscany cast the Madiai into prison, because they had accepted and taught the Protestant faith, Lord Ashley was again to the fore, as prime mover in the efforts to secure their liberation—with the result that "deputies start from England, France, Holland, Prussia, Switzerland; monarchs interfere with autograph letters," and all Europe is brought to see that there is "a reality in Protestantism, a spirit of brotherhood, a unity of hearts under a diversity of forms."

Still later, and for many years, he took an active and prominent part in the great controversy concerning Ritualism.

It is worthy of special remark, however, that while Lord Shaftesbury was stern, almost fierce, at times, in his denunciations of Roman Catholicism and Ritualism, it was only the system he attacked and not the individuals. For Roman Catholics he had many broad and tender things to say, and always kept his eyes open to see the best in their practices. Thus, when in Italy, he wrote, "One great and honourable characteristic of this religion is that no one is ashamed to exhibit devotion." And again: "The most zealous Protestant must applaud the Romish practice of leaving open the churches for any casual worshipper. Oftentimes in the midst of daily occupations, the mind may desire the consolations of religion, and oftentimes it may be led to think of them by the sight and opportunity of houses of prayer." Referring to the self-devotion of Roman Catholics to the great works of charity and love, he says: "I can speak with no disparagement of these sisters of charity and mercy, who, in long black gowns perambulate our streets; I speak of them with deep respect, engaged as they are in works of compassion, goodness and tenderness, but I maintain that in our Protestant faith we have sisters of mercy to vie with them."

And again, at the time of Dr. Pusey's death, we find this note in the diary: Sept. 23, 1882. —"My friend Pusey, dead and buried. Intensely and fearfully as I differed from him in many points of unspeakable importance, I could not but love the man. Had known him for sixty years; was at college with him. We read Aristotle to each other. But while I formed a correct opinion of his diligence, I had not formed, at that time, a correct one of his powers. He has had a prodigious effect on his generation. I greatly admired his talents, fully acknowledged and wondered at his immense learning, and reverenced his profound piety. His work on 'Daniel' exhibits all the three; and surely he was called and supported by our Lord in that illustrious effort of wisdom, labour and courage."

Lord Shaftesbury was not only a Protestant of the Protestants: "I am essentially, and from deep-rooted conviction," he said to his biographer in 1884, "an Evangelical of the Evangelicals. I have worked with them constantly, and I am satisfied that most of the great philanthropic movements of the century have sprung from them. I stand fast by the doctrines held by that party, but I am not, and never have been, a leader of that party." Thirty years before that date he had written to his friend Mr. Haldane, of the Record: "I will do all that in me lies, under God's blessing, to aid their endeavours, advance the good cause, and maintain the simplicity of the truth, but I will not aspire to lead them, notwithstanding the band of worthy, noble, pure-minded beings to be found in their ranks."

There were many reasons why he disclaimed the lay leadership of the Evangelical body. "It is a position too uncertain and too useless for any one to accept. No one can be an effective leader unless those who follow him are prepared to repose confidence in his judgment and guidance, not during smooth and easy times only, but in times of doubt and perplexity." And this he felt sure he could not command. Another and a stronger reason was that, though there were very many, indeed, most points, in which he concurred theologically with the Evangelical party, there were some in which he considered they were very far from charity or justice. Moreover, he belonged to the older order of Evangelicals, to the Venns, Romaines, Topladys, Berridges, Simeons, Grimshawes, Harveys, Scotts and Newtons of a former day: to the school which even in his younger days was fast dying out, represented by such men as Hugh Stowell, Haldane Stewart, Edward Bickersteth, Hugh McNeile, Henry Venn, William Marsh and Alexander Haldane. He maintained that it was the duty of every one to set before the world the one "clear, distinctive, experimental dogmatic truth, summed up in the word Gospel."

And it grieved him to think that clergy and laity alike were engaged in caring about many things and forgetting the one thing needful, "the divinity of Christ, His atoning sacrifice, and His coming kingdom."

Among the "distinctive dogmatic truths" held tenaciously by Lord Shaftesbury were these: He believed in the doctrine of the total depravity of the human heart by nature; in the necessity of a "new birth" through the "revelation to each individual soul, by the agency of the Holy Spirit and the word, of the great saving truths of the Gospel of the grace of God, by which the understanding is spiritually enlightened and the character transformed." He believed in the Christian life as a humble "continuous trust in the Atoning Blood," a simple faith in Scripture, a constant prayerfulness, and a recognition of the hand of God in all the events of life.

The following extracts from Lord Shaftesbury's diary exhibit some of these views more fully:—

"What is belief? What does it contain? What does it demand? Does it demand conviction of sin, confession of sin, repentance and faith? All these things, except faith, are dropped nowadays, and people are led to believe that to accept Christ as a Saviour, and to wish for His salvation, is the sum and substance of a heart turned to God. It requires no self-abasement, no confession of the justice of the Divine wrath, no acknowledgment of inherited corruption; and, disguise it as the preacher may, no sense of demerit, and no sense of deserved condemnation. It is, in fact, reduced to an easy, agreeable acceptance of a pleasant invitation, to be had at any time that is convenient to you. Herein lies the seed of an incipient Antinomianism."

"April 15th (Good Friday).—A deeply solemn day! How many among religious people enter altogether into the height and depth of the event? It is here that the faith is weakest, the heart less approachable, and the intellect most active. The repugnance of the human understanding to accept what we cannot comprehend, is prodigious. And yet this repugnance is only in things moral and spiritual, for we readily believe statements in matters of science, which far surpass our powers of mind. But pride lies at the root, both of our acceptance in the one case, and our rejection in the other. We reject the mysterious doctrines of the Gospel, for they attest the infirmity and corruption of the whole race of man. We accept the incomprehensible assertions of science, because they give a lofty eminence to the capacity of intellect! And what is the real force of man's intellect? It cannot arrive at the first principles of its existence and operation. To those who believe, or, perhaps, who wish to believe, the answer to every perplexity and doubt on the subject of the vicarious sacrifice is 'God is love.'"

"Jan. 31st, 1871.—Really I have more fear from the defenders of religion than I have from its assailants. More mischief seems to be done in many instances by those who undertake the cause of the Bible than by those who would overthrow it. Let the Bible tell its own story, use its own language, make its own appeals. Enforce all these, but adding nothing of your own. The 'scientific friends' are as dangerous as the 'scientific enemies.' . . . Try the Scriptures intellectually merely, and you will encounter no end of difficulties, and these difficulties will agitate and darken your moral and spiritual perception of the truth. Try them by the heart, and you will find such a flood of comfort, conviction and assurance, that all difficulties will vanish, and even those started by science will fade away, for faith and gratitude will set them down to ignorance and incapacity, and revel in the whole force of the discovery, that knowledge, material and philosophical, is for time, but love for eternity."

In the special and particular operation of Divine Providence, even in matters of comparatively minor importance, and in direct and specific answers to prayer, Lord Shaftesbury had an unfaltering belief: "The mass of the world are all against the admission of special providences," he says. "It savours, they think, of fanaticism, hypocrisy and cant. I do not deny the delicacy and difficulty of the subject; to allow it fully, in almost every trifling instance, seems to cripple man's free agency and supersede secondary causes; to deny it, is to deny God's goodness and mercy, and His moral government of mankind!" At momentous crises in his life, he looked for the interposition of God's Providence, and attributed his successes as answers to prayer. The following note from his diary indicates the tenour of his mind on this subject:—

"March 21st.—I do not resort to the 'Sortes Biblicæ,' because I do not see that God has instructed us to consult Him in that way. Nevertheless, He sometimes, I feel assured, imparts encouragement and comfort by suggesting passages of the Bible. Had prayed much to God to know His will, whether I should persist or forbear. I opened, at hazard (not thinking then to inquire), the second chapter of Chronicles. My eye fell on the answer to Jabez, 'And the Lord heard him in that which he requested.' Went to church, and lesson for the day said, 'See, I have accepted thee in this thing also.' Next, at morning prayers in family, read, 'Be it done to thee, even as thou wilt;' and, finally, on day preceding the effort, opened first chapter that occurred, and read to Minny, 'I will give thee a mouth and wisdom that no one of your adversaries shall be able to gainsay or resist.'"

Scattered throughout those three volumes, and gathered together in certain places, are extracts from Lord Shaftesbury's diaries and letters, giving illustrations of his views on every phase of religious thought and feeling.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

DIFFICULT OR MISUNDERSTOOD TEXTS.

BIBLE difficulties are of two main kinds. Some attach to the substance of the revelation: others arise from the obscurity of texts. The former are for theologians to discuss, the latter are the province of the interpreter. No doubt, the two classes of difficulty run into each other at many points, seeing that the revelation as a whole is made up of details, and a faithful interpretation of the parts is essential to the knowledge of the entire scheme. But it will suffice for our present purpose to treat the two as separate, and, passing by those momentous and often perplexing problems which have to do with the essence of revealed truth, as well as the difficulties, intellectual and moral, connected with the method of the revelation, to look at some of the questions which present themselves to every thoughtful reader in individual texts and phrases. Every student finds his own difficulties, and a passage which is plain to one is often a perplexity to another. It has occurred to us that the pages of the SUNDAY AT HOME might be a medium for mutual help in this important matter; and we therefore invite our readers to propose to us any questions respecting the interpretation of Scripture texts, or to state any difficulties which may have occurred to them. To such questions, made with a sincere and reverent desire to know the truth, we will endeavour to reply; asking in this also the co-operation of our readers. A few columns every month will thus be devoted to BIBLE QUERIES AND NOTES UPON TEXTS; and while the Editors must reserve entire right as to the insertion of any communication, they will, so far as the exigencies of publication allow, welcome the aid of correspondents; assured, that "the Lord hath yet more light to break forth from His holy word."

I. A place may be found for the correction of traditional mistakes in the interpretation of particular texts. It has been the fate of some passages to be continually quoted in a sense which they were never intended to bear, and in which their true connection and significance are obscured. The Scriptures are too much treated as a collection of separate aphorisms; and text without context may be made to mean almost anything. Probably, this habit of loose interpretation has arisen in part from the verse-division in our ordinary Bibles, yet more from the preacher's habit of employing single sentences or half-sentences as mottoes for sermons. "We cannot see the forest for the trees:" we cannot see the Bible for the texts! Some familiar passages, examined in the light of their context, will yield a beautiful but little-considered meaning. The old use of the text may be lost, but in their true application its words are seen to be richer and deeper than ever they had appeared before.

II. Again, many passages are obscure because of some hint or allusion which requires thought, knowledge, or comparison with other parts of Scripture to understand. "He who runs" cannot "read." This very text, by the way, illustrates what we mean. It is in Habakkuk ii. 2; and is often used as an illustration of the clearness of Divine revelation, as though the swift runner could catch the meaning of the bold inscription as he hurried past. This is not the prophet's lesson at all.

"Write the vision, and make it plain upon tables, that he may run that readeth it."

The "reading" is before the "running"; and the plainness with which the vision is written is to banish the hesitation and to quicken the steps of him who is to bear the message to the world.

Difficulties of this class may, no doubt, be cleared up by easily accessible Commentaries, and yet it may be useful to note some of them especially, for their own intrinsic and often almost startling interest.

III. Apparent discrepancies in statement are encountered by all "harmonists," of Old Testament histories and of New. These also are discussed in Commentaries innumerable; but many an earnest student feels the difficulties afresh, and enquires what is the net result of the examination devoted to these points. Some have been elucidated by general consent; in some, no final conclusion has been reached; some remain perhaps insoluble. Let it be remembered that an inexplicable variation is not necessarily a contradiction. Two statements often appear irreconcilable only from our ignorance of some detail not supplied. That such details do exist in many cases, which if we knew them would make all clear, is often morally certain. Take for instance the two genealogies of our Lord. It is quite impossible to believe that two registers really inconsistent would have passed unchallenged by the Jews when the Gospels were written. There must have been some facts, then known and unquestioned, respecting the "house and lineage of David" which authorized alike the account of Matthew and that of Luke. What these facts may have been, we conjecture with more or less of likelihood. But whether we succeed or not, we may be assured that the truthfulness of the history remains unassailable.

IV. Some statements, especially in the Old Testament, are so evidently at variance with probability that we may fairly suppose some corruption of the text. To say this is, we know, to tread on delicate ground; conjectural emendation is anxious work; and it is better often to acknowledge a difficulty than to imagine a mistake: but there are cases when the soundest and most reverent critic cannot but discern an error.

These instances especially occur in the specification of numbers—a fact that may be easily explained from the way in which the Hebrews expressed their numerical statements. To take a very simple case: we read of Absalom how he insidiously "stole the hearts" of the Israelites; then it is added (2 Samuel xv. 7) that "after forty years" he requested leave of absence from his father's court. A conjectural emendation, sustained by the authority of the ancient versions, reads four years, and this is generally accepted. Other passages of a similar kind will no doubt be suggested by our readers.

V. The citations of the Old Testament in the New are a fruitful source of difficulty. Sometimes it is their non-accordance with the Hebrew, as given in the English version, and sometimes with the Septuagint also, that perplexes thoughtful readers. Thus, the words of the Psalmist (xl. 6) "mine ears hast Thou opened," appear in the Epistle to the Hebrews (x. 5) "a body hast Thou prepared Me." But a more frequent cause of perplexity is the apparent want of accord between the Old Testament passage in its original and obvious intent, and the use made of it by the New Testament writer. Is the coincidence merely superficial, or only one of words, or is there some deep underlying principle of harmony? To settle such questions satisfactorily we need to understand the true and broad connection between type and antitype, and to see how the "Law and the Prophets," the whole course of Jewish history, and the character and career of Old Testament personages, were a preparation for the Christ who was to come. No study can well be of deeper interest; and the investigation of its very real and numerous difficulties will, we are persuaded, lead to a larger appreciation of Christ's redeeming work, as well as to a deeper sense of the hidden unity of Scripture.

VI. There is only need to mention another, and miscellaneous class of difficult texts—those in which the language itself is elliptical, ambiguous, or obscure. Such passages have exercised for generations the ingenuity of expositors; the Revised Version has furnished valuable help in some cases; but there are others in which satisfactory elucidation seems impossible. Why, for instance, should women in Christian assemblies wear veils upon their heads "because of the angels" (1 Corinthians xi. 10); or what is the meaning of being "baptized for the dead" (xv. 29); or how does the argument apply, that "a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one"? (Galatians iii. 20.) Truly these are among the "things hard to be understood" in the writings of "our beloved brother Paul."

Scripture difficulties, to the reverent and sincere enquirer, have a very definite spiritual value. They prompt some of his deepest enquiries; they lead to the highest triumphs of his faith. Those in sympathy with the truth will discern the truth; and to the humble and devout is given the seeing eye. To cold heartless criticism the word of God will never disclose its wonders: but where earnest prayer for light combines with thought, reasoning, research, the "wondrous things" will sooner or later reveal themselves. It will be a joy to us if in the pages we now propose to devote to this topic we can truly help any "who seek" to "find" the treasure beyond all price.

HEART'S-EASE.

CHAPTER III.

THE next instant, Ethel heard a scream which pierced her heart, and she sprang forward after Nero. It seemed as though he, too, had been startled by the scream from within the cottage, for by the time she gained the door, he had slunk back from the window crest-fallen, as though he expected to be punished for his misdeeds.

"You bad, wicked dog! what have you done?" she exclaimed, as she ran to the window, and looked in. Then she saw the answer to her question.

A girl of about her own age, lay propped up with pillows on a chair by the open window, and although, at this moment, her face wore a flushed and excited look, her arms lay helplessly in her lap, where pussy had taken refuge, her white fur all on end, and her pink eyes flashing as much indignation at the open window as they could command.

So utterly weak and helpless did the girl seem, that at first sight Ethel thought she must be fainting. She was wasted almost to a shadow, but her large brown eyes made her face look smaller than it really was. She was not pretty, but yet there was something about her features that was uncommon, and although her eyes were heavy with the languor of suffering, they were still very beautiful.

"Oh! Nero, Nero, what have you done? I fear the naughty dog has frightened you very much, may I come in, please?" she asked in a pleading voice of the sick girl.

A whispered, "Yes, miss," gave her courage to open the door of the cottage very gently and carefully, lest Nero should intrude. The room was neat and bright, although it had very little furniture beyond the ordinary table and few chairs, but what struck Ethel's notice most of all was that bunches of common wild flowers were placed here and there in the room, where the sick girl's eyes could rest on them, as she turned her head from side to side. The cottage was perfectly still, so that Ethel concluded that the sick girl was quite alone.

"I hope my dog did not frighten you very much," she said, as she bent over the wasted figure, and spoke in a voice of anxious excitement.

"Thank you, miss," the sick girl whispered, as soon as her throbbing heart would let her. "The weakness—will—soon pass off. I—was frightened—for my dear kitty," and she looked down at the ball of white fur, which by this time had curled itself up close to her protecting arms.

"Are you quite alone?" Ethel asked.

"To-day, I am, miss. Mother had to go to market, but she will not be very long."

"But how dreadful to be left here all by yourself, with no one but pussy to talk to."

The girl smiled feebly. "I am not lonely, miss. Mother will soon be back," and then she closed her large eyes as though the exertion of talking was more than she could endure.

"Poor girl, I am so sorry for you," said Ethel, quite at a loss to know what to say, and yet most anxious to be kind. "My naughty dog is really one of the kindest creatures living, and he would not hurt pussy, I believe, even if he had the chance; it was all in fun."

The girl tried to smile and shake her head. She evidently did not share Ethel's trust in Nero's gentleness, for probably she thought that what was fun to him, might be death to pussy. At the present moment, he was lying in the sunshine just outside the cottage, with his great shaggy head between his paws, and apparently asleep, but with one eye really open, watching the ducks in the pond a little way off, and glancing up at the window, occasionally with a furtive look.

"Have you any nice books to read?" asked Ethel, after a moment's pause in the conversation.

"I have this, miss," said the sick girl turning her head, and looking down at an open Bible that lay on the window sill.

"Is that all? but you can't always be reading that. Every one reads a chapter in the morning, of course, as a right thing. But I have lots of books I could lend you, all sorts of nice stories; fairy tales, and stories of travels; and stories of little girls. I shall bring some down, but, oh! dear me, I promised Aunt Regina that I would not go beyond the park, and here I am promising to bring you books. I shall get into awful disgrace."

The sick girl listened with evident pleasure to the merry voice as it rattled on, for it was not necessary to reply, and she found it difficult to speak for many minutes together. So she lay and listened, with a smile about her mouth, as though she were amused at her visitor's manner.

"Do you read the Bible much?" Ethel ventured to ask, in a timid way, presently, as though the idea of any one doing so puzzled her.

"Yes, miss. I like to read a few verses, and think about them. The doctor says I am not likely to live into another winter. I like to read about the home in heaven, that my Saviour has gone to prepare for me," and as she said this, the moisture gathered in her eyes, but the tears were tears of pleasure, more than of pain. "It's only the thought of leaving mother that troubles me. She says she will be so lonely when I am gone, that it makes me sad to think of leaving her. I often wish that she could come too."

Ethel sat looking with something akin to amazement at this girl, who could talk about her own dying so calmly. To her, the thought would be almost terrible. She had so much to give her pleasure in her life, that she could not imagine any other home being equal to the earthly one.

"But how dreadful to think of dying," she said, in her quick, impulsive way. "I shall speak to papa, and get him to allow me to have a clever doctor from London to see you, and then, perhaps, with his medicine and plenty of nice things to eat, you may get strong again. I know Aunt Regina—my papa's sister, who keeps house for us, for my mother is dead," Ethel said, by way of explanation. "I know she will have all sorts of nice things made for you, and I can bring them down, and it will be such fun."

The sick girl shook her head.

"It's too late now, miss. The doctor said, six months ago, that if I could have got away from here, I might have got well again. But it's too late now. I don't mind it, except for mother's sake. I want to go and be at rest."

"Poor girl!" whispered Ethel. "It must be very hard for you. I'm so sorry I did not know about it six months ago. But we were in London then, and couldn't know."

"No, miss. We had no friends, except the doctor and the clergyman. They were both very kind; but mother wouldn't let me go from here into a hospital. She wished, so she said, to see the last of her loved ones."

"Well, poor girl, I shall bring Aunt Regina to see you. She knows everything, and is very kind. She's cross with me sometimes; but she will not be cross to you. And I'll bring you some books as well. Perhaps aunt would let me come and read to you. Would you like that?"

"Oh, yes, miss! But I couldn't expect you to come and read to me."

"Oh, but I will! And Nero can lie outside, where he cannot frighten pussy—dear little pussy!" she said, stroking the ball of white fur, as she stooped down to say good-bye to the sick girl. "I must go," she added. "But are you sure you will not be frightened to stay here all by yourself?"

"No, miss, unless another big dog comes along," the sick girl said, smiling faintly.

"I am so sorry he should have frightened you; but, if he had not, I should never have found you out. Do you know," she added, with a bright smile, "I'm almost glad he did. I think it must have been what aunt calls 'providential.'"

"I am all right now, miss, and mother will be back shortly. I am never frightened at being alone."

"Good-bye then. But what is your name?"

"Ethel, miss—Ethel Weston."

"But that is my name too! How strange that we should both have the same name!"

"Father named me after the colonel's little daughter, miss. He thought it such a pretty name, and I'm very fond of it, for his sake."

"But that's me!" exclaimed Ethel, in delightful surprise. "I am the colonel's daughter. You mean Colonel Seymour, of course? Why it's like a fairy tale."

The sick girl was far too weak and ill to enter into the surprise and wonder of the story, as Ethel would have wished. But she could smile with genuine pleasure at her excited visitor, and feel that the dull sameness of her life had been suddenly brightened by a glimpse of that larger world, which lay very close to her cottage door, and was yet so far—so very far—removed from her.

"It is very strange, miss. Mother will be so pleased when I tell her who came to see me."

"But you must not say anything about Nero, Ethel."

"I never keep anything from my mother, miss," the sick girl said, with a faint trace of pink mounting to her cheeks.

Ethel felt her own face getting crimson. She would not wittingly tell a lie, but she had no hesitation in withholding disagreeable facts, and thus escaping from the punishment that was due to wilful disobedience. She had not the slightest intention of saying anything to her aunt about this adventure, until she could speak of it safely.

Although she made no reply to the sick girl's remark, she had heard it, and it had gone home. She merely said now: "Well, Ethel, good-bye. I must really go now." And, stooping down, she imprinted a kiss on the sick girl's forehead, and was gone.

"Come, Nero, you and I will get into sad disgrace, if we stay out much longer. And we are out of the park too. Down, rude dog!"—for, in his delight at seeing his young mistress, he was jumping wildly about her, and threatening to knock her down. "Come here, Nero, and be quiet, for I want to talk to you very seriously. Ought I to tell Aunt Regina everything that has happened? My namesake says she never keeps anything from her mother. I suppose if my dear mother was alive, I should not do so either. But, Nero, Aunt Regina is not my mother, and the question is—ought I to tell her?"

Nero wagged his tail violently, and barked his opinion in the most decided manner. Perhaps Ethel understood his language; but, if she did, she evidently did not think very much of his opinion, for she called him a "silly dog!" and went along the lane in a very thoughtful mood.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER IV.—IN HARNESS.

IT soon became known at St. Hilda that young Dr. Meynal was going to take the practice left by his father; and, on the whole, this arrangement pleased the inhabitants better than any other could have done. It was pleasant to them to think that it was not a total stranger who would prescribe for their varied ailments, that there was not a new name to be learned, that the cherished traditions of the place were not to be rudely overset. It was true that Wulfric was little known in his native town. He had never cared for the humdrum neighbourhood and its quiet surroundings; and from the day he first left home to go to Harrow, he had been very little there, and of late years hardly at all; yet even with all that against him he was still a Meynal, and had been born in the house where now he lived, and there was something comfortable and reassuring in that thought.

And then, when he began to move about amongst them, Wulfric's strong personality began to make itself felt at once, inspiring different feelings with different natures, but leaving a very general impression that he was a man to be respected and perhaps feared a little, but hardly likely to be very popular.

Dr. Meynal's genial courtesy and visible warmth of heart had made him a great favourite. He had patience inexhaustible, even with those fanciful ailments that can never be cured, and that, if a source of income, are also a source of annoyance to a busy and practical medical man.

Wulfric was more blunt and candid than his father had been, and in some quarters gave huge offence. Indeed, he lost one or two patients at the very outset, and had to bear his mother's reproaches and Gerald's gentle satire with what indifference he might. He said that there was nothing the matter with the people, and he could not spare time for visiting them, and was glad to be rid of them; but Mrs. Meynal quoted his father to him, and silenced him in that way, although he could not be made to confess the error of his ways. "He had been stubborn from a baby," as his mother plaintively remarked.

But if young Dr. Meynal showed himself rough and unsympathetic over nervous ailments that were, in his opinion, the result of idleness of body or vacuity of mind, his care and skill were undoubted in other cases where the disease was genuine. He was a much more skilful surgeon than his father had ever been, and his proficiency in this department was at once exemplified by some cures that were thought most remarkable, in cases of long-standing helplessness or malformation. He was well versed, too, in all the modern researches of science, as applied both to surgery and medicine, and it very soon began to be recognised in the county that the young doctor lately settled at St. Hilda was a remarkably clever and successful practitioner, and he began to be called in, first in consultation, and later on alone, to many places where his father's name had hardly ever been known.

Of course all this did not happen just at once, or, indeed, for many months; but Wulfric was undoubtedly making his way with considerable rapidity. Yet, as is often the case, his family knew less of his success than almost any one else, and he was not likely to enlighten their ignorance.

In point of fact, Wulfric lived his present life very much alone, and saw little of any one at home except his sister Barbara.

It was Barbara who rose an hour earlier than was the habit of the household to give her brother his breakfast soon after eight; for he had established the principle of being at the surgery at half-past, to give an hour of his time to poor patients, who could not afford to pay for medical advice. There was no hospital at St. Hilda, and although Dr. Meynal had always been very kind to the poor, he had not always had the time to do for them as much as he was willing; and as Wulfric well knew the demands of an increasing practice, he had resolved from the first to set apart a regular hour for seeing the poor at his surgery, and had appointed from half-past eight to half-past nine each day as the time when advice was given away to all applicants. As for visiting them at their own houses, that had to be left to the exigencies of the cases, and the pressure of daily duties; but it was very plainly understood by all that young Dr. Meynal was a kind friend to the suffering poor.

Wulfric never came home to luncheon. The carriage called at the surgery at noon, and took him his daily round, and it was seldom till after the family had dined that the doctor returned from his day's work.

Barbara always gave him his dinner, and chatted to him whilst he ate it. Wulfric had not appeared at first to care for her presence, and had often hurt her a little by suggesting that she should rejoin the others in the drawing-room, and "not bother about him." But the girl had always declined to leave him, and gradually he had grown used to her ministrations, and would have missed them had they been withdrawn.

"You are spoiling me for bachelor ways," he once said to her, with his rare smile; and Barbara felt amply repaid for all previous apparent coolness. Wulf liked her to be with him, and that was all the reward she wanted.

For Barbara, who had always been inclined to be a bit of a hero-worshipper, if she could only find an object on which to lavish her devotion, was quite inclined to make a hero of her brother; and the more she saw of him, the more did she admire and love him.

Wulfric, however, was in no wise conscious of being a hero, and was as cool and matter-of-fact as a man could be, accepting his sister's attentions at first in the light of a necessary evil, but growing resigned to them at length, till presently he found them rather pleasant.

After his repast, during which Barbara talked, and he discussed his dinner with business-like zest, the two would retire into the study, where Wulfric would smoke an "anti-infection pipe," as he called it, and would from time to time regale Barbara with some scraps of local intelligence, or some anecdote about a patient of a non-professional character. Barbara knew most of the people he visited, at least by name and reputation; and she liked to hear all the news, and was an eager and willing listener.

Then when a quiet hour had been passed thus —the doctor's one leisure hour of the day— Barbara would be ruthlessly dismissed, and Wulfric would either take his hat and go out to visit any patient in the neigbourhood whom he had been obliged to omit during the day's round, or he would sit down to his books and papers, and study hard until past midnight, when his day's work came to an end.

Mrs. Meynal often plaintively remarked that she hardly ever saw Wulfric from week's end to week's end, and Gerald shrugged his shoulders, and remarked that his brother was hardly cut out for drawing-rooms, and was more for use than for ornament. Celia said she could not bear him in the room; his voice was so harsh, and his manners so bearish, and that she was very glad he kept himself to himself; and Barbara's eyes used to shine with indignation as she heard these words, and it was all she could do to refrain from a fiery retort. She was learning, however, that her championship did not do her brother's cause much good, and she contented herself by lavishing upon him a great wealth of love from a very warm heart, whose natural outlets were sadly checked by the unresponsiveness of others.

"Wulf," she said one evening, as brother and sister sat together in the study, "have you seen Mr. Dumaresq yet?"

"Dumaresq?—the man who lives in the big house by the sea? Yes, I saw him once three weeks ago. I told him I should only come when he sent for me. Quiet and fresh air are what he wants mainly, but his constitution is very much undermined."

"Did you see his wife, or his daughter?"

"I saw Mrs. Dumaresq for a few minutes. I don't think she much liked me. What kind of people are they? County magnates?"

"I don't know much about them. They have not been here long. I think the girl looks nice, and she is very pretty; but somehow we don't get to know them. People have not liked to call much since father died."

"I suppose not. They are always asking after you all, though."

Barbara sighed a little.

"Life is very dull sometimes, Wulf. I hate being idle; yet it is so hard to find anything to do."

Wulfric smiled, as he knocked the ashes out of his pipe.

"I don't suffer much from that evil."

"Ah, no! But then, you are a man."

"Are there no idle men in the world, then?"

Barbara thought of Gerald, and laughed a little. Wulfric seemed to read her thoughts, and his eyes twinkled.

"Well, but men have plenty of things to do, if they like to try; but girls are so hedged in—you don't know."

"Perhaps I don't. It's not a subject I've ever studied closely; but I never can see why a woman's life must of necessity be idle."

"Not altogether idle, perhaps," said Barbara, "but useless. One does things just to pass away the time; but there is no use in them."

Wulfric mused awhile, his face set in lines of thought.

Barbara watched him closely.

"What are you thinking about, Wulf?" she asked at length as he did not speak.

"I'm thinking what an odd thing it is that with so much work in the world waiting to be done, and with so much power and energy longing for an outlet, more ways cannot be found for fitting the one to the other."

Barbara was studying his face closely, when he turned upon her the light of his deep-set eyes.

"I could set a score of women to work in St. Hilda alone, and keep them going for a twelvemonth; but then they would not come, and if they did they would grow tired or disgusted and go away."

Barbara stood up and clasped her hands.

"Could you find some work for me, Wulf?"

"To be sure I could; but I don't say it's work you would like."

But the girl's face was flushed and eager.

"Tell me," she said breathlessly.

"Don't be excited, Barbara. I assure you there is not the least romance or idealism connected with it. What I want to get hold of, is a woman with some sense and gumption in her, who will go and see after some of my poor patients in their own homes—make inquiries as to their circumstances, and see if they tell the truth to me; look after them a little when they are off the sick list, and yet not quite well, and learn to do a few simple dressings so as to save my time and their steps sometimes. It won't be nice work; it won't, in the majority of cases, be even interesting work; but it will be work that wants doing badly enough, and that nobody I know seems likely to undertake. Now don't get into a state of mind over it. It's not a thing to be decided in a moment. It wants thinking over. There are many points to be taken into consideration."

Barbara was silent for awhile, not because there was any indecision in her mind; but because Wulf had bid her not to be in a hurry.

"If mother will allow me," she said presently, "I will come gladly. I should like to work for you and your patients."

Wulfric smiled slightly and half shook his head.

"Always in a hurry, Barbara; always in a hurry. You must get mother's consent, of course, to start with. Will that be a difficulty?"

"Rather perhaps; but I think I might get over that, as long as there was no infection in the cases I went to see."

"I should take care of that," answered Wulfric. "It is more for surgical and chronic cases I should want you, and for private detective work. You would have to come with me to the surgery in the mornings to learn your business and to get to know the people. That would be the first step."

Barbara's eyes sparkled. It was like realising an ideal to be able to help Wulf at his work. She had never even dreamed of anything so much to her liking.

Wulfric, however, took things coolly, bidding her decide in no hurry, but speak to her mother about it, and get things settled by degrees. He was not going to have her rush into anything blindfold, carried away by the enthusiasm of the moment. Second thoughts were often best, and she must wait for hers.

The next day as he sat at his dinner, Barbara waiting upon him as usual, but refraining from "talking shop" as he phrased it whilst he ate, a note was brought by a mounted messenger from the Cedars to summon Dr. Meynal at once to attend on Mr. Dumaresq who had had a seizure of some kind and was extremely ill.

Wulfric rose at once, turned the groom out of the saddle and mounted the horse himself, and had galloped up to the Cedars nearly half an hour before its inhabitants had believed it possible he could be there.

He was taken straight up into the room where the sick man lay, and was shut up an hour with him, after which, leaving his patient much relieved, he descended to the study to write a prescription.

Mrs. Dumaresq was favourably impressed by the skill and self-possession of the young doctor; but she had not entirely forgotten her former opinion that he was a man of too opinionated and independent a type.

"For the future, Dr. Meynal" she said, "I must request your regular attendance upon Mr. Dumaresq. You thought lightly of his condition a few weeks back, but probably you will have changed your opinion to-day. Had you been seeing him constantly, as your father did, most likely this attack might have been averted."

Wulfric made no reply, but merely bowed as he left the room. He knew that Mrs. Dumaresq's suggestion was based upon a mistake, but he did not choose to dispute the point; and perhaps his silence impressed her with more confidence in him than any defence could have done.

"He is a remarkable young man," she said to herself, "and undoubtedly clever; but I am not sure that I like him."

Wulfric went down to the study, which room he knew, having held there his last interview with the master of the house. He opened the door and then stood still suddenly, for the room was not tenantless as he had expected.

Reinée was kneeling on the floor, picking up some flowers that had been scattered upon the carpet, most likely when Mr. Dumaresq had fallen from his chair in the way that had been described. The girl's face was pale, and her delicate lips trembled, her white evening dress was creased and tumbled, and she looked like one who had been through an ordeal and was a good deal shaken by it.

As Wulfric entered, she looked up quickly and rose to her feet. She had never met him before, but his face and figure were familiar to her as they were by this time to all the inhabitants of St. Hilda.

"Oh, Dr. Meynal" she said, advancing a few steps towards him, "please tell me what you think of my father."

Wulfric looked into the sweet, pleading face, and the trustful dark eyes fixed so earnestly upon him, and the rather hard lines of his brow and lips relaxed a little as he answered gently: "There is nothing seriously wrong with your father, Miss Dumaresq. There is nothing in this attack to alarm you. It was more from weakness than any other cause, and rest and care will soon bring him round again to his normal state."

Reinée smiled tremulously; but there was still a sort of wistful trouble in her eyes.

"I am afraid his normal state, as you call it, is not very satisfactory, Dr. Meynal?"

"Not very, perhaps; but we must mend that, if we can."

"Do you think you can?"

"I think I can do something; and I am sure you can do more."

Reinée smiled through the tears that sparkled on her long black lashes.

"What can I do?"

"Take him out of himself. Talk to him, read to him, sing to him; get him to walk or ride with you and to take an interest in the garden and potter about there a little. I can write prescriptions and give dry lectures on diet and habit; but it is to you I must look for the lion's share of the work, and you shall have the credit of the cure when it comes."

And then Wulfric held open the door for her to pass out, and they exchanged friendly little bows, as if some chord of mutual sympathy and understanding had been struck between them. Wulfric sat down to write his prescription, whilst Reinée went slowly upstairs, saying to herself: "That is Barbara's brother, I think they are rather alike. He is not nearly as ugly as mamma said. I call it rather a fine face."

The next day Reinée had a call from Barbara herself. The girl had come to inquire after Mr. Dumaresq, and as the patient was asleep and his wife was with him, it was Reinée who came down to receive the guest.

This arrangement just suited the two girls, who had felt mutually drawn towards one another from the first.

"I saw your brother yesterday," said Reinée. "He spoke so kindly about papa. Somehow his face made me fancy he would be rather severe. Did he tell you what he really thought of him?"

"Wulf does not talk about his patients to me, you know," said Barbara, with a little smile; "but I do not think he considers Mr. Dumaresq is very ill. I know he thinks a quiet country life the very best thing for him."

"I am so glad we have come here," said Reinée, with her frank smile. "It is all so sweet and lovely. I am sure every one must be happy here. Didn't you think so?"

"I don't know whether it is the place that makes people happy," answered Barbara slowly. "I think it is the life we lead there."

"Yes, yes!" answered Reinée, with quick sympathy. "I know that too. Only—don't you think?—it is easier to lead the right kind of life in a place like this, rather than in London."

"I never lived in London," answered Barbara; "and—and I don't quite know what you mean by a 'right kind of life.'"

The two girls looked at each other; perhaps they wondered what made them speak so openly at so early a stage in their acquaintance.

"Shall we come into the garden?" said Reinée. "Should you like it? I am so fond of the garden. I never had one before."

Barbara acquiesced willingly. The spring sunshine was bright and hot and exhilarating. It seemed easier to talk in the breezy garden with flowers around them, and the sea flashing far below, than it had done in the dim, cool drawing-room.

Reinée showed her garden with the pride and pleasure of one who thoroughly loves it. Barbara sympathised with her; and over the subject of flowers and shrubs, and the laying out of the grounds, the two girls waxed intimate. But perhaps they were thinking all the time of other matters too, for presently, as they were pacing a quiet shrubbery path together, Reinée said suddenly: "I think what I mean by a right kind of life, is a life that is led not just for personal enjoyment, but that tries to bring happiness to other people as well."

"Or to do them good," added Barbara.

"Yes; that would make them happier, would it not?"

"I don't know," answered Barbara. "I don't think I have ever thought much about happiness. It is nice to be happy; but we can get on very well without."

Reinée looked a little wistful.

"I have always had such a happy life," she said. "Perhaps that is why I feel so sad when I think of all the poor people who hardly know what happiness means. I do so long to do something for them."

"So do I," answered Barbara. "I have wanted it ever since I have had no lessons to do, and have had so much more time on my hands. I don't think I have cared so much about making them happy; but I should like to help them to be more thrifty, more clean, more orderly and healthy. I don't know, of course, if I shall be able to do much; but I think perhaps something may be done."

"Will you be able to do it?" asked Reinée eagerly.

"I hope so—now."

"Why do you say 'now'?"

"Because my brother Wulfric wants me to help him a little in looking after some of his poor patients, and I think mother will let me, though she has not quite decided yet. Wulfric says it will not be nice work, and that there will be nothing pleasant or interesting in it. He does not try to paint it in fine colours at all: but, oh, I am so tired of being idle and useless! I have so longed for some kind of work. I shall not mind what it is, so long as I feel I am doing something for other people."

Reinée's eyes were shining with sympathy.

"Oh, Barbara," she cried, with sudden eagerness, "I know so well what you mean!" Then she coloured a little, and said, frankly and sweetly, "I ought not to have been so familiar; but somehow I always think of you as 'Barbara.'"

"Please go on calling me so," answered the girl, with an answering smile. "I like it much better."

"Then you must call me Reinée, and then we shall feel like being friends. And I do hope you will like your work, and be very happy."

"I shall be very busy, at any rate," answered Barbara, smiling, "and that is what I seem to care most about."

"Who was that walking with you in the garden this afternoon, Reinée?" asked Mrs. Dumaresq, later in the day.

"Barbara Meynal, mamma. She is such a nice girl!"

"You looked as if you were swearing an eternal friendship, or something of that sort."

"I think we shall be friends always."

Mrs. Dumaresq smiled indulgently.

"Always is a long day, my dear; and I do not think your stay at St. Hilda will be long enough for the formation of very lasting ties. You will hardly be allowed to bury yourself here for very many months."

Reinée's face grew suddenly grave; but she made no reply to this remark.

BLIND CHINESE BEGGARS

TRANSFORMED INTO MISSIONARY SCRIPTURE-READERS.

BY C. F. GORDON CUMMING.

AMONGST the many valuable agencies which (now that England is at length awakening from her long torpor in regard to the duty of obeying the Master's last commandment) are being brought to bear to spread the knowledge of the Gospel of Love, none has done more direct work in what I may term "intellectual countries" than the system of Colportage, by which not only the Book of books, but also various simple expositions of Christian truth are brought within reach of all classes, and being bought and carried to their own homes, very frequently become the means of such genuine conversion as eventually brings the reader to crave Christian baptism, and bravely to endure the inevitable persecution which almost invariably follows.

In no country has this result so frequently followed the simple hearing or reading of the Holy Scriptures, as in China—that mighty Empire where, seventy years ago, there was not one Christian (professing the Reformed Faith). It was not till 1814 that the first convert was baptised, but from that date the good seed so sparsely scattered has slowly but surely sprung up, and borne increase wholly out of proportion with the feeble staff of teachers sent out by Christian Europe. Even now, when a real interest is being awakened in this matter, the total number of Protestant missionaries of all denominations sent out by thirty-four different societies, is in the proportion of one to one million of the Chinese people!

So few workers might indeed have fainted and failed before the apparent hopelessness of their task, had it not been for the very practical manner in which these Chinamen—so cautious and slow to move—so staunch and resolute when once their determination is made—have carried out their Lord's injunction "Let him that heareth say, Come." Thus each convert has become a centre of Christian influence, and despising the shame so readily heaped upon him by heathen neighbours, rarely rests till he has brought some friend or relation to his Master, and so the good leaven spreads, and thus it has come to pass that whereas just thirty years ago, all the Protestant Missions together only numbered 350 Chinese communicants, now about 100,000 Chinese habitually attend Christian services, and of these upwards of 22,000 are regular communicants, many of whom have been sorely tried in the school of bitter persecution.[1]

From this number about 1,100 earnest and devout men have been selected to work as catechists, and a handful of the most able and eloquent have been ordained to the ministry.

But a new class of helpers has now become available, namely Blind Scripture Readers, who may accompany the native colporteur, and who invariably attract wondering crowds of their fellow-countrymen to whom it appears little short of miraculous that blind beggars should be thus cared for by foreigners, and endowed with apparently supernatural powers. From the singular reverence of the Chinese for all written characters, and for those who can read them, it is evident that a blind reader occupies a very different position in China to that of the men whom we are accustomed to see in our own streets. Hence it is obvious that as assistant colporteurs, such blind readers may prove very valuable agents in spreading the knowledge of Christian truth.

Very remarkable are the circumstances which have led to this opening of the gates of the Paradise of Literature to the unnumbered legions of those sorely afflicted ones who in this vast Empire are doomed to life-long blindness. Since even in favoured England (where the ravages of small-pox and ophthalmia are so effectually kept in check) there are nearly forty thousand blind persons, we can form some idea of their numbers in China, England being just about the size of the smallest of the Eighteen Provinces. And whereas, in our own land, it is somewhat exceptional to see even one blind beggar, in China there is not a city where they do not abound, frequently going about in companies of a dozen or more, and assembling at certain spots in clamorous crowds, hungry and almost naked—truly, of all men most miserable—the more so, as many are also afflicted with leprosy. Such are the class for whom the Gospel has now been made an open Book.

Those who have attempted to master the excruciating difficulties of any of the numerous dialects of Chinese, or the terrible array of intricate written characters which the weary eye must transfer to memory ere it is possible to read the simplest book, can alone fully appreciate how wonderful is the boon which has now been confered on the multitude who so truly dwell in darkness.

The benefactor who has in such a wonderful sense "opened the eyes of the blind" is Mr. W. H. Murray, whose calling to Mission Work must be traced to an accident in a saw-mill, whereby he lost an arm, and so was disabled from following his original profession. This apparent calamity has resulted in a discovery which, if properly developed, may prove an incalculable boon to millions yet unborn in the Celestial Empire.

So soon as he was able to resume work, Mr. Murray obtained employment as a rural letter carrier in the neighbourhood of Glasgow, but was subsequently employed by the National Bible Society of Scotland as a colporteur, and at this time his remarkable facility for languages attracted the notice of some of the directors. It was accordingly arranged that he should attend classes at the college, though his studies were not allowed to interfere with his regular work. All day long, therefore, he travelled with his Bible waggon, rising daily at 3 A.M. all through the chill winter mornings, in order to prepare for his classes at 8 and 9 A.M. and then began again at a new day's work of book-selling.

During this period, apparently so fully occupied, he found time for an additional study, his interest having been aroused by seeing so many blind persons come to purchase books printed by Moon's system. Having mastered this, he took lessons in Professor Bell's system of visible speech, and also in Braille's system of reading and writing for the blind by means of embossed dots.

Ere long, he was sent as the Society's agent to Peking, where his work as a colporteur was at first very discouraging, but has of late years proved remarkably successful, and has included several highly encouraging Bible-selling expeditions into Mongolia.

On arriving in China he found that the aforesaid system of visible speech (which he had acquired simply as an interesting curiosity) actually facilitated his own study of the very difficult language, so he noted down the value of every sound he mastered, and thus ascertained that these are readily limited to 420—a very goodly number as compared with our own 24, but a mere trifle as compared with the 4,000 distinct and crabbed characters which every Chinaman must acquire before he can read such a book as the Bible in ordinary print. Even a child must master 1,200 characters before he can read the Chinese equivalent of Jack the Giant-killer!

[1] In my 'Wanderings in China,' published by Messrs. Blackwood, I have so fully sketched the history of the prolonged trials of the converts in various districts of China, that I would earnestly ask any who are interested in the subject to refer to those details.

During the long hours which Mr. Murray daily spent in the crowded streets, he was filled with unspeakable compassion for the multitude of blind beggars who wander about, utterly uncared for, and he was filled with a great longing to devise some means of alleviating their hard lot. The thought occurred to him that some method might be devised for teaching them to read.

Of course no amount of embossing could make the frightfully complicated Chinese character comprehensible to the most sensitive fingers, but something simpler might be devised. He therefore set himself to reduce the 420 sounds to a system of equivalent dots, and his patient ingenuity was at length rewarded by finding that he was thus able accurately to represent the perplexing sounds of the language, and to replace the bewildering multitude of Chinese characters.

Having thus overcome these apparently insuperable difficulties, his next care was to test this system, and prove whether even the most sensitive touch could discriminate upwards of 400 separate arrangements of dots. Now came the most anxious stage of all. Looking round for a suitable subject to begin with, Mr. Murray selected a little orphan beggar who was lying almost naked in the street, but who, notwithstanding his loneliness and poverty, always seemed cheerful and contented. Moreover, he was free from the horrible taint of leprosy, which is so terribly common among the miserable beggar population. So Mr. Murray took him in hand—washed and clothed him, and undertook to feed and lodge him, provided he would apply himself in earnest to mastering this new learning. Naturally the boy was delighted, as well he might be, considering the honour which in China attaches to all literary pursuits, and we can imagine his ecstasy, and the thankful gladness of his teacher when within six weeks he was able not only to read fluently, but to write with remarkable accuracy!

To complete the experiment, two blind beggar men were also induced to learn to read, the boy acting as teacher. One was able to read well within two months—the other more slowly, but also with great pleasure. It was at this stage that I made their acquaintance, and it struck me as intensely pathetic, as we stood at the door of a dark room—for it was night—to hear what I knew to be words of Holy Scripture read by men who less than four months previously sat begging in the streets in misery and rags on the verge of starvation.

Not only did they read with perfect facility from both the Old and New Testament, but the first lad wrote out for me a whole page of a Chinese classic, which to my eye and coarse touch presents only groups of the neatest dots wholly undistinguishable one from another. But there it is—a written page of a classic, highly esteemed by all Chinamen as a lesson in pure morality.

When you consider that a man with the full use of all his faculties takes years of hard study to acquire the same powers by means of the ordinary Chinese character, you will scarcely wonder that those who knew these wretched blind beggars so short a while previously should deem the transformation an absolute miracle.

As a matter of course, the blind students were so delighted with their newly-mastered art that they would lose no chance of reading the Scriptures to whoever would listen to them, and it soon became evident that the mission might be greatly aided in spreading the knowledge of Christian truth by a whole regiment of blind readers.

Up to the present time, however, the work has been a purely personal effort of Mr. Murray's, being altogether outside of his official work; the whole business of elaborating the system, and then of training his early pupils, having been accomplished in extra hours stolen from sleep by rising early and sitting up late. Moreover, the whole expense of feeding and clothing his students was deducted from his own salary, though in this a few very welcome donations recently received have enabled him to increase the number of his pupils, and to appoint one of their number, Mr. Hsing Wang, to act as teacher to the new comers.

Some of superior station having heard rumours of this wonderful work have travelled from remote districts to place themselves under tuition. One man came from a distance of upwards of three hundred miles to be taught to see with his fingers! Another, who had learnt common reading and writing at the Mission School before he became blind, very quickly acquired the new system, and set to work to emboss the Gospel of St. Matthew in Classical Mandarin Chinese.

One blind Christian was greatly delighted to find he might go out as a colporteur to distribute Christian pamphlets. Another was found to be endowed with talents so especially fitting him for the ministry that he has been transferred to a training school for preparing candidates for Holy Orders.

Musical symbols were next embossed, and a number of blind boys have been therein instructed, and have learnt to write music from dictation with extraordinary facility. When the slate is taken out of the frame each reads off his part, and rarely makes any mistake. Some of the boys have a remarkable talent for music—good voices and an excellent ear. Their singing is said to be really attractive. One has learnt the harmonium, and now accompanies the choir at the Sunday services in Chinese.

One of the recent pupils is a handsome young married woman aged about eighteen, who lost her sight while she was a pupil at the American Presbyterian School; nothing could be done to save it. She was engaged to a young man, a member of the same mission, who proved constant, notwithstanding the serious disadvantage of being united to a blind wife. The young woman has already acquired the arts of reading, writing, and music, so that her sore trial does not prevent her from being a cheerful companion.

So the little blind school has already brightened a considerable number of dreary lives, and may continue to extend its good work amongst the many sufferers who are able to maintain themselves. But as regards the great beggar host, the wretched raw material from which (as purest paper is produced from seemingly worthless rags) Mr. Murray hopes to rescue many who may be transformed into most useful members of society, these can only be enabled to come and study by being provided with the necessaries of life, which they have hitherto received as alms. Even in economical China a blind student cannot be fed, boarded and clothed for less than £10 a year, and so an earnest appeal was issued some months ago, addressed to all persons who are interested either in the blind, or in Chinese missions, urging them to send a special thank-offering for their own gifts of Sight and Light, in order to assist in this good work.

Of course in a country where the dialects spoken between Canton and Peking are so different as to necessitate the publication of at least eight different translations of the Bible for the use of persons gifted with sight, it is evident that these must be reduced to the dot system ere the blind beggars of the Central and Southern Provinces can share the privilege already open to those of north China, so that eventually schools for the blind must be established in southern China.

Meanwhile, however, the object aimed at is merely the permanent endowment of one small centre of teaching, which hitherto has wholly depended for its existence on the self-denying exertions of one hard-working man.

[1] I think few readers can fail to be deeply interested in this sketch, showing how an earnest worker has triumphed over great difficulties. We all know, however, how often a warm interest fails to attain to GIVING-POINT, which is very much like bringing a kettle up to BOILING-POINT—quite a different stage from mere heat!

In answer to the appeal already made, donations have been received which will secure a year's training for about a dozen students; but as yet there are no annual subscribers. It had, however, been suggested as very desirable that a fund should be raised to secure a moderate permanent endowment. In reply to this came a letter from "A Working Woman" to say that as the development of so valuable a mission agency was evidently worth a very special effort, she wished to devote to this purpose 100*l.*, saved from her earnings, which she would forward in the hope that nine other persons would each send a similar sum, or that eighteen would each send, or undertake to collect, 50*l.* For the sake of so excellent a work, it is much to be hoped that the nine thus challenged will come forward, and that the 1000*l.* thus aimed at may be at least doubled, so that an income of at least 100*l.* may afford a sure provision for the hire of a small house, a moderate salary for a permanent teacher, and a sum sufficient for the maintenance of at least half-a-dozen indigent blind students, who year by year may be sent forth to read the Sacred Message in the streets of Peking and other cities. We are all suffering from hard times, and perhaps some of us are inclined secretly to acknowledge in these the truth of an old saying, that "When men will not proportion their alms to their incomes, there is good cause to expect that God will proportion their incomes to their alms." It may be that for that very reason some may be inclined to test more practically than they have hitherto done, the truth of God's promise in Malachi iii. 10.

Subscriptions and donations, in aid of the Blind Chinese Scripture Readers, will be gladly received by WILLIAM J. SLOWAN, Esq., Secretary, National Bible Society of Scotland, 224 West George Street, Glasgow.

THE WINTER OF THE SOUL.

BY THE VERY REV. C. A. CHADWICK, D.D., DEAN OF ARMAGH.

"Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter."—Matthew xxiv. 20.

OUR Lord had announced the destruction of Jerusalem, which stood up so proud and fair, with marble towers and gilded pinnacles, as to awaken the enthusiasm of His disciples. He had given them a sign by which to know when their hurried escape must be effected. And then, not one moment should be lost. He that was in the field should not return for greeting or for equipment. He that was on the flat house-top, should hurry by the outer staircase into the street, lest while passing through the house, he should delay to catch up some of his possessions. Time would be given, sufficient for those who were there as strangers and pilgrims, but not enough for men whose hearts were entangled, who would linger, even for one hour, in that great crisis.

They should remember Lot's wife, ruined because her gaze turned fondly back upon the guilty city.

Amid such urgent warnings, the disciples are bidden to pray that their flight be at a convenient time; that they should not require in the depth of winter to arise and fly, without clothing or resources, nor on the Jewish Sabbath, when every one they met would forbid them to break the law by journeying. Such is the connection in which these word were spoken.

Now the fall of Jerusalem is a type of the end of this age, and Christ's return in judgment. But it also reminds us of an event in our own lives, which gives the text an important message to us—a solemn meaning for our souls.

Each of us by nature lives among earthly affairs, taken up with pleasures and gains, hopes, longings and flatteries. We are born in what Bunyan calls the City of Destruction, which is doomed like the ancient Jerusalem to be overwhelmed by the wrath of God, and we in it if we linger there. We, like these early Christians, must flee from the wrath to come. But there is a vital difference in this respect, that we must delay for no future signal, we are at once to escape into the mountains, to the everlasting hills where stands the city that hath foundations. Already, in heart and mind, though not in the flesh, we are to be saved from this present evil world. Its destruction is not yet ripe, but our flight is to be at once. Now is our time to find shelter in the clefts of the Rock of Ages.

"Gaunt winter, flinging flakes of snow, Deep burdening field and wood and hill."

"Arise ye, and depart; for this is not your rest, because it is polluted, for it will destroy you, even with a sore destruction." (Micah ii. 10.)

Some of us, by God's grace, are being saved from this untoward generation, and the rest of us intend to escape. It is only a matter of time. When one can afford to give up the tricks of trade. When another is old and steady. When the bad acquaintances of a third have passed away. Certainly before all is over; for no man intends to die unrepentant, unbelieving, worldly. And yet people do die thus. Their hindrances prove too great. They postpone their escape. But instead of melting away, their difficulties close around them. And while they wait yet a little longer, for the weather to clear, for a day when none shall hinder their escape, the avenging army overtakes and shuts them in.

There is such a thing as the winter of the soul, when he fares ill who has not yet made his escape from the City of Destruction.

I. Winter is the season when a fugitive into the mountains most easily goes astray. It is then, more than at other times, that driving mists and vapours, or blinding snow-storms sweep down from the high summits and fold the wanderer in a deadly embrace. He looks to this side and to that, but the landmarks are effaced, the pine grove and the crag by which he meant to guide his steps are lost, or strangely altered, and in vain he wanders to and fro until his strength is spent. There is a door that would open promptly if he knocked then, but the light is lost which still burns in the turret for his guidance. Fainter he grows and colder, and at last he sinks down despairing upon the wet sod, where in spring the shepherd will find his bones.

Alas, it is so with souls! To the presumptuous and those who resist the truth it is said, Now it is hid from thine eyes. Make the heart of this people heavy and shut their eyes. Thou shalt grope at noonday as the blind gropeth in the darkness. When the Scripture is read, a veil is on their heart. Their feet shall stumble on the dark mountains.

To know the truth, and not to act upon our knowledge, that is to defer our journey until the season of blinding vapours.

II. In winter, a strange drowsiness often creeps over the unwary traveller, and apart from perplexity or even from fatigue, makes it almost impossible for him to advance.

He takes a few steps and then sinks down in a heavy doze; the guide arouses him, and again he totters forward a few yards, but presently he sinks once more into that deadly slumber; and if neglected, or journeying alone, lies down contentedly and sleeps to death in the very road to safety, knowing the danger but quite unable to resist it. It is not weariness but an additional and even a worse peril.

And it has its counterpart for souls who delay their flight until the winter. Only the very special grace of God will save these also from growing dull and lifeless, confessing a danger which yet they cannot feel, because so deadly a torpor has crept over them that when you speak of righteousness and temperance and judgment to come, and of the all-satisfying sufferings of the Lamb, it sounds like vague sweet far-off music that blends gently with a dream out of which it fails to waken them.

Therefore, whoever feels the beauty of holiness to be real, and the death of Christ vivid and touching, and sin exceedingly sinful—let him seize this conscious and precious moment, and remember now his Creator . . . while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh when he shall say My soul hath no pleasure in them.

III. The road itself, apart from mists and vapours and from drowsy unwillingness to tread it, is more slippery and perilous in winter, and many a heavy fall shall the unwary traveller endure.

There are times when a sudden blast of wild tempest almost lifts him bodily off the road into the chasm, even as the storms of evil temper and appetite burst on the unhappy head of him who neglected the path of self-control and self-denial till these were at their fiercest. And places there are where treacherous hollows are filled up with yielding snow, and he who sets foot there is plunged down and buried in awful depths, just as temptation ensnares the unwary traveller who thinks his ground firm, until he is overwhelmed and lost.

When Napoleon crossed the Alps, a little drummer slipped thus down hundreds of feet through the cruelly soft and yielding material which let him breathe, but would not let him go. And he beat his drum in his misery for hours, meaning "Save me, comrades, save me!" But to halt would have risked, and perhaps lost, the army; and so regiment after regiment marched past, hearing his pathetic appeal grow slower and weaker, until it died away.

Where is the minister of religion who has not heard the beating of that very drum, as the slave of guilty pleasures or sinful gains told how he hated himself and hated his sin, but would not give it up. "What am I to do?" he asks. "I must drink when the craving comes upon me; I must continue my way of life or starve, and I won't starve."

And the strong man in the agony of his soul buries his face in his hands and shakes with sobs, and protests that he cannot reform, and cries to his monitor to save him. But Christ Himself will save no person upon such terms.

* * * * *

Does it seem as if we have been thinking rather of the mountains of Lebanon than the hills around Perea? Yet it is certain that the thought of Jesus was of those special hindrances which would befall fugitives among deep ravines and craggy heights in the least fitting season for such a flight.

And if we think that their hindrances were less than have been described, does that excuse the infatuation which runs the greater risk?

Pray ye that your flight be not in winter. And yet, even at worst, unto the uttermost, One can save, if we only grasp His hand. He came from the brightness and warmth of His divine home, in the midwinter of all souls, to save us from the doomed city, and to lead us on the road to heaven. No cloud and darkness turned Him aside, not even that which swept at once over the pale crowd around the cross, and over his pure soul, uncomforted, forsaken.

Weariness never prevented Him from doing His father's business; slumber never overcame His midnight prayers. The blasts of Satanic temptation raged around him, and cunning snares beset His feet; but no storm could move, no deceit could ensnare Him.

It is He who guides us in darkness through peril, and who makes our way smooth in the time of our prosperity. But let us not tempt His goodness; let us not presume upon His forbearance, intending sometime to be saved. When is it to be?

Ah, not in the winter of perplexity and peril, and overwhelming temptation; not then, but now —now is the accepted time; now, in this day of salvation; now, when the summer air about your soul is balmy with love and pardon, and the grace of God; now, when the message of salvation, like a gentle and perfumed breeze, whispers past your ear in melody; now, when the Son of Righteousness shines clear and full upon your path; now, when our Master and Lord waits to escort your pilgrim steps, and with His rod and staff to sustain you through the dark valley which must be trod; now, when the pure mountain air braces and does not freeze; now decide, and gird up the loins of your minds, and come forth unto Him bearing His reproach, and be made like the blessed ones in heaven itself in this, that they follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth.

THE INNER LIFE OF LORD SHAFTESBURY.

PART IV.

WE propose in this paper to see how the religious principles which governed the public life of Lord Shaftesbury were exemplified in the inner circle of his home. A man's religion as it is seen in his home, is the truest test of what that religion really is. Withdrawn from the fierce light of publicity, in which so much of his life was lived, we shall see him now in the relations of son, husband, father, and master.

As a child young Ashley was, in a sense, homeless. He was ruled by severity and fear; and shrunk as much from the treatment he received at the hands of his father and mother, as he did from that of his unprincipled schoolmaster and the bullies of the school. His heart sank within him when the day came for him to go home for the holidays, no less than when he had to return to school. His father was a harsh, cold, stern man, as those who knew him as Chairman of Committees in the House of Lords could testify, for he ruled the peers with a rod of iron; his mother was a woman of fashion. Neither of them took any interest in the welfare of their young children, but left them to the tender mercies of servants, and the delicate and sensitive boy knew "times without number what it was to be kept for days without sufficient food, until he was pinched with hunger; and weary nights in winter when he lay awake all through the long hours suffering from cold." Through life he looked back to those days with a shrinking sense of horror, and to the fact that there had been no light-heartedness in his childhood may be attributed the air of melancholy—a certain sombreness and sadness—which habitually surrounded him like an atmosphere.

Later in life, the career which he had marked out for himself, or rather to which, as he believed, he had been "called of God," met with the strong disapprobation of his father, and for ten years Lord Ashley was banished from the paternal roof. Neither from father nor mother, had he in the whole course of his life, up to the age of thirty-eight, experienced anything save unkindness, which in earlier years almost amounted to cruelty.

In the light of these facts, the following extracts from his diary breathe the very essence of the Christian life:—

"July 27, 1828.—It is pleasant at last to be on good terms with Lord S., and Charlotte" (Lord Ashley's sister) "is so too. We forgive him all his unkindness. Memory is good to show a progress in virtue, not to furnish themes of indignation."

The "good terms" were merely passing civilities, and then came the ten years' banishment and complete estrangement. At the end of that time a reconciliation was brought about, and the way in which it was regarded is very touchingly recorded in the journal.

"Nov. 23, 1839.—I can hardly believe myself, or my senses; here I am in St. Giles's, reconciled to my father, and actually receiving from him ardent and sincere marks of kindness and affection. Who would have thought (not I, at least) when I quitted this house ten (!) years ago, that I should never return to it until I came a married man with six children! But it is a blessed thing that it has happened at last; a thing good for him, and good for me; a thing for which I ought, and for which I do, thank God most humbly. He is now an old man, and it would have been a sad and horrible matter had he died otherwise than at peace with his children; but, God be praised, we are reconciled, and his heart and mine are lighter."

In June, 1851, his father died, and he wrote in the journal:—

"June 6th.—St. Giles's. Ah! my poor father! I bless Thee, O Lord, that I was here to say 'Lord Jesus, receive his spirit,' and to close his eyes."

When Lord Ashley succeeded to the title and the estates, he found that there had been incredible waste; that large sums of money had been ruthlessly lavished and thrown away to no purpose of either use or luxury, while many things really necessary had been totally neglected. "It is worthy of note," says his biographer "that full as the diaries are of the actual position of affairs, there is not one word that reflects in any way upon the memory of his father. On the contrary, scattered throughout the pages there are many touching passages to show that the only thoughts of him, were thoughts of tenderness and filial regard."

The Dowager Countess of Shaftesbury lived to the great age of ninety-one, and for many years Lord Shaftesbury made constant visits to Richmond to see her, and the great comfort of her declining years was his companionship and sympathy.

Some of the most beautiful passages in the whole book, are the extracts from the diaries in which Lord Shaftesbury unconsciously reveals himself in the relation of a husband, when writing of the goodness and self-devotion, the love and bravery of his noble-hearted wife. He had proved the truth of what he wrote on the first anniversary of his wedding-day:—

"June 11th.—Yesterday was the anniversary of our wedding. Mark it with the red letters of joy, hope, and gratitude. If men would all base their love upon esteem, and their esteem upon religion, and their religion upon affectionate Christianity, marriage would prove a twenty-fold source of earthly happiness, and surety for heaven."

Forty years later, and on the last anniversary they were to celebrate on earth, he notes:—

"June 10th, 1872.—To-day my wedding-day! Forty-one years ago was I united to that dear, beautiful, true, and affectionate darling, my blessed Minny. What a faithful, devoted, simple-hearted, and captivating wife she has been, and is, to me! And what a mother! Ah, Lord, give me grace to thank Thee evermore, and rejoice in Thy goodness. Send forth Thy Holy Spirit on us, and lead us yet in the way of service, of obedience, and of love."

A good son, a good husband; a good husband, a good father, is the natural sequence; and the glimpses given us in the volumes before us show that the home life in the household of Lord Shaftesbury was just what might have been expected under the rule of one whose whole moral constitution was tenderness and compassion. We can do no more in our limited space than glance at a few instances to indicate the general scope.

On the day of the christening of a son, he writes: "It is a lovely and solemn ceremony, heavenly in its purport, and almost so in its composition. May God in His mercy grant that as the child was this day 'signed with the sign of the cross,' so he may never be ashamed to confess, and to fight for, a crucified Saviour!"

"Went yesterday to Rugby to examine the physical and moral aspect of the place, and see whether it would be a good school for Antony. I fear Eton; I dread the proximity of Windsor, with all its means and allurements—dread the tone and atmosphere of the school; it makes admirable gentlemen and finished scholars—fits a man beyond all competition for the drawing-room, the club, St. James's Street, and all the mysteries of social elegance, but it does not make the man required for the coming generation. We must have nobler, deeper, and sterner stuff; less of refinement and more of truth; more of the inward, not so much of the outward, gentleman; a rigid sense of duty, not a delicate sense of honour; a just estimate of rank and property, not as matters of personal enjoyment and display, but as gifts from God, bringing with them serious responsibilities, and involving a fearful account; a contempt of ridicule, not a dread of it; a desire and a courage to live for the service of God and the best interests of mankind."

Parting with any of his children, for even a brief time, was always a keen sorrow to Lord Shaftesbury. There is the true ring of tender fatherliness, as well as of exquisite pathos, in the following passage, written on the day when he parted with his first-born son for school:—

"The last day that Antony will pass with his family before he enters on his new state (for such it is) of life. During many years I have passed every morning with him, hearing and reading the word of God. I cannot bear to part from him; were I not deeply, entirely convinced that the plan is for his real welfare, I should be miserable. I commit him to 'God, and to the word of His grace.' Eleven o'clock at night.—It seems to me almost incredible that I am about to surrender my Reuben to the care of a stranger. I have watched every moment, weighed every expression, considered every thought, and seized every opportunity to drop a word in season. All will now be left to an 'hireling.' Will he care for the sheep? Oh, God, be Thou to him a guide, an instructor, and a friend! Probably the course of his affections may be stopped, or made to run in another channel; they will not, at any rate, flow on in their clear and early simplicity. Yet he must be gradually introduced to the world, and we gradually severed from him. This is the order of Providence (and since it is His order, wise and good), that the children shall imbibe new loves, and form new connections, while the parents are left by the receding tide, stranded like seaweed on the shore, their time being come for decay and transmutation. This seems to be painful, and probably is so, but here is not our permanent treasure or our final resting-place. If we have trained up a faithful servant of the Lord, to go forth and fight His battles, vigorous and young, while we are flickering at home, I therein do rejoice, yea, and will rejoice."

Every stage in the history of each of his children he watched with the same parental anxiety, and at each fresh crisis in their lives dedicated them anew to God. Thus, when his eldest son entered the Navy, and sailed in H.M.S. Havannah for the Australian station, he writes:—

and the boys; have been to take leave of dear Accy" (Antony) "for three years, and perhaps never to see him again; it may be so; but yet I hope—nay, I believe, that God will be with him, and restore us safe and happy to each other. But it is a pang; we feel it more when we reflect than while we experience it. I see him now; I shall see him for ever till we meet again, standing at the ship-side and watching us depart. Oh, Christ, our only Saviour and Redeemer, have mercy on the lad in body and in soul!"

It was the custom of Lord Shaftesbury to gather his children together and impart to them religious instruction. The following extracts disclose a very pleasant picture of Christian family life:—

"Dover.—Read the Bible with the boys; a useful and agreeable morning; day beautiful; walked to the top of Shakespeare's Cliff: enjoyed the scene, the refreshing air, the hope of renewed strength and fuller service."

"Good Friday.—As I taught the little children to-day it seemed to me wonderful in how small a compass is contained the whole sum and substance of Christian religion. Volumes without end, years of study, years of controversy, immense thought, immense eloquence all expended and mostly wasted to dilute or torture that which may be comprehended by the understanding and relished by the soul of a simple child. What will all the learning in the world, all the meditation of the profoundest spirits, add to the plain facts of the fall of man and his salvation by Christ? Little but perplexity and the embarrassment of that which is intrinsically simple!"

Lord Shaftesbury was loved and revered by his children with an intense affection and reverence, and scarcely less so by his servants. "In 1883," says his biographer, "when speaking on behalf of the Aged Pilgrim's Friend Society, he referred to the fact that his housekeeper had been fifty-two years in his service: that, as nurse, she had brought up all his children; that not one of them would ever think of retiring to rest in his house without bidding 'Good night' to that 'female patriarch,' and that she was held in reverence by all the household. He did not, of course, say, what was nevertheless the fact, that every morning, after prayers, it was his habit to shake hands with that aged housekeeper, and enquire after her health and of things that were of interest in her little world. He had exemplified the saying of old Philip Quarles, 'If thou wouldst have a good servant, let the servant find a good master.'"

To another friend and servant the following entry, within a few years after the heaviest trials of his life had overshadowed him, relates:—

"Yesterday poor King died, the attached faithful maid of my most blessed wife. She found my precious Minny when that beloved woman was only ten years old, and fifty-three years afterwards was still in the family and died among us. True, kind, honest, affectionate, and having no hope but in Christ, she is gone to her rest, and so breaks another worldly link between me and the parted ones."

BIBLE NOTES.

SOME TEXTS OFTEN MISUNDERSTOOD.

"Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the way of salvation."—2 Corinthians vi. 2.

AN inference often drawn by preachers from this text is that the present moment must be secured by all who are in earnest about their soul's welfare. The lesson is true and salutary, but it was not the thought in the apostle's mind. He is quoting an assurance from the prophetic Scriptures. The captives in Babylon had waited long for deliverance; their God had in His own time answered their longing cry and let them free (Isaiah xlix. 8).

"Thus saith Jehovah,
In an acceptable time have I heard thee,
And in a day of salvation have I helped thee."

Very aptly and beautifully does St. Paul apply these words to a more signal interposition and a greater deliverance. "Now," is the hour foreshadowed by the breaking of the Babylonian yoke. The day of Christ has come, "the acceptable year of the Lord." The "acceptable time" is the time which God has specially and signally accepted (St. Paul's word is more emphatic than that of the prophet) for the revelation of His love. It is this word which suggests the appeal: "Receive not the grace of God in vain." "You ought to receive Him, for He has received you" (Stanley).

A point worthy of note is that the precise idea of "receiving," "acceptable," is due to the Septuagint. The original Hebrew of Isaiah xlix. 8, may be translated: "In the season of favour," or "good pleasure, do I answer thee, and in the day of salvation I help thee." (Cheyne.) It should also be added that the words are an address of the Father to His "Servant"—that is, in their highest application, to the Messiah—the response to the "Ask of Me" in the second Psalm.

"There remaineth therefore a rest (a Sabbath rest, R.V.) for the people of God."—Hebrews iv. 9.

The declaration is generally applied to the heavenly rest; and undoubtedly there is force and beauty in the words when so understood. But it is very doubtful whether the writer was thinking of the future state at all. His point is the fulfilment of the Old Covenant in the New. One by one, the leading ideas and "keywords" of the ancient revelation are taken, in order to show how completely they are realized in Christianity. One of these keywords is Rest. The Sabbath-rest of God when creation was accomplished, and the rest of Israel in the Promised Land, by turns supply the analogy. Beyond both of those there is still a privilege, into which many to whom the outward types had been given "shall not enter." "A Sabbath-rest remaineth," after the emblems and shadows of the olden dispensation—the spiritual reality of which these were but the prefiguration. Then comes in the sublime comparison of the work of Christ in redeeming, with the Father's work in creating. "He that entered into His rest, Himself also rested from His works, as God did from His." As God the Father wrought this fair world, then "rested," not because His arm was weary, but because His work was done, so God the Son accomplished redemption, and "entered into His rest" "on the right hand of the Majesty on high." Then, as God gave the Sabbath to mankind, the sign of His completed work, so Christ has given His people the rest of Christian peace and service, as the counterpart of His own rest in heaven. In a word, the Christian life, in its ideal, is a perpetual Sabbath. It "remained," as the great antitype of the ancient type, and if we will only "enter into it," it is ours to-day.

This interpretation throws a side light on many points, as for instance the connexion of the Lord's day with the Jewish Sabbath: but there is only one of these on which we can now touch, the deep meaning of our Lord's saying in John v. 17: "My Father worketh even until now, and I work." It was thus that Christ vindicated His work of mercy on the Sabbath; and the vindication plainly rests upon the ground that the Father on His Sabbath, although creation has ceased, continues His providential working and care. The Sabbath of God—the "Seventh day" of which we read in Genesis—continues through all time. Each day of creation means an era; and of each we read that it was completed by "the evening and the morning." But not so of the Seventh day. Perhaps many readers even yet have not noticed this distinction between the day of "Sabbath," and all the rest. The conclusion of that day has not yet come; and in like manner Christ's great Sabbath endures—His calm and glorious repose after His completed work. Yet like His Father He is working still, in all the activities of love. And we who "labour to enter into that rest" delight in a service whose highest energies still bear the stamp of restfulness. We "rest from our own works," as a ground of acceptance with God, while still we work gladly and earnestly for Him.

The poet is often the true expositor of Scripture, and a hymn of Charles Wesley's perfectly expresses the interpretation here given of the passage as representing the ideal of the believer's life:—

"Lord, I believe a rest remains
To all Thy people known;
A rest, where pure enjoyment reigns,
And Thou art loved alone.

A rest, where all our soul's desire
Is fixed on things above;
Where fear and sin and grief expire,
Cast out by perfect love.

O that I now this rest might know,
Believe, and enter in;
Now, Saviour, now the power bestow,
And let me cease from sin.

Remove this hardness from my heart;
This unbelief remove:
To me the rest of faith impart,
The Sabbath of Thy love."

"The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."—1 John i. 7.

We continually hear this passage quoted in reference to the forgiveness and justification of sinners. And there are undoubtedly many texts which connect forgiveness with the atoning blood of Christ: as, for instance, Ephesians i. 7. "In whom we have our redemption through His blood, the forgiveness of our trespasses, according to the riches of His grace" (R.V.). But the words of St. John have a different application, to disregard which is not only an error in interpretation but a very serious loss. The apostle is speaking to Christian believers, already reconciled to God, and called to walk worthily of their calling, with a view to yet higher privilege and blessedness. "If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus His Son (R.V.) cleanseth us from all sin." A condition is plainly laid down, "walking in the light"—that is, making it our supreme aim "to live and move as in the revealed presence of God" (Westcott). Thereupon, in proportion as we realise this, two consequences follow: First, "we have fellowship one with another," that is, Christian with Christian in the "communion of Saints." Some understand the fellowship intended as that between the believer and God Himself; but this seems to be a misconception of St. John's thought. To this apostle the mutual fellowship of Christians is "a sign and correlative of their fellowship with God"; and "one with another" is not the way in which he speaks of our relations to God. Then, with this fellowship is associated the purification of the heart and life. "Cleansing" also is the necessary result of that walking in the light. To employ theological language, it is sanctification, not justification, which the apostle has in mind.

And this sanctification is through the "blood of Christ." His sacrifice, that is, exerts purifying influences upon the heart and conduct. This includes what is often called "the moral influence of the atonement," being set forth by some teachers in our day as the whole explanation of that sublime mystery. It is not the whole, it is not even first. The removal of imputed guilt—justification—the setting right with God—is first. But then, the influence upon character follows, on which it is also necessary to insist. Jesus is a Saviour from sin as truly as from the punishment of sin; His blood shed in death is a constant appeal to our gratitude and love, to every emotion that quickens what is best and highest within us. It is the blood of consecration, touching us at many points, as the sacrificial blood was applied to the sons of Aaron, to the ear, the hand and the foot (Exodus xxix. 20; Leviticus viii. 24). This is the "sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ" (1 Peter i. 2), which purifies every receptive and active power. But further, the blood also signifies the flowing of life from Christ to those who receive Him. In St. John's writings this thought of life communicated is constant. "The blood of Christ is, as shed, the life of Christ given for men, and, as offered, the life of Christ given to men, the life which is the spring of their life: John xii. 24" (Westcott).

Here then is the true power for holy living. Observe, the process is gradual; "cleanseth us from all sin." It is a continuous, daily cleansing. Once for all we were set free. "To Him that loveth us, and loosed us from our sins by His blood" (Rev. i. 5, R.V.). The "loosing" is one great act of deliverance. From the curse we are freed for ever; but the "cleansing" is gradual, the result of constant and repeated influences. "The blood of Jesus is ever purifying us" (Bishop Wordsworth). In the next paragraph St. John speaks of the "forgiveness of sin," and the "cleansing from all unrighteousness" as two distinct things. But the power that effects them both is one and the same. "The red rose of pardon and the white rose of purity grow upon one stem and spring from one root."

BIBLE QUERIES.

1. It is said in 1 Samuel vi. 19, that God "smote the men of Beth-shemesh because they had looked into the ark of the Lord; even He smote of the people fifty thousand and threescore and ten men." Can this be correct?

2. How are we to understand Psalm cx. 7: "He shall drink of the brook in the way; therefore shall He lift up the head"?

3. What is the meaning of Psalm cxxxii. 6: "Lo, we heard of it at Ephratah: we found it in the fields of the wood"?

4. "It was about the tenth hour," John i. 39. How are the hours computed in St. John's Gospel? See iv. 6; xix. 14.

HEART'S-EASE.

CHAPTER IV.

ETHEL returned by the way she had gone, and when she reached the house, everything was so still, that she was able to steal up to her own room without attracting the attention of her aunt. She washed the marks from her torn hand, and changed her dress, so that when she went downstairs to look for Aunt Regina, she was somewhat more neat than usual.

"My dear, you look quite tidy," aunt Regina remarked, as she looked up from her embroidery, and saw the tall slight figure approaching her. "You have changed your dress, I see."

"Yes, aunt. This one is cooler—at least, it feels cooler, after having the other on all the morning," for Ethel knew quite as well as her aunt, that the morning dress was very much the cooler of the two.

Something in her way of speaking made Aunt Regina look at her somewhat particularly. I hardly know what it was that awoke a suspicion that some mischief had happened. Perhaps it was that the staid lady was always, more or less, in a state of expectancy as to mischief. She had been the sufferer so often by Ethel's wilful ways, that now she took it for granted, perhaps, that this was a repetition of many former troubles.

"How far did you go, Ethel?" asked Aunt Regina.

"Oh! to the end of the park. But Nero was troublesome, and ran after things, so I took really a longer walk than I intended."

Aunt Regina was surprised to see Ethel's face gradually become crimson, as she told this story. Never having mistrusted her truthfulness, her aunt had not questioned, and would not have questioned her statement. She had always tried to show the utmost confidence in whatever Ethel said, as the surest way of teaching the child herself to be frank and open-minded at all times. But now she felt, by that mysterious "something" which tells people as plainly as anything can that all is not right, that Ethel was keeping back part of the truth, and therefore committing a very serious offence.

Not that Ethel considered her words as conveying an actual untruth—a lie! she would have flared up at once at the thought of such a thing. Had she not gone to the end of the park? and we know how troublesome Nero had been. She had not told everything, but all that she had told was true. But we have seen that even her clever defence would not explain the crimson cheeks which really had aroused her aunt's suspicions, as well they might.

How thankful we all ought to be that God has given us a conscience to help us to do right. I only say it helps us, for it cannot make us do right against that other mysterious thing, our will. But when both our will and conscience are agreed upon anything, then we may hope to do what is right, if both are agreed with God's word. Now Ethel's will was to keep out of a scrape. She had promised Aunt Regina not to go beyond the park, and she had gone. But conscience was making a great noise all the time, and just as ships in distress send up red lights to give notice of their danger, so conscience was sending up the hot blood into her cheeks, to give notice to all whom it might concern that there was something wrong. The sick girl's words were always ringing in her ears. "I never keep anything from my mother." They were sounding out like the fog signals along the coast, to warn the ships, and truly it might be said that Ethel's young heart was enveloped just now in a thick fog, which prevented her from seeing things plainly, and which put her in great danger of wrecking her own happiness and peace of mind. If she had only known it, she had come to a turning-point in her life. The two roads which seem to run so closely together as to be equally safe, are really widely separate, and those who take the wrong road, find it to be so, to their great loss. Ethel was now taking the road of selfish ease, and indifference. It was much easier—or rather, it seemed much easier—to her to prevaricate, and hold back part of the truth, than to tell everything. Her proud spirit could not bear the thought of having to submit to Aunt Regina's reproofs, and yet, through it all, she felt very much ashamed of herself, and the remembrance of the sick girl's words rang continually in her ears, to disturb and warn her.

I hope that no one who may read this will ever think that too much is being made of Ethel's fault. If she were hovering on the threshold of a theft, or any other glaring sin, we should cry out and warn her, if it were in our power; and yet, this sin into which she was falling, underlies all other sins, and makes it easy for the heart to yield to temptation, seeing that conscience is not listened to.

Another thing that Aunt Regina could not fail to notice was Ethel's great restlessness. Now that she had told her story, she seemed anxious to get out of the room, as though her aunt's presence was a restraint on her. She could settle to nothing. Aunt Regina suggested work, but she was not in the humour for work. Reading was the only thing that seemed to be agreeable to her; but she declared she had no books. She had read everything over and over again. When Aunt Regina had gone over a long list of the books which she thought might be agreeable, she lapsed into silence with "Well, my dear, I can think of no others; you must find one for yourself." And after a little she went in search of a book herself. The Bible, out of which her aunt had read, was lying on the table close by, and presently she took it up with an amount of deliberation which did not escape Miss Regina's watchful eyes, although she seemed to be so intent on the embroidery. She took it to the other side of the room, where the sweet air from the garden stole in, laden with the perfume of roses and mignonette, and gently stirred the soft muslin curtains, which fell in ample folds on the carpet.

It would be difficult to imagine a more peaceful scene, and if you had chanced to look in at the moment when Ethel sat down with the Bible on her knees, and opened it, reverently, to read, you might have thought—nay, you must have thought—that the picture was a very beautiful one, and that the peace of the outward scene was only a dim reflection of the peace that lay upon the hearts of the elderly lady and her niece.

The place at which Ethel opened the Bible was the book out of which she had often been taught to lisp short sentences in her very young days. The Proverbs were not only a favourite book of her's, but also of her father's. He frequently read from it, and took occasion to point out that it contained more sound common sense than nine-tenths of the books in the world put together.

At all events, Ethel felt that she could understand the Proverbs, and there was always something to interest her in them; and so she opened at random, not having any particular choice. Her eyes fell on the twelfth chapter, and she read. "Whoso loveth instruction, loveth knowledge; but he that hateth reproof is brutish." "The lip of truth shall be established for ever: but a lying tongue is but for a moment." "Lying lips are abomination to the Lord; but they that deal truly are His delight."

The book lay on her lap, and you might have thought, looking at her, that she was still reading; but she had read enough in those few verses to tell her wayward heart that she was not one whom God could delight in, for her dealings had not been true, nor had her lips refrained from lying. She sat quite still, but her eyes were closed, and through the long dark lashes there stole out every now and then a big tear, which rested for a moment on her eyelashes, and then fell on the book. She could not help it; her heart was very full, and she was half glad that she had discovered such faithful words to tell her exactly what her state was, rather than leave her any longer in doubt as to her danger. She thought that Aunt Regina could not possibly see her, but in that she was mistaken, for that good lady had been so struck by the sight of her taking up the Bible to read of her own free will, that she naturally watched to see what the result would be.

Miss Regina was greatly relieved at the sight of those big tears. They were the evidence of a better state of mind, and a more tender conscience than she had quite expected. She waited still, however, for that confession which she felt sure would come after the tears.

And after some time, she heard a timid voice addressing her.

"Aunt Regina."

"Well, dear?"

"I want to tell you something. Something very particular. Will you promise not to be cross?"

"I hope I am never what you call 'cross' without a cause, Ethel. I cannot promise not to feel distressed, or angered, but I promise you all the help in my power, dear child, to aid you in doing right. We never feel so happy as when we are acting, as well as speaking the truth. God promises His help to those who earnestly try to do His will, and I am sure my darling Ethel wishes to do that."

These earnest words completely broke down any remnants of pride or self will, remaining as a barrier in Ethel's mind to the doing and saying of what was right and true. She put away the Bible, and going over to her aunt, she put her arms about her neck, and kissed her passionately, with many tears.

"Oh, I have been so wicked, aunty, dear. I have told you lies about myself to-day. I went beyond the park, and tore my dress, and I feel so miserable. Do help me to be a good girl, for I feel as if it was impossible for me to do anything right."

Miss Regina drew the trembling, and weeping girl to her heart, and I believe that, in spite of her ordinary coldness of manner, her own eyes were moist, as she whispered words of comfort and encouragement to her niece, telling her of that willing forgiveness which God has provided for all who truly repent of their sins, and who approach Him in the name, and through the merits of their Saviour.

Her reception was so much more affectionate than she had expected that Ethel raised her tearful face and asked, "Are you not really cross with me, Aunt Regina?"

"Not cross, darling. I feel grieved that you should have done what has brought you so much suffering and sorrow, but I am glad, I cannot tell you how glad, that you have been able to do right. God has helped you, I'm quite sure. The Holy Spirit leads us, and speaks to us many times every day. When we are sorely tempted to do wrong, it is the Spirit that strives with us, and points us to the right. We should all be very much happier—yes, old Aunt Regina, as well as flighty Ethel—if we remembered that our Heavenly Father is both ready and willing to help us in every time of need, if we will but ask Him. We think that in order to speak to God, about anything, it is necessary for us to wait until we can kneel down and say our prayers, but that is a mistake. We can speak to Him at all times. His ear is always open to our cry, and whilst it ought to be our delight to go to Him on our knees in prayer, it ought also to be our joy to speak to Him in our hearts at other times, and feel that He is able to protect us from our own weak and erring natures, which so easily lead us astray."

"I feel ever so much lighter in myself, aunty, dear, since I told you."

"But what about your Heavenly Father, my child? have you told Him and asked His pardon?"

"N—o, aunty."

"Shall we both kneel down, just as we are now, you and I, and ask Him to pardon us and make us both better?"

"Oh! but Aunt Regina, you don't want to ask for pardon. You have done nothing to be ashamed of," exclaimed Ethel, her eyes opening wide in spite of her tears at her aunt's statement.

"Indeed, indeed, I have, and do, my darling. I have my besetting sins, just as you have yours. I have my poor aching body to make me irritable, and I say many things every day, that pain me. But the Bible tells us that 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous: and He is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world.'"

And they knelt together before Him who knew their temptations and their repentance, and they left their sorrows at the footstool of Infinite Love.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER V.—BARBARA'S WORK.

NEW DUTIES.

"WULF," said Barbara about a week later, as she sat with her brother in his study at night, "I have spoken to mother about what we were talking of, and she has given me leave to please myself in the matter. She did not like it much at first, but I do not think she minds it now—she soon forgets her objections to things—and I mean to take advantage of her permission. I will begin any time you like, the sooner the better."

"Very good," answered Wulfric equably. "You are sure your mind is made up?"

"Quite sure."

"Because I would much rather you should never begin at all than should begin only to get tired and throw it all up at the end of a few weeks or months."

Barbara's face looked almost as resolute as Wulfric's own.

"I shall not do that, Wulf; I am not given to changing my mind."

"Very good," said the young man quietly; "you can begin to-morrow morning if you like."

A gleam of pleasure crossed Barbara's bright face, but she did not express any great satisfaction. She began to understand her brother, and to learn a certain reticence in his presence.

Wulf smoked on in silence for a time, and then he asked a totally unexpected question.

"Barbara, do you read your Bible?"

No. 1709.—JANUARY 29, 1887. PRICE ONE PENNY.

Barbara was so astonished at this irrelevant query, that she hardly knew how to answer it.

"Y-yes," she answered, after a little pause; "I read it most days, more or less;" and then her natural candour triumphing over any other feeling, she added, "I do read it, but I don't think I care much about reading; I don't believe I read except with my eyes. I do it as a sort of respectable duty, you know, not because I care about it really in my heart."

"Ah!" said Wulfric, and relapsed into silence.

Barbara looked anxiously at him; but his face was quite impenetrable.

"Wulf," she said presently, "why did you ask me that?"

He was gazing straight before him, his deep-set eyes fixed upon the globe of the reading-lamp upon the table.

"Because life is full of hard problems, Barbara, and you will soon be confronted by some of them when you begin to see a little of the battle of life."

The girl still looked earnestly at him.

"But—but what has that got to do with reading the Bible, Wulf?"

"Ah, what?" he answered after a pause. "Perhaps you will some day be able to answer your own question, Barbara."

There was a silence, and then Barbara spoke with a certain amount of hesitation.

"I wish you would tell me, Wulf."

"Well," he answered slowly, "it's just this. Life's problems are hard enough in any case; but the Bible just keeps them from being absolutely insoluble."

Barbara's face was full of intelligence; but she did not look as if she comprehended her brother's meaning altogether.

"I am not sure that I understand you, Wulf."

"Very likely not. I should not have understood at your age."

Barbara smiled a little.

"You are not so very much older."

"No; but I have seen much more of life."

Barbara assented, and looking into her brother's face she remarked tentatively, "I did not know you were religious, Wulf."

"Nor I," he answered, with his enigmatic smile. "Now run away; I want to work."

"But I may come to the surgery with you to-morrow?"

"Yes; I said so before, didn't I? I wonder how long you will be as keen on it as you are now."

Yet he smiled as he bent his head to receive her good-night kiss, and Barbara fancied that he was pleased to think she was going to work for him.

She did not go back to the drawing-room direct, but straight up to her own room; and there she took up, with feelings almost akin to curiosity, the Bible that lay amongst the books on her table.

Barbara's Bible was not an altogether neglected book. She read a little in it most days—every day, in fact, unless she was hurried or her mind was too much preoccupied. Yet as she opened it now she felt as though she knew very little of its contents. She was not at home among those closely-printed pages. She turned the leaves but felt no satisfaction in the task. Wulf's words were sounding in her ears, but she did not understand them, and the book in her hands seemed to give no clue to the question in her mind.

Presently she closed the book with a sigh, and laid it down in its old place.

"It's no good pretending things," she said half aloud. "I never could understand the Bible, or see all the things in it that some people do, and I suppose I never shall. I wonder what Wulf meant by what he said. I never should have expected him to talk like that. Men generally don't care about such things, at any rate till they grow older. I don't believe Gerald ever thinks a bit seriously about anything. But Wulf is different, of course. He is very interesting, I think. I am so glad he is going to let me help him."

And then Barbara went down and joined the others in the drawing-room.

"Mother," she said, as she seated herself amongst them, "I am going to begin helping Wulf to-morrow. I am going to the surgery with him after breakfast."

"Very well, Barbara," said Mrs. Meynal, with the sigh of mournful resignation that was growing habitual now. "A wilful woman must have her way; but I don't suppose you will care for it long."

"We shall see," answered Barbara cheerfully. "Perhaps I shall like it."

Celia shrugged her white shoulders and looked slightly disdainful and disgusted.

"I can't think how you can dream of doing such horrid, disagreeable work, Barbara. Poor people are bad enough at any time; but when they are ill they are ten times worse. I really wonder mother lets you go."

Barbara flushed a little, but said nothing, and Mrs. Meynal responded plaintively, "I never did like it: but I suppose Barbara must go her own way. She is old enough to know her own mind."

"Certainly, certainly," said Gerald looking up from his paper with his lazy, quizzical smile. "Chaqu'un à son goût—it's an excellent motto that, and if Bab's taste is for dirty paupers, more or less diseased, by all means let her gratify it. That sort of ministering angel craze is, I believe, very speedily cured by indulgence. It would be a thousand pities to stand in her way at the outset. Later on, perhaps, she may thank us for putting a few reasonable objections in her way."

Gerald's idle mockery always tried Barbara's temper somewhat severely: but she was learning to govern herself, and in this case she refrained from a retort, and merely smiled with a little covert sarcasm.

But Gerald was not disposed to let her alone.

"How long do you give yourself for the new mania to last, Bab? Six weeks, or six months, or what?"

She looked at him with a sparkle in her eye that was something between resentment and amusement.

"I don't know that I have studied the subject. Judging by the time your great ideas take to come to nothing I should say six weeks would be quite long enough. I don't think you have ever stuck to any one thing longer than that: but then we may not be cut on the same pattern altogether."

Gerald crossed his arms behind his head and appeared to consider the matter.

"Possibly not, Barbara. I incline on the whole to think not. You and Wulf seem more of a match, and Celia and I—the useful and the ornamental, you see. By-the-bye, do you think any power on earth could induce Wulf to dress himself respectably? I'm really half ashamed to own him when we chance to knock up against one another in the streets of St. Hilda."

Barbara's lip curled.

"I don't think any power will induce him to be a dandy like you, or to waste ever so much money upon his clothes; but I don't see anything the matter with him. I think his way of dressing just suits him. It is manly and unassuming, and he is always clean and tidy, which is more than can be said for you when you are daubing in your studio. I believe you smudge your velveteen coat on purpose to give yourself a professional air."

Gerald laughed a little as he fingered his moustache.

"All right, Barbara; Wulf is evidently the rising hero, and everything he does is right. Stick to your colours by all manner of means; but don't pretend to me that a woman ever knows anything about a man's clothes, because she doesn't. Wulf always did look like a respectable scarecrow, and I imagine he always will, unless, by any chance, he should fall in love. That might do him good, perhaps."

Celia laughed rather scornfully.

"I don't think falling in love is much in Wulf's line, and I don't think he would make a very successful lover, even if it were."

Barbara looked indignant, but made no reply, as Wulfric himself entered the room at that moment for the short talk with his mother for which he always spared time before she retired.

She was full of charges to him now not to let Barbara run into any danger, or overwork herself in any way; and the young man promised to use his discretion and to take good care of her.

The next morning, after their early breakfast, brother and sister started off together, Barbara in great spirits at the thought of making herself at last of some use in the world; Wulfric, as usual, silent and rather absorbed, but rousing himself at times to talk to his companion, and tell her a little of her future work.

"What I shall want you to do chiefly, Barbara, so far as I can see, is to look a little bit after the people in the village of St. Hilda down by the sea, which is quite out of my beat, and which it is hard sometimes to make time to visit. When you have got a little experience you can be very useful to me there, looking a little after the out-patients and saving my time in the surgery, and letting me know if there are any cases I ought to visit. The people's own account of things is so hopelessly vague and involved, one never knows what to believe."

Barbara listened eagerly; but the arrival at the surgery hindered further talk. The surgery was a good half-mile from the house and well in the town. There were several patients waiting already for the doctor, and the assistant was making up medicines behind the counter.

Barbara followed her brother into the inner room, and the patients were admitted one by one. There were some wounds and bruises and burns to be dressed; some lungs to be sounded, and miscellaneous ailments prescribed for, and Barbara was most attentive and thought it all very interesting. She helped her brother as far as she could with the dressings, watched him bandage, and resolved to practise at home, and listened to his brief but clear instructions both to her and to his patients with the greatest attention.

Last of all, a tall, pale-faced man came in rather hurriedly, and with a look of agitation on his face.

"Why, Stone," said the doctor turning towards him, "you're not on the sick list again, I hope?"

"No, sir, thank you. You've set me on my legs for good, I think, and thankful I am to you for it; but it's my little lad I've come to you about. He was missing this morning, and at last we found him lying on the rocks with his leg badly broke, and a job we had to get him home, poor little chap. He'd been out trying to get seagulls' eggs to sell, times being rather hard with us just now—and, of course, he didn't understand the job, and this is what came of it."

"Is the limb set yet?" asked Wulfric quickly.

"No, sir, that's just what I came to speak about. I'm 'most ashamed to come, sir, for I know we ought to have the parish doctor, not being in a position to pay a proper fee; but the fact is, you was so good to me and my wife, and they do say as there is no doctor round as can set bones like you; and my wife she urged me to it, and so I made bold——"

"All right, Stone," said Wulfric briefly. He was already overhauling one of his deep drawers in the press, and extracting thence splints and bandages and a variety of things. "I'll come across at once, before any more patients come. Just order a trap of some kind from the stables opposite. I haven't a great deal of time to spare."

The man obeyed with alacrity, and Wulfric sorted out his things rapidly, saying to Barbara as he did so—"Do you care to come?"

"I think I should like to."

"All right. I generally have a spare half hour between the poor and the pay patients, and these last must wait now till I come back. Broken limbs ought to have the precedence."

Wulfric left word with the assistant as to his whereabouts, and the time he expected to be absent, and then he and his sister and the man Stone drove quickly away together in the fly from the hotel.

Barbara felt as if life had really begun for her in earnest, and when the conveyance stopped at the top of a rough cliff path and they had to descend to the cottage on foot, it seemed to her as if a new phase of existence were opening out before her.

She knew the path well, and had often traversed it, and she knew a clean, bright-looking little cottage, about half way down, which had often changed its inhabitants of late years. The present tenants she did not know, but evidently the man Stone was the occupier of the little abode into which he now led the way, followed by the doctor and his sister.

The cottage was spotlessly clean and neat, and the tiny outer room was empty, but the sound of faint moans was heard from the little inner chamber, and Stone led the way into the cottage sleeping-room that was rather larger than the parlour.

On the bed in a dark corner lay a little boy about ten years old. His face was white and contracted with pain, and a handkerchief stained with blood was bound round his head. He seemed hardly conscious, and took no notice of the entrance of the strangers. His mother was sitting beside him, and moistening his dry lips with a little milk and water.

Wulfric approached the child and make a careful examination of the broken limb. The boy cried out a little when it was touched, but the doctor spoke to him kindly and encouragingly, and something in the deep voice seemed to arrest the little fellow's attention and give him confidence. He bore the setting of the limb with great fortitude, and his pale face flushed with pleasure as Wulfric laid his hand upon his hot head when all was over and called him a "brave little chap."

Barbara seemed to see Wulfric in a new light to-day. In spite of his cool matter-of-fact manner she could see a depth of quiet, manly tenderness beneath that she had never suspected before. How she detected this she could not well have told, for Wulfric's old reserve was never laid aside. But see it she undoubtedly did, and so did the poor who came to him with such confidence in their perplexity and distress.

Little Jack Stone evidently had confidence in his doctor. When the wound on his temple was dressed, and he could lie down comfortably again, he heaved a sigh of satisfaction, and took hold of the strong hand that had tended him so gently and skilfully. He had been roused by what had passed from the stunned state in which he had been found, and had recovered the use of his mental faculties.

"I say," he remarked faintly but distinctly, "You're a good one, you are—a real first-rater!"

Wulfric smiled at his candid little patient.

"Well, and you're a plucky little chap too—so there's a pair of us, you see."

Little Jack grinned wide at being bracketed with the great doctor of the place.

"I say," he began again, "how soon can I get up?"

"Not for a good many weeks, old fellow. It's dull work to think of, but they will soon pass by. Well, I must be off now, but I'll come again soon, and see if you're going on all right."

Jack was so visibly reluctant to let his new friend go, that Barbara made a sign to him and remained behind herself. Jack had not noticed her much before, but when Wulf's tall figure had disappeared, he glanced round at the strange young lady, and pulled his fore-lock.

Barbara felt a little shy, but she knew it would be absurd to show it.

"Do you know who I am, Jack?" she asked.

"In course I do—you're his sister. You're Miss Barbara, you are."

"Quite right. You know more about me than I do about you; however, I must make up for lost time. Have you been living here long?"

"'Bout two years now, I think. I don't quite know—it's been two winters, anyhow. I don't like winter. I should like it always to be summer."

"Well, summer is coming now very fast."

"Yes, but it won't be much good to me if I've got to lie here ever so many weeks." And Jack's face looked very rueful.

Barbara hardly knew what consolation to offer.

"Do you like books to read, Jack?"

"I ain't much of a scholar, ma'am, thankee. I can read, but not to take it all in like. It ain't much fun to read like that."

Barbara did not know what else to suggest, and she fancied the boy began to look a little flushed and excited.

"Does your leg hurt you, Jack?"

"Not so much as it did; but it aches a good bit, and my head too."

"I think you ought to keep quiet. Would you like some jelly by-and-bye?"

Jack's eyes expressed his pleasure.

"Yes, please, ma'am."

"Very well, I will see that you have some. And shall I come to see you again?"

"Yes, please, ma'am, if it ain't a-troubling you too much."

And Barbara went away, feeling that a sort of beginning had been made, though not very confident as to her own success at starting. Still, to have made the start was something, more was sure to follow.

It was not from her own family that Barbara was to receive sympathy and encouragement in her work. Even Wulfric was too silent and reserved to be much of a confidant, but in Reinée Dumaresq Barbara found a warm friend and ally.

She came to see her soon after her work had commenced, and was eager to know how she had fared and what it was like. Her fresh, eager interest and quick sympathy did much to win Barbara's heart, and when she pleaded so earnestly to "hear all about it—every detail," it seemed like having a dear sister to talk to—a luxury of which unfortunately the girl knew in reality as little as did Reinée herself.

"It is not so very much I can do," answered Barbara modestly. "I go every day with Wulfric to the surgery in the town, and help him as much as I can with the poor patients who come. I have learned to bandage and do a few simple dressings, and some of the cases belong to me, and I do them alone, unless I want any help. Then I go and inquire about some of the people to see if they are in as great need as they profess, or if they want things that they will not ask for, which does happen pretty often with the more respectable ones. I go and see some of the people who cannot get up, and if they seem very bad I tell Wulf, and he goes himself. Of course, at first, I can't help him much, because I haven't experience, but he says that if I stick to it, and do not get tired, I shall be very useful to him in time."

"And you will not get tired, will you?" asked Reinée earnestly.

"Oh no, I feel sure I shan't. I don't like to boast, but I feel certain about it. I like it more and more as I get used to the people and their ways, and more certain of myself. I don't feel as though I could ever give up. More likely I shall have too much to do and shall want an assistant," and Barbara laughed.

Reinée's face flushed a little.

"Your sister?"—she began half timidly; but Barbara laughed again.

"Celia? Ah, no! that sort of thing is not at all in her line. She would be horrified at the bare idea. She is almost disgusted with me as it is."

For one moment Reinée seemed half embarrassed: then she looked up and asked smilingly, "Barbara, do you think I could help you a very little, if I were to try?"

"You!"

Barbara was so astonished that she spoke this monosyllable in her abruptest fashion.

"I am afraid I should be very little use," answered Reinée humbly. "I know I have no experience, and I am not clever or managing like some people; but I should so like to do something towards making other people happier, if only I knew how to set about it. I do not feel able to work quite alone. I should not know how to set about it, and I should make such blunders. I might talk to the clergyman, but that seems so formal, I feel half afraid to begin to him about things. But if you would tell me about one or two poor families who are pretty respectable, so that mamma would let me go, and who would be glad to be visited and helped when they needed it, I should like that better than anything; and if there were sick children, I should love to go and see them and try to cheer them up—poor little darlings. I do love children, and I think they generally take to me. Do you think, Barbara, you could find me anything like that to do, not in the town exactly; mamma would not like my going alone to the town, but somewhere in the village of St. Hilda? I believe she will allow me to do that."

"I'm sure I can," answered Barbara quickly, "I've got one nice little fellow on the cliff, laid up with a broken leg, who would be delighted with a visit from you. I shall be sure to have others soon. Are you sure you mean it, Reinée? You seem so—so——"

"So what?" asked Reinée smiling.

"I hardly know how to express it—I was going to say so aristocratic, to go into poor people's cottages," and Barbara laughed a little and grew rather red.

"The Queen visits the poor people in the Highlands," answered Reinée, laughing in turn. "I do not think I need be too grand to do what she does. But I must get definite permission first—I think I can."

"Well, I will undertake to keep you supplied with people," answered Barbara, "for I can see already how fast my work is increasing. It will soon be quite a relief to have somebody else to turn the cases over to when I am hard pressed."

She spoke with an almost professional air and Reinée was duly impressed by it.

"Do you think your brother will mind?" she asked, after a pause.

"Wulf? Oh, no, he will not mind. I dare say he will think you will soon give it up; but that remains to be proved."

"Yes," answered Reinée thoughtfully. "Of course we may go away from this place, or something might happen to stand in my way; but I do not think I shall get tired myself. Barbara, what do you do about talking to the people when they are ill, and reading to them? Do they not want to know a great many things?"

"What sort of things do you mean?" asked Barbara, her face flushing a little.

"I mean about religion," answered Reinée simply. "You know if they are ill they are sure to think about such things, and if they should be likely to die they will want to be told about God and heaven. What do you do then? What should I have to do? I am afraid I should be rather at a loss."

"I don't think people are so anxious to be taught as you seem to think," answered Barbara; "I have not found them at all concerned about anything beyond their bodily wants."

Reinée looked half wistfully at Barbara and then dropped her eyes and sighed a little sigh, but she said no more upon the subject, and only the question of bodily needs was afterwards discussed between them.

THE MARTYRS OF UGANDA.

THE great interest felt in the heroic service and untimely end of the devoted James Hannington, first Bishop of the Episcopal Church in equatorial Africa, will be heightened by the memoir[1] which his quondam college companion, the Rev. E. C. Dawson, has just given to the world. As a biography the book is all the more valuable because the Bishop is allowed as far as possible to tell his own story. It would have been a loss to the Christian world at large if the life of this most intrepid of pioneers in the Dark Continent had not been forthcoming. His unselfish self-denial, his patient endurance of fatigue, sickness, and hard fate, are the more striking in the case of one who could have commanded both honour and affluence at home.

It is unnecessary, after the article already given,[1] to refer to the earlier portion of the life of Bishop Hannington; but particulars which have lately come to hand concerning his last week of agony, and the fiery persecution by which the native church at Uganda has been tried, make up a chapter of the romance of missions with which all Christians should be acquainted. We find that love of the Old Gospel not only prompted a gifted and educated man to gladly forego for the love of souls those things which the majority chiefly value, but that it also taught many native youths to brave torture and death rather than surrender that blessed hope of immortality which Christ had given them. In equatorial Africa to-day, as was the case in the old Roman world, and in the European States during later centuries, the blood of the martyrs is becoming the seed of the church.

Those who have read the accounts issued from time to time of Bishop Hannington's missionary work in Africa will have been struck with his endurance during the journey from Zanzibar into the interior in 1882, when, while almost dead from dysentery, he persevered, and presented an example to the whole caravan which will never be forgotten. It will have to be borne in mind that when, after his consecration, Bishop Hannington once more started from Frere Town, hoping to reach the Victoria Nyanza by a shorter and more healthy route north-west from Mombasa, though he would have to pass through the territory of some fierce tribes, he did not apprehend danger, and everything that care and forethought could do was done to ensure the success of the expedition. The most experienced and trustworthy friends were consulted, and there was a general consensus of opinion that all would end well, while the greatest possible benefit would accrue to the mission by having a healthy highland route opened from the eastern coast to the great lake in place of the old unhealthy low-land track. It was a noble undertaking carefully planned, and entered upon with the self-sacrificing determination of a man whose one desire was the evangelization of Africa. The danger, when it came, issued from a quarter whence it was never expected. Mtesa, the great King of Uganda, who had so cordially welcomed the missionaries into his territory, had died, to leave a weak successor, Mwanga, who, with his chiefs, was possessed by the notion that whoever entered the land from the east must be invaders bent on taking the country from him.

The caravan set out from the coast on July 23rd, 1885, the entire company comprising two hundred and twenty-eight men and boys, the Bishop being the only white man among them, although he had for a companion Mr. Jones, a native clergyman. Just before starting the Bishop writes to his wife: "To-day I am revived, and am able to send an excellent account of myself. I was delighted to think that you can trust me in His hands, Who has hitherto led me by the way." When nearly fifty miles on the road he is found lighting a fire for a meal after an eighteen hours' fast, and he writes: "God is just giving me a merciful rest after the terribly severe strain I have had to go through during the last twelve months." He was then exceedingly hopeful. "Everything I hear makes me think that the dangers of the road are greatly exaggerated. It is not the danger that I fear in the least, but the want of food, or a sufficient stock of beads, or something of that kind, which might turn us back." The chief difficulty consisted in obtaining food; for certain districts they passed through were famine-stricken; the tracks in consequence having become overgrown, the leaders several times lost their way; and, as the Bishop good-humouredly remarked, "It is no small thing to lose yourself in a waterless desert." His last letter to his wife was dated from Kikumbuliu, on August 11th, eighteen days after, and affords a glimpse of hardships attending African travel. "'We are a little poor' as Jones says," the Bishop writes. "My watch has gone wrong. The candles and lamp-oil were forgotten and left behind, so that the camp fire has to serve instead. My donkey has died, so that I must walk every step of the way. Well! Having no watch, I don't wake up in the night to see if it is time to get up, but wait until daylight dawns. Having no candle, I don't read at night, which never suits me. Having no donkey, I can judge better as to distances, and as to what the men can do; for many marches depend upon my saying, 'We will stop here and rest, or sleep.'"

In about a month they arrived at the country of the Wa-Kikuyu, a numerous tribe who regarded all caravans with suspicion, in consequence of the ill-usage they had experienced at the hands of slave-catchers and greedy traders. It is said that "the apparently desolate forest was in reality swarming with the Wa-Kikuyu; but they live in impenetrable fortresses. Even the Swahili traders, with all their pretences, have not succeeded in peeping into their huts, and the formidable Masai cannot cope with them in the recesses of their own forest highlands." Only with great difficulty could food be procured for the now famishing caravan; but the cool, fearless, and wise conduct of the Bishop throughout the trying days was well calculated to impress the poor savages with the fact that there was a vast difference between a messenger of Christ, and the common caravan adventurers. The greatest danger, many thought, was to be expected from the warlike Masai tribes; and as it happened, a good deal of inconvenience was suffered through certain warrior visitors, who threatened with their spears, indulged in some bragging talk, and then demanded the hongo, or toll, for allowing the party to pass through their land. The treatment meted out to them by the Bishop, however, conquered even these savages. He received three of them in his hut as visitors for the night. "Having strewed the floor with the leaves of the sweet-scented Caleshwa," he says, "we laid us down, their spears and shields at their sides. They fell almost immediately into a most gentle sleep. I soon followed their example. Wherever we meet we are to be brothers."

Going forward they passed a pleasant time with the Wa-Kwafi tribe and their bee-hive huts in the vicinity of Lake Baringo. The country of Kavironda was reached in the beginning of October; the party seemed to be coming within measurable distance of their destination; and while the natives, through not being so importunate as some other tribes, struck the good Bishop as being "good-natured and polite to strangers," he added, "Oh that we might possess Kavironda for Christ!"

On the 12th of October he left his companion, Mr. Jones, at Kwa Sundu; and, though suffering from an inflamed leg went forward with fifty men. With the exception of the news that the company had reached Sindi, about a day's march distant, nothing more was heard until the 8th of November, when two men arrived with the intelligence that the Bishop had been murdered. What chain of events had led up to this appalling catastrophe?

Under the old King Mtesa, Uganda had promised to become a very garden of the Lord in the desert of African heathenism, numbers not only having become Christians, but having learned to read in their own tongue the New Testament, some of our finest hymns, and certain prayers from the Prayer-Book. Now, however, suspicion and vague alarm had given place to toleration and confidence, when a weak, cruel, and proud king stood in the place of the old one. As soon, therefore, as he entered the country from the north-east, the fate of Bishop Hannington was certain. Only once before had the white man approached from that quarter, in the person of the adventurous Thomson, about a year previously; but the chief who allowed the traveller and his party to escape suffered afterwards for his magnanimity. When the Bishop reached the borders of Uganda, the persecution against the Christians had broken out, a number of boy converts having been burned alive. The messenger of peace was, of course, as ignorant of the storm that was raging as he was of the puerile prejudice against visitors from the north-east.

While he was thus advancing to his fate, and while his friends at the mission-station were unable to warn him of his danger, the Bishop jotted down in his diary what happened from the time of his leaving Kwa Sundu until, as it would seem, the very hour of his death.

On October 17th he reached the shore of Lake Victoria Nyanza, where he found "an enormous market in full swing," as well as "awful swamps and mosquitos as savage as bees." Although he could hear nothing of the Nile, and was beginning to feel anxious about certain matters, he passed "a very restful and pleasant" Sabbath on the 18th; but on the following morning "symptoms of war" became manifest. The neighbourhood was "decimated by war;" and camping for the night between two hostile parties, whose conversation he could overhear, the Bishop realised the danger of the situation. Good progress was made on the 20th, however, and on the 21st he reached the camp of Lubwa, not far from the Nile, and near the Ripon Falls. The people assumed an insolent tone, and demanded exorbitant presents. On the Bishop offering a small present, and attempting to pass, the present was returned. The war-drums were beating, hundreds of savage warriors were coming in; guns were stolen and the men of the caravan were becoming unnerved. In the midst of this confusion the Bishop ascended a hill and was gladdened to catch a sight of the Nile. It was just at this time that Masudi, a quondam Mahometan, who had embraced paganism, allured his victim away from the caravan men by pretending to know of a better view of the river. Then the ruffians who were appointed for the work set upon their prey. "They violently threw me to the ground, and proceeded to strip me of all valuables," writes the Bishop. "Thinking they were robbers, I shouted for help, when they forced me up and hurried me away, as I thought, to throw me down a precipice close at hand. I shouted again, in spite of one threatening to kill me with a club. Twice I nearly broke away from them, and then grew faint with struggling, and was dragged by the legs over the ground. I said, 'Lord, I put myself in Thy hands, I look to Thee alone.' Then another struggle, and I got to my feet, and was thus dashed along. More than once I was violently brought into contact with banana trees; some trying in their haste to force me one way, others the other; and the exertion and struggling strained me in the most agonising manner. In spite of all, and thinking I was being dragged away to be murdered at a distance, I sang 'Safe in the arms of Jesus,' and then laughed at the very agony of my situation."

Soon after this, he found himself a prisoner in a terribly filthy and unventilated hut, bruised, strained, and shaken, as well as consumed by thirst. He had barely strength to hold his Bible. After being allowed to breathe the pure air without for a few minutes, he writes: "It made matters worse when I went inside my prison again, and as I fell upon my bed, I burst into tears." On the 23rd, he awoke full of pain, and seeing his excessive weakness, the savages allowed the Bishop his own tent; and the chief came with a hundred of his wives to ask that nothing bad about him might be reported to the king. On the following day, after a storm of wind and rain, he found a quiet time, engaged with his Bible and diary. How he fared on the 25th, his last Sabbath on earth, is fully explained in the facsimile page from the diary we have reproduced. On the Monday he was heavy and sleepy, and for the first time since leaving the coast was unable to take his food. On the 27th, he began to doubt if the chief had sent to the king at all; but thought he was being kept as a hostage as one suspected of being in league with the fighting party. "I don't know what to think, and would say from the heart, 'Let the Lord do what seemeth to Him good.'" He remarks: "If kept here another week, I shall feel sure no messengers have been sent, and, if possible, shall endeavour to flee, in spite of all the property I must leave behind, and the danger of the undertaking."

On the 28th, after a terrible night with his drunken guard, and with the tent swarming with vermin, he was delirious with fever; but in the evening was sufficiently recovered to learn that three soldiers had arrived from Mwanga, and to be "much comforted by Psalm xxviii." On the 29th, the day of his murder—"I can hear no news," he writes; "but was held up by Psalm xxx., which came with great power." His own notion seems to have been, that the messengers from the king would have brought orders for his release; but it was not to be. Led into an open space with his caravan men, the latter were speared, while the Bishop was shot with his own gun, his last words being to the effect that he died for the Ba-ganda, and that he had bought the road to Buganda with his own life. From first to last he preserved the heroic bearing of a Christian whose faith in God was never shaken by the sufferings or terrors of earth. Only four out of the fifty men who left Kwa Suudu with the Bishop returned to tell of what had happened.

On the very morning of the day of his murder, Bishop Hannington was hoping to greet the native church, little thinking that the storm which had commenced would increase in violence until Uganda would reckon its scores of Christian martyrs who were faithful unto death, and who in some instances even sang the praises of Christ in the fire. When the country was first opened through friendly intercourse with Mtesa, who could have prophesied that in a few brief years the lurid flames of martyr fires would be reflected in the Victoria Nyanza? The accounts of the persecution which has broken out make up a story as terrible as anything which happened under Nero or Diocletian; but at the same time they are a striking testimony that the Old Gospel has lost none of its power, even in the darkest corners of the earth.

The moral condition of the district is low, even for Africa; and thus it is scarcely surprising that the trouble first arose from one of Mwanga's Christian pages "refusing to consent to a sin of which it is a shame even to speak, and to which the king had wished to make him a victim." About the same time a princess burned a certain magic charm; and the result was that a number of young Christians—some of whom belonged to the French Roman Catholic station—were arrested, and after being mutilated and used in a manner too sickening for description, about thirty boys were burned alive. Of course a reign of terror ensued; Christian youths were in hiding about the country; it was accounted a chief crime to be able to read, or to be a learner at the mission-stations. But, amid all this confusion and alarm, as we learn from letters recently received, it does not appear that those who had really accepted the Gospel for a moment thought of striking their colours. They visited the missionaries at night, or in the hours of early morning, some coming for counsel, and some even to ask for baptism.

The unyielding Christian assurance of these young converts was very wonderful; and the future historian of the African church will refer with admiration to the attendant circumstances of their death. Nakumba, or Joseph, fifteen years of age, and baptized with more than a dozen others on Christmas Day, 1883, was mocked for being a Christian on his way to the fire. Another, one of the brightest scholars of the mission-school, and under twelve years of age, was another victim. A third, one of the king's doorkeepers, had purchased the Bishop's Bible from the murderers. One on being threatened with burning, replied, "Very well; do so. I am a Christian, and I am not afraid." Some were butchered in cold blood, some were clubbed to death, and thirty-two were burned alive in one fire.

Amid surroundings as dreadful as can well be imagined, the missionaries, by intercession with the king and other means, have made heroic efforts to stop the persecution, but, as far as our present information extends, in vain.

Meanwhile, though under a cloud, and only able to visit their teachers under cover of darkness, the converts hold on, and the work of printing and teaching has not been checked; for as lately as July 11th, five natives were received into the native church by baptism. In a word, these poor African youths are setting an example of heroic faithfulness unto death which is worthy of comparison with the devotion of the early Christians.

THE INNER LIFE OF LORD SHAFTESBURY.

PART V.

IT pleased God to send into the happy home of Lord Shaftesbury sorrow upon sorrow, and the most pathetic passages in the books before us are those in which he relates the story of his conflicts in the Valley of the Shadow of Death. It is almost sacrilegious to select isolated fragments from those passages, as it destroys the beauty of the whole; but the sneer which is so often brought against philanthropists, that "in caring for others they neglect their own," meets with such a complete refutation in the case of Lord Shaftesbury, that we venture to quote a few detached paragraphs.

In 1847 his second son, Francis, a boy of sixteen, and a singularly striking character, was taken ill at Harrow, where he was at school, and the sickness was "unto death." He knew his danger, but he knew also his hope.

"Never have I known till now," wrote Lord Shaftesbury in his diary, "what I am possibly to lose! 'Read to me,' he said, 'about forgiveness of sins.' We then read and talked much of the free and full mercy of God in Christ Jesus. Above all, I urged him, as a calmer to every apprehension, to bear ever in mind that God is love; that human love is capable of great things; what then must be the height and depth and intensity of Divine love! 'Know nothing' we said, 'think of nothing, but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified.'"

"After he had learned his extreme danger from the medical attendants, he said to me, 'Is it so?' I replied that it was. He then called me, saying, 'Come near to me, dear papa.' I went and knelt down by his bedside; he threw his blessed arms round my neck and kissed me for a very long time, and then said, 'I want to thank you, dearest papa, for having brought me up as you have done—for having brought me up religiously. I now feel all the comfort of it; it is to you I owe my salvation.' No, dearest boy, I replied, it is the grace of God! 'Yes it is true,' he said, 'but you were made the instrument of it.' Is there not consolation, almost divine, in those precious sentences? After we had read and prayed together, the dear boy said, 'Dear papa, give me your blessing.' I might have replied, like St. John the Baptist, 'I have need—of thee, and comest thou to me?' but he asked it, and, from my soul, I gave it!"

"Yesterday it pleased Almighty God to take our blessed Francis. It was the work of a moment, and we were like amazed persons, so great had been the promise, not many seconds before, of returning strength and vivacity. Yet we must not murmur or repine, for all is wisdom and mercy and love that cometh from God. The child, we doubt not, is with Christ, which is far better."

"It opens up a beautiful page in a man's life," as Mr. Hodder says, "when it can be seen that there was between himself and his children such absolute confidence and affection that they could speak unreservedly together on the subject of personal religion. It sheds a lustre over every public effort for the good of others, when it is known that this was but an extended phase of the work that had been going on in his own home."

Nor was this a solitary illustration. Like testimony to the influence of home teaching was borne by his son Maurice, who died in Switzerland, and his daughter Mary, who died at Torquay, both in early life.

The darkest and most terrible year in the life of Lord Shaftesbury was the year 1872. His daughter, Constance, had been for some years in declining health, which necessitated her wintering in the Riviera. The devotion of her parents to her is a home-picture of singular beauty, but it has a reverse side of singular sadness. Overstrung by excessive watchfulness and nursing, the health of Lady Shaftesbury gave way. The best of medical advice was obtained, and recovery seemed certain, insomuch that on a day in October she was able to take the air in a carriage-drive. But in the evening of that day there was a relapse, and, on the following day, while his heart was breaking, Lord Shaftesbury turned to his diary with that strange instinct which had, all through his life, made it to him as a safety-valve for pouring out the pent-up fires of his soul, and wrote:—

"Oct. 15th, 1872.—Minny, my own Minny, is gone. God took her soul to Himself at about twelve o'clock this morning. She has entered into her rest, and has left us to feel the loss of the purest, gentlest, kindest, sweetest and most confiding spirit that ever lived. Oh, my God, what a blow! But we bow before Thee in resignation and sorrow. Almost her last words were, 'None but Christ, none but Christ.' . . . What do I not owe to her, and to Thee, O God, for the gift of her?"

In a letter to his friend, Lady Gainsborough, he says:

"During the long space of forty years that God, in His special and undeserved mercy allowed me to live in union with that inestimable woman, there was an increase and no abatement of love on either side. And now that He has taken her, I must believe that it is a continuance, and not a withdrawal of His mercy; and I bow before Him with reverence and gratitude for His past goodness."

The loss of the mother was a terrible shock to Lady Constance, the suffering daughter, and the only hope of her sustaining it was to go at once to the warmer shores of the Mediterranean. Mentone was reached on the 13th of November, a month after the death of Lady Shaftesbury. Inexpressibly sad were the days that followed.

Then came a day when the invalid daughter "became suddenly quite herself, as in the days of strength and joy. She sat up in bed, her face was radiant with inward pleasure, she spoke to every one around. 'Dearest papa,' said the blessed child, 'do not give way. I want to bless you now for all that you have taught me. . . . Christ is very near me,' she said; and when I reminded her of her mother's favourite line—'Simply to Thy Cross I cling'—she expanded her hands, her whole face beamed with the loveliest, happiest smile I ever saw, and she inclined her head towards me in assent quite exulting. . . . Soon after, she exclaimed, 'I know that I am going to die, for I feel so happy!' With these words she fell into a soft sleep. In a short time she was gone; and no one could mark the moment of departure. . . . Was her blessed mother there? Was our own most dear Lord far off? She said, 'Christ is very near!' She must, I think, have perceived something that we did not."

For many years there are, in the midst of the record of ceaseless activity, some very touching passages in the diary of Lord Shaftesbury, showing how keen was the struggle against abandoning himself to his sorrows, and how vividly, at all times and in every place, he was alive to the tremendous loss he had sustained. Only one of these passages we will quote, written twelve months after the death of the Countess of Shaftesbury.

"Oct. 12th, 1873, Sunday.—Shall I never see her again, O Lord, that sweetest, dearest, most precious of women? Surely there will be recognition; surely a re-union of love. God knows, and He is both wise, and good, and tenderly considerate. Perhaps she and my darling Conty are much nearer than I suppose. Perhaps they see me, watch over me, and pray for me. We cannot pray to saints in heaven; both Scripture and reason forbid it. But neither one nor the other forbids me to believe that the blessed in heaven may pray for the struggling on earth—nay, they rather bid us to do so. The highest duty and the richest enjoyment is the imitation of our Lord. He is ever interceding for those that He loves; and why not, in a far lower degree, the departed saints for those they have left on earth?"

In the discipline of life all sorrow loses its appointed end, unless it results in practical issues. More than the usual amount of suffering was appointed to Lord Shaftesbury. Let us see what use he made of its lessons, for "nothing can happen to a man—no loss, no tribulation—which may not leave him stronger, better, more full of spiritual resources than it found him, if only he has made sure of God, and of the perfect ends towards which, alone and for ever, God conducts His own."[1]

His early sorrows had precisely this effect upon him; they were years in which he was graduating for his life-work. He had suffered opposition in those early years; he determined henceforth to devote his life to fighting the battles of the oppressed. He had known loneliness and cold and hunger; henceforth he would plead the cause of the poor, the lonely, the suffering, and the hungry. He had known the loss of a happy childhood; henceforth he would labour, as long as life should last, to bring joy and gladness to the hearts and homes of little children.

In the same way, as loss after loss of those he so tenderly loved wrung his heart, and in his old age the great trial came which left him bruised and broken, crushed beneath its weight, he sorrowed as a Christian; and, within three months of the time when the grave had closed over his beloved ones he was again in the midst of his old work, toiling with a vigour that had never been surpassed; and to the poor, the suffering, and the sad he went forth from his own grief with a heart overflowing with sympathy and powers awakened into fresh activity, consecrated anew by sorrow.

It was his love for his own children, and his grief at parting with them for ever so short a time, that inspired those exquisite little addresses in which he bade farewell to the ragged-school boys on their emigrating to other shores. No advice could be more beautiful than that he gave on one occasion when, among other pieces of excellent counsel, he introduced these striking words—

"I hope, when you are far away, you will not forget those friends who have taken care of you here, and the instruction and advice you have received from time to time from those who have felt an interest in you, and that you will not forget what has been said to you to-night. I believe it will be a great help to remember, not only what has been said, but the very countenances of those who have befriended you; let their presence be familiar to your recollection. Remember the faces of those who are present to-night. The remembrance may deter you in the time of temptation from doing that which would disgrace yourselves and bring discredit on them."

It was the desolation made in his own household that made him so tenderly solicitous for the poor in their hours of bitterness, without the alleviations that came to him. He never shrunk from any task by night or by day, if only he could be the means of carrying comfort and hope, as well as of imparting practical aid, to those who stood in need. He was known in the slums of Westminster and Whitechapel even better than he was known in Grosvenor Square and Park Lane, and wherever he went he earned for himself the benedictions of the poor. His public labours are known to every one, but his more private deeds of love and kindness have never been told. Mr. Hodder summarises some of them thus—

"'What the poor want is not patronage, but sympathy,' was his own axiom; and when the poor saw him driving into their 'slums' with his carriage full of toys for the neglected little ones; when, on the great day of the year—'the day in the country'—they saw him moving about among them, with a kind word here, and a little pleasantry there, and a smile for all; when, in their times of sickness, he sat by their bedsides, and read to them from the Scriptures; when he promised to see them again, or send them books, or interest himself in other ways for them, and, notwithstanding the many promises of this kind he made, was never known to leave one unfulfilled; when they found that he could trust them, finding tools for one to get employment, advancing money to another till his first wages fell due; when they were confident that if a poor flower-girl, or little children in distress, called at Grosvenor Square to tell their troubles to the 'good Earl,' they would never be turned away; when they knew that, by day and by night, he went to the common lodging-houses, and sought out men and women, tenderly reared, who were hiding away from family and friends, and would not give up a case until he had seen them reconciled, and, perchance, brought home again; when the bare walls of those miserable lodging-houses, on the day after his visit, were made gay with bright pictures to produce the semblance of a home-like look; when, as some of them told him of cruel wrong or heart-breaking sorrow, they saw the tears pour down his face, and heard his faltering exclamation, 'God help you, poor dear!'—it is no wonder that they almost worshipped the ground upon which he trod, and that his name was held in veneration in every hovel of Whitechapel and Westminster."

It was the prayer of Lord Shaftesbury's old age that he might "die in harness," and the prayer was answered. Those memorable meetings in London in the spring of 1885 will be fresh in the memory of many readers of these pages, but few who heard him uttering his last words knew that they came from him when he was heroically bearing acute pain or suffering intense depression.

Then came a day, while he was at Folkestone seeking health, when he took a chill and ceased for ever from active work. Then, undisturbed by fear of death, unshaken in faith, and in full assurance of hope, he calmly waited the end.

That end came as he had prayed it might, and his last hours were spent in filling up the living of Shaftesbury in a way in which, as he believed, glory might be given to God, and good be done to man, and then the "labourer's task was over."

Such a life needs no comment, and yet we cannot close these papers without "pointing a moral." It shall be done in Lord Shaftesbury's own words:—

"June 12th, 1883, Sunday.—'With all your experience' (I imagine some young man saying to me) 'would you counsel me to follow the career that you have chosen and pursued?' In the first place, I reply that, in spite of all vexations, disappointments, rebuffs, insults, toil, self-denial, expense, weariness, sickness, all loss of political position, and considerable loss of personal estimation—in spite of being always secretly despised, and often publicly ignored—in spite of having your 'evil' most maliciously and ingeniously exaggerated, and your 'good evil spoken of'—I would, for myself, say 'Yes.'"

"June 13th.—But what would you counsel to another? I should advise him to consider maturely what he desired. If he desired to rise in the world, to have a party, to be much thought of, to be a great man at Court or in politics, I should say 'No.' If he desired internal satisfaction, that humble joy through Almighty God (amidst ten thousand vexations) that attend you in retirement and in thoughtfulness, I say emphatically 'Yes.'"

"But if Not."

"Our God whom we serve is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace, and he will deliver us out of thine hand, O king. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."—Dan. iii. 17, 18.

THE seas are calm, the winds are fair,
No rocks are near; thou hast no care,
Thou bearest home a cargo rare.

But if the seas thy bark assailed,
And stormy winds that wreck prevailed,
And all thy strenuous striving failed?

Thy strength exulteth in the sun,
Thy limbs are fleet the race to run,
And many a work thou boastest done.

But if thy joyous strength decay,
Thy task be patience all the day,
And death the fleetest in the way?

Now "troops of friends" thy steps pursue,
One common aim appears in view,
Their life gives thine a riper hue.

But if perchance thou stood'st alone,
The measure of thyself unknown,
And hadst no virtues but thine own?

Now clear the lights of science shine,
And wisdom hastes with smile benign
To guide thee up the heights divine.

But if thy knowledge ceased to teach,
And Truth should lose her tranquil speech,
And thy research no answer reach?

Faith hath its visions pure and high,—
Of mystic succour surely nigh,
And land that knows no tear or sigh.

But if no angel wing should gleam,
Nor crystal fountain healing stream,—
If earth be real, and heaven a dream?

Thy God delivers from the flame;
"But if not,"—were it still the same?
What saith the Cross of death and shame?

"Yea, though he slay me I will trust," —Soul, this is life—and God is just,
On all the rest is "dust to dust."

HEART'S-EASE.

CHAPTER V.

ETHEL was now able to tell Miss Regina all that occurred with regard to the sick girl, and to ask for her help in showing her kindness. She found not only a willing sympathiser, but also a ready helper.

"I think I have heard through the rector of this poor woman," she said. "When her husband died, I know your father sent them some assistance, but we have been so much away from home, that for the last twelve months I have lost sight of the family. I shall certainly go down to-morrow, and see the girl."

"And you will let me go with you, of course, aunty?"

"If I take you I shall have to take Nero too, and that might be dangerous for pussy," said Miss Regina, with a smile.

"But you don't know how good Nero was when I was cross to him, Aunt Regina. He lay as quiet as a mouse."

"Then being 'cross' does good sometimes, Ethel?"

"I suppose it is necessary sometimes, auntie," said Ethel, smiling at the allusion to her own words.

"Then if God was not angry with sin, He would not be the kind loving Father that He is described in the Bible," Miss Regina said, anxious to clear her niece's mind of false views of her Heavenly Father. "We are told that 'God is angry with the wicked every day,' and that can only mean that He is angry with their wicked doings. God loves them, and would have them love Him, but as long as they keep away from Him, and do those things that displease Him, He must be angry with them."

"Yes, aunty, I suppose so. But does God forgive us without our doing anything?"

"No, darling. He tells us that we must do something, and that is, repent. If we have no sorrow in our hearts for sin, and no real desire and intention to turn away from it, we cannot hope for His pardon. Repentance and remission —or putting away of sin—go together, and when we know that we earnestly wish both of these things, then there is nothing to be done but to come to God, through our dear Saviour, and ask Him for pardon. And when we have pardon we ought to have peace—the peace of God in our hearts, to keep us from being over-anxious about anything, and to make us always calm and happy."

"O! how I wish I had it, aunty dear; I never seem to have any real peace, and I know I am never calm. As for being happy, I think I am sometimes, but it soon goes away. I am always happiest after telling my faults, like to-day. I feel very happy now," she said, putting her arms once more round Miss Regina's neck and kissing her.

"And that is just how we ought to feel with regard to our Heavenly Father, my darling. We cannot be happy if we feel that there is any cloud between our souls and Him—any unconfessed sin, or foolish desire. But when we know that He is our reconciled Father, and when we try daily to do His will, then He promises us His peace, and that is a peace which 'the world can neither give nor take away.' I wish my darling little Ethel had it."

Ethel looked up and smiled.

"I think God will give it to me, aunty dear, for I do repent, and I have asked Him to make me a good girl. I am truly sorry for thinking all those lies to-day. I felt very, very wicked."

Miss Regina imprinted a kiss on the upturned face, and with a reverent "God grant it, darling," she rose from her chair.

Unnoticed by Ethel, but not unnoticed by Miss Regina, who was facing the window, Colonel Seymour had been standing for a second or so, watching, somewhat in surprise, the unusual sight of his sister in such affectionate nearness to his daughter. There was, so far as he was aware, no special reason for this, beyond the few words he had spoken to each of them that morning, He was greatly pleased at the sight, for he had often felt that both were in some measure the cause of those occasional storms which disturbed the calm that usually presided over Holmsdale.

Of course Ethel caught sight of her father the moment Aunt Regina stood up.

"Oh! papa," she exclaimed, running to him and kissing him. "We have been so happy together. I never knew aunty so good as she has been to-day."

Colonel Seymour smiled across the room at his sister.

"Well, I hope she can say the same of you," he answered, as he patted the head that nestled for a moment so close at his side.

"Oh! no," she exclaimed, with sudden seriousness, "I have not been good." And then she drew herself away from him, with a strange self-condemnation, as though to mark her sense of her own unworthiness.

Colonel Seymour looked across to his sister for some explanation of this unusual confession, but she made no sign. Perhaps she thought it as well to let Ethel make her own confession in her own way. The occasion was most unusual, and no wonder the Colonel was puzzled. As a rule it was Ethel who was everything that was right and good, and all the rest of the world—that is, all her little world—was in the wrong. He was the only one with whom she never had any serious difference, but that was, I fear, because he excused her foolishness, with the fond excuse of an over-indulgent father.

"But, my darling child, what have you done?" he asked at length, feeling sure that it must have been some serious offence to warrant such serious looks and words upon her part.

"Oh! all kinds of things, papa," she answered him, with tears of remorse gathering in her eyes. "I broke your beautiful Dresden vase, the one you prized so much, because darling mother gave it to you," she went on, as if anxious not to leave out of her confession a single word that could make it complete. "But I could not help that, it was an accident. Then, I went out for a walk with Nero, and I tore my dress, and went further than aunty said I was to go, and I told her a lie about it, and I was very miserable, but I am happier now," she added, with a sudden burst of sunshine from the very midst of the dark cloud. Her face lit up with happiness, and she brushed the tears away from her eyes, and all this was so unusual, and so unexpected by her father, that he looked again in vain to his sister for some explanation of it all.

He sat down and drew Ethel to him. "I am very glad that you are happy at last, my darling, and although I am exceedingly sorry for my beautiful vase, I accept my Ethel's statement that it was the result of an accident."

"Oh! yes, Reginald," interposed Miss Regina. "It was really more my fault than hers. I called to her, and she was startled by the sudden noise, and dropped the vase. It was purely an accident."

"Then we must say nothing more about it, my dear. Accidents will happen, you know, although I wish it had happened to almost any other ornament in the room."

"So do I, papa," Ethel said, with serious face.

"But I am greatly troubled to hear about that other matter. I could never have believed it possible that my Ethel would deliberately tell a lie. Surely there was some accident or other, to account for it. It was not done deliberately."

"Oh! yes, it was papa. I should only be telling another if I said anything else."

Colonel Seymour was the very soul of honour, and the thought of any departure from the truth filled him with dismay. He could have wished almost any other fault in his child rather than that.

"I am very, very sorry to hear it, Ethel," he said, slowly and gravely.

Ethel was greatly moved by his tone and words. Her contrite spirit broke again into weeping, and she buried her face in her father's arms, and cried bitterly. It was now Miss Regina's opportunity to explain matters so far as she could.

"I must say, Reginald, that Ethel came to me entirely of her own accord, and confessed that she had said what was not true, and what certainly misled me as to what she had done. We have, together, asked God to forgive the sin; and I think Ethel is happier in her own mind, now that she has confessed both to her heavenly and earthly father. I am quite sure that you will freely forgive her, now that you know what has happened."

It was Colonel Seymour's turn to feel affected by the incident: he drew his little girl closer to him, and kissed her over and over again, with such affection that, in spite of her happiness, Ethel felt she must cry again. But that may have been for joy.

"I freely forgive my little girl," said the Colonel in a soft and broken voice. "If she has asked her Heavenly Father's forgiveness, I know she must feel happier, and it makes me glad to think that she confessed her fault to Aunt Regina without being forced to do to. We are never so happy as when we are doing what our inward monitor, conscience, tells us is right. God has given it to us, as He has given us His word to guide us. When we are following what His word and our conscience tell us to be right, we cannot go very far astray. And now, darling child, kiss me, and run away and wash your face. I cannot bear to see those clouds on it. I want you to come with me for a short walk; perhaps Nero might come too, if he promises to be very good."

Ethel kissed her father with passionate earnestness, and ran upstairs to do his bidding, for the prospect of a walk with him was particularly delightful.

She came down so quickly again, that it drew from him a pleasant remark as to her improved rapidity in dressing. "My dear, if you keep this up, you will be quite a model for your sex," he said. "You have only kept me waiting five minutes."

And very much to his surprise, she looked up at him with a most serious face, as she was in the act of putting on her glove, and said just in the way in which her mother used to speak in other days: "Oh! I have such a lot to say to you as we go along."

"Indeed!" he said, laughing. "A lot to say to me, and what about, pray?"

"Oh! about something very important. I cannot tell you until we are on our way," and with an air of business, such as sat very comically on her young face, Ethel hastened her father, and seemed rather indifferent as to Nero's going with them, much to the Colonel's surprise.

"But you have not called Nero," he said, looking at her with a smile as they walked down the broad gravel path.

"I should like him to come, but he might be in our way. Do you mind coming round by the village?" she said.

"No, my dear, not if you have any special wish to go that way."

"I went there this morning, and Nero gave me, oh! such a fright; and not only me, but somebody else, and it is that somebody else that I want you to see very badly."

"Another scrape, I suppose," he said with a smile, as he looked down into the flushed face at his side. He had begun to think that she ought to have been a boy. She seemed to have so much of the daring, adventurous spirit of his own young life in her, that he sighed, he hardly knew why, as he said this.

"I don't call it a scrape, papa, I call it a most happy adventure. I know when you have seen the 'somebody,' that you will think so, too."

"Is it so great a mystery, then, that you cannot tell me all about it at once?"

"I would rather that you waited until we get to the village, and I think we are better without Nero, although it goes to my heart to leave the dear old dog at home."

"Just as you wish, darling. Call him, if you would like him to come."

She hesitated a moment, but then she said, "No, I think we can talk better, you and I. If he came, he would want me to play with him, and I cannot do so now. I have too much to say to you."

"Then you had better begin at once," said her father in an amused voice, as he watched the serious face of his little girl.

Of course it was quite impossible for Ethel to keep a secret under such circumstances, and long before they reached the village, her father knew as much about "somebody" as Ethel could tell him.

NO event of missionary history has aroused deeper or more general sympathy than the recent massacres in Uganda. Although so many and so great conflicts have been won for Christ peaceably in the dark corners of the earth, there was nothing surprising in the fact that contact with barbarous tribes was followed by bloodshed and peril; but few were prepared for this sudden revelation in central Africa, of patient faith and victorious endurance in the face of persecution, such as gave fame to the early martyrs. Such incidents appeal to the church universal; they have a language of their own, and are understood in every country. They are full of inspiration for the future, although the present is overclouded. The missionaries are themselves in danger. Mr. Mackay—who has suffered also from attacks of fever—has since been thrown into prison; Mr. Ashe has been "dismissed," and crossing the Msalala, came on to Uyui, whence he despatched messengers to Zanzibar. Communications have been addressed to the Sultan of that island, by the representative of England there, and he has engaged to send as a mission to King Mwanga two leading Arabs who have important business relations in Uganda. The journey inland occupies two months.

We have given on another page some account of the circumstances preceding these persecutions. Mr. Mackay, writing a month after the first outbreak, says:—"Those who were at the capital, and best known, were of course first arrested. About a dozen were butchered at once. Several were mutilated afterwards; many were speared or otherwise killed in the endeavour to capture them in various parts of the country; while thirty-two were burnt alive in one huge pyre, after having been kept prisoners over a week. Of course the great body of our people (as of the Frenchmen's) took warning and fled into hiding. A few of them have since come to light, having got influential friends to intercede for them, and have been pardoned on the understanding (i.e. on the part of the king) that they renounce Christianity. But a large number still remain in hiding, able to move about only under cover of darkness." Recounting a few of the incidents of this fearful time, he says:—"Let some of our friends at home fancy themselves exchanging places with us, and see their friends with whom they yesterday talked and ate, and prayed, to-day ruthlessly seized and hacked to pieces almost before their eyes. At this moment I recall vividly the voice and face of a man who came here almost daily. Several voyages he made with me in the boat, to and from Msalala. He was further a member of our native church council. The executioners suddenly appeared before his house to arrest him, but were afraid to enter. At the time he was engaged in holding prayers with several lads. These bolted through the thin reed wall of the house and escaped. One alone remained with him. 'Do not be afraid that I will shoot you,' cried the Christian; 'come in and take me.' They bound him and took him, as also the friend with him, before the king. 'Do you read?' 'Yes.' 'Take him and roast him,' was the summary sentence. The two were condemned, but one bought himself off by getting his friends to pay a woman and a cow. Roberto was kept a few days in the stocks, and then an arm cut off and roasted before his eyes. Next a leg was severed, and that also burnt. How much further the torture went I do not know; I only know that what was left of the man was committed also to the flames." Again:—"Nua, the chief of all the blacksmiths in the land, was one of our most prominent people. On hearing that arrests were being made he hurried off his wife and children, as well as some two or three Christian lads who were living with him. There he sat awaiting arrest: nor had he long to wait; the executioners arrived and led him off unresistingly. For a week he was kept with the other prisoners, and we hear that he appealed to the executioners to embrace Christianity. Seeing among those in the stocks with him a chief who had been condemned for shooting and wounding a man and stealing cattle, Nua implored the executioner not to execute the cattle-stealer along with those who were dying for their faith. This was reported to the king, who sent and pardoned the cattle-stealer, but left Nua to be burnt alive with the others.' After the massacre the head-executioner reported to the king that he had never killed men who showed such fortitude and endurance, and that they had prayed aloud to God in the fire. This caused merriment in the court, the king remarking that 'God did not rescue them from his power.'" Of the subsequent time, we read: "Now every night a few come from their hiding places to see us, and our sleep is much broken. To one or two who were allowed their liberty on payment of a fine, we have helped to advance the amount; while to a chief who is himself a Christian, and who was ordered to hand up two of his boys for execution, we advanced two tusks of ivory, by the payment of which he has been let off meantime. As was to be expected, several have been put to death who were not Christians at all, but were accused of learning. A few have been pardoned because their services could not well be dispensed with, some having charge of the king's goods." The young king meanwhile declaring that he would not tolerate the teaching of the missionaries, yet expressed his determination to have Europeans to work for him. "Every time," says Mr. Mackay, "a fit of malice comes on, it is on suspicion that we mean to 'eat up the country'" A month later Mr. Ashe writes:—"Most of our work is now carried on in secret and under the cover of darkness. At first when the storm broke upon us, all was darkness and fear. We knew the slaughter had been terrible, but who the slain were we knew not. After awhile, at dead of night, one well-known face was joyfully welcomed, and then another. Soon many came, and with thankful hearts we found that though many had fallen, many, many more had escaped and are now hiding." There had been several applicants for baptism; but once again the position is changed by the king's interference with the missionaries.

M. Barthelemy St. Hilaire, a Positivist observer of events, in a recent address to the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences at Paris, made a statement of his belief as to the future of Christianity—that "the colonial expansion of Christian nations will eventually cover the whole world, and India, drawn into the current, will one day spontaneously embrace the faith of her masters and educators, as she has already adopted their arts, industry, and commerce."

Some cheering incidents of missionary progress are reported from Cuddapah, where the Rev. W. H. Campbell, B.D., has for some time been labouring single-handed. There are signs of spiritual movement among the Sudra farmers. A number have already come forward and received baptism. "In one village, Upalapad, where there has been a Mala congregation for many years, almost the whole Sudra population seems impressed. In February last, two old men—leading men in the village—received baptism. In June, two more received baptism; one of them a Brahmagnani, or spiritual teacher, who had a considerable number of disciples in his own neighbouring villages. A few weeks later the village magistrate followed their example. When we visited the village a few weeks ago the people came in crowds to hear us. From morning to night they kept coming to our tent to inquire about the way of salvation. One young man received baptism in his own village, and with him a Brahmagnani from a village ten miles distant. You would be greatly pleased with these new converts. They are men of good position, educated and intelligent. Almost all of them, before they became Christians, held the Brahmagnani creed, a kind of mystical theism which tends to pass into Pantheism." Later letters report other encouraging facts, but there is a cry for teachers.

We get a glimpse of the manner in which song has been pressed into missionary service, in an account of a large jatra held in Belgaum. It was in honour of the goddess Lakshmi, and should be held once every twelve years, though in this instance fourteen had been allowed to elapse.

Large numbers of people came from long distances, and remained for about a fortnight, taking part in the religious ceremonies which occupy the first week—when a number of buffaloes, and hundreds of sheep, goats and fowls are sacrificed—and in the festivities and amusements of the second. Several missionary parties combined to utilise the occasion. From Satara came a band of singers who, to attract the people to their message, clothed it in services of song, called in India Kirtans. The airs were native, and sung to the accompaniment of finger drum, cymbals, and a rude kind of guitar. In the intervals between the musical portions the leader took what had just been sung as his text, and explained and enforced it for about five or ten minutes. Much evangelistic work was done in this way by the party, consisting of four, travelling about together. They drew large crowds.

ANOTHER detachment of missionary volunteers from different islands of the Pacific has arrived in New Guinea. The party this time consisted of nine young men and their wives. "We have visited from one end of the Mission to the other," says the Rev. W. G. Lawes, "and the most impressive thing I saw was the extent of land yet to be possessed. Everywhere teachers were wanted, and would be well received, but we have none to give them. It makes me sick to come home from these fields, ready for the plough and the seed, and read the reports of the English missionary meetings." "At Motumotu, a new station in the Elema district, begun only two years ago, the teacher Tauraki is a most energetic, intelligent young man, and has got a wonderful hold on the boys and girls of the village. He wanted a church built, and the chiefs and men assented; they talked about it, chewed betel nut, and smoked over it, but were not in a hurry to do anything else. Tauraki got sixteen young boys, and they went to work with a will, eight boys to each side; and in three Sundays it was finished. Then he got two fat pigs and gave them a feast, to which all the talking, betel-chewing aristocracy came, and thought they were going to have a share; but Tauraki kept watch over his lambs until they had had enough, and then let the hungry wolves in for the leavings. It was a grand success. The average attendance at the day-school was fifty-two."

A PROJECT for the reunion of the various sections of Methodism has been brought under discussion. "The recent unification of Presbyterians in England and Methodists in Ireland," writes the Rev. Alexander McAulay, "reasonably suggests the question—Cannot some of the Methodist Connexions in Great Britain be joined together? These connexions are of two classes—those formed by splits from the parent tree and those that grow from its seed. Among the former are the Methodist New Connexion, and the United Methodist Free Churches, and among the latter are the Primitive Methodists and the Bible Christians. The splits occurred during controversies on points on which there is now a near approach to an agreement on the principles involved. The seeds grew amid revivals, under an infinitesimal amount of collision with the parent body." It is suggested that the first step might be a reunion between the Methodist New Connexion and the older body. Many leading men have expressed an opinion favourable to the movement, but no official action can yet be taken.

IN an address at the opening of the Regent's Park Baptist College, Mr. S. R. Pattison warned the students against the supposition that the doctrine of evolution was universally accepted by scientific men. The botanist had found no unit in his department of study; for the most rudimentary plant has its parts. The leaves taken out of the funeral vestments of Rameses II., the contemporary of Joseph, were precisely the same as those now growing on the banks of the Nile; and the clover found under the ld glaciers was identical with that of the present day. The geologists, led by Sir William Dawson, find that although there has been throughout the ages an unfolding of a Divine plan, this has been step by step, and not by an inclined plane—every step a separate creation. The physicists know nothing of evolution; they find force and matter, but they know of no atom which is not a manufactured article. The chemist opines that the so-called "elements" are compound bodies. The metaphysicians reject evolution in ethics. The Scripturist finds nothing akin to natural forces able to account for the revelation of God in His word—which gives a light to every age—"gives, but borrows none."

DR. WELLDON, now the Head Master of Harrow, preaching in Westminster Abbey on behalf of the Bishop of Bedford's East London Fund, said the church did not so much need organisation as a larger living agency of men and women. Amongst other requirements was a lower order of preachers, for no messenger to a working man was so potent as one of his own order, as every religious revival from Methodism to the Salvation Army had shown. The church did not know what might be effected by the labours of illiterate men ready to be hissed and persecuted for the truth they believed.

THE Church Army has opened buildings in the Edgware-road for the use and training of its officers. There is accommodation for more than thirty men. The course of training occupies three months, at the end of which those who are duly qualified become "officer-evangelists." There are now nineteen men in the Home, who receive lessons every day in the Bible and Prayer-Book and in practical work. This is at present the only mission college in connection with the Church of England for training working men to preach the gospel. The Bishop of London presided at the dedicatory service.

THE Salvation Army has despatched forty-six additional "officers"—men and women—to fields abroad, in India, the United States, Canada and Sweden. An enthusiastic farewell meeting was held at Exeter Hall. Mrs. Booth said these forty-six were taken from the masses, were sent to the masses, and were chiefly equipped by the Holy Ghost.

THE Society of Friends in Great Britain numbered 15,380 members in 1885. The membership touched its lowest point in 1864, and since that time a slight annual increase has, with three exceptions, been recorded. The numbers in 1885 show an increase of 1,625 in a period of 21 years, equal to 77 per year. The excess of females over males was at the beginning of the period 912, and at the end 716.

ANOTHER attempt has been made to take a census of the attendance at the churches and chapels of London. On Sunday, October 24, about 460,000 out of its vast population were present in the morning, and about 410,000 in the evening.

THE Rev. G. S. Reaney, of Stepney, suggests, with a slightly satiric touch, that while conferences are being held to discuss such questions as Evangelical preaching, it would be quite as valuable if we could arrive at some true conception of the Evangelical practice of the churches. "Might we not have a kind of spiritual census of the hearers? The form of question might be in this wise:—(1.) What are your habits of private devotion? How and when? (2.) What are your methods of Bible study? How and when? (3.) In what Christian work are you engaged? How and when? (4.) What are your ways of giving? How and when? These questions, if fairly and fully answered, would enable many people to adopt wise and practical ways of Evangelical living. The 'how and the when' are most important, because it must be somewhat difficult for 'City men' to find the time for such methods of life as are highly spiritual."

THE Young Women's Christian Association has taken possession of the new buildings in Regent Street designed to be its headquarters. The site was purchased a few months ago through the liberality of the late Mr. Samuel Morley. They include a handsome lecture-hall, one or two smaller halls, class rooms, a library, an office for the assistance of necessitous foreigners, and other apartments.

JOHN BUNYAN has found voice in one more language, making the eighty-first into which the "Pilgrim's Progress" has been translated. The Religious Tract Society has just received copies produced at its cost in Japanese. The illustrations are done by a native artist and are of remarkable interest, as showing how well the artist has caught the spirit of the various characters and scenes in the immortal allegory. The Society is also contributing towards the cost of an edition in the Fanti tongue spoken on the West Coast of Africa.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

BY EVELYN EVERETT GREEN.

CHAPTER VI.—DAY DREAMS.

A REVERIE.

"I THINK you will find Juliet in the garden, my dear," said Mrs. Granby. "She is often there with her books now that the weather has turned so much warmer."

Reinée Dumaresq was standing before the old lady, looking down at her with her peculiarly sweet smile.

"Mrs. Granby," she said, with the winning frankness that was one of her most engaging traits, "I sometimes wonder why it is you always look so very happy. I think you are the happiest person I know."

The old lady smiled a little, in that peculiar inward fashion not uncommon in old people, and said: "I am happy, my dear. I have had my troubles in my time; but the clouds have all rolled away now."

Reinée looked dreamily out of the window.

"I think you must have a secret for making them roll away."

"Perhaps I have."

"I wish you would tell it to me."

Mrs. Granby looked up into the thoughtful face above her, with its soft curves and steady dark eyes, and wondered if there were any clouds hanging over this young life that seemed so sheltered and cared for.

"Some secrets can only be learned by experience, my dear," answered the old lady, smiling a little to herself. "If you wish to learn the secret of happiness, you must learn that of contentment first."

Reinée made no reply at once, but after a thoughtful pause, she said slowly: "There is so much to learn in life;" and then she moved quietly across the room and went to look for Juliet in the garden.

She had not to seek far. Juliet was in her favourite sheltered arbour overlooking the sea. She had books beside her, but she was not reading, being lost in a reverie from which she did not awake until Reinée actually spoke, turning the books over as she did so.

"Ruskin, Browning, Carlyle. I always feel a sad dunce when I come to see you, Juliet. I have had so little time for study since I left the schoolroom, and I am afraid I did not learn much there."

"Ah," answered Juliet, drawing a long breath, "if only I had not had time!"

"What do you mean, Juliet?"

"Mean? I mean that I have never known any world but the world of books; never lived any real life, save in the pages of history or romance. Whilst you have been seeing real life and mixing in the stirring turmoil, I have been stifling in the heavy atmosphere of this stagnant little place, where people do not live but vegetate. Ah, you do not know what it is like, year after year! You have lived in the world—you are to be envied!"

Reinée was growing used to Juliet's impetuosity, and knew something of her views of life by this time.

"I am not sure that living in the world, as you call it, is so very different from your life. We have our own circle of friends—rather larger, of course, in London than here—but sometimes I think people are very much alike everywhere."

But Juliet shook her head impatiently.

"You don't understand—of course, you don't! How could you? What would not I give for one year of the life you have always led!"

Reinée laughed softly.

"I wish I could give it you. I did not care for it so very much. I feel quite pleased to think we are settled down now to be quiet and enjoy our own home life. I mean to be very rustic and Arcadian."

Juliet looked at her in surprise, not unmingled with a faint dissatisfaction.

"I cannot understand how you can talk so—how you can be content to give it all up so quietly. I often feel as if this little place would choke me, though I have never known anything else. But for you who have really tasted life to give up all so calmly—it passes my comprehension. Have you no dreams, no aspirations?"

Reinée's face grew intent and thoughtful now.

"Yes, I think I have. But what has that to do with the question?"

"Why, everything! One can do nothing here but dream. There is no realising of one's ideals."

Reinée smiled a little.

"I think mine will be more easily realised here than in the places I have been more used to."

Juliet looked at her curiously.

"I can't understand that. There seems to me nothing to be done here. I wish you would tell me what you mean, Reinée."

Reinée's eyes had grown dreamy again as they had done when she was talking to Mrs. Granby just before. A slight smile parted her lips and her face looked very sweet in its bright, trustful thoughtfulness.

"It is so difficult to put things into words, Juliet. I do not think I shall ever make you understand; but I have a great many thoughts and feelings of my own. I have always seemed to live before in a hurry and whirl, with no time to think, or to study, or to try to live my life more in earnest. I have no sister, and my mother always wished to take me everywhere with her, and it seemed my duty to put aside everything else to do as she wished."

"Ah," said Juliet with a sigh, "how I should have loved such a life!"

"Perhaps you would have grown a little tired of it," said Reinée quietly, "as I did."

Juliet shook her head.

"No, I am sure I never should have done that: but you have not told me about your ideal yet."

"It is so hard to say it in words," answered Reinée simply. "I think it is that I want to be good."

Juliet stared and then laughed a little.

"Do you think it is easier to be good in the country than in London."

"It seems so to me," answered Reinée in the same simple way. "At least one has much more time to think and much fewer temptations. I have always wanted to do something for other people—something to make unhappy lives happier and rough paths more smooth. In London I never could do anything like that; nothing personal, I mean: only giving away money when I was asked—mamma would not have liked me to do more, and in a great city things seem so big and one feels helpless. But here it is different. There are not so many people; I feel as if I could make friends with them and make them happy. I should like to visit them in their homes, and take them little things that I had made myself; I should like to talk to the little children and make them love me. Perhaps I might have a Sunday school class, or a little class of my own at home. I should like the people to tell me of their troubles, and try to help them when I could. I should like them to feel that they had a friend to come to when they wanted help. I should like to make myself good first and try to help them to be good afterwards."

Reinée spoke with all the frank simplicity of her nature. Juliet listened in some wonder. She could not have spoken out so clearly and composedly. She would have felt ashamed of such homely and rustic ambitions.

"Well," she answered at length, summing up the case with a readiness for which Reinée was not quite prepared, "your ideal seems to be to play at Arcadia, and make a model Lady Bountiful for a model village. I suppose everybody fresh from London thinks the country all romance and the people all delightful."

Reinée coloured a little, but she was not vexed. It was very much what her mother had said before. In her heart the girl knew that she had deeper thoughts and purposes; but she could not make them clear to another.

"You think me very romantic and foolish I suppose?"

"No, only ignorant. You fancy that poor people here are quite different from those in town, less dirty, less wicked, less miserable. You think that you can do good here that you could not there, that it will all be easy and pleasant; but you will not find it so really. Things will be just as disagreeable and discouraging here as there, and after a brief experience of country cottages you will retire gracefully from the field as others have done before you."

Reinée looked rather downcast.

"Does nobody go amongst them then?"

"Oh, yes, the clergy, the doctors, of course. Barbara Meynal has just begun some sort of sick visiting."

"Barbara Meynal—yes; she was telling me about it. I should like to help her, if my mother will consent. I have told her so."

"Yes, she is helping her brother Wulfric. She has been at it about three weeks now and seems to find it all very delightful; but Barbara always was impulsive; she will most likely grow tired by and by. As for you—I am certain you will tire of it directly, if you begin."

"Why?"

"Oh you know people always do. There is something so miserably wearisome in the daily round of a little place like this."

Reinée did not look as if she quite understood the logic of this, but all she said was: "Tell me about your ideals, Juliet, now that I have told you of mine."

"Mine?" responded Juliet half bitterly, "ah it is waste of breath to talk of mine—hemmed in as I am in this narrow little place. I want to go out into the great whirl of life that lies beyond; to feel myself drawn into the vortex, to do and dare great things for the struggling humanity there. I feel I could do something—it may sound vain to say it, but I feel that I could if I only had the chance, but doomed to this quiet monotonous life I can do nothing—nothing."

"Except take care of your old grandmother," answered Reinée with a grave smile.

"She does not need any care of mine," answered Juliet with some vehemence. "She is well and strong and active; her life is full of little interests that give her all she seems to need. Her dairy, her fowls, her garden and household suffice her, and she does not really need me, although she has given me a home ever since I was left an orphan at six years old. She is good and kind in her own way, but she does not understand me and she never will. She forgets that she is old whilst I am young, and that what is enough for her energies is miserable inactivity for me. She smiles when I try to talk to her, and I know that she thinks me an idle dreamer, quite ignorant of what I speak about. But if I could only get away and find a larger sphere of action I would soon show her what I could do. I know it is not all mere boasting. If I could but get to London, what could I not do?"

Reinée looked thoughtful and made no reply. She was wondering if Juliet knew at all what she was speaking of.

"If I were rich and beautiful like you," pursued the other, still excited and restless, "I might realise my ideal still. Possibly I might marry and free myself in that way." She paused and looked at her companion, and then added more slowly, "I almost wonder that you have not married, Reinée. Do you mind my asking if you are engaged?"

Reinée's colour had risen a little, but she answered quietly and steadily, "No, I am not engaged."

Something in her manner aroused Juliet's curiosity.

"I suppose it would be very impertinent to ask if you cared much for anybody?"

Reinée smiled frankly and sweetly.

"Perhaps it would, if I did; but I do not care for anybody in the way you mean. My brother Clive has always stood first with me, and sometimes I think he always will."

"You have a brother, then?"

"Oh, yes, my dear boy, Clive. He is three years older than I am, and I love him with all my heart. He has been yachting; but is coming home very soon now. I shall be so glad to see him!"

Reinée's whole face beamed as she spoke. Her brother was evidently very dear to her.

Juliet would have asked more about him, but at this moment Mrs. Granby appeared making her way towards them, and a maid followed with a tray laden with strawberries and cream.

"Mrs. Granby," said Reinée when they had all seated themselves again and the maid had withdrawn, "Juliet and I have been telling each other our day dreams and ideals of life. We don't think at all alike, and one thing seems to me to be funny. Juliet, who has always lived here, thinks and feels that she could do more and make more of her life if only she could go to London; and I, who have spent much of my time there, feel as if the country were the place where I could do the most to realise my ideals of usefulness. Why is it that we feel so differently? Can you guess? I am sure you are very wise and understand things much better than we do."

Juliet was rather taken aback by hearing Reinée propound her questions so simply. She was not fond of confiding in her grandmother; but she could not help herself now. Mrs. Granby smiled kindly at the two girls.

"My dears," she said in her wise and gentle fashion, "it is a way we all have in our lives of thinking we could better ourselves and do more good by breaking away from old ties and striking out a new line for ourselves. What we know by daily experience looks tame and wearisome to us, and imagination paints the unknown in glowing colours; but experience teaches us that the colours fade on approach, and the old difficulties we hoped to escape beset us at every turn. God has sent us each into the world with our appointed work to do, and if we leave matters in His hands and look to Him for grace and guidance, He will show us the way to do it. It may be He will make our duty plain to change the outward tenor of our lives, or it may be that we shall live and die in the same state in which we were originally placed; but let us leave all that to Him, and let us look about us with wide open eyes for the duties He has laid ready in our daily path. Let our prayer always be, 'Lord, show me what Thou wouldst have me to do, and help me to do it to Thy glory.' If we say that from our hearts, not once nor twice, but every day of our lives, we may be quite sure we shall not ask in vain, and wherever we are—in a peaceful country village or in the whirl of London life, work will never be wanting us, and our Heavenly Father will help us to do it. That is the ideal that I would have each young girl aspire to. It sounds homely: perhaps it sounds both visionary and tame; but try the prescription and see how it answers."

Reinée's face wore a very softened look. She glanced at the old lady, and it seemed as if something like a tear sparkled in her eyes. What had been said appealed to the devotional element of her nature, which was very strong, and she almost wished Juliet had not been present, for her dark face checked any possibility of confidential talk.

"I should like to feel like that," she said softly; "but I am afraid I am very ignorant. I hardly know how to begin to try to be good. It is so much easier to dream than to plan and to do."

Mrs. Granby smiled quietly, and quoted Kingsley's lines—

> "Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever,
> Do noble deeds, not dream them all day long;
> So, making life, death, and that vast forever
> One grand, sweet song."

"I should like to do that," said Reinée.

"Those who wish to do so generally can find the way," was the quiet answer.

But Juliet's face was hard and rather scornful. She had heard counsel like this before, and it was to her as idle words, without any real meaning. It was all very well to talk, but nothing could be done on such lines as these. She had been convinced of this by practical experience, as she told herself, again and again.

Reinée, however, thought rather differently. She was moved and struck by what Mrs. Granby had said, and went home with a more deeply-rooted purpose than before of trying to turn to account her bright young life for the benefit of others as well as for her own enjoyment. That night she spoke again to her mother about her former request, and received a half mocking, half serious assent to her petition.

"Well, well, my love, I see no valid reason against your doing a little, if you have set your mind upon it; but you must be careful where you go, and I do not think you will care for it long. Clive will soon be home, and I quite expect he will bring Arthur with him, and then you will not have much time for your charitable works. You will be better occupied."

Reinée's fair face flushed a little.

"Clive never interferes with my pleasures. He is more likely to help than to hinder."

Mrs. Dumaresq laughed lightly.

"Possibly, my love. But what about Arthur?"

The flush on Reinée's face deepened, but eyes and voice did not falter.

"Arthur has nothing to do with it," she answered quietly and steadily.

Mrs. Dumaresq laughed again, and Reinée was silent for a few minutes, trying to command herself before she trusted herself to continue the conversation.

THE HYMN-WRITERS OF WALES AND THEIR HYMNS.

WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

WHAT Paul Gerhardt has been to Germany, what Isaac Watts has been to England, that and more has William Williams of Pantycelyn been to the little principality of Wales. His hymns have both stirred and soothed a whole nation for more than a hundred years: they have helped to fashion a nation's character and to deepen a nation's piety. They have been sung by the shepherd on the moor and on the mountain, in the midst of romantic solitudes; or by the smith to the accompaniment of his ringing anvil; or by the miner in the weird halls of buried forests underneath the ground; or by the milkmaid, with a fresh clear voice, as she brushed from the clover the dewdrops of an early morning in May; or by the reaper in the harvest-field as he gathered in the golden grain. The mother hums one of his tender musings above the cradle of her child, surrounding its soft-winged slumbers with the praises of Him whose "very name is music." The funeral procession takes up one of his strains of sorrow touched with hope, and sings it in accompanying the dead to the long home—sings it musingly, measuredly, moaningly. The young man in the day of trial will take some smooth stones out of this book of Christian poetry, and with them overcome the enemy. The veteran soldier of God thirsts for the water out of this "well of Bethlehem," and "pours it out before the Lord." Through some memorial verse of his the family of the Lord Christ has often expressed its sweet sorrowfulness of heart as it looked on the breaking of the bread. Many a time has the sad Angel of Death heard one of his victorious strains fall from some trusting soul as it passed through the dark gateway—heard the echo of the song far down in the Valley of the Shadow: a strange thing of joy: like a warm sunbeam piercing through the chill eternal twilight of some ancient forest of pine. It was a verse of his that Christmas Evans—one of the immortal "three" of the Welsh pulpit—sang when nearing home; taking it as a staff in his hand, "and smiting Jordan with it so that the waters were divided hither and thither, and he went over on dry ground":—

O Thou Righteousness eternal!
  Righteousness of boundless store!
Soon my naked, hungry spirit
  Must enjoy Thee evermore:
Hide my nakedness, Oh! hide it,
  With Thy robe of shining white;
So that, fearless, I may ever
  Stand before Thy throne of light.

Like all poets that have deeply stirred a people, he was brought up in troublous times. His father was the deacon of a famous Independent church in Carmarthenshire, which had to meet for a time in a cave during the hours of twilight on account of the persecution to which a large number of the sincerest Christians of the age was subjected. But when the poet was very young he lost his father and was left to the care of his mother. He spent some years at college, purposing to devote himself to the medical profession. It was on his way home from college that an incident happened which changed his whole career. He was passing through the little village of Talgarth, in Breconshire, on a Sunday morning when he was attracted by the sound of a bell to enter the parish church. The service was cold and spiritless, and left scarcely any impression whatever on the young man's mind. The people on leaving church, instead of scattering and wending their way home, grouped themselves together in the churchyard, and every face was alive with expectation, as though eagerly waiting for something more. And more did come. It affords a striking picture of the religious life of Wales near the middle of the eighteenth century. On one of the gravestones a man of short stature, and exceedingly sombre face, takes his stand. In a moment every eye is fastened upon him in a solemn, nervous suspense. Then the voice begins to ring deep and clear and earnest among the grey tombstones—like the voice of some ancient prophet of Israel summoning the people with words of fire to repent forthwith and escape for their life. The congregation is stirred, startled, confounded: it moves to and fro, "as the trees of the wood are moved by the wind." Strong men are there, weeping like little children, terrible to see: while others in their rage against the preacher curse like a demoniac at the approach of the Lord Christ. Here a woman falls fainting: another cries out through a storm of sobs and tears, "What must we do?" And the young poet? "There he is, his face deathly pale, and his whole body shaken with excitement and terror. He is a very image of fearfulness. He stands each moment expecting to see the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven: a sharp, glowing arrow from the bow of the doctrine of the man on the gravestone, has pierced through his heart." He came out of that historic churchyard with the light of eternity in his eyes.

Two or three years afterwards he was ordained deacon of the Church of England. But in those days the Church of England was her own unrelenting enemy in Wales. Like many another of her servants of best worth, he was excommunicated on an indictment of committing twenty-four crimes—chief among them being his refusal to make the sign of the cross in baptism, and his zeal in preaching the gospel outside of places properly consecrated. He had come under the influence of Whitfield, who urged him to go forth to the highways to proclaim the glad tidings. And preach he did from Holyhead to Cardiff, having travelled on an average 3,000 miles every year for fifty years.

Williams first exercised his gift of sacred song at an association held in the earliest days of Welsh Calvinistic Methodism. The hymns hitherto used were foreign to the spirit of the new movement; but as soon as he began to pour forth his varied strains of passionate sweetness, Howell Harries, the preacher of Talgarth churchyard, pronounced him a master of song. His hymns seemed to fly abroad as on the wings of the wind, and soon became the sacred ballads of the whole nation. As Luther sang Germany into Protestantism, so did Williams sing the Wales of the eighteenth century into piety.

A general feature of Welsh hymns is their picturesqueness. Almost every verse is a transcript from nature—spiritualised and illuminated. We walk in a song-land of rocks and mountains, of valleys and running brooks; of beautiful dawns struggling into day on mist-covered hills, and calm sunsets of gold breathing peace on land and sea after a storm of thunder and lightning and rain; of long winter nights with every song hushed under the starless skies, and happy spring mornings when every leaf is a murmur of resurrection.

The hymns of "Pantycelyn" are full of these pictures. Once, during a long season of drought, he was walking through the fields and found some little beasts of prey making busy mischief among the green corn; whereon he pertinently asks—

Why should beasts of prey be suffered
To destroy the tender blade?
Why should sweet and youthful blossoms
In the drought be left to fade?
Bring the pleasant showers refreshing
That the grain may flourish soon;
Bring a shower the early morning,
Bring one more the afternoon.

Jesus, turn the living rivers
O'er the dry and rocky land;
So make beautiful the cornfields
With the blessings of Thy hand;
From the cool and crystal fountain
Give to him who fainting lies;
Who has toiled without a shelter
All the day 'neath burning skies.

On another occasion he was staying for the night not far from the Prescelly hills. Being up early next morning, he saw the whole range lying dark and frowning under the mist; but in the east the dawn was breaking up the shadows of night, and the sky was brightening with the promise of a new day—a picture which he has introduced into his well-known missionary hymn—

O'er the gloomy hills of darkness.

He suffered sometimes from absent-mindedness, as the following tradition indicates. He was one day far away from home holding a service beside the sea-shore. A friend had taken the devotional portion of the service, when, as he drew near the close of his prayer, a cuckoo began to sing. Williams stood up to give out a hymn before preaching: it was an appeal to the cuckoo to fly away to Pantycelyn and tell "Mally" his wife that he was alive; to proceed from thence to Builth and tell "Jack" his son to "keep his place"; concluding with the pious wish that should they fail to meet again on earth, they might meet in heaven. His friend touched him and hinted that the doctrine of salvation was rather scanty in his verse. "Very true," replied the poet at once; and, without any more ado, gave out another verse, which seems to carry in it everywhere the sound of the everlasting sea—the music of an infinite hope for man:

Salvation like a boundless sea
Keeps swelling on the shore;
Here shall the weak and helpless find Enough for evermore.

In another hymn we seem to be gazing on the sunset sky of a peaceful summer evening; and the heavenly quiet of the scene awakens in the soul infinite longings that are sad in their very sweetness:

I look beyond the far-off hills,
O gentle Christ for Thee:
Come, my Beloved, it is late,
The sun goes down for me.

These captive weeks of Babylon
Make sorrow long delay:
Oh! that I heard the jubilee
Opening the gates of day.

If from these fetters hard and cold
My feet were only free,
Long as I lived I would but sing
The grace of Calvary.

A pilgrim in a desert land
I wander far and near,
Expecting every hour to find
My Father's house appear.

Williams possessed to a considerable extent the Shaksperean faculty of seeing many aspects of human nature, especially on its religious side. His hymns give expression to every grade of experience from the lowest deep of despair to the clearest height of full assurance. It is himself speaking; but in his voice we hear the sobs and cries, the joys and transports of a thousand hearts. Now he is the publican in the temple "standing afar off," bearing the name of sinner—"I have no better name:" it is mercy he seeks, it is mercy he must seek again, knowing that to fail was death. Then he gives us a view of his early struggles and defeats: how seven times back and fore he broke the commandments of God, and attempted to confirm his deliverance with "seven great vows:" but all in vain, until he saw from the depths the Face that is "altogether lovely," and driven by a flame of guilt he came to the pleasant hill of Zion: he had found heaven in the brink of hell, in the thunders of Sinai he had his first meeting with God—hours never to be forgotten, the hours of his marriage with Heaven. But though the violence of the early conflict is smoothed down, he has not yet come to the possession of perfect peace:

Oh! to hear the silver trumpet
Now proclaim my full release,
That my soul so heavy-laden
May at last have joy and peace.

In another hymn we see him a solitary wanderer on the high and dangerous mountain foot-path; the path is very narrow, and underneath him is a fearful depth. What if he miss his footing!

In Thy hand I cannot fall,
Though the weakest of them all;
In Thy hand at length I come
From my trials safely home.

What a burst of triumphant faith we have in this martial strain:—

The standard is ahead,
The gospel of His grace;
And hell is filled with dread,
And shakes before His face:
Down! down! with shame it shall be brought,
Before my Jesus it is nought.

Great hosts from prisons free
Already have marched on,
And great their joy must be
To know the day is won:
From strife and toil on high they fled,
And in their footsteps we must tread.

Leave we the world behind,
The world that made us smart,
The world of evil mind
Each day to break our heart:
Between the stars we see the light
Of that far better world grow bright.

The blood of Jesu's cross
Was never shed in vain;
There is not any loss
Of His most precious pain:
This is the great, the finished plan
To open heaven's door for man.

Let all bow down and own
The sacrificèd Lamb!
Among all titles known
His is the greatest name:
Praise, laud, and blessing to our Lord,
Let Him be evermore adored!

Side by side with this call of Christian soldiers to battle we may place a hymn to the Lord of Battles, the Captain of the Christian host.

Ride to battle, ride victorious,
Gird, O Christ, Thy glittering sword;
Earth can never stand before Thee,
Nor can hell itself, my Lord:
In Thy name such glory dwelleth,
Hostile armies faint with fear;
And the wide creation trembleth
When it knows Thee coming near.

The Christ of the glittering sword and the glorious terror—can He speak to the broken heart and bring glad tidings to the frightened conscience? Yes, verily:—

Speak, O Christ! the gentle-hearted,
For Thy words are God's best wine;
All within me peace creating,
Peace of endless worth divine;
All the voices of creation,
Every passion and delight,
At Thy voice of quiet sweetness,
Pass away in hushed affright.

This world's empty noises vanish
When Thou speakest but a word;
And the tumult is dispersèd,
By opposing passions stirred;
Though the afternoon was stormy,
Cloudless is the evening sky,
And the south wind bloweth softly,
When Thou speakest peace on high.

His hymns are filled with Christ; every verse seems fresh from under "the sprinkling of the blood." He had expected to find Him among the great men of the earth; but he first saw the pale heavenly face among murderers and thieves; not in a king's palace, but on a cross: and there was no need to climb to heaven—heaven was on the tree; heaven bent down in pitifulness toward the earth when He bowed His head to die: and—

I the guilty
Go for pardon to the cross.

Oh! that my dear Lord's afflictions
In my heart had room to dwell;
Every wound and every anguish,
Every lash on Him that fell:
Till the evil
Lost its hold and went away.

This passionateness of devotion reaches its most striking expression in a prayer which seems to breathe the sunny air of an early morning in June:

To Thee, my God, my Saviour,
Praise be for ever new;
Let people come to praise Thee
In numbers like the dew;
Oh! that in every meadow
The grass were harps of gold,
To sing to Him for coming
To ransom hosts untold!

H. ELVET LEWIS.

ONE SOWETH AND ANOTHER REAPETH.

GLIMPSES OF EVANGELICAL WORK IN SPAIN.

I WOULD bring my readers to warmer climes and different faces. I would ask them to follow me through the narrow streets of Seville, warm with the heat of advancing spring, past the grand old cathedral, and the glittering towers of the Giralda until they reach the orange groves bordering the banks of the Guadalquiver, where orange blossoms strew the ground, and the fragrant scent of these lovely flowers perfumes the air.

It is a calm, pleasant evening; a soft breeze has sprung up after the day's heat; and gradually the seats under the trees begin to be filled with working-people chiefly, for the élite of society have not yet emerged from their homes.

On a bench under one of the trees sits a man deep in thought; he might be some thirty years of age; a troubled expression is on his face, and the high thoughtful brow is wrinkled with care. He was just then trying to solve the great problem that comes to all in a lifetime, that of the soul's salvation. How to be saved! "What is truth?" Don Federico is thinking. "I left the Church of Rome because it was not to be found there, but where am I to find it? I have read the Bible, and though I believe in it with my head, my heart is untouched. Yet it has been compared to a 'two-edged sword.' It has not proved so to me. I attend the evangelical services. I hear good things; my reason is convinced, and yet I cannot find peace, and now I long for it, God knows." Don Federico's thoughts ran somewhat in this line. He had been a friar for years, but thoroughly convinced of the errors of the church of his fathers, he had left it in search of something more real and comforting which as yet he had failed to find.

That same evening, in one of the evangelical churches in Seville, the usual weekly service was to be held; a large concourse of people had gathered, for a preacher whose fame was well known was passing through and was to preach there.

Señor Lopez, for so we shall call him, had not arrived yet, and already the hour of service was near. Some brother ministers were awaiting his arrival in the vestry, where prayer was usually made before service for a blessing on the word. The people, ever demonstrative, were showing signs of impatience. Suddenly the long looked for one arrived, breathless. Seizing a brother minister by the arm he exclaimed, "I have forgotten the sermon I intended to preach, and I have no time to prepare another, and yet," he added, "perhaps it is all for the best, for there is another verse ringing in my ears so persistently that even if I had my sermon I don't believe I could preach it, for this verse has fixed itself on my mind. I can't remember where the passage is, however."

"What text is it?" asked his friend, who, having known the Scriptures from a child, had a more perfect knowledge of the Bible.

"To whom should we go but unto Thee? Thou hast the words of eternal life," answered the preacher.

His friend quickly turned to St. John's gospel, and having found the verse, handed him the Bible. Señor Lopez took the book with many thanks, and eagerly asked to be left alone.

That evening the little assembly was electrified by the words of power that fell from the preacher's lips. It seemed as though the Spirit of God had touched them with the live hot coal. He showed the way of salvation in a striking way. "To whom should we go?" he said, "to the Virgin, to St. Peter? Can they help us? Have any of you ever been helped by them? Can they give you peace? No, Christ alone. It is to Him alone we are to go. He gives salvation freely, without money and without price. No penance is needed, no self-laceration such as you often subject yourselves to, thinking that by so doing you may win salvation. Christ gives it freely. He was wounded and tortured for us. He bore our sins; the weight of them broke His heart. Oh, my friends, He only can help; He only can save. To whom should we go but to Him? And He will give us life!" Much more he said in his own earnest loving way—the power and earnestness of which we can only faintly give an idea of.

To one restless, sin-tossed, pardon-seeking sinner, conviction and peace came. It was the message he needed; and, down Don Federico's careworn face the tears were streaming—tears of joy, as he drank in the message, and learnt that Christ is not "very far" from any seeking one. His eyes never left the preacher's face; it was wonderful to see the changes that flitted over the speaking countenance as he followed those words of fire. At last it was too much for him, and, broken down by the strange conviction breaking on his poor tired soul, he bowed his head on his hands and wept. Before the preacher had descended the pulpit stairs, Don Federico had rushed to him, and throwing his arms round him, exclaimed, "Oh I have found it at last. God gave you that message for me! Oh, thank God!" It was a moment never to be forgotten, and sobs were audible all over the church. The brother minister who had found the text declares he can never to his dying day forget that scene. And what must have been the feelings of the preacher, whose happy tears told of the greatest joy that mortal man can know, joy more like that the angels feel, that of winning a soul to Christ! Señor Lopez's work on earth is now done. He lies under the waves of the broad Atlantic,—for he perished in the "Ville de Havre," with many others who were returning from a Christian conference in America,—but his memory lives in the hearts of many, and very especially in that of Don Federico. The latter is now also a "winner of souls." For many years he has been an earnest and tried worker, testifying to all around him that he is truly a servant of Christ.

An earnest missionary working in the south of Spain had for many years been labouring without apparent result. One night he was sitting in his study feeling very low and discouraged. He was saying to his wife: "After all the years I have worked here there seems so little fruit. I read of wonderful conversions: I have none. Many in our congregation profess Christianity, but have I really won one soul for Christ?"

While he was speaking a knock came to the door, and a messenger entered to summon him to the deathbed of a member of his church suddenly taken ill, who for years had been a professing Christian, but apparently a lifeless one; cold and reserved, little given to speaking, a thing most uncommon with Spaniards.

As the missionary entered, the dying man held out his hand, and with a happy smile, and rapidly failing voice, said: "I want to thank you for your faithful ministry. I owe my salvation to your message; my trust is in my Saviour and has been all these years, and I wish my children to follow in my steps." He died shortly afterwards in great peace. The good pastor said that he could never forget that night and God's faithfulness to him, and whenever he felt depressed and discouraged he brought it to mind.

Shortly afterwards he had still further cause for thankfulness and rejoicing.

At the time of the late earthquake, he told his congregation that he hoped they would be able to contribute something towards helping their suffering brethren; he did not expect much, for his hearers were all poor—but one of the first things missionaries try to teach is the privilege of giving to the Lord—and this is a thing little understood by these infant churches.

On the Saturday evening following, a poor water-carrier came to his door asking to see him, and put two shillings into his hand. The pastor, knowing how poor a calling an "aguador's" is, marvelled at so large a sum, and asked how he had managed to give so much. "Those are my earnings of to-day," answered the poor man. "I intended giving my Saturday's earnings to you, but when I saw the rain pouring down, I thought, no one will want water to-day, but I prayed hard to God about it, and He answered my prayer, and opened ever so many doors to me. I have never done a better day's work."

THE GATE OF THE COURT OF ORANGES, SEVILLE CATHEDRAL.

And here we should say that all the houses are almost entirely dependent on water from the "aguador" or water-carrier, as the wells with which every house is furnished are brackish, and the water not fit for drinking purposes; but when it rains, the Spaniards, who economise much in this respect, fill tubs and barrels with the rain water, and the water-carrier is therefore on those occasions not in requisition.

One evening the pastor of a neighbouring town was called suddenly to see a member of his church who was dying. On the Sunday previously (only forty-eight hours before) the now dying man had attended the services, and partaken of the communion, and now it seemed as if he was about to partake of it in the real sense, in the "Father's kingdom." He had long known in whom he had believed. As the pastor entered, he saw the dying man lying unconscious. A numerous concourse of people had gathered round the sufferer, as is the custom in Spain, and the good pastor was determined not to lose such an opportunity of speaking to his countrymen of his Master. He took up the sick man's Bible, which lay on the table, and read a passage here and there, explaining as he went. As he began to read a woman rose up in a hurry, saying she must hasten back to her ironing, she had left her irons in the fire. "Wait but a few minutes," said the pastor; "I should like you to hear this; I won't keep you long." He read and explained briefly, but in a simple winning way that arrested the attention of those assembled, to whom God's word was a name only. "Your irons will be cold," whispered a neighbour to the woman who had been so eager to return to her ironing. "Never mind," she said; "the fire will be out now, and one doesn't often hear words like these." Another woman present was told that visitors were awaiting her at home. "Let them wait," she said; "I must hear this." Thus many heard the Gospel for the first time, and as the sufferer passed away, still in unconsciousness, the words of life were falling upon the ears of the living who but for this occasion might never have heard them. Thus out of our griefs a "Bethel" often arises by God's mercy.

In a quiet little spot, not far from the last village mentioned, on the south coast of Spain, lived some years ago a Christian lady. She had come there for her health; but her active spirit would allow her no rest when she saw the ignorance of the people, and the need of instruction. She devoted her life and means to work amongst them. For some years she was allowed to labour for her Master; then, suddenly, in the midst of her useful life, she was taken away.

She had been much discouraged by the fickleness of some and the lukewarmness of others; and she died without seeing much fruit, believing there was none. The reaping was for others who had not borne "the toil and heat of the day." She had worn herself out in her work; she had trained teachers, and taught the young, comforted the sorrowing, prayed with the dying; and none knew till she was taken away, what a place she held in the hearts and homes of the people. Those who have been allowed to follow in her steps can testify that "she being dead yet speaketh."

One young girl, who had attended the schools from infancy, had grieved the last months of her teacher's life by her worldliness and indifference. Suddenly, in the midst of her youthful bloom, the girl was struck down with a terrible illness. At first she rebelled against such pain and suffering, and in the intervals of relief, would speak constantly of the time when she would be well, and of what she would do, and what she would wear; but, by degrees, the gospel teaching and many of the loved teacher's words came back to her. The change was very great, as all could testify who were with her. One night, while still able to speak, she gave full testimony of her belief in Christ, and constantly she said how her only trust was in Him. In her delirium her only fear was that a priest should visit her, and she would beg a lady who came to see her, not to allow one to enter, for her mother was half-hearted. Firm in the faith she died. As the once bright eyes grew dim, the dull hearing was still able to take in verses of Scripture; and with these promises sounding in her ears, she passed away in perfect peace. By her faith she forfeited Christian burial—there was no native Protestant cemetery—and she was not allowed to be buried in the Roman Catholic place. For hours the coffin lay exposed in a hot August sun, the mourners not knowing what to do; and at last orders were sent from the mayor of the village to bury her outside consecrated ground. So she was buried under a cactus hedge. Facts speak for themselves, and this act excited fierce indignation even among the people of all parts of Spain, for the papers far and wide took the matter up.

Some time after this, a brother of the girl fell ill. He also had "from a child known the Holy Scriptures," but as manhood came, neglected his soul's welfare, and turned his back on religion. But he was checked in his downward course. For some time his case baffled the doctors. In his suffering he was very impatient, and would complain of everything that was done for him. Gradually a change came; he took to reading his Bible—it was never out of his hands, and with the familiar words came back the teaching of his youth and the remembrance of the loved teacher. Often he spoke of her, and of how he hoped to see her soon; for "my whole heart is in Christ," he would say. With the soft spring days, the poor mother's hope returned; he sat in the "patio" and breathed the sweet air. It was but the final flickering of the candle, and he himself was never deceived. As his earthly tabernacle crumbled away, his spiritual life seemed to grow and beautify; the joy he was given was really remarkable. Day by day he sank rapidly. One evening his mother and sister thought he was passing away, and both were weeping bitterly. It was not yet the end, however, only one of the attacks of deadly faintness that were so frequent. He opened his eyes suddenly, and saw them crying. "Oh, why do you cry?" he said, smiling brightly. "I am so happy; if only you knew how happy I am." Shortly after he said: "Oh, God, only let me die a painless death; this is all I have to desire." His wish was fulfilled; he passed away in his sleep, peacefully as an infant in his mother's arms.

Shortly before he died, the doctor, a kind and liberal man, told the mother that he feared there would be great trouble attendant on her son's death if he did not have a priest. "I know all that happened before," he said, "and if to save such scandal, you decide to have one, I will send a friend of mine, who will ask no questions." The dying lad overheard the conversation, and agreed to the doctor's suggestion, saying: "To me it makes no difference. My trust is in Christ, and I believe He won't judge me for such a step; it is to save you all trouble." So the parish vicar came, and as he entered the dying lad's room, he said: "I come as a friend, not as a priest. I don't ask you to confess, and I merely come that there may be no trouble hereafter." He added that he was in favour of liberty, and utterly disapproved of what had happened before.

Another incident shows the power of the word. Maria "la sillera," or chair-maker, lived in a large tenement house. About eight or ten families dwelt under the same roof. There was an open court with a big plantain tree which grew in the middle; creepers grew up the walls, and pots of flowers made the little "patio" like a garden. Here in the evening the women gathered and little black-eyed children played. Here during the day busy life went on, and a stranger on entering would see women at their various household tasks, standing or sitting at their doorways, washing clothes, working or ironing. In a small damp room on the ground floor Maria plied her trade of chair-mending, and often Doña Isabel (the lady afore-mentioned) when coming to visit people in the house, would see the old woman sitting at her doorway, surrounded by chairs in different states of dilapidation waiting for her swift fingers to weave in new straws, or in many cases to put in new seats. She always wore the same patient dogged look, her face grey with pain, for she had an incurable heart complaint, and a cough that gave her no rest night or day. From early morning to night she plied her trade, only pausing when a paroxysm of coughing took her strength away.

Doña Isabel often noticed the patient suffering woman, but except wishing her "good day" she never spoke to her—for Maria's expression was forbidding—and the neighbours said she was sceptical about religion, and did not like to be talked to, so that some time passed before a way was opened for getting near her.

One day this lady was told that Maria was very ill—dying she thought herself—and had expressed a wish to see her. Accordingly the same afternoon she called on the sufferer, who was in an upstairs room, which was beautifully clean, and bore the marks of unusual care. Evidently the sick woman had once been better off; the chest of drawers, chairs, and tables were good of their kind, and well polished. The little shrine before the image of the Virgin was decked with flowers and candles, and there were a few bad paintings on the walls.

The sick woman was sitting up in bed, supported by pillows of snowy whiteness. She was suffering very much, and gasping for breath. Doña Isabel took Maria's hand, and told her how sorry she was to see her so suffering.

"Why should you be sorry?" the woman asked in an odd abrupt way, at the same time fixing her keen eyes on her visitor.

"Why you would be sorry if I were suffering," answered her visitor. "I often hear you coughing at night (her house was just opposite), and wish I could give you any relief."

"Well, I believe you mean what you say," said the strange woman, looking keenly at Doña Isabel.

When Doña Isabel left, she was eagerly asked to come again. Thus began an acquaintance that soon became a very pleasant one for both parties.

On her next visit she found Maria sitting up, supported by pillows, looking still very ill, but bent on returning to her work. Doña Isabel, after making inquiries about her health, said something about the comfort of having a Saviour who could feel for our infirmities. Maria caught her up quite sharply, saying, "Oh I don't believe He has time to look after poor people like me; He has too much to do."

"Wait and you shall see," answered her visitor, opening her Testament at the 11th of St. John. She read slowly and clearly; but as she came to the verse, "And Jesus wept," a sob broke on her ear, and looking up, she saw the old woman weeping.

"Oh, is that true?" she asked.

"See, it is in the Bible," said the lady; "now you cannot say that Jesus has no sympathy for the suffering."

"Oh, it is wonderful, beautiful—read more."

It was touching to see how the old woman's armour of pride seemed to break down under the gospel message.

Each time Doña Isabel came she found her old friend (for such she now considered her) more eager for the word. She drank in the message, but still her self-righteousness rose as a barrier between her and God. "I am good," she would say; "I have a good heart; I never yet saw one poorer than myself but I would divide a loaf with him."

The summer days were coming on, and Doña Isabel's family were going to England for a time. Severe illness made it many months before she saw her dear old friend again.

On the last visit paid before leaving, she found her very ill, and asked if she would like a hymn. Then taking Maria's hand in her own, she sang a Gospel hymn.

Maria hid her face in her apron and cried as the hymn was being sung. Many women gathered in; and Isabel read from the twenty-first of Revelations of the blessed home above. The words seemed to touch many a stony heart; and during the prayer that followed, she could hardly control her voice, for the sobs of some of her poor sisters. A touching farewell ensued, for the poor Spanish women are very affectionate and demonstrative.

It was nine months before the lady returned. During that time a young Christian man belonging to the evangelical church visited and read to Maria, and found her always willing and glad to hear the Bible.

Almost the first thing Doña Isabel was told on her arrival was that Maria was dying, but that she had prayed to live till she should see her friend once more. It was a touching meeting. The aged pilgrim was very near the border-land; her face grey and drawn, her sufferings very great. But another change was visible, and this became more apparent every day; the patience, the resignation, were new; there was a softer tone in the voice.

Her last hours were troubled by nuns and priests. She had never come out of her church, but she did not wish to receive the last rites—she said she believed they would do no good. When she was unconscious, however, the priest forced an entrance, and gave her the sacrament without confession. She lay in a stupor, only once rallying to ask for her friend to sing her a hymn. Thus the aged woman passed away. She had learnt to know that Christ was not too busy to look after her.

In this manner, little by little, the seed is being sown. There are now five towns on the south coast of Spain, where the presence of the new life is making itself felt.

E. B. MOORE.

THE WIDOW OF NAIN.

"Now when He came nigh to the gate of the city, behold, there was a dead man carried out, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow: and much people of the city was with her."—Luke vii. 12.

THE ruins of Nain are still to be seen in Palestine. They are found on the side of a hill which gently slopes downward to a broad plain covered in their season with green grass and gay flowers. The name Nain means "the Lovely Place," and it is connected with one of the loveliest stories of Him who is "chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely," even Jesus Christ our Lord and our Elder Brother.

He had just done a great wonder-deed in Capernaum. Next day, unwilling to be complimented and caressed, and yet most willing to be active, He went away into the country. There, breasting the slope of the hill on which the village of Nain stood, He did another great wonder-deed. And the awed verdict of those who witnessed it was what ours would have been had we lived in that day, and seen that sight. Some cried out, "A great Prophet has risen up amongst us!" thus signifying their sense of His personal power. Some whispered, "God hath visited His people!" thus signifying their sense that the Divine omnipotence went hand in hand with the Divine compassion—a compassion that stooped to human sorrows, and delighted to relieve them. And quick like the summer wind, away swept this report through all the district. It bore with it the fragrance of heaven, and roused in lonely cottages and clustered villages the long-stilled emotions of wonder and hope.

Glancing over the history, we see: The dominion of death.—"When He came nigh to the gate of the city He saw a dead man."

1. There is the certainty of the dominion.—"A dead man." Nain was a country village situated on high land, and in a pure air, like so many of our English villages. And yet death had found it out; and entering one of the houses, had claimed a victim. So it is, and will be with our houses now. We may dwell by the sea-side, or on the hill-top, or on the sheltered plain—but there is a sure visitor on His way to us. He will not stop to ring the bell or tap at the window. We shall not see him coming up the street, or entering the passage. He will come in silently at his own time. And when he goes away, it will not be alone. Some one who lives with us must go with him too. Perhaps, indeed, we ourselves.

2. "He saw a dead man carried out." There is the entirety of the dominion.—It was, as we know from our Lord's challenge presently, a young man who had been claimed—say somewhere under twenty-five years of age. The strong hand of youth had been touched by a stronger; the active limbs had been caught by some yet more active; the whole compact force of heart and lung and brain had been wrestled with, and cast down helpless. He was now "carried out" utterly overcome. And so with ourselves some day.

3. There is the severity of the dominion.—"He was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow." This is one of the most pathetic sentences in that Book of endless pathos—the Bible. The mother, too, a widow; she had lost her husband from her side, and for years, perhaps, lived a lonely straitened life. This dead man was her only son. She had nursed him, fed him, clothed him; she had taken him for walks—sometimes in the flowery fields, sometimes to the cemetery to his father's grave. She had pinched herself of many necessaries, perhaps, to educate him. She had doubtless prayed for him, as only mothers can for their sons. And he had grown up with her, taller, stronger, cleverer, year by year. And now, when he was able to repay her for some of her tenderness and trouble—now, when he could support her in her old age and feebleness—he was taken away. And she, a widow and childless. Oh, it was hard and terrible! But this hardship and terror abides with us also to-day.

4. There is the irresponsibility of the dominion.—"Much people of the city was with her." Ah, yes, as usual, now; some from curiosity and some from sympathy. They clustered together and followed her as she walked next to her dead boy. "Poor soul!" they whispered at intervals. "What will she do now? Who will take pity on her and care for her?" But for the most part there was awed silence. There was nothing really to be done but bow to the stroke. It was no use to challenge it, or even to cry out against it. Death gave no account of himself. He gives no account to any of us now. He will give no answer to our petitions. His dominion is with us what it was at Nain—certain, entire, severe and wholly irresponsible.

But look again on the other aspects of this scene.—There is the Christ of God accomplishing the defeat of death.—"When the Lord saw her, He had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. And He came and touched the bier: and they that bare him stood still. And He said, Young man, I say unto thee, arise. And he that was dead, sat up and began to speak. And He delivered him to his mother."

1. Full in front of the certainty of death let us put now the certainty of Christ.—He was not a phantom gliding across the country and vanishing in an hour—this deed declares that. He was not only a good man who lived His life, worked His work, died and finished with this world. "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever." He is as real as death, and immeasurably more powerful. Death is but a passive state. Christ is a living Person. Death is but a produced effect. Christ is an uncreated will by which causes are set in action. Death belongs to man only. Christ belongs to God: He is God. In Him "God hath visited His people." We know God now because we know the Son of God. We drink in His words as spoken from His ascended glory: "Fear not; I am the first and the last; I am He that liveth, and was dead; and, behold, I am alive for evermore, Amen; and have the keys of hades and of death."

2. Against the severity of death let us place the pity of Christ.—"When the Lord saw her, He had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not." As the sad procession drew near, it was not long before His keen eye distinguished its meaning and marked the chief mourner. And His compassion flowed out towards her in her unbounded grief. He had seen His own mother weep when carpenter Joseph laid down his tools for the last time and came slowly into the little cottage to die. To die near her for whom he could do no more. And near that Son who had been such a blessing and wonder to them both. And now the Lord spoke to the widow in tender, healing tones; "Do not weep," He said.

Yes, He sees us in our death chambers and in our death journey; and He has pity, living, healing, redeeming pity for us in our death losses and death sorrows. Whilst sin lasts death must last too. Whilst the dark work is being done the dark wages must be paid. But meanwhile we have His compassion. He does not separate Himself in cold isolation. We cannot but sorrow, the tear-fountains cannot but flow. They must flow, or the over-charged heart reservoir would burst. But Christ is the authorised Stayer of the tear-fountains, that they do not exceed and leave the heart desolated and dry. He is "the Man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." He understands us still—sympathises with us still. We, under the healing sense of His pity, can calm ourselves a little and at least listen to His voice.

3. Against the authority of Death let us place the supreme authority of Jesus Christ.—Christ as an historic personage claims and wins the attention of all. "He came and touched the bier, and they who bore it stood still." There was something about Him that caught the attention of the bearers and secured their instant homage. Something in His bearing as He came nigh—something in His gesture as He touched the bier; a commanding majesty of sovereign and supreme goodness, which they could not resist. The four men who bore the body instantly and involuntarily halted on the road.

And so it is with all thoughtful men still. If they look at Christ simply as one of the chief figures on the page of history; simply as one of the chief persons who lived, worked and taught in the world eighteen hundred years ago, they cannot help stopping a little while before Him. It has been so with all the great thinkers and philosophers who have heard of Christ—they have yielded Him some homage as a greater than themselves. Men have done this specially when contemplating the terrible problems of life; when on their way to the grave; when the burden and mystery of death is heavy upon them. What has He to say upon these matters? What is it that He can promise? What is it that He can do?

But to how many thousands is Christ in His authority the Raiser and Restorer and Giver of the True Life that will endure and is life indeed?

"And He said, Young man, I say unto thee, arise. And he that was dead, sat up and began to speak."

There was sufficient force of Divine life in His voice to bring the human life to re-possess and re-animate the body.

We do something of this kind, in some small degree, in some lesser way, every time we stand by the bed of a sleeper and call him back to consciousness. The life in our voice, somehow touches the life of the soul in the motionless body, and brings it forth from its inward secret chambers. The roused sleeper sits up, and begins to speak. First the muscular system is re-occuplied, and then the brain is repossessed, and then full intelligence is again upon its throne. "Ah, it is you! And this is the day! The day so long looked forward to, dreaded or delighted in. The day of execution—the day of marriage—the day of journeying is indeed come at last!"

So in His higher way the commanding life of the Lord, coursed through the mystic avenues. His voice brought out and brought back the life of the young man, the life which had departed from the body, but that was not destroyed.

And now Christ is calling thousands of people to life in a high sense, far higher even than this. "The Son quickeneth whom He will." "He that is of the truth heareth My voice." "Verily I say unto you, Whosoever heareth My voice, and believeth in Him who sent Me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." "Is passed," now and here under the power of that word, challenging the deeper life, and bringing it out into consciousness and activity. Hearing Him, and believing in God, we have the true life which Time cannot touch—which Death cannot destroy.

4. Against Death the irresponsible dissolver of families let us place Christ as the invincible re-uniter of families.—"He began to speak." What did he say? At first he was probably startled and surprised. "Where am I? What are you doing with me? Why, mother, how you have been crying! And we are out in the fields! And our friends and this funeral, what are they doing with us!" And then, as he became more collected, and saw Christ, and came under the spell of His radiant majesty—lowering his tones in awe—"Who is this!" We are not told what He said. But in this beautiful reticence, what we do know is this—all speaking was instantly brought to an end. "He delivered him to his mother." And they went away together, side by side, to the old home, and then they entered and closed the door; and sat down and saw it was all real. Son and mother together once more. Son and mother touched now with a deeper sense than ever of their true relationship to one another and of the new claim of Christ as a supernatural benefactor.

This is part of Christ's redeeming work here on earth. He reunites the members of our families in mutual confidence and love. He sets the parents to a life of true care for the children. He sets the children to a life of true obedience to the parents; and sets both parents and children to a life of true gratitude and confidence in Him.

And then, presently, what will Heaven be but a vast assembling of the scattered members of one united family? "Many will come from the east and the west, and the north and the south, and sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the Kingdom of Heaven." One family purged at length from all personal pride and folly; from all national misunderstandings, disagreements and disputes. What a meeting, what a greeting will be there!

Children delivered to their parents. Parents freed from all causes of tears. Death defeated and dismissed for ever. And One, to whom all turn as the supreme Conqueror, who has at last given them the victory. ALFRED NORRIS.

Things New and Old.

SUPERSTITION v. DISEASE.—The belief in witches still holds sway over the minds of the Devonshire people. They have unbounded faith in charms and spells. I remember once to have had a conversation with Hannington on the subject of the supposed miracles at Knock, Lourdes, and other places. Whatever might be the source of the alleged healings, he warned me against summarily concluding that no cures had taken place. He said that he had himself seen the strangest cures effected in Africa by medicine men with their fetish; cures of which, to an impartial beholder, there could be little doubt. He then narrated some remarkable cases of persons who had, under his own observation, been healed by recourse to men or women who were supposed to be endowed with the power to "bless." He was of opinion that certain diseases—in fact, all those diseases which were directly or indirectly nervous—might, in certain cases be healed by a strong faith in anything.—Bishop Hannington's Life.

SMALL BEGINNINGS.—The late Bishop Hannington once took part in a very remarkable work which is carried on by the railway men at the Derby station. He says: "I went to the Midland Railway breakfast-room, where about a hundred men meet and listen to an address from a specially-invited preacher every morning, while they consume their breakfasts. A short time ago the Bishop of London spoke to them. This gathering originated in a half-witted man who used to read his Bible at meal-time, and was badly treated in consequence by the other men. He went apart into a corner by himself and was presently joined by another. They both of them got so persecuted that somebody spoke to the officials, and they gave them a small shed. This has now grown into the present meeting of about a hundred strong. I came in and asked if I might be a listener. The foreman said, 'We have been disappointed in our man, will you speak to us?' I had not come prepared, but the Lord helped me, and they immediately begged me to come again."—Bishop Hannington's Life.

A YACHT ADVENTURE IN 1867.—The party spent a week in St. Petersburg and Moscow, keenly entering into the delights of everything that was going in the way of entertainment, and towards the end of July set their faces again homeward. An incident which throws light upon Hannington's character occurred on the return voyage. The elder brother, who was in command of the expedition, having been recalled home by domestic affairs which required his presence, the leadership fell to James. He at once took the reins, and held them with no uncertain hand. He writes: "The men have of late been very disorderly, and getting worse, so, on my assuming command, I instantly gave them my mind on the subject, and told them that, in the future, any man breaking leave would be discharged. The first to do so, as it happened, was the captain, who remained ashore, and, by his own confession, helplessly drunk." The captain had no doubt that he would be able to make it all right with the young commander. But he reckoned without his host. Discipline was at stake. Hannington felt that now or never was the time to assert his authority, and, in such circumstances, he was not accustomed to hesitate for a moment. To the astonishment of the whole crew, and not less so of the culprit himself, the captain was there and then sent ashore with all his belongings. After this dreadful example the crew gave no more trouble.—Bishop Hannington's Life.

HEART'S-EASE.

CHAPTER VI.

COLONEL SEYMOUR listened with great interest to the story Ethel had to tell him. In some measure, he felt himself responsible for all who lived within reasonable distance of his house, which was the principal residence in the district.

He felt that he had not taken quite so much notice of the villagers since his wife's death, but the world was so changed for him by that sad event that he was never so light of heart—or more correctly, let me say, less heavy of heart, than when he was away from Holmsdale, the place of all others that revived his grief, and brought back with painful vividness, the few happy years which he spent there with his young and beautiful wife.

Ethel, all unconsciously, was filling her father's mind with new and somewhat painful thoughts, and she looked up at him once or twice with curious questionings in her eyes, as she noticed the effect her words had upon him.

"Are you not pleased with me, papa?" she asked at length, as she stopped abruptly in her story, much of which, by the way, her father had not heard. "Do you think I did wrong in going into the cottage?"

"By no means, darling. It was both wise and kind of you to do so. We should be glad of the opportunity of doing, or saying a kind thing, especially to any one in such distress as that poor girl."

"But you look as though my story wasn't what you liked," said Ethel, somewhat at a loss for words to express quite what she meant.

"Do I, darling?" and the fine military face was turned to her with a strange tenderness expressed in it. "No, my child. It is not that I dislike the story, but that it recalls other things, and other days, and they make me sad."

"I shall not say another word, then," she exclaimed decidedly. "I do not want you to be sad. I thought you would be pleased with my story. You always tell me that you like to listen to my 'chatter,' as you call it."

A smile broke over the Colonel's face, such as you may often have noticed, as the sun breaks through a bank of cloud, and lights up all the landscape. "Yes," he said, pleased at her words, "I do like to listen to your chatter, and never more so than now, for there is real interest in it. I should be content to leave my little girl, and go away to that other home where your darling mother is, if I knew that she was a useful woman. There can be no happiness in life apart from usefulness, Ethel, and I hope that this may be the beginning of a happy life of service for God, and your fellow-creatures."

"You will make me cry if you talk of leaving me, like that," she said with sudden alarm. "I won't be left alone with aunty, it would break my heart." And already the tears were gathering in her eyes.

"Hush! my child. Do not let me hear you speak like that again. We are in God's hands, you, and I, and aunty, and there must be no such words as 'won't.' But I was wrong to speak my thoughts aloud. Please God, darling, you and I will be spared for many years together, and I may be spared to see you a useful woman like your dear mother."

"Oh! I should so wish to be just like her. You tell me I am," she said eagerly.

"Yes, Ethel, you are. That is, you are like her—very like her—in face and figure."

"But not like her in my mind, I suppose? She was not foolish as I am, and wicked, sometimes. But, perhaps, God will make me like her in that way, too, if I ask Him," she said, with sudden hopefulness.

"God will make you a good woman, as well as a good girl, if you ask Him. He promises to give His Holy Spirit to all who desire and ask for it, and it is the Holy Spirit who leads us to God."

"That is just what Aunt Regina told me, papa."

"That is just what the word of God tells us all, my child. I have to learn that lesson, and your aunt has to learn it, and so have all who wish to know God, and to serve Him. Your darling mother learned it, and it taught her to love and serve God as long as she lived. And she was always happy. Even when God sent for her to take her home, very suddenly and painfully, as it seemed to every one, she was quite prepared to go, even though she left so many loved ones behind. Almost her last words were, 'He knows what is best.' With those words on her lips she went away from us, and with those words in my heart, I have tried to live ever since."

There was a solemn silence for some few minutes after this. To Ethel her father's words were almost like lifting the curtain from some picture that has stood with its covering over it for many years. She knew so little about her mother's last illness that she could not but feel awed and sobered by what she had just heard. She had always loved and cherished her mother's memory, but her heart swelled up now with a deeper love than ever before, and her prayer was that she might be like her, and worthy to be numbered among the followers of Him whom her mother served.

Very little more was said between them until they reached the cottage where the sick girl lived. The window was now closed, for the sun had ceased to shine upon the front of the house, and was already slanting towards the west. In response to Colonel Seymour's knock, a tall, respectable woman appeared at the door, and on seeing who it was that stood there she made a low curtsey.

"We have come to inquire after your daughter, Mrs. Weston. I am Colonel Seymour," the Colonel said.

"You do me a great honour, sir. Will you be pleased to walk in?"

They entered the only living room, in which Ethel had been that morning, and found the sick girl still propped up with pillows, but looking more cheerful as they approached.

"I have not forgotten my promise, you see," Ethel said, going over to her, and taking her wasted hand.

"Oh, I knew you would not, miss!" the girl answered, with a bright smile.

"I want papa to see pussy. Where is dear pussy?" she went on, looking round for the ball of white fur, which she presently discovered in a corner, not very far from the sick girl's chair.

Of course Colonel Seymour expressed himself greatly pleased to make pussy's acquaintance, although he found her disposed to mark the introduction by her sharp little claws, for, when he put his hand near her, she playfully scratched him, much to Ethel's delight. This little incident put them all more at ease than they might have otherwise been. Mrs. Weston was a woman who had seen much trouble, and not very much sympathy. Living so far as she did from any town, and dependent on her labour for her own support and that of her sick child, she had been shut up with her sorrow, and had grown not to care to talk much about it to strangers.

She had received many kindnesses from the Colonel's family in days gone by, but since Mrs. Seymour's death, and the constant absence of the family in London and abroad, she had seen very little of them.

"I remember your face, Mrs. Weston," the Colonel said, in his kindest manner. "My dear wife took a great interest in you, I remember."

"She was very kind to me and mine, sir, when we sadly needed help and kindness. My husband died soon after your lady. He had the same complaint as my poor Ethel," —pointing to the sick girl.

"How strange!" he exclaimed. "Why, your daughter bears the same name as mine. She is Ethel too!"

"My husband would have the child christened after your sweet babe, Colonel. He thought she must grow up good and wise, if she knew that she had the same name as the young lady at the big house. But that's many years ago now, sir. She has lived to be good and wise, and I must not doubt God's goodness, even though I must prepare to lose her. She is my only child." And Mrs. Weston's eyes began to fill at the thought of her impending loss.

"Can nothing be done?" the Colonel asked, in a low whisper. "I hardly like discussing the matter before your daughter; but is there no chance? What do the doctors say?"

Mrs. Weston shook her head. "They say she might have been cured years ago, if she had had change of climate; but it was only 'might,' sir, at the best. The child is going just as her father went. But, thank God, she is quite ready to go. Her heart was given to Him years ago."

Meanwhile Ethel—the two Ethels—were talking very earnestly together, and the Colonel could hear snatches of what they were saying. He heard his Ethel say—

"I was very glad you said what you did to me this morning. You remember you told me you never kept anything from your mother. Well, it was that that made me so uncomfortable about telling Aunt Regina an untruth. I didn't want her to know I had torn my dress."

"But you would never tell an untruth to your aunt, miss?" the girl said.

"But I did," Ethel replied sorrowfully. "I was very wicked, I know; but I thought, as she wasn't my mother, that it didn't make so much matter. I am not so wicked now, though," she went on, as she looked at her friend, and smiled. The other Ethel smiled too. Suffering had made her much older both in appearance and in manner than her young visitor, who preserved, in an unusual degree, the simplicity of a child; and the confident way in which she said that she was not so wicked now, caused the sick girl to wonder what she could mean by it. "I told Aunt Regina all about it, and I asked God to forgive me, for that and all my sins. Papa knows all about it too; but I'm glad, for I feel ever so much happier, now it is all over."

"I'm sure you must, miss. We ought never to keep any secrets from our parents, or from God," she added reverently

"I hope I shall never be so wicked again," said Ethel, "for I did feel miserable. All wicked people must be unhappy, I feel sure," she said, in a sorrowful tone.

"They must, miss, for we can only be really and truly happy, if we are trusting and obeying our Heavenly Father; and wicked people, who care nothing about Him, cannot be happy."

"I wish I could love Him better than I do. It seems to me that my heart is very hard sometimes. Could you tell me what I am to do, namesake?"

"Namesake" smiled pleasantly, as she answered: "There is only one thing you can do, miss, and that is to ask God to make your heart soft. You know He has promised to take away our hard hearts and give us soft ones. Mine was very hard; but I don't think it is so now. I hope it is not. I love God, and would serve Him if I could; but I am not likely to be of any help to any one whilst I am like this." And her pale face flushed for a moment, as though her weakness had surprised her into saying something that was almost like an act of rebellion against her Heavenly Father's dealing with her.

"Oh, but you must not talk like that, namesake! Remember how much use you were to me. You certainly helped me by what you said to-day, and I shall never forget it. Do you know, when I went home, and was telling Aunt Regina about my walk and deceiving her, your words would keep sounding in my ears. I could not keep them out of my head. They were just as if they insisted on being heard, and they seemed to be saying to me: 'Ethel, you are doing wrong, and you know it. You know you are, Ethel. You should never keep anything from your mother, and Aunt Regina is in the place of a mother to you.'" Then she added, with more serious manner: "And then the thought came into my mind, that in keeping it from Aunt Regina it was like keeping it from my own darling mother, who, perhaps, knew all about what had happened, and knew that I was not telling the truth."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. II.

Over what heathen land did Balak reign
When Balaam's curses were desired in vain?
Father of one Jehovah called His friend?
What mountain top did God's high priest ascend?
The second son of one who walked with God?
A plain through which a new-made monarch trod?
After the Lord had fiery serpents sent,
What spot was that to which the people went?
A refuge-city in the tribe of God?
Whose early death first made a mother sad?
One of two princes slain by Gideon's hand?
Assyria's town where dwelt an exiled band?
Who sought and then forsook old men's advice?
Father of him who blessed the Hebrews thrice?
When going south, what plain did Abram pass?
And where did Moses lead his flock to grass?
Where Paul a prisoner dwells "bound with this chain"?
Whose longing eyes chose Jordan's fruitful plain?
The mount from whence the curse of God was read?
Who did King David first expect to wed?
A town which close to Ezion-geber lies?
Father of children three, who all were wise?
One of the wives returning Jacob brought?
Father of those from whom a field he bought?
Where did the people "wait for good" with care?
The town God says He gives for Moab's share?

One name from out the twelve apostles choose,
Longest of all, and then its letters use
To spell these answers; you will need no more Than these eleven for all the twenty-four. L. T.

THE COLPORTEUR'S PLACE IN HISTORY.

THE PEDLER IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY.

A WRITER in the "Nineteenth Century" says, "The chief difficulty about literature for the working classes, is to reach them." If the literature were lying on their table, they would often read, but they seldom sally forth into the highways and by-ways of the literary world to discover what they shall purchase. "The working classes," he says, further on, "read the Sunday newspaper as largely as they do because it is left at their door." And he suggests that what religious organisations have done in the way of the distribution of tracts, might be done in order to distribute other works of a wholesome character and an abiding interest. Here is a call for the work of the colporteur, or book-pedler; and it may help those who wish, for one reason or another, to use this form of disseminating their ideas if we glance at the work of the colporteur in the past and present. "Colporteur," in England, as well as in France, is the accepted word for one who goes about the country selling books or other publications. Book pedler, or book hawker, might have been used, but it is a moot point which would have been best. In legal documents, "pedlers and hawkers" are always classed together; they are, however, clearly distinguishable. A pedler, strictly speaking, is one who travels on foot selling petty wares, while a hawker may possess a cart or waggon. This difference, clearly marked in the present usage of the words, is not so clear in their etymology.

"Pedler," some think, comes from Ped, a Suffolk word for a basket, because pedlers often carry one; another derivation suggested is pedularius, a socksman; a third, petit (French), because the pedler sold little wares; and this last would probably have had the sanction of Dr. Johnson. The most probable derivation however seems to be the French pied, or the Italian piede, afoot; and a correspondent in 'Notes and Queries' suggests that the word "pedler" is directly taken from one or other of the expressions: a piede dall' érta, on foot from the mountain; or a piede all' érta, on foot, on the look out. The Italians were, as we know, the leaders in commercial enterprise in the Middle Ages, and it is probable that the first pedlers known in France and England were Savoyards, or Northern Italians. That "pedler" in any case came to us from France is favoured by the phrase "Pedler's French," which may thus have got its meaning of Jargon.

"Hawker," it is suggested, comes from "hawk," because, like that bird, the hawker goes to and fro, rambling backwards and forwards from place to place, or travelling continually in a circle. Hawker, however, is clearly a Teutonic word, and may be derived as others think from the German Hocken, in the sense of carrying a burden on one's back. If this were certain, "hawker" would, etymologically, be a good translation for Colporteur, which is derived from the Latin collo portare, to carry on the neck. Others, again, derive it from the German Auchen, to increase, because the hawker sells for more than the first vendors; in which case hawker and auctioneer would, we suppose, be distant relatives. Richardson makes hawker descend from the same progenitor as huckster, which Junius says is from an old Dutch word—hoecken, a retailer, derived from hoeck, a hook, because they endeavoured to hook or draw in strangers. Whatever the etymology, hawker is precluded from being the translation of colporteur by its long-established usage to represent one who goes about selling goods in some conveyance with the words "licensed hawker" painted on a conspicuous part.

Colporteur is consequently best represented by the pedler who is himself the bearer of his wares—

> But all as a poore pedler he did wend,
> Bearing a trusse of trifles at his backe,
> As bells and babes and glasses in his packe.
> Shepherd's Calender (June).

One of the Roxburghe Collection of Ballads, entitled "The Sorrowful Lamentation of the Pedlers and Petty Chapmen for the Hardness of the Times and the Decay of Trade," shows, in fact, the exact similitude of the two words pedler and colporteur, since the woodcut of the pedler which accompanies it, represents him with this burden absolutely on his neck. He is evidently a dealer in rabbits, and this carries us back to the fourteenth century, when, according to the author of Piers Plowman, a distinguishing feature of the pedler was his skill in skinning cats.

This combination in the pedler's trade is disagreeably suggestive. It is to be hoped that our forefathers did not buy their rabbits skinless, but that the good wife saw that operation performed, especially if pedlers were often of the Autolycus type, who, "having flown over many knavish professions, settled only in rogue."

Unfortunately, society in all ages and in nearly every land has been so constituted that he who wishes to reform it has been obliged to allow himself to be numbered with such. Thus the early Reformers made much use of this means of propagating their doctrine.

Reinerius Sacco, a Romanist and an Inquisitor, who had once been a Vaudois or a Waldensian Christian, says in a book against his former co-religionists: "These Heretics are full of artful devices to obtain familiar access to the noble and the great and thus do they proceed: they exhibit to gentlemen and ladies some kind or other of tempting ware, such as rings or shawls for sale. When these are sold, if they ask him: Have you any thing else to sell? He replies, I have more precious gems than these, which I will shew you, if you will promise not to betray me to the clergy. Security being promised, he says: I have a gem so brilliant, that by it a man may know God. I have another, which shines so, that it kindles the love of God in the heart of its possessor. And so of others calling them metaphorically, gems. After that he recites some devout chapter, as that of Luke i. or one of the Lord's discourses, and then when he has begun to interest his hearer, he adds, Matt. xxiii. or Mark xii. Asked of whom these imprecations are to be understood he replies of the clergy and monks." He then begins to enlarge on the contrast between the state of the Roman Catholic Church and that of the Vaudois, illustrating every point from the Word of God, and calling upon his hearers to consider which state and which faith is the more perfect one, and to choose that.

The value of this method of disseminating the Scriptures and other publications was thus fully understood by the Reformers of the sixteenth century, and gave an immense impulse to the Reformation.

In 1518, the presses in Germany connected with the effort of which Luther was the most famous champion sent forth seventy-one different works; in 1519, a hundred and eleven; in 1520, two hundred and eight; in 1521, two hundred and eleven; in 1522, three hundred and forty-seven; and in 1523, four hundred and ninety-eight. In this last year the whole of the Catholic publications in Germany amounted only to twenty. In vain did the Emperor and the princes issue severe edicts against the writings of the Reformers. A vast number of bold colporteurs carried them all over Germany, visiting the remote hamlets and the isolated huts, and so spreading the sacred fire in all directions. These colporteurs were mostly monks, who, too ignorant to preach themselves, adopted this work as the one to which they were most fitted. Well might Luther say in 1518, "My little books and my Resolutions went or rather flew in a few days over Europe."

The same work went on in France under the leadership of Farel and Calvin. The presses of Geneva, Lausanne and Neuchâtel poured forth religious works, which an army of devoted men, staff in hand and basket on back, carried by the by-ways, across ravines, down into the most hidden recesses of the country. Young, buoyant, adventurous, they travelled in the spirit of the song Shakespeare puts into the mouth of an English pedler:

> Jog on, jog on, the footpath way
> And merrily beat the stile—a:
> A merry heart goes all the day,
> Your sad tires in a mile—a.

At the top of their packs were all kinds of trinkets for ladies, with stuffs for dresses hiding the real wares below—Bibles, Testaments, and religious books, which were only produced when they became tolerably sure of the good faith of the purchasers. It was, however, a hazardous business, and many of these humble colporteurs went to the scaffold or the stake. Such an one was Pierre Chabot, who, in 1546, was detected by a spy of the Sorbonne and arrested. Brought before the chambre ardente at Paris, his gentle air and modest demeanour, combined with the bold manner in which he constantly appealed to the Scriptures, moved the hearts of his judges, some of whom would have allowed him to go free altogether, but the majority restrained their leniency to a remission of the cutting out of his tongue, giving him only the rack and the stake. Broken to pieces by the former punishment, he was supported in the cart by two men, yet he had enough life left in him to preach to the people on the road and to repeat a portion of the Creed. Urged to utter an Ave Maria, he steadily refused to say any other prayer than "Jesus, Son of David, have mercy on me!" The Sorbonnists saw clearly that leniency would not do with such determined heretics, and got the Parliament to decide that their tongues should be cut out, without exception.

The success of the colporteur system of propagating reform doctrine depended much on the degree to which the people connived at it. That they did so is evident when we find books being sent into the country packed in barrels, so that there were depôts in various places where the colporteur could replenish his exhausted stock.

We come across no groans nor complaints from these enterprising apostles; on the contrary, we fully believe their lives were joyful, if not gay; very different to the poor seekers after gain, who, according to an old ballad of the year 1595, called "The Pedler's Prophecie," went groaning about England in this way:—

> O this packe, this packe,
> this heavy packe,
> It is so heavy, it hath almost > broke my backe.

This dolorous ballad, sold by William Barley, at his shop in Gratious Street, was matched by the one already referred to: "The Sorrowful Lamentation, &c." The burden there is that "Trading is dead, and all the sweet, golden fair-days are fled." At the date of "The Pedler's Prophecie," pedlers were in bad repute with the authorities. There was in Edward the Sixth day something like a general conspiracy of the poor against the rich, and the pedler's bag as well as the tinker's budget and the glassman's basket proved receptacles for articles whose presence could only have been defended by a "sturdy rogue," such as I imagine the pedler rarely was. Thus this "sorrowful lamentation" deals in very humdrum sort of verses:—

> We travel all day through dirt, through mire,
> To fetch you fine laces and what you desire;
> The world is so hard that although we take pains
> When we look in our purses we find little gains.

Probably the English pedler has always seen things in the light of this last word. A "Pedler's song," arranged as a glee for three voices in 1667, and of which the words on no ascertainable foundation are attributed to Shakespeare, says:—

> From the far Lavinian shore,
> I your markets come to store,
> Muse not, though so far I dwell
> And my ware come here to sell
> Such is the sacred hunger for gold,
> Then come to my pack
> While I cry,
> What d' ye lack?
> What d' ye buy?
> For here it is to be sold.
> I have beauty, honour, grace,
> Fortune, favour, time and place,
> And what else thou would'st request,
> E'en the thing thou likest best;
> First let me have but a touch of your gold,
> Then come to me, lad,
> Thou shalt have > What thy dad
> Never gave;
> For here it is to be sold.
> Madam, come, see what you lack,
> I've complexions in my pack,
> White and red you may have in this place
> To hide your old and wrinkled face.
> First, let me have a touch of your gold,
> Then you shall seem
> Like a girl of fifteen,
> Although you be threescore and ten years old.

According to the Penny Cyclopædia, laws affecting hawkers and pedlers were first made in the time of William III.; but the ballad entitled "The Sorrowful Lamentation," which, to judge from its woodcut, belongs to the time of James I., shows that the pedler even then required a license. It stands to reason that the local retailers would be jealous of these itinerating traders; and we find them in France complaining of their competition, and asserting that they descended in the bad weather from the mountains of Switzerland, Savoy, and the Dauphiny (a pièdc dall' erta), paying no taxes, selling refuse articles at a low price, and, while they carried French money abroad, often left the country without paying their debts. Some of the Swiss pedlers were in a good way of business and took a considerable stock of goods about with them; in fact some went about with a waggon and a strong horse. Many seem to have been packmen travelling with a mule that carried the packs. "Every year," writes Madame de Lamartine, "the colporteurs announce autumn, and the itinerating draper is seen with his packs, his mule, and his hungry-looking dog." In the last century, some of these Swiss pedlers must have looked picturesque and imposing personages. Here is one from Switzerland in 1758, dressed in a coat and waistcoat of grey velvet, with brass buttons, leather breeches and shoes with brass buckles. In Paris, colportage of publications was strictly looked after, so that only 120 were allowed. Each wore a medal, which with his license and his knapsack were absolute essentials of his condition. However, as in most monopolies, curious people got the license, and still more curious were their ways. An innocent young man thinks it a calling in which he may get an honest living, but he finds he cannot sell his papers. A vagrant points out to him that he tells the public too much, whereas his companions artfully mislead their customers, exciting their curiosity by suggesting by their cries that the most outrageous and almost impossible things have occurred.

As far as the country was concerned, this strict supervision of the sale of newspapers was continuously broken. The Jansenists in 1728 established a publication called "Nouvelles Ecclésiastiques," which in spite of the police was kept up until the first year of the Revolution, 1790, a space of eighty-two years. The press was set up in a boat, and distributed through the country by a method, which, printed on a card, was the only ornament which adorned the Jacobin club when it opened in 1791. It would be interesting to know what that method was; but we cannot doubt that it was a sort of colportage, as under the subsequent Revolution the pedler was freed from all bonds whatsoever, probably out of gratitude for the important work he had done in bringing it about. The colporteurs' business in Paris at once developed immensely. Six thousand men, women, and children were in the streets, shouting the titles of the innumerable journals and pamphlets which now began to stream from the press. "Every hour," writes one, "produces its pamphlet; thirteen came out to-day, sixteen yesterday, and ninety-two last week." Under the Consulate certain restrictions were imposed, and they continued in force during the First Empire, and under the Bourbons and Louis Philippe. The Law of 1833 organising primary instruction in France aroused, as was the case in England about the same time, a great desire to distribute knowledge among the people. Towards the end of the Orleans Monarchy, 3,500 colporteurs, distributing a stock of nine millions of volumes, were travelling about in all parts of France. To a great extent they were divided and organised into brigades, under about 300 different booksellers, who supplied them with cheap publications which they obtained at Paris, Rouen, Limoges, Épinal, and Tours. Colportage at the same period was much used in distributing copies of the Scriptures in France, so that the priests were reported as saying: "It is a deplorable state for our poor France; since the freedom of the press these miserable colporteurs go everywhere, and everything is destroyed. In fifty years, if the good Providence of God does not come to our assistance, our religion in this kingdom will be in a deplorable state."

The second Republic, following the traditions of the first, removed all restrictions from the colporteurs' trade; but the reaction against liberty was coming, and the Assembly of 1849 once more put the colporteur into fetters, which were rendered tighter still after the Coup d'État of 1851. The object was evidently to prevent the spread throughout the country of facts and doctrines inimical to the Empire. We have not the means for ascertaining how far the arrangements for suppressing the colporteurs succeeded; but from their elaboration, and from the rank of the persons who were put on the Commission to superintend the matter, it is clear the propaganda carried on by colportage had been most powerful and effective. This Commission, on which not a single ecclesiastic of any religion whatsoever sat, had almost the authority of the Inquisition. No publication could be hawked through the country unless it had first been examined by the permanent Commission, and each copy stamped with its imprimatur. Every colporteur had to have a special permission to exercise his trade, revocable in case of abuse; and to obtain this permission, he had to deliver to the prefect a number of documents, which would prevent any but safe men from going about the country. The Commissioners talked much of respect for the human conscience and society, but their standard permitted the circulation of the works of Voltaire, while it could hardly have failed to proscribe those of De Lamennais.

In the British Isles and in the United States colportage has been much used as a means of disseminating religious publications. The American Tract Society issued a report in 1843, in which it is stated that the colportage system is the great means of touching the mass of foreign immigrants into America, and the mass of the population in the West. The same was thought in Ireland during the early part of this century. Book pedlers went about the country selling travels, books on natural history, voyages, stories about shipwrecks, or extracts from the Bible. All were carefully selected, each volume being sold, bound in leather at seven pence, or in stiff covers at five pence, and some few as low as three pence.

"THE GLORY THAT SHALL BE REVEALED"

The first faint promise of the Spring awaking
God's tender kindness to His land makes known:
By every snowdrop, through the drifts upbreaking
His faithfulness is shown.

His word can reach the innermost enfolding
Of leaf and flower which winter storms sweep by;
For Him the birds make melody, beholding
Their time of bliss draw nigh.

So, Lord as Thou dost comfort Thy waste places,
And clothe the earth with beauty from above,
Pour on our souls so bare of heavenly graces
The springtide of Thy love.

Break up the secret frosts that bind and harden,
Give quickening showers, and sunlight full & free,
Till life shall be a fair and watered garden,
And fruitful, Lord, for Thee.

(Mary Rowles.)

ALF COOKE, QUEENS PRINTER, LEEDS.

We have seen that colportage is quite a traditional institution. During the last eighteen years it has been worked in a new form. In 1869, two evangelists started with a Bible carriage, belonging to the Committee of the Bible-stand at the Crystal Palace, from Bourges, in the centre of France, intending to visit the small fairs—of which there are about 1,600—throughout France. The zealous French evangelist F. Pointet still travels about with this carriage; and, according to the last report (1885), had recently completed a long tour of sixteen months' continual travelling, in which he had crossed France from the extreme south-west to the north-east, and then through the eastern and southern departments back again into Italy. During 1885 he sold 6,867 Bibles and New Testaments, and distributed 51,500 Gospels.

In other continental countries colportage is much more difficult. Thus in Austria the restrictions imposed are so numerous as to render it almost prohibitive. Like every other good work, it can only prosper in an atmosphere of liberty. When by the expulsion of Queen Isabella in 1868 Spain was for two years actually a Republic, the Scriptures were freely disseminated over that priest-ridden land.

It is not pretended that the labours of the colporteur produce immediate and startling effects, but it is a form of seed-sowing which can scarcely fail to produce a certain crop. And the work itself to one rightly understanding its advantages is evidently educational, if not inspiring, as any one will admit after reading the admirable picture Wordsworth has drawn of a pedler in his poem, The Excursion:

> An irksome drudgery seems it to plod on,
> Through hot and dusty ways, or pelting storm,
> A vagrant merchant under a heavy load,
> Bent as he moves, and needing frequent rests;
> Yet do such travellers find their own delight;
> They wander far; much do they see of men,
> Their manners, their enjoyments, and pursuits,
> Their passions and their feelings; chiefly those > Essential and eternal in the heart,
> That 'mid the simpler forms of rural life
> Exist more simple in their elements,
> And speak a plainer language.

Passing the better portion of their time in the open air and in the midst of the peace and liberty of nature, unvexed and unwarped by any kind of bondage, living for the moral and the intellectual improvement of the race, they could not fail to grow in sympathy with Man, to become alive to all that was enjoyed, and all that was endured. Wheresoever they went, they would learn to take large views of things as they observed the progress and decay of mind and body in the men they met from time to time, and to observe

> The history of many families;
> How they have prospered; how they are o'erthrown
> By passion or mischance, or such misrule
> Among the unthinking masters of the earth
> As makes the nations groan.

It would be difficult indeed to imagine a calling which would better help a man to realise the highest aim of ancient philosophy: "Mens sana in corpore sano."

> Vigorous in health, of hopeful spirits, undamped
> By worldly-mindedness or anxious care;
> Observant, studious, thoughtful and refreshed
> By knowledge gathered up from day to day;
> Thus might be lived a long and useful life.

R. HEATH.

THE GOING-TO-DO FAMILY.

BY RUTH LAMB.

PROBABLY there is no family so numerous as the Going-to-do's. Its members are to be met with everywhere, and the persons who are not acquainted with some of them are few and far between. Happy is the house-mother who neither springs from the ancient stock of the Going-to-do's, nor harbours one of them beneath her roof-tree.

When we call over memory's muster-roll of the world's workers, heroes, discoverers, or inventors, we never by any chance find a Going-to-do in the list; yet probably every single member of the family has in his day resolved to take a high place there.

It has been equally the misfortune of one and all to be ever planning, never executing; always resolving, yet ever adding to that pavement which is said to be laid with good intentions—unfulfilled.

The Going-to-do's are endless talkers, and like nothing better than to get hold of good listeners to whom they may expatiate respecting their various schemes for astonishing and benefiting the world. They may be compared to an archer who bids you watch the course of the arrow which he will let fly presently, and which is certain to reach a height or travel a distance never before attained by such a shaft.

The Going-to-do's always profess to aim at something far beyond what has been hitherto achieved by their neighbours. But, somehow, just as a bow-string will become slack if strained too long, and the arrow drop harmlessly to the ground, so do the dreams of fame indulged in by the Going-to-do's remain unfulfilled to the end of their life's chapter.

Socially speaking, the members of this family are usually pleasant people to know. They are so hopeful and enthusiastic, so certain of success, that their buoyant spirits prove infectious and act upon their neighbours like a mental tonic. The real worker who talks little about his plans but puts them into practice, is not always of a hopeful temperament. Even when he feels that the work is good and for the good of others, he is often weighed down by doubts and fears. He recalls to mind the fate of many an inventor before his day, who has given a lifetime of thought and labour, but who, when success has crowned his efforts, has been called from the scene of them. Fame has come when age has dimmed the eye and unnerved the hand and the toiler can no longer rejoice in it. Or others have reaped the reward; mankind has enjoyed the results of a hard-working, unrequited life of labour, and the name of him who conferred the benefit is soon forgotten.

The thinker and toiler of to-day remembers the discouragements and disappointments of his brother worker of yesterday, and hardly dares to hope for immediate success and recognition or enduring fame.

The Going-to-do, on the contrary, knows no such fears or forebodings. He is always buoyant, always going to succeed. His plan of last year may have vanished like the winter's snow; his resolutions have proved as fruitless as a withered tree that will never again put forth leaves. But he has new plans, new resolutions, new hopes—he would call these "certainties"; and sometimes his very confidence cheers a desponding neighbour into thinking that the future may have some brightness for him, if one possessing so little foundation for his expectations can see nothing but success and sunshine in the distance.

If, however, the Going-to-do's are often amiable, they are always to a great extent mischievous. The harm they do by leaving undone is simply incalculable.

An active evil-doer often so shocks those who witness his openly wicked life, that they shrink with horror from the bare thought of imitating it. On the other hand, the geniality and enthusiasm of the Going-to-do often prove irresistibly attractive to other people of sanguine temperament, and the plague spreads. The number of useless lives is multiplied and the family increases.

It may be as well to sketch the lives of a few of the Going-to-do's, as there are plenty of these to choose from.

There is Dick, for instance, a middle-aged man now; but when I first knew him, a pretty boy of nine, and one of the pleasantest-tempered children imaginable.

He was the child amongst several grown-up brothers and sisters, the youngest of whom was at least ten years his senior. Death had made a wide gap between these two, and the little fellow came in for a large heritage of love in consequence. He was watched, cared for, shielded, petted, just a little too much for his own good.

His early lessons were made as easy as possible for him by the joint efforts of his mother and sister, and Dick's road to learning was the nearest approach to a royal one that love could contrive and maintain.

As the boy grew older he was expected to put forth his own powers. Mother and sister began to doubt whether it was true wisdom to make things so easy for him; and when he came for help, replied, "No, Dick, you must begin to work in earnest. You never set yourself to do anything single-handed. Do your best to master your lessons, and then come for help, if you really need it."

Dick was a thorough Going-to-do. His patience was soon exhausted, his efforts hardly worth the name; and, like all the family, he was fertile in excuses for putting off even the beginning of anything requiring effort. He would enter the room with a smiling face and kiss his parents most affectionately an hour before bedtime—then say good-night.

"But, Dick, are the lessons learned? Why do you wish to go to bed so soon?" would be his mother's question. "I have a headache, mother. I have been grinding over the books for ever so long, but I am feeling too stupid to do any good. I have asked to be called early, and shall feel bright and fresh, and do my work twice as well after a good sleep."

"Mind you do get up. You are always going to rise early and coming down late," said his mother.

Dick promised, and retired, but not to bed. The weather was warm, the evening light, and he had resources in his room for passing a pleasant hour. He went to rest later than usual, and, despite frequent summonses, rose just in time to scramble through breakfast and be the last at school. His mother for once refused to send a written excuse; the master was a man of his word and declined to receive a verbal one, so Dick paid the penalty due for unprepared lessons.

The days were very much alike as to scholastic results; but Dick could not help a feeling of shame when the report arrived at the end of the term, and he saw his father's sorrowful looks and his mother's tears. He was affectionate after his thoughtless fashion, and he twined his arms round her neck and whispered what he was going to do next term.

He looked very winsome—and he was the Benjamin of the household—slight and delicately built.

The mother thought of the gap in the family ranks and of the graves in the churchyard, and that perhaps Dick was not very strong. So she and his father admonished him tenderly, and the lad listened, promised, and even got to drawing pictures of all he was going to do, and was as cheerful as if the work were accomplished, even winning his parents to hopefulness by the infectiousness of his own. Finally he retired, feeling that he was uncommonly well over this affair, and that, with the long vacation before him, he might prepare to enjoy himself.

His career can only be given in outline. Removed from school to school—boarded, that he might be under the eye of the principal; next relegated to the care of a gentleman who received two or three backward boys on high terms, and boasted that he had never failed to bring them forward. Dick proved the one heart-breaking exception, and he left his tutor with the merest smattering of learning.

Having to decide on an occupation, he resolved to be a farmer. "Nothing like a country life," he said to his mother. "When I am settled down, you and father can come and stay with me away from city smoke. How jolly it will be!"

Seeing Dick was no student it seemed the best choice to make, and he was placed as the pupil of a nobleman's steward, and a fine farmer. But Dick had pictured farming as riding on a good horse and looking at other people working, and never dreamed of office work, study, and scientific calculations. So after three years of "knocking about" in a desultory way, he resolved to emigrate.

"The old country is used up," he wrote. "Nothing like new ground for young men—less science and more work."

Away he went across the Atlantic, as buoyant as the waves that bore him. His first letter was most cheery. Country delightful; scenery glorious; people hospitable and kind. Canada was the place of all the world to come to.

Then two months and no news. Dick was always going to write, and keeping his friends in cruel suspense because he never noticed the lapse of time. A second letter expressed only disgust at his new surroundings.

"One does not at first realise the state of things here," he wrote. "Rough and ready; Jack as good as his master." This last should have been in Dick's favour, seeing he was to begin in Jack's position. "I am going to leave off farming and try something else."

He had left it when he wrote, and gone to "show off" organs at a city exhibition. Dick had a fine musical ear, and might have made a musician; but as he was always going to practice, he never got beyond a little showy strumming.

Dick further stated: "I shall learn the tuning business, and shall then make ten to twenty dollars a week."

The dollars evidently did not come in fast enough to prevent Dick from sending for money, and for three years he tried something new about every month, and was at length reduced to depend upon the charity of a gentleman who had once known his father, and who sheltered him until a last remittance came to pay his passage back to England.

Many years have passed since his return, and Dick has always been going to do great things, and has done many foolish ones, amongst them marrying unknown to his parents and without the means of keeping himself or a wife.

The Going-to-do's, it may be observed, are often prompt enough in carrying out a particularly rash and foolish resolution. Dick has worn out everybody's patience, and now subsists on a little allowance paid him through an agent, to spare the parents whom he has so sorely tried.

There was another Going-to-do of my acquaintance who went into the office of his bachelor uncle, a lawyer, with the certainty of a partnership when he had served his articles, and succession to the practice. He had just got his right to practice when the uncle died and left him at the head of affairs, and with a capital of thirty thousand pounds absolutely his own.

When I knew this man, he was station-master at a little wayside station, with house, firing and lamps found him, twenty-five shillings a week, and a wife and eight children. His eldest lad, sixteen years of age, was acting as porter, and thus adding a little to the family income. They had absolutely nothing else—not a five-pound note left out of the thirty thousand pounds and the fine practice built up by the dead uncle. By the way, they had something else—a notice to quit.

The man, big, strong-looking, but helpless, was a Going-to-do of the first water, and this fact had landed him where he was. His clients had entrusted business to him, and gone again to find things as they left them.

A will was perhaps to be drawn up, and instructions were given. A messenger would go post haste to the office, bidding the lawyer take it for the signature of a dying man. The will was just going to be drawn out, and before it was done the hand that was to give it value had lost its cunning.

An investment of his own was said to he shaky. Our lawyer was going to see about it. He put off from day to day, and the money was lost.

Notice was to be given to get rid of an objectionable tenant; but quarter-day slipped by whilst the master was going to tell his clerk to deliver it, and the angry landlord found himself powerless to obtain possession of his property for eighteen months to come.

So practice dwindled away, and the lawyer's money dwindled too—not from extravagance, but for want of active care; until he and his were landed at the wayside station, through the intercession of one who was sorry for the wife and children. Thither went also the going-to-do disposition, which brought down several reprimands on the master's head. Notice to quit came because a great quantity of grain had been spoiled for want of tarpaulin covers while standing in the waggons.

The covers were in the shed, the clouds hung low all the morning, and the station-master was for some hours just going to put them over the corn. Then down came a torrent of rain, the corn was drenched, the owner wrote to claim the value from the company, and our going-to-do received marching orders.

The wife, who had done all the indoor business, was frantically writing to interest friends on their behalf, and, poor soul! trying to find excuses for her husband.

The children were sadly thronging the little waiting-room, the only cheerful face being that of the baby.

"I say, ma'am," said a young countryman, after giving me a nudge with his elbow to call attention, and indicating with his thumb the seven human steps around us; "ain't this a warning?"

He meant the flock of children. So many for such a little place, as a warning to bachelors not to run headlong into matrimony. I felt that it was the father, not the children, who might be regarded as a warning against going-to-do.

What became of the family for the time I know not; but years after I saw husband and wife well dressed in deep mourning, though with little of grief in their faces. The wife's father had left them another fortune, and "tied it" to come to the children. Going-to-do's are generally better cared for than they deserve; but that does not lessen their individual responsibility.

It is Going-to-do fathers who neglect to make wills, and leave their money to flow into channels it was never meant to pass into, or to be wasted in litigation.

It is Going-to-do servants who set houses on fire, for want of using precautions within their reach.

Going-to-do mothers and nurses burn babies to death by leaving the fire-guard out of its place, or the lamp within reach of the tiny fingers. They leave washtubs full of suds in the house place, and kettles of boiling water on the hob, when there is no living creature near them except baby, that can just toddle. They are only going to hang out the clothes, or fetch some coal, and then going to empty the tub or wash up the dishes. They come back to find baby silent enough, head downwards in the suds, into which it has fallen through bending over to dabble in the pretty white froth. Or they are summoned by wild screams, and find that the tiny hand has been strong enough to pull down the boiling kettle.

Going-to-do tradesmen lose their business. Going-to-do messengers would ruin masters, only they generally lose place after place and are ruined themselves.

And, worst of all, those who are always going to attend to their temporal interests invariably neglect their spiritual ones. That which should be their great, their chief concern, is ever the matter of all others that is to be thought of in the future. Speak to a Going-to-do on this subject, remind him of the value of the soul, the shortness of life—of the death that must come to all, and the bliss or woe that must follow to every human being, our Going-to-do's face becomes serious, and his reply befits the importance of the subject. He owns the truth of every word you say, and probably adds point to the lesson by telling you of some sudden death that has just taken place, or of the solemn warning furnished by another dying bed. He is resolved to take it and lose no more time. He owns he has been too much like him who was called away unprepared, having lived without God in the world, and died without hope in Christ. The friend who has uttered the kindly warning leaves the Going-to-do, feeling thankful that he had courage given him to speak a word in season and confident of good results; but the results he anticipates never follow.

The Going-to-do is true to his character. He knows that now is the accepted time, now is the day of salvation, but he determines to see about it to-morrow or the day after. The morrow never comes, but in God's time the summons does. The first call, that of sickness, stretches him on a bed of pain. How can he turn his mind from the contemplation of present suffering to future possibilities? Weakness succeeds pain, and then the brain wanders, the powers of mind and body are alike enfeebled. He can neither think of the past, pray for pardon, lay hold on Christ by faith, or hope for a blessed future. It is too late for each and all of these things now. He dies, having done nothing for the well-being of his neighbours; there is no single instance of a fellow man helped onward by his example, or cheered by the sight of his success. "I was going to do," is all the plea he has to urge in excuse of his innumerable neglects.

Bethany.

A LITTLE village on the mountain's shoulder,
Facing towards the sunrise and the day,
Half-ruined now, and strewn with rock and boulder
That tell of homesteads long since swept away.
Yet every stone is dear that marks the sod
Hallowed by footprints of the Son of God!

Here, far removed from city strife and revel,
His wayworn steps oft turned at eventide;
The bitter scorn, the haunting hate and evil
Were all forgotten on the lone hillside.
Divine in lowliness, with joy He moved
To hold sweet converse with the friends He loved.

Without, the night dews on the olives glistened,
And the hill breezes through the vineyards stirred;
Within, one sat beside His feet and listened
With eager love that treasured every word.
All heaven seemed opened and made manifest
When her soul hearkened to its Kingly guest.

And when her sister, in her much providing Cumbered and anxious, with reproach was filled,
How sweet the words, half tender and half chiding,
With which the anger and the blame were stilled.
Teaching the truth all busy hearts should know,
That work in worship must have root and grow.

And thus His comings touched their lives with glory,
And happiness seemed borne on every breath;
Till sudden darkness dimmed their tranquil story,
And love was conquered in its strife with death.
No Master nigh to succour and to save,
They laid their brother in his rock-bound grave.

Long were the days of grief and separation,
While faith still questioned "When will He appear?"
But brief the heart-wrung cry of desolation [here!"
That told their yearning, "Lord hadst Thou been While o'er His human soul the anguish swept—
A sea of love and sorrow—Jesus wept.

THE HOME AT BETHANY.

They heard His pleading prayer the silence breaking,
And then the challenge, resolute and strong,
That smote the gates of death, the lost one waking,
And stirred all listeners in that eager throng;
It shook the hills, it thrilled the heavens above,
For Death was vanquished by eternal Love.

Oh living word! oh wondrous resurrection!
No great thank-offering could their rapture bring;
But in the fervent gladness of affection
They made a feast, and Martha served her King—
With yearning zeal and gratitude untold,
While Lazarus sat among them as of old.

But Mary came, with swift, impulsive motion,
Love culminating in one purpose sweet—
And in abandonment of pure devotion
Lavished her spikenard on His sacred feet.
And through the world, as through the ages gone,
The odour of that precious gift lives on.

Once more at Bethany, His own assembled
When the long strife and woe were overpast,
The stricken hearts that in His griefs had trembled
Rejoicing now, were with Him to the last.
His parting blessing given, their wondering eyes
Beheld Him pass in triumph to the skies.

Oh, little village on the mountain's shoulder,
Well may the ransomed love to gaze on thee!
Our feeble faith grows strong, our courage bolder,
Whene'er remembrance turns to Bethany.
And all our work and worship and our care
Shine in the brightness of the home-life there.

From the deep meaning of its tender story
We gather hope in grief, and rest in pain,
And see in gleams of His departing glory
The sunrise promise "He shall come again,"
And on its slopes, by white-robed angels trod,
Adore and bless Him, our Redeemer God!

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER VII.—GERALD'S VIEWS OF LIFE.

"WULF," said Gerald, in a slightly patronizing tone of voice, "when can you spare an evening to dine with me at the Thompsons'? They want to make your acquaintance."

"Very kind of them, I'm sure; but I haven't time to begin dining out."

"Oh, nonsense! You can't go and make an anchorite of yourself. Our father never did, and it's absurd for you to take that line. Besides, people will resent it, and professional men like you and me cannot afford to give ourselves airs and despise public opinion."

A faint suspicion of a smile hovered round Wulfric's lips, whilst Barbara tossed her head with a gesture of unconcealed contempt. It was evening, and Wulfric had joined the family party, as he generally did for a short time when he was at home.

"Of course the girls aren't going out anywhere at present," continued Gerald; "but it does not do for us to hold aloof too long. Come, now; be sensible, and say what day will suit you. The Thompsons were good enough to leave the choice to you."

Wulfric looked impatient, and muttered something that Gerald pretended not to hear.

"When did you see them?" asked Celia, with a little more interest than she generally appeared to take over anything.

"Hector came to my studio to-day," answered Gerald. "I was at work on your picture, and he offered me five pounds down for that study in chalk of your head when I had done with it."

Celia blushed and bridled and looked foolishly pleased, but a dark frown contracted Wulfric's face.

"I hope you knocked the fellow down for his impudence," he said, without, however, any heat of manner.

Gerald laughed, as if it were all a very good joke.

"What am I to say, Celia? Shall he have it or not?" he asked.

"Oh, I don't care!" she answered, with an affected toss of the head. "I'm sure it's nothing to me."

"I think we'll wait till we are a little more pressed for money before we begin selling portraits of our sisters to strangers," said Wulfric.

Gerald and Celia both laughed.

"Strangers, indeed! Much you know about it! Why, the Thompsons are amongst our very oldest friends."

"Who are they?"

"He is mayor of the place. They live in one of the best houses in the town. They are very well off. Hector has travelled a great deal, and been all round the world; and Fergus is a scholar, and has been to Oxford. There are two very jolly girls. You ought to know them, Wulf; and as they are never ill, it is no use waiting for a professional visit. You must just come with me some evening to dine there in a quiet way."

"Very well," answered Wulfric, after a short pause, "I will do as you wish."

Barbara looked half surprised, but made no comment, and Gerald was pleased to have carried his point.

"I've never seen any of your work yet, Gerald," remarked Wulfric a little later. "I've been so taken up with my own affairs that I have had no time to think of yours. What are you doing, and how are you getting on?"

"Come into my studio and smoke a cigar, and see for yourself," answered Gerald. "I've always plenty of work on hand. In fact, I have almost too much; for my ideas come so fast that I have not time to finish one thing before I have to begin another."

Gerald spoke in the self-satisfied way habitual to him, but Wulfric looked doubtful.

"I should have thought it would pay better to finish off one piece of work ready for sale before beginning another. Do your patrons like being kept waiting for an indefinite time for their pictures?"

Barbara began to laugh; but nothing ever put Gerald out. He answered with his careless smile: "Oh, as for that, I paint for my own pleasure and satisfaction more than for anything else. It's a necessity to me to give my thoughts expression in some way; the other is quite a secondary consideration."

"Ah!" returned Wulfric, with a kind of good-humoured dryness; and he gave Barbara a look of reproof as he caught her murmured words:

"Yes, quite; so long as he can sponge upon his relatives, and live in elegant idleness."

Wulfric had an odd sort of affection for this brilliant, handsome, good-for-nothing young brother of his—perhaps their radical differences of temperament formed a link of attraction; possibly Gerald's lofty and almost scornful patronage amused and pleased him by its frankness and simplicity. Any way, such was the state of the case. Gerald afforded him much entertainment and a little anxiety; and he was himself too large-hearted and raised above all petty jealousies and vanities to feel in the least annoyed by the tone adopted towards him by his brother. In point of fact, he found in it a great diversion.

He followed him willingly to his studio that night. His day's work had been laborious, and he felt more disposed for a chat with his brother than for burning the midnight oil over his books.

He had not visited the studio before. He had always been busy, and Gerald looked upon him in the light of a Goth or Vandal, upon whom the treasures of art would be entirely thrown away.

As a matter of fact, Wulfric, although not professing any knowledge of art, had lived long enough in London to have acquired a kind of unconscious culture on the subject; and his knowledge of anatomy gave him a critical insight into figure-drawing that received a severe shock as he stood before Gerald's canvases.

He put his hands in his pockets and looked at his brother's productions with an odd sort of compression about the corners of his lips. The room was warm and bright—the gas lighted it up well. Gerald cast himself into his favourite chair, and lighted a cigar.

"What do you expect to realise by the sale of a work like this?" asked Wulfric presently.

The picture represented the bearing of Elaine into the hall, where king Arthur and his queen and knights were assembled. It was only half finished, nevertheless the composition and colouring made a great impression upon the young doctor. He felt much disposed to laugh.

"Oh, as for that," answered Gerald negligently, "I suppose it would fetch a good sum in a London exhibition; but the Academy is no good unless one has influence at headquarters. The Grosvenor is more my style. I dare say I may send it there next year, if I get it finished in time. It's rather in the Burne-Jones style, don't you think?"

"Hum!" returned Wulfric, doubtfully. "The fact is, my dear fellow, pictures aren't in my line; but if you'll allow me to make the remark, that young female lying there is in an absolutely impossible attitude. Nothing short of an attack of catalepsy could throw her into a posture like that."

Gerald smiled indulgently.

"My good fellow, I had a model."

"I don't care if you had a dozen models—the thing's impossible."

"Well, I wonder who is the best judge of drawing—you or I?"

Wulfric laughed good-naturedly, and took a chair opposite to his brother.

"Now look here, Gerald, let's be serious a minute, and talk business. Will this art of yours ever make you a decent livelihood?"

Gerald waved his white hand as if such a question as that were quite beneath his concern; and the elder brother continued coolly—

"Because, if it wont, it's high time you turned your attention to something that will."

Gerald laughed negligently.

"Anything else, old fellow? Any other suggestion to make? Do you want me as a supplementary assistant in the surgery, like Barbara?"

"No, thanks; I'll dispense with that gratification. But what about the law? That was to have been your profession once, was it not?"

"Yes, once; but it was no go. A born artist can't go and settle down to that kind of drudgery. It's an impossibility, though not one that you will understand, I dare say."

Wulfric compressed the corners of his lips as he glanced round the artist's studio; but all he said was: "Didn't I hear something about a novel, or a poem, or something? Haven't you a second string to your bow?"

"Oh, yes! I have written a good deal at one time or another."

"And published anything?"

"No; but I have sometimes thought of bringing out a volume of poetry."

"At your own expense?"

"I dare say. What does it matter at whose expense?"

"It would matter very little if you were a millionaire, but, as things stand at present, it is of some considerable importance that you should begin to turn your many talents to some practical account. Have you ever made any money by your art so far?"

"I have sold a few sketches to the people about," answered Gerald carelessly. "I've never cared very much about that part of the business."

"But it's about time you began to care now. Is there any chance of your writings becoming at all profitable?"

Wulfric had his own ideas about the market value of the pictures, and was not sanguine there; but he could still hope that the literary work might be more successful.

"I don't think poetry pays well," answered Gerald; "at least, not till you've got your name up. But I've got a novel in hand which I think will make a sensation when it comes out, and a successful novelist's fortune is made from that day forward, I believe. But, for my own part, I believe in my pictures the most. My inspirations generally come to me in the form of pictures for the brush rather than the pen."

Wulfric mused a little and then spoke.

"Well, look here, Gerald. Of course you know as well as I do that you have got your way to make in life in some way or another. You have very little private property—so little as hardly to be worth considering—and, if anything happened to our mother, this house would be sold at once, and you would lose your home. I have every reason to hope that I shall be able to look after the girls; indeed, if I keep my health I think there is no reasonable doubt on that point; but you will have eventually to shift for yourself, and it seems to me that the sooner you learn to do so the better. You cannot go on for ever in this desultory easy-going way."

Wulfric spoke very quietly and good-temperedly; but Gerald looked decidedly offended at his tone.

"I do not quite understand you, nor do I know by what right you lay down the law to me. I am sure I work hard enough."

"That may be; but I want to see you turn your work to more account. I have a certain right to speak, seeing that I occupy the position of head of the house. Look here, Gerald; don't you take offence where none is meant. Just listen to me for half a minute. All I want you to do is this: make a start of some kind. Bestir yourself to sell your pictures, or to get commissions. I know this place thinks well of you—at least I am told so; see if you can't do something. Aren't there local exhibitions where you could get your pictures taken?"

Gerald looked very disdainful.

"I don't care about provincial exhibitions, thank you."

Wulfric was more patient than Barbara. He did not lose his temper.

"Well, go your own way," he answered quietly; "you ought to know the tricks of your own trade better than I, and I don't want to hurry you, or anything. We'll say no more about it for a few months to come, and then by that time I shall hope to hear of something a little more definite."

Gerald looked relieved. He was a born procrastinator, and a respite of some months just suited him. He was angry with Wulfric for daring in any way to take him to task, and yet there was something in his brother's strong personality and cool air of mastery that was very difficult to withstand.

So then the subject was changed, and the two young men parted amicably enough. Wulfric, judging his brother to a certain extent by himself, believed that he would be a little roused from his apathy and would at least bestir himself as much as in him lay, whilst Gerald told himself that there was no hurry, and that something was sure to turn up all in good time.

A few days later Wulfric and Gerald dined together at the house of Mr. Thompson, the leading magnate of St. Hilda. He was a pleasant, if rather a pompous man, and gave his guests an excellent dinner. He had lost his wife some years ago; but his two grown-up daughters, handsome, showy girls, played hostess with great good-humour and gusto, whilst the elder son was a noisy young fellow, who seemed to think the more he talked the better every one would be pleased.

The brothers were not the only guests present, but Wulfric being the stranger was considered of the most importance. He took in Miss Thompson, whom her brother called Georgie, and was made a good deal of by all present; for St. Hilda, though not much acquainted with the young doctor personally, was proud of his talents, which were now being recognised far and wide.

Wulfric was more at ease under the honour thus done him than Gerald had expected him to be, and he was not quite certain that it pleased him to see his brother acquit himself so well. In point of fact the young doctor, who had not unfrequently dined at the tables of his senior physicians and surgeons in London, and had met there men of great culture and eminence, was not at all dazzled or abashed by the attentions paid him by the good people of St. Hilda. He was able to hold his own very well, and would have been much amused had he been aware of his brother's feelings regarding him. It had always pleased Gerald to believe that because Wulfric was deeply engrossed by his profession, and had never indulged in the whirl of social dissipations that London life made possible to him, he had therefore become awkward and boorish and would hardly know how to conduct himself amongst the magnates of St. Hilda.

But this supposition proved quite groundless, and Gerald would have been equally surprised on his side had he been able to read Wulfric's opinions of the people whom he met.

A young man fresh from town is rather predisposed to hold somewhat cheaply an assembly comprising the quiet humdrum inhabitants of a small country town; but Wulfric was not inclined to be censorious for the most part, and made friends easily enough with the older men present. But what he did not like was the tone adopted by Hector Thompson and some of his contemporaries with whom his brother Gerald seemed very intimate.

Gerald and Hector were evidently very close friends, and at the end of the table, where, on the departure of the ladies, the young men clustered together, the noise was fast and furious, and the style of the talk, by what Wulfric could gather, anything but refined or elevating. His face clouded over unconsciously as his eye rested upon his brother's flushed face and sparkling eyes. He was pretty certain Gerald had been drinking more wine than was good for him, and his brows drew together into a frown of anxious thought.

Nobody was noticing him just now. Local politics were engrossing the elders of the party, and the juniors were full of their own noisy merriment. Wulfric belonged to neither set, and was free for the moment to indulge his own thoughts unchecked; but a voice at his elbow aroused him from the reverie into which he had fallen.

"I must say, Meynal, I am uncommonly glad to think you have settled at home for good."

Wulfric looked round quickly, and saw that Fergus Thompson had slipped into the seat beside him. Little as he knew of the Thompsons—so little indeed that he had almost forgotten their very name—he had had some slight acquaintance with the boys in their childhood, and had felt a sort of liking for Fergus.

"Thanks," he answered, with a quick glance at the speaker; "but you have some special reason for saying so, have you not?"

"Yes, I have. I think it's high time somebody was on the spot to look after that brother of yours."

Wulfric glanced at Gerald, and shrugged his broad shoulders.

"Brothers have not much influence over brothers," he said.

Fergus made an expressive gesture, as if he too had found out that much.

"True enough in most cases," he answered; "but in this instance you hold the purse-strings, don't you?"

"To a certain extent I do; but, so far, things are hardly settled. Gerald has never appealed to me for money yet."

"No? Well, I do not think it will be long before he does. He is here three or four evenings a week, and he cannot always win."

Wulfric's face grew grave, and rather stern.

"Do you mean that they gamble every night?"

"They play cards regularly, and for money. I don't know very much about what goes on. It isn't in my line. But Gerald is weak. He is very easily led. He wants a strong hand over him. It is Hector's fault more than his. Hector leads him into it. I have spoken to him again and again; but he won't listen. He says Gerald is his own master, and can do as he likes."

Wulfric made no reply, and a general rising to join the ladies put an end to the conversation for the present; but he went home with a mind full of anxious thought, feeling that the position he had taken up as head of his father's house was an onerous one indeed.

The substance of that conversation and the warning conveyed in it haunted him for long, as did also another doubt that began to weigh upon him at this time. He had known so little of his family during these long years that his relation towards them was often exceedingly difficult; and he had so little leisure in which to improve the acquaintance, that it seemed sometimes as if he never should be able to win their confidence, and must find out the points he wished to elucidate by appealing direct to the one sister who did trust him.

"Barbara," said Wulfric to her one evening, as they paced the shrubbery together instead of going into the study, "does Celia go much to the Thompsons, do you know?"

The question came so suddenly that Barbara was a little time in replying.

"I don't know much about Celia's doings. I dare say she goes there pretty often."

Wulfric bent his brows in thought.

"Do you think there is any attachment between her and Hector Thompson?"

"I don't know. Celia is always admired; but Hector has been away some time, and I don't often go to the house. I don't much care for the people."

"Nor I," answered Wulfric, "except Fergus—he's a good sort of fellow, I believe. Of course it's no business of mine exactly; Celia is of age, and must choose for herself. But that young Thompson is not the stamp of man I should like one of my sisters to marry; and with a fellow of that sort one never knows if he is in earnest or not. Celia is very inexperienced, and I don't wish to stand by and see her trifled with." And Wulfric's face looked very stern.

"What can you do?" asked Barbara.

"That's what I want to know. First of all, I must find out the truth. Have you noticed any thing?"

Barbara shook her head. She felt a little compunction as she realised how very little she heeded the affairs of other people, whilst Wulfric, with so much to occupy him, found time and occasion to be anxious on their account.

"Would not Celia confide in you?"

"No, indeed!"

Wulfric stopped short and looked down at his sister. His sternly-set face expressed a certain sense of dissatisfaction.

"How is that? I thought sisters always told those things to one another."

"I am sure Celia would not tell me."

"Nor you her, I suppose?"

"No."

Wulfric walked on again in silence, and Barbara paced at his side feeling half ashamed of herself, yet hardly knowing why.

"I can try and find out for you, Wulf," she said presently, rather timidly.

He made no reply.

"Shall I ask Celia?"

"No, certainly not."

"Is there nothing I can do to help you? It isn't fair all the worry should come upon you."

Wulfric stopped short again, and looked down at her steadily, in a way that made her glance fall before his.

"If you were fond of Gerald and Celia you might be able to help me: but as it is, I think you would most likely do more harm than good."

Barbara looked up to say pleadingly, "It isn't all my fault, Wulf, indeed it isn't. They have never been fond of me. We get on pretty well; but—but—you see——"

"Yes, I see; I have seen all along," answered Wulfric quietly. "No, Barbara, I don't suppose the fault is all yours, and it is not for me to lecture you. Only it is a pity. Our home might have been such a much happier place than it is."

HEART'S-EASE.

CHAPTER VII.

ALTHOUGH the visit to the sick girl was a short one, it was sufficiently long to make both mother and daughter very glad, and a little proud, too, of the distinction that had been put on them. It was not to be the last visit by any means—oh, dear, no! Ethel was determined that Aunt Regina should come down and see her new friends, and she herself had formed plans for reading to the sick girl from some of the many books in her little library at home.

It was perfectly wonderful how much brighter Ethel became in the thought of all this kindness. She seemed to throw off much of her petulant manner, and to be less exacting, and certainly less troublesome; Aunt Regina knew that. During the few days that followed she was as busy with her plans, and as happy in them, as a little girl could be. Her delight when Aunt Regina drove down to the cottage—for she could not walk—was only equalled by the joy she felt in seeing how happy these attentions made the sick girl and her mother. The books that were transported from the big house to the little one, the jellies that cook made, and the little dishes to tempt the feeble appetite of the sufferer, were enough to make the invalid open her eyes, and her mouth, too, at the mere sight of them. Of course she could neither read, nor eat, half the good things that were provided for her; but that did not matter. The little that she was able to take did her good. And, with true charity of spirit, the sick girl bethought her of another invalid a few doors off, who had quite as much need of nourishing food as she had, and that was the young woman who married last year, and was now the happy mother of a pretty babe. Ethel had no idea before of how much real pleasure there was in doing good. She seemed to enjoy the dainties and good things at home with a new relish. The world was brighter and sweeter for these acts of charity, which did more for the giver than the receivers. Nero had been allowed to go over to the village as a special act of grace, and had behaved himself, I must say, with the greatest propriety—in fact, so amiable did he become after one or two visits, that the ball of white fur became quite friendly with him, and might be seen watching for him from the window on those bright sunny days when Ethel brought him with her; and as soon as she was quite sure that he was in good humour, she would jump down from the sunny window sill, and, after pretending to bite his ears and otherwise punish him, would nestle down between his big paws, much to the delight of the two girls.

Ethel found that reading aloud was not the pleasantest part of her visitation. She did it, though, resolutely, as if to prove to herself that she was not above doing what was disagreeable when it was a duty. But, nevertheless, there were very frequent pauses in the readings. Sometimes it would be a robin perching just outside the window on the hawthorn tree, whose saucy demeanour made both girls laugh; or, perhaps, a bee would come sailing majestically in, making as much fuss and noise as if he was a person of great importance; and after having examined the beautiful blossoms about the room, and having made the sick girl rather anxious as to his movements, would sail out again, without even an apology for his intrusion. But whatever it was, it gave Ethel an opportunity for talking a little instead of reading.

"I think I must tire you with this story," she said on one of those occasions, as she raised her head from her book. "I always think that talking is so much pleasanter than reading; there is more variety in it."

The invalid smiled. Certainly no one could complain of want of variety in Ethel's conversation.

"I wish you would talk a little, miss; I like it," she said.

"I hardly know where to begin, Namesake. I suppose I had better commence with myself."

Namesake nodded assent. She never spoke much, and when on occasion she made an effort to do so, it cost her dear afterwards.

"Then I must tell you about nurse—I call her nurse, because she was my nurse when I was quite a tiny infant—ever since I was born, in fact; and do you know what she said to me yesterday? Can you guess?"

Of course Namesake could not guess, and so she shook her head.

"She said that I was a different girl all last week. What do you think of that?"

"I am very glad to hear it miss; but I should never have thought you were bad."

"Well, no, Namesake, not bad like those little girls that get taken up by the police and put into prison—not like that; but she said I was always very troublesome. Do you know what she calls me?"

Namesake again shook her head.

"She calls me 'a spoiled child.' Is not that cruel of her?"

"Perhaps it may have been true, miss. You may have been spoiled without knowing it."

Ethel laughed heartily. After a moment or so she became very serious, and whispered—

"I think you may be right, Namesake. Between ourselves, I think I have been."

"It must be bad for people to be spoiled like that, miss."

With a comical look of confession and gravity on her face, Ethel said: "I think I shall go on with the reading now, Namesake; I have got tired of talking. We can have another talk after a bit."

When the reading had again become slightly wearisome, Ethel put the book away; and turning to Namesake she said: "Now I am going to ask you about yourself. Do you feel any better?"

A very weary but decided shake of the head was the answer.

"I know I shall never be better, miss; God whispered that to me long ago."

"And were you not frightened? I should be terribly alarmed if I had such a thing whispered to me." The sick girl had spoken so quietly about it, that for a moment Ethel had thoughts of little Samuel's temple experience, when God's word actually sounded in his ears.

"I don't think you would, miss. Not if it really came to you as it came to me. It was the voice that always speaks to us, if we will listen to it. The inner voice. It told me that I might be called home any time. I always think I should like most to go with God's angels when all the world is asleep." And the sick girl's face lit up with sudden pleasure, as though the vision of that heavenly home came to her with exquisite joy.

Ethel was strangely interested, and moved. She sat in silence, as though some charm had fallen on her; and the wan face of the sick girl seemed to her to gather new beauty as she spoke of going home.

Perhaps you may have guessed already something of the thoughts that were trooping through her busy brain. Ever since she had seen this poor sick girl she had been thinking much of her own mother, whom she could but dimly remember, if indeed she did remember her at all. A beautiful oil picture of her hung in the drawing-room at home, and the face in that picture was so sweet and compassionate, and the eyes so full and dark, that they followed her all over the room with a tender, almost inviting, glance that was to Ethel's vivid imagination life-like. So that whenever she thought of her mother at all, this picture filled up the entire of her mind; and although she declared that she could remember her mother's face, I think myself that the portrait had a great deal to do with her memory.

But now, as she listened to her namesake talking about heaven as a home to which she was looking forward, with the pleasure of a tired and faithful child, she mixed up the picture of her mother with this delicate face; and when she could command herself sufficiently to speak, she asked: "Do you think people ever know one another in heaven, Namesake?"

The unusual exertion of speaking had tired the sick girl, who replied by a shake of her head.

"I think they must," she went on, with an assured voice. "If our very own selves are there, we ought to, you know. I'm sure I should know you, and I hope you would know me."

This time the girl nodded and smiled.

"Well, now," continued Ethel, very earnestly, and tenderly, as though she had come to a very important part of her discourse, "suppose you should. And suppose my darling mother should meet you. Would you give her a message from me?"

"Yes! Oh yes, miss!" And the white face was lit up with smiles of genuine pleasure. "But what should I say, miss?"

"Say that I am trying to be a good girl, and to love and obey Aunt Regina, and to take care of papa, and to be kind to everybody. God will help me if I ask Him, and I do ask Him every day now." Ethel said this with a great effort, as though she had worked herself up to it; and then she stopped suddenly, as though she could go no further, and her large eyes overflowed with tears, much to her relief.

For some time the silence was unbroken. The sick girl sat with a happy smile on her face, although the tears were quietly coursing down her cheeks also; but they were not tears of sorrow, you may be sure.

After dinner that evening Colonel Seymour was sauntering round the garden, as his custom was, pulling here and there a dead leaf or blossom from the roses, or stopping to admire the brilliant colours of the geranium beds, and to suggest some alteration in the arrangement for next season. He delighted in his garden, although he was far too busy a man to be able to spend much time in it. Almost always he was accompanied by Ethel, who talked about the flowers with all the authority of a pupil of Aunt Regina's, who, as everybody ought to know, was quite a famous amateur.

To-day Ethel was with him, as usual; but so quiet and so preoccupied was she, that her father more than once cast a sidelong glance at her, to see whether she looked well. He tried to engage her in conversation about the garden. "I think we ought to have another bed cut here, to match the one yonder," he said, pointing with his stick to the spot.

"Yes, perhaps so, papa."

"Come, come, my dear child. That's not your usual style of talking. There is something on your mind. What is it?"

"I want to ask you a question, papa."

"Certainly. I knew there was something. Go on."

"Do people know one another in heaven?" And a very flushed face was upturned to his.

"My darling child, who or what has put such thoughts into your head?" her father enquired, as he removed his hat and brushed his forehead. In truth, the question was so very unexpected that it somewhat agitated him. The oil portrait was not forgotten by him, you may be sure; and that other home beyond the skies had become very real for him since his wife died. But he had never spoken very much to Ethel about her mother, except on those rare occasions when some special circumstance called forth some special confidence.

"Mamma's picture," she said.

"Come and let us sit down here and talk it over, darling," he said gently, as he led the way to a rustic seat close by.

"My little girl must remember that we are not permitted to know very much about these matters. God has wisely hidden them from us, in order that we may trust Him the more. We know that He is there; and where He is, we and those we love must be safe and happy. But what has caused you to ask the question?"

"The sick girl told me to-day that God had whispered to her some time ago that she would never be better, and she thinks herself that she is worse. She says she wishes to go to her home in heaven. And I thought, papa dearest, that if she ever met darling mamma, she could tell her that I was trying to be a good and useful girl."

"May God bless you, my darling!" said her father, kissing her. And she felt a tear drop on her hand as he did so.

NATURAL HISTORY NOTES

ON THE REVISED VERSION OF THE BIBLE.

NO. I.—THE WILD OX.

IN the Revised Version of the Old Testament several changes are made in the names of animals. In this and following papers it is proposed to make some remarks upon both the new and the old names. We take first one with which all British children are familiar—the unicorn. No doubt most of us, on first hearing this animal's name read out from the pulpit or at family worship, thought we knew all about it. Of course it was the horse with a horn that faces the lion in supporting the crown—a very graceful animal, and very terrible with that long sharp horn between his eyes. After a few years we learnt that this unicorn never had any being. He was the invention of those people called "Heralds," who make out armorial bearings for people to put on their carriages. Having lost our first unicorn, we were very glad to hear of some learned men who told us that the proper unicorn was the rhinoceros. We went to see him at the Zoo, and found that he really had a horn on his nose, though not just between his eyes. Perhaps some young readers looked to find the rhinoceros mentioned in the Revised Version. If so, they were disappointed. Instead of rhinoceros, they would find "wild ox." Now let us see what reason there is for this. One of the verses of the Bible tells us "His horns are like the horns of the ——." Rhinoceros plainly will not do to fill up the gap. He has usually only one horn; if he has two, the second is much smaller than the other. This animal has two, and probably exactly alike—for they stand in the Scriptures for two of the tribes of Israel. Besides, he is to push with them, and the rhinoceros would find it very awkward to do that. Then the unicorn is spoken of as skipping. If you have ever seen a rhinoceros, you can hardly think of his doing that, even when young. The unicorn is an animal of great strength. Well, that would do for the rhinoceros, but for many other animals also. Another text tells us that we cannot yoke the unicorn to the plough, or make him draw the cart at harvest. Well, you will say, of course you cannot do that with a rhinoceros. But then there is nothing in the rhinoceros that would make you think of doing so. Probably this animal is much like those used for the plough, only not at all manageable. Then one of the prophets speaks of unicorns coming down to be sacrificed along with bulls and bullocks. He would not talk of sacrificing any animal that did not resemble those usually employed for sacrifice. There is one more passage which is difficult, but the general idea is of lifting up the horns; and even the tame ox does that sometimes, in a very unfriendly way.

LITHUANIAN BISON. (B. urus.)

There have been in all countries in former times, and in some at the present day, wild oxen, which answer to every point in this description. Over the plains of North America wild buffaloes or bisons roam in huge herds. They have certainly become scarcer in this century, and the Pacific railways will hasten on their end by helping to fill the country with their greatest enemy—man. In Africa there are also bisons scattered about more thinly than in America. These animals differ from tame oxen chiefly in that their hind quarters are smaller, stronger, and fitted for quick movement. All their strength is gathered about their shoulders, which, as well as their necks and heads, are covered with shaggy hair. They may be seen careering over the plains, throwing up their heels, and lowering their heads, and then again lifting up their horns as if they were hurling a foe into mid air. A nearer view reveals a round, rolling, fiery eye, and sharp horns. By the aid of these the animal may hold his own against a panther, or even a lion. A recent traveller in Africa gives the tale of an encounter with a buffalo, the terrible charge which he made, and renewed again and again, to the dismay of his antagonist, who wondered when it would end. The wild ox of the Bible would display all these traits, and perhaps was larger and stronger than those we know now, for the remains of larger animals are discovered from time to time.

HUNTED WILD OX.

Now there are six texts in which the wild ox or unicorn is mentioned, from which these six questions may be answered:—

1. Where is the wild ox spoken of as strong?
2. Where is he spoken of as skipping?
3. Where as pushing with the horns?
4. Where as coming to sacrifice?
5. Where is it said that he cannot be made to plough, or draw a waggon?
6. Where is lifting up the horn spoken of?

HIDDEN TEXTS.

NO. III.

Write out these texts, and then mark one word in each line, so as to form another text.

1. My son, fear thou the Lord.—Prov. xxiv. 21.
2. My son, despise not the chastening of the Lord.—Prov. iii. 2.
3. He shall give His angels charge concerning thee.—Psa. xxxvii. 4.
4. Have mercy upon me, O Lord, for I am weak.—Psa. vi. 2.
5. Arise, O God, plead Thine own cause.—Psa. lxxiv. 22.
6. The Lord looketh on the heart.—1 Sam. xvi. 7.

NO. IV.

One word from each line will give a text showing David's trust in God.

1. He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness.—Psa. xxiii. 3.
2. All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth.—Psa. xxv. 10.
3. The Lord is my light and my salvation.—Psa. xxvii. 1.
4. The Lord is the strength of my life.—Psa. xxvii. 1.
5. The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.—Psa. xxiii. 1.
6. I will be glad and rejoice in Thy mercy: for Thou hast considered my trouble.—Psa. xxxi. 7.
7. He shall feed His flock like a shepherd.—Isa. xl. 11.
8. Thou shalt not be forgotten of Me.—Isa. xliv. 21.
9. They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing.—Psa. xxxiv. 10.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS

CHAPTER VIII.—LITTLE JACK STONE.

AN UNEXPECTED VISITOR.

"I DOES try to be patient, I does," said little Jack Stone to himself, as he fetched a deep sigh and twisted his hands restlessly together. "But it ain't easy, that it ain't; and if 'twouldn't bother mother to see me, I could cry, I could."

Jack looked round him as he spoke, for although like many children he was fond of talking out loud to himself, he did not care to be overheard. But he need not have been at all afraid. The little cottage was quite empty this hot summer's morning. From where he lay in the inner room the child could see the open door, and watch the branches of white roses as they danced up and down in the golden sunshine. He could hear the sound of the waves upon the shingly beach fifty feet below, and the cries of the sea birds as they circled about the cliffs or skimmed over the shining water; but he could not see the sea itself. He could catch nothing but a glimpse of the steep path that led down the face of the cliff, and the roses framing the doorway. For three weeks he had lain there, horribly tired of inactivity, yet doomed to it for some weeks to come still, and the child who had never before been ill and had spent all his life out of doors, indulging in every hardy enjoyment and active prank that ingenuity of body or mind could suggest, felt as if the long weary days never would end, and as if he could really bear imprisonment no longer. Had it not been for the trouble in his mother's eyes whenever he gave way to his feverish grief and impetuous sense of despair, little Jack would have been less brave than he had shown himself to be.

But it was very hard to lie all day alone in that close little room, with the sea breezes and sunshine nearly but not quite within reach—so hard that the tears would sometimes roll down the brown cheeks that were beginning to look pale and hollow with the confinement to the house; and on this particular day Jack felt as if his powers of endurance were almost exhausted.

"I don't know what I'll do all day—that I don't. Miss Barbara she said as she'd not be able to come, as there was other folks as wanted her more. I did say as I'd try and be brave and not selfish, and not fret if she couldn't come so often; but it didn't seem so hard then, when she was sitting by and telling me of other folks worse than me, but it don't seem now as if anybody could want her more than me. Alice has one of her cross fits on, and nobody else will be back not before evening."

And Jack heaved another deep sigh, and gave the same sort of instinctive look round afterwards, although he knew that his mother was far away.

"Oh, dear! oh, dear! I wonder what I'll do all day. I wish I could go to sleep like a dog and only wake up when there was something to do," and then Jack's voice suddenly ceased and his eyes took an intent and listening look as he raised his head from the pillow. "Sounds like somebody coming down the path," he said softly. "Perhaps it's Miss Barbara, after all. 'Taint Dr. Meynal, he makes more noise than that."

The next moment Jack's eyes were bewildered by the sight of a totally unexpected apparition. A young lady, dressed all in white, with a wide brimmed hat and drooping white feathers had stopped at the cottage door and was knocking gently upon the panels.

"Come in, please," said the bewildered Jack. "There ain't nobody at home but me, and I can't move. Was it mother as you wanted to see? She's out washing. She won't be home till night."

The young lady had approached whilst Jack was speaking, and now stood at his bedside. The little boy saw then that it was Miss Dumaresq from the Cedars.

"It was you I wished to see, Jack, not your mother," said Reinée with a very sweet smile. "I heard you had broken your leg, and I came to hear all about it, and see if there was anything you wanted. May I sit down a little while? You are so nice and cool in here. I have a brother who once broke his leg, and he wanted such a lot of amusing. He kept me hard at work amusing him for ever so many weeks."

Jack's face expressed a vivid interest and pleasure.

"How did he break his leg?" he asked. "Did he get climbing up rocks like me?"

"No, his was broken at football when he was at school; but they sent him home to be nursed. He kept me busy, I can tell you. How do you manage to amuse yourself all day?"

"It's pretty dull," answered Jack, but he spoke brightly, for he was wonderfully cheered by all he heard. "Sometimes I get dreadful low, but I does try to be patient—I does indeed. Miss Barbara comes in pretty often; only she's so busy now she says she can't come as much as she did—and the new clergyman—the curate they call him—he came once; but I expect he's busy too. I liked him, though he looked grave and was so tall, I was most frightened at first; but I think he's a good man, don't you?"

Reinée smiled at the question.

"I hope he is. I suppose he is as he is a clergyman. I have only seen him in church. He preached a very good sermon. He has not been here long, has he?"

"No, only since Mr. Sargent got ill and had to go away. I wish he'd come again. I couldn't quite understand all he said. I want him to explain it some more: but perhaps you could tell me as well as he." And he cast a quick searching glance at the face of his visitor.

Reinée's face encouraged him to proceed.

"He said as having pain to bear ought to make us better like—'bring us near to God,' he said; and he talked about Jesus carrying of His cross, and said it was something like that if we were brave and tried to be like Him. I can't remember it all—but it was nice, it was—only I don't think I rightly understand it."

Reinée's face had grown sweet and serious. Little as she was used to put her deeper thoughts into words, she felt more able to do so in presence of this simple childish questioner than she would have done before one of her own age and station.

"Perhaps, Jack, he meant that as Jesus had carried that heavy cross, and borne all the pain and shame for us without one murmur, so we ought not to complain if He asks us to bear pain too when He sends it; but try to be brave and patient as He was. We can none of us be much like Him; but we must all try to copy Him as well as we can."

Reinée's fair face had flushed as she spoke, and Jack looked up at her with deeply seated admiration and reverence.

"Yes, that was what Mr. Leslie said—but I think you make it clearer, I do. I guess you're ever so good. I just know as you couldn't ever do anything wrong."

Reinée smiled back at him as she answered simply: "Indeed, Jack, you're quite wrong there. You can't see my faults and I can't see yours; but God sees both our hearts and He knows that I have my sins just as much as you have. Perhaps, in His sight, mine look blacker than yours." And, as the girl glanced round the poor room and contrasted her own lot with that of the little lad beside her, she was filled with a deep sense of humility and gratitude, feeling as perhaps she had never done before to the same extent that from those to whom much has been given much will be required.

But Jack looked at her with an incredulous smile and shook his head vigorously. Reinée did not pursue the argument.

"You have not told me about yourself, Jack; nor how you met with your accident."

"I was climbing after sea-gulls' eggs, I was," answered Jack. "And I got giddy like and fell off and broke my leg, I might have been killed, I might."

"Poor little boy! How pleased you must all be that things were no worse."

"Father and mother is," answered Jack, his face working a little oddly and expressing a variety of feelings, "but I ain't sure that I am. Sometimes I think it might have been best for them if I'd a been killed outright."

"Oh, Jack!" exclaimed Reinée shocked.

"I can't help thinking things sometimes," explained Jack, defending himself for his assertion. "Times is so hard. I sometimes don't know what will become of us. Father's been ill and hasn't had no regular work for months, and can't get nothing but a job now and then, and mother has to slave at washing or charing till sometimes she's almost beat. Then there's Alice as is worse than no good; and David who's at sea and used to help a bit hasn't been heard of for ever so long. And I thought as I'd be able to help as I was getting a big boy, and I took to getting sea-weed and shells and eggs and things and selling them in the town, and I did make a bit like that now and again. And now I've broke my leg and I'm only a burden and there'll be doctoring to pay for as well, and I shan't be no good for ever so long; and I think we'll all have to starve—we were pretty nigh it before," and Jack's brave little face quivered all over.

The tears were very near to Reinée's eyes, but she would not let them be seen.

"No, Jack," she answered gently; "you shall not starve. I will take care of that. Tell me, what sort of work can your father do?"

"He can turn his hand to most things, can father," answered Jack; "but he likes minding cows and pigs and poultry best. He was brought up on a farm, he was."

"And what wages does he earn when he is in work?"

"He gets half-a-crown a day when he's jobbing; but he can't never hardly get more than a day or two in a week, and sometimes he gets nothing. He ain't strong since he's been ill, and folks seem to think as he can't work; but he can now."

"And if he got regular work at the Hall farm at eighteen shillings or a pound a week, would you be pretty comfortable then?"

Jack's eyes sparkled, and he rubbed his hands gleefully together.

"Why, we'd live in clover altogether then. I can't hardly believe as such a thing would ever happen."

"We will see about it, Jack. It shall be a secret between us; but I almost fancy it will."

Reinée know her kind, indulgent father would never deny her her first request of the kind. She knew he was not altogether suited with farm hands, and was confident that any protégé of hers would be taken at once.

"And now, Jack," continued the girl, opening a dainty little basket she carried, "don't you think it's almost time you had some dinner? My brother was always wanting a meal when he was getting better. He said it passed away the time better than anything."

Jack's eager eyes expressed the state of his feelings eloquently. They sparkled with delight as the basket was unpacked, and its contents spread upon the bed. First there came a snowy napkin, that served as a table-cloth; then followed two light, yet substantial, chicken patés, some slices of pudding, such as Jack had never seen before, and in a little basket by themselves some such big ripe strawberries as made Jack's eyes grow round with wonder.

"Now I want to see you make a good dinner, Jack," said Reinée, "and then I must be thinking of going."

Jack needed no further encouragement; but set to work upon the tempting viands with an energy that showed how sharp-set was his boy's appetite, all the more sharp from the fever that had hung about him for some time, but had left him now altogether.

Whilst he was enjoying his food, and Reinée was enjoying the sight of his pleasure, she was aware of the tapping as of crutches approaching from without, and presently a lame girl of apparently about fourteen years of age came limping into the cottage and across to the inner room. Her face was thin and brown with the sun, but it was contracted either by pain or temper into an expression far from pleasant; and there was something in the expression of the sombre dark eyes so hostile and menacing that Reinée started as she met their glance, although she smiled the next moment at her own weakness.

"Is that your sister?" she asked of Jack.

"Yes," he answered, rather uneasily, "that's our Alice."

"Alice," said Reinée, "will you come and have some dinner with Jack? I am sure he will spare you a share. I dare say you are ready for some as well as he."

But the lame girl, who had stopped short upon the threshold as soon as she saw the stranger, only scowled darkly as Reinée spoke, and turning abruptly round, limped away upon her crutches; but she paused to take some crusts of bread from the cupboard in the outer room, though she had tacitly refused to partake of Jack's banquet.

Reinée looked perplexed, and the brother hung his head as if ashamed.

"Don't be vexed, please," he said timidly; "it's only our Alice. She can't abide strangers nor gentlefolk, and she's a bit queer always. Dr. Meynal thinks as he could do her hip good if she'd go to the hospital; but she goes pretty nigh mad at the thought of such a thing. Folks do say as she's wrong in the head; but she's a good scholar, and likes books a deal better than I do. She's good to us, is Alice, but mother's often troubled about her.

"Perhaps its being lame that makes her shy with strangers," said Reinée, gently. "Never mind that, Jack. I will make friends with her, if I can, and if I can't I must do without. Now tell me, as you don't care much about books, is there anything else you think would amuse you, if we could manage it for you?"

Jack's face beamed with pleasure.

"You are good, you are, a real first-rater!" Reinée smiled to herself, at the thought of what her mother would think, could she hear Jack's eulogium upon her daughter. "I saw an old fisherman mounting and drying sea-weed once, and he sort of showed me how to do it and it looked jolly; but it wants blotting paper, and a book on purpose to mount it when it's done properly, and I never could get the things, though he said it paid in the long run."

"If I were to see about those, could you get the sea-weed?" asked Reinée, smiling.

"Oh, yes! Alice would get me that; but then it's so dark in here, I'm not sure that I could see to do any good," and Jack's face fell suddenly.

"Couldn't you be out of doors, now that it is so warm and bright? If you were lifted carefully, I don't think it would hurt your leg."

Jack looked eagerly out at the open door.

"I should like it no end," he said wistfully, "but the bed wouldn't get out at the door, and I don't think the doctor would let me lie on the ground."

"No," answered Reinée, smiling, "I don't suppose he would. Well, we must think what we can do; and I must be going, but it won't be long before I come again."

"I'd like to see you every day, I would," said Jack with his broadest and brightest smile; and Reinée smiled and stroked his curly head and went away, leaving a great deal of sunshine behind her in the heart of one weary little child.

Every one knows how strong a hold first protégés take upon the imagination of youthful workers. Reinée went away full of schemes for the benefit of the Stones in general and little Jack in particular, and so engrossed was she in her thoughts that she met Wulfric Meynal face to face on the narrow cliff path before she was in the least aware of his proximity.

"I have just come from one of your patients, Dr. Meynal," she said, holding out her hand with a smile. "I was just wishing to see you about him. He is so tired of lying in that dark room, poor little fellow, and I wanted to know, if I had a sort of couch fixed for him against the cottage wall out of the sun, whether you would consent to his being carried there on fine days to lie there instead of on his bed. He would find it much less dull and would be getting the fresh air and sunshine."

"It would be a capital thing for him," answered Wulfric, "if it could be managed."

"I think I could manage it easily enough, if you approved it. I feel so sorry for the child. It is so very dull for him."

Wulfric smiled with just a touch of grimness. He was thinking of some of the misery he often witnessed, before which little Jack's troubles sank into insignificance; but he said nothing of this to Reinée. How could she understand? she, whose whole life was one dream of luxury and pleasure.

"If you can carry out such a plan, you will be doing him a great kindness, Miss Dumaresq, as well as an undoubted benefit."

It was altogether a red-letter day for little Jack Stone. First there had been this wonderful visit from the young lady at the Hall. Then his doctor had paid him a flying visit, and told him he had made a friend of the queen of the fairies—an opinion he was quite prepared to endorse—and later on, about three o'clock in the afternoon, the village carpenter and his assistant came up to the cottage with a lot of blocks and lengths of wood, and were busy there for a couple of hours—so busy, that they could not hear Jack's oft-repeated questions to know what they were about. Before they left, however, the man looked in, and told him his orders were to make a wide sort of couch in the shelter of the north wall, and that he believed some cushions and things were to be sent down from the Hall to make it comfortable by day. The cushions could be taken in at night easily, whilst the woodwork was immoveable and safe from molestation. It seemed indeed to Jack as if a wonderful new life had begun for him.

The cushions came down from the Hall that same evening, together with a message that Stone had better step up to see the farm bailiff the first thing the following day.

There were bright faces and cheerful hearts in the little cliff cottage that night. There had been anxiety, sickness and trouble there for many long days, but it seemed as if brighter times were dawning at last.

Only the lame girl's face was dark and clouded, and it was long before Jack could coax her to say what was in her mind; but at last it came out.

"I hate taking things from rich folks. They just come to amuse themselves and give what don't cost them nothing, and think themselves awful kind and good. I won't have none of it. They don't do it because they care for us, only to amuse themselves. They wouldn't lift a finger for us if it gave them any trouble, that they wouldn't, only when it's a sort of game."

Jack was silent. He did not in the least understand the bearing of his sister's excited speech.

Reinée went home that day in a thoughtful mood, and for many days, as she pursued with unostentatious and loving care the little offices she had set herself to perform, a shade of unusual gravity rested on her sweet face, and her eyes would grow dreamy with the thoughts that were rising within her.

She was very happy, and yet often sad during these days of new experiences. The sight of poverty and pain saddened her again and again, as did also the uncomplaining cheerfulness or stolidness of the sufferers; and yet, despite these sorrowful sights, Reinée was beginning to experience some of that strange sweetness that is felt by all those who take up a labour of love in a tender, humble, child-like spirit.

She felt her ignorance in spiritual things very keenly at this time, and longed for a friend to guide and teach her. She could not, alas, go to her mother, and after the unconscious rebuff she had once received at Barbara's hands, she felt shy of re-opening the subject with her. She saw more of Juliet Granby just now, and the two girls had become increasingly intimate of late. And so one day after Juliet had been spending the afternoon with her, Reinée propounded the question she had been pondering with a little more abruptness than was usual with her.

"Juliet, are you religious?"

"I hardly know what you mean, Reinée," answered Juliet quickly. "Of course I read the Bible—sometimes—and go to church, and all that sort of thing; but I never profess to understand the ecstatic sort of religious enthusiasm that seems to fill some people. I should not care to have it if I could. I think that poetry and music are my most real religion."

"Yes?" queried Reinée dreamily, "I have heard other people say the same; but do they satisfy you?"

"Satisfy me? Why no, of course not. Who could be satisfied in this narrow, narrow little life?"

"Some people are," answered Reinée in the same dreamy way. "That dear old blind woman by the church is quite the happiest person I know; and yet she has had more troubles than fall to the lot of most. It is her religion that makes her happy. It is a real, living thing to her. Why do not we feel the same?—we who have so much more to be thankful for."

Juliet smiled with something of scorn, but Reinée did not see, neither would she have been daunted by a little contempt. She was too much in earnest.

"My dear Reinée, surely you are not going to institute comparisons between our minds and those of poor untaught people like that. Don't you know that it is always the most ignorant of the community who are the most religious—or superstitious? When you come to that level it does not much matter which you call it."

Reinée made no reply. She did not appear shocked—unfortunately she had known too much of such talk to hear it with any great surprise; but her eyes grew deep with the intensity of the thoughts at work within her, and presently she said softly: "You can call it superstition if you will, Juliet; but I know that there is a grand, grand truth behind—a truth worth all the learning of this world put together. When we come to die, Juliet, how do you think things will look to us then?"

Juliet laughed uneasily.

"What dismal spirits you are in to-day, Reinée! What is the matter with you?"

The face that Reinée turned towards her companion was anything but dismal.

"I think," she said with a peculiarly sweet smile, "that I am learning to be happier than I have ever been before."

Juliet looked at her companion with some dissatisfaction.

"Is that because you are growing religious?" she asked with a half impatient sigh. "It seems to me that every one gets spoiled when they begin to take up——"

And then Juliet stopped short, half ashamed of the thought that had prompted these words.

Reinée looked at her thoughtfully.

"I was hoping you would be able to help me," she said in her simple way.

Juliet's cheek flushed, and her glance fell in a sort of compunction she could not understand.

"I am afraid I can't," she said with a humility very unusual with her; and as she walked home and thought again of Reinée's words and look, she almost wished she had been able to help her friend along the narrow way that she had often said she more than half despised.

MARY OF BETHANY,

AND THE VALUE OF A ROMAN PENNY.

THE critics of all ages have a marvellous faculty for discussing improbabilities in a narrative, and for passing from that discovery to a doubt or denial of its truth. The sacred histories have not escaped this ordeal, and many, even of those who profess to accept the Gospels as in the main accurate and trustworthy, yet refuse their credence when anything improbable appears to be recorded. This is quite different from the rejection of miracles. Some students accept some or all of the miracles, and yet hesitate about narrations which, if miracles are admitted ought surely to give little occasion for doubt. This refinement of criticism is especially frequent when the Gospels record two similar events. It is thought to be unlikely that almost exactly the same incidents should have occurred twice; and from this unlikelihood men jump to the conclusion that the records are slightly different, and each of them slightly inaccurate, accounts of one event.

This criticism has been employed with respect to the miracles of feeding. Canon Cook, when writing of the feeding of four thousand men, says: "Nothing can be clearer than the distinction between this miracle and that of the five thousand as stated in Our Lord's own words. Yet the ingenuity of several modern commentators has discovered, in spite of the narrative, that the two are but different statements of the same event." Precisely the same kind of criticism is observable with respect to the account given by St. Luke of the anointing of our Saviour and the similar occurrence related by the other three evangelists. These records, say the captious commentators, are so nearly alike that we must believe them to be only two slightly different accounts of a single transaction. It is not likely that there should be two Marys performing the same act of devotion in the houses of two Simons.

But when we look more carefully into the matter, we shall see that the unlikely circumstances are more on the other side. In the first place, it is not properly a question of two Marys. The name of the "woman who was a sinner" is nowhere mentioned in Scripture. It is true that, for some hundreds of years, there has been a tradition, more or less accepted by the church, that the "woman who was a sinner" was Mary Magdalene. But for this there is not a particle of evidence, and the only excuse for the supposition is that Mary Magdalene is introduced to us by St. Luke immediately after his account of the anointing. On the other hand, we may rather say that there is clear proof that the two women were not identical, for, in the phraseology of the New Testament, it is not at all the same thing for a woman to be "a sinner" and to be "possessed of devils"; the one marks moral guilt, the other spiritual infirmity, to which guilt is no more necessarily attached than it is now to madness. In fact, as we should now say, the one was a "bad woman," the other was a "mad woman." As to the name Simon, it was as common as John or James. Perhaps we should say more common. Hence, it is usual to distinguish the Simons by descriptions which have the effect of surnames. Thus we have Simon surnamed Peter, Simon the tanner, one Simon a Cyrenian; and in these two accounts Simon the Pharisee, and Simon the leper. Again, it is clear that Mary of Bethany was a daughter of Simon the leper. But that Simon appears only by name. No doubt his disease had compelled his removal from home, and hence his house is in one place called the "house of Martha," who was clearly the eldest of the family. Simon the Pharisee does appear conspicuously. He was entertaining our Lord when the woman came in. To him the parable of the two debtors was specially addressed. It is very certain that he would not have spoken of his own daughter as "a woman that was a sinner." We take it to be proved then that there were two different Simons and two different women. That two women should have selected the same method of attesting their devotion cannot be deemed improbable by those who remember how common a thing in Palestine, Greece, and Italy were the use of precious oils and unguents. We may pass rapidly by other differences. The story of St. Luke appears clearly to be placed in Galilee, and in the first year of our Lord's ministry. The story of the other evangelists is most distinctly placed in Bethany, and within two days of our Lord's betrayal. Again, our Saviour distinctly speaks of the motive of the "woman who was a sinner," that "she loved much"; and of her reward, that her "sins were forgiven." Of Mary He says that "she did it for My burial," and for her reward He promised that her name and story should be published wherever the Gospel was preached.

We now come to another interesting question, namely, that of the costliness of the spikenard used by Mary of Bethany. We are told that it might have been sold for three hundred pence, and we have to consider what that means. Now we all know that a Roman denarius, which is translated by "a penny," contained as much silver as would be equal to sevenpence halfpenny of our money. Reckoning in this way three hundred pence would be equal to about 9*l.* 7*s.* of our money. But historians and political economists alike have pointed out that the value of different coins in various countries and at various times is not to be learned by simply ascertaining the weight of silver or gold they contain. A Roman penny contains as much silver as sevenpence halfpenny of our money; but if it would purchase five sixpenny loaves it would really be equal to half-a-crown. The real question, therefore, is, "What amount of useable commodities would such and such a coin purchase in any given country at a given time?" And for such a comparison, perhaps no commodity is more useful than bread or grain. It is universally used—it is the prime necessary of life; and if we could learn how much bread the Roman penny would purchase in the time of our Lord, we shall know as nearly as possible the present value of three hundred pence. Now the value of money changed very rapidly in Rome during the two hundred years before Christ. In the time of Polybius, about 150 years before Christ, a bushel and a-half of wheat could be bought in Southern Italy for four pence of our money. Victuals and lodging at an inn cost on an average about one farthing of our money per day. But a great change took place. Flushed with conquest, loaded with wealth, the Romans ceased to grow their own corn in Italy, and purchased what they required from Sicily, Sardinia, and Egypt. Hence the price of food fluctuated very much. The ravages of the pirates about 70 years before Christ brought Rome to the verge of famine. More than once a severe winter and the perils of the sea caused extreme scarcity in the time of Augustus, that is, during the life of our Lord. At one time, we are told by Herr Mömsen, that the price of a bushel of wheat rose to about twelve shillings of our money. A quarter, or eight bushels, would then be worth about ninety-six shillings, which was about the price reached during the Crimean War. But the same authority calculates that the medium price of wheat in Rome during the first century of our era was about four denarii or pence, that is, about two shillings and sixpence of our money for a bushel. That, however, is reckoned as the price in Rome itself, which imported all its bread-stuffs, and therefore had to pay, in addition to the cost of production, all the cost of carriage over a long sea voyage—all the risks of shipwreck, and the profits of the farmers and merchants. The cost in Syria, Palestine, and Egypt must have been very much less, for carriage, whether by sea or land, must have employed much more labour than it does in these days of steam. We may well suppose that, even on Herr Mömsen's calculation, three Roman pennies, or denarii, would purchase a bushel of wheat in Palestine at the time of our Lord's ministry. The price in England of a bushel of wheat, even in these days of depression, is about four shillings and sixpence; and as the penny would buy one-third of a bushel, it would be worth not sevenpence halfpenny but one shilling and sixpence, and the three hundred pence, at which the spikenard was valued, would be equal not to 9*l.* 7*s.* but to 22*l.* 10*s.* Another authority, Mons. Victor Durney, distinctly gives the cost even in Rome at three denarii, or nearly two shillings the bushel.

But we think that even these calculations give to the penny too small a purchasing power; and we have a test even more satisfactory than that of the price of wheat. About the time when our Lord was teaching in Palestine, the Roman soldiery were agitating for a penny a day. It is probable that John the Baptist refers to this when he tells the soldiers to "be content with their wages." But their actual pay was, and for many years remained at, ten asses, or five-eighths of a Roman penny per day. Out of this they had to pay not only for food, but for their arms, clothing, and tents. So that three hundred pence would pay, clothe, arm, and shelter a soldier for a year and a quarter, and would be equal in purchasing power to at least forty pounds. This then makes the penny nearly equal in purchasing power to three shillings now. And this is something near the amount which other passages in the Gospel imply. Thus in St. Mark vi. 37, we have the estimate that two hundred pence would purchase enough bread to give a meal to five thousand men. "Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat?" St. John, in his account of the same miracle, makes Philip suggest that two hundred pennyworth would hardly be enough. Now, if we take the penny as equal to sevenpence halfpenny, twopence would only buy three four-pound loaves—the two hundred pennyworth would buy three hundred loaves; and it would be absurd to suggest the purchase of three hundred loaves for five thousand men. But allowing that the purchasing power was nearly equal to three shillings, two hundred pence would buy nearly as much as 30*l.* now. If we reckon the four-pound loaf at sixpence, the two hundred pence would buy 1200 loaves, if at fivepence, 1600 loaves, so that the estimate becomes a very fair one. Again, we have the labourers hired for the vineyard. It is obvious that the master in this case is represented as a very rich man, who could afford to pay for an hour as much as for a day. Yet he reckons a penny to be good wages for a day; and that, presumably, for labourers who had to house and feed a family. If the penny were only equal to our sevenpence halfpenny in purchasing power the wages would be absurd; but if it would buy as much bread and other necessaries as three shillings will now, we can understand that the wages of eighteen shillings a week were not despicable. Indeed, as we have seen already, it was the pay that the soldiers asked for and could not obtain. The same remarks apply to the parable of the good Samaritan. Twopence, if reckoned equal to one shilling and threepence of our money, seems an absurd sum to leave, even at a roadside inn, for a wounded man: it would barely buy three loaves of bread. But six shillings would buy loaves enough for a week or more, and leave something over for wine and olives. And we must remember that even then the twopence was not expected to be sufficient. The balance was to be paid on the next journey.

Perhaps it may be thought that we have proved too much, that the expenditure of 40*l.* on unguents would be monstrous, and would deserve the epithet of "waste." But it must be remembered that in these times the rich were very rich, and the poor very poor.

Thus Juvenal (Sat. iv. 15) says, that Crispinus gave 50*l.* for a mullet of six pounds weight,[1] and a little research would provide plenty of proof of the possession of enormous wealth in comparatively few hands. Now every incident about the family of Bethany seems to suggest a wealthy household. We may add that it was the custom of the Jews and of other nations who buried instead of burning their dead, to spend large sums in spices for a newly-buried corpse. Finally, we may notice that at this very day 50*l.* to 80*l.*, or even more, is constantly spent in the United States for embalming a corpse, and that Jesus distinctly speaks of this anointing as being for his burial.

The M'Ganda's Request.

[When the first boy-martyrs of Uganda, Central Africa, perished, in January, 1886, singing the praises of God in the flames, one of the murderers was so impressed by their behaviour that he came afterwards to the missionaries, and said that he must learn to pray too.]

TEACH me to pray! For I have seen
That man may hold communion high
With One who far above doth dwell,
To mortal eye invisible,
Beyond the heavens' shining screen,
Beyond the portals of the sky.

Teach me to pray! For I have seen
That in a way beyond our ken,
Down from that strange, stupendous height,
Down from that glory infinite,
Where mortal foot hath never been,
The Mighty One comes down to men.

Teach me to pray! For now I see
There is a Power beyond our thought
That, spite of human fraud or force,
Holds on its straight, unswerving course;
And wrath and hate and man's decree
Before its purpose are as nought.

Teach me to pray! For I would share
In that communion high and blest.
Teach me to pray! For I would be Linked with that Power so strong and free,
Would know that Friend beyond compare,
And find in Him eternal rest.

THE SAVOY.

AN interesting history has the precinct of the old Savoy; and with its palace, hospital, and chapel, many vicissitudes has it had since Peter the Savoyard, brother of two archbishops and uncle of five queens, received the manor from the third Henry on condition of the three barbed arrows delivered each year to the king's exchequer. It was at the invitation of his niece, the Provençal Eleanor, that Peter came to England in 1241. Five years afterwards, by a grant signed by King Henry at Reading, he was put in possession of the lands hitherto belonging to Brian de l'Isle—"extra muros civitatis nostræ Londiniæ in vico qui vocatur La Straunde"—and to them he gave his name.

He built the first house and in it kept considerable state. He was always an officiously busy man, and went on many missions across the channel, but he was never popular. His distasteful consignment of continental damsels, shipped in hopes of marrying our wealthy wards in Chancery, did him no good; and his position was not improved by the proceedings of his brother Boniface, who has come down to us with the distinction of having been Archbishop of Canterbury for nine years before he set foot on our shores, and then having fled the storm he had provoked. Peter, who shared in his disgrace, seems to have escaped banishment by being abroad when the Oxford Council met, and, in 1263, he succeeded his nephew as Count of Savoy, and retired to the Castle of Chillon, where he ended his days, sailing on Leman's pleasant lake and listening to the strains of his minstrel.

From him the Savoy passed to the friars of Mountjoy, and these, two years afterwards, in 1270, sold it to Queen Eleanor. Eleanor held it until she began her preparations to take the veil, and then, by a grant from Ludgershall in 1284, she assigned it to her "dear son Edmund" Crouchback, Earl of Lancaster, the husband of Blanche of Navarre. During Queen Eleanor's holding it was occupied by her eldest son Edward Longshanks, who thither brought his young wife, the other Eleanor of Castile, and made it his home whenever he came to London; and when Alexander III. of Scotland was in London in 1279 he also was lodged in the Savoy.

Of Edmund Crouchback the story runs that he brought from Provence the stocks of the red roses which afterwards became the cognizance of his descendants, and which are still to be seen carved on his monument in Westminster Abbey. The roses thus first grew in the gardens of the Savoy which in the Temple Gardens lower down the river were a century and a half later to give rise to the picturesque incident of the York and Lancaster quarrel.

Edmund's son was Thomas, afterwards "Saint Thomas of Lancaster." He it was who compelled the banishment of Gaveston in 1308, and who, on the favourite's return four years afterwards, captured him at Scarborough. After Bannockburn, Thomas entered into correspondence with the Scotch, and in 1322 was executed with twenty-eight of his followers. By an extraordinary revulsion of opinion he became a popular "saint," and miracles were wrought at his tomb. In vain the King desired the Bishop of London to put a stop to the worship of a rebel without the authority of the church. The feeling was too strong against him. St. Thomas of Lancaster almost took the place of St. Thomas of Canterbury. "The archbishop had died for the liberties of the church, but the Earl for the liberties of the people." There was even an "Office of St. Thomas of Lancaster" with its first lines in imitation of a current hymn beginning—

> "Gaude Thoma, ducum decus, Lucerna Lancastriæ,
> Qui per necem imitaris Thomam Cantuariæ;
> Cujus caput conculcatur pacem ob Ecclesiæ
> Atque tuum detruncatur causa pacis Angliæ."

And after Edward's deposition an application was made to Rome to canonise the Earl of Lancaster in the orthodox way. It came to nothing, however, and soon the tide turned; the people who had worshipped at the tomb of Earl Thomas, began to worship at the tomb of the king who had beheaded him.

For a time the manor belonged to Edward, Earl of Chester, afterwards Edward III., and then "the Sauveye" was handed over to Henry, Earl of Lancaster, the next heir of the sainted Thomas. His first son, the fourth earl, became the first Duke of Lancaster, and henceforth the Savoy was the headquarters of the great Duchy Palatine, which still has the offices of its chancery within its precincts. When the palace had disappeared, and its site was occupied by the hospital, these offices were rented from the master and chaplains. The Duchy had then been joined to the Crown, and it is on account of its head being also our reigning sovereign, that the chapel of the Savoy is one of the chapels royal.

In 1357, King John of France, who had been taken prisoner at Poitiers, was quartered at the Savoy, and it was thence that he rode on the white steed with the Black Prince "on the little black hackney" beside him, as told in all our history books. John was released when the first instalment of his ransom was received; but after a time he returned to captivity—because he could not raise the balance say some; because he came to organise a conspiracy against his captors say others—and in the Savoy he died.

The first Duke of Lancaster had met his death three years before. He left the Savoy to his daughters Matilda and Blanche. Matilda died childless in 1362, and the whole inheritance fell to her sister Blanche, the wife of John, Earl of Richmond, better known to us as John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, he having been advanced to the title on his wife coming into the property.

John of Gaunt was the last who lived in the palace of the Savoy. "In his day," says Mr. Loftie in his memorials, "the house in all probability consisted of a quadrangle or series of quadrangles surrounded by domestic buildings. There was a great gateway half fortified and protected by a portcullis facing the Strand. This gate was probably on the site now marked by Savoy Street, and occupied the centre of the Strand front. A smaller gate, or postern for foot passengers only, may have been at one side, and the space between was guarded by a long line of wall pierced with a few windows at some distance from the ground, and serving to mark the residences of the soldiers and lower rank of retainers with which the court of every great

John of Gaunt's ambitious schemes bore unexpected fruit. In 1381 occurred the "rising of the commoners," when the peasants rose against their rulers all over the kingdom. The men of the southern shores under the Tyler stormed into London. Southwark was harried, the Marshalsea was battered down, Walworth's houses in Bankside were given to the flames, and Lambeth Palace was broken into. The Lord Mayor made a half-hearted attempt to save the city and pulled up the drawbridge over the last arch on London Bridge. As soon as the crowd had gathered, the drawbridge was dropped and into the city the rebels poured.

It was on Corpus Christi day. The peasants man's house was in those days filled. Entering by the great gate we should have seen on the right the chapel, and in front, probably the great hall, a prominent feature in every nobleman's house. The private apartments were beyond the hall, between it and the river on which they looked out, pleasant terraces intervening, with gardens and orchards extending to the water's edge. There was, of course, a landing-place, as the river was in those days the great thoroughfare, with low houses for the duke's barges, and sheds, or cloisters, for the bargemen to wait in. The kitchen adjoined the hall, probably running at right angles to it, and, if so, occupying the left-hand side of the court-yard, that namely facing the chapel."

rushed to the west, straight for the Savoy. It was soon in flames. Not a thing was taken out of it. "We are no thieves," said the Kentish men; and when one straggler was found hiding a silver goblet in his jerkin, he was set upon at once and cast alive into the flames. The palace was one of the best furnished in Europe. "Five carts would hardly have carried all the silver and jewels," to say nothing of the gold and plate; but the gold and the silver, the draperies and the tapestries, the house and all that was in it fell wrapped in fire. Three barrels of gunpowder were found by the rioters, and, supposing them to contain gold and silver, they threw them into the flames. The powder "more suddenly than they thought, blew up the hall, destroyed the houses and almost themselves."

This was the end of the palace in the Savoy. Sixteen years afterwards John of Gaunt died, and his son Henry IV. annexed the manor to the Crown with all the other estates of the house of Lancaster. Under the charter in which he did so Queen Victoria is now Lady of the Manor of the Savoy.

For some years the site remained waste. Occasionally the ruins were used as a prison. At last came the founding of the hospital in accordance with the will of King Henry VII. The chapel was then rebuilt on its old foundations and re-dedicated to its old saint, St. John.

The hospital was opened in 1517. Three years before, Wolsey, then Archbishop of York, held a council in the uncompleted buildings. The first life of the hospital was not a long one. The suppression took place under Edward VI.; but with Mary came the restoration. During Elizabeth's reign the state of the charity was much enquired into, and it dragged on a miserable existence. Under James its condition improved somewhat. Its end was however evident, and in 1702 came the sentence of its dissolution from Lord-keeper Wright.

In James's time came the rivalry of its two famous masters Balcanquall and the corpulent Archbishop of Spalato, Mark Anthony de Dominis, who, after quitting the Church of Rome, and becoming Dean of Windsor, reverted to his old creed, and returned to his old country to be killed in the castle of St. Angelo, and with his "Ecclesiastical Republic" burnt by the public executioner. In Cromwell's time came the meeting of the Independents to draw up their uniform confession of faith. In Charles the Second's time came the conference between the Churchmen and the Presbyterians on the Book of Common Prayer, in which so much was said and so little was done.

After the hospital's dissolution the precinct grew to be a kind of no man's land of very doubtful fame. At last the builders invaded it. The west front of Somerset House was built within its boundary. Waterloo Bridge took away a large slice of its area. Lancaster Place rose on the site of the houses once occupied by Jacob Tonson the bookseller, and Alexander Cruden, of the Concordance, who in 1739 held under no leases and paid no rent. In 1876 the Embankment came, more of the Savoy was taken and little but its chapel was left.

The precinct had had other chapels. There had been a French one, a German one, and even a Persian one. The Persian, probably a Greek Church, had no lengthened existence; the German chapel with its burial-ground lasted until lately; the French Chapel had removed to Bloomsbury. The present chapel, the chapel royal, is on the same site as that destroyed in 1381. It was built by Humphrey Cook in the reign of Henry VIII.

Cook's monument once stood in the body of the chapel. It has now disappeared and with it many others. The oldest now remaining is the little brass plate in memory of two bishops—Thomas Halsey, of Leighlin, and the poet Gawain Douglas, of Dunkeld—the third son of the mighty Bell the Cat. "Save Gawain none could spell a line."

The Savoy is indeed rich in its memories of the poets. It was in its gardens that Chaucer won Philippa Roet to be his wife and it is of the Lady Blanche who brought the manor to John of Gaunt that he sings in his Boke of the Duchesse. Wither "who discovered that poetry was a present possession as well as a rich reversion" came here to die. Cowley was an unsuccessful applicant for the mastership, and the Mrs. Anne Killigrew of Dryden's Ode was the master's daughter. Her monument was destroyed in the fire of 1864 which wrought much damage.

After the fire the chapel was restored by the Queen. It was reopened on Advent Sunday 1865, Dean Stanley preaching the first sermon, Frederick Denison Maurice addressing the evening congregation. The Savoy has had many ministers. Among them two stand out pre-eminent—Anthony Horneck the popular, "whose parish extended from Whitechapel to Whitehall," and quaint old Thomas Fuller, "who spent his life making others immortal and thereby attained immortality himself."

It was in the Savoy that the author of "The Worthies" preached his last sermon. "He felt unwell, and his friends would have kept him from making the exertion. But a member of the congregation was to be married on the following day, Monday, and Fuller lovingly undertook to wish the wedding couple well, in a special sermon, a good custom which still obtains at the Savoy. Before he began he told his congregation he felt ill, but by a strong exertion he got through. He was carried from the church half-fainting, and being taken to his lodgings, he was put to his bed, and he never rose from it again."

"Here lies Fuller's earth" was the epitaph he playfully suggested for himself, but a by no means inappropriate one is furnished by George Wither's hymn "For the present day or the last day" which is given in Mr. Loftie's book—that "ample and accurate record of the varied attractions and associations which cluster around the history of this ancient precinct," as Mr. White very truly calls it—to which we owe so much.

So let us walk, so let us work,
Whilst this fair daylight is possessed,
That when Death's evening waxeth dark,
Our flesh in hope may sweetly rest,
Until that mortal night be done,
And day immortal is begun.

And when Time's veil is rent away,
Whereby Eternity is hid,
When Thou shalt all things open lay,
Which here we thought, or said, or did.

Among Time's ruins bury so
Our failings through our tract of time,
That from these dungeons here below
We to celestial thrones may climb;
And then to our Eternal King
For ever Hallelujah sing.

AND how many castes are there in India? Let any man look through Mr. Sherring's three quartos, and strive in vain to discover, and let him live in India for years and see for himself and combine his information in vain. In the olden times it was held there were but four castes. Manu's doctrine was that there were created four distinct types of men, Brahmans, Kshatriyas, Vaisyas, and Sudras, who from birth to death were to remain distinct from each other. According to the Brahmans there is but one pure caste, their own; for all the rest are mixed. There is no mistake about the superiority of the Brahman, in looks at least. Kashmir is a Brahman country, and there are to be found some of the finest and handsomest men in the world, men of quite high Aryan type, with fair well-chiselled features that would make a sculptor's heart glad. As Mr. Sherring says, in his "Hindu Tribes and Castes"—"Light of complexion, his forehead ample, his countenance of striking significance, his lips thin and mouth expressive, his eyes quick and sharp, his fingers long, his carriage noble and almost sublime, the true Brahman, uncontaminated by European influence and manners, with his intense self-consciousness, with the proud conviction of superiority depicted in every muscle of his face, and manifest in every movement of his body, is a wonderful specimen of humanity walking on God's earth." But the Brahman is now being left behind. He had a better start than his fellows, and he missed his opportunity. Instead of trusting to himself he thought only of his ancestors.

In the portrait of Nait Ram, given on the next page, we have an example of the Sunat sect from Aligarh. Most of these are agriculturists, but many of them are priests and mendicant friars, sometimes going on pilgrimages, but generally settled and peace-loving members of society, of teetotal and vegetarian habits. By the horizontal marks on Nait Ram's forehead, and the round spot in the centre, we see that he is a follower of Siva or Mahadeo, the third person of the later trinity which consisted of Brahman the creator, Vishnu the preserver, and Siva the destroyer, whose duties and attributes are so mixed and interchangeable that all efforts to separate them have been futile. This mark of Siva may be of ground sandal wood, or white earth ground up with water; but the mark would be red if he were to be a worshipper of Kali—the consort of Kala, who is none other than Time, "the great dissolver"—or Devi, Siva's female principle, who has come to be the mother of the wives of Brahman and Vishnu, and to represent all the other female manifestations of the Trimurti. On his breast and arms are also marks of sandal-wood rubbed on a particular stone for this particular purpose until the paint is of the thickness of cream. Into the paint he dipped the finger ends of his right hand and scored himself in stripes, here and there ending with a dot, in the Prout style of art, not only for effect but as a protection of his chief muscles and vital spots from evil influence. This marking or painting of his body is a part of his morning's devotion, and during its performance he chants his liturgy or incantation to purify himself for the day. In the evening he bathes again and washes off his paint to renew it with his morning devotions, and so continue for the rest of his life by day and night in turns a painted and unpainted man. By his beard, by the mark across his nose, and by the rag thrown on his head, we recognise him as a mendicant friar and priest. And on his shoulders, across his chest, and probably tucked into his waistband is his sacred thread, the emblem of his Brahman rank.

This sacred thread is the mark that he has been born again; for the Brahman, like the Kshatriya and the Vaisya, belongs to a twice born caste. This sacred thread must have been made by a religious Brahman. It consists of three strings of cotton, each forty-eight yards in length, twisted and folded into three, and again twisted and folded into three, and knotted at each end. It is worn over the left shoulder, next the skin, and should hang halfway down the right thigh. In the case of the soldier caste the janeo is of hemp, in the case of the Vaisyas it is of wool. The Brahman receives the token of his spiritual birth in his eighth year, the Kshatriya receives his in his eleventh year, the Vaisya receives his in his twelfth year. No Brahman can marry unless he has received the thread, and should he not receive it at all he is an outcaste.

In the induction ceremony he has to stand opposite the sun, and walk three times round the sacred fire. The guru then consecrates the janeo by repeating the Gayatri, a sacred Vedic text, ten times. The boy is then girt with the thread and asks alms from the assembly in token that he undertakes to provide himself and his teacher with food. "The guru," says Professor Monier Williams, "then initiates him into the daily use of the sacred Savitri prayer called Gayatri, because it is in the three measured Gayatri metre, preceded by three suppressions of breath, the triliteral syllable Om and the three Vyahritis, or mystical words, Bhur, Bhuvah, Svar, and admits him to the privilege of repeating the three Vedas, and performing other religious rites, none of which are allowed before investiture. The Gayatri prayer is from the Rig-veda and may be thus translated, Let us meditate on that excellent glory of the divine Vivifier; may he enlighten our understandings." This prayer is repeated or muttered with the aid of a rosary five, ten, twenty-eight, or even one hundred and eight times at the two Sandhyas of sunrise and sunset; and those who aim at great sanctity repeat it at the three Sandhyas or divisions of the day, sunrise, noon and sunset. The rite of investiture is concluded by the binding on of a girdle made of Munja grass.

The young Brahman is then an "unmarried bachelor," or student; and at the end of his studentship comes another ceremony, the Samavartana, after which he has to return home and take a wife and become a householder. The three debts of the Brahman are the first to the gods, of which he acquits himself by daily worship and sacrifice, the second to the sages of which he acquits himself by the daily study of the sacred books, and the third to his spirit of which he acquits himself by begetting a son. When he is married, the sacred fire used at the ceremony goes home with his bride, and becomes the domestic fire to be kept up night and day by either himself, his wife, his children, or his pupils. And when he is advanced in years, he takes his sacred fire with him, and, clothed in skins or bark, he lives on vegetable food, and only such gifts as are necessary for his existence, to read the Veda and overcome his sensual affections and desires; his last stage being to meditate on divinity with no companion but his own soul, and beg only in the evening. That is to say, he will do so if he chooses, though the practice is not now obligatory.

Away to the north Brahmanism has given place to Buddhism which arose in Behar and Eastern India in the sixth century before Christ, and made its way with great rapidity not by the sword, but by persuasion, until it now has more followers than any other religion on earth. Of Buddhism, in its modern aspects, much notice is given in Mr. Gilmour's "Among the Mongols." It has been the state religion of China ever since Kublai Khan, and its head the Dalai Lama, who lives at Lassa, and effects his re-embodiment by the beam of light that issues from his own body and enters that of his successor, is merely a creature of the Chinese government who retain the right of nominating the keeper of his conscience. It is singular to what numbers its lamas run. In Lassa there are 18,000 of them; in Ladakh there are at least 12,000; all going through the ceremonies in the most mechanical of ways. Horns are twirled and beads are slipped; prayers are cut on waterwheels and kept spinning in the stream; psalms are pasted on drums worked like smoke jacks and kept whirling round, each revolution having the same effect—on the lama—as if he had thought and offered the pious petition. To enlarge on the absurdities would be profitless; they are appalling instances of how great thoughts may be depraved. For Sakya-Sinha, so called from his clan, or Muni, so called from his being a hermit, or Gotama, or Buddha, or whatever he may be called, was assuredly a great man. The world is not likely to forget the story of the great renunciation; and though we may not go as far as to identify him all at once as the Sarmanes of the Greeks, the Wud of the Arabs, the Toth of the Egyptians, and the Woden of the Scandinavians, we are unable to deny the commanding influence of him who, as Saint Josaphat, strangely enough appears even in the Roman calendar.

The date of his death, B.C. 543, two hundred and sixteen years before Alexander the Great invaded India, serves one useful purpose to us here in showing the antiquity of the Brahmanism he came to reform. What that faith is to-day among India's two hundred and fifty millions has been shown over and over again in these pages, and is known to all readers and travellers. What it was three thousand years ago is not easy to say, and it may have failed as much in practice then, as now: but from the Vedic hymns it would seem to have had in it many of the elements of truth. That it can even be considered as monotheistic the following extract from the hundred and twenty-first hymn of the tenth Mandala, as translated in Professor Williams' "Indian Wisdom," affords at least fair grounds for contention.

What god shall we adore with sacrifice?
Him let us praise, the golden child that rose
In the beginning, who was born the lord—
The one sole lord of all that is—who made
The earth, and formed the sky, who giveth life,
Who giveth strength, whose bidding gods revere,
Whose hiding-place is immortality,
Whose shadow, death; wholly his might is king
Of all the breathing, sleeping, waking world.
Where'er let loose in space, the mighty waters
Have gone, depositing a fruitful seed,
And generating fire; there he arose
Who is the breath and life of all the gods,
Whose mighty glance looks round the vast expanse
Of watery vapour—source of energy,
Cause of the sacrifice—the only God
Above all gods. W. J. GORDON.

A VILLAGE READING.

THE indifference of the working-classes to religion may be too hastily assumed. Many conferences have been held on the subject. The following paper, written at our request, shows what has actually been done in an English village. Whatever views may be held as to the methods adopted in different spheres, the question as to how these classes may best be reached is one of vital interest, and all facts that bear upon it must be welcome.

I have been asked to write a short account of my "Sunday Readings" in our village. I will begin by saying I am a layman, a member of an exacting profession—a busy man: therefore, what I do, others may be able to do under corresponding circumstances. The place of which I have to speak is a purely agricultural village; there are a few small shops, some shoemakers, bricklayers, labourers, or odd men, who usually obtain work in the neighbouring towns. We are some miles from a rail, and had the reputation of being not so long since "a very wild uncultivated lot."

About a year ago, on my way to public worship I was often pained by seeing such a crowd of men and lads, on Sundays, standing at the cross-roads—the favourite place of meeting—all smoking, talking, or indulging in a good deal of rough play. As from time to time I passed, I would ask them why they did not go to some place of worship, and the answer was usually a great laugh, and some would slink away. There was no other result.

One Sunday, when I thus spoke to about thirty, a voice in the crowd said, "Church is not for such as we. Look at our clothes." I endeavoured to show them that that ought to be no bar; but shakes of the head showed I had failed. Another voice then said: "Why don't you talk to us on Sundays? We'll come to hear you." I said: "Is that a promise? If I read a chapter of the Bible and try to explain it, will you come?" Several men said, "Yes."

Then where to meet was the difficulty. I spoke to a farmer. He offered a barn; but it was out of the way, had no seats, and was, moreover, very draughty. A public-house club-room was offered, but after consideration was declined. There is a club-room in the village, and unused on Sundays. After some negotiations I obtained the use of that—I pay a man to light a good fire, so as to warm the room in winter—and we met. About twenty or so came. I began at first by reading a chapter in one of the Gospels, taking one which brought in country life. In the simplest manner and plainest language I sought, as one familiar with the text, to show the men the difference of country, of race, costume, agricultural implements, and then I went on to the practical lesson of the chapter.

The numbers increased. Then I thought I would begin with a short prayer—only a few words. No objection was made by the men. Still I kept to the Gospels. Soon it occurred to me that a large map of the Holy Land would be a good thing, so that I might point out the exact place where the event occurred; and if a journey was described in the sacred text, I traced the line of route on the map, explaining from my own knowledge of the land anything peculiar or different from England. Presently I thought I might also end with a prayer.

A few Sundays after, I asked the men if they thought we could sing the Doxology. There were grave shakes of the head; but we tried it. It was not a success, but I determined to try on, and ere long we managed very well. Here I must note, that though I can sing in a way, I cannot start a tune. By-and-by, however, the Doxology went splendidly, and the men were pleased.

One Saturday evening a deputation of the men who attended came to me, and asked if I would say a few more words of prayer, both at the beginning and end, and "if we could not have a hymn." I said we would try. I kept the prayers very short still; and we tried our hymn.

It was a great trial to my gravity: all were in different tunes and time, but we did not give it up. We then numbered about seventy, and soon we got on; and now though we could hardly enter into competition with a trained choir, we sing well, and from the heart. Often the men ask, before I begin, for a particular hymn, such as, "Jesus, lover of my soul," "Abide with me," or, "O God, our help in ages past." Hymns of that class are the favourites. And now we begin with prayer; then a hymn; and close with hymn and then prayer. At the present time we meet, 120 men, and perhaps twenty lads over sixteen.

Some time ago we began a course on St. Paul. First I described him when he was a Pharisee, explaining carefully what that meant. One lesson which made a great sensation was the chapter giving the account of his conversion. We are still going on with St. Paul's Epistles; and it is a deeply touching sight to see old grey-haired labourers, with their furrowed cheeks, and bent figures, come with reverence into the room, cover their eyes for a short prayer, and then listening with eager ears—and eyes often full of tears—to the manly appeals of the Great Apostle of the Gentiles. The younger men are equally attentive, and many a bent head or shaded eye shows how the man is impressed. After reading the chapter selected, the whole chapter and sometimes more if the subject requires it, I endeavour to bring out all I know of the history of the place, and the people to whom the Epistle was written, and the state of the world at the time, often quoting what the best heathen writers said of it. I strive to show how straighforward, simple and manly the life of the apostle was, his difficulties, trials, faith. And then his converts: I show who they were, as far as history helps us; their positions in the world; their dangers and devotion; and apply as well as I can every event described in the lesson to ourselves.

We have our difficulties. Small boys like to come, but we are obliged to turn them out, otherwise the ladies who hold Sunday afternoon classes would complain that all their scholars were taken away. Another difficulty is the hour. We meet at three P.M. and close shortly after four o'clock, there being no service in the village at that hour. There are other men, employed on the different farms, stock-feeding at that time, who want the hour made 5.30, but then it is said I should be competing with the services in the evenings; so at present we keep to three o'clock. Another difficulty, and that has been grave, has arisen from the fact that so many men wished to bring their wives, mothers, or grown up daughters. For they said, "You make the Bible a real Book, sir; and women have souls to be saved." But the objection was made,—if you give this general character to it, your "reading" will become a "service." So we have compromised the matter. Once in every three months, women are admitted. They sit at the end of the room by themselves. Strangers often come. One man was steady in his attendance all the summer, walking from a village, four miles away. The Squire and male visitors at the Hall drop in; but all are treated alike. Of course we have disappointments, for we have some bad characters in the village. Their attendance is very irregular; but when here they behave quietly. On the other hand men come privately to tell of their troubles, to speak of their soul's welfare, and ask advice. Wet days make no difference, only that more young men are present. Working men from other villages at a distance ask me to do the same there, but as I have not solved the difficulty of being in two places at the same time, I am obliged to refuse.

Explain it how you choose,—vast numbers of working men will not go to church or chapel, yet they will listen to laymen in club-rooms or town halls. I have proved it again and again in the most unlikely places. My own belief is that the masses are "hungering for Christ." They may have deserted the churches, they have not deserted Christ.

In the hot summer-time the room gets very close, so, one Sunday, having a friend staying with me, we had two addresses in my field, a quiet place away from any road. No notice but a verbal one given in the club-room announced the service. The sight was wonderful. Under a beautiful sky the whole village assembled. It was touching to see men and women kneel down on the grass, while my friend offered a few words of prayer. He was a man who had bravely fought for country and Queen in distant lands, and, strange to say, in this out-of-the-way village two men came up to him afterwards, and reminded him that they in distant lands had been soldiers under his command in battle! How warm the greeting, I leave the reader to imagine. It was pleasant to exchange words in such circumstances; but there is a deeper joy in meeting those who are our comrades in the greater battle against evil.

HEART'S-EASE.

CHAPTER VIII.

IT was not to be expected that Ethel could visit her sick friend every day, but as often as opportunity offered she went to the village, either with Nero, as her sole companion, or with nurse, who in common with every one else, took a lively interest in the case of the sick girl. The visits now were usually shorter, for even Ethel could see how weak and weary her namesake became if there was much talking between them, and to go there and not talk, would have been impossible for the bright, active girl. Nurse, and all who had any experience in such matters, shook their heads whenever they spoke about the case, as though they had quite made up their minds that there must be a speedy ending to it.

Aunt Regina had gone over several times, but had not always taken Ethel with her, for she thought, very wisely, that so many visitors would not be good, and there were other people to be visited also, for her brother had begged of her to make enquiries as to any case needing their help, and she was glad to be of service herself, in doing good.

But when Ethel went now, she was able to read from the Bible for her namesake. The sick girl could listen to that when she could not listen to anything else. One portion was always a special favourite with both girls, and it was read so often, that it became easy for Ethel to repeat it from memory.

"Let not your heart be troubled; ye believe in God, believe also in Me. In My Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again, and receive you unto Myself; that where I am, there ye may be also."

It was always with a smile, and a brightening face that Namesake listened to these tender words. She knew them so well as the words of the Saviour who had died to give her a right to enter that happy place, that they had long ago ceased to be mere words from a book, but sounded to her heart as the accents of a present friend. Everything belonging to the present world in which she was merely hovering now, seemed dim and uncertain. Ethel made it appear less visionary by her high spirits, and keen enjoyment, but it was fading away day by day, whilst that other home beyond the grave was shining bright and splendid, to her eager spirit.

It was good for Ethel who had never given a thought to such realities, to be brought in contact with one so fit to teach her something about them. There was nothing gloomy in the lesson. There ought not to be, if it be taught by God, and not by the fear and ignorance of our own hearts. "Let not your heart be troubled," was the shining motto over all. And Ethel began to understand something of the great love which makes life full of happiness, and death full of glory to those who trust it.

One lovely morning after breakfast, Aunt Regina herself suggested going to the village with Ethel, and as she felt better to-day, she would walk through the fields, and so cut off a considerable angle of the road.

"Your father tells me that he may have to go abroad after all, this autumn, Ethel," Miss Regina said as they went along.

"Oh! aunt!" Ethel exclaimed, with evident disappointment. "I could not leave home now. I do hope papa will leave us here."

"But, my dear, if he goes we must go too. He would never leave you behind, and besides, I thought you were most anxious to go! Remember how angry your were at our coming down here."

"Ah! but things have happened since then, Aunt Regina," said Ethel, looking up with a smile.

Yes, things had happened, no doubt. No one knew that better than Miss Regina. The smiling face at her side was proof positive of the fact, if she had need of proof.

"But you have faith enough to believe that if you are to go, it will be the best for you and others, Ethel."

"I don't know, aunt," said Ethel, doubtfully.

"But, my darling, if we have faith in the wisdom and goodness of our Father in heaven, we shall be willing to trust Him in matters of this sort. Indeed, unless we have such faith we must be continually in doubt and distress. It is only by perfect trust that we can be happy."

Of course Ethel knew that. She was not too young to understand what real faith in God meant, and she had, in her own way, desires after a more perfect trust in Him. We have to walk without seeing exactly were we place our feet. It may be we have never crossed the bridge of promise before, and it seems so slender as to be dangerous. I think we may all say, as Ethel did, in answer to Miss Regina's remark, "I'm very foolish, aunt, I know. I wish I had more sense."

"There is a promise in the Bible that will exactly suit you then, Ethel. 'If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and it shall be given him.' We can bring even our weaknesses to God, and He promises to turn them into strength."

Ethel walked on in silence for some time. She was busy with her own thoughts, which were too sacred even for Aunt Regina. There was an inner sanctuary in her warm heart, to which no one had access but God only, jus tas there is in your's and mine, and everybody's. It was only by the happy expression on her face than Miss Regina could tell something of what was going on in that sacred recess of her thoughts and feelings. It could not be anything other than pleasant, to cause such a happy smile to light up her young face, and give such buoyancy to her step. Even Miss Regina seemed brighter and better to-day than she had been for a long time. Her sufferings, which were considerable, had given her a respite for the last few days, and she was able to enjoy the walk through the pleasant fields, and in the inmost recesses of her heart she thanked God for having given her this exemption from pain.

When they reached the village, they saw at once that something unusual had occurred. The women who would at this hour have been busy in the fields, or in the house, were grouped together in conversation, and noticing the approach of Miss Regina and Ethel, they seemed to connect them, in some way, with their talk.

Ethel looked instinctively at the cottage where her namesake lived, with a little heart-throb, as though she expected to find there the answer to her questioning. But everything was as usual. The window was open to the bright day, and the soft air was playing with the leaves of the vine that clustered over the front of the house. So far as any one could see there had been no change in the place since she was there a few days ago. It was only by the perfect stillness which prevailed, and the hushed voices of the women a little way off, that she still felt sure that something had happened.

The cottage door being opened they went in. The room was empty. The sick girl's chair was vacant, and never more would she look out from the old lozenged window on the little patch of green, for her spirit had taken flight, before the dawn, and was at rest.

The mother and a few of the neighbours were in the little room at the back, which was the only sleeping apartment. They came out, hearing the steps, and their faces were calm, and serious, but not grief-stricken. They could not mourn that the long period of weakness was over, and the endless life of joy begun. Only the mother's eyes overflowed as she told Miss Regina and Ethel of the last words uttered by her daughter before she went home.

"She called me to her," the weeping woman said, "and bade me be sure and give Miss Ethel her last message. Tell her, said she, that I have not forgotten what she said to me the other day. I will say that she is trying to be a good girl, and to love and obey Aunt Regina, and to take care of papa and to be kind to everybody, and then she put her dear arms about me, and begged of me to come to her soon, and after a few more words of remembrance to the neighbours who had been so kind to her, she lay down, and turned her face to the wall with a sweet smile of peace on it, and went asleep. The smile is on her dear face now, but she will never wake again in this world: and my heart is desolate." Nothing could exceed the tender pathos of these last words. Not spoken in noisy grief, but with the subdued feeling of one who has indeed been bereaved, the solitary woman seemed rather to allow her grief to escape her, than willingly to give expression to it.

Ethel could not say a word. She felt a great lump in her throat, and her eyes were fast filling with tears, and it was as much as she could do to keep from bursting into sobs. But she could not think of her namesake's death as anything dreadful, or terrible, but rather as the falling asleep of a tired child. Was it not just what the girl had wished for? When all the world was asleep to be carried by the angels beyond those golden gates into the city of the Great King—her Saviour.

Aunt Regina was exceedingly gentle and wise in her words. She had passed through so much sorrow herself, that she was able to give comfort to those who needed it.

The walk back through the fields was very different to the walk to the cottage. A little chapter in Ethel's history had been closed that day, and its effect on her life was to be greater than she had any knowledge of now. It seemed to her, as she recalled that first day, when Nero brought her into contact with the sick girl, as though it was a long way off. She had so taken her namesake into her confidence that it seemed almost as though she had known her always. And she could not bring herself to think that wherever that freed spirit was now, there could be any want of knowledge. She asked Aunt Regina some very wonderful questions on that return walk. I am not at all sure that they were all answered, for the simplest tongue can frame questions which God only can give the right answer to, and Aunt Regina never attempted to supply out of her own imagination explanations such as might happen to satisfy her enquiring niece at the moment. It is far better to admit that at best, we know but little. And best of all to rest in that love and wisdom which hides many things from us for our good.

There was no fear of Aunt Regina misleading Ethel on any subject of this sort, for her own trust in the wisdom of God was very great, and she desired to so teach her niece that she too might carry through life an abiding confidence in that loving Father, who does all things well, and in whose light we shall see light.

* * * * *

Some days afterwards a ball of white fur might be seen rolling about in Colonel Seymour's drawing-room, and having indeed the run of the whole house and premises. Even Nero's kennel was not sacred to this daring animal. And if so formidable a beast as Nero had to bear the indignity of having his ears bitten by the daintest of white teeth, and his face licked by the pinkest of pink tongues, it is not surprising that Colonel Seymour should have suffered from its attacks. I am told on good authority that this bold and privileged kitten made attacks on the Colonel's legs when he was quite unprepared for them, and that he has been known at such times to drop his newspaper with a start and an exclamation of astonishment, much to Ethel's delight. When she laughed at him he seemed to enter into the fun himself, declaring that he hardly knew which was the most impudent of the two—Ethel, or pussy.

After all, Ethel did not find it disagreeable going away from Holmsdale that autumn. But she went away a much wiser girl than she was when first we saw her. Perhaps this little portrait of her—small and imperfect as it is—may cause other Ethels to see a feature here and there, which reminds them of themselves. Perhaps it may help them to understand that there is no real 'Heart's-ease' apart from love to God, and obedience to His commandments, and that in seeking to do good to others, we are going the surest way to do good to ourselves.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. III.

Who says the wicked shall be sore afraid,
And by "the king of terrors" be dismayed?
What king describes a good and virtuous wife?
Who fled from Jezebel to save his life?
Third son of one whose youngest son should reign?
A second brother of the cruel Cain?
What exile-prophet by the Chebar dwelt?
Who for a prince a deep affection felt?
Who stood as prophet by his brother's side?
Who on a camel rode as Isaac's bride?
Where dwelt a witch consulted by king Saul?
One who received two letters from St. Paul?
Who met the death for Mordecai prepared?
Who to her son the word of God declared?
The name by which Naomi would be known?
And that of Samuel's great memorial stone?
Who, pleading, saved a younger brother's life?
A king of Elam slain in deadly strife?
Whose head was laid in Abner's honoured tomb?
Who was made governor in Felix' room?
Third of the mystic words that Daniel read?
One Jesus loved, and raised to life when dead?

These twenty-one initials now explain
Who from their God shall gracious mercy gain.

BALAAM AND BALAK.

"And Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam, and he smote his hands together: and Balak said unto Balaam, I called thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times."—Numbers xxiv. 10.

STONES OF CURSING.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D.

THE method of Balaam's divination has an interest of its own, apart from that reflected upon it by its occurrence in the tragic story of one of the most perplexing characters in Scripture. It gives us a curious glimpse into the pagan world, and illustrates a custom that was wide-spread among ancient nations. When Balak wished to devote the Israelites to destruction by invoking upon them the curse of heaven, previous to going to war with them, it was not enough that the great Gentile prophet should pronounce that curse in his distant home. A prescribed and elaborate ritual had to be gone through. Balaam had to come across the eastern desert to the plains of Moab where the Israelites were encamped. He had to ascend with the king the heights of Mount Nebo, the highest hill in the vicinity—not merely because from that elevated vantage-ground he could obtain the best view of the goodly array of the tents of the Israelites, as they dotted the extensive plain below, but also because of the superstitious veneration connected with the place. From time immemorial the spot was one of the great sanctuaries of religion. It possessed on its craggy knolls and along its elevated ridges high places dedicated to Baal; and on its loftiest summit, the peak of Pisgah, there was the famous shrine of Baal-Peor.

This was doubtless the worship of the sun as the source of all the life, beauty and power of the world. There was no older, or more universal, or more natural form of idolatry. Mountains were the most suitable places for such worship. They were supposed to be nearer to the divinity. They were lifted above the earth into a holier solitude and a deeper peace. They commanded a wider outlook of heaven and earth. On their summits, the eye could most advantageously behold the rising and setting of the sun, and embrace the widest survey of the kingdom of life which his beneficent beams created and upheld. Mount Nebo in the south was therefore what Hermon was in the north of Palestine, the seat of a primitive sanctuary of nature worship. There, as on a throne high and lifted up, reigned the mighty force whose smile was life—whose frown was death. Balak and Balaam, as their very names indicated, were both worshippers of the sun; Balak, a sincere and whole-hearted idolator, for he knew nothing better; Balaam, a man who sought the rewards of divination, while he had the prophet's vision of the things of God, and was rapt out of his baser self for the moment by their inspiration. Together the two climbed the sacred mountain, to invoke the great spiritual force that was supposed to dwell specially there. And few things are more strange and impressive than the repeated attempts which they made to overpower the voice of conscience, and to wring an answer favourable to their wishes from the local divinity. On successive heights, nearer and nearer to the skies, they built altars of the rough boulders scattered on the hillside, and offered sacrifice upon them. The king remained beside the altar on the lower level, while Balaam went alone to the top of the hill. But as the sacrificial smoke ascended, the words of cursing that arose to the prophet's lips were irresistibly changed into words of blessing. From each new point of view a new revelation was given to him of Israel's future. Like a sublime panorama the destiny of the world passed before him, and he knew what a mighty part in its drama was to be played by the people, the outskirts of whose tents he could dimly discern through the haze of distance, with the tall pillar of cloud resting over them as the rallying point and centre of Israel's national life, and the pledge of divine protection.

In a well-known picture of Moses on Mount Nebo, the artist represents the right hand of the Jewish lawgiver resting on a fallen cromlech, as if symbolising in this action the triumph of his law and race over an already crumbling idolatry. The introduction of this feature into the picture was a peculiarly happy stroke; for such cromlechs, consisting of huge blocks of rough stone—gathered from the hillside, and set on end, with a large covering slab placed over them—abound in the neighbourhood of Mount Nebo. On the slopes of the ridge itself, Captain Conder found, a few years ago, several cromlechs at various levels, the highest considerably below the summit. They occur in groups, and in some places a great number of such groups are found together on one site. On every new occasion it seemed to have been the custom to erect a new altar; and sacred centres would thus in time be crowded with such structures. To this custom Balak we are told conformed, for he erected no less than twenty-one altars on three different sites, a group of seven on each site. Hosea plainly refers to this multiplication of altars on important occasions when he says "Their altars are as heaps in the furrows of the field." Among the hill-tribes of India it is customary for the relatives of a sick man to vow a large stone in honour of some local deity—to be erected should the sick man recover. Other members of the tribe make similar vows, and thus a group of similar votive stones will appear on a certain spot, and mark it as a religious centre. Some of the table stones of the cromlechs of Mount Nebo have cup-shaped hollows excavated in them, connected together by means of grooves or channels. The presence of these rude sculptures affords a strong confirmation of the view that the monuments in question were ancient places of sacrifice; the hollows and grooves having been made for receiving the libations poured upon the altar, or for collecting the blood of the sacrifices offered upon it. Captain Conder would not venture to say that he had actually discovered the identical altars which Balaam had erected; but the peculiar archaic appearance of the cromlechs and their local position, occurring not on the highest point of the hill—to which Balaam ascended alone, but at some distance below it where the king was left—would seem to indicate that they were at least the kind of altars which the eastern soothsayer must have constructed at the time.

The use of such altars for cursing the Israelites was in strict conformity with ancient superstition. Hanilcar, the Carthaginian general, when his son Hannibal, at the age of nine years, was eager to accompany him in the war against Spain, made him lay his hand on an altar of Baal, that must have been similar to the ones on Mount Nebo, and swear eternal hatred to the Romans. The Druses of Lebanon, who still preserve many remnants of the old Canaanite religion—such as a brass image of a calf, the well-known ancient symbol of the rising sun which they now affect to despise—to this day swear beside the altars of their chapels on Mount Hermon, and invoke in these sanctuaries curses upon their enemies. Near Triguier in Brittany, a country famous for the mysterious charms of its Celtic and Mediæval monuments, and where the spirit of the old Pagan religion lingers under the alien forms of the Christian faith, there is a place of worship called the "Chapel of Notre Dame de la Haine" —Our Lady of Hatred. It is situated on the top of a bleak eminence amid desolate surroundings; and the present shrine is the representative of one that has stood there from time immemorial. The people have not ceased to believe in the potency of the prayers that are offered there. It is by no means uncommon to see, as the twilight shades are deepening around, muffled human forms stealthily approaching the spot; youthful pupils tired of the tyranny of their masters, old men jealous of the prosperity of their neighbours, and wives worn out with the cruel treatment of their husbands. These kneel before the altar of the Virgin, and pray for the death of the object of their hatred. Three "Aves" devoutly repeated bring about irrevocably that death within a year. There can be little doubt that this chapel occupied the site of a prehistoric altar of cursing, and that the unhallowed rites once practised there long ages ago were continued in the Christian church that afterwards arose in its place, and received the sanction of the new faith; much in the same way as Mahomet tolerated the previous stone-worship of Mecca, and the Roman Catholic religion baptized many of the ancient customs of Pagan Rome.

"Cursing-stones," as they are called, are well known to antiquarians. They are found in several places in our own country; and till very recently they were resorted to by jealous and disappointed persons who wished to imprecate destruction upon the person and property of their neighbour who had injured them. Upon the shore of Loch Macnean in Ireland, within a short distance of the ancient parish church of Killinagh, there is one of these "cursing-stones," called St. Bridget's stone. It is a large roundish boulder of red sandstone, with a flat top in which there are nine cavities artificially scooped out. Each of these hollows contains an oval water-worn stone which nearly fills it. When a man thought that he was wronged, he went to this altar, and taking one of the stones and turning it round, he would wish all manner of evil to his enemy. If he had good cause of complaint, the evil fell upon the wrong-doer; but if he simply bore spite or malice against an innocent neighbour, the curse causeless would not come, but, on the contrary, the evil returned to his own bosom. The dread of incurring this latter fate deterred many from the use of the altar, and led to its final abandonment. St. Bridget was the queen of heaven, and was adored as the "Mary of the Gael." Her symbol was a flame, and on her altar blazed a perpetual fire which was maintained for ages in the shrine at Kildare. It is possible that in her worship we may recognise a form of primitive solar adoration. If so, the turning of the oval boulders in the hollows of St. Bridget's stone would be a part of this Baal or Solar worship. The hallowed turn, or the deseul, was from east to west, or from left to right, sunwise—the turn which the host still gives to the service of his table, which the housewife gives to her spinning-wheel, and the soldier to his brandished weapon. While the sinister turn, or tuathseul, which was always made when a curse was invoked, was against the motion of the sun in the heavens, from west to east, or from the right hand to the left. There are individuals still alive who dimly remember the maledictive rotation of the stones on St. Bridget's altar.

"Cursing-stones" are somewhat numerous in Ireland. There is a celebrated one at the well of St. Fechin, near Cong; and in the island of Innissmarry in Connaught, there is a boulder near the ruins of the ancient Chapel of St. Molaise covered with globular stones somewhat flattened, of different sizes, which are turned in precisely the same way as those on St. Bridget's stone when evil is wished to any one. The custom of "turning stones" in the case of a person considering himself aggrieved to bring ill-luck upon the offender still exists in some remote parts of Dartmoor. Not long ago, a woman in this locality, who was under notice to quit her farm for some offence, threatened to "turn some stones" against the proprietor. So great was the dread of her occult powers of cursing that it was with difficulty that a man was induced to execute the order for her eviction. A peculiar manner of cursing once prevailed extensively in the county of Fermanagh, Ireland, though it is now rapidly disappearing. It is called the "Fire of Stones." When a tenant was in danger of what he considered wrongful eviction, he proceeded to collect from his farm as many stones as would fill the fireplace of his kitchen. These he piled up on the hearth, like a heap of fuel, and kneeling down he prayed that, until that heap of stone should burn, every kind of misfortune might attend his landlord and family to the latest generation. And to prevent all possibility of the malediction being frustrated, the stones were afterwards scattered widely all over the country, so that they could not be gathered together again. We see in this extraordinary method of procedure, a manifest survival of the old altar of solar sacrifice, with its sacred fire. As Balak on Mount Nebo built a special altar for each new opportunity of cursing the Israelites, and kindled the flame upon it which consumed the offering, so the Irish farmer built his altar of representative stones from the farm which he was in danger of losing on the household hearth; and as the sacrifice was perpetual, for the stones could never be consumed, so the curse should never cease. Both instances pointed to their common origin in the prehistoric worship of the sun.

"Cursing-stones" are often associated with holy wells. A very remarkable and deeply venerated well, dedicated to St. Bridget, exists near the altar stone of the saint already described. And this circumstance leads me to notice that there are also "cursing wells," where, by casting into the water a stone with the name of the person upon whom the curse is to be invoked inscribed upon it, the spirit of the well forthwith causes the victim to pine and die, unless the curse should be willingly removed. Perhaps the most dreaded of such wells is the one in the parish of Llanelian, Denbighshire, called St. Elian's Well, named after a Welsh pilgrim saint whose churches are renowned for the cure of diseases, and whose fair is still held in August. It is the firm belief of many of the people in the neighbourhood, that a person can put his enemy into this well, that is to say, render him subject to its evil influence. A man who lives near at hand has charge of the well, and after presenting him with a fee, and registering the name of the person to be maligned in a book kept for the purpose, he casts into the well a pin and a pebble carved with the victim's initials. The person thus cursed soon hears of it; and such is the power of superstitious imagination, that the curse speedily fulfils itself, and death has not unfrequently happened. The curse may be removed by reversing the process, taking out the pebble and pin and appeasing the spirit of the well by a gift. Occasionally the maledictive power of the well has been turned to a good use. Its magic influence has been invoked to curse a disease and so to cure it. The curse as in Balaam's case has thus turned into a blessing.

The most interesting association connected with my subject is the incident that took place on Mount Ebal, which is known to this day as the "Mount of the Curses." Moses said to the Israelites, "And it shall come to pass when the Lord thy God hath brought thee in unto the land whither thou goest to possess it, that thou shalt put the blessing upon Mount Gerizim, and the curse upon Mount Ebal." This remarkable ceremony was performed as soon as an entrance into the Holy Land was effected by Joshua, who proceeded straight from the valley of the Jordan to the sacred spot. Half the tribes stood on the one mount, and half on the other, while the Levites read the law beside the ark pitched in the intervening space between the two hills. In the clear still atmosphere of this locality, where voices are heard at great distances, and every sound is musical, the people on Gerizim responded with their loud "Amen" to the blessings invoked upon those who should keep the law; while the people on Ebal ratified the curses chanted against transgressors. On Ebal there was a sanctuary from time immemorial. It was one of the oldest, if not actually the oldest, religious site in Palestine. Its western side is still called the "pillar of religion," from a very ancient local tradition that a rude primitive cromlech stood there dedicated in all likelihood to solar worship. It was on the summit of Ebal that Joshua erected his monumental altar of the twelve stones that had been taken from the bed of the Jordan during the miraculous passage of the Israelites. And it was in the same place that he constructed according to Divine commandment the altar of rude boulders on which a copy of the law of Moses was inscribed—and beside which the maledictions upon the law-breakers were fulminated; if indeed this altar was not identical with the one previously mentioned. Probably Mount Ebal was used as a place of cursing by the aborigines long before the Israelites took possession of the land; its primeval cromlech being regarded with the same veneration which the Irish peasants cherished towards St. Bridget's stone. And thus the primitive custom of the place was consecrated by Joshua to a higher service, according to the Divine method of procedure which produces out of the forms of the alien or the false the power of the true. The great height of the mountain, forming a conspicuous object on every side, and its sterile appearance, the bare precipitous cliffs of its dome-shaped summit, and its steel-blue rocky slopes, rising up in remarkable contrast to the rich foliage of the valley beneath, early marked it out as an appropriate shrine of nature-worship, where the severest forms of religion might be cultivated. The study of this whole subject of "stones of cursing" is an elucidation of the fact that primitive Hebrew life was parallel to primitive life in general; and we rise from the consideration of the fierce and inordinate forms which early religion often assumed, with deeper gratitude for the clearer and purer light that shines on our Christian path from the revelation on the Mount of Beatitudes. "But I say unto you that hear, Love your enemies; do good to them which hate you; bless them which curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you."

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER IX.—COMING CHANGES.

"IF I were you, Gerald, I would go to London, and see what real life is like. What is the use of letting your talents rust and moulder in a little place like this? You are a man. You have some liberty of action. Why do you not go away, and make yourself a great name elsewhere?"

It was Juliet Granby who spoke, and her dark eyes were alight with her own eager enthusiasm. Her listener was leaning against the rustic arbour door in an attitude of graceful, negligent ease.

Juliet had known the Meynals intimately from childhood upward, and she and Gerald had always shared in a good many similar feelings and ambitions. She had twice his energy and force of character; but he had ambitions as lofty as any of hers, and although he had never troubled himself with any great exertions in order to realise these, it was generally supposed that he was an unknown genius, who must some day rise to notoriety and fame.

Juliet was no judge of art: she did not profess to look critically upon his productions either with pen or brush; but she recognised the one merit they undoubtedly did possess—that of vivid and original imagination. Faulty as was Gerald's execution, from the fact that his idleness hindered any kind of serious study and persevering toil, he yet was full of fanciful imagination, which, could he but master the technicalities of his craft, might stand him in good stead, and give to his work a certain value of its own. But he was vain and idle. He never realised how utterly he failed in transferring his thoughts to canvas or paper, and his facile imagination threw a halo over all he did, and made it eminently satisfactory in his own eyes.

Juliet had always felt in sympathy with Gerald. She understood the better side of his nature more thoroughly perhaps than anybody else. She entered into his dreams, sympathised with his ambitions, and appreciated his imaginative faculties as no other friend did, because they were in reality not at all unlike her own. Gerald was fond of Juliet in a rather patronising sort of way. He liked a talk with her now and then. It was pleasant to feel himself intelligently appreciated, and to talk in a strain that would convulse Barbara with mirth, and provoke the good-humoured scorn of many of his friends, but which chimed in only too harmoniously with Juliet's thoughts and fancies. He was telling her now of that interview with his brother, in which Wulfric had spoken strongly as to the necessity of his turning his talents to practical account, and the girl had broken in upon his tale with the urgently expressed wish that he should try in the great city of the world for the fame that must be awaiting all true talent.

"You will be appreciated there, Gerald; how can you expect it here, where the people are only half educated or half asleep? If I were a man, I would not wait long before I found myself in the great vortex of life. Go, Gerald: your own family will never recognise your talents until you return to them with the victor's laurels, that you must surely win when you mix in a world of culture and intelligence."

Gerald smiled at the picture thus held up before him, but his answer showed a certain amount of practical knowledge of the world.

"That is all very fine, Juliet; but Rome was not built in a day, and it takes time for a young man without name or connections to make his way in the world. How am I to live meanwhile?"

"Would not your mother or your brother make you an allowance—you could repay them afterwards?"

Gerald shrugged his shoulders.

"My mother has not the power to do so; and Wulf is such a Goth, he would scorn the idea of my being able to make my way alone in London by my art. He had the cheek to stand me out the other day that one of my figures was out of drawing."

Gerald was still sore about the affront put upon him. Wulfric's cool air of assurance had been very trying, and he had not forgotten the episode. But Juliet was intent upon her own thoughts and plans.

"Have you no money of your own? Can't you sell your pictures, or get some any other way, just to make a start, which is all you want?"

Gerald thought for a little while.

"Well, perhaps I might manage it somehow. I suppose I could demand my portion if I really wished it; but possibly I can manage something without that."

"Ah, yes, I feel sure you can!" cried Juliet ardently; "and just think what it would be like to change this slow humdrum life for the whirl and glitter and vortex of life in a great city! Ah, if only I were a man, it would not be long before I should find myself there!"

Gerald was not easily roused out of his habitual indolent calm, but there was something rather infectious in Juliet's enthusiasm and ardour. As they talked together in glowing terms of the great future that lay before him, he began to feel aroused from his careless state of ease, and to believe, as she did, that a great career lay before him, only waiting for him to enter upon so soon as he should have joined the ranks of genius to which he was entitled to belong.

Juliet felt like a maiden of romance, girding his armour upon a youthful knight and speeding him to the battle by words of cheer and promise.

There was no vanity or self-consciousness about Juliet in this. She knew that she was nothing to Gerald save a friend who had known him from childhood, and she had not the least thought of flattering him into an additional interest in herself—she would have scorned such a course as despicable and unwomanly. It was unselfish of her to bid him go, for she would miss him greatly as the one being who seemed to have real sympathy with her dreams and ambitions; but Juliet, with all her faults, was conscientious and sincere, and she urged upon him a course of action that she really believed was for his benefit. She never had any doubts as to her own capacity for judging the merits of a question; she was troubled by no misgivings on account of her own inexperience and ignorance of life. It is always the most inexperienced who are the boldest, and those who are ignorant of the snares and pitfalls of life who rush most blindly and confidently along the untried path. Gerald and Juliet had a great deal of this rashness and confidence, and before they had talked together for an hour, it had become almost a settled thing that he was to go to London; whilst the credit of the scheme was allowed by both to be hers.

Their conference was interrupted by the return of Mrs. Granby and Barbara, who had been making a tour of inspection round the garden and poultry yard, whilst the girl had taken the opportunity of telling her wise old friend all about her new duties and labours, and had asked her advice on many knotty points. Barbara had always been fond of Mrs. Granby, but she had never felt quite such a respect for her opinions as she did to-day. It seemed as if the old lady understood and sympathised with everything, and yet had a sound discrimination enabling her to discover true from false, and detect the least taint of insincerity, or, as Barbara called it, "humbug."

The girl felt that in the mistress of the cottage she possessed a valuable ally, to whom she might always safely apply in cases where she was in difficulty or doubt.

When they reached the other two, who had soon left them to prosecute their journey of inspection alone, they saw that an earnest conversation had been carried on also in this quarter.

Gerald was unusually silent as he partook of Mrs. Granby's excellent tea. Juliet hoped he would keep his own counsel, but that was not Gerald's forte.

"Mrs. Granby," he said, looking up by-and-by, "Juliet has been talking to me in a most edifying way about my duties to myself and others. You have brought her up to be wise beyond her years."

Mrs. Granby smiled in a way not quite easy to be understood, and Juliet coloured and looked as if she would have silenced Gerald if she could.

Barbara glanced from one to the other, and her brother, feeling that he was making something of a sensation, proceeded with great deliberation.

"She tells me that I am letting my talents rust, and am wasting my life in idleness. I partly believe she is right, and mean to amend matters in the future. In point of fact, as soon as I can see my way, I am going to London."

Barbara laughed silently. As Gerald had no money to do this, it seemed a mere boast to talk of it.

Mrs. Granby glanced quietly at her granddaughter.

"Juliet has a theory that all talent is buried and useless unless it is carried to London. When she grows older and wiser she will perhaps learn her mistake."

Juliet flushed angrily.

"At any rate, in my case I think she is right," answered Gerald, who, when once an idea took hold of him, could be quietly tenacious of purpose. "Other people have told me the same. You see I belong to an advanced school of art, that has only come to be appreciated in the great centre of civilisation."

Juliet gave him a glance of approval; Barbara's face expressed an amused disdain, whilst Mrs. Granby said in her quiet way: "London is a great place, a wonderful place, and great fortunes and names are made and lost there. Every man must to a certain extent be the master of his own life, and decide upon his own career; but to go to London to make fame and fortune that are denied at home, or at least only partially assured, is a dangerous step, and one likely to be fraught with peril. Do not enter rashly upon any such decision. Take counsel with yourself and others before making any resolve. Juliet has hardly experience enough to advise you. Your brother would be a safer counsellor."

Gerald looked at Juliet with his gay smile. The counsel of the young and ardent is ever more pleasant to hear than that of the old and thoughtful. Of course Mrs. Granby was no judge of his affairs. She was a good old soul, but sadly old-fashioned and behind the times. One could listen respectfully to her advice, but it would be ridiculous to act upon it.

Barbara had risen to her feet and was drawing on her gloves.

"Gerald has been going to London, on and off, ever since I can remember," she remarked in her incisive way. "Do not be afraid, Mrs. Granby; we shall believe in his going when he has really gone."

Gerald's smile expressed no annoyance. His temper was not easily ruffled—in that he possessed a decided advantage over Barbara—but Juliet, glancing in his face, saw a certain look of resolve about the set of his lips, and he made a slight gesture as much as to say that his mind was quite made up and would not easily be unmade.

Brother and sister went away together; and Juliet exclaimed with some heat: "I cannot bear Barbara's sneering way with Gerald, as if he were quite beneath contempt; and he so immensely her superior really!"

"Brothers and sisters are not always quite wise with one another," answered Mrs. Granby quietly; "they are inclined to be a little too intolerant of faults and failings from which none of us are exempt; but the wisest plan is to adopt the 'give and take' principle, and not to pay too much heed to the sharp speeches that wider experience teaches us to modify. A man who cannot stand a little home-made ridicule and banter is scarcely likely to make his way in the world."

Juliet pursed up her lips and kept silence. She had learned to avoid arguments with her grandmother, who had a tiresome way of being always in the right about things.

Although what Mrs. Granby had said as regards brothers and sisters was undeniably true in the case of the Meynals, as well as in that of many more families, there are notable exceptions to every rule.

At that very time—that quiet evening hour—Reinée was standing upon the terrace watching the sunset-glow fade in the sky, and she was so absorbed in her own thoughts that she only awoke to the consciousness of outward impressions when her eyes were suddenly covered by a pair of strong hands, whilst a merry voice cried in her ear: "Caught, Reinée! Fairly caught! Who is it?"

"Clive!" cried Reinée joyfully, and pulling his hands down she turned quickly round and clasped her arms about his neck, murmuring pretty loving words of welcome.

Clive's caresses were as warm as hers. Brother and sister loved each other dearly, and had never had a quarrel since the days of their babyhood, but had grown up together in the closest ties of loving union. They were never really happier than when in each other's society.

Clive was a fine handsome youth, two years older than Reinée but very like her, with the same well-cut features, high-bred carriage and air, and the same sweet and expressive dark eyes. His face was very brown from exposure to sun and wind, and he looked a picture of manly health and vigour. Reinée's eyes rested lovingly upon him, and she said presently with a bewitching little smile: "My own handsome boy!"

He laughed and kissed her again.

"I shall not waste compliments on you, little sister. You will have plenty by-and-by. Tell me, Reinée, are you happy here? What were you thinking of so seriously when I stole upon you unawares?"

"I will tell you some day. I will never have secrets from you, Clive; but I want to know more about you. Are you coming for a long visit?"

"I hope so, little sister. I have no intention of taking myself off—not at any rate before the shooting begins, and then, perhaps, we shall all go to Scotland together. And so you like this place, do you? And country life does not weary you to death?"

"I have been very happy here," answered Reinée with a bright smile, "and if you are here too, it will be quite perfect, I think."

Clive smiled, and drew his sister's arm within his, and thus they paced the terrace together.

"And I shall have you all to myself for once," said Reinée, pressing close to her brother's side. "I do not know when that has happened to us before, Clive."

"Not for some time," he answered; "life has been rather a whirl and a rush since you came out. But we shall not be quite alone for very long. Arthur Trevelyan is coming down shortly; but he will be no spoil-sport," and Clive smiled rather mischievously.

Reinée's face grew suddenly grave.

"Oh, Clive!" she exclaimed quickly, "I am sorry! I do not want Arthur here."

Clive looked at her surprised.

"Not want him! Why, I thought——"

"I know what you thought; but it is all quite wrong. I have never liked him since I began to grow up, and learn a little of life; and I like him less and less every year that passes."

Clive whistled.

"Why, little sister, what is the meaning of all this? I thought it was a settled thing that you were to marry Arthur; and he will be a peer before many years are out—some say in the course of a few months' time. Old Lord Strafford's life is not worth a pin's purchase."

"That has nothing to do with it," answered Reinée with a sort of forced quietness. "I could not marry any one I did not love; and I can never love Arthur Trevelyan."

Clive looked at her a little disturbed and perplexed.

"Why not, Reinée?"

"I am sure he is not a good man."

"I don't know, I'm sure," answered Clive, a little dubiously. "He always seems a very good fellow."

Reinée did not speak for a few minutes, and then she said thoughtfully: "I often think there is a very great difference between a 'good fellow' and a good man."

Clive glanced again at his sister. The outline of her pure profile stood out in strong relief against the darkening sky. Something in the expression of her face struck him as being changed, though in what way he could hardly tell.

"She is lovelier than ever," was the thought in his mind; "Trevelyan will not give her up without a struggle." But what he said was, "Does mother know your views?"

"No," answered Reinée, and there was some pain in her face now. "I am not very brave, Clive. Sometimes I am afraid of mamma. I want you to help me. I have never engaged myself to Arthur. He has never asked me to be his wife. I have known him from childhood, that is all. Why should it be taken for granted that I am to marry him?"

"You see the match was made for you when you were still in the nursery. Trevelyan fell in love with you after a fashion when you were quite a child, and from a worldly point of view, of course the marriage is a good one. He is a good deal older than you; but twelve years does not seem so very much as one grows up. Trevelyan may or may not be what you call a good man. I do not feel able to judge a point like that; but at least he has always been faithful to you, which should be something in his favour. I admit that it has always been taken as a matter of course that you would marry him when the time came, and possibly without sufficient allowance being made for your independent opinion; but you know what mother is, and she has always looked upon you as a sort of lawful prey. If you did not like Trevelyan, it is a pity you did not find it out sooner. Things have gone rather far now."

And Clive, who liked to take life easily, looked at his sister as if he could find it in his heart to wish that she would think better of what she had said, and submit quietly to the destiny mapped out for her.

"I never had time to think until I came here," answered Reinée gently. "Life used to be such a whirl, I seemed to be swept along without power to judge for myself; but I begin to see things differently now. Clive, you will be my friend, will you not?"

She turned and faced him as she spoke with a look that went to his heart. An appeal like that would never be made in vain, and in the present instance Clive felt more moved than he altogether liked. There was something in Reinée's face that touched him in an inexplicable fashion he could hardly understand.

"You and I will always stand together, Reinée," he answered, putting his hands upon her shoulders and looking straight into her eyes. "You may rely on me, little sister. Whatever your decision is, I will uphold it."

Sudden tears sprang to Reinée's eyes, showing how grateful this support was to her.

"My own dear boy!" she answered with a little tremulous smile; and then they resumed their walk together, and talked of other subjects, until the time came to go indoors for dinner.

Reinée knew that there were difficulties and dangers lying in her path, not very far ahead, and she did not try to blind her eyes or to ignore their existence; but just for the time being, in the delight of having Clive at home for her companion every day and all day long, she could afford to put aside her sense of coming trouble and enjoy the present as only those blessed with her happy temperament can enjoy things. Brother and sister rode, drove and boated together, exchanged confidences and indulged bright day-dreams, and led a simple, healthful life, that was as delightful to both as it was novel. They did not seek such society as St. Hilda had to offer. For the present they preferred to keep together and away from others, and scoured the country in a way that Reinée had had no opportunity of doing before.

Mr. and Mrs. Dumaresq were delighted to have their only son at home, and pleased for him to enjoy his sister's society to the full for a time.

"Let them take their fill of one another whilst they can get it," Mrs. Dumaresq sometimes observed to her husband. "I am glad for Reinée to have these weeks of liberty and Clive's company, for her girlhood is fast drawing to a close, and when once she is married, no one can tell how her life may shape itself, and in any case, it is certain to be full of duties and engagements of all sorts. She has always had a very happy and easy life with us, and I am pleased that it should continue so to the very end. She has not flagged or moped at all down here. No doubt the knowledge that she would not long be here has kept her up."

"We shall miss her sadly when she goes," the father would say with a little sigh. "She is quite the life of the house."

"Yes, we shall miss her; but we must get over that. We must not stand in the way of her happiness and welfare."

Clive, however, who saw more of his sister than their parents did, was not entirely satisfied that she was altogether as carelessly happy as they supposed, or as she had been in old days. He often caught her musing deeply, so deeply that she was lost for the time being to all sense of outward impressions; and although at such times there was no look of unhappiness in her face, yet there was a depth and earnestness of expression that often awoke within him an odd sensation akin to pain.

"Reinée," he said suddenly to her one day as he surprised her in one of these reveries, "you have never told me what all these sober thoughts are about. You are changed, little sister, from what you were when I saw you last, and I want to know what it all means."

It was Sunday afternoon, and Reinée had been reading to her old blind friend, but she had returned now, and her brother had found her in one of their favourite haunts.

She looked up with a smile as Clive seated himself beside her, and slipped her hand into his as she often did when they were alone together.

"Am I changed, Clive?" she asked. "Sometimes I am afraid I am not; but I want to be."

"You need not want that, Reinée," he answered quickly; "for nobody who knows you could wish you a bit different from what you are."

She smiled and shook her head.

"Ah, Clive, you say that because you don't know!" He put his arm caressingly round her.

"What don't I know, little sister? What is it that is troubling you?"

"I hardly know how to put it, I don't know if you will understand. I want to make my life of use, Clive. I don't want to be a mere pleasure-seeking butterfly; I know I have my own duties to think of. I am given my place in life and I mean to stay there and try to do God service by serving Him where He has put me. But I want to make my life real earnest, not all ease and pleasure. I want to live so that when I come to die I shall not have to look back on a long vista of wasted opportunities and an idle, selfish life of ease, without any thought of the great eternal future."

Reinée could speak more easily to Clive than to any one else; but even to him she could not say all she would. He was silent for awhile, and then said gravely and quietly: "I understand you better perhaps than you know, Reinée; but I tell you that the less you indulge such thoughts the better. Forget them and live happy and careless as you did before."

She looked at him with surprise.

"What do you mean, Clive?"

"I mean what I say, forget your dreams and be happy in your butterfly life. Do you think I have never had my hopes—my aspirations? Do you think I have never had dreams of noble purpose or longings after something higher and holier than the life we lead? Yes, Reinée, I understand you; I have been through it all before; but I have had to give way to circumstances. You know what our home is like, and our mother. God forbid I should judge her; but we both know how she views the questions we have been touching on. She is our mother; she moulds our lives and has done so from the day of our birth, and you know as well as I do what her influence is like. We have been born butterflies, and as butterflies we must live and die; I have striven, and I have had to confess myself beaten, as you will do, if you persist. Take my advice and give up at once; it is much the safest and simplest plan."

Clive spoke with a good deal of suppressed emotion, and Reinée, who had never known him allude to such a subject before, was surprised and moved.

"You never told me, Clive."

"No; men find it difficult to speak, and I was not always at home—home baffled me."

"Clive," said Reinée suddenly, "I do not think you are quite beaten or baffled. Let us help one another. Do not give way; God is very good; He does not look for impossibilities; He does not wish us to be undutiful or extravagant in what we do. He can help us to live for Him, even if we are surrounded by temptation. He can make our lives holy, and keep us from the evil, even if we are in the midst of it."

She broke off almost as suddenly as she had begun, wondering at her own confidence in speaking thus: but it seemed as if some assurance of help had been given her to make her brave and steadfast. Clive was silent for a long time, and his face had caught some of the serious gravity of hers with just a gleam of the light of hope that beamed out of her clear eyes.

Presently he stooped his head and kissed her.

"Little sister," he said in a low voice not quite like his own, "almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian."

"Oh, Clive!" she cried, half-startled, half-pained, "you know that you are a Christian now, and have been all your life."

"I do not know," he answered quietly. "If by a Christian you mean a follower of Christ, I am afraid I have often been something very different."

There was silence for a long time, and then Reinée spoke in a whisper: "Let us follow Him together from to-day, Clive."

"Clive," said Mrs. Dumaresq, during the course of dinner that day, "I forget if I told you that I heard from Arthur Trevelyan this morning. He intends being with us by the end of the week."

The Network on the Sky.

FAIR are the trees when the soft colours blended
By spring or autumn clothe each spreading bough,
But when the leaves have passed, their life-work ended,
An equal loveliness of form we know.

Bravely the chestnut to the tempest hearkens,
And with his sturdy arms the blast defies;
Softly the birch, all grey and silver, darkens,
Against the grey of quiet wintry skies.

We love the oak when sunbeams, in their playing,
His strong and massive lines are glancing through,
The lighter grace of willows idly swaying,
And far-spread elm-boughs pencilled on the blue.

The nightfall glows with more ethereal splendour,
Behind their curved and darkly outlined bars,
The peace of midnight seems more deep and tender,
And clearer shows the lustre of the stars.

So sorrow works its own rich compensation
When by untimely frosts our joys are shed,
For through the blanks of loss and separation
Come visions of the azure overhead.

The beauty of God's infinite designing,
His traceries of love we learn to see,
And rounding every twig in sunlight shining
The promise-buds of summers yet to be!

The Catastrophe of Beth-shemesh.

QUESTION.—It is said in 1 Samuel vi. 19, that God smote the men of Beth-shemesh because they had looked into the ark of the Lord: Even He smote of the people fifty thousand and threescore and ten men." Can this be correct?

THE literal translation of the clause in question is: "And He smote among the people seventy men, fifty thousand men." Had the intention of the writer been to express the number 50,070, he would scarcely have put it in this way. At least, such a designation of the number would be without example in Old Testament Hebrew. The Revised Version gets over the difficulty by inserting the italic and before "fifty thousand"; it is surprising however that no attention is called in the margin to the anomaly. The phrase was found altogether perplexing by the older Commentators. Among the explanations given are: "Seventy men out of fifty thousand;" "Seventy men, even fifty out of a thousand," i.e. five per cent. of the whole number;

"Seventy men, equal to fifty thousand ordinary persons!" But these explanations all seem unnatural. Josephus (Ant. vi. 1, 4) writes: "The wrath of God overtook them, and struck seventy persons of the village of Beth-shemesh dead, who, not being priests, and so not worthy to touch the ark, had approached to it." This is quoted, not as of itself authoritative, but as showing that the copy of the Book of Samuel in the hands of Josephus read simply "seventy men."

We may conclude therefore with tolerable certainty that the words "fifty thousand men," are an addition of some transcriber, and that the words ought to read: "He smote among the people seventy men." It is probable, as the Bishop of Bath and Wells suggests ('Speaker's Commentary,' in loc.), that "fifty thousand" was originally a marginal insertion by some scribe, who in copying the passage was uncertain whether the numeral (expressed by a Hebrew letter) was ע = 70 or נ = 50,000. In the earlier alphabets these letters were more nearly alike than in the form here given. Another copyist combined the text and margin: hence the error. The Septuagint and Vulgate both read 50,070, only the latter takes the repetition of the word "men" as denoting two classes: "percussit de populo septuaginta viros et quinquaginta millia plebis." "He smote of the people seventy chief men and fifty thousand of the commonalty." In this the Vulgate follows the Chaldee Targum of Jonathan; but of course without authority. The Hebrew word for "men" is the same in both instances. It may be added that the Arabic and Syriac versions read 5070.

Beth-shemesh, "House of the Sun," was a Levitical city (Joshua xxi. 16) amid vast cornfields beneath the hills of Dan. In extent it would be little more than a village, and the whole population seems to have been in the harvest-field, ver. 13 (literally "And Beth-shemesh was [were] reaping," etc.). The crime of the people in all probability was that they celebrated the return of the ark by feasting to excess, and that in their unhallowed excitement they pried into the ark. The impiety would be aggravated by the fact that the chief inhabitants of the place were consecrated to solemn service, and therefore should have set an example of reverence. The sudden death of the seventy men stricken down for their sin would be a salutary warning to all Israel.

The Brook in the Way.

Question.—How are we to understand Psalm cx. 7: "He shall drink of the brook in the way; therefore shall He lift up the head"?

We have the authority of our Lord Himself for regarding this Psalm as David's own: not in the general sense in which the whole book is ascribed to the royal Psalmist, but as an expression of his personal hope—a direct prophecy of the Christ. This Psalm, as Dean Perowne remarks, "is more frequently cited by the New Testament writers than any other single portion of the ancient Scriptures." It is worth adding that, as the same author shows, "in late Jewish writings nearly every verse of the Psalm is quoted as referring to the Messiah."

The conquests, then, which the Psalm describes, are spiritual; the imagery being taken from the triumphant career of earthly warriors. In the last verse, the subject of the query, the conqueror is depicted as pausing for a moment's refreshment, in the ardour of pursuit, and lifting up the head with new strength to continue his career. "Thou shalt reap the fruit of thy victories like a warrior who, pressing hotly on the rear of his enemies as they flee before him, scarcely pauses for a moment to snatch a hasty draught from the wayside brook, and then with renewed ardour, with head erect and kindling eye, continues the pursuit. Thus shall victory be crowned, and not a foe remain" (Perowne).

Others discern in the figure an allusion to our Lord's humiliation and glory—"He humbles Himself," to the common, wayside refreshment of earthly life, and therefore "is highly exalted." But this seems a little to confuse the figure, which, without this added thought, is simple and sublime.

Reference should be made to the mystical interpretations of the passage favoured especially by the older expositors. So, Matthew Henry: "'He shall drink of the brook in the way,' that bitter cup which the Father put into His hand. The wrath of God, running in the channel of the curse of the law, was 'the brook in the way'—in the way of His undertaking which he must go through; or which ran in the way of our salvation and obstructs it, which lay between us and heaven. Christ drank of this brook, when He was made a curse for us; and therefore, when He entered upon His suffering, He went over the brook Kidron (John xviii. 1). He drank deep of this black brook (so 'Kidron' signifies), this bloody brook, so drank of the brook in the way as to take it out of the way of our redemption and salvation." All this is interesting, but it is not exposition, and true Bible students are learning inflexibly to apply the principle, that the deepest spiritual significance of the Scriptures is to be reached by the direct and (as we may say) common-sense interpretation of its letter. In the present case, the much-needed and exquisite refreshment of the cool stream to the wearied warrior under the burning eastern sky furnishes an emblem both adequate and beautiful of the unfailing energies of love that sustain the Captain of our Salvation until His final crown shall be won.

"Ephratah" and the "Fields of the Wood."

Question.—What is the meaning of Psalm cxxxii. 6: "Lo, we heard of it at Ephratah: we found it in the fields of the wood"?

This Psalm, being one of the "Songs of Degrees," belongs to the period after the return from the Captivity, and was no doubt connected with the building and consecration of the Second Temple. By a happy retrospect, it commemorates the bringing of the Ark by David into the Tabernacle on Mount Zion. The "fields of the wood," or, as the margin reads, "of Jaar," are evidently a poetical description of Kirjathjearim ("the city of woods"), where the ark had remained for nearly a century,[1] after the catastrophe of Beth-shemesh. Thus far all is clear. Personifying David and his associates the Psalmist joyfully sings: "At Kirjath-jearim we found the ark."

But what is to be understood by, "We heard of it at Ephratah?" Now the word means "fruitful;" and the clause may therefore read: "We heard of it in a fruitful place." If then the reference is to the place where the ark was at the time, it may be no more than a description of Kirjath-jearim itself, with its orchard-fields, or of the surrounding district. So, 'Annotated Paragraph Bible:' "We heard of it in the fruitful district—we found it in the city of fields." Another explanation is that as the word "Ephrathite" sometimes denotes "Ephraimite" (Judges xii. 5; 1 Samuel i. 1; 1 Kings xi. 26), so "Ephratah" may stand for "Ephraim," the reference being to Shiloh, the place of the ancient sanctuary, "We had heard of the ark as at Shiloh in the days of our fathers; but we ourselves found it at Kirjath-jearim." According to this explanation, which is preferred by Gesenius and other authorities, the verse sums up the history of the ark up to the time when it was brought with songs and shoutings into Zion. In fact, on the authority of this passage Gesenius in his 'Lexicon,' gives "Ephraim" as one of the meanings of "Ephratah." Fuerst renders the word "to Ephrath" regarding the termination as prepositional, and also understands the allusion as being to Shiloh.

We cannot however regard this as satisfactory. Ephratah or Ephrath, as the name of a place, means Bethlehem; and (if we except the passage before us), Bethlehem only—(Genesis xxxv. 16, 19; xlviii. 7; Ruth iv. 11; Miah v. 2). To make it equivalent to Ephraim in this Psalm appears a forced interpretation, inadmissible, if the text can be fairly otherwise explained. Most natural too would it be that the mention of David would lead on to the mention of David's birth-place and early home, Bethlehem-Ephratah. But the ark never was at Bethlehem; is not this fatal to the meaning that we would give? We venture in reply to suggest another construction of the sentence, already indeed given by Hengstenberg. Instead of reading "we heard of the ark (as being) at Ephratah," read, "at Ephratah we heard of it." In Bethlehem, in the days of his youth, the son of Jesse would often listen to the story of the ark. The tale fell upon receptive ears, and stirred a strange enthusiasm: and in the heart of the child there sprang the yearning desire after this symbol of the living God, with some wild dream, perhaps, of being able to bring it to its destined dwelling-place. Of these dreams and longings the realisation seemed impossible, until the opportunity was given by his wonderful elevation to the throne and his early career of conquest. The object of youthful aspiration was secured in his maturer days; and on the heights of Zion were brought to pass the visions of Bethlehem.

Thus the Dedication of the Second Temple is connected in this noble hymn with David rather than Solomon, with Mount Zion rather than Mount Moriah, while the thought is carried back to the early days at Bethlehem in which the foundations of future greatness were laid. These days were dear to the nation's memory—

> And took him from the sheepfolds;
> To feed Jacob His people
> And Israel His inheritance.—Psalm lxxviii. 70, 71.

THE SNAIL AND THE ROSE-TREE.

BY HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN.[2]

A HEDGE of nut-bushes grew around a certain garden, outside which were a field and a meadow with cows and sheep. In the middle of the garden there was a rose-tree full of flowers, and under it sat a snail, who had a great deal in him, for he had himself.

"Wait till my time comes," said he; "I shall do something more than merely put out roses, or bear nuts, or give milk like cows and sheep."

"I shall have to wait very long for that," said the rose-tree. "May I ask when it is coming?"

"I take my time," said the snail. "Now, you are in such a great hurry; that is not the way to keep people's expectations on the stretch long enough."

The year after the snail was lying in the sun, in much the same spot under the rose-tree, which was bearing young buds and full-bloom roses, ever fresh, ever new. The snail crept half way out, stretched out his feelers, and drew them in again.

"Why, it looks just like last year! There is no progress made. The rose-tree is in the same condition, it can go no farther!"

The summer passed and the autumn passed, while the rose-tree continued to bear buds and flowers all the time until the snow fell, and the weather got bleak and wet; then the rose-tree bent down towards the earth, and the snail crept into the ground.

A new year began again, when out came the roses and out came the snail.

[2] Translated from the Danish by CHARLES J. BRANCH, D.D., Bishop Coadjutor of Antigua.

"Why now you are an old rosestick," said he. "You'll have to see about dying soon. You have given the world already all you ever had in you—whether that has been of any importance is a question I haven't had time to think about. But it is nevertheless evident that you have not done the least thing for your own internal development, or otherwise something else would have come out of you. Now, can you set up any defence for that? You are now hardly anything else but a stick from head to foot. Can you understand that, I say?"

"You frighten me," said the rose-tree. "I never thought about that."

"No; it's a long time since you ever got anything for yourself by thinking. Have you ever at any time tried to account for your own flowering, or thought anything at all about the question of bearing flowers? Why shouldn't it be done in some other way than it is?"

"No, indeed," said the rose-tree; "I flowered for the pleasure of it, because I could not help doing it, the sun was so warm and the air so refreshing. I drank in the bright dew and the strong rain: I breathed, I lived. Strength came up into me from the earth, strength came to me from above. I was conscious of a health always renewed and always great, and therefore I was obliged to be always bearing flowers."

"You have an easy, comfortable life of it," said the snail.

"To be sure I have. Everything is given me," replied the rose-tree. "But still more is given to you than to me. You are one of those profound, deep thinkers by nature, one of those highly endowed beings who will one day astonish the world."

"That I have not the least intention of doing," answered the snail. "The world is nothing to me! What have I to do with the world? I have enough to do with myself, and I have enough in myself."

"But should we not all, while we are here on earth, do our best for others? Should we not give them what we can? But you—you who have received so much—what have you given to the world? What are you giving to it?"

"What have I given it? What am I giving it? I spit at it—it is good for nothing—it is nothing to me. Put out your roses, you can advance no farther. Let the hazel-bush bear its nuts. Let the cows and the sheep give their milk. Each one of you has his own people to serve. I have mine in myself. I retire into myself, and there I am. I have my people in myself, the world is nothing to me."

And so the snail went into his house, and fastened it up.

"How sad it is," said the rose-tree; "I cannot shrink in by the utmost effort of my will. I must be ever springing out, springing out in roses. And the petals fall off and fly away in the wind. But, never mind, I have seen one of my roses laid in my mistress' hymn-book; one of them got a place on the breast of a beautiful young girl; and another was kissed by the lips of a child in his joyous happiness. These are my memories. This is my life."

And the rose-tree blossomed on in her innocence, and the snail still lay torpid in his house.

The world was nothing to him.

And so the seasons went by.

With the snail it was "dust to dust," with the rose-tree it was "dust to dust." The rose put in the hymn-book, as a keepsake, was also blown away. But new rose-bushes were blooming in the garden, and new snails were also living there. They went on creeping into their houses, they went on spitting—the world was nothing to them.

Shall I tell you their history over again? It cannot be told in any other way.

HOMELY LIGHTS ON HALLOWED TEXTS.

NO. II.

"He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."—Proverbs xvi. 32.

IT was the proud boast of the soldiers of France that every drummer boy might hope to rise to the highest position in the French army, and wield a marshal's baton. The proverb ran, "Every soldier carries a marshal's baton in his knapsack"; but we know that the proverb was but half a truth, and that of all the brave Frenchmen who have fought and died for their country, very few attained to the dignity of the high-sounding motto.

There is a service, however, in which even the youngest and weakest may hope to succeed, and in which all who are faithful and persevering are sure to reap a reward more enduring than the laurels of the warrior.

Of this service our text speaks. It tells of a warfare and a victory, and it says of those who conquer their angry passions that they are better than the mighty.

It may seem strange to some young people, and yet it is actually true, that the boy or girl who checks the flood of angry words and thoughts which rise so suddenly like armed enemies against our souls, is really engaged in a nobler warfare than many a warrior who has taken a city.

And we can understand something of this by means of a very simple illustration. Let us suppose that we are called upon to give a prize to one of two boys for true manliness and nobility of character. One boy is first in every athletic exercise, and is, so far as looks go, handsome and strong. The other is neither so good-looking nor so muscular. But this latter boy has proved that he can rule his spirit, and check the angry word or blow. He is helpful, kind, and gentle, to all who need his aid, and no cruel act has ever been recorded against him. The other boy is notoriously a bully. He makes his younger brethren quail beneath his ungovernable temper, and with him it is a word and a blow. Despite his good looks, there cannot be much question as to which we would accord the prize. He may be strong, and able to gain victories by the force of his arm, but he cannot win our respect or love, and therefore we cannot give him the highest place in our esteem.

Happily, some of the strongest among boys have also been amongst the gentlest and kindest, and where the two qualities are combined, we have the stuff of which real heroes are made.

The noblest men have been distinguished for the power of ruling themselves.

The great George Washington, as a boy, was afflicted with a violent temper, which he fought against all his life. He learned to rule himself, before he was called to rule a great people; but his victory over his own heart made him strong to govern others.

"First in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," were the fitting words engraved upon his statue. It was, perhaps, the greatest tribute that could be paid to his character to say that even his enemies mourned his loss. What greater victory can the world show than that of turning enemies into friends? Surely such a conquest is well worth our best energies.

It was in the nursery and at school, that our greatest men first showed signs of their powers, and none can be too young to begin the struggle against evil tempers and angry words.

If we wait until some great occasion arises, we can never hope to win a victory at all. Great victories are usually the result of little ones. Little words checked, little bursts of anger quelled, are sure to lead us on to greater victories, if we seek the necessary strength from our Father in Heaven.

Let us never forget that our foes are mighty, and that the strength to overcome them must come to us from God. He has promised His aid to all who seek it, and in His strength we may fearlessly go on to victory.

Home will be brighter, hearts will be kinder, and all about us will be happier, if we begin at once to fight this noble battle against the evil that is within us; and we shall presently understand the real meaning of our text, "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city."

THE SUNDAY ALBUM.

NO. I.—FIG-TREES AND FIGS.—p. 32.

THE fig-tree, so beautiful for its shade, and so valued for its fruit, is held in such high esteem in the Holy Land, that it is mentioned as one of the blessings of that country that it is "a good land. . . a land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees." (Deut viii. 8.) In later days, when Israel was settled there, we have a glimpse of the way in which they valued this tree in the curious parable of Jotham (Judges ix. 10), "The trees said unto the fig-tree, Come thou, and reign over us." A beautiful picture is given in 1 Kings iv. 25: "Judah and Israel dwelt safely, every man under his vine and his fig-tree. . . all the days of Solomon." See also Zech. iii. 10. When Rabshakeh tried to tempt Israel with deceitful promises from Hezekiah, he said, "Make an agreement with me, and then eat every man of his own vine and of his fig-tree." (2 Kings xviii. 31.)

It was not merely for shade or for ornament that this fine tree was valued. "Whoso keepeth the fig-tree shall eat the fruit thereof." (Prov. xxvii. 18.) Therefore a fig-tree planted in a vineyard, on which its owner found no fruit, was condemned,—"Cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground?" (Luke xiii. 7.) How touching is the intercession of the "dresser of the vineyard." "Lord, let it alone this year also, till I dig about it, and dung it: if it bear fruit, well: and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down."

The Lord had also another way of marking His displeasure against those represented by the unfruitful fig-tree, as shown in Matt. xxi. 19: "He found nothing thereon, but leaves only, and said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforth for ever. And presently the fig-tree withered away,"—emblem of that nation or individual that produces nothing but leaves—barren professions.

There are those from whom no such fruit is expected,—"Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?" (Matt. vii. 16.) It is thus that the Lord teaches that the "tree is known by its fruit." See also Jas. iii. 12.

The fertility of the land and the return of spring is known by the fig-tree's state, "the fig-tree putteth forth her green figs." (Cant. ii. 13.) The Lord teaches a still higher truth when speaking of the signs of His own coming, He says, "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree. When his branch is yet tender, and putteth forth leaves, ye know that summer is nigh: So likewise ye: when ye shall see all these things, know that it is near, even at the doors." (Matt. xxiv. 32. Luke xxi. 29.)

The judgments of God are shown by the destruction of the precious fruits of the earth,—"There shall be no grapes on the vine, nor figs on the fig-tree." (Jer. viii. 13.) "He hath laid my vine waste, and barked my fig-tree." (Joel i. 7.)

How grand is the faith which even in such circumstances says, "Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vine; yet will I rejoice in the Lord." (Hab. iii. 17.)

Jeremiah's two baskets of figs set forth as in a parable two opposite parties in Jerusalem, those who obeyed and trusted in the Lord, and those who refused to do so,—"One basket had very good figs, even like the figs that are first ripe: and the other basket had very naughty figs, which could not be eaten." (Jer. xxiv. 2.)

An awful scene is described in Rev. vi. 13: "The stars of heaven fell unto the earth, even as a fig-tree casteth her untimely figs."

The deep shadow of Nathanael's fig-tree made it a place of holy retirement for that man in whom was "no guile," but the eye of the Lord followed him there, and brought home conviction in a moment to his mind by the words, "When thou wast under the fig-tree, I saw thee!" (John i. 48.)

Let our young friends take a NEST as the second picture for their album.

NO. V.

Write this out, and then mark one word in each line, so as to form a text.

Those who in life's young dawn shall turn to God;
And that bright path shall choose which saints have trod;
They who seek wisdom more than length of days;
They that love Me and My most pleasant ways;
Turning from sin, and early seeking peace;
These surely in their searching shall not cease
Until the Lord they seek they find. He Says, and means it surely, "Come to Me."

"Suffer little children to come unto Me."—Luke xviii. 16.

Monthly Religious Record.

WHILE the various sections of the nation are still debating as to the manner in which they may best celebrate the Queen's Jubilee, the fifty years of the Victorian Era have already been made the occasion of many a retrospect. The development of foreign missions during that period is the subject of an interesting paper, by the Rev. E. Storrow, in the "Chronicle" of the London Missionary Society. For the details of progress we must refer our readers to the article itself; but the multiplication of societies is alone evidence of a vast change. Thus, the 8 British societies have grown to 25, or including those of the colonies, to 31; the 7 in the United States to 39; the 10 of Continental Europe to 13 in Germany, 11 in Holland, 16 elsewhere; while to these must be added many institutions not exclusively missionary, but co-operating in Christian work. Many influences have combined to give the Victorian Era its proud eminence; and among other great factors has unquestionably been the more aggressive faith of the Christian churches. When we look abroad, we are reminded that England, while contributing to the general progress, has herself, as at other times in her history, been but a sharer in a world-wide movement, having its origin in more than national causes. Surveying the field of Christian effort, Mr. Storrow concludes:—"If the missionary spirit is not as intense as once it was in a few, it is at least far more diffused. The seven Protestant Missionary Societies of 1800 have become more than a 100. Their total income then was less than 50,000*l.*; now it has steadily grown to 2,220,000*l.* Then the converts numbered about 50,000; now they are nearly 3,000,000. Every Protestant denomination of the least importance has its foreign missionary society. If a chart could be so tinted as to exhibit the relative presence of Christian teachers throughout heathenism as recently as 1837 and now, the contrast would be very great. Some regions then entirely dark now have some light; others then having a little, now have much more. Thus has it been with South America; North, East, and Central Africa; Madagascar; the Turkish, Indian, Chinese, and Japanese Empires; New Guinea, and scores of smaller islands. Central Asia, including Thibet, is, indeed, the only large region where missionaries do not reside; and if Tertullian, in the middle of the third century, and Jerome, a hundred years afterward, wrote with surprise, not untouched with exultation, of the spread of Christianity, not only among various classes in the Roman Empire, but even far beyond its limits, we, with equal surprise and exultation, but with stronger confidence, should hail the extension of the Kingdom of God now. The hundreds of thousands of converts gathered, and the almost 30,000 natives preachers and evangelists, are the outward .and visible signs of a splendid work for Christ and man. . . . And the collateral results of missions are far more varied and important than is usually supposed. . . . It is not the least of the glorious features of Her Majesty's reign that during it Christianity has spread more widely, gained more triumphs, and made more solid advance throughout heathendom than during any monarch's reign of any age or country."

ANOTHER aspect of this era is touched by Mr. Gladstone, in an article upon Lord Tennyson's new "Locksley Hall." Contrasting the past and present, he says; "The sum of the matter seems to be that upon the whole, and in a degree, we who lived fifty, sixty, seventy years back, and are living now, have lived into a gentler time; that the public conscience has grown more tender, as indeed was very needful; and that, in matters of practice, at sight of evils formerly regarded with indifference or even connivance it now not only winces but rebels: that upon the whole the race has been reaping, and not scattering; earning, and not wasting." Would it be too much to add that this gentler spirit, this more sensitive conscience is the perfected fruit of the evangelical revival of the last century?

SAD news comes from the neighbourhood of Lake Ngami. The mission to the Batauana tribe, initiated some years ago under circumstances of much interest, has been apparently shattered. The story, as told by the Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson, vividly reflects the lights and shadows of Christian enterprise. The first stroke fell in 1883, when the Matabele invaded the country, and wrecked the town. The native church was then destroyed, and the schools broken up; the traders' houses were levelled, and a large number of prisoners carried off, and many thousand head of cattle. A second raid was attempted in 1885, under one of their most noted captains; but then the Batauana were better prepared; they betook themselves to an impregnable position, and hundreds of the invaders fell in the swamps under their rifles, or in crossing the adjacent river. This success, and the long strife, have demoralised the people. The change in their location, and the break up of old associations, effaced the last traces of educational work. In the tumult of war, the heathen spirit regained its ascendancy. The tribe, as a whole, "has given up Christianity, and gone back with redoubled energy to the licentious practices and cruel ways of heathenism." A faithful band alone remains to witness for Christ.

THE Rev. James Gilmour, whose Mongolian travels have become a missionary classic, is now again in Mongolia. For some time he has been living the life of an itinerant vendor of medicines, being at the same time teacher and preacher. "I have been well received everywhere," he says. "For a while I could get but a limited medical practice. At last, imitating a Mohammedan medicine-seller I happened to see at a fair, I had a cloth awning or tent made and mounted on six sticks, and with this, like a Chinese quack-doctor, I made my appearance in the market-places and public streets. This took, and the patients have everywhere been numerous; and by this means God has opened a way for me into the hearts and confidence of the people."

THE heroic self-sacrifice of Father Damien among the lepers of Molokai reminds us of other men who have given themselves to a like service. It is sixty-seven years since the Church of the United Brethren, which has ever been ready to go to the most inhospitable climes, the most pestilential districts, and the most degraded people, had its attention called to the wretched lepers of South Africa, where her missionaries had for many years been labouring successfully among the Hottentots. An interesting sketch of their labours in this direction was published some years ago by Mr. James Latrobe. The following details will be interesting at the present time. In the year 1818 the Colonial Government fearing the spread of leprosy, erected a temporary Asylum, in the romantic valley of Hemel en Aarde (i.e. Heaven and Earth) so-called because it was far removed from human habitations and hemmed in by rocks, with only a strip of sky above. To this place some Christian Hottentots had been removed from the Moravian settlements, and their faithful pastors paid them occasional visits, and embraced the opportunity of preaching the gospel to all the afflicted inmates. In course of time, a larger hospital was built, and the Governor, Lord Charles Somerset, addressed a letter to the Directing Board of the Moravian Church, requesting that a missionary might be sent to manage the Institution, and to instruct its inmates in the doctrines of Christianity. His desire was granted, and in January 1822, the Rev. Mr. Leitner and his English wife, relinquishing the loved society of their fellow-missionaries, and the valued privileges of a well-organized church, entered on their self-denying, repulsive, and then supposed, perilous duties at Hemel en Aarde. For sometime he had to preach in the open air, at much risk to his health. Often a heavy shower would disperse the congregation, but only till the rain ceased. In 1824, a temporary chapel was built of stakes and unburnt bricks by the patients. Four years afterwards a new church was built by the Government.

Year by year the work progressed, the gospel of a crucified Saviour approved itself the power of God to salvation. Nor was this all; diligence superseded idleness, the hospital was soon surrounded by neat gardens, and a large plot of ground was cultivated for the general benefit. Assisted by such inmates as still could work, Brother Leitner constructed an aqueduct which supplied the little colony with water for their gardens and houses. No wonder that the afflicted household looked up to the missionaries as their father and mother, and sad was the Easter Day, 1829, when, after six years of faithful labour, he was suddenly removed by death, in the act of baptising one of the converts.

In the same devoted spirit their successors laboured among the lepers at Hemel en Aarde for ten years. But in 1846 the Government, wishing to enlarge the Hospital by the addition of a Lunatic Asylum and an Infirmary for the poor, resolved to remove it from Hemel en Aarde to Robben Island, a low sandy islet, surrounded by dangerous rocks, and situate near the entrance of Table Bay, seven miles from Cape Town. Here commodious buildings were erected, and arrangements made for diet, cleanliness, ventilation, and sea-bathing, far superior to those at the former station. In this new sphere the status of the missionary was materially changed; hitherto he had managed both the spiritual and temporal concerns, but now the latter were committed to government officials, and his duties were restricted to the spiritual and educational charge of the patients.

The number of inhabitants on Robben Island, lepers, lunatics, and sick, now rose to 300, and of these about 60 placed themselves distinctly under the care of the missionary. A school was begun for the children of lepers, and such adults as chose to attend, and the first teacher was a leprous young Englishman, a convert from popery, who undertook the service gratuitously. "It is most touching," wrote Brother Wedeman, "to see the scholars turn over the leaves of their Bibles with their mutilated hands, some not only without fingers, but with hands corrupted to the wrist." Many and deeply affecting were the scenes depicted at this time.

In 1860 the Governor paid a visit to the Island, and expressed a desire that a competent teacher should be sent out to take charge of the schools. Accordingly, Brother John Taylor, son of an esteemed missionary (and himself lamed in his feet from his youth), left his widowed mother, and relatives, and home comforts, and willingly followed the call of the Lord to this desolate island of lepers and lunatics. For five years this earnest young brother continued his labour, till he was called to his eternal rest on May 27th, 1866. Thus for forty years, impelled by love to Christ and compassion to man, Christian men and women were found willing to undertake this self-denying duty, amid a mass of human misery and corruption. In no field of labour was missionary work accompanied by more signal spiritual blessing. One after another of the poor lepers were, by their sore affliction, led to seek rest in Christ.

In 1867 the Colonial Government appointed a chaplain of the English Church, and thus dispensed with the religious oversight of the Moravian Church.

The Moravians have now a hospital for lepers at Jerusalem.

In India leprosy is still a terrible scourge. It is estimated that there are as many as 135,000 lepers within its boundaries. Their condition is almost too dreadful for description. A Mission to Lepers has been for some years in operation there, with a view of ministering to both their bodily and spiritual needs. This society endeavours to utilize as much as possible existing agencies, by assisting Leper Asylums already established, and providing missionaries with the means for carrying on Christian work in connection with them. It makes grants of money towards the building of new asylums, prayer-rooms, etc.; and in many instances provides for the entire support of lepers. It is at present carrying on work at Kashmir, Tarn Taran, Sabathu, Dehra, Almora, Lohardugga, Calcutta, and Alleppey, in connection with the Church Missionary Society, the London Missionary Society, the American Presbyterian Mission, and Gossner's Evangelical Mission. The work has been greatly blessed in the conversion of souls. 6*l.* will support a leper for one year, and 20*l.* will supply a Christian teacher to an asylum for the same period. Many most pathetic facts attest the consoling power of the gospel among these outcasts.

The Salvation Army has welcomed General Booth back from America. Three great meetings were held at Exeter Hall. In the course of his statement, he said that their progress in the United States was greater than in any other country. This sanguine view has been challenged, but he reported that they had made a commencement in 240 cities. A summary of the year's operations over the world, since published, shows that at the close of 1885 the Army comprised 1,322 corps under 3,076 officers, while at the present time there are 1,749 corps and 4,192 officers, being an increase in the year of 427 corps and 1,116 officers. The total receipts for the year were 73,430*l.*, as compared with 69,768*l.*, in the preceding year. The Times devoting an article to the subject, points one important lesson. "Undoubtedly," says our contemporary, "the Salvation Army has something in its spirit which other religious bodies need not disdain to copy, while they repudiate absurd accessories. All old-established societies tend after a time to close their doors, and to turn their camps into citadels. The strength of the Salvation Army is that it is constantly in light marching order, and is encumbered with little baggage, It is not more dependent on a base of operation than a Mahratta host of the last century. Its life is a life of forays and invasions. With all its defects it will not have been without use if it has reminded orderly communities of a distant past in which, at the opening of their careers, they conducted themselves with the same vivacity, though with more self-respect."

The Colporteur's "place in history" is described on another page. We note with pleasure also his place among the agencies of to-day. The Christian Colporteur's Association, for example, employs 91 colporteurs. Its sphere is indicated in the fact that during the year 1885, they sold many copies of the Scriptures, various books and periodicals to the number of 578,762, and distributed half a million of tracts. More than a thousand villages are regularly visited, as well as the Metropolitan markets and other markets and fairs. In addition they have two colporteurs who work at some of the ports on the Severn, and a Bible carriage which goes about many of the towns and villages in the South and West of England. Another Association has its headquarters at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and for the same year reports a distribution of 457,527 Bibles and books, and 320,504 periodicals. The Church of England Book Hawking Union employs a like agency; while the Religious Tract and Book Society of Scotland has also a committee for colportage.

Mr. G. R. Sims, whose description of life among the poor attracted much attention some years ago, has recently given his impressions of the East of London, as he finds it after the lapse of time. "One improvement directly resulting from the slumming agitation must," he says, "be thankfully chronicled. Religion and Temperance have stepped in and taken a tighter grip of the masses. In several slums that I passed through I found a church bill displayed in every window—the printed notice of a sermon to be preached next Sunday; and on entering into conversation with the inhabitants I found that the great bulk of them were teetotallers. The manners of the people have also appreciably improved. In places where a few years ago I was received in much the same spirit as the cannibals of the Pacific Isles were wont to display when a white stranger landed on their shores, I found a courteous welcome from both men and women. The conversation of my hosts was also considerably less garnished with expletives, and faces were worn decidedly cleaner." As regards the housing of the poor, he reports that the large blocks of buildings erected here and there have made little appreciable difference. There is, moreover, no marked improvement in the domestic interiors.

Our readers will be glad to learn that Mr. Power's sketch in our November part entitled "Unscattered" has brought £300 to the funds of the National Orphan Home, on Ham Common. This amount has been received chiefly in small sums, which have varied from one half-penny, to 5*l.* It is evidence how widely the Sunday at Home is read, that the contributions have come from India, Egypt, Canada, Germany and other places abroad. The friends of the orphans in that institution return their warmest thanks. We are unable here to specify details; but may add that two cheeses have also come to hand, and a variety of clothing.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

BY EVELYN EVERETT GREEN.

CHAPTER X.—ARTHUR TREVELYAN.

"VERY PRETTY AND ARCADIAN," SAID TREVELYAN.

"BE ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers."

Reinée closed her Bible and stood quite still, leaning against the window frame and gazing steadfastly over the sea, upon whose broad shining expanse of waters the opal tints of twilight were beginning to gather.

Reinée was dressed for dinner and had dismissed her maid, as she often did now, for a few minutes before descending, and those few minutes were generally spent by her in quiet, prayerful thought, or in the study of her Bible.

She looked very fair and sweet that evening in her pure white robes, white blossoms in her hair, and a look of steadfast purpose shining in her eyes. An unusual shade of seriousness and gravity hung about Reinée that evening, for she would have to meet in a few minutes time the man whom her parents wished that she should marry, and who had probably come with the intention of making a formal proposal for her hand and of settling definitely for a speedy union. It was this thought that made the girl's face grave and serious; but there was no wavering or indecision in the set of the delicate lips or in the glance of the dark eyes. Difficulty and some trouble and distress might lie before her; but Reinée knew by this time that she would not be left to fight the battle alone; she had learnt where help was to be had and was never asked in vain.

She had closed her Bible and a shade had gathered upon her face, presently she spoke half aloud: "Is Arthur an unbeliever? I cannot tell. I do not wish to judge him; but I am afraid—I am afraid he has no God, save of his own making. I have so often heard him sneer at what is good and true, and speak slightingly of those who are living for another world beyond this. I have felt again and again that we were not suited to one another. Now I am sure of it. I would do much to please my mother; but not that—not that."

And with a look of peculiar sweetness and resolution upon her face, Reinée went downstairs and entered the drawing-room.

She was watched rather closely by more than one pair of eyes as she appeared, and met Arthur Trevelyan with a quiet, gracious self-possession that was at once dignified and simple. Her colour had deepened a little, and her eyes were unusually large and luminous. She looked very lovely, and her mother regarded her with satisfied pride, whilst her brother felt that she had a very difficult game to play, and wondered how it would end.

Arthur Trevelyan was a handsome man with a hard face expressive of determination and force of character. It was not a good face, despite its regularity of feature. Its beauty was all external, it lay only surface deep, and was already somewhat marred by the traces wrought upon it by the passions from within. He had been travelling for some time. Reinée had not seen him for nearly a year. She detected at once that he was changed, and that not for the better.

He looked at her steadily as they met, with an air of appropriation that deepened the flush upon her cheek. His long and close acquaintance with the family and his years of seniority had given him the claim to a familiarity which it was useless now to resent. He had known her as a little child with white frocks and floating hair, and had paid court to her, even then. It was hardly likely he would begin to stand on ceremony now.

"You grow more like your name every year, Reinée," he said, "more queen-like and stately; but it becomes you well. I never wish you other than you are. Tell me, are you glad to see me after this long absence? Is my presence welcome to you?"

He asked the question with a sort of cool confidence, and he did not release the hand he held.

"My brother's friends are always welcome," answered Reinée, looking at him without a trace of self-consciousness. "And especially when they are old friends and known to us all."

He smiled a little as he turned away. He would win a warmer welcome from her presently.

Reinée was somewhat more silent than was her wont at the dinner-table that day, and when she did talk it was generally to her father, at whose elbow she sat, and whose wants she studied and forestalled with a loving tenderness that had become habitual with her since his health had so manifestly failed.

Mrs. Dumaresq talked to their guest, and drew him out on the subject of his travels. Arthur talked well, and if he boasted somewhat of his own prowess, it was done with a skill that almost defied detection, and left no unpleasing impression on the minds of his hearers. His eyes rested often upon Reinée; he seemed to be studying her with great attention. Perhaps he was conscious of the subtle change that had crept over her of late, and was wondering what it was, and what had caused it. He felt that she was at a greater distance from him than she had been when last they met; but he attributed that to the length of his absence and her natural girlish shyness. He was a man accustomed to his own way, and he did not doubt for a moment his power of breaking down any barrier of reserve so soon as he had a mind to do so.

"Arthur is really exceedingly clever and well-informed," remarked Mrs. Dumaresq, when she and her daughter were alone together after dinner. "I think he improves each time I see him."

Reinée was standing by the long French window that even now stood open to the soft night air.

"Do you?" she questioned thoughtfully. "I do not think I agree with you."

"You are hardly of an age to judge, my dear. You must accept upon some points the verdict of those older and wiser than yourself. Arthur is a man of very superior parts. I only wish Clive would show indications of as much talent and energy."

"You see we do not quite agree in our views, mamma," answered Reinée, still speaking quietly and naturally. "I should be very sorry to see Clive grow like Arthur. I want him always his own dear self."

Mrs. Dumaresq looked sharply at her daughter, but she was disarmed by the serenity of Reinée's expression. There was no mutiny or defiance in the sweet face turned towards the moonlight without.

"Ah, you and Clive always stood by one another; but all the same, Arthur is the cleverer man."

"And Clive the better one."

"What do you mean by better?"

"I mean that he has the nobler nature. I could trust Clive's generosity and goodness of heart, his unselfishness and bravery, anywhere, and under any circumstances; but I could not say the same of Arthur."

Mrs. Dumaresq looked slightly displeased, but she laughed lightly as she answered, "You are foolish about Clive—you always were; but you will do more justice to Arthur when you know him better."

Reinée made no reply, but moved across to the piano, and played softly until she was interrupted by the entrance of the men.

"It's as light as day outside," remarked Trevelyan, approaching the window. "I want to see your garden, Reinée; it looks charming in this light. Come round and do the honours. I have never before seen you occupy the post of châtelaine in a house like this."

"The garden is delightful," answered Reinée, slipping her hand within Clive's arm as she stepped out upon the terrace. "We have such lovely views of the sea, as you must have noticed before. If we stay here I mean to be very busy in the autumn making improvements. Clive and I have a great many ideas. I hope papa will buy the house. I have never felt any place quite so like home as this."

"It is not likely to be your home for very long, in any case," remarked Trevelyan, in a low voice; but Reinée made no reply, only that Clive felt her fingers press rather more closely upon his arm.

He came to the rescue by drawing his friend into conversation, and an hour slipped quickly away in rambling about the extensive grounds of the Hall, and in talking easily and pleasantly of bygone days and old associates.

Reinée presently left the young men to smoke together, and slipped off to her own room. Arthur Trevelyan oppressed her somewhat by his air of appropriation. She had never given him the right to exercise it, and she looked upon it as a liberty that he had no right to take.

With all her gentleness and sweetness, Reinée had a good deal of innate pride; and she could be exceedingly dignified and stately when it pleased her. She was quite prepared to hold her own with Arthur Trevelyan, and to show him his place if necessary.

The next day was Sunday—a day that of late Reinée had learned to love and prize very highly, and to keep very differently from the way in which she had been accustomed to see it kept.

There had been no Sabbath calm about God's day of rest in the girl's old life. It had been as it were a breathing space in which to recover from the toils of the past week, and lay in a supply of energy for that which was begun. No active employment had been carried on, but it had never been hallowed by any of the reverence that makes it in very truth "the Lord's day." Reinée had generally gone to church, sometimes accompanied by her mother, but more often only attended by a servant, and she had tried to infuse a little of the devotional element into the day by the choice of her books and the regulation of her thoughts; but she had received no encouragement from without, either by example or precept, and it had been an uphill struggle, not undertaken with much resolution or energy. Until lately Reinée had been more given to dream than to think, and her ideals had been far too shadowy for her to grasp.

Now, however, a change had come over her. She had begun to see light where once all had been dark, and step by step she was treading the narrow way, humbly and patiently trying to follow the footsteps of the Saviour whom she had learned to know and to love.

Her quiet country Sundays were a source of much comfort and pleasure. The simple practical teaching of the old rector, followed by the earnest, impassioned eloquence of the young man who had taken his place for a time, had been of immense use to Reinée. No difficulty was made here about her regular and frequent attendance at church, or her visits to her cottage protégés. Mrs. Dumaresq liked her daughter to be looked up to and admired by high and low, and fancied that there was nothing more than a freak of fancy in the girl's "religious turn." All young things liked change; and this new development was very pretty and becoming, and gave a pleasant popularity to the name of Dumaresq.

All the family, with the exception of Mr. Dumaresq, attended morning service; and Arthur Trevelyan, who never willingly entered a place of worship, swallowed his weariness and ennui as well as he could in the pleasure of sitting beside Reinée and watching her covertly throughout the service. But his restlessness and distaste did not escape her notice. She felt instinctively that he was only here from motives of policy, and she heard him mutter under his breath a word or two of scornful dissent as young Mr. Leslie spoke with peculiar emphasis and eloquence upon the awful danger those were in who idly followed the fashionable doubt and scepticism of the day.

Reinée had a visit to pay on her way home from church to the old blind woman, to whom she read regularly on Sundays and once or twice during the week. Generally she went in the afternoon, but to-day she feared she might be prevented from doing so, and determined to take advantage of the present and go on her way home. So she slipped away as the congregation were dispersing, and hoped that her disappearance would be unnoticed.

She had hardly however got clear of the churchyard before she found herself joined by Trevelyan.

"Whither away so fast, Reinée? This is surely not the direct way home?"

"No; you must go back and keep up the hill. I am going to pay a visit before I go home."

"You have modified your views then, Reinée; for if I remember right you made a point of paying no visits on Sunday, or receiving them, if you could help. I suppose you have learned at length how inconvenient such Sabbatical rules are?"

He spoke with something of mockery in his tone. Reinée, her mind full of the stirring truths she had just been hearing, answered quietly and fearlessly: "I am learning more and more to try and keep holy the Sabbath day as we have been bidden to do. You know best whether you are doing the same."

He laughed with careless raillery.

"You see, Reinée, I am more advanced than you, though quite as Scriptural, I assure you. I hold that the Sabbath was made for man—not man for the Sabbath."

"Yes," she answered, turning her clear eyes full upon him, "the Sabbath was made for man, that he might use it as God has appointed, and not abuse it after his own will. You may be quite sure it was not made to be ignored and despised. I know it is not for me to preach. I have been very thoughtless and careless; but I cannot and will not stand by to hear you sneer at such things. If you are determined to be a scoffer, please keep out of my hearing."

Reinée spoke with her usual quietness, but Trevelyan had never before received such a set down at her hands, and he felt more affronted than he cared to express. He admired the through all the ages; and the Master's commission ordains Mary Magdalene, last at the cross, first at the sepulchre, to be the earliest herald to the despairing disciples of the power of His resurrection.

Eighteen centuries pass away; and when we narrow down our gaze to the one spot in Christendom where we might reasonably expect to find the Gospel victorious, the prospect is scarcely brighter than was that of the heathen world before Christ. It is now scarcely a century and a half ago since Bishop Warburton said that he had lived to see that fatal crisis, in England, when religion had lost its hold on the minds of the people; while Bishop Butler declared that it had come to be taken for granted that the religion of Christ was fictitious, "a subject for mirth and ridicule." The picture of the moral condition of England was worthy to be hung as a companion beside that of Rome under Nero. We need only recall, for a moment, the merciless descriptions given by Thackeray of the First and Second Georges; the coarse satires of Swift; the equally coarse pages of Fielding; and those famous paintings in which William Hogarth has immortalized the life seething about him in that London which Johnson brands as "the common sewer of Paris and of Rome." It is a condition of things upon which no pure-minded man cares to look long. In the pathway of history there it is, this stagnant slough of despond; and we are bound to take knowledge of it. But like the lonesome traveller, haunted by the spectre, who "having once turned round, walks on, and turns no more his head," so the student of the seventeenth century has no inclination to spend one moment in its company beyond what is absolutely necessary. "I say," cries Thackeray, "I am scared as I look round at this society, at this king, at these courtiers, at these politicians, at these bishops, at this flaunting vice and levity."

But then, as truly as in the first century, "the Lord reigned." Again the Gospel of Christ asserted its power. Such changes as Lecky pictures coming over the Pagan world, later historians describe as coming over our Protestant world, a hundred and fifty years ago.

It was then that modern Protestant missions were born. The very same power which was working a moral revolution in England and the Colonies, matched itself against a heathen world, of whose magnitude and wickedness it knew no more than did the first disciples, of the region beyond, when they started out to preach the gospel to every creature. It is with these "regions beyond" that we are now concerned. The scope of our argument is comparatively limited, and, to a believer in Christ, it is certainly very imperfect. "Godliness," says the apostle, "is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come." This "life that now is," is a life which the world at large can measure and apprehend. If, by the spread of Christian missions, commerce is prospered, if civilization is advanced, if patriotism is cherished, if education is introduced and culture encouraged, and the morals of a community are cleansed, these things must be simple matters of history. The gauge which such an one as Mr. Lecky applies to the old heathen world, can be applied also to the heathen world which lies about us at this hour.

If William Carey, or Alexander Duff, or Henry Martyn, or John Williams, had been sent forth to speed the commerce, and to raise the civilization, and to inspire the patriotism of the world, they would, we believe, have failed. Nobler ambitions swelled in their breasts. But we cannot afford to shut our eyes to the fact that all this, and much more of the same character, modern missionaries have accomplished. This "after-shine" of Christianity, as Carlyle finely calls it, is not, indeed, the full splendour of the light which, coming into the world, lighteth every man; but it is not, therefore, to be ignored. Christian missionaries have a right to point to material prosperity, to home happiness, to nobler manners and purer laws, to schools and colleges, to temperance, truthfulness, peace and security, and to demand of the wide world to-day that these be credited to them as among the things which accompany salvation.

Wherever honest missionary work has been done, "the life that now is" has been lifted up and made better.

I will glance, to commence with, at the effects of missions upon commerce. Perhaps you will pardon me if I allude at once to an incident of personal interest to myself. As a boy, one of my earliest remembrances is of being told the tragic history of the "Charles Eaton." A large merchantman of that name, bound for China, was wrecked among the dangerous reefs of Torres Straits. A raft was hastily made, on which the crew and passengers all escaped to a small island, where they were treacherously welcomed by the natives. On the first night after their arrival, the savages, having seen that all their visitors were asleep, set upon them with clubs. With the exception of one little boy, every one of the white men was killed, and the bodies were eaten. This child was carried off, with the skulls of the murdered people, to Murray Island. A schooner, sent out by the British Government, rescued the boy; and finding the skulls piled as a trophy, brought them to the Cape of Good Hope, where they were buried. The facts are impressed on my mind because an uncle of my own was one of the victims, and his death must have occurred about the same time that I was born. Now, through the heroism of missionaries who, fearless of its evil reputation, and of the blood of some of their own number, persisted in occupying that ill-omened region for Christ, Murray Island is civilized; it has become an educational centre, industrial and other schools are planted there, regular reports are issued of the work carried on by native teachers, and it is a well-known place of call for traders. It is quite as safe to-day for a stranger to be wrecked in Torres Straits as in Boston Harbour; and a merchant is in more danger of being clubbed on Broadway than on those once murderous shores. If countries at one time shut off from trade by barbarous practices are now open to commerce, commerce has not herself to thank for this. The peace of the world is being promoted by the Gospel of Peace. Sir Austin Layard confesses that he went to India prejudiced against missionaries, and holding the opinion that they were largely responsible for the terrible mutiny in this empire. He came away with the firm persuasion that, so far from this being the case, they were the most intelligent and the soundest men he met.[1]

The dignity of labour is an essentially Christian doctrine. In Rome, while the cry "To arms!" could call thousands into the battle-field, industrial toil was handed over to slaves, and came at last to be reckoned beneath the dignity of the free man. In heathen lands to-day, in half-civilized countries, with the Indian tribes, and even on our own frontiers among the wilder settlers, the drudgery of honest toil is contrasted unfavourably with a life of predatory ease. Christianity changes all this. Robert Moffat once told me that when first he went among the Bechuanas, he found no ambition for trade. Money, the people called "buttons without holes in them." Merchants did not dare to pass beyond the line of missionary discovery. When he left the country he could record the fact that, in one year alone, £300,000 passed through Bechuana and in commercial transactions. No sooner were the savage hearts tamed, and the fierce lives surrendered to Christ, than the converts "manifested a disposition to clothe themselves, and to keep clean their persons. They began to improve their dwellings, and, in a simple way, to furnish them. They wanted ploughs, waggons, and other agricultural implements. They entered readily into commercial relations with foreigners, and in a few years their import of foreign manufactures amounted to £250,000 paid for in the produce of the soil."

In the South Seas the islands, with almost universal readiness, took on a new life with Christianity. Under the teaching of the missionaries the cotton plant was cultivated, spun, and woven; sugar was extracted from the cane; roads were made; bridges were built; a patent-law was passed; a newspaper was started, and, in due time, a national debt. Not even the shadows of civilization were lacking. Before this, traders had come to these islands almost in vain. They had left on them their vices, and carried away the spoils of trickery and violence. Discovery, in yet earlier years, had visited these same islands only to lose, on their treacherous shores, Captain Cook, the first of modern voyagers. But with Christianity al things became new. In 1867 the imports were £400,000, and the exports exceeded them by £100,000. In the Congo country, while a great majority of the cotton goods sent out go to deck the dead, the living are no longer content to dress themselves in the narrow strip of cloth formerly used. The whole region has been opened to European enterprise by the foundation of a new state.

The missionary, while no trader himself, must often serve an apprenticeship to those industrial arts which are the bases of commercial life. James Mursell Philippo, the Apostle of Jamaica, was at once doctor, brick-maker, builder, joiner, wheelwright, farm labourer and manufacturer. In the fascinating "Voyage of the Beagle," on which his fame was founded, Mr. Darwin describes, in glowing terms, the change wrought in New Zealand by Christianity. The country-side at Waimate he finds more charming than an English or a tropical garden. "All this," says he, "is very surprising, when it is considered that five years ago nothing but the fern flourished here. Moreover, native workmanship, taught by the missionaries, has effected this change. The lesson of the missionary is the enchanter's wand." The traveller is quick to notice that this revolution in industry goes hand in hand with a revolution in morals.

Now, it is surely only right that such facts as these should be widely known. At the British Association meeting in Montreal, Sir Richard Temple, an eminent authority on India, drew attention to the debt which commerce owes to Christianity. England spends, he tells us, three-quarters of a million of pounds on Christian missions. What is this petty sum compared with what is annually produced by trade with the nations to whom missions have given access?

It is to modern missions that the savage world is indebted for the civilization which has made its life clean and tolerable. The scion of an ancient English family, himself a man of fine taste, ripe scholarship, and exquisite manners, is seen, one evening, travelling in New Zealand. To call him an Episcopal Bishop is to summon back those early days when a bishop needed to be made of heroic stuff. And of such stuff Bishop Selwyn was made. "I landed," he writes, on this occasion, "with my faithful Maori carrying my bag and cassock, the only remaining articles in my possession of the least value. The suit which I wore was kept sufficiently decent, by much care, to enable me to enter Auckland by daylight, and my last remaining pair of shoes (thin ones) were strong enough for the light and sandy walk of six miles which remained from Manukau to Auckland. At 2 P.M. I reached the Judge's house, by a path avoiding the town, and passing over land which I have bought for the site of the cathedral; a spot which, I hope, may hereafter be traversed by the feet of many bishops better shod and far less ragged than myself."[1] The presence alone of a man like Selwyn is, in itself, a liberal education. We pass to the opposite extreme of the social scale when we mention the name of Alfred Saker, missionary to Africa, a man of humble birth and imperfect education. Yet, under his influence, the wild tribes of Africa were changed as entirely as were the Maoris of New Zealand under the influence of Bishop Selwyn. "More than twenty inquirers are hanging,"[2] he says in one place, "on my heart and lips, with marks of deepest solicitude. The ferocious, demoniacal features are assuming the softness of children, and those who, a little time since, sought my life, are saying to me, 'What shall I do to be saved?'"

Turn, if you can do so, to the original edition of Captain Cook's voyages. Look at these plates. Here, a savage, horridly adorned, with a dagger run through his ear. Here, a bench, covered with naked men and women. Here, a wild dance of the men, more awfully grotesque than a page from Dore's 'Dante.' Here, a human sacrifice. Here in the Sandwich Islands, a picture of the savages worshipping Cook as one of their gods, having placed him in honour among their hideous idols. Now leave this vivid book of travels, and take up, instead, the perodical published in these very same islands at the present time, 'The Friend.' It is the journal of a highly civilized and most intelligent people; and the last page is occupied by the doings of the Young Men's Christian Association of Honolulu.

Some five and twenty years ago a missionary was pushing his way into Africa, up one of the rivers which empty into the western shores of the Dark Continent. Suddenly, a creature sprang out of the bushes, which slowly assumed the shape of a human being; a young boy, but more degraded and inhuman than we can imagine any creature made in the likeness of God to have become. He had no articulate speech, but he made signs to be taken into the boat. Before long he disappeared again. That same missionary attended a gathering of Sunday-school children last year, and listened to an address by one of the native pastors of that district. The wild creature of the swamp, and the preacher on this occasion, were one and the same person.

JACOB: A STUDY OF CHARACTER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

"JACOB have I loved, but Esau have I hated." So, in Jehovah's name, speaks the prophet Malachi, as he contrasts the arid mountain wastes of Edom with the fair valleys of Israel. We know how the Apostle Paul applies the words, and, from the different fate which befell the descendants of the twin brethren, points his argument for the sovereignty of God. Yet, apart from this, there are in the contrast important ethical meanings, which hardly lie upon the surface, and which may even shock our preconceptions.

Many a reader of the patriarchal annals has at times been conscious of a preference for the ruddy frank-hearted sportsman over his quiet and subtle-minded brother. Englishmen, we may be permitted to say, feel this pre-eminently. Of all faults, duplicity is perhaps the most abhorrent to Saxon instincts; and we are apt to forgive many a grave moral defect to the hearty and the outspoken. Our delight in all athletic and manly exercises fosters the tendency; schoolboys would call Jacob a "milksop," and many children of a larger growth will confess that Esau was after all "a good fellow." The young huntsman would have been the favourite in almost any family, and a natural leader among his young companions. Most people, on first acquaintance, would "get on with" him better than with his shy and thoughtful brother. He would have many more friends, though not so true, perhaps, and constant as the friends of Jacob. That Isaac should have preferred Esau is not wonderful. The very unlikeness between father and son would but quicken the old man's doting fondness. It is equally natural too that the mother should prefer the quiet, obedient, home-loving Jacob.

But Esau was "a profane person"; he despised the great spiritual gift which was the heirloom in Abraham's line. True; but, some will boldly say, was it not better to be thus profane, than to be as mean and overreaching as Jacob showed himself to be when he proposed that memorable bargain? To the immediate view, the wild impetuous warrior of the forest, faint with hunger and ready to give up anything for bare life, seems not wholly at a disadvantage beside his crafty smooth-faced brother.

Then what are we to say of the conspiracy by which Isaac's intentions regarding Esau were frustrated at the last? We cannot but have our pity stirred by the "exceeding great and bitter cry," with which the favourite son threw himself on his father's baffled heart: "Hast thou but one blessing, my father? Bless me, bless me also, my father!" Our natural sympathies are still on Esau's side.

We pursue the history of Jacob; and amid its glimpses of supernatural grandeur, we still discern the calculating, bargain-making spirit. Even when awaking from the slumbers on which visions of God and heaven had dawned, the transports of his devotion do not wholly check his ruling disposition. "If God will be with me .... then shall Jehovah be my God; and this stone shall be Beth-el, and of all that Thou shalt give me, I will surely give the tenth unto Thee."[1]

[1] It is right to say that there is another way of reading this passage (Genesis xxviii. 20–22), which makes the bargain somewhat less pronounced. "If God will be with me . . . and if Jehovah will be my God . . . then this stone shall be Beth-el, and I will surely give the tenth unto Thee." By this turn to Jacob's vow (given in the margin by the English Revisers) his promise becomes not that of personal devotion on condition of Divine care, but of the dedication of the place and of his gifts to God, should the opportunity be afforded. Dr. Doddridge, in his beautiful paraphrase, turns Jacob's vow into a prayer:

"God of our fathers, be the God
Of their succeeding race."

PARTING OF JACOB AND REBEKAH [From the Painting by Rodolphe Amoëdo.

The subsequent transactions in Laban's sheepfold display a similar character. The covetous, bewildered Mesopotamian, endeavouring to circumvent his nephew, is again and again defeated by the younger man's craft. Laban "changed his wages ten times," but Jacob was even with him to the last, and still secured the best of the flocks and the herds. The whole business is eminently Oriental, and while we feel that the brother of Rebekah is detestable, we can scarcely exonerate the son.

Such are the superficial aspects of the history; and yet, before going any deeper, we must note one important fact which cannot but qualify our estimate. Jacob schemed and planned simply to obtain his own. It was no case of defrauding others of their just rights. Laban would have deprived him of his wages, and was only compelled by stratagem to render substantial justice. Then, as to the graver matter of the birthright: from the beginning, Jacob knew it to be pledged to him by the Divine word. In the face of the declarations of God Himself, Isaac's attempted choice of Esau to receive the supreme blessing was an injustice. Well must Rebekah and Jacob have understood this. The promise of God to the younger was the great family tradition. Mother and son must often have talked of it; the father was familiar with it; Esau himself had surrendered any possible claim. And now at last, suddenly, peremptorily, Isaac appears to be setting aside the Divine plan. A few hours, and the patriarchal blessing will be wrongfully bestowed! It is a terrible emergency! Must not Rebekah and Jacob "do something"? Alas! they had not the calm strong faith that could wait, assured that God would accomplish His own purpose in His own way. They did not understand that Infinite wisdom needs no human craft to further its designs. Like many mistaken religionists of after times, they sought a Divine end by immoral means, when no other seemed available; and the result of their intermeddling, although for the moment apparently successful, was to their own shame and disaster.

How stern and complete, again, was the retribution of Jacob's sin! His mother's fondness had led him astray: and mother and son were parted, never, as it appears, to meet again. "Flee then," she said, "to Laban my brother, and tarry with him a few days." The "few days," stretched out to twenty years of weary servitude! Had he risked everything to gain the assurance of his birthright in the fair land of Canaan, only for a result like this? Then, he had been the occasion of strife in his father's household; more bitter were the dissensions which through long years distracted his own. He had grossly deceived his father; his sons in turn shamefully imposed upon him. He reaped as he had sown: and, although forgiven and restored, he was pursued by the consequences of his misdoings, almost to the end.

But we have not yet reached the true man—to whom, when driven from home in consequence of his falsehood, God Himself appeared, and showed a path from earth to heaven. For that vision there must have been a spiritual susceptibility. We cannot imagine Esau dreaming such a dream. The power of God's Spirit had already reached the soul of Jacob; and a Divine life was quickened there, although so strongly overlaid by human selfishnesses. So, amid Jacob's imperfections and failures, we still discern the possibility and the promise of higher things. In his more winning and attractive brother that promise is absent. Esau is the "natural man": his highest qualities belong to the present sphere; we see the best and the worst of him at once; he "wears his heart upon his sleeve." Such men may be very frank and generous when the impulse so takes them: they can also be violent and cruel. To this day it is uncertain what Esau at first intended to do with the "four hundred" men whom he took with him to meet Jacob. The apprehensions of the latter may after all have been mistaken. Possibly the chieftain of Mount Seir may have intended only to make an imposing demonstration, showing himself at his best while welcoming his brother back to Canaan. His armed retainers would make a goodly display in comparison with those droves of flocks and herds, that company of women and children! In such a contrast Esau would delight. For it must be remembered that he had his heart's desire. Whatever his clamorous entreaties may have been for "the blessing," he had never really understood what it meant; and he was happier in his mountain fastnesses, "away from the fatness of the earth, and from the dew of heaven from above," than he could have been among his father's tents and sheepfolds in Beersheba. Could he have seen the immediate future, too, would he not have exulted in thinking he had the better part? The long line of "dukes" of Edom, in their wild unfettered freedom, would seem a bright contrast with the strangerhood and degradation of Israel in Egypt. What man of the world would not rather have had the "birthright" of Esau?

Jacob was a man who even at the worst held to his faith in the future and the unseen. He felt, however dimly, that he lived for something beyond the visible and tangible. The great promises of God had not passed into unheeding ears; he "was persuaded of them and embraced them, and saluted them from afar." His moral defects were those incident to a thoughtful, dreamy nature. When principle is weak, intrigue and finesse have not infrequently been associated with a sincerely religious feeling. Yet in the spiritual man there is that which will overcome these lower elements. The true life in its rudiment and germ is there, with its possibilities of growth and of conquest. Esau remains to the end the slave of impulse; although the impulses may not only be generous, but may simulate the results of disinterested affection. Jacob grows towards the light, entering more and more into communion with God; the baser tendencies of his nature being cleared away one by one, and the character emerging in spiritual nobleness at the last. To something of this nobleness he had attained when he utters his wonderful prayer before meeting Esau and the four hundred men. It is not without significance that this is the first[1] recorded prayer in Scripture; and in its fine completeness it gives the picture of a soul purified by discipline and led upwards from its immature longings and dreams to restful communion with God. Humility, thankfulness, and trust blend in one impassioned cry; and the victory over self is a presage of that sublime victory which was to win for him the name of Israel. His might in that mysterious struggle, "until the breaking of the day," well symbolized the spiritual power to which he had arisen through discipline and self-conquest. It was "power with God." And at the same time, the touch that left him halting showed him that the power was not his own. Dependence on his own resources could mean only failure, and there were marks that he would carry to his life's close.

> Contented now, upon my thigh
> I halt, till life's short journey end;
> All helplessness, all weakness, I
> On Thee alone for strength depend;
> Nor have I power from Thee to move,
> Thy nature and Thy name is Love.[2]

Henceforward, the life of Jacob is worthy of his new name. Through troubles patiently and nobly borne, he reaches at last the supreme hour in which "by faith he blessed Ephraim and Manasseh," with a calm reliance upon the purpose of God, as far as possible removed from the restless self-assertion of his younger days. "Let my name be named upon them." Strange words for the aged shepherd from Palestine to employ respecting the sons of Zaphnath-Paaneah, the great Egyptian noble! Faith explains the mystery—faith, piercing at a glance through four centuries of time, to the possession of Canaan; then onward still, to the accomplishment of the world's great hope. The "birthright" and the "blessing" remain the object of his hopes: only for the self-seeking, the restlessness, the artifice, with which he had once sought to win them, there is now the sublime repose of absolute trust in God. "I wait for Thy salvation, O Jehovah!"

Such are the points of contrast between the natural man at his best and the spiritual man at his worst. The former remains on its own low level for evermore, unless indeed some miracle of heavenly grace should shatter the old self-content and inbreathe new life; to the other, the glimpse of the Divine which has been vouchsafed will grow into the perfect day. It is faith, we are told, that saves. True greatness of character can be reached only through communion with the Unseen. The "children of this age" pass away and are forgotten; but "they that are of faith" appear as God's true Israel, and out of weakness are made strong for evermore.

[1] "This prayer is the first on record; for the intercession of Abraham for Sodom was more of the nature of a remonstrance or argument; and Eliezer's utterance at Haran rather a proposal than a prayer."—Dr. Kitto.

ANNE GENTLE:

A SKETCH IN BLACK AND WHITE.

THERE are few bits of English landscape less interesting—to speak in common parlance, and from the level of common ideas—than the mile and a half of flat country that you pass through, between the village of Caldecote and the little hamlet of Hatch, in Bedfordshire.

The road runs almost in a straight line, between wild hedges, looking over which on either side, you see nothing more striking than large fields of grain or vegetables, in stubble or seed or blossom, as the season may be; distant woods and a few straggling trees, not of the most picturesque forms, the rich cultivated soil producing a weight of leafage which seems to hinder the woody growth, and to give to the forest tree some resemblance to a very fat man.

Yet, commonplace as this road is, dull and flat, destitute of striking form and rarely enriched by brilliant colouring, we can well believe that any thoughtful sweet-minded person, not afflicted with chronic dyspepsia or acute rheumatism, or a twinge of jumping toothache, and walking in a leisurely manner with parochial visiting in his mind, or a friendly call and a cup of invigorating tea in perspective, may find much in the objects that surround him to soothe his spirit, and minister through more than one sense to his love of the beautiful.

First of all, the sky-larks; they are always on the wing in this flat country—not a sky-lark here and there as we meet with in other places, but sky-larks without number. They seem to be going up from the fields by hundreds, raining upon us from far and near, their exhaustless flood of melody, music and sunshine flowing upon us together, until song seems lost in light, and light in song, as it is in truth in the dazzling ether, where our bewildered sight in vain tries to distinguish the small winged shape that is > Pouring its full heart,

> In profuse strains of unpremeditated art.

Then—let us suppose that it is a genial day in June—our pedestrian, looking over the hedges to see what he can see, finds in the far distance, between the leafage of those fat trees, a line of very spiritual blue; trees and hedges all ethereal; the line broken here and there by a repetition of trees and hedges slightly enlarged, and with a faint tint of grey green marking their closer proximity. And again, breaking this second line, and in part extinguishing it altogether, he sees the woods of Ickwell, and here and there a building wrapped in mystery; it may be a church tower or the tower of a mansion that looms through the blue haze; it may be a line of tiled cottages or barns that shows rose-red through the blue; or those yellowy-brown objects may be thatched roofs or hay-stacks; and while he looks on, still unable to distinguish, he is struck by a strange line of yellow light, or what he had at first mistaken for light; but its fixity and exceeding brightness puzzle him. Then he discovers that it is a turnip field in full blossom. It gleams here and there through the openings in the wood, and on the verge the olive green outlines lie against the yellow in their rich rounded beauty; and throwing these colours into striking relief, he observes a patch of rich purply-blue—later on he would have seen this patch as a positive purple; now the whity tinge of the upper part of the leaves makes it incline more to blue; it is a large field of red cabbages. Nearer are fields of wavy grain showing the varieties of tint that we see in a hay-field fully ripe and swayed by a strong wind; and nearer still are fields of onions in full bud, the white balls on the top and the blue green of the leaves giving a soft tint which harmonises with the distance, and which seen under the passing shadow of a cloud makes a sober effective light.

We cannot say that the long strips of rye, sown to shelter the young cucumbers and vegetable marrows, add much to the scenery, but one observes with constant admiration the beautiful parallel lines in which this crop is planted, as exact as if it had been done with line and compass; a master hand having set the first furrow, for the less skilled workmen to follow. Ah! we are apt to think, falling into a moralizing vein, what a world of consequences may follow upon a first furrow! Make them straight, fathers and mothers; there are feet following in your train. Make them straight, wives and daughters, elder brothers and sisters; there are little ones close upon your track. What does the Book of books say, the Wisdom that has a lesson ready for every occasion: "Make straight paths for your feet, lest that which is lame be turned out of the way, but let it rather be healed!" And again: "He has left us an example that we should follow His steps."

And now, having seen all that there is to see, our walker begins to find the road hot and dusty; but on this road to Hatch, as on many of the Bedfordshire roads, there are delicious borders of grass, sloping down to the shadow of the hedges, and kept close shaven by horses, which for a small payment are allowed to graze by the roadsides. There is Walter Scott, most likely, lying on the soft sward, with a rope in his hand, and his father's pony browsing a few feet off; and amongst that group of children on the other side we may possibly find a Minna and a Brenda; the poor here, as elsewhere in modern times, having a taste for names out of books, and small scruple in disturbing classic associations.

These children are amongst the objects well worth looking at on this dull road. Caldecote is as full of children as a hive of bees, and so many of them are pretty, graceful and endearing, that one can hardly meet with a small group, even in dirt and rags, without looking fondly at them, and comparing them to the bedraggled wild flowers that show their glad beauty in the solitary places. Our friend is looking at some of this wild beauty now, as he blesses the shelter of the tall hedge, and is ready to cry out with notes of admiration at the marvellous wreaths and clusters of wild roses that throw their tangled masses over the hawthorn bushes and send their long blossom-laden trailers to meet the trailers of the bramble below, where the wild briony and convolvulus clasp them both in such an ecstacy of love as death only can dissolve.

And now, having come to the end, or very nearly, of this straight road where we can see before us the little cluster of cottages known as Brook-End, I find myself obliged to part company with my imaginary companion and to turn on my own account into a lane on the left, for a reason which I will presently explain. But just here something has impressed me very much. On one side of the road, just where the lane branches off, you see in the mid-distance the little town of Sandy. I had seen it often from this point, and taken little notice of it. To-day, when the sun is midway between the zenith and horizon, a gleam has fallen upon the roofs, tiled and slated and thatched; upon the houses, red, and white, and yellow; upon the trees of every shade and character that belong to this wooded region, bringing out the colours with such a transparent glow, such a glint of brilliant beauty, that I quite start with astonishment. Looking upon the other side of the road I saw the same effect produced upon a landscape of quite another character; a few simple cottages with their green surroundings, some distant roofs, and again, the woods of Ickwell. The transformation was complete, and that lesson once more repeated which we learn so often both in Nature and religion of the wondrous manner in which light can glorify the lowliest and meanest objects.

The lane already alluded to is a very rough irregular by-way to some cottages that lie scattered beside it, and about midway there is a little wooden bridge with a hand-rail over a stream, which presents a pretty subject for a sketch. A little farther on there is a still prettier view of this stream, where the Brook-End cottages may be seen through the trees as they bend gracefully over the water, and throw their shadows with picturesque effect below. I had borrowed a chair at a friend's house and was sketching this little picture, when some six or seven small children coming out of a gateway close by were attracted by the novel sight of a lady sitting on a drawing-room chair in the middle of the lane, and drew near with very wondering faces. Dearly as I love children, I confess they worry me sadly when I am sketching, and I have been so often troubled by intrusion of this kind in other places that I am afraid I ordered these little ones off in rather a peremptory manner. My orders at other times have generally proved unavailing, and I considered it necessary to be severe. These little ones, however, were easily cowed and ran away immediately, looking frightened and shy. My heart smote me, and I ran after them, showing them what I had done, and explaining my reasons for not wanting them close to me while I was at work. While I was still speaking to them, the little white gate, from which they had issued a few moments before, was opened by an old woman—a very disfigured and remarkable-looking object she was. Her under-lip was drawn completely to one side, causing a sad distortion of her whole face. The muscles of her neck were also contracted, drawing her head on one side; and her poor hands and arms! I did not see them at first, for her face had startled and riveted my attention; but they were injured and deformed beyond anything I had ever seen.

She spoke to me in a pleasant courteous tone, begging that I would come into her house and rest awhile; and, with the easy refined grace and good-breeding which I have generally found in the poor women of this district, she led me into her cottage, offered me a chair, and then sat down herself. I liked this. A poor woman would not sit down in a lady's house unless requested to do so, and then with some reluctance; but the poor woman's house is as much her castle as the rich man's, and there is a native dignity which makes her feel that when it is her place to offer hospitality it would be unbecoming to suggest social distinctions. She had already two visitors, one of them a near neighbour of mine—our church-woman; a face I always like to see, in the church or outside it—a bright, cheerful, happy face, showing energy and contentment in old age and poverty.

"Oh, Mrs. T——, I am glad to see you. I did not expect to find you here," I said.

"I have come to see my old friend and relation, ma'am. I often run over to see her."

"Ah! and she lives alone, I suppose, and is the more glad to see a friend."

"No, ma'am, I am not alone," our hostess replied. "I live here with my husband. My own children are all married and gone, but I have still the young ones about me most of the day. I keep a little dame school, and those were all my little scholars that you met in the lane."

"Ah, indeed!" I said, feeling very much mystified and surprised; first, that such a terribly deformed creature should have a husband and children, and secondly, that any one apparently so physically incapable of exertion should be the teacher of a school. "You must feel it hard work," I said at last; "you do not appear to be very strong."

"Yes, ma'am, I enjoy good health, though I am such a poor cripple."

"Rheumatism, I suppose?"

"No, ma'am, no; I was nigh burned to death when I was nine years old."

"Indeed! So terribly burned and so young! It is wonderful that you survived."

"Yes, ma'am, it was wonderful. They gave me up for dead, but I was brought through. And then Mrs. H——, the Squire's lady, she sent me to school, and I learned to sew and to make lace."

"To sew and to make lace!" I exclaimed, glancing again involuntarily at those dreadful hands. It would be difficult to describe them. The muscles of the arms had been so injured that the limbs could never grow to their proper length, but were stunted and shrunken to half their natural size. From the left hand the fingers had all dropped off at the second joint, leaving a bundle of stunted stumps, thickened at the ends, and apparently utterly useless for any practical purpose whatever. On the right hand she could still number the five fingers, but in such a fearfully mutilated and distorted condition that no one could imagine they could be of any use to her. The thumb is turned completely over the back of the hand, and the lower joint of the thumb and the wrist-joint protrude in such a way that they can be made almost to meet across the palm. Between the lower joint of the thumb and the middle finger she learned to hold the needle. She showed me how she did it, and executed a very neat bit of hemming while I looked on.

"The Squire's lady," she resumed, "said she would send me to school, just for to learn me to read. 'You can't do much more, you know, Annie,' she said, 'than learn to read and add up a few figures; but they will come useful to you and help to pass away the time.' So she sent me to school; but I did want to learn to sew, and so I thought I would try, and I did try, and I tried, and I tried very hard, and it was hard work sure enough, but I did it, and I won the sewing prize that year; a half-crown it was, and Mrs. H—— gave it to me herself; and then after that I learned the lace making, and I made beautiful lace, that I did. I have sold a lot, but I have none left. I often wish I had a piece left, just to show what I could do; for now I am too old, and my sight has been bad for over seven years; one eye is quite lost, but you know, ma'am, it is time, for I am in my seventy-nine. I was never good at the straw-plaiting. I could plait, for sure; but so slow, so slow, it was no good to try to make anything of that."

I did not make a very long visit on this occasion, as I felt that I was interrupting a friendly reunion, but I promised to call again.

The story of this poor woman had impressed me so deeply, and more and more as I dwelt upon it, that I resolved to ask her to give me, in her own words, a history of her life and her struggles with her infirmities, and to allow me to take it down in writing as she told it. This she most willingly consented to do, making the naïve remark: "I quite agree with you, ma'am. It is right that people should know what a creature can do as crippled as I am, if only she has a mind to. See all the people with their limbs all whole and sound that can't do a thing, just because they wont try. We get help when we do our best; and even if we never could succeed, it is something to have to think on that we did what we could."

"It would not hurt you, if a drawing or a photograph were taken of your hands?" I said.

"Oh, no, ma'am; dear, no! Why should I be 'shamed. My children all have my likeness, with my hands just in front, to show what they are like."

I needed no photograph: those hands will be engraved on my memory as long as I live. I looked at my own uninjured limbs, and meditated on the marvellous mechanism that has called forth from one of the ablest philosophers of his age one of the largest and most brilliant scientific treatises in the England language. I thought—

> Of flesh and bone and nerve beneath,
> Lines and hue of the outer sheath,
> * * * * *
> Flesh and bone and nerve that make
> The poorest, coarsest human hand
> An object worthy to be scanned
> A whole life long for their sole sake.

Yes, a perfect human hand, be it the rough coarse worn hand of a peasant, or the delicate jewelled hand of a princess, is an instrument so wonderful for its beauty and completeness, so exquisitely adapted to the purposes for which it is required, so delicately responsive to the motive power of the brain that guides and directs its action, that it seems impossible, as we contemplate it, to doubt for a moment the Divine source that has originated and completed its mechanism. What may not a hand accomplish? What has it not accomplished? But here were hands deprived of all their natural force, the nerves destroyed, the sinews shrunken, the bones charred and wasted away, the flesh hardened almost to bone, the nails destroyed, the joints stiffened and dislocated; and yet these hands had practised the most delicate uses of the needle, and guided through their intricate mazes of workmanship the tangled bundles of bobbins!

So much seemed to my mind to be wrapped up in a life-history that had arrived at such noble ends by such apparently inadequate means, and that had gained all the honours and blessings and fulfilled all the offices of womanhood under such singular deprivations, that I confess to a feeling of disappointment as I transcribed into my note-book this poor woman's dry and utterly colourless narrative, from which I have abstracted the following particulars.

She was a gardener's daughter, and lived in Ickwell. Her father and mother had gone to Sandy, and she and her little sisters were left in charge of their grandfather, who went to bed. She set her pinafore on fire with a match, and her screams brought the old man down. He threw water on her and extinguished the flames. She then went to a neighbour who kept oil for burns; the burns did not pain her so badly as any one might suppose until she went near the fire. She was taken home, and the Squire's family did all they could for her, and then sent her to the Bedford Infirmary. "When there," she said, "all the flesh of my arms hung down like rags, and bits of the flesh dropped off; but I did not feel so much pain until the skin dropped off, and my fingers they dropped off with the plasters."

When she came home cured she was sent to school, and not liking to sit idle during the sewing hour, she begged of her mistress to teach her to sew, but she said it would be impossible. So she then said if she would only set the work for her she would try herself. And she did try, and tried so hard that she gained the prize for needlework. Afterwards she learned marking, embroidery, and lace-making; and had regular employment at "embroidering dresses for the ladies and helping about the bed-furniture." She "kept company" with her husband for three years before she married, "and a very good husband he have been to me, and a very happy life we have spent together."

Yes, it was a dry and colourless story. The poor have a very limited vocabulary, and they do not know how to translate their feelings into words, and therefore we are too apt to think that they do not feel as we do, and that the golden threads of fancy are never woven into the web of their lives. "I tried hard, and I did it," was the only record of those terrible struggles, physical and mental, through which alone her modest ambition could ever have attained its goal. "We kept company for three years, and then we married," comprised the whole history of her life's romance; and yet what gleams, rich with a poet's colouring, may not have shot athwart the memory of this woman of nearly fourscore years as she read again the pages of the past! What fair images of her bowery home on Ickwell Green! Of the dear old cottages, with their tall chimneys and thatched roofs and lichen-tinted bricks and tiles, each familiar as a friend's face! Of the tall trees making patterns more beautiful than her lace work over the greensward and the shady old lane! Of the true love that had sought and found the priceless worth that lay and given to her afflicted life the crowning joys of womanhood, a loving husband, a happy home, and the "olive branches round about her table."

> ". . . beneath

For myself, after all, what recked I of the dead flat, while a myriad sky-larks were raining their glad melody upon me, rose wreaths arching overhead, and every common thing made glorious in the light of heaven.

Once or twice, I must confess, with a narrow prejudice, I suppose, in favour of a more demonstrative manner, I had been tempted to doubt whether Anne Gentle's religious growth had kept pace with her self-reliance and her heroic efforts to master the difficulties of her position. She said so little about the Divine help, and it was so coldly said! Calling one afternoon I found her reading to a poor sick neighbour, who had "just crawled over," she said, "to have a cup of tea with me, and have me read a chapter of the Bible to her!"

I asked her what parts of the Bible she liked best to read, and she answered at once, "Isaiah and the Psalms in the Old Testament, and St. John and the Revelation in the New."

On another occasion I found her similarly engaged with another neighbour, her sister-in-law, whose husband had that day been removed to the Bedford Infirmary with small hope of ever returning to his home. In fact he never did return. The old women were both in floods of tears, but Anne with a broken voice was reading from a large print Psalter. "You see, ma'am," she said, "she come to me natural enough in her trouble, but I don't seem to know what to say to do her any good, but I always finds it comforting to read a Psalm."

The mechanism of a human hand is a difficult study; more difficult still is it to follow through its various ramifications the complicated mechanism of the entire human frame, and to ascertain how each part ministers to the health of the whole, and all combined to that subtle principle which we call life. But more difficult far would it be to dissect the mechanism of a human soul, and to trace, through all their complicated workings, the feelings, and motives, and influences that have all had their share in sustaining and upholding its life. We know that it is a hidden life "with Christ in God," but when we see the fruits we believe in the life, and the poor woman who had learned to find her best comfort in the Book of books, and who tried to impart that comfort to others, was surely no dead branch on the living Vine.

And thus these aged pilgrim feet
Are treading day by day
With patient step and quiet hope
Upon their lowly way.

No eye to mark the daily toil
That loads her fourscore years,
Her crippled hands, and failing sight,
With weariness and tears.

No tongue to tell how oft her tones
Have soothed the waves of strife,
And poured upon the wounded breast
The blessed oil of life.

No study she, for painter's art,
No theme for poet's song,
The tender eye might even shun
To see her pass along:

But hers was an heroic strife,
A victory nobly won;
And hers the prize that crowns a life
Of duty bravely done.

No heathen mission called her forth,
No martyr's scourge of flame,
But yet her mission work she has,
Her cross for "that dear Name."

No jewelled fingers fair and free,
That loving eyes behold,
Shall surely e'er so joyful be
To strike a harp of gold—

And swell that everlasting sound,
The Alleluia song;
As those poor shrunken withered hands
That ached and toiled so long.

Oh, blessed joy that Christians have!
To see a vault of stars,
And all the glorious blue of heaven
Athwart their prison bars!

Bear on, toil on, O patient souls,
That watch for morning's light!
Where shall these hours of darkness be
When "there is no more night"?

NATURAL HISTORY NOTES

ON THE REVISED VERSION OF THE BIBLE.

NO. II.—THE CONEY.

THE next name of an animal that we take is the coney. None of the young folks now living would know what sort of an animal is meant by it until they were told. Very likely they have imagined strange things about it. One young lady told the writer that she always took it to mean a horse. But it was not always so. When the Bible was published in the form that we call the Authorised Version, two centuries and three-quarters ago, everybody knew what was meant by it; and it is scarcely a hundred years ago that people left off using the word. Meanwhile another word was being used by a few people, and had been used for two hundred years, which was in our day quite to take the place of coney—I mean the word rabbit. Perhaps it will seem strange that the Revisers should leave in the text of the New Version a word that has quite gone out of use; but we must remember that "rabbit" would not be any better for their purpose, as it is pretty certain that no such animal is intended. The Revisers have put in the margin "rock-badger." This does not give us much more light. We have heard of badgers, and know that they are to be found in England now; but what is a rock-badger?

Let us turn to the verses where the animal is mentioned. This is what the Bible tells us about the coney. It is a feeble animal—that will suit the rabbit very well; but then it makes its house in the rocks, it keeps company with the wild goats. It is not exactly on the rocky hill-tops that we look for rabbits. They like something soft and sandy; a level country with sandy hillocks is the thing for them. Plenty of green food too must be within their reach. Then we find the coney placed among the animals that the Israelites were forbidden to eat; it chews the cud, but does not part the hoof. That will not suit the rabbit, for it does not chew the cud.

Without venturing to be too positive about it, travellers are pretty well agreed as to the animal meant in the Bible by the coney. They have given us pictures of them, and you may perhaps see one stuffed in the British Museum, or rather the Zoological Museum at South Kensington. This is the name you must look for—Hyrax Syriacus, or the Syrian hyrax. You will see that it is about the size of a cat; its fore-legs are as long as its hind-legs, and not ever so much larger and stronger, as the rabbit's. It does not belong to the same race as the rabbit, but to the thick-skinned animals, so that, though a little animal, it is in its structure something like the great rhinoceros. Now the hyrax really lives in the rocks. In the north of Palestine are some tolerably high mountains, the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. Between the two ranges runs a river, called the Litany. In some parts this runs through very narrow places, where there are steep cliffs on either side. It is in such places that the hyrax is seen. It lives in holes in the rocks, and, though not very elegant to look at, is a pretty object, with its brown-grey back and white belly. The animal most like it also lives in mountains, the marmot of the Alps.

There are not many texts to find out about the coney; only these:—

1. Where it is called feeble.
2. Where the rocks are said to be its refuge.
3. Two texts where it is called unclean.

LIFE ON THE PRAIRIE.

VERY extensive prairie fires last autumn too quickly devastated the half-settled lands of Assiniboia, the new Province of Canada to the west of the better known Manitoba. Many square miles of country were in flames. Where no "fire-brake" had been made, the flames extended to the ricks and stables, and even to the houses of many of the settlers, some of whom were rendered houseless just as the winter frosts were setting in. Some time since, a settler had carefully ploughed his "brake" all round his homestead, and thought all was safe. He was going away for a few days, and, to save his wife labour in feeding the cattle, he carefully carried from the hay-rick enough hay to serve them during his absence. A prairie fire came in sight. The poor woman, who thought she was in safety, was astounded to find that the fire had spread to their stable and house, and that she must escape for her life. The fact was that the husband's kindness had wrought their ruin. In carrying the hay across the ploughed fire-brake he had dropped enough hay to form a train from the fire to the dry grass growing beyond the brake, and so the fire had traversed this bridge of the farmer's own making, and thus wrought his ruin. "Behold, how great a matter a little fire kindleth." What disastrous events spring often from very small causes. May we not treat this incident as a parable? How many a soul has been ruined by some little circumstance of evil association.

Another glimpse of prairie life is given in the letter of a lady who is settled at Moose Mountain, in the same region: "I must tell you a story of the little girl of the man who has been plastering our church at Moose Mountains. He is a Londoner, one of the colony that Lady Burdett-Coutts sent out, and who are settled a few miles from here. She is about ten or eleven years old, and was left in charge of some small brothers and sisters while her mother was away helping a neighbour, and her father was working here. Seeing the fire coming over the place she proceeded busily to transfer as much as she could of the household belonging to a potato patch,—fire of course stopping at ploughed ground; then she led the children there. Leaving them, she took buckets of water and wetted as much ground as she could all round the house, retiring eventually to the potato patch to wait for the fire. No harm came to them. On the return of her father next day—he was on his way to the dentist at Moosomin—she told him she thought she was entitled to a treat. 'So you shall, my dear,' said he, 'you shall go with me to Moosomin (the nearest town and station) and have your teeth out!' She was delighted and went gleefully. The dentist was much interested in making the acquaintance of the little girl, who for a treat went to have her teeth out." Such coolness and courage deserve commemoration and imitation.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. IV.

Who pleads his cause six times with earnest tones?
Who praying dies amid a shower of stones?
What brook flows near the spot where Jesus prayed?
What foe was slain while Moses' hands were stayed?
Who prayed for safety while a wall was built?
What king implored "Deliver me from guilt"?
What rose with prayers of saints before the throne?
Who came to life when Peter prayed alone?
Who, blinded, asked for vengeance on his foes?
Who o'er a letter prayed and rent his clothes?
Who sought for help when meeting Zerah's host?
What after prayer were blown from Egypt's coast?
Who went to pray down by the river-side?
And where did Jacob seek a heavenly guide?
Who prayed one day for fire and water too?
Who to a praying prophet swiftly flew?
What child of prayers was on an altar laid?
And what appeared to Peter while he prayed?
Who weeping mourned and prayed till Israel wept?
What town with prayer a public fasting kept?
The birds God feedeth when they cry for meat?
The trees that shaded Jesus' loved retreat?
A sorrowing father did some faith possess,
Yet still with tears what sin did he confess?

A promise sweet initial letters show,
Which Jesus gave us while He dwelt below.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. I.

1. She was a queen in a country not her own.
2. Her father was king of a celebrated nation.
3. She was the chief support of a heathen worship.
4. She stirred up her husband to many sins.
5. She persecuted the greatest of the prophets.
6. She died a shocking death.
7. That death was plainly foretold.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. VI.

One word from each line will give a request of our Lord.

1. If ye keep My commandments, ye shall abide in My love.—John xv. 10.
2. These things I command you, that ye love one another.—John xv. 17.
3. Continue ye in My love.—John xv. 9.
4. As My Father hath loved Me, so have I loved you.—John xv. 9.
5. Nor will he keep His anger for ever.—Psa. ciii. 9.
6. If ye shall ask anything in My name, I will do it.—John xiv. 14.
7. If ye love Me, keep My commandments.—John xiv. 15.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

God's Child.

THE EVENING HYMN.

AH, child, we live together in our old house mid the trees,
But each sees a world quite different from the world the other sees:
For you prattle to the portraits that are hanging on the wall,
And you make a pretty story up, about them, one and all,
And your fancy shows you fairy rings upon the daisied grass,
And up and down the corridors you dream that angels pass:
And when upon your little bed you rest at eventide,
You think "mamma in Heaven" comes and watches at your side.

But, child, I know our household tale, and all its woe and sin;
I've gazed into the living eyes of those, our pictured kin,
Whose wasteful crimes have left us poor, the bearers of a name
Whose ancient glory only gleams 'neath smirch of newer shame!
And bitter words ring in my ears and wrongs earth cannot right,
And scenes of strife come back to me in visions of the night,
With heart-sick longing for my boy—your father—lost in life;
(The angel that you dream about was his deserted wife!)

And when I hear of ship-wrecked men, grown savage in despair;
Of wanderers lost on mountain tops, I wonder "was he there?"
Or when I read of nameless ones, found dead in alleys dim:
Or lawless souls whom none can tame, I always think of him!
And yet—and yet—I see his eyes, as they were raised to me
When he would lay his boyish head against my manly knee,
I'm ever listening for his step—his hand upon the gate,
Oh, he will surely come some day—but he may come too late!

My little maid, you dream of life as one long summer day,
Where new friends come to bless our hearts, while all the old friends stay:
You know of poverty and grief, but do not understand
That they are aught but something strange which makes life good and grand:
While I—I know their stress and strain—the pinching and the wear
Of constant worry, lest to-day consumes to-morrow's share:
With not a hope, except for death, that I at rest may be,
—Only this little maid of mine has nobody but me!

Yet when behind the low, blue hills the rosy sunset dies,
Its glory on your auburn hair and in your sweet gray eyes,
I take my poor old fiddle out, while like a bird you sing
About "the Blessings of the Light," and "God's Almighty Wing."
Then, somehow, sweeter thoughts steal in, and gazing on your face,
I recollect Who set a child in midst of all the place
And bade His servants understand who would His Kingdom win
Must be as little children are, and as a child go in.

And I begin to think 'tis I am lost in nightmare dreams,
And that God's world is really fair as in your sight it seems;
Old wrongs, may be, are working out some new and higher right,
And surely old friends are not lost because they're out of sight;
And my poor boy is in God's hand, Whose love is more than mine:
Who keeps His best things to the last—like Cana's mystic wine:
So in the light of Love Divine, all life grows reconciled,
As from my little maid I learn how I may be God's child!

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XI.—AN ADVENTURE.

WULFRIC MEYNAL had had a hard day's work amongst his patients. The heat had been oppressive all day, and he was feeling unusually tired as he walked homewards along the edge of the cliff.

It was about seven o'clock in the evening, and the heat was slowly abating. He had been spending the last two hours in visiting on foot some of his poorer patients who lived at a distance from St. Hilda, and now that this work of charity was accomplished, he was leisurely retracing his steps, his mind reverting from time to time, although against his will, to the difficulties and anxieties of his position, and revolving schemes by which he hoped in time to lessen these, and settle down to a greater enjoyment of life than seemed possible at present.

He was presently aware that the lonely cliff path was less lonely this evening than usual. He caught sight of two figures slowly advancing towards him. The graceful girl in white he recognised at once as Miss Dumaresq, and he presumed that her companion was the brother of whose arrival he had heard, although he had not yet seen him.

But the next moment his thoughts were entirely diverted from the pair in front by the sudden presence of imminent and terrible peril.

He had been vaguely aware for the past few moments of the dull thud of galloping horse-hoofs over the green sweep of the downs that terminated in the precipitous cliffs at whose edge he was walking, and now all in a moment there hove in sight over the ridge of the sloping shoulder a dog-cart driven tandem by a young man unknown to him, whose horses had taken fright, and had bolted, and now, utterly unmanageable and beyond themselves, were heading straight for the cliff, from whose edge they were but five hundred yards distant.

Wulfric took in the whole situation and its awful peril at a single glance. He was not wont to lose his presence of mind, and danger generally served rather to quicken than to deaden his faculties. In a single instant he had resolved upon his course of action. The horses were charging straight down upon him, but the ground which sloped down from the ridge of the moor rose again somewhat steeply towards the edge of the cliff, thus giving him a slight advantage. Waving his arms wildly, and uttering a series of unearthly sounds, he rushed furiously towards the leading horse.

This manœuvre produced the desired effect. The creature terrified by the sight and sound, started, swerved, half paused, and in that moment's pause Wulfric sprang to its head and seized the bit in a grasp of iron.

What happened then he could not afterwards remember; there was a rearing and trampling, a hideous noise and confusion, and all the breath seemed beaten out of his body, and stars danced before his eyes; but he did not relinquish his grip upon the horse's head, and when at length the tumult subsided, he found himself standing beside the panting leader, whose traces were broken, leaving him free of the cart, whilst the wheeler lay upon the ground, unhurt but exhausted, having slipped upon the smooth dry turf in the effort to pull up suddenly.

Reinée Dumaresq, as white as death, stood a few yards away trembling in every limb, whilst two young men unknown to Wulfric were endeavouring to release the prostrate horse.

At that moment the groom came running up. He had prudently dropped off the back seat when the horses headed for the cliff, and now arrived at the scene of action in company with one or two men, who had seen something of the accident from the spot where they were working.

The arrival of these assistants seemed to break the spell of silence that the sense of escape from imminent peril appeared to have laid upon the party.

Clive gave some directions to the man and then turned to Wulfric.

"Are you much hurt?" he asked anxiously. "I am sure the shaft struck you. I was awfully afraid you would be knocked down and trampled on. The man will take the horse now. Will you let me send for the carriage to take you home? I am awfully afraid you are hurt!"

But Wulfric, who was quickly recovering from the stunning effect of the shock he had experienced, only smiled in his quiet way.

"I assure you I am not conscious of any injury. I dare say I have got a few bruises and may be stiff for a day or so; but nothing worse. I hope you have come off equally well?"

"I? Oh, yes—you saved me from the necessity of having to hazard a leap. Two minutes later I must have tried it; but I wanted to save the horses too, if I could. They owe their lives, however, to you, and I am not sure but that I do the same."

Clive held out his hand, which Wulfric took in his for a moment. That silent pressure expressed the young man's sense of gratitude better than his words.

"I think," said Wulfric, with a glance towards Reinée, "that you had better send for the carriage for Miss Dumaresq. It has been too much for her."

But the girl was recovering from her first agitation and terror; and Wulfric's words brought a flush of colour into her white face.

"I would rather walk, thank you," she answered, with a tremulous little smile. "I hardly care to trust myself behind a horse today."

"You must come with us too," said Clive, as he drew his sister's arm within his and led the way onwards. "You must not attempt to walk all the way to your own house until you have had something. You cannot help feeling a bit shaky after that."

Wulfric would have preferred going straight home, but he was aware that to insist would have appeared ungracious, and, moreover, he was still feeling dazed and shaken and hardly in trim for a two and a half miles' walk. He was fasting and exhausted, and though vexed with himself for being taken at a disadvantage, was conscious that his best course was to accept the proffered invitation.

So they walked on together four abreast, the young man whom Clive introduced as "my friend, Trevelyan," on Reinée's other side, Wulfric next to the young fellow whose life he had probably saved—the only son of Mr. and Mrs. Dumaresq.

"You have cheated yourself of a patient, Dr. Meynal," said Clive, recovering his natural gaiety as they walked onwards. "I should at least have broken an arm or a leg had I taken the inevitable leap."

"Don't, Clive!" murmured Reinée.

"I am glad to think it is so," answered Wulfric. "I am much too busy to wish to add to my labours. I prefer you sound to broken."

"What a good thing! I was afraid you would be regretting the nice complicated case I might have presented—all chawed up. Now, Reinée, don't shiver so. I am all right, thanks to Dr. Meynal; and all's well that ends well."

"I know," she answered, with a little quiver in her voice; "but I cannot help seeing it all again and again. Ah, Clive, why did you put Firefly in as leader? I told you he was not safe. He is so nervous—the least thing frightens him."

"Yes, and I ought to have taken your word for it, only I would have my own way. He took fright at an engine thrashing on Holson's farm, and there was no holding him after that. Well, Reinée, make your mind easy; I won't drive him tandem any more."

They were not long in reaching the Hall, and Wulfric went upstairs with Clive to remove the traces of the struggle from his dress and person. A great bruise on his temple was beginning to come out, and his head threatened to ache severely before many hours had passed. Nothing, however, would serve Clive but that he should remain to dinner; and he spoke a few words of simple, heartfelt gratitude to the man who had "saved his life," as he termed it, that pleased Wulfric more than a more elaborate or ambitious speech would have done. He took to Clive from the first moment of their acquaintance, and for the first time since he had come to St. Hilda, felt that if circumstances allowed, he could make a friend of this young man.

Mr. and Mrs. Dumaresq received him with a good deal of empressement, and expressed themselves warmly when they thanked him for the service rendered to their son. Wulfric could well have spared these eulogiums on his courage and presence of mind, but he accepted them with his cool, impassive gravity, and turned the conversation as quickly as possible into other channels.

He felt the better for his dinner, and took his part in the conversation with the ease of a well-informed, cultivated man untroubled by self-consciousness or false shame. He was not in the least awed by the stateliness of Mrs. Dumaresq or the slightly supercilious air adopted by Trevelyan towards the country practitioner. On the contrary, he did not hesitate to enter into an argument with that gentleman on the subject of some new scientific discovery, and he undoubtedly showed himself the more brilliant talker, the better informed man, and, to all appearances, got very much the best of the argument; although after he was safely gone Trevelyan asserted that he had "beaten that impudent young apothecary into a cocked hat," whatever that might signify.

The antipathy between Wulfric Meynal and Arthur Trevelyan was undoubtedly mutual. Reinée grew hot as she heard the covert sneers levelled at the doctor by a man she considered so much his inferior. In order to effect a diversion, she asked Wulfric how it chanced that he came to be walking that way at such a time.

"I suppose you think I ought to have been going about my business, instead of enjoying a walk on my own account, Miss Dumaresq?" he queried, one of his rare smiles lighting his eyes. "But I had not been quite as idle as you might suppose. I had been visiting some patients of mine along the coast."

"I did not know there were any houses out that way," remarked Trevelyan carelessly.

"Well, I do not know that you would call them houses; but there are plenty of cottages and cabins scattered about."

"Oh—pauper dwelling-places you mean?"

"Some of them; others inhabited by working people of the poorer kind."

"You are the parish doctor, then?" remarked Trevelyan, with a manner evidently intended to be insolent.

"No," answered Wulfric, very quietly, "I have not that honour; but I often think if I had time that I should like to undertake the office."

Trevelyan stared. He did not in the least understand the bearing of such a remark, but he fancied it was meant as a set down, and was angry in consequence.

"You have a natural taste for paupers then?"

"I have a natural taste for hard work, and for combating disease in its worst forms. The ailments of the poor are much more interesting to me, as a rule, than those of the rich, and deserve infinitely more compassion. The patience and gratitude of the poor often strike me as very wonderful. I do not hesitate to confess that they are my favourite patients."

Reinée said nothing, but she looked at him with a sense of undefined sympathy and comprehension, and for a moment their eyes met. Wulfric smiled very slightly, but neither of them spoke, and shortly afterwards the ladies withdrew.

"That is a very peculiar young man," remarked Mrs. Dumaresq to her daughter, when they were alone together. "As a doctor, I think very highly of him, and we shall always be grateful to him for having prevented a serious accident to-day; but I cannot say I altogether like his manners or opinions. I do not think he would make a suitable companion for Clive."

Reinée made no direct reply. She could not agree with her mother's verdict. She felt she would much rather see her brother under the influence of Wulfric Meynal than of Arthur Trevelyan; but it was not for her to say so to her mother, and so without any definite answer she slipped away into the garden.

Presently she heard voices in the drive, and caught the drift of what Clive was saying.

"I'm awfully sorry you have to go so early, Meynal; but if your head is aching, it's no kindness to keep you. I hope you won't be any the worse for it all. I shall not be quite comfortable for a day or two. Sometimes one gets a blow or a twist that turns out an awkward thing after a bit. I shall look round early to-morrow to ask how you are."

The answer was plainly distinguishable.

"Unless I am very much worse than I at all think myself to be, I shall be busy in my surgery long before you are about. Come in some evening if you will, and smoke a pipe with me in my study. From eight to nine I am generally my own master, but at no other time."

"I'll be sure to come, thanks. Well, good night. You're sure you feel equal to the walk? I'll have the cart ready in five minutes, if you prefer it."

"Thanks, I'd rather walk. Good night; make my adieus to the ladies for me. Good-bye."

But just as he turned after this last farewell, he was confronted by Reinée herself, who had approached under cover of the laurel hedge, and had slipped through a gap and now stood before him.

"Dr. Meynal," she said, holding out her hand and speaking with simple earnest feeling, "I cannot let you go without thanking you for saving my brother. I had not the chance to do it before. You do not know how very, very grateful I am; but please believe that I shall never forget it—never—never. You risked your life for him; I saw it all."

Wulfric took the girl's hand, and answered with quiet gentleness, "I am only too pleased, Miss Dumaresq, to have been of any service to you or yours. For the rest, you think too much of the matter. The danger to myself was much less than you suppose."

And lifting his hat, he bid brother and sister good night, and walked away down the dim avenue.

"Clive," said Reinée, turning and putting her arms suddenly about his neck—"oh, Clive, when I think of it all, I do not know how to be thankful enough!"

He held her in his arms, and answered seriously enough: "Yes; it was a narrow escape, little sister. I have very much cause for thankfulness."

"He did risk his life, Clive, though he won't admit it. I saw it all; we were quite close. I thought he would be killed when Firefly reared and Gipsy was rushing right upon him. Oh, it was awful! And the edge of the cliff not a hundred yards away!"

"Yes, I thought it was all over for us both for a moment; but his strength saved us."

There was a pause, Reinée was shivering again despite the heat of the night. Presently she whispered a low-toned question: "Clive, do you know that Arthur is a coward?"

"What do you mean, Reinée?"

"I mean what I say. He is a coward, and thinks only of his own safety. He was almost as near as Dr. Meynal when he saw the cart come tearing along, but he did nothing. When Dr. Meynal had seized Firefly, and everything seemed to depend on Gipsy's being stopped, he would not move, though we were quite close. 'Go and help,' I cried out to him; but he only said, 'I have no wish to be killed, thank you, like that other fellow,' and there he stood doing nothing. I tried to rush at Gipsy myself, but he held me back. Clive, I don't know how a man can stand by and see anybody in such danger and not try to help, and that man his friend too! I think in moments like those one's true nature comes out better than at any other time. I don't know if Arthur knows what he said, or that he betrayed himself to me; but I know him now for a coward."

Clive made no answer. It had not escaped him that his friend had been content to stand by until all real danger was over; but he had not fancied that his sister would have been as clearly aware of this as he was himself.

"And after that he amused himself by sneering at Dr. Meynal at dinner time—at the man who had saved your life, Clive. I always knew that there was something about Arthur that I did not like; but I never knew till to-day what an unworthy man he is. Clive, I hope you will not let him be your friend any longer, even if he has to be an acquaintance."

"You are excited to-night, little sister," said Clive soothingly; "but, Reinée, you must learn not to judge harsh judgments."

"I will try not," she answered gravely and more gently, "but it is rather difficult not to think hardly of Arthur Trevelyan to-night."

Did Trevelyan himself know how much he had fallen in Reinée's estimation by his conduct that day?

He was a vain, self-satisfied man, whose good opinion of himself was not easily shaken, and Reinée was too courteous and gentle by nature as well as by training to show hostile or contemptuous feeling by any open or outward sign; and yet as that day drew to its close and the next passed swiftly by, and Trevelyan got no speech of her, and failed to increase by any single small degree the intimacy that he was pleased to consider existed between them, an uncomfortable sense arose in his heart, that perhaps all was not well, and he determined to out-manœuvre the queenly maiden who contrived to avoid him without the least appearance of effort.

Of course when his mind was made up, and he was bent upon an interview, she could not hinder it. She had no reason to fear Trevelyan's power over her. She did shrink a little, sometimes, from interviews with her mother, feeling bound by filial obedience to respect her words and wishes to a certain point at least; but with her lover she felt strong—stronger than he knew—stronger than he did himself.

He sought her out in the garden as she was tending her flowers. He began to talk to her in easy, pleasant fashion of one thing and another, bringing the subject round as was his wont to himself and his own adventures and exploits. Trevelyan, as has before been stated, had a clever way of boasting without appearing to do so; but on this occasion Reinée was disposed to be more critical than usual.

She raised herself from her flowers presently and looked him full in the face, her clear eyes expressing a certain fine incredulity not unmixed with scorn.

"If you are so very brave in other places, Arthur, and expose yourself so readily to danger for the sake of strangers, I wonder that you were content to stand by idle and useless when Clive was nearly killed before your eyes two days ago."

The words were quietly and steadily spoken, with the direct simplicity characteristic of Reinée. Trevelyan shrank from the glance of her eyes, and then laughed uneasily.

"I was too late, unfortunately," he said.

"You were not too late," she answered. "You arrived at the critical moment; and you stood by taking care of your own safety, whilst a stranger risked his life to save that of the man you call your friend."

Trevelyan ground his teeth together; but he did not know how to answer the charge. Reinée had actually been upon the spot. It was useless to tell her that facts were otherwise than she had believed. He was intensely annoyed at being taken at a disadvantage and called to account like this; but there was nothing to be done at such a moment but to humble himself and try to make the peace as well as he was able. He must not lose Reinée through a trifling accident like that. How was it she had come to be so clear sighted and penetrating all at once? Why did she not take him on trust and believe in him as she had done years ago?

"Reinée," he said, trying to take her hands, but failing, for she withdrew herself a pace or two from him, "I know that you must despise me for a coward, but can you make no allowance for the freezing sense of horror that comes over a man sometimes in moments of deadly peril? Had it been any one but Clive—my friend—my almost brother, who had been concerned, I could have rushed to his rescue; but it was Clive himself, and the horror of the moment was so great that I was paralysed—I could do nothing. It was weak, it was womanish; but surely you can understand, you can forgive."

Reinée's clear glance expressed a deepening scorn, her delicate lips curled involuntarily.

"I do understand, I am afraid, only too well," she answered quietly. "Do you think I have forgotten how you looked or what you said? There was no trace of agitation about you then. You were cold and calm and master of yourself. I think a man s true nature comes out in moments like those, and I am glad I was there to see for myself. I think I should hardly have believed had I been told afterwards that you had stood idly by whilst Clive had been nearly killed; and the truth should always be known, even though it may be sad or painful."

Trevelyan's face was rather pale—pale with passion and baffled rage.

"And in point of fact you consider the truth to be that I am a coward?"

She looked at him steadily.

"Does it not look like it?"

He bit his lip angrily.

"Or, at least," she added more gently, "I cannot help feeling that a brave, true man, like Clive or—Dr. Meynal, never could have hesitated—as you did."

Trevelyan sneered fiercely.

"Oh, if you are going to set up a beggarly country apothecary as an example to me, I think it is time I was going."

She looked at him quietly for a few seconds, and then turned and walked away. He called her name once or twice; but she did not even turn her head. He felt that, for this time at any rate, he had got the worst of the argument.

"THE FATHER OF LIGHTS."

BY THE REV. J. MONRO GIBSON, D.D.

"Every good gift and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."—James i. 17.

IT is well worth our while to give special attention to the different titles of God which we find in different parts of Scripture. These titles are never given at random; they are always suggestive of some important truth about God, which is sure to shed light upon the subject under consideration. These titles, then, should be studied, not only in themselves, but in connection with the passages in which they occur.

This is the only passage in which the title "Father of lights" occurs. It is a striking and suggestive title; and it ought to be both interesting and profitable to enquire into its significance as it is here used.

First, let us endeavour to get a clear idea of its meaning. As to the word "lights" there can be little doubt that the primary reference is to the lights of the natural world, those lights of which we read in the first chapter of Genesis. But this reference, though primary, is only a passing reference. The general subject of the passage is the life of man, and especially of the Christian, with its lights and its shadows. And inasmuch as the lights and shadows of nature are the universally recognised emblems of the lights and shadows of life, the mind readily passes from the one sense of the word to the other. When God is spoken of as the "Father of lights," then, it is intended that the mind, after glancing for a moment at the lights of the natural world, should pass to the other, and rest upon the thought of God as Father of the lights as distinguished from the shadows of the spiritual world: the Author of the good, as distinguished from the evil, in human life and experience.

The word "Father" must not be diverted from its proper meaning. It is sometimes explained as meaning Creator; but if we take this liberty with the word, we are led astray. Properly speaking, God is the Creator of darkness as well as of light, as is expressly stated in Isaiah xlv. 7: "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things." But while He makes darkness, He cannot be called the Father of it. "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all." In a certain sense it is true that the sun is the cause of shadows. If there were no light, there would be no shade. But while the shade comes by the sun, it is not of it. Darkness is the shadow of some obstruction to the light. And all the shadows of life come in the same way. They are not of God, but the result of something which comes between us and God. It is by the ordination of God that the darkness results from the obstruction, so in a sense God makes darkness; but it is not of God—it is not according to His nature—He is not the Father of it. God is the Creator of all things; but He is the "Father of lights" and of lights only. Such we take to be the meaning and force of this beautiful title.

Let us now look at the application of it which the context suggests. That which is most obvious and prominent is its reference to good and evil influences, as will be seen by reading verses 13 and 14: "Let no man say when he is tempted, I am tempted of God, for God cannot be tempted with evil (or, 'is untried in evil,' margin R.V.), and He Himself tempteth no man; but each man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and enticed." The thought then is: God is the Author of all good, and not of any evil influences. "Do not err" in supposing that when you are tempted to evil, the temptation comes from God. On the contrary, He is the "Father of lights," and only good and perfect gifts come from Him. Nothing of the nature of temptation comes from Him. But do we not pray, "Lead us not into temptation?" Yes; but let us distinguish between those circumstances which form the occasion of the temptation, and the temptation itself. God may lead us into scenes where temptation is presented. But He does not present the temptation. He does not lead us there for the sake of giving the enemy an advantage over us, but for the sake of giving us an advantage over the enemy. He does not suffer us to be tempted above that we are able to bear, but with the temptation makes also a way of escape. Every time, in fact, that in following God's leading we find ourselves in circumstances of temptation, we have the opportunity of gaining a signal victory over the enemy of God and man. Jesus was led of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. But was it the Spirit that tempted Him? By no means. The Spirit fortified Him against the temptation. It was the sword of the Spirit that He used so triumphantly against the great adversary. It was in the power of the Spirit that He gained His glorious victory. As for the temptation, it came not from the Spirit by whom He was led into the wilderness, but from the devil whom he found there. We may be sure that when by God's appointment (not of our own choice) we find ourselves in circumstances of great temptation and spiritual danger, God is only giving us an opportunity for some great achievement and corresponding advancement in the spiritual life. And instead of presenting the temptation He will surround us with gracious influences to resist the temptation which the enemy presents. He will give us all needful armour, supply us with all needed courage, and bring us off more than conqueror, thus proving Himself to be the "Father of lights" even in that which in itself seemed dark and mysterious. But when of our own choice we go into circumstances of temptation, the case is entirely altered. We have in fact already yielded to temptation when we have consented to expose ourselves to risk; and accordingly we go in a demoralized condition into the contest. Moreover we go into it alone, and therefore cannot have the "Father of lights" with us in the darkness. Having taken the case into our own hands we have to fight the battle in our own strength; and that means defeat. Hence the duty of avoiding circumstances of temptation, of keeping as far from contamination as we can. This undoubtedly is the reason why our Lord teaches us to pray, "Lead us not into temptation." If only we have the continual shrinking from temptation which will result from the sincere offering of this petition, then we are sure never to run into temptation; and not only so, but when in spite of our efforts to avoid it, it is, so to speak, forced upon us, then we may count on the Lord's presence with us; and that means victory. And after victory is ours, we may well praise God that He gave us such an opportunity. The temptation was from below; but the victory was from above, from the "Father of Lights," from whom all good and nothing evil comes.

It is from this particular case of temptation that the inspired writer rises to the magnificent generalization of the text: "every good gift and every perfect gift cometh from above, from the Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning." The idea is that God is pouring out good influences upon men continually, just as the sun is pouring light and heat continually upon the earth. The idea of continuity is rather lost in our version. The word "cometh" in the original is not the present tense alone, but the present tense and the present participle combined, and the meaning is "keeps coming and coming." All good and perfect gifts keep coming and coming in a perpetual stream, just as light and warmth keep coming and coming in a perpetual stream from the sun.

Yet light and heat are very variable on the earth's surface. There is much darkness and much cold. Why? The variability is not in the sun, but always at or near the surface of the earth itself—clouds that have risen up from below and intercepted the light—some vast mountain range which casts a deep shadow and from its icy summit sends down chilly blasts on those who dwell beneath. Or it may be simply the turning away of the earth from the sun which is the cause. Remember it is always the earth that turns away from the sun, never the sun that turns away from the earth. It may be only a partial turning away, as in the winter season here, when the sun is far down from the meridian, and consequently storms and fogs prevail, and the verdure of summer disappears. Or it may be a turning away altogether, such as results in the darkness of night, or such as is found in those high latitudes where the night lasts on and on, until the whole land is locked in the icy embrace of death.

In the same way we may trace all the darker experiences of life to influences which originate in and around ourselves: clouds of unbelief, mountain ranges of sin. Or we are in darkness simply because we have turned away from the "Father of lights,"—turned away, it may be in part, so that He is no longer in the meridian, and winter influences are about us; or it may be altogether, so that, like the people in the Arctic regions, who during their winter are left entirely without the sun, we do not see His face at all, and are left under the power of darkness. But our variableness and the shadows which are the result of our turning away from Him, do not affect the great and blessed truth that He is the "Father of lights with whom there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning," and that all good and perfect gifts keep coming and coming from Him, flowing out in a perpetual stream from His great heart of love, and from the infinite treasury of His grace. Such is the thought which flashes like a sudden inspiration into the mind of the author of this epistle. You see at once that it has a very much wider application than to the subject of temptation out of which it has risen.

It is from God that all the light of natural religion has come. From Him comes the light of reason and the light of conscience in the heart of man. From Him has come all that is good and true in all the religions of heathenism, while all that is false and untrue has sprung from below. And the differences between different nations are not due to any variableness or partiality in God, not at all. "God is no respecter of persons;" and, accordingly "in every nation he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of Him." It was the nations that turned away from God, never God that turned away from the nations. When God chose the Jewish people, we are not to suppose He cut off all rays of light from the other nations and restricted them to this one race. There was no cutting off from any. Only, men everywhere were raising up barriers, interposing obstructions, turning farther and farther away from the Source of light, and going deeper and deeper into the shadow of darkness and death. Then it was that, if one might be allowed the expression, He took special pains with one nation to remove the obstacles and keep them out of the way, so that there should be at least one spot where the rays of truth were not hindered from giving life. Israel was indeed an oasis in the desert. But the sun shines on oasis and desert alike. The rain-cloud that passes over does not single out the one and pass by the other. "God makes His sun to shine on the evil and the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." The variableness and shadows of turning have never been with Him. He is the Father of lights always, everywhere, to all: the Father of darkness never, nowhere, to none. Is it not a blessed thing, amid all the darkness that surrounds us here, to know that though it cannot exist without His permission, it is not of Him, it is not congenial to to Him, it does not represent His purpose concerning us His children. It is with no "prince of darkness," but with the "Father of lights" that we have to do. And does not all this lend additional emphasis to the urgent entreaties which are addressed to us throughout the word of God, to separate ourselves from the kingdom of darkness and come to the Father of lights—to cease following our own natural inclinations which are too apt to lead us away from God and from His light, and to follow Him who came in the name of the Father of lights to save us, and who proclaims aloud in our hearing: "I am the light of the world; he that followeth Me shall not walk in darkness, but have the light of life."

We must now glance at another application which seems to be in view in this passage. We have been dwelling on the thought of God as "the Father of lights" in its reference to good and evil influences. Let us now think of its application to pleasant and painful experiences. If we go a little further back we shall see that these also are in the inspired writer's mind. See verses 9 and 10: "Let the brother of low degree rejoice in that he is exalted: but the rich, in that he is made low: because as the flower of the grass he shall pass away." It is true in the region of joy and sorrow as well as that of temptation that God is the Father of lights, of lights only. We cannot deny indeed, that it is He who sends us our sorrows as well as our joys. But in a very different way. He sends us our blessings with all His heart. He keeps sending blessings direct from His gracious hand, which is always open liberally to supply His creatures' wants. On the other hand "He doth not afflict willingly nor grieve the children of men." Many of our afflictions can be seen to come, not directly from God, but indirectly because of our sins, which intercept the light that otherwise would always stream upon us. Often too we may look upon God's dealing with us as a shading of the light from our weak eyes; and surely He is none the less the Father of lights, that He sometimes tempers His rays to our weakness. Then it very frequently happens that what seems to us darkness is not really dark. We see as it were the under side of the cloud which is turned towards earth and away from the sun, and it seems very dark. But if we could look upon the upper side of it, and we do sometimes discover a little fringe of it—the silver or the gold lining as we call it—we should see it all radiant with heavenly glory. Some time ago I had the opportunity of seeing a very splendid sight. It was what the Swiss call the Nebel Meer, or cloud sea. I was on the top of the Faulhorn, and while it was perfectly clear towards the high mountains, on the side of the plains there was one continuous sea of cloud beneath, stretching away to the farthest verge of the horizon. But seen from a height above, and out of a heaven that was dazzling in its brightness, that sea of cloud was a sea of glory! So would it be on the very darkest dreariest day if only we could rise high enough to look down on the clouds from above. So will it be with us on earth, in proportion as we rise together with Christ and sit with Him in heavenly places.

"The Lord struck the child that Uriah's wife bare unto David, and it was very sick," so sick that in a little while the little darling died. Does that look like the Father of lights? Was it not a dark deed? It seemed so at first to David, and the same sad thought has come to many, many sorrowful fathers and mothers who have passed through the same experience in every generation. But look back to it now. Was it not in mercy to the child? Was it not in mercy to the father? And was there not mercy in it to an innumerable company of fathers and mothers who should afterwards be enlightened and comforted by the believing words of the stricken parent? After the dark cloud, which seemed so black at the time, had just passed over his head far enough to let him catch a little of the glory of its upper edge, listen to him: "While the child was yet alive, I fasted and wept; for I said, Who can tell whether God will be gracious to me, that the child may live? But now he is dead, wherefore should I fast? Can I bring him back again? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me." (2 Sam. xii. 22, 23.) Ah yes: if we could read God's dealing with us in the light of eternity we should see what now we can only believe, that "all the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth," that in all He does it still remains true that He is "the Father of lights with whom is no variableness, nor shadow of turning." The time is coming when we shall see the truth as well as the beauty of what the late Horace Bushnell said a short time before his death: "I cannot think that God has let any shadow fall on us but the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

It may help us here to distinguish between the good and the perfect gifts. All God's gifts are good. Affliction itself, in so far as it comes from the hand of God, is good. But afflictions, though they may be good gifts, are never perfect gifts. They come as good gifts, to prepare us for the perfect gifts God has in store. They are sent from heaven as heavenly messengers, angels of light from the Father of lights, to prepare us for the time "when that which is perfect is come." Then all God's gifts will not be only good but perfect. Then there will be nothing whatever to interrupt the ceaseless flow of His infinite love and liberality. "There shall be no night there; for the glory of God shall lighten it, and the Lamb (God's unspeakable gift) shall be the light thereof."

Let us close with a word to those who are disposed to turn away from God. Why do you wish to turn away? It must be because you do not understand Him. You do not know how good and kind He is, how He longs to pour out His treasures upon you, to bestow good and perfect gifts upon you, even as the sun pours out his rays at noontide. And all that hinders your receiving His blessings is that you turn away from Him or keep mountains of sin and clouds of unbelief between you and Him. Will you not look at Him as He is presented to you here, as the Father of lights with whom there is no variableness nor shadow of turning, and who keeps sending forth good and perfect gifts to all who will receive them? Only give Him your confidence: open your heart to Him, and He will shine in it. The heavenly light will no doubt reveal some black spots there, of which you were not aware, or at all events you did not know how black they were; but surely it is better to know the worst, if by knowing the worst perfect recovery may be assured. Surely you are not of those who love the darkness rather than the light because their deeds are evil. Open up everything to God, and He will show Himself the "Father of lights" by taking all the darkness away. Then will the Holy Spirit take possession of your heart, and make it bright and joyful.

May God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, shine in all our hearts, to give us the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ!

THE HYMN-WRITERS OF WALES AND THEIR HYMNS.

III.

WE are still in the eighteenth century; and we must linger in the romantic though little known Vale of Towy to make the acquaintance of one more sacred poet of Wales. This is MORGAN RHYS, the story of whose life is almost entirely lost. We have, however, the memoir of his soul safely kept in his hymns and elegies. Being a contemporary and neighbour of David Jones and William Williams, he seems to have felt the stress and storm of the same religious conflict; and his devotion has very much of the same deep and fervent colour. He was influenced largely by the potent spirit of Griffith Jones of Llanddowror, the morning star of the Great Revival; and for a time undertook the care of one of his Circulating Schools. These schools were instituted to impart the simplest forms of elementary knowledge in country villages. After a school-master had been for a while engaged in removing the dense ignorance of one district, he had to leave it for another; so the "little knowledge" was scattered far and wide, although in very small instalments. In the latter part of his life, Mr. Rhys established a stationary school on his own responsibility: most probably in order that he might have more of personal freedom in his evangelistic work. For he was one of the band of Calvinistic Methodist intinerant preachers that rendered noble service in that age to the renaissance of national piety. His hymns reflect strongly the theological lights and shades of his day; when the human side of Redemption was to a very considerable extent ignored, so as to emphasize the divine side of it. The total depravity of man—the impossibility of salvation by means of legal observations—the need of the atonement and its sufficiency—these are the doctrines which his harp translates into song. When he once went to Williams of Pantycelyn and read out to him one of his hymns, that master of sacred song told him that it contained the experience of a "good Christian and a half." He can see Christ from everywhere. However weak and helpless he may be in himself, he never doubts the grace of God. He has made "a thousand vows to keep the narrow path," and he has failed. What can he do but pray that "the Dweller of the bush" should increase his strength and help him to climb the steep rocks without tiring any more? "Hold me with Thy powerful hand lest I fall here and there; and in the dark day to come, be Thou my God!"

We seem to hear the far-off noise of battle in these two verses—a dim echo from the theological conflicts of by-gone days,—

All praise to Christ the Righteous
Who for my sin has died,
And from the grave has risen
That I be justified:
Now on His throne of pity
He intercedes for me,
And names His life of sorrow,
His death upon the tree.

I ask no help from Moses,
Christ shall have all my plea;
The Substitute unblemished
Who died for one like me!
In Jordan's swelling torrent,
Or in that "day to come,"
I know His hand will hold me,
And safely bring me home.

"I ask no help from Moses," has in it the martial ring of some famous old battle-cry.

A similar theme is handled in these glowing verses—

Lord, open mine eyes to behold
The worth of Thy wondrous decree;
Far better than silver and gold,
The law of Thy mouth is to me:
The fire shall consume all below,
But Thou art the same, and Thy plan—
'Tis life everlasting to know
My Saviour as God and as man.

O wonder of infinite cost!
The way that He took in His grace,
To rescue a man that was lost,
By dying Himself in his place!
He conquered the serpent's despite,
And stood there alone—O my King!
He leadeth us now in His might—
Let those on the Rock shout and sing.

The Mighty One has overcome,
His foes in confusion retire;
And Zion is on its way home
In terrible chariots of fire:
The saints and the angels unite,
A white-shining numberless throng,
To bear thro' the realms of the light,
To Him the all-conquering song.

Another schoolmaster under Griffith Jones, and a maker of sacred songs also, was DAVID WILLIAMS, of Llandilo-fach, in the county of Glamorgan. Very little is known of him; and it seems probable that still less would be known were it not for the severity of his domestic trials. His wife was an advanced pupil of the school of Xantippe; and her violent temper kept the poet's sensitive spirit in exquisite torment. Among other troubles, he had to change his denomination on her account. But whatever of that, as in the case of another sweet singer who had to practice on "an evil spirit," his harp lost none of its tenderness of devotion. Some of his verses rank among the best in Welsh hymnology; and one especially is known wherever the Welsh tongue is spoken. He has not enclosed so much systematic theology in his hymns as Morgan Rhys: rather is he the minstrel of the mortal strife of men, with their sorrow and joy and divine endeavour. Many a troubled soul can join him in this remonstrance with doubt,—

Unbelief, let me have quiet,
Else my cry of pain shall rise
From this valley of affliction
To the gracious dawning skies:
There for me my Brother pleadeth,
Unforgetting day or night:
He will come and break my fetters,
He will lead me into light.

Little Faith, where art thou hiding?
For thy ministry take heart:
Why, sweet Hope, art thou so timid?
For the feeble do thy part:
Soon the battle will be over—
Unbelief, away! away!
Though I am so faint and helpless,
I am gaining ground each day.

In another hymn we are still touched with the anguish of the strife—

Hear my grief! believe I cannot
That for me there is a hope,
Who, between two weak opinions
Halting, in the darkness grope:
Fearing much and trusting little,
Shall I stand at last or fall?
Fearing evil hosts of darkness,
But myself much more than all!

Sometimes in the gloomy valley,
Sometimes on the sunny height;
Sometimes drinking Marah's waters,
Sometimes wine of pure delight:
Sometimes sighs and bitter moanings,
Sometimes joy on every string;
Sometimes low beneath the billows,
Sometimes sunward on my wing.

It must have been during one of his sunward flights that he saw this radiant vision of Eternal Love standing in the midst of all change without a cloud on its brow, without a fear in its soul:—

Oh! the grace no will can conquer!
The omnipotence of love!
Changeless is my Father's promise,
It will never, never move:
In the storm this is my anchor—
God can never change His mind;
In the wounds of Christ He promised
Life to me: and He is kind.

But the verse that has undoubtedly travelled wherever the Welsh language has, is the one of which I give the first line as it stands in the original—

Yn y dyfroedd mawr a'r tonnau.

It is the popular tradition that one stormy night on reaching home after having been away preaching, he was hailed with all the bitterness the practised tongue of his wife could command. It was more than he could bear: he preferred the company of the storm without to the mad rhetoric within, so away he went and stood on the banks of the river Llwchwr. The rush of the raging torrent and the noise of the wild night brought to his mind another river and another night, when his soul would be overwhelmed by the desolate presence of death. What hope would remain loyal then? What help would be at hand?

In the waves and mighty waters
No one will support my head
But my Saviour, my Beloved,
Who was stricken in my stead:
In the cold and mortal river
He will hold my head above;
I shall thro' the waves go singing
For one look of Him I love!

A touching incident has given to this verse the title of "The Miners' Hymn." In the month of April, 1877, a colliery at Cymmer in the Rhondda Valley was flooded, and fourteen miners found themselves in a prison of darkness and terror, waiting helplessly for death. The whole nation seemed to turn its thought towards that coal-pit, and every day made the suspense more painful. The rescue-party toiled manfully day and night; and when seven days had passed without any reward to their labour, the last hope was almost given up. But on the eighth day nine of those imprisoned were found: and they were alive, though exhausted to the verge of death. Without air, without food, despair would have driven them mad, were it not for the above hymn, which they sang over and over again with a terrible reality of feeling. "The waves and mighty waters" were there; so was their Saviour, their Beloved. And they sang for one look of Him!

A change: we come to a lady hymn-writer. This is ANN GRIFFITHS, a farmer's daughter, born in the year 1776, at Dolwar, near Llanfyllin, in the county of Montgomery. As a young woman, she was full of gay spirits, and used to speak very flippantly of the deepened religious earnestness of the age. She used to point to the crowds of people which journeyed from all parts of the country to the "Association" at Bala, and say—"See the pilgrims going to Mecca." She was extremely fond of dance and merry song and rustic gaiety. She had gone to attend one of these merry-making festivals at Llanfyllin, when she was induced by an old servant of her father's to enter the Independent chapel. She did so without any afterthought whatever. But like David Jones of Cayo, she found a message waiting for her there. She did not stay for the festival, but went home forthwith in a storm of troubled thought and dark questionings. She went to her parish clergyman: he met her heart-breaking distress with light jokes and most untimely jests. Taking hold of her hand he said—"Let me see, Ann, if the veins of vanity have all gone out of thy hand." She went away more distracted than ever. Her brother was already one of "the pilgrims of Mecca." She went with him to the chapel he frequented, and the message of dawning hope came to her there. An affinity of religious feelings led her soon afterwards to join the society, and she became a strong and shining influence in the quiet valleys around her home. But her career was cut short: she died when only twenty-nine years of age.

Her religion shared the ecstatic fervour of the age. Once when returning home after an exciting service, full of her own unworthiness and of the glory of Christ, she turned down a narrow, sheltered lane, in order to be alone to pray. There she knelt; and in her communion with God the spirit of sacred song touched her soul; and by the time she reached her home she had composed her first verse—the third in the following hymn.

Great Author of salvation
And providence for man,
Thou rulest earth and heaven
With Thy far-reaching plan:
To-day, or on the morrow,
Whatever woe betide,
Grant us Thy strong assistance
Within Thy hand to hide.

Give us the faith of angels,
That we may look and see
Salvation's depths of radiance
And holy mystery:
Two natures in one person,
Harmonious, part and whole:
The blood divine availing
To ransom every soul.

My soul, behold the fitness
Of this great Son of God;
Trust Him for life eternal,
And cast on Him thy load:
A Man!—touched with the pity
Of every human woe;
A God!—to claim the kingdom,
And vanquish every foe.

She who once laughed at the pilgrims of Bala became now one of the most devout of them. She used to attend there on the Communion Sabbath, although it meant for her, as for hundreds more, a rugged mountainous journey of over twenty miles. Once on her way home she became so absorbed in holy contemplation that she rode many miles out of her way over the Berwyn hills before ever awakening to the fact. The result of those hours of thought is kept in this hymn—

Blessed day of rest eternal
From my labour, in my place!
On a shoreless sea of wonders,
The unfathomed depths of grace:
Finding an abundant entrance
To the Triune God's abode:
Seas to sail and never compass;
God as man, and man as God.

Neither shall the sun light on them,
Nor the fear of death give pain;
Tears forgotten in the anthem
Of the Lamb which once was slain:
Sailing on the crystal river
Of the peace of One in Three,
Underneath the cloudless beamings
Of the death of Calvary.

Nothing could mark the intensity of feeling more strikingly than the broken sentences and rapid interchange of thoughts. "The cloudless beamings of the death of Calvary:" the confused eloquence reveals the divine anguish of imagination.

A noteworthy fact in connection with her hymns is their preservation. A servant in her father's house, named Ruth, possessed a remarkable memory. To her Ann Griffiths used to recite her hymns as they were composed; and then the two would sing them over time after time. After the death of the young authoress, Ruth used to repeat these verses to her husband. He saw their worth and wrote them down from her dictation. To-day they cannot be lost: they have a home in too many hearts.

Things New and Old.

THE LATE LORD IDDESLEIGH.—The following letter, bearing upon the life and character of the late Earl of Iddesleigh, was addressed by the Hon. and Rev. John Northcote to the editor of the "Baptist," which published a sketch of the Earl as one of a series of religious legislators:—"Dear Sir,—As rector of Upton Pyne and a son of Lord Iddesleigh, I have to thank you for your very kind letter, which is one of the many we have received which prove how truly he was beloved by all classes and shades of opinion. His real goodness and simple faith made him, indeed, the brother of all earnest people. And he felt that all who agreed with him in a hearty desire to serve God and in a true belief in Jesus our Saviour were fellow-labourers with him in God's vineyard. His faith was, indeed, extremely simple and wonderfully strong. I often heard and we have all often been greatly struck by the simple way he would say, 'I must do this because it is right.' And if any course was proposed to him which he thought wrong, he would simply put it aside as impossible. He loved his own church most heartily, but with no bigotry, and was often grieved at errors which he saw in her. He sympathised with the varying modes of belief which he saw in others, but felt that there should never be any feeling but one of brotherly love between true servants of our one Master. The chief thing he detested was hypocrisy wherever he met with it. He was regular in his attendance at public worship, and used to read lessons in church regularly. He was also most regular in reading family prayers at home. I have always thought that his piety was too simple for us to call him either a High, Low, or Broad Churchman, but I suppose he called himself a High Churchman, or rather would have done so if he had not extremely disliked these names. He is now at rest, but the example of his blameless life and gentle, loving spirit will long be one of the strongest motives to goodness among all who knew him well. His power to forgive injuries was greater than any one can believe possible in a mere mortal man. And he never would allow his family to speak in anger of those who had done him wrong. Even at the last he was always trying to invent excuses for those who had so bitterly injured him. His heart was very gentle, and when he was wronged he suffered most terribly, but suffering developed in him the true likeness to his Master, and made him more ready to forgive his enemies. He used not only to attend church, but he always used to enter most heartily into every part of the service. I never saw any man so completely devote himself to prayers and praise during service. He always joined in the responses and the singing, and I am sure that he did it in heart even more than by voice. The sermons he liked the best were always the simplest, and he was never tired of listening to the simple story of the love of God as shown in the life of Christ."

STORY OF A SERAMPOOR TESTAMENT.—In commencing the mission to the Afghans the great desideratum was to get a Bible in the Afghan tongue. It was supposed never to have been translated into Pushtoo, and two or three officers at Peshawur had undertaken to translate some of the Gospels.

I at once remembered that in the year 1848, while acting for the Government of the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh in the Derajat, I had seen a Pushtoo Testament in the possession of a fine old Pathan chief, who had received it in his youth at the Hudwar Fair, where he had gone to sell horses, from an English missionary, who told him that if he took care of it, and preserved it from fire and water, it would certainly be of use to him some day, when the English should come to his country. "That day," said the old chief, "has now come; and here is the book, uninjured by fire or water." So saying, he unrolled it from many wrappers, and I found it had been printed at the Serampoor mission in 1818. I read a few lines of it and saw that it was Pushtoo, in the Persian character. I asked him if he had ever read it. He said, "Our moollah has read it and says it is a very good book and quite correct, for Father Abraham and Father Moses are mentioned in it." I returned the volume to the old man, and though I fear it was for the noble qualities of himself and his son, and not for the sake of the Bible, yet certain it is that Ali Khan Kolachee never had cause to regret that the English came into his country. Well, this incident flashed across my mind at once, when I heard everybody wondering what was to be done to translate the Scriptures into Pushtoo, and I mentioned it to Colonel Martin. Application was, I believe, made to the mission library at Serampoor; but strange to say, not a copy could then be found. I then wrote to my old friend Ali Khan, and recovered the precious volume; and I think it is impossible to consider this incident without being struck with awe and humbled at the long foresight of that omniscient and constant God who deposits His sealed-up purposes with unconscious man, and tells Futurity the hour to open and to read them. Thus was one mission at Calcutta, to be established in 1818, made to provide a translation of the Scriptures for another mission at Peshawur to be established in 1855; an Afghan chief was made to preserve one copy of this message to his countrymen for twenty years, when all others had either been lost or forgotten. The Pushtoo Testament thus found was placed by Colonel Martin in the hands of the Afghan branch of the Bible Society, and they most generously undertook to reprint and present to this mission three thousand copies of the Gospels of Luke and John, the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistle to the Ephesians.—Speech by Sir Herbert Edwardes at Peshawur.

A CHILD'S LETTER.—When far inland (i.e. in Africa) the mail comes in but once a month. Its arrival is heralded by two gun-shots, fired in quick succession. No matter what one may be doing, he leaves his occupation and hurries forward to get a sight of his precious letters. There would be some perhaps from my brothers, some from friends, always one from my wife. But once there was one which, when I saw the handwriting, I opened first. It was on a bare half-sheet of paper, the lines running this way and that way, tumbled and soiled, but that one letter I read first, and treasured above all the others. It was from my dear little son, and contained but two lines: "My dear father—God bless you." These few words received by me in the wilds of Africa were more precious than many a longer letter.—Bishop Hannington's Life.

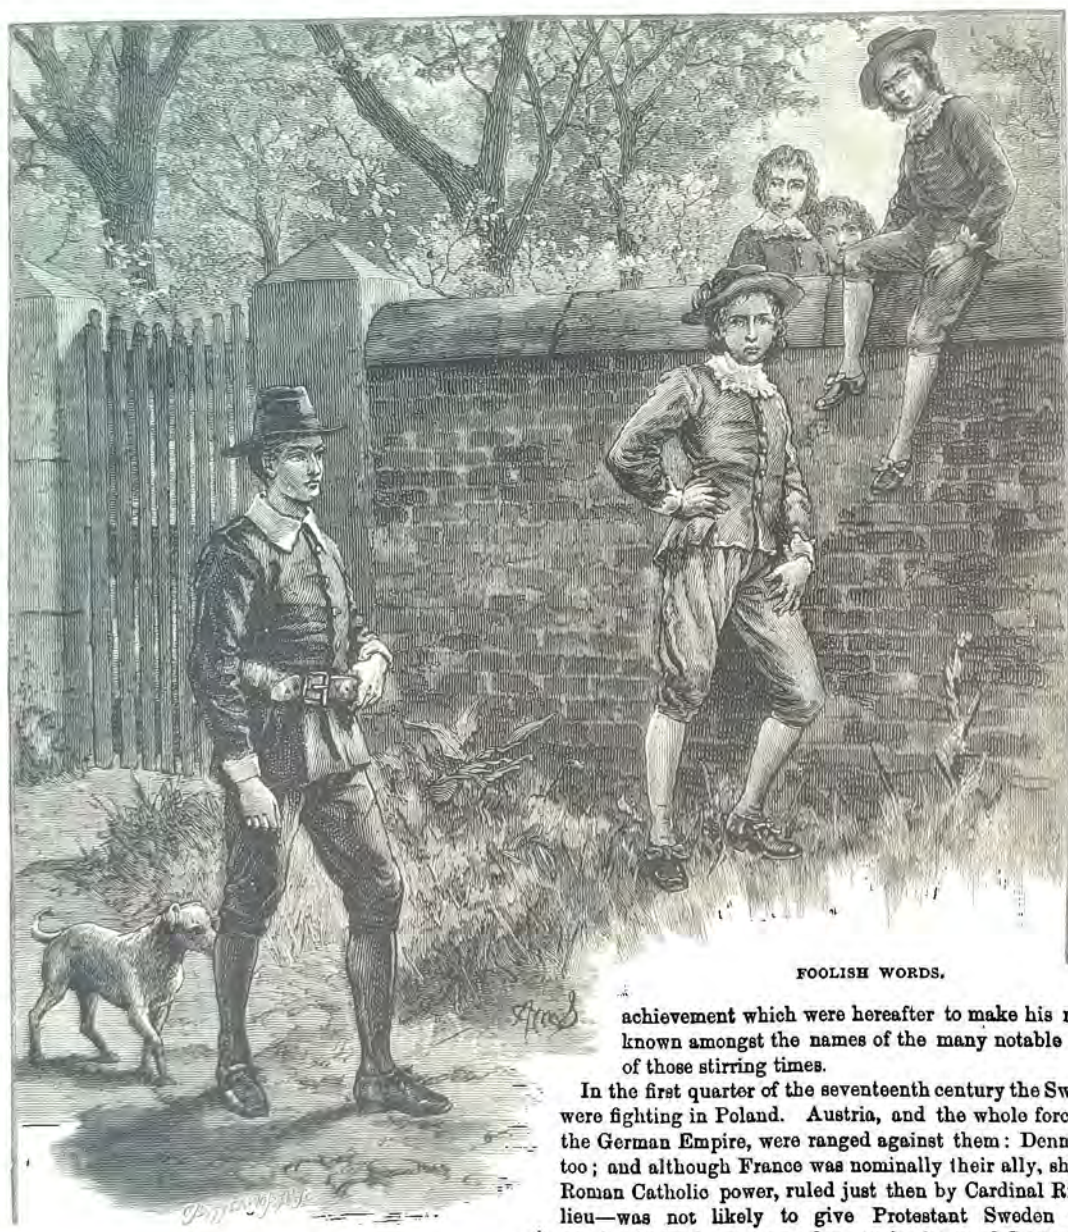
THE SWEDISH KING'S PAGE.

BY CRONA TEMPLE.

CHAPTER I.



FOOLISH WORDS.

"LEONARD the son of Torsten." That was the name of the first page of King Gustavus. He had no surname. He came of a Gothland family, whose pride it was to retain the ancient fashion of distinguishing a man only by his Christian name and his father's Christian name. Leonard was just "Torstenson," until, years afterwards, the soldiers of the Thirty years' war called him "Blixten"—their Lightning.

He was but a boy when he first rode to the wars in the train of the great Gustavus; but even then he showed the swift judgment, the clear reasoning, and powers of rapid achievement which were hereafter to make his name known amongst the names of the many notable men of those stirring times.

In the first quarter of the seventeenth century the Swedes were fighting in Poland. Austria, and the whole forces of the German Empire, were ranged against them: Denmark, too; and although France was nominally their ally, she—a Roman Catholic power, ruled just then by Cardinal Richelieu—was not likely to give Protestant Sweden very hearty aid in the cause so dear to the heart of Gustavus—the religious liberty of Europe. It was hatred of Austria that brought France into the question at all: Richelieu judged that if Germany were kept constantly weakened by strife the influence of his own country must remain paramount. A poor reason for rendering help!

Towards the end of the year 1624 the battle-tide rolled back into the plains of Livonia. Only a few months since, Sigismund of Poland had desolated that very country. The inhabitants of the towns looked with a strange apathy on the war-worn men that defiled through their gates and crossed their fields where the harvests were trampled in the dust. King Sigismund of Poland, or King Gustavus of Sweden—it mattered little to the Livonians. The contending armies had marched and countermarched across their lands, had besieged and battered at their towns, until, in their despair, they imagined they had reached the deepest depths of misery. There only remained death to await—and death itself would soon cease to be a dread.

The Swedish army lay in and around Dorpt, a town on the northern shores of the Duna river. Gustavus wished to force the Germans back into Poland, hoping thereby to end the campaign before winter.

He had taken up his headquarters in an old country-house belonging to a certain Baron Goertz, who was a mournful-minded man, even when things went fair, but who was utterly sunk in desolation by this stroke of evil fortune.

And truly great havoc had been wrought.

The largest trees had been hacked away: the pleasure grounds left to desolation. The fountain which was the pride of the Baron's heart would never throw water into the air again, for not only was the basin broken, but the supply which fed it had been diverted to water the Swedish horses; it was a wreck, like most other things about the grounds! Yet there was still some beauty left to the place. Still some quiet corners where the shrubs had been spared, still a few roses left in the wilderness to show where the garden had been: still a few trailing convolvulus-blooms, creeping amongst the weeds!

The Baron's four sons were too young to go soldiering: too young to be of any use at all, their father thought impatiently.

They were handsome lads, well grown and high-spirited. Karl and Alexis, Martin, and little Ernst. They heard plenty of their father's fretful fury at the change in their fortunes, and they believed everything that was evil of the "thieves and robbers" that had invaded their home.

"Yet he is a king," said Martin one day, as Karl was scoffing at the great Gustavus.

"Oh, yes. Truly he is. But his grandfather was just a private gentleman, with rank no higher than ours," was the scornful response.

"If he is our enemy, why don't the Livonians fight him?" demanded Martin, who was of an inquiring turn.

"For the same reason that you and I don't fight them, I suppose," answered Karl, bitterly; "because we can't."

There was a step on the road, and the boys looked round to see who might be approaching. Little Ernst peered over the park wall, and Karl drew himself up with added haughtiness. Few people found their way to the solitary haunt where the boys loitered away their spare time. The unusual sound of a footstep there startled them.

"It is one of those canting Swedes!" said Alexis, who was perched on the top of the wall.

The intruder, a lad but a year or two older than Alexis himself, came quickly on, a dog pacing soberly at his heels. It was Torstenson, carrying despatches for the king.

He did not at first perceive the boys; his thoughtful eyes were looking straight before him; his plain, belted dress showed in dark contrast to the glow of the autumnal foliage, and the rich colouring of the mosses on the high brick wall.

"He has just the sneaking air of a thief, has he not?" went on Alexis, safe, as he supposed, in a language which the new-comer was not expected to understand. "They are all heathens and heretics, these Swedes; so our father says."

Torstenson's glance flashed suddenly round on the speaker, and he halted, looking sharply at the four. Their clothes were far finer than his own, their whole air and bearing proved them to be of gentle birth and breeding; but be they who they might, they could not be permitted to call Swedes thieves, heretics and heathens in his hearing!

"By your own showing, your father knows little of the matter," said he, in excellent German. "Pray, my young cockrel, why is it, do you imagine, that the Swedes are here?"

Karl answered, pushing Alexis behind him: "They are here by the right of the strongest," he said. "The Poles and they have ruined us. It is very like thieving to take the roof from my father's head, and the food from my mother's lips. It is very like heresy to flout our holy religion, and revile——"

"Stay," interrupted Torstenson; "words are easy to say, but let deeds speak. The Swedes have come to assert the right of all men to serve God in freedom. Our King Gustavus wishes to open to Germany the gates of light and liberty; he is no robber; his people pay with broad florins for all we need——"

It was Karl's turn to interrupt.

"Let deeds speak," he echoed, with a short laugh. "We are homeless, we are poor, while the northern invaders drink our wine, and eat our bread in our own halls. Your talk of light and liberty is small comfort for such wrongs."

This view of the question was new to Torstenson. He had never heard the Livonian side; he had yet to learn that conflicting interests surround truth with envelopments which alter and hide it until it almost ceases to be recognisable as "truth" at all. He was staggered, but his faith in his king was unshaken; Gustavus, he felt, could not be unjust.

"I am on duty; I have despatches," he said hurriedly; "but I will come some day and prove to you that if there is injustice it is not with the king's knowledge."

The boys looked after him as he strode away. There was some admiration on the face of Alexis, at least. This Swede seemed a fine fellow—not a nobleman, perhaps; his clothing was too straight and plain for that—so Alexis judged; but he probably was the squire of some great lord.

"Don't you wish, Karl, that we also could go to the wars?" said youug Alexis, wistfully; and Karl's eyes flashed, although he made no answer.

Torstenson had but repeated what he had often heard his royal master declare. The fighting was not to acquire fresh territory, nor was it for the sake of the honour and fame of Gustavus. All Europe had lately been stirred by Luther's powerful voice; all Europe had perceived the links of the chain which bound her. This new-born effort after liberty of conscience should not be strangled if Gustavus could prevent it! Dark days would come for Europe if the Emperor Ferdinand succeeded in forcing the people back to their bondage to the papal throne. It was to secure their holiest liberties that the Swedes had marched there to the shores of the Duna river.

This Torstenson fully understood. That the lads he had left by the garden wall should not comprehend it, surprised and troubled him.

He carried his despatches to his master. Gustavus was busy with his officers planning an attack on the enemy, whose army, under his cousin and rival, Sigismund, held a strong position on the opposite bank of the stream. The king was sitting at a table covered with maps and plans, talking eagerly. Torstenson waited and listened.

There was a second bridge, possession of which the king was bent on gaining. "We could turn their flank, if our cavalry were thrown across there," he said, with his finger on the map indicating the spot.

"It is not impossible," said Tamelstiern, a captain of dragoons.

"It shall be done," cried De la Gardie, the general of the cavalry brigade.

Gustavus shook his head. "It will be no child's play," he said. "Sigismund knows well the value of that bridge. It will not drop into our hands for the mere asking."

One or two of the generals were almost twice the age of their king; veterans who had fought when he was in his cradle: but they served him with a rapturous loyalty. Their obedience never flagged: perhaps it was because he also had learned to obey. They listened to him now as to an oracle.

The next morning Torstenson followed the king in his daily round of inspection. When the camp had been visited and the daily duties done Gustavus rode onwards to a gentle hill overlooking the river. He rode slowly, for the day was hot: one of those scorching days which come sometimes after a summer's drought and calms. He drew rein for a while, and looked over the valley where the Duna river flowed sluggishly in the sunlight; and beyond one might see the tents of the Imperial army showing in tiny spots of white against the blue distance.

"Leonard," said the king, "do you see columns of men moving out there?"

"Yes, sire," answered Torstenson, "they are moving towards the western bridge."

The page spoke modestly, but with a certain swift decision that would alone mark him out as a lad of no ordinary promise. The king had found out his worth long ago.

Gustavus sighed. The enemy, too, had discovered the importance of the western bridge!

They lingered on the hill while the sun rose higher in the quiet sky, and the wild doves flew in whirling flocks to the fields of trampled corn.

"Greeting to you!" called out a shrill young voice, and two boys ran up to Torstenson's horse. "You did not return, Sir Swede, to prove Karl in the wrong, when he called your king and your army thieves and heretics!"

It was Alexis and his brother Martin.

Torstenson flushed scarlet. He pointed to the king with a warning gesture—could it be that these dolts of Livonian boys did not recognise his majesty?

But before he could speak Gustavus turned.

"Who is Karl?" he demanded, a covert smile lifting the ends of his huge moustache: the boy's beauty and energy pleased him, and the audacious words amused him. "Who is Karl?"

"My brother; the heir of the Baron Goertz," was the answer. "And you? You are a Swede?"

"Yes, a Swede: but neither thief nor heretic. I am here trying to do my Lord's work. You might help me, if you would. We fight for liberty and freedom."

Alexis opened his blue eyes. "Your Lord is King Gustavus, I suppose. That was just what he said," pointing to Torstenson; "he said that Gustavus was fighting for Germany's freedom: but I wish that he had not turned us out of our house, and taken our wine and our horses."

"No," put in Martin, the just-minded. "It was the Poles who took our horses. But, tell us, sir, how we could help. We are too young to go to the wars."

The king turned his horse, and paced slowly towards his quarters. "My Lord accepts the help of all," he said, answering Martin. "There are those in the south, at Rome, who have usurped His kingdom, beguiled His subjects, suppressed His orders and His letters. I am here to try and break their hostile power. And any one, be he old or young, who helps the cause of liberty, helps me."

Gustavus spoke to himself more than to the boy. He knew that he uttered enigmas which Martin could not understand.

"Your king must be a good man!" said Alexis impetuously." Karl declares he is no better born than ourselves; that he is an upstart. But if he is what you and he (pointing to Torstenson) declare, he must be worth fighting for."

Again Gustavus smiled. He relished the boy's fresh, bold ways. Was it of stuff such as this that Rome sought to make votaries and slaves?

"Leonard, here, shall explain one day," he said. "Just now we cannot further delay." And he urged his horse forward, nodding over his shoulder to the lads, as, followed by Torstenson, he cantered away.

The boys gazed after them. "I'd like to help the Swedes," said Alexis. "I wish Karl did not hate them so."

"How silent the young one was," meditated Martin. "I suppose that man was his master."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. V.

Who first to earth a helpless infant came,
And closed his life in punishment and shame?
What king, intent on killing Christ the Lord,
Slew Bethlehem's children with the cruel sword?
A Hebrew's child whose unexpected birth
Three angels promised, sent from heaven to earth?
What was her name whose grandchild loved the truth,
And learned the Scriptures in his early youth?
What sorrowing king in meek submission said,
"Why should I fast now that my child is dead,
For I shall go to him his face to see,
But he shall never more return to me"?
A favourite child who rose to wealth and fame,
Though born in exile: tell his mother's name?
A little child complains "My head! my head!"
Then dies: what prophet raised him from the dead?
City to which the Saviour's parents went,
And where their Son His holy childhood spent?

Initial letters now will plainly show,
Who came to Jesus when he dwelt below,
Received His tender words, His kind caress,
And felt His holy hands enfold and bless,
And when had nearly closed His earthly days,
Sang sweet hosannas and proclaimed His praise. L. T.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XII.—SPEAKING OUT.

NEW PROJECTS.

JULIET GRANBY was walking home from a visit to Reinée Dumaresq in a peculiarly dissatisfied frame of mind.

She had begun to find that her new friend was not at all inclined to enter into her lofty ideals and high-flown aspirations. Reinée seemed to enjoy pottering about dirty cottages and visiting uninteresting poor people as much as Mrs. Granby enjoyed training her young maids and looking after every detail of the spotless home that Juliet was growing to despise and dislike. Perhaps old women always did grow more or less childish, but what could have made the beautiful high-born Reinée so tiresome and tame? Juliet rebelled sorely against her lot. Everybody seemed to fail her. Was she never to get beyond the narrow limitations of this little neat house and garden, or the control of a grandmother, who appeared to her to have no thoughts beyond her pigs and poultry, and a low poor people.

A mind that could be so engrossed in matters of this kind could never aspire to any higher flights—so Juliet told herself again and again and with increasing emphasis. She herself had a nature that soared far above the region of such trivialities, and yet she was not happy; and on this particular afternoon she was more than usually dissatisfied.

When she reached home, she hurried for consolation to her books, and was deep in the biographies of notable women, when the bell summoned her to the substantial eight o'clock supper-tea, a meal to which she had a great aversion, always wishing Mrs. Granby to substitute for it a late dinner.

She did not hurry down, and when she reached the dining-room, she found her tea poured out, her plate supplied, and Mrs. Granby already engaged with her meal.

"I knew that you were in, my dear, so I did not wait. Can you not try to be a little more punctual? I hope you have had a pleasant afternoon?"

"Pretty well," was the not very gracious answer, and Juliet began to eat in silence, the shade upon her face deepening each moment.

"I had a visit from Mr. Leslie this afternoon," said Mrs. Granby. "He gives but a poor account of Mr. Sargent; but I was pleased with the young man himself. He spoke with a great deal of proper feeling. I was pleased, too, by what he told me of Wulfric Meynal. He seems to be making himself an invaluable friend amongst the poor. Barbara, too, is helping him. I had heard something of her work from herself; but Mr. Leslie's independent testimony was of still greater interest. I have always felt that Barbara Meynal had in her the making of a very fine character."

But Juliet hardly listened. She had more important concerns on her mind than anything her grandmother could find to discuss. After a long silence she laid down her knife and fork, pushed away her plate, and burst out with great vehemence: "Grandmother, I can stand it no longer. This place is killing me!"

It was by no means the first time Mrs. Granby had heard such an assertion, and she answered quietly: "Well, my dear, where do you wish to go?"

"To London!" cried the girl excitedly. "To some great city where life is life—not a miserable stagnant vegetation that stifles the soul, and crushes the mind. I am being starved here—absolutely starved! I will go to London, if it is only as a governess!"

"My love, you are not suited to be a governess," said Mrs. Granby gently.

Juliet tossed her head with some indignation.

"You think I do not know enough?"

"I was not thinking of your book-knowledge. You may be qualified there, although you must remember that a wide range of desultory reading does not necessarily make an educated woman, and the rudiments of learning you always despised, wishing to run before you could walk, as seems to be the fashion of the age. But the intellectual difficulty is not the one of which I was thinking."

Juliet had flushed a little under the criticism her grandmother had just uttered; but it was too true to be denied. Rather hastily she asked: "What other difficulty can there be?"

"One or two rather serious ones, as it appears to me, my dear. Those who are entrusted with the care of the young, and undertake their management, require to have a steady control over their own tempers, or they will never control their pupils. Very great patience and self-possession are absolutely essential in the management of children. I doubt if you are sufficiently qualified on either of these points."

Juliet was silent. A good deal of irritation was stirring within her, but she did not wish to lose control of herself at such a moment.

"Then," continued Mrs. Granby, after a short pause, "there are habits of order and punctuality, of ready obedience and steady application to distasteful duties, to be instilled into the minds of children; and it is useless to preach unless we have learned to practise. I have never forgotten one saying that was well drilled into me in my young days—'Those who have not learned to obey are not fit to command.'"

Juliet's face looked rather dark, but all she said was, "Of course I could be tidy if I chose."

"Then is it not rather a pity you do not choose?"

"Oh, there is no motive here to make me."

"No—only the motive of pleasing me, which is not at all sufficient."

Mrs. Granby spoke quite gently. Since Juliet had grown up to womanhood, she had wisely allowed her a good deal of personal liberty, and hardly ever reproved her seriously for faults that she evidently declined to mend; yet her very forbearance sometimes caused Juliet a good deal of discomfort, and she would rather have endured a good scolding, against which she could have rebelled as tyrannous and harsh. After the last words spoken there followed a long silence.

"Well, I must do something!" exclaimed Juliet, breaking out again, stifling her momentary feeling of compunction and shame. "I don't care much what it is, so long as it takes me away from this place."

Mrs. Granby looked pained.

"I am sorry you are so discontented, Juliet. I know your life is quiet and monotonous. I cannot help that; but I have done my best to make it happy."

"Oh, it is not your fault, grandmother," answered Juliet, struck by a little contrition. "You have always been kind. It is the place that is in fault—the whole atmosphere of it. I must live a wider life; I must have a larger sphere. Some strangers were at Mrs. Dumaresq's at tea-time this afternoon. They were saying that there must be a European war before long. I wish it might break out soon. I would go directly then."

"What to do?"

"Why, to nurse the sick and wounded, of course—like Florence Nightingale."

Mrs. Granby smiled a little.

"And what do you know of nursing, to start with?"

"Oh, I should learn directly I got there. One can do almost anything under the pressure of necessity and excitement, you know."

"Those can do a great deal who know what should be done and how to do it," answered the old lady quietly. "But the battle-field is not generally considered the place to learn the rudiments of nursing, nor do they fill the ambulances with untrained and enthusiastic girls."

"Oh, I could soon get a little training. I should learn anything of that sort very quickly. There need be no great difficulty there, if that is all."

Mrs. Granby sat silent for a few minutes, and then said, "If you are really in earnest in your wish to learn something of nursing, I will certainly do what I can to forward the plan."

This was not perhaps the scheme that appealed the most to Juliet; but then if there should be war, she would love to go to the front, and the only chance of getting leave to do this would be by training herself beforehand. Juliet was convinced that she had it in her to be a second Florence Nightingale, and the prospect of any change was pleasant to her.

"What could I do to learn?" she asked. "Where could I go?"

"I am not sure that you need go anywhere. I could teach you a good deal myself, if you really wished to learn; and Barbara Meynal and her brother, I do not doubt, could find you work and give you instruction."

Juliet's face fell instantly.

"No, thank you, grandmother, that is not the sort of thing I want. If I go in for nursing, I shall do so in a thorough practical fashion. I shall either let it alone altogether, or go into a hospital and learn it there."

Mrs. Granby sat silent for some time wrapped in thought.

"Hospital life is very hard, Juliet. The hours are long, early rising and punctuality are essential, as well as prompt obedience and strict attention to orders. I am not at all sure that you would like it."

Juliet looked roused and eager.

"Do you really mean that you would let me try it, grandmother?"

"I must think it over; but if your heart is set on it, if you really feel wishful for a proper medical and surgical training, I am disposed to give you your own way. I am not indifferent to your happiness, my dear; it troubles me that you cannot be content with your life. When you have suggested plans before, they have been too wild and impossible to entertain seriously for a moment; but this idea of entering a hospital is less chimerical."

"Where do you think I could go?" asked Juliet eagerly, "to London?"

"No, London is too far away. I could not have you at such a distance, where I could hardly ever see you or satisfy myself as to your well-being. Besides, I believe it is rather an expensive thing entering as a lady probationer at a London hospital. If you are really in earnest over your wish, I suppose you will not mind 'roughing it' a little?"

"Not at all," answered Juliet quickly; "I would rather go on my own merits as it were, and work my way up from the bottom."

She felt a little contempt for the very expression "lady probationer," and was by no means disposed to swell that band.

Juliet had, as has been implied before, a very great opinion of her own powers. She felt certain that if she once had full scope, her talents, her energies, together with her gentle birth, would soon make her a power and an influence in whatever kind of work she took up.

She did not want to go to a hospital where there were a number of ladies—girls of her own station—at work already. She much preferred the idea of entering as an ordinary untrained nurse, and of shining above all her companions by her capacity, her skill and her general quickness and force of character. Mrs. Granby did not know what thoughts were fermenting in her brain; but she was relieved to find that her granddaughter was not as resolutely set upon going to London as she fancied she might be.

"There is the County Infirmary," remarked Mrs. Granby. "I believe the nursing there is very good: and it is not more than twenty miles away. I could come and see you occasionally. I will speak to Wulfric Meynal about it. He knows the place. I believe he goes there occasionally in some capacity or other. I fancy he lectures from time to time to the medical school. He will be the best person to consult."

So for the present the conversation dropped, and Juliet, feeling that a crisis in her life was at hand, went away to dream of her unexpected success and of an ideal hospital life that was to transform her at once into a sort of full-blown heroine.

Wulfric Meynal when consulted told Juliet plainly that the work would be hard and monotonous; but he relaxed a little when he saw that her mind was made up, and undertook to make arrangements for her to enter the County Infirmary (where he gave lectures every month), at the earliest opportunity. He gave her a few words of excellent counsel, to which she paid but little heed, as was her way, and he left her in a state of triumphant exultation that was rather intoxicating.

Barbara was her main confidante during the next days. The girls had not seen so much as usual of each other since the time of one had been so much more occupied, but the sympathy of a common purpose drew them together now, and led to the interchange of many thoughts.

That is to say, Juliet talked away more eloquently than ever—more than ever certain that a great future lay before her. Her companion had much less to say on her side, and though she gave sympathy and encouragement to Juliet, and tried to avoid forming a hasty judgment, she did wonder a little if a plan whose soul and centre seemed to be self would be likely to turn out very happily or well.

Barbara was silent about her own theories of life, because she felt that they wanted enlarging and modifying. Her old ideas were not sufficient for her. She felt the need of something deeper and wider. She often wished to talk to Wulfric about it, but a sort of shyness held her silent. She had grown more intimate with her brother since she had become his assistant and fellow worker, but there were some subjects that she still hesitated to broach.

But an evening came when a favourable chance seemed to present itself.

It was the day following the narrow escape that Clive Dumaresq had had of a serious accident—perhaps of death itself. He had called to ask after Wulfric, and had seen Barbara, who heard from his lips the story about which her brother had been quite silent.

The tale did not lose in effect by Clive's telling of it, and all that day Barbara went about with a sense of deep thankfulness at her brother's narrow escape, and with an admiration of his coolness and bravery, that wrought her up to an enthusiasm about him which she knew she must not let him see.

She had, however, the unusual pleasure that day of having more of his company than usual, for he came home about six o'clock with a racking headache, due to the effects of the blow on his head, and was altogether so stiff and bruised that he was glad to lie down upon the sofa in his study, and let Barbara wait upon him with that quiet trained skill that she had lately learned.

Rest and quiet, and strong tea, soon produced a beneficial effect upon him. He enjoyed a couple of hours' sound sleep, and awoke to pronounce himself quite recovered, save from a little stiffness that a hot bath would remove.

Barbara, however, would not hear of his rising or attempting any work that night, and he submitted to her dictum, and indulged himself with a long rest, a thing he had not done for months, and she sat beside him and told of Clive's visit, and the story he had related, and asked for her brother's account of the adventure.

Wulfric's story was very slight; he had caught hold of a horse and stopped it, and got a bruise or two; but he had nothing to say of his own prowess. It might have been the most ordinary affair in the world from his account. Barbara felt all the prouder of him for his unconsciousness of any heroism; but she could not refrain from saying: "You must have known that you might have been killed."

"Well, we may all be killed every time we walk out or do anything. There is more or less of danger all round us; it is only a question of degree."

"And the degree there was imminent."

"I don't know. I am very strong, and there was another man close by, ready to lend a hand. I dare say, if the truth were known, he did as much as I; but I couldn't see really what happened."

"Mr. Dumaresq said nothing about anybody else. He only spoke of you."

"There was another fellow though—a friend of young Dumaresq's. He was certain to have lent a hand too. Any way, it's all right. I kept out of harm's way, and the less fuss you make about it the better."

Barbara knew what this hint meant.

"Wulf," she said, after a long pause, "does death seem to you a very dreadful thing?"

It was easier to ask this question in the twilight dimness of the room than it would have been at any other time. She could not see her brother's face clearly, only the outline of his tall figure as he lay upon the couch with his hands clasped behind his head.

"Do you wish for a personal answer to that question, Barbara? Do you want to know my own feelings about it?"

"Yes, Wulf."

There was a short silence, and then the young man answered quietly and composedly, "Personally, there is nothing dreadful to me in the idea of death."

"You mean you would not be afraid of it?"

"That is my meaning."

"But you have seen many people who are?"

"Undoubtedly. You know there are two causes for the fear of death, one much commoner than the other."

"What do you mean?"

"I am speaking of the natural physical shrinking from death and clinging to life, which we all share to a greater or less extent. In some cases it amounts almost to a horror of dying, yet in nearly every case in the actual approach and presence of death it passes entirely away. The sense of spiritual fear is a very different thing. We do not see it very often. Generally the senses are hardened or deadened at the last and physical exhaustion saps away all sense of mental terror; but from time to time it is there, and teaches us its own lesson."

Barbara was silent for a while, and then she said, "Wulf, I believe I should be afraid to die."

"Why?"

"I hardly know how to say it; I am not good enough; I am not ready."

"And how much goodness do you think you need to make you ready?"

Barbara was silent, twisting her hands together; she was uncertain how to make her meaning clear.

"You know what people say, Wulf, 'that they are not fit to die.' That is just what I feel."

"And how do you propose to make yourself fit?"

Barbara was silent.

"Wulf," she said, after a pause, "you are not afraid; why is it that you feel different from me?"

"Perhaps if I were relying on my own fitness and goodness or readiness I might feel as you do, Barbara."

She sat very still in the gathering darkness, and then asked softly, "What is it you trust in, Wulf?"

"Have you been reading your Bible, Barbara?"

"Yes, a little; a good deal sometimes; but I don't think I know how to find the places I want—I don't seem to learn what other people do."

"No? Then you must look again for the answer to your own question."

"Won't you tell me, Wulf?"

"What am I to tell you? I think you know it all as well as I—that there is One upon Whom has been laid the iniquity of us all; One Who has borne our griefs and carried our sorrows, by Whose stripes we are healed. He was good—fit and ready to die; but He does not expect it of us."

"But He expects something, Wulf?"

"Yes, our faithful and loving service. He expects that, and that we must give—all the rest may safely be left to Him."

Wulfric spoke very quietly and coolly, not in the least as if he were dealing with sacred subjects. There was no hesitation or shamefacedness in his manner, no bated breath or slurring over the words he uttered. What he said he evidently spoke from settled conviction and was not ashamed to express. He never introduced such subjects into conversation, but when pressed by his sister, he gave her his opinions without hesitation.

"And it is all real to you, Wulf? Of course, I have heard it all again and again, but somehow it has never come home to me. Is it all real to you?"

"Yes, Barbara. I advise you to have done with all those shilly-shally ways of taking things on trust because you are afraid to doubt, yet are not prepared to investigate their truth and find out what you really do believe. Nothing good can ever come of that sort of thing. If you believe, believe with your whole understanding and mind and spirit: if you do not—at least, know yourself for a doubter, and do not hug yourself upon sharing a creed that is in reality nothing to you. Some day or other you will have to face the question seriously, and if you take the advice of one who, with a good deal of your nature and temperament, has gone through a struggle he would be glad to see you spared, the sooner this matter is settled one way or the other, the better. Half-hearted soldiers in the ranks are next door to traitors. There are some words in that Bible of which we were talking that would make the text for a sermon I often feel I should like to preach—'How long halt ye between two opinions? if the Lord be God, follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him.' Elijah in his time uttered many wise sayings; but I don't know that he ever said anything more strikingly practical and wise than that. The world would be all the better if we had a few more teachers now of his type, not afraid to face the question and drive it home upon the hearts of their hearers."

Wulfric had said his say and now lapsed into silence.

Barbara sat still for some time in deep thought, and then bid him good-night and went quietly away. He lay quietly where he was, revolving many things in his mind, and he must have fallen asleep unawares, for when he awoke the moon was waning and the chill of the early morning had stolen through the open window.

The sound that had aroused him was the opening of the front door, and as he rose and struck a light he saw that it was two hours past midnight. His limbs were cramped and stiff, and he felt desperately tired. He made his way to the door, expecting to meet Gerald on his way upstairs, for it was evidently he who was coming in so late.

But when he reached the hall, there was his brother leaning against the door, rather as if somebody had propped him up against it and he had remained where he was placed because he had not power to move. One glance was enough to tell Wulfric what was the matter—his brother was partially intoxicated.

Weary and unfit as he was for the exertion, there was nothing to be done but for him to get Gerald to bed as quickly and quietly as possible, and it was with a very heavy heart that Wulfric laid himself down at length for the few hours' rest that remained to him.

He began to feel that the burden he had taken upon himself was almost more heavy than he could well bear; and the question for which he could find no answer haunted him throughout the night.

"What was to be done about Gerald?"

HOSPITALS AND HOSPITAL WORK.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER I.—MY FIRST PATIENT.

"The end and object of the medical art is health."

TO enter fully into the wide domain of Hospitals and Hospital Work would open up matter sufficient to fill volumes. This would be a giant work indeed, but it is one which already occupies the brains of giant thinkers.

Still, comprehensive though their studies may be, little holes and corners are sure to be passed over and afford gleanings for the searchers who follow after, and thus it is I am able to offer my contributions, few indeed, but collected with my own hands, and sufficient, may be, to test the quality of the general work.

It is the ambition of all civilized countries to have good hospitals established in their midst for the amelioration of pain and sickness among their people; and perhaps there is no feature of this nineteenth century which affords more unmixed pleasure and satisfaction than the rapid growth of these institutions, and the manner in which they perform their Christ-like work.

In our own country, the fifty years' reign of our dear Queen has seen the rise and fall of many a venture; but we dare to think that the increase of hospitals, the improvement in their working power, and the number of her subjects, men and women, who have devoted their lives to labour in them, will throw a bright lustre upon her reign when looked back upon by those of the next generation; nor will the deep interest Her Majesty and the Royal Family have always taken in the work be forgotten.

Originally, Hospitals were buildings erected and endowed for the relief and reception of the poor, the aged and infirm, or they were places of shelter and entertainment for travellers and pilgrims. In early times one fourth of the Church's revenue was appropriated to the relief of the poor, and with some of this money several houses of charity were built and called Hospitals. Others were erected and endowed by private persons from motives of charity or piety, and these persons made it clear beyond doubt that sickness allied to poverty was to be an all sufficient qualification for entrance.

This probably is the reason why so strong a feeling exists against turning endowed hospitals such as Guy's, St. Thomas's, and St. Bartholomew's into paying hospitals, not because paying hospitals are not needed, but that it is clean contrary to the wishes of the founders.

Hospitals are of many kinds: some are general hospitals, in which all kinds of accidents and sickness are dealt with; while others are for the treatment of special diseases of mind and body; but of whatever class or kind they may be they are a wonderful power for good in the land, especially among the sick poor who seem to be ever on the increase.

The improvement too which has taken place in the system of nursing is not less to be welcomed than the increase of the hospitals themselves. Formerly the class of nurses employed, mostly old women, without any training, made the poor patients regard the hospitals as torture chambers. Alas! the picture of Sairah Gamp and Betsey Prig, so well portrayed in "Martin Chuzzlewit," was no fancy picture, but a description of things as they really were; while now the gentle, refined, well-trained women, who devote themselves to the work, so soothe the mind and body of the sick and suffering that they never cease to think of their compulsory rest in the hospital as of a pleasant temporary home. Their nurses they remember as friends with gratitude ever after, as testified by the little bunches of flowers, the loaf of home-made bread or roll of fresh butter which find their way to matrons, sisters, and nurses from old patients—gifts of the poor which are most touching.

Perhaps there is no work in the world so full of comfort to the doer, and so little open to harassing doubts as hospital work. In almost every other kind of labour undertaken for the relief of want and distress a certain amount of doubt as to method and results is mixed up with it; whether, for example, by indiscreet giving we may not be fostering pauperism, or by unsympathetic giving we may not be developing the evil rather than the good in the heart of the receiver. Not so in hospital work. There is a certain thing to be done at the moment, in obedience to wise directions and urgent necessities, work in which a clear head, a loving heart, and educated hand all find full occupation, and a result to be hoped for without any drawback.

Still, when you think of it, is it not something for a country to be proud of that this work, which demands the best years of useful lives, is always well supplied with workers? And surely it speaks highly for the courage of these women that they are neither appalled by the magnitude of the task nor daunted by the labour and risks which attend their ceaseless occupation among disease and suffering. It is a glorious work, and one which demands great skill and constant untiring vigilance; and, thank God! in every civilized country of the world there are such workers to be found fully ready to undertake it.

While one knows that all this is exactly as I have stated, there is yet another side to be regarded, namely, that the work is so arduous, often so offensive, that fifty per cent. of those who start as nurses break down under the burden, even in the first year.

We, who are mere visitors at the hospitals, seeing all things so neat, clean, and orderly, and the sisters looking so charming in their soft pretty dresses, and the wards decorated with fresh flowers, have little idea of the amount and character of the morning's work ere all is brought to such a condition of order and beauty.

I was very young when I gained my first experience of hospital work. It was in a celebrated hospital of a county town, and between that time and this year of 1887 I can scarcely find words to express the change that has come over the whole tone and manner of hospital work and hospital nurses. The repulsiveness of some of the old nurses was beyond description. Of course there were here and there good women, kind, motherly, gentle, but these were rare exceptions.

It was not the fashion then for gentlewomen to put themselves under training for hospital work, and it would have required more courage than I then possessed to have proposed myself for such a post. I was only a girl, without any knowledge of nursing, except what I had gained in my own home, which, alas! was very extensive. I was in sorrow, and wanted to spend some of my time in ministering to the sick and suffering, if only for an hour or two in the course of the twenty-four.

This I was permitted to do through the kindness of the physician and house surgeon, who, as a preliminary step, took me with them through the wards. They had an idea that what I should see would take away my courage, but they were mistaken.

My first sensations on entering the abode of suffering I well remember. The feeling of wonder at the composure of the porter—the apparent indifference of the young medical students. My introduction to the dispensing laboratory, familiarly termed the shop, I pass over, together with the arrangement of the wards, the nature of the cases, or the remarks they elicited, till we came to Ward No. 4.

Before entering I was informed that it was the apartment to which male patients were carried after serious operations, and, as I entered, I saw at once that it was neater and better supplied with appliances for ease and comfort than any I had as yet passed through.

I should like to tell you what I saw, for the picture has never left my mind. I have never mentioned my experience in this hospital; and if I do so now it is more to show the kind of nurses and matrons who occupied these posts nearly forty years ago than to speak of myself.

The first object I encountered in Ward 4 at once riveted my attention and exercised over me a kind of fascination, so that look which way I would it was always before me. This object was a strange, wild-looking being at the corner of the ward nearly opposite the door. He was leaning upon his elbow, reading with gesticulation out of a well-thumbed discoloured hymn book. By his side lay a few religious tracts, and a well-worn Bible, with several strips of yarn, and here and there a piece of coarse paper put between the leaves to direct him to some favourite passages.

He held his hymn book much in the style of a man about to deliver from it a verse or text for public exhortation; his thumb was placed between the open pages and his fingers supported it at the back.

It was impossible not to notice his hand. It was more like the claw of a famished bird than a human hand, so hard, so thin, so yellow, so horny was it.

The man was a weaver, and had evidently been a great sufferer in the sudden and extreme distress which had of late fallen upon his trade. Three days previously he had undergone amputation for white swelling of the knee. He was a poor emaciated creature, with eyes wild and glistening like those of a wild beast; his lank, grizzled hair fell straight down his cheeks, which were so lean and hollow that between them and the hair you could have put a couple of fingers.

As I stood gazing at him, he lifted up his eyes from the book, and with a peculiar twang he said, or rather chanted:

> "To regal honours raised our heads
> And made us priests to God."

Shutting the book with both hands and pressing them on its cover he looked up into my eyes with an expression that I was too inexperienced to interpret. There was something of pride or triumph in his face, a something which was so at variance with the forlorn condition of his starved and mutilated frame, that it struck me with awe; the desire to smile or to pity seemed to have been stepped over and left far behind.

His condition was evidently unsatisfactory, and from some expression on the face of the house surgeon, the weaver gathered as much, for he said as we were leaving his bed, "I know what you see, sir, and you are right; my web is wove, my thread is spun," and touching his hymn book, he added in an emphatic whisper, "The combat's o'er, the prize is won."

"Don't alarm yourself, my good fellow, many's the web you'll weave yet," was the doctor's answer, as he turned to quit the ward.

I lingered a moment to see what effect these words would have upon the weaver, and was not altogether surprised to see a scornful smile playing about his mouth, but catching my glance, he calmly resumed his book.

The remembrance of this man haunted me, and I wanted so much to help and comfort him, though in what way I could do so I did not know. I did not like the look of the nurses in this ward. They were fat, heavy, sleepy, self-indulgent looking women, and I asked if I might take an hour or two of the night watch. Having gained permission, I returned to the hospital about ten o'clock, and was waiting for the doctor to take me to the ward, when we heard the hurried footfall of a nurse pattering along the corridor—she entered out of breath, as much from fright as haste, I thought.

"How now, nurse?" said the doctor.

"If you please, sir, would you come to the crippled weaver, he's bin a wanderin' off and on all day enough to scare a body, but he's a goin' now, sir, he's quite insensible."

"I will go with you instantly," was the rejoinder.

"Could you, sir, just give me a drop o' the tincter of rhubub and a little sperrit in it to comfort me, for I am that faint and frightened I'm ready to sink, I am?" This was evidently no unusual request from these women, at all events hers was complied with.

We all three went to the ward, where we found the man sitting up and singing in a sing-song tone a hymn of which I caught two lines only:

> "This heavenly calm within the breast
> Is the dear pledge of glorious rest."

The old nurse was evidently afraid of the poor man, strange as it may appear; and certainly she was superstitiously alarmed at the sudden improvement.

After a very short interval he sank back into a state of torpor. I gave him, by the doctor's orders, a few drops of wine, and, as he swallowed them with effort, he exclaimed feebly, "Warmth for a cold heart."

"Ah!" whispered nurse in my ear, "though he is light o' the head he knows what does him good."

And as I gave yet more drops of the wine he added: "Thy love is better than wine."

"Poor man!" said nurse again, "his head's a-wandering after his wife as has been dead nigh two years."

He was evidently coming to himself, and after a few moments sat bolt upright. He took up the book, but I am sure he did not read, although he repeated:

> "Come to thy throne, the Monarch cries;
> I hear, and pleased obey."

As the poor weaver caught sight of the doctor, he looked upon him distressfully, and turning away his glassy eyes he said with a mournfulness most touching:

> "My Saviour doth not yet appear,
> He hides the brightness of His face."

He seemed to find expression for his every thought in snatches of hymns. I heard a clergyman say once that hymns are portable religion, and I could not help thinking it was true, as I listened to this poor dying man.

The doctor felt the pulse, and, giving me some few directions, left the ward.

The position was solemnising and sufficiently sombre to sober any one. Yet was I glad to have been trusted, and specially glad that that rough uneducated woman who sat snoring a short distance off should not wait upon him.

It was very distressing to witness the expression on the weaver's face for some time. To all appearance he was unconscious, and I did not expect to hear him speak articulately again. In less than an hour, however, he turned his face towards the side of the bed at which I was sitting and looked at me with those large, glaring eyes, though I do not think he saw me and in broken but quite audible tones, he repeated :—

"Although the vine its fruit deny,
Although the olive yield no oil,
The withering fig-tree droop and die,
The field elude the tiller's toil . . .
Yet will I triumph in the Lord,
The God of my salvation praise."

After the expression of this holy confidence he seemed to lay perfectly unconscious until the early dawn, when he said faintly and with intense sadness, "'Tis dark, I shall not see Him."

And so ended my watch and first hospital experience, and I could not help saying as I looked at him, "Surely there are first that shall be last, and last that shall be first."

MUNKACSY'S "MILTON."

MICHAEL MUNKACSY is a native of Hungary. His pictures must be regarded with keener sympathy wherever the circumstances of his life are known. When scarcely four years old he lost his father, who had taken part in the Hungarian Revolution of 1848, and died in prison; his mother had not long outlived his birth. An aunt took the boy into her care, but one evening robbers entered the house, killed her and carried off everything of value; the child being left alone with the corpse in the house. Then his uncle, a lawyer, who had been ruined by the revolution, came to his rescue, but being too poor to give him a proper education, apprenticed him to a joiner. In due time the lad set up as independent journeyman, and began to employ all his spare time in the pursuit of knowledge. A violent fever unfitted him for work. His uncle, who was now in better circumstances, took him to his house in Gyula; and while recruiting there, Munkacsy met an artist who had come on a visit to paint portraits. He had always had a strong poetical feeling, and admiration for beauty and truth; but now a new world opened to him. He implored to be allowed to take lessons in painting, and followed his new art with such success that he was at last allowed to devote himself wholly to it. While pursuing his studies, he painted occasionally small pictures which he sold at low prices. His subjects he took from the peasant classes. He visited Pesth, Vienna, and Munich. In 1870 he exhibited in the Paris Salon a picture on which he had bestowed much pains—"The Last Day of a Condemned." It was the first that attracted attention to his name.[1] Other paintings followed. It was the picture of "Milton Dictating 'Paradise Lost' to his Daughters," exhibited at the Paris Exhibition of 1878, which proved the first step on the way to European fame. The picture has thus an interest of its own apart from its subject. He afterwards essayed a loftier range in his painting of "Christ before Pilate," and again in his well-known work of "Calvary," both of which drew sympathetic crowds to see them. In his painting of "The Last Moments of Mozart," the last exhibited, he has returned to earlier themes, and brings us once more into the company of Genius under the eclipsing clouds that so often attend upon it.

The Milton picture with which we are now concerned, represents rather a tradition than a fact. It has a grace and tenderness which did not belong to the poet's home. But it presents an attractive ideal of the kind dear to English hearts; and if not precisely an historical example, still pleasantly illustrates those harmonies of affection in which youth lends to age and helplessness a ready service, and every member of the household brings some element of sympathy to help build up its happy life.

Though the "Paradise Lost" was the production of Milton's later years, it was the fruit of purposes cherished in early manhood. The story of its inception is a familiar passage in English literature, but it is one full of instruction to every generation. No small part of the excellence of the poem is due to the noble purpose of the life by which it was informed. "He who would aspire to write well hereafter," Milton once wrote, "ought himself to be a true poem —that is, a composition and a pattern of the best and honourablest things—not presuming to sing high praises of high men and famous cities, unless he have in himself the experience and the practice of all that is praiseworthy." It may be that Milton's self-discipline would not have sufficed to enable him to realise this high ideal, and that the blindness that fell upon him was necessary to fit him fully for his task. We hear him say—

"So much the rather thou, Celestial Light,
Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
Irradiate."

But the harshest critic of the blind Titan's

MILTON DICTATING "PARADISE LOST" TO HIS DAUGHTERS. [Michael Munkacsy.

infirmities and mistakes cannot deny a certain harmony between the nobleness of the poem and the temper of his life.

The subjects to which he was naturally drawn are indicated in other sentences from one of his controversial works: "These abilities," he says, that is, these poetic powers, "are the inspired gift of God, rarely bestowed, yet to serve in every nation, and are of power, beside the office of a pulpit, to imbreed and cherish in a great people the seeds of virtue and public civility; to allay the perturbations of the mind, and set the affections in right tune; to celebrate in glorious and lofty hymns the throne and equipage of God's almightiness, and what He works, and what He suffers to be wrought, with high Providence in His church; to sing victorious agonies of martyrs and saints, the deeds and triumphs of just and pious nations, doing valiantly through faith, against the enemies of Christ; to deplore the general relapses of kingdoms and states from justice and God's true worship; lastly, whatsoever in religion is holy and sublime, in virtue amiable or grave—whatsoever hath passion or admiration in all the changes of that which is called fortune from without, or the wily subtleties, or refluxes of man's thought from within—all these things, with a solid and treatable smoothness, to paint out and describe; teaching over the whole book of sanctity and virtue, through all the instances of example, with such delight to those especially of soft and delicious temper, who will not so much as look upon Truth herself unless they see her elegantly dressed—that, whereas the paths of honesty and good life now appear rugged and difficult, though they be indeed easy and pleasant, they will then appear to all men both easy and pleasant, though they were rugged and difficult indeed." Such was his glowing conception of the sphere of poetry—a sphere, however, which none but the Hebrew prophets have ever truly filled, and remote from the more mundane aims of even the greatest writers.

This was his view when he wrote in 1641, "The Reason of Church Government." It is there also that he speaks of the hope of even earlier years that he "might perhaps leave something so written to after times, as they would not willingly let it die." And in another passage he pledges himself that the design, though postponed, shall not be abandoned: "Neither do I think it shame to covenant with any knowing reader, that for some few years yet I may go on trust with him towards the payment of that I am now indebted, as being a work not to be raised from the heat of youth or the vapours of wine, like that which flows at waste from the pen of some vulgar amorist, or the trencher fury of a riming parasite, nor to be obtained by the invocation of Dame Memory and her siren daughters, but by devout prayer to that Eternal Spirit who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and send out His Seraphim with the hallowed fire of His altar to touch and purify the lips of whom He pleases. To this must be added industrious and select reading, steady observation, insight into all seemly and generous arts and affairs, till which in some measure be compassed, at mine own peril and cost I refuse not to sustain this expectation from as many as are not loth to hazard so much credulity upon the best pledges that I can give them."

Seventeen years elapsed before the work thus foreshadowed began to assume form; but never was more fitting prelude penned to any undertaking. Troubles, personal and public, were yet to temper his experience, but they did not shake his purpose.

There is a list in Milton's own handwriting, made about this time and still remaining, in which he has set down one hundred subjects capable of treatment. "Paradise Lost" is the first. The Arthurian story is another, and it is curious to speculate how different the form its legends might have assumed under his genius to the now familiar "Idylls" of the Poet Laureate, —more sombre and majestic possibly, but it may be more remote from human sympathies.

The greater interest of "Paradise Lost" is evidenced in the fact that four drafts remain of that subject as it then presented itself to him. They are all brief and all point to a drama. The first consists only of dramatis personæ, as follows:—

> "The Persons: Michael; Heavenly Love; Chorus of Angels; Lucifer; Adam, Eve, with the Serpent; Conscience; Death; Labour, Sickness, Discontent, Ignorance, with others, Mutes; Faith, Hope, Charity."

There is in the other drafts a clear suggestion of the plot finally adopted. It is interesting also to note that those famous lines (ten of them) in which Satan addresses the sun (Paradise Lost, Book iv.)—

> "Oh thou that, with surpassing glory crowned,
> Look'st from thy sole dominion like the God
> Of this new world,"—

were written within a short time of the passages just quoted on the vocation of a poet. They link the troubled years in one great purpose.

It therefore appears that the "Paradise Lost," though composed after Milton was fifty, was planned when he was thirty-two; and it has been said, "the opposite virtues of two distinct periods of mental development were thus combined to produce it; the daring imagination and fresh emotional play of early manhood, with the exercised judgment and chastened taste of ripened years."[1] It was commenced when Milton was still in official attendance on Cromwell as his Latin Secretary. When the Restoration of 1660 compelled him to hide, he was already in continuous work upon it. Five or six years were occupied in the composition and revision of the poem. The places in which he lived during this period have been traced by his assiduous biographer, Dr. David Masson, who has left no detail of the poet's life without investigation. They were, "first, Petty France (now York Street) Westminster, till within a few weeks of the Restoration; then, a house in Holborn, near Red Lion Fields, whither he removed as soon as it was safe for him to do so; and, finally from 1661 onwards, in Jewin Street, close to that part of Aldersgate Street where he had had his house some eighteen or nineteen years before, when 'Paradise Lost' first occurred to his thoughts." It is probable, however, that though Milton may have had the poem in some sense complete before he left Jewin Street, the revision was undertaken after he had removed to the house in Artillery Walk, Bunhill Fields, which was the last of his many London residences, and the place where he died. During the Great Plague, he took refuge in a cottage at Chalfont, St. Giles, in Buckinghamshire, and we find him while there showing the finished manuscript to Ellwood, the young Quaker who used to read Latin to him in London, asking him to take it home, read it at leisure, and then give his judgment upon it. The poem was not published till 1667, when Milton was in the fifty-ninth year of his age, and in the fifteenth or sixteenth of his total blindness.[1]

The circumstances under which he lost his sight are an illustration of the patriotic spirit too rare, which places public duty before personal considerations. Charles II., who was then residing at the Hague, had commissioned Salmasius, a professor at the neighbouring university of Leyden, reputed the first scholar in Europe, to prepare a defence of the royal cause. The Defensio Regia pro Carolo I. which he produced was an attack on the Commonwealth which attracted universal attention. The Council of State requested Milton to reply. He had already lost one eye, and was warned by his physician that if he attempted this task, he must lose the other, but he sat down to it. And he achieved it—Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio—though the result was this total blindness.

The controversy was one which did not reflect great honour on either side; fierce and cumbrous personalities obscured the real issues. Milton himself was at fault in his weapons, but his devotion to what he deemed his country's cause was beyond question. This milder age—measuring the man by the poems afterwards written—can scarcely read without a shudder the brutal words with which his enemies assailed him. They boasted now that his affliction was a retribution for the transgressions of his pen. There is a passage in the preface to his "Second Defence of the People of England," in which he tells us that he would not have listened to the physician, not if Esculapius himself had spoken from his sanctuary; that so far from being depressed by the sense of the divine displeasure, he realises solace and strength from above in doing the will of God. Then, turning on his antagonist—falsely assumed to be one Morus—with true Miltonic dignity, he says: "But, if the choice were necessary, sir, I would prefer my blindness to yours. Yours is a cloud spread over the mind, which darkens both the light of reason and of conscience; mine keeps from my view only the coloured surfaces of things, while it leaves me at liberty to contemplate the beauty and stability of virtue and of truth . . . There is, as the Apostle has remarked, a way to strength through weakness. Let me then be the most feeble creature alive, as long as that feebleness serves to invigorate the energies of my rational and immortal spirit—as long as, in that obscurity in which I am enveloped, the light of the divine presence more clearly shines—then, in proportion as I am weak, I shall be invincibly strong; and in proportion as I am blind, I shall more clearly see. Oh that I may thus be perfected by feebleness, and irradiated by obscurity!" Beautiful is the thought which gleams in another clause, that blindness may be but "the overshadowing of heavenly wings." It is lamentable that words like these should be lost in the harsh discords of a hateful controversy.

Nowhere in the world's literature has blindness been pictured with such pathetic power as by Milton in that Invocation to Holy Light ("Paradise Lost," Book iii.), from which we have already quoted.

> "Thus with the year
> Seasons return; but not to me returns
> Day, or the sweet approach of even or morn,
> Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
> Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
> But cloud instead and ever-during dark
> Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
> Cut off, and, for the book of knowledge fair,
> Presented with a universal blank
> Of Nature's works, to me expunged and rased,
> And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out."

Gray ranks Milton with Shakespeare in his Ode on "The Progress of Poesy," but by the side of this Invocation, his glowing fancy is a tame conceit:

> "Nor second he, that rode sublime
> Upon the seraph-wings of Ecstasy
> The secrets of the abyss to spy.
> He pass'd the flaming bounds of Place and Time;
> The living Throne, the sapphire-blaze,
> Where angels tremble while they gaze,
> He saw; but blasted with excess of light
> Closed his eyes in endless Night."

And yet it is true that there was an intimate connection between the poem and the blindness. Certainly there are few more conspicuous instances of a great calamity being overruled to richer fruitfulness of mind and life.

During the years occupied in the composition of "Paradise Lost," Milton was a widower. Three daughters were left him from his first marriage, the rash alliance with Mary Powell which brought so much unhappiness. At the time when the poem was begun, as Professor Masson points out, "the eldest daughter Anne was but twelve years of age; the second, Mary, but ten; and the youngest, Deborah, but six; and as when the poem was finished their ages were about eighteen, sixteen, and twelve, respectively, their services as readers during its composition could have been but partial." Moreover the eldest could not write, and she had an impediment in her speech. As they grew older the other two might have become as right and left hand to him, but they appear to have had no sympathy in his pursuits, and no great affection for one who lived in a world so remote from theirs—no such reverence, alas, as Munkacsy suggests. These girls, it should be remembered, like their father, "had fallen on evil times." It should be borne in mind, also, that there were other formidable works beside the "Paradise Lost" in progress, and presently other poems to be dictated. He trained them to read aloud in five or six languages, of which they understood not a word; and though at length they rebelled against so uninteresting an occupation, the fact that they did so is proof that to some extent he depended on their help. But there were grave disagreements in the home, and grave complaints, ending after the lapse of years in the daughters being sent out to learn embroidery in gold or silver, as a means of obtaining their livelihood. Milton's second wife, to whom he was wedded in 1656, had survived her marriage little more than a year. He married once more about the time when he was finishing the first draft of the great poem. Professor Masson's conclusion, from a survey of all the facts, is that Milton "dictated the poem in small portions at a time, chiefly within doors, and more in winter than in summer, to any one that chanced to be about him. Sometimes it may have been one of his daughters; sometimes, latterly, when the poem was nearly complete, it may have been his third wife; frequently it may have been one of the friends or youths who statedly read to him." We fear, therefore, that the pleasant ideal of the Hungarian painter has but a slender basis in actual fact.

Some glimpses of the poet's methods of composition are afforded by contemporaries. In early years he had known the inspiration that comes with the spring, when the pulse of life beats quicker; but when engaged in "Paradise Lost," he told a friend that "his vein never flowed happily but from the autumnal equinox to the vernal." Sometimes he would compose or prune his verses in the garden, where he would walk for three or four hours at a time. Night was a favourite time for meditation. His verse came then in swift and marshalled numbers; yet at other times he would lie awake the whole night without achieving a single line. What he composed in these silent hours he dictated in the day, "sitting obliquely in an elbow chair, with his leg thrown over the arm."

His mode of life after he became blind has been minutely described. In summer he rose at four, in winter at five; and began the day with having the Hebrew Scriptures read to him. "Then he contemplated." The morning was given to studies, with the aid of reader or amanuensis. Afterwards he took exercise, "either walking in the garden or swinging in a machine." His only recreation, besides conversation, was music. Then he went up to his study to be read to till six. After that his friends visited him, and at nine he retired to rest.

The house in Bunhill Row where he lived for nearly twelve years, and where he died, has disappeared. It was at the door of this house, sitting in the sun, looking out upon the Artillery-ground, that he would receive visitors—as Mr. Boughton has pictured him in the painting he exhibited at the Royal Academy. One admirer tells how he found him there, sitting "before his door in a grey coat of coarse cloth, in warm, sultry weather, to enjoy the fresh air." Thither doubtless came Andrew Marvell and Cyriac Skinner, and the young Ellwood, and those foreigners unknown to English fame who sought him out; but it is a remarkable fact that both circumstances and sympathies separated him from many of the greater minds of that age. How different, for example, the circle of his friendships from that of Samuel Johnson, who a century later filled the place of honour as "man of letters" in London. There is pathos as well as nobility in Wordsworth's line—

"His soul was like a star, and dwelt apart."

It is, indeed, a pathetic picture of old age which the "ancient clergyman of Dorsetshire" paints, who describes John Milton as he found him—"in a small chamber (of this same house), hung with rusty green, sitting in an elbow chair, and dressed neatly in black, pale, but not cadaverous, his hands and fingers gouty and with chalk-stones."

The "Paradise Lost" is not only one of the beacon-marks of English genius, it is a monument of human faculty as put forth in adversity. Milton himself did not forget Blind Homer:—

"Those other two equalled with me in fate,
So were I equalled with them in renown,
Blind Thamyris, and blind Mæonides,
And Tiresias and Phineus, prophets old."

Every such achievement teaches courage and endurance to lesser men. The "Paradise Regained," and "Samson Agonistes" were also products of these darkened years. Nor must we overlook the Sonnet on his Blindness, which points the moral with immortal words:—

"God doth not need
Either man's work or his own gifts. Who best
Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best. His state
Is kingly: thousands at his bidding speed,
And post o'er land and ocean without rest;
They also serve who only stand and wait."

"My Bonnie Mother."

I STOOD before my shabby looking-glass
Brushing my hair—'twas growing thin and grey—
When in there bounced my rosy little lass—
"My bonnie mother!" Loyal lips were they
And truthful, though the words were most untrue;
For not a single beauty-curve or line
Is mine, alas! But Love, Heaven's artist, drew
My portrait, and his colours made it shine.

Then thought I—Oh, how often of my neighbours
Do I speak harshly!—"This one is unjust,
And that one crafty: this one only labours
For selfish ends, that one no man can trust."

If I could only look through Love's warm eyes,
All might be fair and dear; and I—not quite so wise.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

DIFFICULT OR MISUNDERSTOOD TEXTS.

The Hours of the Day, as reckoned in St. John's Gospel.

Question (page 63).—"It was about the tenth hour." John i. 39. How are the hours computed in St. John's Gospel? See iv. 6; xix. 14.

THE question on this subject derives its importance from a seeming discrepancy between the Fourth Gospel and the rest, in the narrative of our Lord's trial and condemnation before Pilate (ch. xix. 13). After conference with Jesus, we read, Pilate "sat down in the judgment-seat; and it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour." But in the Synoptic Gospels we find that, at "the sixth hour" of the same day Jesus was hanging on the cross (Matt. xxvii. 45; Mark xv. 33; Luke xxiii. 44). There can be no doubt that in the three last-mentioned passages the sixth hour was the hour of noon, particular attention being drawn to it on account of the miraculous darkness. From St. Mark, again, we learn that the time of the actual crucifixion was "the third hour" (xv. 25). At noon, therefore, our Lord had been three hours upon the cross.

Various suppositions have been offered with a view to relieve the difficulty. The readiest, and at the same time the boldest, is to suppose that "sixth" in St. John is a transcriber's mistake. It can hardly be for "third," as some ancient writers suggest, as some time must have elapsed between Pilate's ascending the judgment-seat and the nailing of Jesus to the cross. But no other various reading has ever been proposed; and the immense and decisive preponderance of evidence is for "sixth."

An ingenious solution has been offered by Professor J. H. Godwin, in the 'Contemporary Review,' vol. xix. p. 374. From the phrase "about[1] the sixth hour," which might also be rendered "as it were the sixth hour," the Professor remarks that the note of time is not absolute, but simply marks the termination of the court's sitting. In general the courts sat from the third hour (9 A.M.) until noon, and "the sixth hour" thus became a technical phrase to denote the conclusion of proceedings. On this particular day—"the Preparation of the Passover"—the proceedings were hastened, the court sitting three hours earlier than usual; the dawn had been taken as the third hour, and therefore the third hour was as the sixth. This is ingenious, but supposes both a usage of the courts and a form of speech of which there is elsewhere no evidence. Certainly no reader of St. John alone could possibly have supposed that "sixth" was an enigmatic expression for "third." Even then, as we have shown, the third would not meet the conditions of the case.

[1] The Greek is ὡς or ὡσεί; according to the reading adopted.

We fall back, then, on an old explanation, which has been indeed discredited by many recent critics, but which, we are glad to see, has now the high authority of Dr. Westcott in its favour, that St. John adopted a different computation of time from that of the other evangelists. In the Synoptics, we all know, the hours were reckoned from sunrise to sunset; but the Romans reckoned their civil day as we do, from midnight to noon and from noon to midnight. If St. John at Ephesus followed this method, all is clear. The sixth hour, then, when Pilate "sat down in the judgment-seat," was the sixth after midnight, or the hour of sunrise. The enemies of Jesus had occupied the whole of the previous night in their eager proceedings before Annas, Caiaphas, and Pilate. "It was early" (John xviii. 28)—in fact, (as we say), "the small hours of the night," when the Roman governor first went out to parley with them. Then "he entered into the judgment-hall again," and examined Jesus in the absence of the Jews, who had not yet eaten the passover.[1] Again he went out to the Jews for a second ineffectual conference. Returning, almost desperate in his bewilderment, with the popular mandate to release Barabbas, he ordered Jesus to be scourged, and gave Him up to the insults of the soldiers. Then again he went out to the Jews, leading forth Jesus, and uttering his pathetic and memorable Ecce Homo. Another scene followed, of miserable indecision on the judge's part, of sublime endurance on that of the Son of Man. Meantime the dawn was breaking over Jerusalem; and, as the sun rose, Pilate ended all by ascending the tribunal, and, after yet another fruitless appeal to the multitude, pronouncing sentence and delivering Jesus to their will. Three hours after Pilate had finally taken his seat as judge, the preparations for the sacrifice were complete, and Jesus was crucified.

This brief outline of events harmonises all four evangelists, and without any hypothesis of corrupt text or abnormal mode of expression, requires only the supposition that with St. John, as with the Romans and with ourselves, the sixth hour was the hour of sunrise—at that period of the year about six o'clock in the morning.

But what of the other passages in which notes of time are given in the Fourth Gospel? These are three in all, and the explanation we have given will be seen to suit them well.

1. The two disciples (Andrew, and probably John), pointed by John the Baptist to the "Lamb of God," followed Him with eager interest, and received from Him a welcome to His abode. It is added, they "abode with Him that day; it was about the tenth hour" (i. 39).

[1] This clause may be thought to require explanation. At present we are content to refer again to xviii. 28. However this may be understood, the main point here is unaffected.

The passage seems at least to indicate a day spent with Jesus, rather than an hour or two in the evening. True, the margin of the Authorised Version says, "this was two hours before night"; but this of course is not decisive. Ten hours after midnight, or, as we should say, 10 A.M., would, to say the least, suit the narrative quite as well.

2. Jesus being wearied with His journey from Judæa into Samaria "sat thus on the well: it was about the sixth hour" (iv. 6). This has generally been supposed without question to have been the hour of noon.[1] But quite apart from our preceding remarks, it will be seen, we think, that another explanation is more reasonable. "His disciples were gone away into the city to buy food"—which they were certainly more likely to do at the end of the day's journey than at midday. And more especially; "there cometh a woman of Samaria to draw water," pre-eminently the housewife's evening task (see Genesis xxiv. 11). With some confidence, then, we interpret the sixth hour here again as meaning six o'clock—only in this case 6 P.M. as in the other it was 6 A.M. The time of sunset and that of sunrise are in fact expressed in St. John by the same phrase.

3. The third instance is that of the nobleman of Capernaum. He appealed to Jesus, who was then at Cana, "at the seventh hour;" and at the same hour, as he was told on the morrow, his son was cured. Was this hour 1 P.M., according to the ordinary view, or 7 P.M., as we would suggest? Assuredly the latter would best suit some of the conditions of the case. For Jesus was barely twenty miles from the nobleman's house; the man was anxious and distressed: had the interview with Christ taken place but an hour after noon there would have been ample time for the father to return before evening. It is almost inconceivable that he should have waited until the next day. Alford, who adopts the ordinary view, confesses that the nobleman was "leisurely." Archdeacon Farrar sees in his remaining till the morrow "the calmness of faith." We submit that at any rate it is more natural to suppose that the father returned as soon as he could, it having been already an hour after sunset when he met with Jesus at Cana, so that he had to wait until the next morning before starting for Capernaum.

The conclusions here maintained are supported not only by Canon Westcott ('Speaker's Commentary,' St. John, p. 282), but by Meyer, Wieseler, and Tischendorf. Among older writers they are held by Le Clerc and Townson. Mr. Mc Lellan, in his elaborate work 'On the Four Gospels' shows with great success, as against Archdeacon Farrar and others, that the computation of time from midnight and noon was according to Roman usage, and was moreover known in Asia Minor.

The languid hour of noon."

THE SWEDISH KING'S PAGE.

CHAPTER II.

THINGS came to a crisis in the town of Derpt before either Sigismund or Gustavus had expected. News came that an army from the Danube was advancing to the help of the Poles. Gustavus knew that he must strike his blow at once; the enemy was already nearly double his strength: the coming reinforcements would render an attack hopeless.

So again the generals met in the old house which the Baron Goertz had relinquished with so ill a grace: again maps and plans were spread, and the details of the advance planned out.

"If only we were sure of forcing the western bridge," said the king earnestly. "But they will be as anxious to keep it as we are to gain it. De la Gardie, is it worth the price which we must pay?"

"Sire, it is the key of the position."

"Then, if my Swedes can do it, it will be ours," Gustavus said.

The next day's sun had scarcely broken the mists of the dawning when the sombre wreaths of cannon-smoke rose in thick clouds into the air. The hoarse voice of the demon of war echoed around and throughout Derpt; that terrible voice which once heard is never to be forgotten.

Karl and his brothers had watched the troops getting under arms; they had run up to the old chateau to see the officers of the staff mount their chargers. And there, first and foremost in the gay glittering crowd, they saw the king.

Martin recognised him at once. His face flushed scarlet as he seized his brother's arm.

"Alexis! look, the man we talked to! See, it is the king!"

Yes, it was the king, and, as he rode by, followed by his generals in their brave array, he, too, recognised the lads.

"Aha!" he called out to them, "you will help the cause of liberty one day, will you not?"

The boys stood as if spell-bound, as the train swept by.

"Oh, Karl," sighed Alexis, "how can we help? I wish we were ten years older!" and the lad struck his empty hands together with a gesture of eagerness. The gallant sight had set his young blood tingling in his veins.

But sights of horror unutterable succeeded this brief show. As the day wore on, the battle had grown fierce in the fields down there by the Dana river. Presently they began to bring the wounded back into the town.

Everybody did what they could. Even little Ernst could help the women carry cups of cold water to the lips parched with the fever-thirst of pain.

Alexis was silent now. He was thinking about King Gustavus.

Presently a youth on a powerful horse dashed up the road. A sword-cut on his arm was bleeding profusely.

"Bind this up for me!" The words came in breathless gasps. Alexis sprang forward to render what help he could.

"Quick! anything will do!" cried Torstenson, for it was he. "I shall have worse wounds than this before the day is done. We are going to force the west bridge."

He spoke under strong excitement, hurriedly attempting to knot the bandage with his teeth. Alexis tore a handkerchief across to serve as a sling for the injured arm. He stopped in his task and looked eagerly at Torstenson.

"Why the west bridge? Cross the river here: why not? The drought has lowered the water so that Karl and I waded across only yesterday; down there, below our garden wall."

"You waded? You are sure?"

"I am sure."

The page looked keenly at him.

"I will trust you!" he said. "You shall show us this fording-place."

He spurred on to De la Gardie who was holding his cavalry in reserve behind the hill. "I bring orders," he said.

The order he gave was to advance instantly: not on the bridge, but to cross the river at the shallows and throw the cavalry immediately on Sigismund's right. "We gain miles of distance, and the place is wholly undefended," added Torstenson.

Little did De la Gardie imagine as he dashed with his men into the Duna water that the ford had been pointed out by the small lad who rode behind the king's page, that Gustavus himself knew nothing of the possibility of crossing the river here; that young Torstenson had taken on his own shoulders the responsibility of the whole change of plan. It was well he did not guess it: it was well that he obeyed unquestioningly.

There was not a moment to be lost.

The Swedes were losing heavily. The king himself had led the royal guard to the front. Sigismund with his superior numbers was pressing on them fiercely.

De la Gardie's fresh troops, dripping with the water that had reached their saddle girths, swept up the bank like a whirlwind, swept up through the gory corn-fields, and over the low range of hills straight to the succour of their king.

And far out to the westward Sigismund's veterans were guarding the bridge, the further bridge—whereby not one single Swede sought to cross the river that day.

That cavalry charge decided the fate of the battle. The Imperial army, beaten and disheartened, fell back. The "Cause" was yet again successful.

Late that night Gustavus sat down to the hard fare that he shared with his soldiers. Torstenson, though wounded, and weary almost to the death, stood as his duty was behind his chair.

Suddenly the king turned.

"Leonard!" he cried, "who gave orders to the dragoons to ford the river?"

"I did, sire." His pale cheek could grow no paler, but his voice sank and quavered in the access of his fear. "The bridge would have been a hard struggle: the shallows were undefended, unsuspected, and so—and so I ventured."

He tottered as he stood, and reached blindly out as if for support.

Gustavus sprang to his feet: with his own hands he seated him at the table and brought him food and wine.

"You saved the army," he said. "You have saved the Cause. I am not sure about the strict discipline. But how came you to know of the shallows?"

Then Torstenson told how Alexis had guided him; Alexis, the boy to whom the king had spoken on the hill-slopes beyond the chateau grounds.

"I know! I know!" Gustavus cried. "A bold, fine lad, he and his brother. Bring them here that they may see that the Swedes can be grateful."

The fire of heaped pine-boughs cast strong red lights across the great hall as the Baron Goertz walked slowly up the floor. He had chosen to come himself with his sons in obedience to the king's message. He doffed his cap and bowed low, but his heart was full of bitterness. It was the first time he had entered his own house for weeks.

Behind him came the boys. Karl with the shadow of his father's gloom on his brow; Alexis all quivering with excitement: Martin quiet and calm as ever, and baby Ernst bringing up the rear.

Gustavus beckoned to Alexis. "Come hither," he said, "you have done us good service to-day."

Then he looked at the Baron.

"We are worn out, my men and I," he went on, "and there are gaps in our ranks, and death and suffering are busy amongst us—ah, yes. But I would not let the day wear by without thanking this lad of yours. My page, Leonard Torstenson is promoted. Will this lad come to take his place?"

Bewildered, Alexis sank on his knee. "Oh father, let me!" he cried, "Do let me serve the king!"

Even the hard face of the Baron Goertz melted and softened. "Sire," he said, "the Poles have used me ill; the Swedes have wronged me. But this moment repays for all. The lad is but a child. Train him to be generous and good—he will be safe under the charge of Gustavus."

"I will train him to serve my Master," was the king's reply. "I will teach him, as far as in me lies, that to do God's work is the highest work; that we are all but simple instruments in His hands, and that great is our honour when He uses us in the cause of the liberty of His truth."

Years afterwards, when Alexis had become a man, and Torstenson, no more a youth, led the Swedes to battle, those words were well remembered. The soldier-king fell on the field of Lutzen, called away from the cruelty and horror of earthly warfare to the home of the peace of God. The cause he had fought for was won. And the open Bible was left a legacy from the stormy times through which he toiled.

"He bade us do his Master's will," Torstenson repeated in a voice broken with his grief. "Alexis, he puzzled you that day, long ago, on the Duna river when he spoke about serving his Lord. He knew then, what you and I are only finding out by slow degrees, that God's work is done in fighting against other than earthly armies. Gustavus won greater battles by Christ's grace than any of those of which the fame rings throughout the kingdoms."

Alexis smiled. "I'm only a soldier young and rough," he said, "but that I have learned; and it is not the things which we reckon the best which really are worthiest. I have never served the king so well again as I did when I, a heedless boy unwitting what I did, led you down to the shallows beyond our garden wall: We are just 'instruments,' as he said. But I am right glad that you turned that day to prove to my brothers and to me that the Swedes were not all 'thieves and heretics!'"

Torstenson did not answer. He was thinking of some words written in a Book which was being read throughout the length and breadth of the land—some words which he afterwards found and showed to Alexis: "Ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VI.

Where did a king beside an altar stand
And God dried up his sacrilegious hand?
Where did the cedars grow that Hiram sent?
Village to which two sad disciples went?
The mount where Moses fasted forty days?
Who in the night with Paul sang songs of praise?
Father of one who did two strangers bring Home to his house, anointing one as king?
Where was a prophet with his servant found
With heavenly steeds of fire encompassed round?
What son of David said "I will be king"?
Who in a window tied a scarlet string?
Whose sons both fell on one disastrous day
When heathen warriors took the ark away?
Where was he born whom Ananias healed?
Where first to Moses was the Lord revealed?
Where did Diana's heathen temple stand?
Who from mount Pisgah viewed the promised land?
Who for his master's son obtained a wife?
Who asked the Lord to take away his life?
Father of one whom music soothed to rest
And charmed the evil spirit from his breast?

THE SUNDAY ALBUM.

NO. II.—NEST.—p. 142.

THE wonderful nests of birds, so secure, so warm, so beautifully made, have often been figuratively referred to in God's word as well as literally made mention of.

Balaam said of the Kenites, as he "looked on" their city, "thou puttest thy nest in a rock." Numb. xxiv. 21. Jeremiah says: "O inhabitant of Lebanon, that makest thy nest in the cedars." Jer. xxii. 23. And again, speaking of Edom: "Though thou shouldest make thy nest as high as the eagle, I will bring thee down from thence, saith the Lord." Jer. xlix. 16. See also Obadiah 4. The warning given to proud Edom is more widely extended in the words of Habakkuk ii. 9: "Woe to him that coveteth an evil covetousness to his house, that he may set his nest on high." Job said: "I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand" (Job xxix. 18), little knowing how soon he was to be brought low. Sometimes God in mercy prevents His people from settling too confidently in any earthly portion; "as an eagle stirreth up her nest," the Lord stirs them up and keeps them from loving this world so much as to forget their heavenly home. Deut. xxxii. 11.

When David longed for the house of God, he envied the very birds that dwelt there: "Yea, the sparrow hath found an house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King, and my God." Psalm lxxxiv. 3.

When Moab was threatened with punishment, Isaiah warned them that "it shall be that as a wandering bird cast out of the nest, so the daughters of Moab shall be at the fords of Arnon" (Isa. xvi. 2), their homes destroyed, and themselves exposed to all kinds of danger. Sometimes men do not enough value the safety and peace of their nests. Solomon says: "as a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place." Prov. xxvii. 8. No greater proof of the utter ruin of a city can be given than that mentioned by Isaiah in describing the wild and savage creatures which shall possess it; the cormorant and bittern, the owl, raven, and vulture, "there shall the great owl make her nest, and lay, and hatch, and gather under her shadow." Isa. xxxiv. 15. The security of these wild and timid creatures shows how utterly the place is deserted by man. This is quite different from the security of the forests intended for the homes of the birds. "The trees of the Lord are full of sap; the cedars of Lebanon, which He hath planted; where the birds make their nests: as for the stork the fir trees are her house." Psalm civ. 16, 17.

Now I have just two more verses to give you, or rather one more, for the words are the same though given by two of the New Testament writers: Matt. viii. 20; Luke ix. 58, as if both Matthew and Luke wished to impress on us all a striking fact and solemn thought. We think of our homes, dear children, as of nests which we love, and where we feel ourselves more or less secure and happy; but, ah! there was One who left His house above for your sake and mine! He came to His own and His own received Him not! "Foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests; but the Son of man had not where to lay His head!"

Let our young readers now copy this RAVEN into their "Sunday Album," and find as many texts as they can relating to the bird.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XIII.—MRS. MEYNAL TAKES ALARM.

"ALL I know is that this sort of thing never happened in your dear father's life-time. If he could keep Gerald straight, why cannot Wulfric?"

Mrs. Meynal was the speaker, and she uttered these words in that tone of plaintive irritability that was growing more and more common with her. Wulfric was seated opposite to her, his face grave and set, and a look of care and weariness in his eyes that there had not wont to be, even during the hardest days of his student life.

Barbara and Celia were also present, the latter calmly indifferent as it seemed to what was going on, the former keenly alive to every word that passed, her flushed face and the nervous movements of her hands betraying a subdued tumult of feeling within her.

She had been silent for a good while; but now at these last words she seemed constrained to speak. She did so however with much more of gentleness and less of impetuosity than would have been possible to the Barbara of three months back.

"Mother," she said quickly, rather in the tone one would assume towards a fretful, wayward child, "how can Wulf help what Gerald does? You know he will never listen to advice from any one. He only laughs at it and does just as he chooses."

"I am not talking about advice," answered Mrs. Meynal peevishly. "I am speaking of influence. Why has not Wulfric a proper influence over his brother?"

"Now, mother," cried Barbara, unable to keep quite as calm as she wished, "do you not see how unreasonable you are? Why should Wulf be expected to have all the influence when we have none?"

"You talk like a child, Barbara, and you worry me by your folly. You ought to know that it is men who are able to influence men. Mothers and sisters never count for anything with young men."

"I am afraid Gerald is not very easy to influence," remarked Wulfric, speaking for the first time since his mother had begun upbraiding him.

"Then you are quite wrong," answered Mrs. Meynal with some sharpness, "and it shows how little you care for or understand your brother. Your dear father was always saying how easily Gerald was led. He used to be quite anxious about him, because he was so susceptible to influence."

Barbara was about to speak with something of triumphant vehemence; but a glance from Wulfric checked her, together with a sense of the utter impossibility of ever making her mother understand the real drift of such a remark.

"I must do what I can about it," said her brother. "I will do my best to influence him; but you see I do not know Gerald very well. I have been little at home, and we have grown apart."

"Yes, that is just what I always said would happen, if you were indulged in your headstrong fancies. If you had been a dutiful son, Wulfric, you would have come back years ago as your father's assistant, and then perhaps he would not have had to work himself to death as he did at the last. I always said no good would come of your setting up to be a greater man than your dear father; but he would indulge you in every possible way—and that was the result—and this."

And Mrs. Meynal put her handkerchief to her eyes and wiped away some tears.

Wulfric, worn out in body and mind with hard work, lack of sleep, and anxiety, was little fit to bear the additional burden of reproaches like these. He shrank even now from mention of his father's death: he had loved his father with the strong, tenacious fidelity of his nature, had strained every nerve in his upward progress to please and satisfy the parent who was watching his career with a proud appreciation and satisfaction, and the thought that his father had died whilst he was away in a distant land, always filled him with a keen sense of pain that had never left him ever since he had heard the news. Therefore reproaches such as these were peculiarly painful, and not the less so on account of their irrational injustice.

Barbara, who had an instinctive insight into some of his feelings, quickly interposed.

"Mother, dear, do not speak so. It is not just, and it is very unkind. Father was never overworked at all, and he died from the effect of a chill—it was not even in visiting a patient that he took it, you know; but with driving over to dine at the Croft. It was his doing more than any one's that Wulf always stayed away. He was so proud of his success in London."

"Well, I'm sure I never said he was not, though I never saw anything to be so very proud of; but I'm only a woman, and of course nobody cares what I feel. I always did say that a son's place was at home, and I kept Gerald here; I would have my way about him—and any one can see what a dear, clever boy he is. But Wulfric never cared for any of us, and always would go his own way, and now, when his influence might have been some use with his brother, it turns out that he has none, all because he would be so headstrong and undutiful and neglect everything but his own ambitious projects that I know will never come to anything."

Barbara bit her lips. Wulfric sat quite still for a while, and presently looked up to say, "The trouble with Gerald is not simply that I have too little influence, although that is true enough; but that other people have too much."

Celia looked up at that, appearing for the first time to be roused to interest.

"Who do you mean by 'other people?'" she asked with some sharpness.

Her brother looked rather keenly at her as he answered, "Well, Hector Thompson for one."

Celia tossed her head and a flush mantled her cheek.

"Our father was very intimate with the Thompsons. He did not mind how much Gerald went there: but you are much too grand, it seems, to recognise any merit in our friends."

Wulfric ignored the taunt.

"By what I understand, this Hector has been away from St. Hilda for many years. When my father sanctioned Gerald's going there, he was not at home."

"Much you know!" cried Celia, with some contempt, but Barbara answered quietly, "Hector had not been settled a month at home before father died."

"Just so," returned Wulfric coolly, "and there would be nothing to find fault with in Fergus or his associates. The thing is explained at once."

Mrs. Meynal was looking from one speaker to the other in a sort of bewilderment.

"I don't know what you are all talking about. The Thompsons are very nice people, I am sure."

"Wulf does not think them good enough for him," answered Celia scornfully.

"Wulf knows that Hector is leading Gerald into mischief," retorted Barbara with indignation.

"Dear, dear, dear," said poor Mrs. Meynal, with a weary sigh, "I cannot understand why all these troubles come. They never used to do before Wulfric came home. I'm sure Hector always seems a very nice young man, so attentive and polished. What is it you see to dislike in him? I suppose you are jealous of him at the bottom?"

"I am afraid his tastes are fast, and that he is leading Gerald into mischief."

"Why do you think that?"

"Because he is out so much at night, and is so late home; because I know they play at cards or billiards constantly, and because of the condition in which Gerald came home last night."

The quietness and firmness with which Wulfric spoke seemed to alarm his mother.

"And if you know of all this, why don't you interfere to stop it?"

"It is not very easy to stop Gerald when his mind is set upon a thing."

Mrs. Meynal began to wring her hands.

"Oh, what will become of us? I am the most miserable woman on earth! Wulfric, you must speak to Gerald. You must tell him that such things cannot be allowed. You must be severe with him—severity is necessary sometimes, your dear father used to say so. You must put a stop to it once for all. I cannot have it, and I look to you to stop it."

"I will do all I can," answered Wulfric. "Whether Gerald will heed me is another matter."

"You must make him heed," cried poor Mrs. Meynal, whose sensitive nervous system was thoroughly on edge now. "Why, he may ruin us all in a night if he takes to gambling like those people we hear of at Monte Carlo. I shall never rest in my bed till it is stopped. Wulfric, you must be firm; you must be very firm. If one thing doesn't do, you must try another. You must make him promise never to do so again, even if you have to threaten to turn him out of the house."

"I am not sure that threats will do much good," remarked Wulfric.

"Oh, yes they will!" cried Mrs. Meynal. "Do you think I do not know Gerald's character after all these years? You must threaten, if other means fail. You must tell him that I cannot have him in the house any more. That will bring him to his senses, if nothing else will. Mind you don't forget, Wulfric; you must tell him that I cannot have him in the house—or rather that you cannot—I desire it shall be said, if necessary."

There was no time for a reply, for the door was suddenly opened, and the servant announced "Mr. Leslie."

The young clergyman was tolerably well-known to the Meynals by this time. There was some very distant kinship between them, and he had taken from the first a great liking for Wulfric, and had watched him with increasing admiration and respect. He often dropped in for half-an-hour when his day's work was done, and he was always kindly welcomed by Mrs. Meynal, who liked to see people about her, and was gentle in her manner towards almost every one save her eldest son; but to-night as he appeared she looked up almost fretfully and said: "Oh, how do you do, Mr. Leslie? I am pleased to see you, of course; but I did hope that it was my son Gerald coming in."

"I have brought you a message from him instead," answered the young man, as he shook hands all round and sat down beside Celia. "I have just met him. He was on his way to the railway station."

"To the railway station?"

"Yes; he was with young Mr. Thompson and another gentleman I did not know. They seemed in a great hurry. Your son stopped to ask me to tell you that he was off for a few days—possibly for a week. They had just made up their minds to go for a little outing, and he had not time to come back and tell you. He asked me to leave the message. I suppose he will write and tell you more himself."

Mrs. Meynal looked helpless and distressed. Wulfric drew his brows together, and leaned his head upon his hand as he stood with his elbow on the carved mantelpiece and his head slightly turned away. He knew quite well that there was to be some horse-racing in a town about twenty miles off, and he had little doubt but that his brother had gone there. He had been half afraid before that he would do so; but as days had passed by and nothing had been said, he had begun to hope that all was well, until this message reached them. Nobody else present was aware of the racing, but after the foregoing conversation, Mr. Leslie's communication was anything but welcome.

"Oh, dear, dear!" sighed Mrs. Meynal, "whatever shall we do? I do hope he will not go and get into mischief. I have just been made so miserable about him. They tell me he is getting into bad company; yet not one of them raises a hand to keep him back."

And Mrs. Meynal, in her rambling, discursive, incoherent way, began telling the young clergyman of her troubles. Wulfric took this opportunity to make his escape to the work that was waiting for him in his study; but Barbara stayed, anxious to explain away any incautious statements her mother might make, and Mr. Leslie listened with great attention and sympathy. He expressed himself with great good feeling on the subject of Gerald's delinquencies, and so soothed Mrs. Meynal that the painful impression made upon her began to subside, and she was able to compose herself to her usual evening nap.

Then Frank Leslie turned towards Celia and said gently, "I should think that your influence with your brother might be the strongest power that could be brought to bear upon him. He surely would not willingly lend himself to a course of action that must lower him in your sight."

Celia looked very lovely that night, as indeed she generally did, and her beauty was heightened by the slight colour that flushed her cheeks in the consciousness that she was being admired. Barbara sometimes wondered whether her sister was really as apathetic and vacant as she sometimes appeared to be, or whether, perhaps her soul was only slumbering and would some day be roused into a life it had not known before. To look lovely and to win admiration had so far appeared to be the aim and object of her life; but surely there were possibilities of greater things beneath so fair an exterior.

At any rate Frank Leslie thought so—that was plain enough for all to see.

Celia made no answer to his proposition save by a little smile, and her companion turned the conversation.

"Have you thought over what I spoke about to you the other day?" he asked.

"Oh, I told you at the time, didn't I, that I did not care about that sort of thing?"

"Yes; but I hardly took that for an answer."

"Why not?"

"Because we all of us have to do what we do not like at some time in our lives."

"Oh yes, of course; but that is different from doing it with our eyes open when we need not trouble ourselves about it. I hate trouble."

Mr. Leslie smiled, but did not appear disconcerted.

"But you like giving pleasure to others?"

"I don't think I care about it unless it gives pleasure to me at the same time."

"And I am certain that if you were once to try, you would find that in the giving of pleasure to others you would gain it for yourself."

Celia shrugged her shoulders a little, but she was not altogether displeased at being regarded as so amiable a being.

"People always say that of course; but nobody else believes them."

"They believe it themselves—and possibly they know best, as you may find if you will only try."

Celia made a little moue.

"Well, what is it you want me to do? In what way must I victimise myself for your precious parish and people?"

"They are not mine, Miss Meynal, they are God's people, and in a certain sense they belong to you as well as to me."

The sudden gravity and earnestness with which these words were spoken checked the levity with which Celia had felt inclined to treat the whole subject.

"Well, tell me what you want then. Perhaps I will think about it."

"I only want you to visit every week that home for the indigent blind on the other side of the town, and read to them for an hour or so. Poor things, they have had hardly anything done for them ever since their patron Mr. Stuart died and his family removed, and their lives are so sadly monotonous. I want to get a lady visitor for every day of the week to go and see them and read to them and cheer them up a little. You do not know what it would be to them. Will you take one day, Miss Meynal? I know your sister's time is taken up, but you say yourself that you have no occupations. Will you not help the poor and needy by one little act of self-sacrifice?"

"Oh dear, Mr. Leslie, what a sermon to preach about such a little thing! Will you promise me if I say 'yes' about this not to worry me about anything else?"

He smiled a little and was silent.

"You won't? Well, I call that too bad. It would serve you right if I said 'no' straight off. Have you got any other people for the other days?"

"Yes, Mrs. Granby has promised to take one day. I went to ask her granddaughter; but found she proposed going into a hospital to learn nursing, and the old lady said she would go until I got so many younger volunteers that I could afford to dispense with her services. Then Mrs. Dart, the solicitor's wife, will take one day, and Miss Dumaresq, from the Hall, another. I hope soon to get every day supplied."

"Reinée Dumaresq seems very fond of good works," remarked Celia. "I can't understand it in any one brought up as she has been."

Frank Leslie smiled a little.

"I think bringing up has less to do with it than disposition and heart; but you have not given me your answer, Miss Meynal."

"Oh, I suppose I shall have to go; but what I shall say when I get there I cannot imagine. You will soon be begging me to discontinue my visits."

Mr. Leslie looked at her again with a smile that was not exactly one of assent.

Celia did go—why she could hardly have told, unless because it was easier to do so than to be always saying "no" to the young clergyman. She did not expect to be at all interested in the people, and she was not very much, still their patient helplessness did touch her somewhat, and her visits to them led to other encounters that interested her more than the people themselves.

She came across Reinée Dumaresq on several occasions, and as she was an intimate friend of Barbara's, it seemed natural that a certain amount of intimacy should be taken for granted between these two. Reinée would sometimes call for Celia in her pretty pony carriage and drive her to the home upon her visiting days, and would talk to her of the blind people and what might be done for them in a way that showed how personal was the interest she took in each one, and how fully she believed that her companion did the same.

Celia felt it impossible, somehow, to tell Reinée of her indifference upon such subjects, and from appearing interested in these plans she began to feel a faint stirring of genuine compassion and willingness to second them.

Mr. Leslie would sometimes be appealed to for advice by Reinée, who generally included Celia in her projects, and the young clergyman's face would light up with pleasure as his eyes rested upon the two girls, and something in his manner or in the look of his face betrayed a good deal of his mind to the quick perceptions of Miss Dumaresq.

"I think Mr. Leslie is a very good man," she once said to Celia.

"Yes, I suppose so. Clergymen ought to be."

"There is a difference in them," answered Reinée, smiling. "I like Mr. Leslie very much."

Celia coloured slightly.

"Do you?" she said indifferently. "I suppose he means well. He is a little oppressive sometimes, I think. It seems to me it is the fashion just now to be like that. I do not fancy it is a fashion I shall ever follow. I like to take my ease."

Reinée looked thoughtful for a moment and then said: "You may get tired of that some day."

"Perhaps; I doubt it though. I know you were tired of gaiety when you came here and took up country life with great zest; but I expect when you are married and plunge back into the vortex again, you will enjoy it all the more, and wonder how you could have left it."

It was Reinée's turn to colour now.

"I am not likely to be married," she said quietly.

"Oh, I beg your pardon," answered Celia quickly, "but everybody said you were engaged to that handsome Mr. Trevelyan who stays with you so much."

"I am not engaged to him," answered Reinée, "and I do not think I ever shall be."

Celia looked perplexed and almost incredulous, and Reinée added after a short pause, speaking rather fast: "When I was much younger my parents entered into a sort of provisional engagement on my behalf; but now that the time has come for me to judge for myself, I cannot ratify it."

"I suppose I must not ask why not?"

Reinée glanced at Celia, and saw that the question was not put in mere idle curiosity, she therefore answered with frank simplicity and truthfulness.

"I will tell you—I know you will not talk about it. Arthur Trevelyan is a man who—who has different ideas of life, of right and wrong, of almost everything from mine. I want to try and follow—however far behind it must be—in Christ's footsteps upon earth. He would not help me in that. He might even—no—I will not say that; it is not for me to judge him. But I could never, never marry a man whose inner life I could not share. You understand me, Celia, do you not?"

Celia answered "Yes," but the answer was low and uncertain. Did she understand she asked herself as she walked in the garden that evening? Did she know what it was to put considerations of that kind above everything else? She knew, as every girl in her place would have done, that she was admired and courted—loved perhaps by two men at this time; the wealthy, gay, extravagant Hector Thompson and the earnest, unselfish Frank Leslie. In a different way she liked them both. She respected and reverenced the latter infinitely more; but the former was the "better match." Hector could give her those things that she esteemed most highly in this life, ease, luxury, and everything she could want. Frank would be for years nothing better than a struggling curate—Celia's lips curved with sudden scorn. She be nothing better than a poor clergyman's wife? Never! She would manage to do better for herself than that?

THOMAS ELLWOOD.

"THOU hast said much here of Paradise lost, but what hast thou to say of Paradise found?" So spake gentle Thomas Ellwood on returning to John Milton the manuscript of "Paradise Lost" which had been given him to read.

Milton's "Paradise Regained" was the direct result of this remark; but how few know anything of the pure and simple life of Ellwood, the contemporary also of George Fox and William Penn, and a member of no mean note in the Society of Friends. A recent republication of his Autobiography affords a favourable opportunity for recalling the facts of his life.

Born in 1639, at Crowell in Oxfordshire, he was taken when only two years of age to London, where, as he tells us, "I was bred up, though not without much difficulty, the city air not agreeing with my tender constitution." His father, Walter Ellwood, a country gentleman and well to do, had espoused the cause of the Parliament against the king, and, deeming the country unsafe, brought his family up to town.

At a very early age Thomas was sent to the free school at Thame, where, being too full of spirit to submit easily to the rules of the school, he came in for a large share of the rod of correction, sometimes as often as twice in the forenoon. But he was not there long, for, his elder brother being entered at Merton College, Oxford, where the living was found to be very costly, young Thomas was taken from school by his father, who, although now a justice of the peace, declared he could not afford the double expense.

Then followed a period of idling at home, which, had it not been for an innate dislike to anything approaching dissoluteness either in word or manner, would have gone far towards undermining the young man's character. About this time he had an adventure which throws some light on his disposition. Two men seized the heads of his father's horses, as he was driving home one night, for the purpose of compelling him to take another route, falsely declaring that he was driving over a private road. Thomas, who was with his father, at his command advanced to disarm the men, who, taking fright at his drawn sword, dropped their bludgeons and fled, closely pursued for some distance by him. His success had the effect of making him a sort of braggart; and he went about for some time wearing pistols as well as sword. But very shortly afterwards he was seized with horror when he reflected how near he had been to shedding the blood of his fellow-creatures, and he never again passed the same way without returning thanks to God for withholding him from that sin.

The death of his brother in Ireland, where he had been playing the part of the prodigal son, was shortly followed by that of his mother, "who was indeed a woman of singular worth and virtue." Of this mother we know nothing more, but are left to guess that her death was accelerated by the conduct of her eldest son.

Ellwood's introduction to the Quakers he tells in his own pleasing way. "I mentioned before that during my father's abode in London, in the time of the civil wars, he contracted a friendship with the Lady Springett, then a widow, and afterwards married to Isaac Pennington, Esq., to continue which he sometimes visited them at their country lodgings; and, having heard that they were come to live upon their own estate at Chalfont, about fifteen miles from Crowell, he went one day to visit them there, and to return at night, taking me with him. But very much surprised were we when, being come thither, we first heard, then found, they were become Quakers: a people we had no knowledge of, and a name we had till then scarce heard of."[1] Presently he meets the daughter of the house—"Whom I found gathering some flowers in the garden, attended by her maid, who was also a Quaker. But when I addressed myself to her after my accustomed manner, with intention to engage her in some discourse which might introduce conversation on the footing of our former acquaintance, though she treated me with a courteous mien, yet, as young as she was, the gravity of her look and behaviour struck such an awe upon me that I found myself not so much master of myself as to pursue any further discourse with her. Wherefore, asking pardon for my boldness in having intruded myself into her private walks, I withdrew, not without some disorder of mind." This modest young lady, Guli Pennington, afterwards became the wife of the celebrated William Penn.

Ellwood was deeply impressed with what he saw and heard while at the Penningtons', and we next find him making inquiries as to where Quaker meetings were to be held. Hearing that there was to be one at High Wycombe, he proceeded thither, but accompanied by his greyhound as if he were going coursing, for he was ashamed to have the real purpose of his journey known.

The first result of his attendance at this meeting we find in a few of his own words: "The general trouble and confusion of mind which had for some days lain heavy upon me, and pressed me down, began now to wear off, and some glimmering of light began to break forth in me, which let me see my inward state and condition towards God." He describes how all his former life was laid out before him, as it were; and he then first realised that all sin brought a sense of guilt, and, finally, condemnation on the soul that sinned. Happily he did not stop here, but continued his inward searchings until it pleased God in His great goodness to give him a new law—"the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, which wrought in me against all evil, not only in deed or word, but even in thought also."

The serious-minded men and women with whom he had become associated, laid special stress on abandoning the symbols of that worldliness which they had abjured. Conforming to their practice, he immediately divested his clothing of all lace, ribbons, and useless buttons, nor did he even leave a ring upon his finger. Neither would he any longer address people by the usual titles of sir and madam, or say "Your servant," to those to whom he did not stand in that relation in the literal meaning of the term. Bowing and raising the hat in salutation had also to be dropped, as well as speaking in the plural to a single person—you to one, instead of thou.

Yet, while Ellwood was enabled to conform to this rule before the rest of the world, he found that it was impossible, at first, to alter his ordinary demeanour before his father. Painful scenes ensued when at last he attempted to put his new ideas into practice in the family. Then began another inward struggle. He insisted on wearing his hat in the presence of his father, and in addressing him after the fashion of the Quakers. The father not unnaturally was angry. When remonstrance failed, he stormed and gave reins to his passion, resorting to violence. For some months young Ellwood, though remaining in the house, had to live an almost solitary life.

One day, to his great delight, he heard that the Penningtons were come to pay his father a visit. Before they left they had persuaded the old man to allow his son to accompany them to their own home. Ellwood then had not a penny of money, and even the riding-coat he wore was lent him by his friend Isaac Pennington, as was also the horse he rode.

[1] So named by Justice Bennet in derision of George Fox who had admonished the judge and those around him "to quake at the word of the Lord."

The seven weeks he spent with the Penningtons were employed very profitably and pleasantly. He records the visit with feelings of great gratitude, and says that his hosts were affectionate as parents and tender as nurses. The spiritual benefits he received were of the greatest value to him in after life.

On his return home the quarrel about wearing the hat indoors was renewed, his father finally dismissing the subject by remarking: "If you cannot content yourself to come to dinner without your hive on your head, pray rise, and go take your dinner somewhere else." Ellwood did rise; and then, and as long as he lived with his father, he took his meals in the kitchen with the servants.

About this time, 1660, he wrote his first article for the press, and called it "An Alarm to the Priests; or, a Message from Heaven to Forewarn them."

We soon find Ellwood arranging for Quaker meetings to be held in his own town, but the mad rising of the Fifth Monarchy men caused the government, which believed that these meetings of dissenters were used for like seditious purposes, to take measures for their suppression. A letter of Ellwood's to one Thomas Low, entreating him to attend a meeting, was intercepted, and he was arrested and taken before two justices of the peace for examination. Failing in their endeavours to get him to take the oath of allegiance, they sent him under guard to Oxford, there to be imprisoned. On the way thither Ellwood was joined by one of his father's servants, who, perceiving a favourable opportunity, entreated him to escape; but Ellwood reproved the fellow, and rode rapidly forward to overtake his guard, who, relying on his prisoner's strong sense of honour, kept but a careless watch over him and had got some distance ahead.

Arrived at Oxford, Ellwood was placed in the care of a linen-draper who was also City Marshal. He was greatly cheered during his imprisonment by the receipt of an encouraging letter from Thomas Low, who, together with forty of the "Friends," had been arrested on the same charge, and was confined in the castle at Oxford. Ellwood himself was fortunately released before being brought to trial, mainly through the exertions of his father. Mr. Ellwood afterwards in vain endeavoured to keep his son from the meetings of the Quakers; but at last, finding it impossible, he gave up the attempt, exclaiming—"Nay, if he will take so much pains to go, let him go, if he will."

The country still being in a ferment over the Fifth Monarchy men, Ellwood was again arrested, this time with Isaac Pennington, at whose house a meeting was being held when some troopers broke in upon them, and seized several of the participants. The magistrate before whom they were brought was inclined to treat them with leniency, until—finding that one was from Westmoreland, another from Essex, and two others from Oxfordshire and London—he told them their case looked very grave indeed, for it was hardly likely that people could meet from such distant parts of the country without previous arrangement. Finally, however, and after doing his best to induce them to give bail, he dismissed them on their promising to appear before him whenever they should be called upon to do so.

Feeling keenly his need of a better education, Ellwood now set himself to study, that he might make up his deficiency in this respect. He soon found that without a guide he could do but little; and one day happening to complain of this to his friend and adviser, Isaac Pennington, the latter resolved to do what he could to help him. He was as good as his word, and Ellwood soon found himself permitted to visit John Milton, and to read to him such books as the blind poet directed. First settling his affairs at Crowell, Ellwood went up to London and took lodgings near Milton's house, which was in Jewin Street, now a place of large warehouses and manufactories. In return for these services Milton instructed Ellwood in Latin, and also directed his other studies.

But London fog proved too much for his lungs, and within two months Ellwood was compelled to retire to Wycombe in such bad health that his life was despaired of. No sooner, however, was he recovered than he was back in London, hard at work both with his studies and his reading. But a sudden stop was put to this pleasant and instructive intercourse with Milton. The interruption came about in a way with which Ellwood must have been by this time pretty familiar,—by arrest and imprisonment for being found at a meeting of the Quakers. The meeting was being held at the "Bull and Mouth" inn in Aldersgate Street, when the house was suddenly entered by a party of soldiers, and thirty-two of the men carried away to Old Bridewell.

When arrested Ellwood had but tenpence (about equal to half-a-crown of our money) and this amount he made to last him for several days, refusing to partake of some food provided by friends for those who had no money, because, as he had some money, he did not consider himself entitled to participate; yet he was pleased when two halfpenny loaves were brought him, instead of one penny one, because it would last the longer. Once more the Penningtons came to his relief.

While in prison Ellwood occupied himself in making "red and yellow night-waistcoats," though he received next to nothing for his work. Prison discipline in the reign of Charles II. was a strange mixture of laxity and severity. Long and indefinite terms of imprisonment were frequently awarded for trifling offences; on the other hand, a prisoner's friends had usually ready access to him; sometimes even the prisoner himself, in some cases, being permitted to go in and out occasionally. Little or no provision was made for the feeding or sleeping arrangements of the prisoners, who, if they had no friends or no money, were thrown upon the mercy of their jailers.

Brought before the magistrate and refusing to swear, Ellwood and those arrested with him were committed to Newgate, and compelled to herd with common malefactors. In consequence of one of the prisoners dying through the overcrowding, those of them who had come from Bridewell were sent back there, walking through the streets in a body with all their belongings in a bundle on their backs. No stronger testimony to the worth of a Quaker's "word of honour" can be given than the fact that, in these changes from one prison to another, the authorities permitted them to move without a guard of any sort except their word.

Once more in Bridewell, we find Ellwood expressing his thoughts in verse:—

Thee, Thee alone, O God, I fear—
In Thee do I confide;
Thy presence is to me more dear
Than all things else beside.
Thy virtue, power, life and light,
Which in my heart do shine,
Above all things are my delight:
O make them always mine!

At the next sitting of the court most of the imprisoned Quakers were called to the bar and immediately discharged; upon which they held a solemn meeting, "to return our thankful acknowledgment to the Lord."

The next seven years Ellwood lived with the Penningtons, teaching Latin to the younger members of the family, while diligently continuing his own studies. It was, however, by no means a period of uninterrupted quietness, but was chequered by various arrests and imprisonments. One day while in prison Ellwood amused himself by composing the following riddle:—

THE RIDDLE.

Some men are free while they in prison lie;
Others, who ne'er saw prison, captive die.

Caution.

He who can receive it may;
He that cannot, let him stay,
And not be hasty, but suspend
His judgment till he see the end.

Solution.

He's only free indeed that's free from sin;
And he is safest bound that's bound therein.

Conclusion.

This is the liberty I chiefly prize:
The other, without this, I can despise.

It was about this time that he paid the memorable visit to Milton to which we owe "Paradise Regained," as already described.

Thomas Ellwood's quaint courtship and subsequent marriage with Mary Ellis was undertaken by him in the same spirit that characterised his whole life. Having asked the advice and obtained the approbation of the Penningtons to the match, and being still doubtful as to the advisability of the step, he says: "Yet took I further deliberation, often retiring in spirit to the Lord, and crying to Him for direction, before I addressed myself to her. At length, as I was sitting all alone waiting upon the Lord for counsel and guidance in this—in itself and to me—so important affair, I felt a word sweetly arise in me, as if I had heard a voice which said—'Go, and prevail.' And, faith springing up in my heart with the word, I immediately arose and went, nothing doubting.... I used not many words to her, but I felt a Divine power went along with the words, and fixed the matter expressed by them so fast in her breast that, as she afterwards acknowledged to me, she could not shut it out." The two were married in October, 1669.

Presently we find Ellwood successfully advocating the cause of a friend who had, on the testimony of two informers, been falsely imprisoned and fined. Owing mainly to the exertions of Ellwood, the trade of the informers was put a stop to in Buckinghamshire, but it flourished elsewhere—"the worst of men for the most part being set up for informers; the worst of magistrates encouraging and abetting them." His indignation broke forth into an expostulatory poem, under the title of "Gigantomachia" (the war of the giants against heaven), "not without some allusion to the second psalm."

Ellwood also wrote "A Song of the Mercies and Deliverances of the Lord." But the age was one of controversy, into which he plunged with the eagerness natural to him when he conceived truth to be endangered, and it would be a profitless task to pursue the various pamphlets which he issued. Amongst the mass of books and papers written by him we note one especially, "A Seasonable Dissuasive from Persecution, &c.," because there are few who have had such an experience as to entitle them to speak with equal authority on the subject. In 1688 he began a metrical life of David, which he called "Davidus." It was finished twenty years afterwards. He also wrote a Sacred History of the Old Testament, and another of the New Testament.

The greater part of Ellwood's married life was passed at Hunger Hill, Bucks. His wife died five years before him. In 1713 he was stricken with paralysis, which he bore with resignation. The same year he died, smiling as he uttered his last words: "I am full of joy and peace; my spirit is filled with joy."

The following characteristic lines have more than a personal interest:—

A PRAYER.

Oh, that my eyes might closèd be
To what becomes me not to see!
That deafness might possess my ear
To what concerns me not to hear!
That truth my tongue might always tie
From ever speaking foolishly!
That no vain thought might ever rest
Or be conceivèd in my breast!
That by each word, each deed, each thought,
Glory may to my God be brought!
But what are wishes? Lord, my eye
On Thee is fixed—to Thee I cry:
Oh, purge out all my dross, my sin;
Make me more white than snow within!
Wash, Lord, and purify my heart,
And make it clean in every part;
And when 'tis clean, Lord, keep it so,
For that is more than I can do.

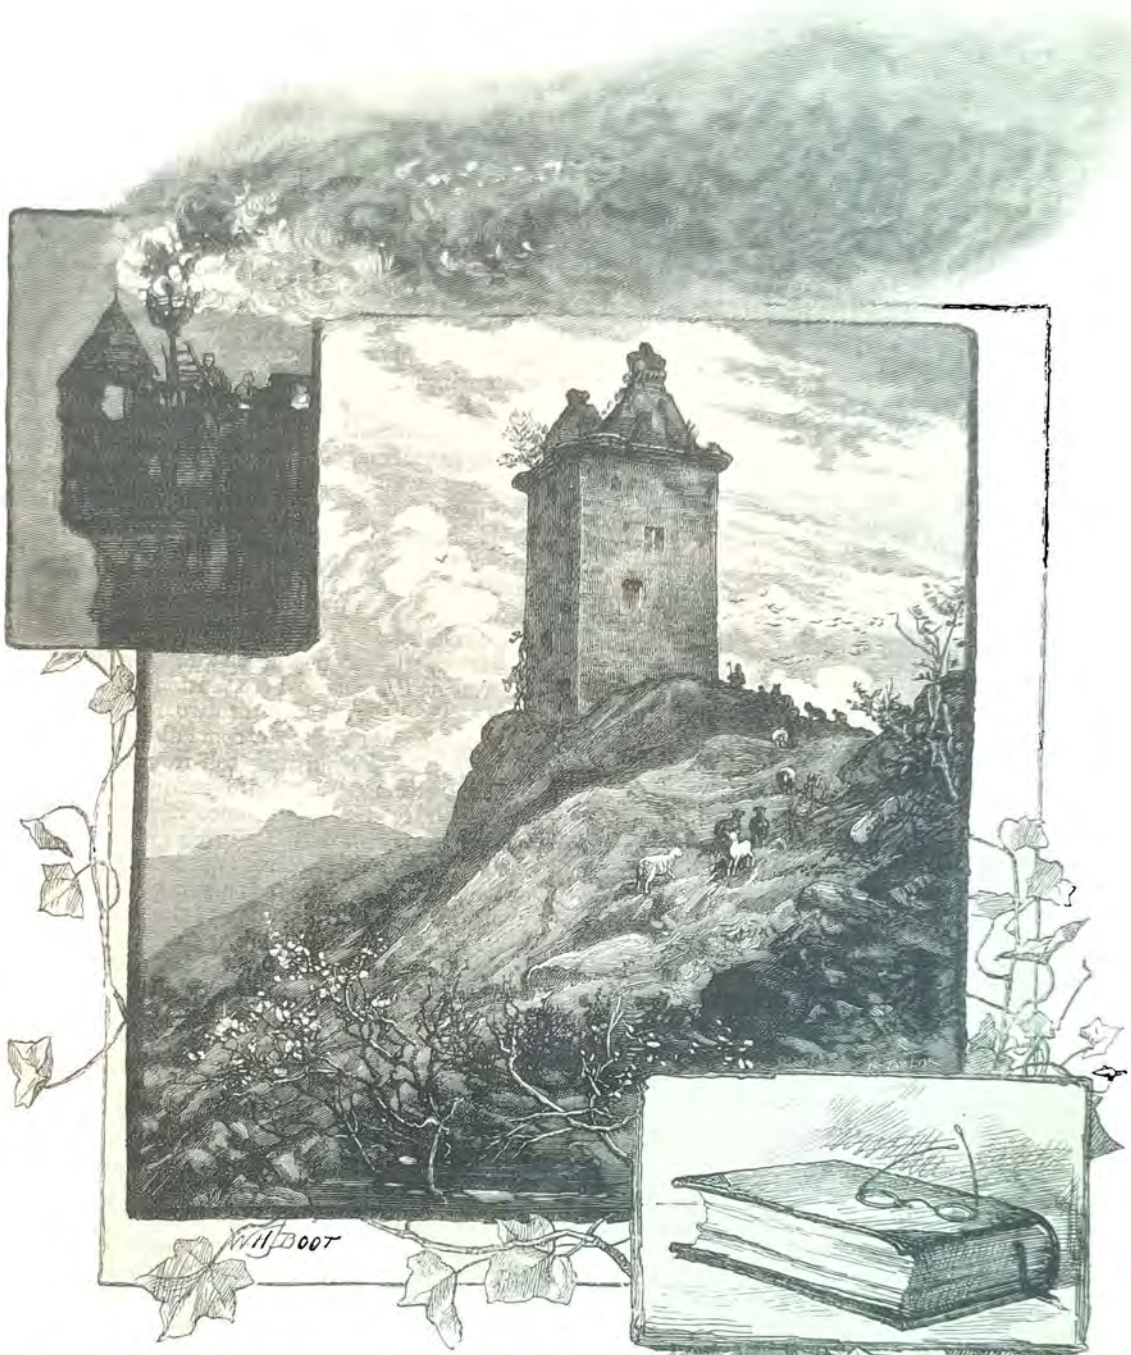
The Beacon Tower.



O WORD of God Incarnate,
O Wisdom from on high,
O Truth unchanged, unchanging,
O Light of our dark sky;
We praise Thee for the radiance
That for the hallowed page,
A lantern to our footsteps,
Shines on from age to age.

It floateth like a banner
Before God's host unfurled;
It shineth like a beacon
Above the darkling world;
It is the chart and compass,
That o'er life's surging sea,
'Mid mists and rocks and quicksands,
Still guides, O Christ, to Thee.

WHAT "THE LIFE THAT NOW IS" OWES TO MISSIONS.

PART II.

THE influence of Christianity upon the character and duration of human life is no less remarkable than its influence on human features. During that dark period in English history that preceded the great Methodist revival, life was rapidly diminishing. The increase of the population of England from 1651 to 1751 was only one million; whereas, in the succeeding century, the era of a quickened religious faith, the increase was fourteen millions. Whatever causes may have combined in this result, it is a fact to be noted. Heathenism in many of its practices is, on the contrary, directly hostile to life. During his absence of twenty years, Moffat found that death had been so busy among the warriors of Moselekatse that on his return not one was left to recognise him. What war did not devour, plague and famine claimed. "Where," exclaimed Saker, "should we all have been if still confined to the frail, sickly huts of the heathen? Deaths among us have diminished in proportion to a better housing." Slavery among savage nations has been, and still is, a main cause of diminished population. Christianity sees in human life something which is unspeakably precious and holy.

I have already touched upon the influence of Christianity upon woman. For her the apostles of the highest modern civilisation, even though they profess no faith in the gospel, must acknowledge that here, as in the old world of Jew and Greek and Roman, the coming of Christ heralded a new and nobler era. A distinguished Chinaman not long since published a volume, entitled 'The Chinese, Painted by Themselves.' In this he defends the neglect of female education on an entirely new ground. He declares that women, having being born perfect, science and letters cannot add to their charms. This argument reads strangely enough as a comment upon those pictures in Cook's Voyages, or even upon the life of the harem and the zenana. But it is Christianity which has cheered the insipid dulness of the life where woman is held only as a toy, as much as it has brightened the life where woman is treated only as a beast of burden. A few years ago no native woman in India was allowed to learn to sew; now not only are the Zenanas opening their secluded doors to missionary ladies, but the girl schools are attended by large numbers of children. The 'Athenæum' lately recorded the fact that a Zenana library was about to be established in Calcutta.

Side by side with increasing honour paid to woman, comes increasing attention given to the woman's true kingdom—the home. Christianity does not pause to argue the question, "Is life worth living?" It is content to point to the homes radiant with the joy of religion. With such homes, missions, within the last century, have plentifully adorned the dark places of the earth. A traveller in Africa, who pretends to no sympathy for mission work, and no personal regard for Christianity, speaks thus in 1880: "I do not at all understand how the changes at Camerons and Victoria have been brought about. Old sanguinary customs have, to a large extent, been abolished; witchcraft hides itself in the forest; the fetich superstition of the people is derided by old and young: and well-built houses are springing up on every hand. It is really marvellous to mark the change that has taken place in the natives in a few years only. From actual cannibals, many have become honest, intelligent, well-skilled artisans. An elementary literature has been established, and the whole Bible translated into their own tongue, hitherto an unwritten one. There must surely be something 'abnormal' in this."

New views of life bring new ideas of personal responsibility. The things which accompany salvation, the decency of apparel, the decorum in behaviour, the changed conception of the sanctity of life, the deference paid to woman, the comfort of the home, those cannot come alone. The daily life is guarded by a new self-respect, the license which welcomed the white man to its orgies is no longer tolerated, and once a week the air is full of the sound of the church-going bell. Mr. Moncure Conway declares that never, in Scotland or Connecticut, has he seen a paralysis such as fell upon Honolulu the first day of the week. But the paralysis, which would have fallen on Mr. Conway himself from the club of a savage, might have been more remarkable still; and this would have been his fate in that same place but for the very Gospel which once a week hushes the sounds of commerce and raises, instead, the songs of the Redeemer.

More worthy to be remembered, is the answer given by Mr. Darwin to some shallow critic of missions. I quote his words all the more readily because no one will charge the philosopher with partiality for the Christian religion. Yet it is he who, speaking of the opponents of missions, says: "They forget, or will not remember that human sacrifices and the power of an idolatrous priesthood; a system of profligacy unparalleled in any other part of the world; infanticide, a consequence of that system; bloody wars, where the conquerors spared neither women nor children—that all these have been abolished, and that dishonesty, intemperance and licentiousness have been greatly reduced by the introduction of Christianity. In a voyager to forget these things is a base ingratitude, for, should he chance to be at the point of shipwreck on some unknown coast, he will most devoutly pray that the lesson of the missionary may have extended thus far."

Beside this frank and manly statement we may place the equally honourable testimony of Sir Bartle Frere, as Governor of Bombay: "I speak simply as to matters of experience and observation, and not of opinions, just as a Roman prefect might have reported to Trajan or the Antonines; and I assure you that, whatever you may be told to the contrary, the teaching of Christianity among a hundred and sixty millions of civilized, industrious Hindoos and Mohammedans in India, is effecting changes, moral, social and political, which, for extent and rapidity of effect, are far more extraordinary than anything you or your fathers have witnessed in modern Europe."

To Christianity also science is largely indebted for some of her most splendid conquests in this last century. To compare the philological researches of to-day with the haphazard speculations of a hundred years since, is as absurd as to constitute a parallel between the latest work of Mr. Max Muller and the New England Primer. But we may first challenge the world to name any one body of men to whom philology owes so much to-day as it does to the missionaries. In all cases where the missionary goes to a barbarous and wholly unlettered people, it needs to be remembered that the language itself must first be rescued from its vagabond existence—a mere "wandering voice,"—and reduced to a grammatical system, before it can be taught to the tribes who have been speaking it in ignorance perhaps for centuries.

Education, in so far as it has spread to heathen lands, has done so, in a majority of instances, in the wake of the Gospel. The life of Dr. Duff is to this hour the best, as it is also the most vivid, chronicle of the battles in India between ignorance and knowledge. The revolution in Hindu education was carried through by missionary persistency, in the teeth as much of the bitter prejudice of the governing powers as of the superstition and apathy of the people. Carey, the pioneer of Indian missions, was gifted as few men are in the acquisition of languages. Within twenty-one years he and his companions translated the Scriptures into twenty-one Indian tongues. A language once acquired is as open to secular as to sacred usage; and while it is true that during the last twenty years three million copies of the Bible have poured from the printing presses of Indian missionaries, it is equally true that twenty millions of school books, and other works, have come from the same tireless source in the same period of time.

We live in an age whose special glory it is that it has transformed "the fairy tales of science" into the toiling servants of our multiplying necessities. Christianity has done much, by its indirect influence, to foster the inquiring spirit of science. "As long," says one writer, "as men were taught by polytheism that the phenomena of the material world were referable to the discordant action of many gods; or by pantheism, that an explanation of Nature's laws was to be sought, not by patient observation of Nature's action outside us, but by reflective examination of the mind within, as exhibiting in consciousness those necessary laws, according to which the world has been evolved—so long, their knowledge of Nature made but little progress." Christianity quickens research, and honours the spirit of true scientific inquiry. The missionary has added some of the rarest specimens to our cabinets; his travels have opened up to us new fields for investigation; the world is larger to-day because of his heroic daring in pushing into the pathless wilderness, and whitening with his sail seas hitherto silent to the keel of a civilized mariner. The Travels of Livingstone are as valuable a contribution to science as are the Voyages of Darwin.

We will advance one step further. Patriotism is in debt of the missionary. "See how calm and quiet England has remained throughout the storm," some one remarked to M. Guizot, during the great revolutionary hurricane of 1848. "Yes," was the reply of the French statesman, "and England owes it to her religion." When England herself was plunged into war by the Indian mutiny, "soldiers and statesmen did not shrink from saying that the province which saved the empire was conspicuous for two things: a most successful government, and the most open acknowledgment of Christianity." "I believe," said Lord Lawrence, the Governor-General of India, "notwithstanding all that the English people have done to benefit that country, the missionaries have done more than all other agencies combined."

Not less honourable was the testimony of Sir Bartle Frere. "The missionaries," he said, "are infusing new vigour into the stereotyped life of the great populations placed under English rule, and are preparing them to be in every way better men and citizens of the great empire in which they dwell."

During the excited time when slavery was abolished in Jamaica, the Governor, speaking to the planters in the House of Assembly, testified to the same effect. "The first object," he said, "is to instil the doctrines of Christianity. Give every facility you can to the missionaries' labours. Banish from your minds the idea that they are your enemies. I will answer with my head for their loyalty and fidelity."

Such testimonies from men in power as to the effect of missions may easily be multiplied.

Take another aspect of missionary work. From the beginning Protestant missionaries have declared war against the system of caste in India. They have based their opposition to it upon the assertion that any system must be prejudicial which prohibited the free intermingling of men, and filled their minds with unreasonable prejudices and antipathies. The Gospel asserts this truth in the face of various foes, of socialism as much as of imperialism; of the tyranny of the many over the few, equally with the tyranny of the few over many. "Foreign missions affirm, with the force of an eternal sanction, the brotherhood of men. They help us to rise to a worthier apprehension of the truth which we hold so simple that it comes home to the rudest savage, so vast that it requires the experience of every race to unfold its mysteries in the language of men. With a faith which goes beyond the ties of kindred and the bounds of empire, they see in all for whom Christ died, the heirs of a common salvation."

Commerce, Civilisation, Culture, Scholarship, Patriotism, and that wider and nobler passion which sees in all men "children of the same dear God," what these are to-day in once heathen lands they are largely because of Christian missions. Surely this constitutes a debt which, to say the least, deserves recognition from the world. But climb higher yet. The life that now is, by common acknowledgment, is more than all of them combined. It has its moral aspect also. My enumeration, therefore, would be incomplete, if I did not crown my appeal by adding this further consideration. The moral life of to-day is indebted to modern Christian missions.

The present changed condition in China, in India, in the South Seas, in Africa, although, as yet, only the healing shadow of the gospel can be said to have fallen there, is positive proof that the Cross of Christ has in it a new and nobler potency. The Gospel has proved itself to be more than a system of morals. It has vindicated its claim to be a life. It has thrilled with fresh meaning the music of the ancient prophecy: "Everything shall live whither the river cometh."[1]

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

Two correspondents (M. W. and S. A.) ask for an explanation of Luke xvi. 9: "And I say unto you: Make to yourselves friends of the mammon of unrighteousness; that, when ye fail, they may receive you into everlasting habitations."

TO make this passage clear, little more is requisite than a careful explanation of its several phrases.

1. "The mammon of unrighteousness" is equivalent to "the unrighteous mammon"; just as the unrighteous steward had been called in the preceding verse (in the Greek), "the steward of unrighteousness." Mammon is an Aramaic word (not the name of a deity), meaning simply riches, described as "unrighteous," because of their deceitful and transitory character; with a hint, perhaps, at the false view which men take of worldly wealth, regarding themselves as absolute proprietors rather than as stewards.

2. To "make friends of" is a common English expression, meaning to acquire as friends. Thus "make friends of the wise and good," i.e., gain their friendship. Such, however, is not the phrase here employed. Literally, it is "make friends out of," i.e. "by means of," as in the Revised Version. The whole command may therefore be paraphrased, "By means of deceitful riches (i.e. by their right employment), acquire to yourselves friends."

3. "That when ye fail." Here, again, we must consult the Revised Version, which reads "that when it shall fail." There is no reasonable doubt that this represents the correct text. "When ye fail" would mean "when ye die," which also would give a good sense. But our Lord's words, as rightly reported, refer to the riches themselves. When they are gone—for "as we brought nothing into this world, we can carry nothing out"—something yet remains! There is "a treasure in the heavens that faileth not." Luke xii. 33.

4. This treasure is realized, in part, in the form of a welcome to heaven. "Friends" acquired through the just and charitable use of "deceitful riches" will "receive" their benefactors "into the eternal tabernacles" (Rev. Ver.) The reference is not to the title to heaven: this is not secured by any deeds of ours. Yet a part of the "abundant entrance" into the future blessedness shall be the result of earthly self-denial and charity. Their works do follow them: their friends await them: two related aspects of one inspiring hope.

5. Finally, the words stand connected with the preceding parable. A becoming regard to the future is our duty. The unrighteous steward is commended by his master, not indeed for his dishonest dealing, but "because he had done wisely," according to the wisdom of "the children of this age." How much more should the "children of the light" employ their gifts and possessions here so as to secure imperishable treasure! The motive may not be the highest, but it has its place; and it will at least quicken our sympathy and brotherly kindness to be assured that those to whom we have been benefactors here will be our friends for ever.

An explanation is also requested by M. W. of Matthew xxi. 44: "Whosoever shall fall upon this stone shall be broken: but on whomsoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder."

The terrible consequences of rejecting Christ are here set forth by a twofold emblem, taken from Old Testament Scripture. To the unbelieving and disobedient He is "a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence." (Isaiah viii. 14). Their unbelief, by natural and inevitable consequence, entails moral and spiritual injury. The Pharisees and Sadducees brought ruin upon themselves by refusing to listen to Him; so with every doctrine and system which sets itself against His truth. In vain do they batter the Rock of Ages, they are broken in pieces, they come to naught. But in the end a more fearful consequence remains. Like the stone "cut out without hands" (Daniel ii. 34) which "smote and broke to pieces" the image, and made its fragments "like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors," so Christ, when He comes forth to judgment, shall utterly destroy His adversaries. The stone quiescent, over which men stumble and fall, represent what Christ is to the rebellious here; the stone in movement, crushing them utterly, what He will be to them hereafter. (A most impressive elucidation of the passage will be found in Dr. McLaren's "Manchester Sermons," vol. i.)

WINKLES!

"PLEASE, missis, have you got a pin?"

The question was addressed to me, in a childish voice, which had, however, a merry ring with it. I had paused for a moment to gather up my skirts a little, so as to keep them clear from the mud on the pavement. As it chanced, the stop took place in front of a shop where oysters, cockles, muscles, and periwinkles were displayed in tempting profusion.

I looked to see whence the voice came, and found that the owner of it was a little fellow, whose head was so overshaded by an old, wide-brimmed straw hat that he seemed to be standing under a small umbrella. I had quite to look beneath this shade to discern a pale face and a pair of merry, black eyes, fringed with long lashes. He might be a small-sized five-year-old, for he was only in pinafores. Beside him was another youngster, evidently under the protection of little Black-Eyes, who waited with a look of intense anxiety for my answer.

"Supposing I have got a pin," said I, "what then?"

"Oh, please, would you give it us?"

"What for? Why do you want a pin?" I asked.

"Winkles!" was the prompt reply, with a glance towards the open window of the fish shop.

I understood the position. Black-Eyes and his friend wanted the pin in order to extract the little sea snails from their shells with it.

But I could see they had no winkles in actual possession, so, whilst extracting a spare pin from the edge of my cloak, I said, "I can give you a good strong pin, but where are the winkles?"

"In there," indicating the pile with his thumb. "We've had some. Only two or three though, yet——"

The thought flashed across my mind, "Why the little rogues have been stealing. They watch their opportunity and snatch at odd ones that drop on to the slab within their reach. I put on a severe look and said, "but you ought not to take even one winkle that is not your own."

"Oh, missis, we didn't!" returned Black-Eyes, with a troubled face. "When the woman measures 'em she 'most always spills one or two, and they roll out o' window, and we pick 'em up. She don't want 'em back. She says so."

The child looked so straight at me out of those wonderful eyes, and gave such a prompt response, that I felt quite ashamed of myself for having suspected him. Poor little chap! He had stood there on the chance of picking up a stray winkle, and even when the first fell into his possession, groped for on the greasy-feeling pavement, he had bravely checked the impulse to make it his own, and had asked the shop-keeper if she wanted it back.

From instant observation, I concluded that the question had gone to her heart, for one or two winkles rolled off into the street just then, in what seemed a preventible way, as she served a juvenile customer.

I wondered how the youngsters had got at their winkles at first, or whether the pin had been too weak and had become hopelessly crooked.

"Here is a good strong pin for you," I said, handing the article which was received by Black-Eyes with rapturous thanks and an attempt at a bow, which had the effect of jerking off the big hat on to the pavement, whence it was speedily recovered.

"How about the winkles?" said I. "I suppose a penny would buy you quite a lot."

"Oh, wouldn't it?" returned Black-Eyes, and then stood as if absorbed in contemplating a vision of bliss that he could never hope to realise.

"Here, take this penny and buy some then," said I. "I'm sorry, I have not another pin for you. Good-bye, children."

"Oh, thank you, missis." Say "thank you and take your cap off," this to his wee companion. Then "you shall have the pin first Johnny, or may be the shop lady will give us another."

Black-Eyes put his arm lovingly round the less child's neck, and led him into the fish shop in a state of delight which it was worth a good many pennies only to witness. And I could not help lingering, even though time was precious, to see the children with the materials for what would be to them a feast.

Beside, when one thought over this little scene, there were a good many lessons to be learned from it. Little as the elder child was, he was guarding a brother or companion weaker, younger, more helpless still.

There was the patience with which he waited for a windfall, and the sturdy honesty which made him unwilling to use it until he was quite sure it would be right to do so. There were good manners and gratitude for a small kindness, which the natural longing for a banquet of winkles would not let him forget.

There was not only this example to the less child, but the lesson in civility which made Black-Eyes wait for his companion's thanks to be added to his own. And there was the delightful unselfishness that resolved to give the younger the first turn in using the pin, and the love which threw the guiding arm round his neck.

How easy it would have been for Black-Eyes to appropriate the penny, or absorb the lion's share of the little coming treat. To dole Johnny out a winkle now and then, and to reserve to himself the exclusive use of the pin, so that the other could never have the supreme felicity of extracting his own dainty morsel.

But, in turning my back upon this little picture, I felt satisfied that, if anything, the younger would have most and best of what had to be shared, and that his interests were safe in the hands of his companion. I left the well-lighted thoroughfare and turned into a dim side street, but, as I passed on, I seemed still to see the faces of my little friends, and often since I have recalled with pleasure, that scene to memory.

I witnessed another picture not far from the spot where Black-Eyes and I became acquainted. I saw it in the broad daylight, and the actors were two boys, each about a year apart, and as much older than the former two. This is a world of contrasts and these street pictures proved it.

One little fellow—his face streaming with tears and all besmeared through his frantic efforts to wipe them away with one hand, whilst, with the other, he tugged at a bit of a handkerchief entangled amid the varying contents of a small boy's pocket, was running after his elder companion. What with crying, running, and sobbing out at intervals—"Willie. Do stop. Do stop!" the child became quite exhausted, and finally coming to a stand-still, he leaned against the wall and wept bitterly.

He had no real trouble, but it was evident that he had a tender, loving disposition, a clinging nature that yearned for kindness and companionship. The two children had come out together, and the elder, a hard-faced malicious-looking boy, but sturdy and self-reliant as one could see, was tormenting the other by racing off a-head, hiding round corners, dodging in and out, and keeping him at a continual strain, in order that he might not lose sight of him altogether.

Perhaps it was very weak and foolish of the child to cry as if his young heart would break about a mere nothing. Far better to have strolled leisurely on, and told the other to go on his way and he would follow. But it is just the tender, loving natures that can bear anything better than unkindness, and it is such natures that are tortured and played upon, by those who find pleasure in witnessing the pain they have caused.

A glance at the mocking, evil face of the elder lad, sufficed to discern foreshadowings of a tyrannical manhood in years to come.

When I parted from Black-Eyes, I had thought to myself at what a trifling cost happiness had been purchased for him and his friend. Just a penny expended and two young hearts were gladdened and a happy memory left to me of two bright faces. "Now," I thought, "I will try the worth of a penny in drying tears."

So I had a talk with the weeping little man, and did my best to cheer him, with such effect that the handkerchief having been extracted from his pocket, he soon effaced the traces of tears and smears from his rosy cheeks. An occasional sob testified to recent trouble, but a very genuine smile appeared when I produced the penny and bade him put it in his pocket and take it home. Down it went under his knickerbocker museum of treasures, and he kept his hand in too, as he lifted his rosy face to kiss his thanks.

Next came what made the contrast between the elder boy and Black-Eyes. Our petty tyrant who had watched the transfer of the coin from round the corner, began to sidle up to the little one, with pretended friendship and hypocritical words. That penny had made all the difference, and the selfish rogue was plotting either to share it, or get the whole from his neighbour.

I turned back, though I could ill spare the time, and sent Master Willie to the right about, then cautioned the little one against his wiles. I did not want to make a tender confiding child into a suspicious one, so I had to give him quite a small lecture, and make him promise faithfully not to give the penny, or any portion of what he might buy with it, to Willie. He might share it with another friend if he liked, for little boys should be generous, only this boy ought not to be rewarded for naughtiness, I said.

I really believe the tender heart had forgiven its tormentor already, and that the penny was losing much of its value because it was not to be shared with Willie, for the child's eyes followed him with a sort of yearning look.

Maybe on some past occasion, the bigger boy had put forth his strength on behalf of the little one, and the remembrance of a single benefit could never be forgotten.

The two reminded me of a boy and his dog. The lad may plague the beast as much as he chooses, but if the creature loves him, he only rushes to his side with vociferous welcome, to be teazed again and again.

Generally speaking the young master, though a petty tyrant himself, protects his dog from other boy tyrants, and the animal knows it, and looks up to him accordingly.

There might be some such bond between Willie and the sorrowful wee man whose tears I had succeeded in drying.

I had to leave him; but as I went my way I drew fancy pictures of the homes and mothers of these my street acquaintances.

I pictured Black-Eyes, for instance, in a poor home with a hard-working, widowed mother. His clothes bespoke the poverty, for I was quite sure they had known other wearers—notably the wide hat—before they were worn by him. Their cleanliness, and that of both the children, told of a mother who did her best for the bodies of her little ones. They were kept warm and tidy to look at.

Then the way in which Black-Eyes protected Johnny seemed to say, that, mere baby as he was, he had often to take charge of the other baby a size less still, probably the mother went out to work—compelled to do it in order to win bread, and left these two to keep house with many an injunction, and a prayer to God to guard them from harm. Perhaps she had read the words "Leave thy fatherless children, I will preserve them alive," and taken them to herself and found comfort in them, as she went about her daily task.

I am sure she had taught her little ones to be truthful and honest, for they would not appropriate a stray winkle without the leave of her to whom it lawfully belonged.

The conduct of Black-Eyes seemed to brighten, by the thought of it, the dim little side street into which I passed when I bade him good bye, and a prayer went up from my heart to God, that He would bless the children and guide their young feet into the narrow path that leads to everlasting life.

I could not feel the same about Willie's home, for his conduct was tyrannical, selfish and mean. He enjoyed the sight of suffering and, unless he were checked and guided aright, would develop into a cruel and selfish man. Surely he needed to be prayed for most of all my street friends, and I remembered him too. One finds so many to pray for in passing to-and-fro in the world. And are we not all members of the great human family that sprang from the same Creator? Should we not all pray that we may become true children of the same heavenly Father?

As to the troubled little heart, he has a good mother, I am sure, and is loved and cosseted at home. He gets no stinted measure of affection. One could discern a mother's hand and love in every article of his clothing, even to the mite of a pocket-handkerchief which took so much tugging out when most needed.

As a last thought, one is struck with the fact of the small cost at which childish tears may be dried. It seems very easy to bestow a penny, and it is delightful to get such a large return for so small an expenditure.

I know there are wise people who would object to the bestowal of odd pennies on little street children and I own that it would not do to scatter even these broadcast. But when—well I will not argue, but suggest that, if in going along the streets, we can in any little way give a glimpse of happiness or a gleam of sunshine to a child, it is good for ourselves that we do not let slip the opportunity.

RUTH LAMB.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. II.

1. He was the third king of this name mentioned in the Bible.
2. He put one of our Lord's apostles to death.
3. He seized another with the same purpose.
4. When he wished to put him to death the prison was found to be empty.
5. Afterwards he held a great feast for all his nobles and officers.
6. He died a sudden and dreadful death.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE Chinese Government has issued a decree which is virtually one of complete toleration, assuring protection, to all missionaries. It has instructed its high officials in the various provinces to issue proclamations calling upon the people to live at peace with Christian missionaries and their converts. The terms of some of these proclamations are very remarkable. Thus we read in one posted at Ningpo:

"Know therefore, all men of whatsoever sort or condition, that the sole object of establishing chapels is to exhort men to do right: those who embrace Christianity do not cease to be Chinese, and both sides should therefore continue to live in peace, and not let mutual jealousies be the cause of strife between them. If cases come before the courts, the local authority should investigate them impartially, having regard only to the merits of the case and not to the religion of the litigants, and should give his decision quickly: thus neither party shall inflict injury on the other, each shall pursue in peace and quietude its various callings, and the desire of the State to include in its kindly benevolence the men from afar equally with its own people shall not be frustrated. From the date of this proclamation any lawless vagabonds who make trouble or stir up strife without a cause shall be punished with the utmost rigour of the law; no mercy will be shown, so beware!"

Another issued in the Shanghai district says:—"Bear in mind, that when missionaries live in the midst of your villages, you and they are mutually in the relationship of host and guest. Under ordinary circumstances it is your foremost duty to act towards them with courtesy and forbearance; should there arise any misunderstanding requiring to be set right, let each submit his side of the question to the local authorities for equitable arbitration and decision; your officials have the necessary power and influence. You must be careful on no account to give rein to ill-considered resentment, and fall, owing to the impulse of a moment, into the net of the law."

This view is a startling advance on the once popular cry which has pursued the missionaries as "foreign devils" in so many cities. It must not, however, be assumed that the change is due to growing sympathy with Christianity. The outbreaks at various places within the last few years have not only occasioned much local trouble, but have given rise to questions involving broader issues; and in all probability the edict is due to the controversy which culminated in the proposal to send a Papal Legate to China, and the counter claim of France to protect the Roman Catholic converts. It must be remembered also, that there are missionaries of various creeds and nationalities in China. Still this imperial decree marks an epoch, and must give fresh impulse to Christian effort. The progress making is one of the most remarkable features of our time.

THE London Missionary Society recently said farewell to another batch of medical missionaries appointed to labour in North China. Sir Risdon Bennett presided on the occasion. The Rev. Edward White, who gave the valedictory address, said he believed that the progress of Christianity was greatly hindered amongst Jews and Mohammedans because men did not teach it in the language of the New Testament, but in modern philosophical language.

THE China Inland mission has also been reinforced. Five more young men have gone forth, and several young ladies; twenty-five have already this year volunteered for the field; and it is the earnest desire of those abroad that the number may be increased to one hundred.

THE English Presbyterian mission reports that the unusually large number of thirty-four adults has been received in one month into the church by baptism. From Formosa also we learn that the native church there have resolved to establish a mission in the Pescadore Islands. In the Amoy district, five or six new stations have been opened at the expense of the native church.

MR. STANLEY'S expedition to the relief of Emin Pasha opens another chapter in the African story. There is too much reason to fear a time of disquietude among the tribes as they realise the encroaching presence of European influences. The disaster that has compelled Mr. Wakefield, of the Free Methodist Galla Mission, in East Africa, to retire for a time, is but another illustration of disturbed relations. The fact that Germany and England have each assigned to them a definite sphere of action, over vast territories, while not involving annexation, has yet a significance that will not be overlooked, as the recent treaties become known. This arrangement, we should note, leaves a large part of the field now occupied by the Church Missionary Society entirely to German control, namely, the stations of Mamboia, Mpwapwa, Uyui, and Msalala. The Universities' Mission in Usambara, Mombasa, and Taita, are in the territory reserved for the extension of British influence; Chagga is on the border-line. Bishop Hannington's route, Uganda, is in what may now be called British territory, though not annexed, while the old route is within the German protectorate. It is a question whether the German influence will prove favourable to these missions. The experience of the Baptists on the west coast points the other way. The Sultan of Zanzibar is held responsible for a strip of coast-line, some six hundred miles in length. Meanwhile Mr. Ashe has arrived from Uganda. His account of events to some extent modifies former statements. It appears that the number of Christians in Uganda, and the number massacred, has been under-estimated. More than 200 have been baptized by the missionaries of the Church Missionary Society, and probably a like number by the Roman Catholic priests; but many hundreds besides have learned to read, and the Romanist converts read the papers issued by the Protestant mission. Of the lads burnt to death at the capital, the majority were Romanists. Mr. Ashe thinks that some 200 persons who were more or less adherents of one or other of the missions were put to death altogether, and a large number of these were attached to the mission of the Church Missionary Society; but of its baptized Christians only twelve are certainly known to be dead.

THE outlook on the Congo is much brighter. The letters last received tell of "progress all along the line." Portions of the Scriptures have been printed in the Congo language by the mission press at Underhill Station. A new up-river station has been commenced at Lukolela. Here is a glimpse of the pioneer missionary: "The natives express themselves glad that we have come. One cannot help suspecting that their joy is only occasioned because they think we shall bring them cloth and trade; still, we are thankful to find a people who are glad to welcome us. To start with, we are trying to buy native houses. The forest is very dense, many of the trees being from eighty to one hundred feet high. These were fortunately cleared for us about a year or so ago, but the place has all overgrown since with small but very dense bush. When first we landed on our ground we found it occupied by a troop of monkeys; they did not, however, object to our taking possession, but made off at once, and have not since returned. We hear there are many wild animals in the bush." Then, in a postscript: "We are comfortably housed in a native hut, rather crowded, but happy, in spite of the hardship. We are both in excellent health, and are working hard with shovel, axe, and saw."

THE destruction wrought by the sale of spirits among the native tribes of Africa has not yet received the practical attention which the subject demands. Dr. Sims, who is returning to the Congo, referred to it in a recent speech at a leave-taking meeting held at Harley House, Bow. In illustration, he stated that even at Stanley Pool 25 per cent. of what is brought by the caravans is gin. At one place he visited, around the grave of a lad recently buried, were two rows of gin bottles. Farther on was another grave with four or five rows of gin bottles around it, and a demijohn on the top. In the house of the king he had seen eight or nine gin bottles under the king's bed. And this sort of thing is going on right away far into the interior. It is a common thing, in going from place to place, to find nearly all the people in a state of intoxication quite early in the day. In harmony with this statement is that of Mr. Joseph

Thomson, the well-known traveller, who says that "in many districts the wealth and importance of the various villages are measured by the size of the pyramids of empty gin-bottles which they possess." It is estimated, indeed, that 60,000 hogsheads of fifty gallons each is the annual consumption in the Niger and adjacent districts. Speaking also of slavery as he had seen it, Dr. Sims said that one night when on board the steamer, he was startled by seeing a great light, and then by floating articles bumping against the sides of the vessel. The morning revealed that a native town, containing 6000 inhabitants, had been utterly destroyed by fire, and at first not a native was to be seen. After some time one man told him that the Arabs were there, on the look out for slaves, and this was the result. Farther up the river they passed several villages and towns of 2000 inhabitants, and upwards, which had all been destroyed by fire. Not less than 40,000 people had been rendered homeless by the destruction of towns which he then witnessed.

THERE are now on the mainland of New Guinea about seventy mission stations, extending from near the East Cape to the West. The Rev. James Chalmers, describing his experiences, said they had been told to take civilisation first, and then Christianity; but he had travelled east and west in the South Pacific, and had never seen so-called "civilisation" civilise men: it is Christianity only that can civilise them.

FROM the sacred city of Benares come signs of fresh awakening. "I have had," writes the Rev. G. M. Bulloch, "the unspeakable pleasure of coming across quite a number of young men lately, who seem to be experiencing an awakening, and are passing through terrible spiritual throes. As a sign of the reality of this, I hear that the Brahmos have begun a second church in a thickly-populated part of the city. At first Brahmoism seems a fitting resting-place for some of these anxious spirits. Only yesterday morning I met an old pupil on the platform of the railway station who seemed greatly dejected. On entering into conversation with him I found that for several months he had been enduring what he called inexpressible torments, longing for spiritual rest. During this time he had read the Bible through three times, often sitting up all the night in the exercise."

THE desire for union which has found expression in several quarters of late has received another illustration in a conference of the Congregational Board and the Baptist Board—two bodies which have held their meetings regularly for a century past, but never before, save for some political purpose, have met together for common consultation on other subjects. The Rev. R. A. Redford read a paper on "Denominationalism in the Past and the Future"; and a discussion followed, in the course of which suggestions were made as to the possibilities of common action.

THE Working Men's Lord's Day Rest Association has issued an address in which the chief incidents of the last year bearing upon the Sabbath question are briefly recapitulated. Our readers are familiar with the main facts, but there is enough in various localities to show how rapidly the Sunday might be transformed into a day of trading and amusement, to the detriment of the working classes, were it not for the wholesome expression of public opinion. For example, at Liverpool the Great Eastern Steamship was chartered by a local company, and opened as a place of amusement on Sundays. Legal proceedings were commenced, but before the case could be heard the ship passed again to the control of its owners. At the Brighton Palace, near the same city, concerts were opened for money payment, but closed after remonstrance. At Harrogate and Brighton Sunday concerts for money admissions on a large scale were being arranged, but were abandoned on the heavy penalties for so doing being made known to the managers. The Crystal Palace grounds and the refreshment department for six o'clock Sunday dinners were open to season-ticket holders with a view to make money. Both movements have come to an end. These cases show how eager speculators are to appropriate the Sabbath to dividend-making. By 22 votes against 15 the Town Council of Liverpool has abandoned the Sunday organ recitals in St. George's Hall, after an experiment of six months' performances; but at Bradford the Town Council, after contests lasting over several years, has by 31 votes against 24 resolved to open the Museum Reading Room and Reference Library on Sundays for six months.

THE Socialists, or that section of them identified with the unemployed of London, have organised what they call "church parades," much to the discomfort of some congregations. Companies of them, sometimes numbering two or three hundred men, after marching through the streets, have attended service. They have some of them hissed at the prayers for the Queen, and also at the eighth commandment, possibly with some vague recollection of Proudhon's saying, that "all property is theft." At St. Mary, Battersea, the Rev. Canon Erskine Clarke replied with effect from the pulpit to some of their complaints. At Marylebone the rector, the Rev. W. Barker, on one occasion of their presence, addressed himself to them in a manner which won strong approval from some of their number. He took as text two passages—one from the fifth verse of the seventeenth chapter of St. Matthew: "Hear ye Him"; and the other from the thirty-second verse of the eighth chapter of St. John: "The truth shall make you free." De Jacqueville had predicted, he began, that the latter half of the nineteenth century would be signalised by a great social movement—an opening which immediately called forth exclamations of assent. Then he laid it down at the outset that the truth alone could make men free. Social problems could be solved only by understanding them and by the application of right principles. We were always under a temptation to adopt temporary expedients and to take short cuts, but in the long run sound results could be obtained only from sound principles. He recognised the honesty of many of the leaders and teachers of these men, but veracity was one thing and truth was another; and though men's veracity might always be unimpeachable, their conceptions of truth would change from time to time. The relations of truth are not always perceptible, and law and liberty often appear to be opposed. Many of his hearers were slaves to false ideas. The wrong-doing of one class did not justify the wrong-doing of another. No conjuring could make all men equal, and it was never right for a man to try to repress the individuality of his own class. As to what were truths, he would state a few. First, that God is, and that God is our Father. Secondly, that we are His children, and all are brethren. Thirdly, that there is a life beyond this in which every man will be judged by what he really is. Further, so far from God hating us, Christ had given His own blood to prove His love to us. The manner in which this plain speaking—direct, yet sympathetic—was received is an augury for good, to be noted by all who labour among the artisan classes.

MANY English sailors have been this winter in great distress. This is said to be mainly due to foreign seamen coming in to occupy their places. In London, the British and Foreign Sailors' Society has done its utmost, by providing free meals, or finding them friends and situations, to aid those who are unable to pay for accommodation in the Sailors' Home. The Rev. J. P. Millar gives the result of his inquiries on a recent Sunday, when he met ninety-seven of these men in a mission-room near the Thames: "I found that in the matter of food it is a rare thing for the majority of them to pass a week without two or three days' entire want, and such food as they get on other days is little better than scraps or crusts. A bed to lie on at night is a luxury to be enjoyed, once a fortnight or once a week, as the case may be. The usual experience is to walk the streets, or to sleep in vans in open yards, under arches, or anywhere away from the eye of the policeman. One man told me he had slept once in bed during the previous seventeen nights. Such a place as home is unknown to most of them, the nearest approach to it being the lodging-house; but a few of them are married. Yet in most cases, it is not drink that has done these men harm, or bad conduct. Within these three years we have got 2,600 sailors to take the pledge, and more than 2,000 have kept it. I put the question to those present, How many are teetotalers? when a clear majority held up hands. As to conduct, one man, who seemed quite as badly off as the others, gave me his last eight certificates to inspect, when all of them bore the mark V.G. (very good)." We have heard much of the waifs of the streets drifted city-wards from the country fields; and much of the straitened dwellers in overcrowded city courts; this aspect of the riverside is not less painful. Any contributions in aid of these distressed seamen may be sent to Thomas Hankey, Esq., of the Bank of England, the treasurer of the Society.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

BY EVELYN EVERETT GREEN.

CHAPTER XIV.—CLIVE'S CONQUEST.

A LESSON IN BOAT-BUILDING.

"COME with me this morning, Clive, and see my dear little Jack," said Reinée.

"I shall be jealous of that precious Jack of yours if you persist in using such endearing terms."

"Well, be as jealous as you like, but come with me. It is so nice to have you all by yourself again."

Clive was lolling on a green bank beneath the terrace with a newspaper beside him. Reinée, parasol in hand and basket on arm, had come to seek him before starting on her expedition. Clive was in his white flannels, and evidently proposed some boating or lawn tennis that day. He looked up at his sister as she spoke the last words with a merry twinkle in his eye.

"Is that meant for a compliment to Trevelyan?"

Reinée coloured a little.

"I cannot help being very glad he has gone, although I do not like saying inhospitable things about any guest of ours, especially if it is a friend of yours."

"Well, to tell the truth, Reinée," answered Clive, "I don't regret him much myself. He does not altogether improve as he grows older.

"Can't you sing me a song? It's your turn now."

But Alice shook her head.

"I can't sing when anybody's there to hear."

"Well, you must sing to me some day when we're quite alone," he answered, smiling as he got off the wall. "Are you ready, Reinée? We have stayed an unconscionable time: but you don't seem shy of inflicting yourself upon the community."

They spoke their kindly adieus and brother and sister had almost ascended the steep path to the top of the cliff when the patter of footsteps behind them made Clive turn round.

The lame girl was hurrying after them as quickly as her crutches would allow, and as the young man stepped back a pace or two to meet her, she pulled from her waistband a single, half-blown white moss rose evidently just gathered, and put it into his hand; then turning quickly round, she began descending the rugged path with marvellous agility.

"Why, Clive," said Reinée with a smile, "you have achieved at one stroke what I have failed to accomplish by much pains and patience. Alice will not speak to me or look at me if she can help it."

"I suppose she is a little touched in the head?"

"She is peculiar, but I do not know that it amounts to more than that. You have made a conquest anyhow."

Clive laughed at the idea, and gave little heed to the matter; but he began to take an interest from that day forward in the little bright-eyed Jack and his odd lame sister.

The cliff path was the shortest way down to the beach, where Clive's boat lay moored, and he was in the habit of passing the little thatched cottage two or three times a week. He would never go by without a kind word to Jack, and a promise that when he was well enough he should come with him and steer his boat.

As for Alice, she watched for him in her odd silent fashion day by day, and never let him pass without some simple offering of a flower, or fern, or perhaps a curious shell or pebble. Sometimes he would sit on the wall awhile, and chat to Jack or sing a song, and Alice always hovered around, evidently taking a keen pleasure in these visits.

Clive did not think much of the matter, little knowing what the lame girl's devotion was to cost him, but Reinée was much surprised by what she heard and saw, as were the inmates of the cottage themselves.

But Alice could give no explanation of her odd likes and dislikes. She told Jack that Miss Dumaresq only came to amuse herself, and did not really care for them, and no indignant protestations on her brother's part, could shake her in this conviction. Why she did not resent Clive's visits on the same ground it would be hard to say; but his voice and his whistle and perhaps the very carelessness of his merry ways had quite won her stubborn heart, and he became to her at once a hero and an idol.

Nobody however had the least idea what was to come of Clive's conquest, or to what results it would lead. Certainly there was something very attractive about the two young Dumaresqs, this brother and sister who were so devotedly attached to one another, and who won all hearts by their kindly sympathy and ready interest in the life around them into which they were so willing to enter.

Clive had taken a great liking for Wulfric Meynal, partly perhaps out of gratitude, but more from genuine admiration for the man himself; and the difficulty of improving the acquaintance only seemed to increase the young man's desire for it.

Wulfric was much too busy to pay or receive visits, and it never occurred to him that his society could afford pleasure to others. That the gay and brilliant Clive could really desire his company was an idea that never entered his head, and yet such was undoubtedly the case, and by-and-by even Wulfric became convinced of it, and the consciousness brought with it an odd glow of pleasure and a sense of gratitude and satisfaction.

Clive would often stroll in at the hour when Wulfric was usually at leisure; and as often as he could he would get the young doctor to the Hall, or detain him there after a professional visit and improve the acquaintance by every means in his power.

Mr. Damaresq liked Wulfric exceedingly, and had the utmost confidence in his skill. He was benefited by his treatment, and was more inclined to think favourably of his own case than he had been able to do before.

Mrs. Dumaresq believed in the young doctor's medical skill, although she had no liking for him personally. She would have preferred only to receive him on a strictly professional footing; but then Clive was the very idol of her rather cold heart, and whatever he chose to do she could not oppose. She was so pleased at having him at home that she was glad for him to enliven his time in every possible way, and if Dr. Meynal's society was an attraction, she would make no objection to the friendship. To her Wulfric was so essentially an unpleasing and uninteresting man—rough, heavy, and dull, she mentally called him—that the idea of his attracting the esteem and regard of her daughter never for a moment occurred to her.

Yet Reinée saw a great deal of her brother's friend on the occasions when he came to the Hall, and she shared Clive's admiration and respect for him in no small degree. Since she had begun to help Barbara a little in visiting some of the sick poor, a common bond of sympathy seemed to unite them, and they had many things to discuss together, and Wulfric was often appealed to for advice with regard to some of Reinée's plans and projects.

Of course she was inclined to "spoil the people," as Wulfric often told her, with a smile that robbed the rebuke of anything like ungraciousness. With money at easy command, and warm feelings of sympathy towards all who were suffering from any kind of ill, it was inevitable that Reinée should incline to an over-lavishness of generosity; and many of her pretty little

You were pretty well right, I believe, in your verdict. I do not believe he is a good man. He is not good enough anyway, for my little sister. I am glad he has gone, and I hope he will not come back very quickly."

"Do you think he will?"

"Undoubtedly he will, sooner or later. He will not let go his prize without a struggle; but he evidently saw that he was not favoured by you, and could reckon on no support from me, and he judged it wise to let well alone, and not provoke a refusal by speaking at an inopportune moment. After that narrow escape of mine on the cliff he seemed to know he had lost a point or two by his shirking danger. Your regal scorn was a little too much for him, Reinée—you can be magnificent when you are roused; and now he has taken himself off awhile to 'wait till the clouds roll by.'"

Reinée stood silent for a few minutes wrapt in thought, but then, putting on one side all unpleasant topics, she smiled in the sunny fashion her brother loved to see.

"And meantime we can enjoy ourselves without him; and you are to come with me this morning to see my dear little Jack."

"And where does this infant prodigy reside?"

"In a nice little cottage half-way down the cliff. You will come, won't you, Clive?" for he had made no sign of moving all this time, and was lying back in luxurious ease upon the bank.

"I suppose my life will be made a burden to me until I do," answered Clive, rising leisurely, "and you must play tennis with me this afternoon in return. Now, give me that basket; I suppose I must needs be a beast of burden when we go on these charitable errands. There, which way? All right—phew! How hot it is in the sun!"

And laughing and talking in gay and easy fashion they approached the cliff path and began the descent.

"I hate stuffy cottages!" remarked Clive, who loved to grumble; "especially on a day like this."

"Well you need not go in, Mr. Fastidious. You can stay and talk to little Jack outside. He is sure to be out on a day like this. I must go in and talk to his mother."

"Is it the father of this little chap that works on the farm—a delicate-looking man they call Stone?" asked Clive.

"Yes, do you know anything of him?"

"Only that he seems to understand his business very well, and he's rather knowing with horses too. He suggested something for Gipsy's strained shoulder after her fall that did her more good than anything else. I was telling the governor the other day what a handy, civil-spoken sort of fellow he was."

Reinée looked pleased.

"That is a good boy, Clive. Always stand up for my protégés."

"Of course," answered Clive promptly; and as they were now approaching the cottage, further conversation was suspended.

Little Jack was lying out upon his cushioned couch in the shade, and his face looked brown and healthy. The good nourishing food which the improved circumstances of the family enabled his mother to give him had worked a marked change for the better since Reinée had seen him first. He had a table in front of him on which lay a vast assortment of odds and ends of rubbish, such as boys love to collect about them.

As the visitors approached, he looked up, and his face beamed all over when he saw Reinée.

"Mother, mother!" he cried, "here's my young lady!"

Mrs. Stone, at the sound of the call, appeared at the cottage door, and curtesied to the visitors. Clive lifted his hat and Reinée smiled and touched Jack's curly head with her gloved hand.

"You are very busy this morning, Jack. What are you doing with all that wood?"

"I'm a trying to make a boat, I am," answered the child brightly, "but it ain't so easy as it looks."

"Well, you ask my big brother to tell you how. He was a great hand at it once, He's come here to see you this morning, you see."

"Thank'ee sir," said Jack, pulling his forelock.

Reinée passed into the cottage and Clive seated himself in an easy attitude upon the low stone wall that bounded the little garden on the sea side, and was close to the foot of Jack's couch.

"A nice young man you are to go tumbling down precipices and breaking your bones! I suppose it was an excuse for playing truant all these weeks. You ought to be ashamed of yourself, that you ought."

Jack grinned from ear to ear.

"Well, it weren't my fault, I don't think. It were an accident. Besides you broked your own leg, you did, when you were at school," and he looked up in Clive's face with a little laugh of triumph.

"Who told you that, you impudent young rascal?"

"My young lady did," and Jack glanced towards the cottage where Reinée had disappeared. "She said you wanted a deal of amusing, she did."

Clive laughed mirthfully, and Jack, encouraged by the kindliness of the young gentleman's face and manner, concluded archly: "She didn't tell me as you was ever ashamed of yourself."

"Ah, but I was old enough to do as I pleased, and you're not, which makes all the difference. And how soon are they going to get you on your legs again?"

"In about a week, my doctor says. He's going to let me have a pair of crutches to get about on a little; and then I shall have a stick, and then I shall run about as I did used to do. It were a bad break, it were, but it's doing famous, and I shan't be no worse for it in the long run, that's what he says."

"Dr. Meynal?"

"Yes; he's a good 'un, he is, and so is Miss Barbara. She sent my young lady, and she's the best of them all. I've been in rare luck, I have!"

Jack's whole face glowed, and Clive, glancing at the child with his broken limb, and homely surroundings, fell into a brief reverie, from which he roused himself to observe—

"And so you don't know how to set about making a boat, don't you?—and you, half a sailor too? How comes that?"

"Well, I ain't got much of a knife to start with," answered Jack, holding up a weather-stained haft with about an inch and a half of rusty broken blade.

"Think that's any better?" asked Clive, tossing him the one from his own pocket.

Jack's eyes sparkled with delighted interest as he handled the wonderful implement, and carefully opened one bright sharp blade after another, and tested their edges with his thumbnail.

"That's something like a knife!" he said, with great admiration. "I expects that was made in London, I do."

"Well, I dare say you're not much out. And do you think it would do your business for you better than that treasure?"

Jack looked a little mystified.

"Would you like to keep it altogether to help with your boat-building business?"

Jack's eyes opened wide, and he drew a long breath.

"Be you a joking, sir?" he asked.

"No, old fellow, I mean what I say. You may keep it. I dare say I've another at home. Now let's see how you set to work—I'll show you a dodge or two. I was a dab hand at that sort of thing when I was a shrimp like you."

Reinée sat some twenty minutes in the cottage with Mrs, Stone, hearing about Jack's progress and the other simple joys and sorrows that make up the sum of so many lives. Mrs. Stone was not a woman who could talk of her affairs to many people, but Reinée's gentle ways and sweet smiles had won the way to her heart, whilst the kindness shown to her little boy during this time that would otherwise have been so trying had filled her with a deep and earnest gratitude.

So she could talk to the young lady from the Hall as she had not been able to talk to any one for many a long day, and Reinée listened with an interest that was not in the least feigned, and which, by its sincerity, seemed to invite confidence.

When the girl quitted the cottage and rounded the angle of the house that hid Jack's couch from view she saw something that caused her a sensation of considerable surprise.

During the whole month that she had been visiting at the cliff cottage she had never once succeeded in winning a single word or smile from the crippled girl, Alice. Beloved as she was by all the rest of the family, and particularly by Jack, his sister had never consented to make friends or to relax the hostile attitude she had established from the first. Reinée was sorry and perplexed, but as all her efforts to make friends had proved fruitless, and as the child was said to be a little wrong in the head, she had at last yielded up the attempt and had ceased to pay the attentions that were obviously so much resented.

So that her surprise was now very great at what she now saw.

Clive was seated as before on the low wall and was working away at a miniature boat to which he was putting the finishing touches, whilst Jack watched him with eager eyes.

Clive was whistling as he worked, and his whistle was peculiarly clear and sweet and bird-like, and he could trill and shake and warble like a sky-lark.

Jack was listening with as much pleasure as he watched, and he was not the only auditor, for Alice had drawn near from the other side of the wall and was standing quite close to Clive, her lips parted in a breathless smile, her eyes wide and full of delight, her whole face so wonderfully changed and softened that Reinée hardly knew the girl.

"'Tis the music," said Jack in a low voice, catching Reinée's look of surprise. "Our Alice does so love it."

Clive ceased whistling as his sister approached and looked up with his merry smile.

"Is the charitable mission accomplished?" he asked in French "and have we sufficiently done our duty to our neighbour."

Reinée smiled and sat down for a few minutes to talk to Jack.

"I have heard from the lady to whom I sent your sea-weeds, Jack. She is very much pleased with them and has sent you half a sovereign," and Reinée produced the bright little coin and held it out to Jack.

Jack's eyes sparkled more brightly than the gold. He took it eagerly and looked at it, and then held it out to Reinée.

"Will you take care of it for me, please? And I'll try and save up all I can to get mother a warm gown or shawl against the cold weather comes."

"Yes, Jack, I will do that gladly," answered Reinée, "and if you do some more sea-weed as nicely as the last, I dare say I can find a purchaser again."

"And if you'll make me a fleet of decent boats for my little nephews," added Clive, "I'll give you sixpence a piece for them."

As Clive had no small nephews, Reinée heard this proposition with considerable amusement, and her brother catching the glance in her eye laughed aloud; but Jack was too delighted at his good luck to observe anything of this.

Alice had moved away as soon as the whistling ceased, and was now hidden behind a low bush.

"Sing us a song before we go, Clive," said Reinée. "I want to see how Jack can carve."

So Clive sang a good rollicking sailor song with a swing in it that seemed to speak of beating waves and a rolling ship. His voice was as clear and true and flexible as his whistle had been, and Jack forgot his boat to listen, whilst Alice drew nearer and nearer as if drawn by an invisible power.

When Clive stopped she was close beside him, and he looked down at her with a smile.

"Well, is it so very wonderful?" he asked, catching the wrapt expression in her eyes. "Did you never hear any one sing before?"

"Not like that," she answered without shrinking away as Reinée had expected. "I think the angels must sing like that."

Clive laughed a little at the notion.

plans were negatived with a smile by Wulfric, a smile half sad, half pleased, and he would say with his unconsious air of command: "No, Miss Dumaresq, if you want my sanction I cannot give it. Do not pauperise the people, and teach them to think that they are to have everything they fancy just because you have plenty to give. Keep your money for the really weak and suffering, and those who cannot help themselves; but let those who can work do so, and do not continue doles longer than is absolutely necessary, or let it be thought that you encourage idleness or needless complainings."

And if Reinée sometimes looked a little sad and disappointed at having some pet scheme quietly put asido in this way, she very soon learned how wise and far-seeing Wulfric Meynal's judgments were, and how really tender-hearted he was in any case of genuine distress and suffering. She began to feel that he could never be wrong and to look up to him as to a great and good man who stood on a higher level than that of ordinary mortals.

Her manner towards him, though always sweet and gracious, had just that touch of reserve that is often to be noticed in the young towards those whom they most reverence and respect. Mrs. Dumaresq observed it with satisfaction, and considered that Reinée was acting with becoming dignity. But Clive sometimes smiled to himself as he listened to the discussions between his sister and his friend, and said to himself that she was never so bewitching as when she was talking in that earnest serious way, appealing to him with such perfect confidence in his judgment and such absolute trust in his kindness.

"I don't know how Trevelyan would like it if he were here," he said sometimes to himself, "but I doubt if he will be here just yet. He certainly went away in high dudgeon about something, and when he comes back it seems to me that the chances are it will be—too late."

THE DIVINE SHADE ON THE RIGHT HAND.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D.

"The Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand."—Psa. cxxi. 5.

WE are accustomed to regard this localising of the divine agency as a mere poetical expression. We see no special reason why the right hand should have been selected in preference to the left. Such a restriction of the Supreme Being who fills all heaven and earth with His presence, seems more consistent with the genius of idolatry than with the lofty monotheism of the Jews. God can defend us equally in all directions, and His overshadowing power is as necessary on the one hand as on the other. The choice of the right hand might indeed have derived a figurative significance from the fact that there seems to be some physiological impulse to use it in preference to the left hand. The right hand is undoubtedly the stronger of the two members, and is universally used as the leading organ in all the arts of life. Mankind have everywhere trained themselves to use the right hand before the left in all work that requires either strength or skill; and to be left-handed is considered to be feeble and awkward. The allusion of the Psalmist therefore appears to us to mean no more than that the Lord is our defence on the side which we ourselves most honour, and where, from a human point of view, His assistance could be given with most advantage.

If we think more deeply upon the subject, however, we should naturally be led to reverse this supposition. We should conclude that the Divine promise of help would be given, not to the strongest but to the weakest point. The right hand is already strong, whereas the left hand is feeble. In that case it is more important that the feeble side should be fortified, than that a comparatively powerful side should have an increase of protection.

This idea leads us to inquire whether the conventional meaning which we attach to the right hand is here the correct one. By the Hebrews the four points of the compass were named after personal terms, determined by the attitude of a spectator towards the rising sun. Looking to the east his front was towards that quarter, and therefore the term "before" stood for that direction, while "behind" stood for the west, and of course the left hand represented the north and the right hand the south. Accordingly, when the Psalmist says that "the Lord is thy shade upon thy right hand," the reference is to the south. All the metaphors of the Psalm, in which the exile is yearning for the hills of his fatherland, speak of the special dangers of the desert—the heat of the burning sun by day, and the perils from lawless tribes by night. On the south the evils were intensified. The north was the region of home, where the cool mountains rose up to the sky, and the rejoicing streams refreshed the air, and the dense foliage of the trees created a delicious shade at noon. It was to the hills of the north on their left hand that they lifted up their eyes for help. In the south, on the other hand, stretched a bare and dreary desert, trackless and shadeless. There the rays of the sun were almost vertical, and no green leaf or cloud or well was present to relieve the intolerable heat. On their right hand therefore would be intensified all the evils of thirst, heat, and monotony which made the passage of the desert so trying. Consequently the Lord engaged to be their shade in the direction in which they needed it most. Where the heat was greatest there the Lord should give them the deepest shade.

And how grateful such a promise must have been no inhabitant of the cool north can adequately appreciate. Even in our mild summers we are sometimes oppressed with the heat; and from the noonday sun in July we know how delightful is the dim green gloom of umbrageous woods. But our experience falls far short of that of the pilgrim in the glowing Arabian desert, to whom the shadow of a great rock in a weary land is the most delicious of all physical sensations. In the north, we know of the sun only as a benefactor, and we can hardly have too much of him in our long winters and short dim summers; but in the fierce south he is not without his terrors. The ancient poets spoke without exaggeration of the death-dealing arrows of Apollo; and to the unshielded head the blaze of the unclouded noon is full of peril. While the sun stimulated the rich oasis into amazing luxuriance, it burnt up the leafless sandy desert. So too the glory of the Lord, whose brightest material image is the sun, is not unmingled with dread. While therefore He is our sun, He is at the same time our shield. He is never our foe, but our best friend. We need no shelter from Him, but He is our refuge. The Lord is our shade on our right hand where the heat of the desert is greatest. He is our pillar of cloud by day all through the wilderness; and there shall be a tabernacle in the daytime from the heat.

But worse even than physical heat and drought and barrenness were the unknown supernatural terrors on the right hand of the pilgrim travelling in the desert. Among all ancient nations the right hand, or the south, was the God-forsaken direction—the region of special misfortune. Job gives an indication of this superstition when he says: "I go to the left hand, where He doth work, but I cannot behold Him," implying that on the right hand God does not work, but has abandoned that region to the lawless forces of chaos. From the south, or the right hand, therefore, there was a belief that spiritual perils were to be specially dreaded. That quarter was the abode of evil spirits. In Indian thought all deadly influences proceeded from the south, the abode of death. The Talmud says that the most poisonous of all winds is the south wind, which would destroy the world were it not held back by a specially-commissioned angel. The southern desert was supposed to be haunted by vague, mysterious beings from the other world whose airy voices syllabled men's names, whose misty forms appeared before the sun-wearied eye that fashioned the mirage out of the thirsty sand. Satan in Scripture is said to reveal himself on the south or right hand; as in the vision of Zechariah, where he appears on the right hand of the one whom he came to accuse, and in the imprecation of the Psalmist, "Let Satan stand at his right hand."

This idea of special evil belonging to the right hand quarter, gives a striking emphasis to the expressions used in several Psalms, as in the 91st Psalm, where it is said, "a thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh thee;" and in the 142nd Psalm: "I looked on my right hand, but there was no man that would know me; refuge failed me, no man cared for my soul." Job, searching for God in his trouble, said "He hideth Himself on the right hand that I cannot see Him;" and of those who mocked his sufferings he complained, "Upon my right hand rise the youth; they push away my feet, and they raise up against me the ways of their destruction." Ezekiel, prophesying against Jerusalem, described the appearance of the King of Babylon standing at the parting of the way and using unhallowed arts by means of which he might prevail against the sacred city. "At his right hand was the divination for Jerusalem, to appoint captains, to open the mouth in the slaughter, to lift up the voice with shouting, to appoint battering-rams against the gates, to cast a mount, and to build a fort." This universal idea of the unhallowed nature of the right hand quarter must have arisen from sun-worship, which was the primitive form of idolatry. In the act of solar adoration it was considered among all ancient nations a great offence and punishable by some marks of heavenly displeasure to make the ceremonial turn from right to left, and not from left to right as the sun moves in the heavens.

We must be careful, however, to notice the distinction between the same term when employed to signify the human arm and the cardinal point. When referring to the human member the right hand is always used in Scripture in the best sense—to indicate strength and blessing and favour—because physiologically we use the right hand in preference to the left; but, when employed to indicate one of the points of the compass, the right hand is almost always used in an evil sense, to indicate danger and calamity. And looking at it thus, as the region from which special supernatural terrors were apprehended, in what a new and striking light does the promise of the text stand out, when we bear in mind the strong hold which this superstitious belief obtained among all ancient nations. The Lord accommodated Himself to the weakness and ignorance of man. As the Apostle Paul said about heathen idols that they had no objective existence in the world of reality, so God might have said, regarding these superstitious terrors. He might have tried to reason men out of their foolish beliefs. But superstitious fear is an unreasonable thing; and God therefore treated His people as grown-up children, looking at the matter not from His own point of view, but from theirs. To them the superstitious terrors haunting the lonely southern desert, the land through which their pilgrimage lay, had a very real existence; and therefore God regarding these terrors from their view-point put His promise of safety from them into the very mould of their fears. The Keeper of Israel would be their shade on their right hand. In the quarter from which they dreaded most danger from unseen and imaginary foes, in that quarter would the Divine protection be most powerfully and graciously afforded. Greater was He that was with them than all that could be against them. "For I the Lord thy God will hold thy right hand, saying unto thee, Fear not; I will help thee."

In these modern scientific days, when in the world we see only a rigid chain of antecedents and consequences, it is difficult for us to realise the terrible bondage to the power of superstition under which the ancient nations lived. Man was oppressed by nature; it lay like a great mysterious shadow over his spirit; its unknown forms and forces were dread personalties connected with his fate and having a strange power over him. Everywhere he expected to encounter the evil eye, and the spells of magic. Every lonely place was haunted by some awful being; and the darkness of night was the suitable opportunity for all the tenants of the invisible world to carry on their unhallowed work. From this terrible bondage of enchantment Christianity has delivered man. It has exorcised the world, and banished by the light of true religion the evil forms that flitted in the twilight of paganism and terrified the imaginations of men. The great god Pan disappeared when Christ appeared, and, according to the beautiful myth, his dying wail was heard over the far-off hills when Jesus died on the cross; and there are no unaccountable panics now to frighten men in lonely places. Christ, by His resurrection and ascension, has annexed the dark realms of death to the kingdom of light, has explored and exposed all the dread mysteries of the seen and the unseen worlds, and brought the whole universe into sight —so that in no dark unknown part may now lurk the foes of man. The world had quailed before a multitude of powers visible and invisible, before shapes that had been created by men's own evil consciences, which they had sought to conciliate by accursed sacrifices; but far above all these spirits of evil to which they had done homage He was exalted who had given His life for man, who had sounded the lowest depths of fear that man might no more fear, who ascended the highest heights of power that man might be raised up together with Him in the heavenly places above all the principalities and powers of evil. Blessed be our Redeemer for disenchanting the world! But though the world of imaginary evil spirits which superstition created has for us ceased to exist, we are still in the midst of real evils of the spiritual world, of which the superstitious terrors of our forefathers were the outward and fantastic setting forth; for behind the fictions of ancient superstition which overshadowed all society with its baneful influence, there was the existence of a spiritual world which is not a falsehood but a solemn and enduring reality. This spiritual world science and philosophy cannot banish; Christianity cannot exorcise. On the contrary, the gospel of Christ gives it a more vivid existence, and makes it stand out in more terrible relief against the background of human life. When, therefore, we are oppressed with its fears, when we feel ourselves compassed about with a great mystery of evil against which we are utterly powerless, we can pray for the purging of our vision with the eye-salve of faith, so that we may see the whole desert filled with horses and chariots of fire, and realize that the barren and lonely place in which we stand is a Mahanaim—God's host—and that like Jacob we are pursuing our way through an avenue of angels to whom God has given charge concerning us. On our right hand where we are most assailed by spiritual fears and terrors He will be our shade; and there can be no more effective shield against all other fears than the fear of the Lord.

But apart from the special interpretation I have given to the text, its simple, obvious meaning, intelligible to the humblest capacity, is sufficiently beautiful. The daisy to the eye of the philosopher reveals unknown beauties of structure and proofs of design, but the eye of the child, who knows nothing of its inner wonders, sees in it enough to attract its admiration and love. And so in my text, though we may be ignorant of its special appropriateness to the ideas of the time and the place in which it originated, we recognise in it a precious significance and adaptation to our own wants and circumstances. It puts the doctrine of the particular providence of God in a most attractive form. By localising the general care of Him who rules in heaven and earth, it shows how He adapts Himself to our personal necessities. He is not merely our shade in general, He is our shade on our right hand. He comes very close to us, walks by our side, is at our right hand, waiting for our need of Him, in the place where He can render help with the greatest rapidity and efficiency. When we look up at the sun in the heavens, and remember that our earth is but a satellite of that sun, which is itself but a unit, and not the grandest among the innumerable myriads of suns with their dependent worlds in space, we are apt to be overwhelmed, and to say with the Psalmist, "What is man, that Thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that Thou visitest him?" How reassuring then is the thought that He who upholds the sun in its mighty orbit, condescends to be a shade on his right hand from its burning heat to the humblest human being who fears His name! Far higher in the scale of creation than that orb of heaven with all its dazzling glory is a single human soul which has entered into fellowship with God and prays for grace to do His will. Sooner will that sun be extinguished than a hair of his head be injured. God knows him by name, and therefore all providence becomes to him special providence; for all dealings with persons must be special and distinguishing. All things work together for his good. He can say, "Because the Lord is at my right hand, I shall not be moved."

And in thus becoming our shade on our right hand how much is implied! There is first the idea of gentleness. We have in the fierceness of the sun a type of the burning glory of God; and in the grateful coolness of the shadow a type of the tenderness of God's love. The shadow is cast by the sunshine. The same fierce light that dazzles and destroys produces the shadow that cools and refreshes. And so with God tenderness is the token of strength; gentleness is the manifestation of power. He who is strong to smite is also strong to save; He forms the light and creates darkness; and the darkness and the light are both alike to Him. The shadow is only the subduing of His glory to suit our weakness—the hiding of His power to bring out our own.

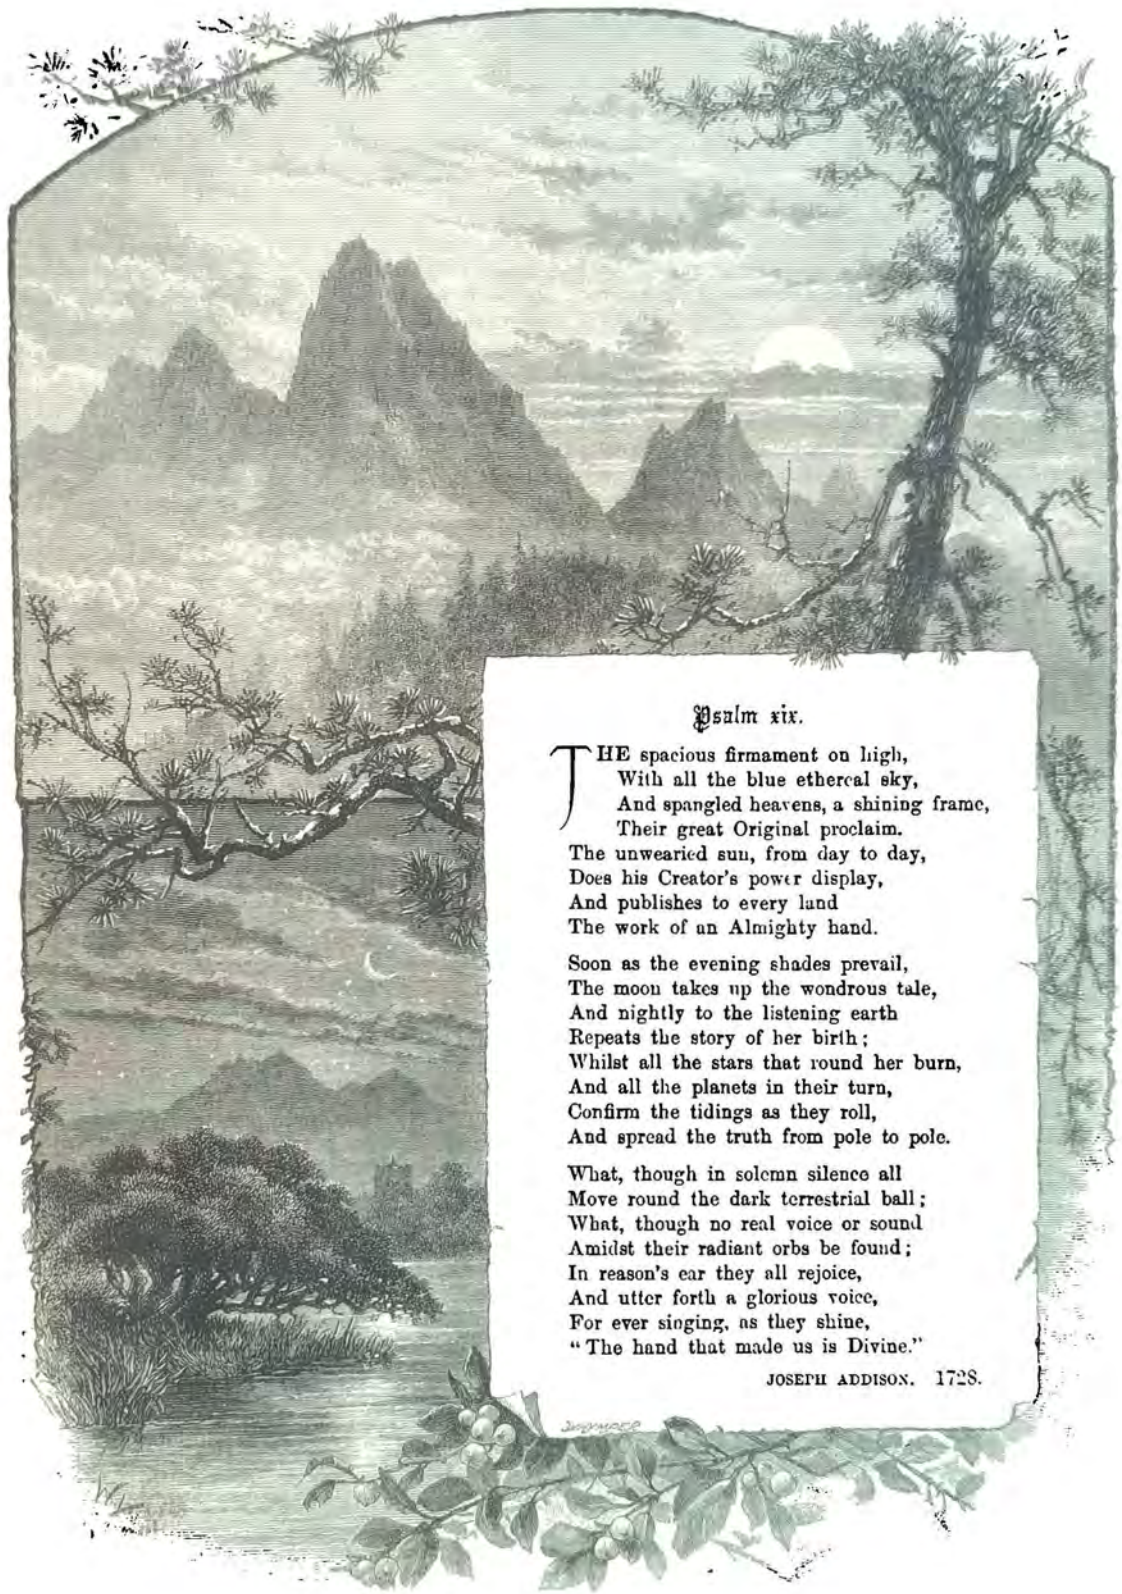
There is next the idea of self-sacrifice. The shadow is the abnegation of light. There can be no shadow without loss of light. And He who is the true Light, He who is our Sun has divested Himself of His uncreated glory, and clothed Himself in the cloud of human nature that He might be our shadow on our right hand. We cannot gaze directly and steadily at the noonday sun without being blinded, and we cannot look upon the face of God and live. Angels veil their faces with their wings in His presence. But the overwhelming brightness of the Godhead is mitigated and softened in the shadow of the Mediator who bears our nature and wears our form. We are no longer lost in the vastness of His infinitude; He is our shadow on our right hand. It requires no painful effort, no straining of our faculties beyond their strength to hold communion with Him. In Christ Jesus we have all the endearing qualities which render God familiar to the heart.

To make that grateful shade for us, the Sun of Righteousness suffered an awful eclipse. The face that was tranfigured brighter than the sun on Hermon, grew cold and dark on Calvary. He who shone a great light in the midst of heaven could say of His life on earth, as it could be said of no other human life, "My days are as a shadow." His life was one long avenue of darkened days, a continuous walk through the valley of the shadow of death. And therefore the shade that He is to His people is a shade made by sorrow and suffering and death. It was by emptying Himself of His glory, casting a shadow where there was light, a vacancy where there was fullness, a poverty where there were riches, death where there was life—that He has become our shade on our right hand. And now to make a grateful shade for His people in the burning and intolerable hours of life, when the whole head is sick and the whole heart is faint, how near does He come!

The sun is far off in the heavens; the shadow is down upon the earth, beside our path, over our head. So near to us does God come in order to be a shade on our right hand, a very present help in our time of need. He is very close to us without and still closer within. It is a nearness which we can most easily bear—a nearness not of majestic power, but of quiet gentleness. The shade that is over us is like the cool touch of a loving hand on a feverish brow. It is the shadow of His sympathy, touched with a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, knowing the frailty of our frames.

Light usually is life and joy, shadow is dreariness and death. But when the Lord becomes our shade on our right hand, there are no elements of death or gloom in the blessed overshadowing. It is grateful unspeakably. It is suggestive of the refreshing dew, and of the balmy odours of the reposeful darkness, and of ennobling visions of the stars. In the shadow of His presence we grow better than in the garish light of the world. His shade is our true light. By His gentleness we become great; our being is enlarged; and by stooping to us and identifying Himself with us, He has enabled us to become more like Himself. There is no terror to paralyse our souls or make us shrink into ourselves, but a Divine lowliness and graciousness, drawing nearer to us in tender sympathy and encouraging us as dear children to do our best for Him.

Perhaps the shade on our right hand in which God manifests Himself may be caused by a sorrow. There may be the withdrawing of some joy that was the light of our life. But the emptiness is the token of His presence; the gloom is the evidence of His overshadowing love, bringing down upon our fevered souls the calming and hallowing powers of the world to come. And it is a blessedness to know that He is near to us, veiling the light with the shadow of His hand that we may see deeper into the mysteries of grace, and higher into the glories of heaven. He has sacrificed Himself for us, passed under the shadow of sin, and sorrow, and death, if by any means He might relate Himself to our need; and under the shadow of the fellowship of His sufferings, which we know when bearing in faith and patience our own, we are made willing to sacrifice ourselves to Him, and thus deeper and more blessed connections are established between Him and us than could be possible in any other way. There is no darkness where God is, but only a cooling and refreshing shade in the midst of too overpowering light, enabling us to see more clearly. We are afraid of nothing with Him. Even in the valley of the shadow of death we fear no evil, because He is with us; and the passage of the Shadow feared by man is only the passage from light to light. He is our shade on our right hand here as we journey, like the Israelites, through the wilderness, singing like them our "Songs of Degrees," and led like them in person to the land of promise, where He that sitteth in the midst of the throne shall dwell among us, or as the word in the original should be translated—shall dwell as in a tent—shall be our tabernacle; and the sun shall not light on us nor any heat. And, oh, what an indescribable shade will that be in which all the promises of the Bible will be fulfilled, and all the memories of the pillar in the wilderness, of the Shechinah in the Holy Place, of the tabernacle of witness with all its symbolism, will be realized and superseded by the overshadowing presence of God Himself!



Psalm xix.

THE spacious firmament on high,
With all the blue ethereal sky,
And spangled heavens, a shining frame,
Their great Original proclaim.
The unwearied sun, from day to day,
Does his Creator's power display,
And publishes to every land
The work of an Almighty hand.

Soon as the evening shades prevail,
The moon takes up the wondrous tale,
And nightly to the listening earth
Repeats the story of her birth;
Whilst all the stars that round her burn,
And all the planets in their turn,
Confirm the tidings as they roll,
And spread the truth from pole to pole.

What, though in solemn silence all
Move round the dark terrestrial ball;
What, though no real voice or sound
Amidst their radiant orbs be found;
In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice,
For ever singing, as they shine,
"The hand that made us is Divine."

EASTERN FASTS AND FESTIVALS.

I.

READING recently an elaborate description of the Hindu Festival in honour of Rama—the hero of the celebrated Sanscrit poem entitled Ramayana, I was set musing on the many festivals which interested me to fascination in the days of "My Boyhood in the East."[1] My recollections are so real, and contain so much that seems to me to deserve record, that I hope others will be interested in a few stories belonging to my personal knowledge and experience of these festivals. Of the Rama festival I have no remembrance—although the romantic history of Prince Rama and his wife Sita, and of the doings of the wicked giant Ravana who stole her from her husband, and of the monkey-general Hanúman and his monkey army and their miraculous bridge, by whose means the giant was defeated and slain, and the virtuous wife restored, were as familiar to me as the fairy tales of the North are familiar to the girls and boys of England. I believe the reason for my never being at this festival is that its celebration is not universal, but limited to certain places and possibly classes in India proper. It is a very remarkable fact that though Rama (an incarnation, like the favourite Krishna, of Vishnu) and Sita (an incarnation of Luchmi) are very popular personages in the Hindu pantheon, neither is represented by an image, and for neither does there, I believe, exist a temple throughout India. The public reading or reciting of the Ramayana is regarded as the worship appropriate to them—accompanied as it is by the rapturous admiration and applause of those who crowd to hear the story. Perhaps because of this extraordinary feature of the Rama worship—its practical spirituality—as compared with the worship offered to other deities, the festival is not celebrated by the castes which migrate to Ultra-Gangetic regions.

The Hindu festival with which I was most familiar is of a very different type. Everybody who knows anything of Hinduism knows of its Divine Triad. Brahma is the Creator, whose worship is among the orthodox Hindus practically extinct, but is revived by the Hindu reformers of the Brahmo Somàj. Vishnu is the Preserver, whose best known form is that of Juggernath (Lord of the World), with whose worship, as Dr. Hunter has pointed out, because the image is representative of the Preserver (who turns with horror from even the death of a fly), the mutilations and suicides, of which exaggerated accounts have been given, are utterly irreconcileable. Siva is the Destroyer—with whom, as more intensely possessed of the terrible powers described by the epithet, is associated his wife Kali (also known as Dūrga and Bhowani). It is also well known that speaking broadly Hindus are either worshippers of Vishnu or Siva, and carry respective insignia of each in their ornaments and in coloured lines on their foreheads. It was with the yearly festival—certainly the most important of Hindu celebrations—of Kali, commonly known as the Dūrga Pūja (worship), that I was most familiar. The first notification of its arrival was noise—noise increasing in vehemence as night approached, caused by the beating of drums and metallic plates and by loud and frenzied shouts, especially of the cry Hari bol! Hari bol! I believe very often the sounds are so tumultuous and even alarming that permission has to be previously obtained from the local authorities for license to indulge in the tremendous clamour which characterises the festival. Another feature was the plentiful use of red clay and sand, in the houses, on the roads, on the faces and breasts of the celebrants, and freely cast upon the gathering crowds, whether votaries or not—red I suppose as emblematic of blood, on which Kali feeds! With these general features of the arrival of this celebration there appear images in clay of the goddess, the one particularly in which she figures with snakes coiled about her coal-black body, and a huge necklace of human skulls, with a drawn scimitar in one of her four hands, and the head of a slaughtered giant in another, dancing in exultation because of this slaughter, and with her tongue protruding to denote her surprise at finding herself in her sacred orgy inadvertently stamping on the prostrate form of her husband, Siva. These images are multiplied in all directions, and placed in temporary shrines in or near the houses of the well-to-do votaries of the goddess. Before them festive offerings, sometimes of slain animals, but especially of flowers and butter are made, and at night dances performed amid the blaze of flaming torches and to the sound it may be of European music. At one period it was, alas! common for English officials, civil and military, to be seen at the evening rejoicings. At the end of the festivals the images are carried in procession amid indescribable revelry and uproar to the sea, river-side, or a tank, and submerged in the waters. I remember how I engaged the friendly services of a Brahmin school-fellow to save for me at least a part of one of these images, and that he succeeded in securing the head of the unfortunate giant, which I carefully packed in a box and brought to England as a magnificent trophy!

But to me the great sight of the festival was the Churruck puja, or swinging worship, now, like Suttee,[2] put down by the strong arm of British authority. I had reason for being deeply interested in one of these scenes. Our saice (horse-keeper) when he had his only son, an infant, dangerously ill, had I know registered a vow that if the child's life were preserved he would do honour to the gods by swinging at the Churruck puja. The child recovered, but I had forgotten the vow. When the Festival arrived, I accompanied my father as usual, when he went to the open fields, on which the swinging poles were erected, to speak and give tracts to the crowds that would be gathered. My readers have probably seen representations of these poles. They are fixed upright in the ground, and are some thirty feet high and across the top of each is a horizontal beam, moving on a swivel, with a rope at one end, to which the devotee is attached, and another at the other end hanging to the ground, by means of which excited groups of men, as they run with the rope in their hands, turn round and round the beam on its pivot. As we approached one of the poles we observed a band of men besmeared with red ochre, with their hands uplifted, and shouting with all their might, dancing together to the sound of a shrill pipe, and a loud tom-tom, and moving towards the foot of the pole. In the midst was our saice with garlands of flowers round his head and neck and body, vociferating and dancing, and evidently in a state of mad excitement, in part owing probably to the free administration of the intoxicating bhang (Indian hemp). Arrived at the foot of the pole the band of men moved away on each side of him, and he stretched himself prostrate with his face to the ground. And what did we then see? A Brahmin gathered with his fingers the muscles which cluster a little below the shoulder-blades, and first on one side and then on the other forced through them iron hooks (with sharp moveable caps) fastened to cords which were tied together at about a foot's distance from the hooks. No cry was heard, nor seemed there to be any shudder or shrinking of the outstretched form. The piercing points removed, the man rose, and amid the bellowing multitude and a storm of discordant sounds from drums and fifes renewed the dance and the shouting till he reached the suspended cord. Then a bag was hung to his side containing flowers, cakes and pigeons, the beam was lowered, and the hooks were attached to the rope. This done, the group of men at the other side moved first with slow step but soon quickly round and round with the other rope in their hands, and the suspended victim swung in mid air, throwing from time to time among the crowds the contents of his bag.

Never can I forget the sensation, when after some minutes of this gyration the men that were running halted, and the beam was lowered, and the infant child was handed to the father. With the child in his arms, thus adding to the cruel strain of the hooks, he again swung round and round, though more gently; over the heads of the applauding crowd. I ought to add that, owing to fatal accidents, it was required by the government authorities that the devotees should be protected by a strong band over the hooks and round the chest, and now happily (as has been stated) this perilous form of fanatical worship has been universally suppressed. But nevertheless it is right that these personal recollections should indicate how "their sorrows are multiplied who hasten after another god." I know that the recollections of these scenes inspired me with passionate desire for missionary service, and this mercifully became the means of my resolving on a Christian life.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

DIFFICULT TEXTS.

"For My thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways My ways, saith the Lord."—Isaiah lv. 8.

THIS text is commonly used to point a discourse upon the wonderful and unsearchable ways of God's Providence, and to answer murmuring or tried and perplexed inquirers who are tempted to ask "Why?" at many strange and sad events they behold, or to enter into curious and abstruse questions on the dealings of God with man. And no doubt the verse may be very profitably turned and made to apply to such cases. But it is not the primary meaning of the passage, as the context shows us. The prophet was not discoursing of God's providential dealings in the matters of common life, but on His free pardon of sinners. He bids the wicked forsake their ways and turn to the Lord, "for He will abundantly pardon."

Then follows the verse in question, and it seems as if it were meant, as happens in other parts of Isaiah's prophecies, to answer an objection supposed to be made by those invited. The convicted, alarmed sinner might answer, "I have done too much wrong to be pardoned; I must expect punishment rather than acceptance."

The verse answers the objection. The sinner might well fear if God's ways were like theirs. Man often pardons as it were by half, clogging the forgiveness with reproaches for the past, or with conditions which take away all the grace from the pardon. But God's pardon is free and full, like that of the father to the restored prodigal. He does not welcome his penitent son to make him a hired servant, but gives the robe and the ring, and welcomes him to the feast. These are God's ways of pardoning, and they are not like man's. This then would appear to be the right application of the text. God pardons freely, because He is not like man in his dealings.

ADDITIONAL NOTE ON PSALM CX. 7. (See p. 138.)

"He shall drink of the brook in the way; therefore shall He lift up the head."

The reference given in the "Oxford" edition in the margin is Judges vii. 5, 6. May not this throw light on the meaning? Just before the great victory of Gideon over the Midianites, he was directed to take his army to "the water," evidently (see 1st verse) the well of Harod: those only were chosen who, without stopping to enjoy the water leisurely by kneeling at the stream's brink, contented themselves with taking up some water in their hands to moisten their lips and hastening on: probably these were the ones who were too eager for the battle to do more than snatch this hasty draught "by the way." The result of the battle was a great slaughter among the Midianites; and the victory of Midian is alluded to in Isaiah ix. 4, apparently as a type—first of the great destruction of Sennacherib's army, which was to follow closely on the prophecy, and then of that higher deliverance of which these earthly ones were only faint shadows—the deliverance from sin and its penalties, to be effected by Him, who was to be called "Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."

It would not then be surprising, if He, whose victory is compared with that of Gideon in this ninth chapter of Isaiah, should be in this Messianic Psalm likened to Gideon's victorious army, drinking of the brook in haste by the way—("how am I straitened till it is accomplished!" are His own words in Luke xii.), not staying for earthly rest or refreshment till He had gained the victory, and therefore "lifting up the head" over His enemies. "Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, and He shall divide the spoil with the strong; because He hath poured out His soul unto death." (Isaiah liii. 12.)

"Because of the angels."—1 Cor. xi. 10.

A correspondent (W. T. A.), referring to our remarks, p. 47, suggests that "the angels" are "the men assisting in the services of the church;" an interpretation proposed also by Theodore Beza, but unanimously rejected by modern scholars. If the word is to be taken as denoting human messengers, it would be better to understand it of spies, sent to watch the procedure of Christian assemblies. (So Rosenmüller, and several German commentators.) But against this must be set the fact that ἄγγελοι when standing absolutely in the New Testament "always denotes good angels alone" (Meyer); and we have no right to deviate from the constant use of the word on account of an apparent difficulty. A note in the "Speaker's Commentary" explains the apostle's language as denoting "respect or regard for those unseen ministers of God and guardians of His order, who are present in the holy congregation watching the behaviour of their human charge. If a woman be so lost to sense of shame that she shrinks not in church from the public eye, let her fear the mournful gaze of those divine sentinels. Or again, if she be so ambitious of equality with her superior man, as to discard the veil of subordination, let her remember that she is watched by the order-loving angels, who themselves veil their faces before the face of God." (Canon Evans.)

"Baptized for the dead."—1 Cor. xv. 29.

Another correspondent (H. B. S.) writes: "It has occurred to me that an explanation may be found in the custom mentioned by Wheatley, cap. vii. 1, common amongst the Greeks, for those who had been reported as dead but reappeared again as alive, to be baptized. May not this have suggested to the Greek converts at Corinth that a vicarious baptism for a Christian at his death was a most striking assertion on the part of Christians that he was only apparently dead, and was in the truest sense still alive? Of course it may be objected that there is no trace of such a custom in after ages; but surely it is quite conceivable that this custom, being without sanction from the rulers of the church, should have been quickly dropped. It was not in itself a superstitious custom, which would account for its being used as an argument with the Corinthians by the apostle and not being in any way condemned by him. It may be that this explanation has been already suggested amongst the many offered by expositors—but I have never seen any which at all events refers it to an analogous custom amongst the heathen innocently adopted by the Christians at Corinth."

C. F. asks: "Why was David, in two instances so sinful, a man 'after God's own heart,' when nothing of the kind is said of Daniel or Joseph?"

The epithet in question is applied to David by Samuel, in announcing Saul's rejection by God. 1 Samuel xiii. 14: "Thy kingdom shall not continue. The LORD hath sought Him a man after His own heart." These words, be it observed, were spoken while David was yet a "ruddy youth," and before Samuel knew him as the predestined king. Plainly, the idea is that of qualification for the kingdom, according to the Divine standard. Saul was emphatically a man after the people's own heart—noble-looking, frank and brave—in outward seeming "every inch a king," and God gave him to the people, as if in anticipation of their choice. The successive revelations of his moral and spiritual weakness taught the nation a needful lesson. Then, in the choice of David, the God of Israel showed the qualities which He required in the ruler of His chosen people. These kingly qualities, it is true, were mixed with grievous sins, daringly committed and bitterly repented, but still the true bent of David's nature was noble and good, and especially did he realise the Divine purpose in the constitution of the kingdom—the "Covenant" of which we read so much. (See Psalm lxxxix. throughout.) To this David was ever true. The same thought is expressed in the citation of Samuel's words, Acts xiii. 22: "a man after Mine own heart, which shall fulfil all My will"; that is, the grand purpose for which Israel was set apart.

This explanation of the words fully meets our correspondent's enquiry why the same epithet is not applied to Joseph, to Daniel, or to others of exalted piety. The mission of David was unique, and the phrase which describes his adaptation to it is unique also.[1]

E. R. R. asks: "Can you supply any explanation of our Lord's parable of the hidden treasure: Matthew xiii. 44? It seems a remarkable circumstance that He should select a dishonest proceeding to illustrate the gaining of the kingdom of heaven. Of course He had some object in doing this, but to our knowledge it is not clear. Trench quotes Olshausen, who puts it upon the same footing as the unjust steward and the unjust judge, but this does not seem a satisfactory arrangement."

The reference to the parable of the unrighteous steward, as made by Olshausen and Trench, suggests, we think, the true solution of this difficulty. Nothing in the application of the parable depends on the craft of the purchaser. The points are the unexpectedness of the discovery, the joy of the discoverer, and his readiness to make any sacrifice to win the treasure. That the concealment can have nothing to do with the main lesson of the parable plainly appears from the fact that there can be nothing analogous to such concealment in our method of receiving the heavenly treasure. There is nothing to hide. The finder's silence until the bargain is completed is but an indication of his intense anxiety not to lose the treasure. To secure his end he practises a deceit, just as the steward in the other parable seeks his future interest by arts of fraud. In the latter instance it is wise forethought that is commended, not dishonest scheming; and in the former it is the all-absorbing desire to win "the kingdom of God," and not the adoption of equivocal measures for the purpose. In fact, from the very nature of the case, there would be no room in either for any fraudulent proceeding.

It is not unlikely that the parable was founded on some recent incident, well known to the disciples. If so, the conduct of the finder in concealing his discovery would naturally be a part of the story, quite apart from any special significance.

Things New and Old.

THE EUROPEAN CAMP.—The armaments of Europe, at the beginning of this year, reached the vast proportions of 3¼ million men on a peace footing, and 12½ millions trained in readiness for war. Twelve and a-half million fighting men in Christian Europe in 1887! These figures are eloquent of wide-spread sacrifice and misery. Thus in France military service is compulsory on all men except a few invalids. The time of training extends over five years, and the liability to service over twenty years. The Russians are subjected to a similar liability of twenty years enforced service. The new Military Service Act in Austria sweeps within the meshes of its net all males from nineteen to forty-three years. Even a man who is the sole support of a large family is not exempt. All the men of Germany are liable to military service from twenty to forty-two years of age. They must actually join the army for at least three years to begin with. All personal interests and family-ties must be ruthlessly sacrificed to these demands of the great military States. In addition to these vast burdens, Europe has to bear the increase of costly fortifications. For example, since 1871 France has erected a double line of forts of 140 miles along the length of her frontier line bordering on Germany. There is at least one practical step which can be taken in these circumstances—both at home and abroad—and it is to make increased endeavours to awaken the professing churches and their ministers to a deeper sense of their responsibility in this matter, and to urge them to put up earnest prayers to the Lord in behalf of peace. But prayer is not all that is needed. God measures the sincerity of prayer by the degree of practical effort which accompanies it. If Christians are honest in their prayers, they will seek to devise some means for exerting their personal influence, at home, as abroad, or both, to bring about some diminution of these evils.—Peace Society Paper.

A MESSAGE OF PEACE.—The following has been issued as "A Message, in the love of Christ, from the Society of Friends to their fellow Christians, on the threatening aspect of affairs in Europe:"—In view of the events passing around us, and of the vast military preparations made by the nations of Europe—so calculated to bring about a war the consequences of which none can foresee—we have been led seriously to ask: Are the Churches of Christ faithfully using their influence to abate the war spirit at home and abroad? The subject is a very solemn one, and we earnestly commend it to the united prayer of our fellow Christians of all denominations. May it please our Heavenly Father so to influence the hearts of His children throughout Europe, and so to control the passions of men, that peace may be maintained, and the whole spirit and teaching of our blessed Redeemer be fully accepted. His kingdom is one of righteousness and peace; and all who unite in the petition, "Thy kingdom come," at once confess the duty of their own present subjection to it, and pray for its universal establishment.

THE NESTORIAN TABLET IN CHINA.—There is a remarkable memorial, well known to antiquaries, in the province of Shensi, China. It is a tablet erected by the Nestorian Christians in the time of the Emperor Tang, above a thousand years ago. It stands exposed to all weathers, within two miles of the west gate of the city of Singan. One of the American missionaries recently sent to the Editor of the New York Observer a rubbing of the inscription, still legible, to be hung on the walls of the library of that journal, at 37 Park Row, New York, there to serve as a memento of early Christianity in China, and a call to prayer for the success of modern missions in "the land of Sinim."

BIBLE REFERENCES BY LITERARY MEN.—The Times recently in a leading article alluded to the walls of Jericho as "falling before the noise of empty pitchers." A member of parliament, a professor, in a speech at St. James's Hall, spoke of the army of Sennacherib as destroyed by the soldiers killing one another. And the Pall Mall Gazette refers to the man "in the parable" who kept the good wine until last. Had citations of corresponding accuracy been made from Homer or Livy, the literary journals would have joined in a roar of indignation, but it is only the Bible, with which men of letters may not have found time to keep up their acquaintance.

THE LADY ELFRIDA.

BY ALICE KING.

CHAPTER I.

IT was in the earlier years of Queen Mary's blood-stained reign. In large towns, throughout the length and breadth of England, the flames of the martyrs' pyres were lighting old men and maidens, wrinkled grandmothers and young men in their manhood's noon up to God. Willingly they trod the way through the fire with words of praise and triumph on their lips, words which soon mingled with the song of the redeemed above. The dwellings of every city were ringing with stories of Christian heroism, and even the very persecutors wondered, and almost admired as they heard.

The more remote country districts, however, did not as yet know much of the scourge which was being shaken over the heads of God's people. There came, it is true, from time to time, tales of mingled horror into the villages and the houses of the country gentry; borne on the lips of some travelling pedlar, such as in those days used to supply most of the more costly requirements in dress of dames and damsels who lived far from a town, or left behind in the village inn by the servants of some passing nobleman who was on his way towards London. But in general, the real state of things in the kingdom was vague and indistinct to eyes which looked daily on green fields instead of bricks and mortar.

This was especially the case in North Devon and West Somerset, which in those days were reached by tidings from the capital slower than India is now. The fiery zeal of persecution had hitherto burnt but fitfully in these parts, and many of the reformers still continued there to carry on quietly their worship, and follow their pure creed unmolested. There were many reasons for this. The region was, as has been said, far from the seat of government. It was thinly populated, so that people did not quickly know what was going on among their nearest neighbours. The simple country folk had a kindly feeling for each other, even when there was a difference between them in religious belief, and the trade of an informer was not carried on here as easily and busily as it was in less primitive districts.

Thus it came to pass that the Lady Elfrida Acland was able to gather round her with impunity, Sabbath after Sabbath, a band of Christians who hated, and stood firm against, all popery, and loved to serve God in the spirit and the truth alone. The Lady Elfrida lived in a small ancestral castle belonging to her husband, Captain Edward Acland, who was now absent in the Netherlands, fighting there for the cause of religious freedom. He had formerly been in the English army, but at the accession of Mary to the throne, he had given up his commission in his own country and gone abroad to seek service. He was the younger son of an old West Somerset family, and was not rich, as riches are counted in the world's eyes; and as at that period travelling was an expensive operation, and attended with many inconveniences and hardships for those who could not afford luxuries, he had deemed it best for the present to leave his delicate wife and his little son in their retired home.

Here the Lady Elfrida had spent the last year or more occupied with the education of her son and the care of the tenantry and poor on her estate, and all the sad or sick or sorrowful in her neighbourhood. She and her husband had always been earnest, faithful followers of the reformed doctrines and of the pure gospel truth as it is in Jesus, and though she was well enough aware, ' eing better informed on these points than her simpler neighbours round her, of the dangers which would probably, soon or late, attend such a course, she never failed each Sabbath to have a meeting for the reformers held in her private chapel, and daily herself to follow all the practices of the reformed religion. She was a very gentle, very womanly woman, perfectly absorbed in all her duties as wife and mother and mistress of a family, and yet there was a fund of calm courage in her which made her fit to bear the name of a true soldier of the Heavenly King.

It was a stormy autumn evening towards the end of October, the little band of faithful worshippers were gathered in the chapel of the castle. The reformers, using all prudent and reasonable means of safety by the advice of the lady, never met for their services till after sunset, and then burnt as few lights as possible, that the appearance of the chapel shining through the night might attract as little notice as might be from the passengers along the neighbouring road. The chapel was, therefore, dark with changeful shadows, brightened here and there by a fitful gleam in which faces and figures stood out with more or less distinctness. Now it was the grey head of an old man, bent reverently as he listened to the Word of Life, and the peace that rested on his furrowed weather-beaten features told the tale of deep, great calm within; now it was the lithe, active figure of a youth who had found his way to God, and who stood in an attitude of steadfast waiting, as though he only wanted the battle-cry of his Lord to put his armour on; now it was the countenance of a fair girl, all quivering and stirring with feeling like the waters of a lake when a breeze bounds over it. And here and there, among the men and women, there would stand out a bit of the rude tracery which adorned the chapel, such as a quaint head, or a huge, unshapely leaf.

There was, however, one bright spot in the semi-gloom of the chapel. The spot where stood the Lady Elfrida in the light that fell softly from a crystal lamp brought from the castle, light that hung around her form like a mantle of one of the blessed in the golden city. The minister who usually officiated at these meetings, and who went from village to village leaving the glad tidings to each as he passed along, had happened not to arrive this evening —something had detained him at a distant hamlet of the thinly populated district—but as the little congregation had come together before this fact was known, the lady, rather than let them depart without a few crumbs of the bread of life, had opened her Bible and was now reading a chapter aloud in a clear, sweet voice. At the end of a few verses she would pause and give some brief, simple words of explanation, or dwell with tenderness and power, for a short space, on the good news of pardon through the precious cleansing blood. Her figure, which was tall and slight, bent forward gently as she read, as though she were ready to hold out a helping hand to the most fallen and sinful there to lift him up and lead him to the Master; her face, which seemed like an embodied dream of gracious, christian motherhood, shone as if it reflected a ray of heavenly light from the page on which her eyes were fixed. At King Edward's court she had been spoken of as a star of beauty; the advancing years had stolen from her face something of its blooming freshness, but had brought a better radiance in its place—the radiance of a soul which is ripening for the land of light.

At a little distance behind the lady stood young Harry Redwood, her best-beloved and most trusted servant. Harry was the son of a yeoman whose ancestors had lived on the Acland property and rented under the family for generations; he had been taken very early into Captain Acland's service to fill the situation of the Lady Elfrida's page, and had grown up in their house, becoming every year dearer to the lady and her husband, until they had learned to regard him as almost a relation. The tie between Redwood and his master and mistress had been not weakened but strengthened when they had discovered his love for Ruth, the young gentlewoman, daughter of a former chaplain of the late earl, who waited on the Lady Elfrida.

Ruth had been left an orphan while yet a child, and the Lady Elfrida had taken charge of her at once and had brought her up with peculiar care and affection. She had looked down blushing, yet with serious sweetness in her eyes when her mistress had first asked her whether she returned young Redwood's love; then tears had stolen softly into view, and the Lady Elfrida had drawn her to her, and the girl had faltered out a low, glad assent on her breast. Soon after that the young people had been married.

In those patriarchal days larger numbers dwelt together in the country houses of the landed gentry and nobility than we see now; so the young husband and wife remained on in their lady's service, even after there was born to them a little daughter.

But to return to that evening in the chapel. As Harry Redwood stood behind his mistress, listening intently to the word of life, he was startled by hearing a light tap at the window near which he was. He looked round quickly, and there, to his surprise, he saw a face gazing in at him—the face of his wife who had been absent from the service that evening on account of some slight indisposition of their child. Yes, it was Ruth's face: but is was as pale as the moonbeams which were beginning to steal out from behind a cloud, and there was an expression of terror and anxiety in her eyes. When she saw that she had attracted his attention, she began to beckon with her hand, rapidly, eagerly, imploringly, for him to come to her; and, alarmed, not knowing what to think or expect, he glided quietly, and unperceived from his place, and slipped out at a little door at the back of the chapel.

NATURAL HISTORY NOTES

ON THE REVISED VERSION OF THE BIBLE.

NO. III.—BEHEMOTH.

IN the 40th chapter of Job is a description of a huge beast, said (v. 19) to be chief of the ways of God. The word behemoth sometimes means beasts, that is, it is the plural of the Hebrew for a large quadruped, and the explanation used to be that the plural was used to signify an animal as large as many beasts. Learned men, however, had for a long time suspected that this was not the true explanation, and the revisers have put in the margin the word which was expected to appear, viz., hippopotamus. Many of you know perhaps that hippopotamus is made up of two Greek words, and means river horse. In the same way we now understand that behemoth means river ox, and properly it is a native Egyptian word. The Hebrews had not got the word itself, so they took that one in their own language that was nearest to it. The first part of the word means ox, and the second part water.

THE HIPPOPOTAMUS.

The description occupies ten verses, 15-24; some of these are a good deal altered in the Revised Version, and the alterations make the description come much nearer to what we know of the animal's habits. We know the Nile now as well as we can expect to know any river that we have not seen, and nearly every one can tell whether the description is suitable or not. Now verse 23 in the Revised Version plainly speaks of an animal that is used to the water. He does not mind if the river overflows; he rather delights in the swelling of Jordan. I dare say you have seen pictures of the hippopotamus swimming with only his nose to be seen, and have been very much disappointed at the Zoo, when you found that he would not let you see any more of him. Verses 21, 22 give an exact picture of this huge animal lying in the warm pools of shallow water, half hidden by the tall reeds, with the leaves of the Nile lily floating about him, and overhead the grateful shade of the willows. When you see him come up out of his bath, pushing his monstrous snout along, and urging his way with the force of his great body and strong hind-quarters, you may think of verses 16, 17 and 18: "His strength is in his loins and his force is in the muscles of his belly." This strength of muscle too is based upon bones that are tubes of brass and bars of iron. "His tail certainly is not to be compared with the cedar for height, but it is very firm and well knit." Eastern nations too are more careful to use striking language rather than words that are true to the life. Happily this great strength is accompanied by a quiet temper; unless provoked, the hippopotamus seldom makes an attack upon man, but when angry he has been known to crush a boat with his powerful jaws and teeth. The mention of his food, that he eateth grass like an ox, taken along with his water-loving habits, leaves us no room to doubt what animal is intended. The reference is clenched by the second part of the 19th verse. There it is admitted that no sword of man can penetrate his hide, and none but the Creator Himself can give the animal its death-blow. The power of man is widely extended, but it has its limits, and where man's arm fails, there God makes his power known.

HOMELY LIGHTS ON HALLOWED TEXTS.

NO. III.

"So David took the spear and the cruse of water from Saul's bolster; and they gat them away, and no man saw it, nor knew it, neither awaked; for they were all asleep; because a deep sleep from the Lord had fallen upon them."—1 Samuel xxvi. 12.

THE story of the shepherd boy, who rose to be king of Israel, is made up of many striking pictures, of which this is one of the brightest.

Here was a sleeping enemy, whom God had delivered into his hand, by the strangest possible means, and yet, although his chosen friend begged of him to kill King Saul he would not.

"The Lord forbid that I should stretch forth mine hand against the Lord's anointed," he replied, to the pressing request of Abishai; and that noble spirit of forgiveness, worthy of a great king, must be cultivated by all who desire to live rightly, even though they may not have great enemies to forgive, or great places to occupy in the world.

It is told of one of the kings of France, called Philip the Good, for his nobility of nature, that when his countrymen endeavoured to induce him to punish one who had used him ill, he answered, "I know that I can revenge myself, but it is a fine thing to have revenge in one's power and not use it!"

This shows a forgiving spirit, but there is something more required of us.

"I say unto you, Love your enemies; bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you."

There was once upon a time a rich merchant, who had risen to wealth from being a poor boy, and he was told that another rich merchant had published a very wicked and foolish pamphlet about him, holding him up to ridicule, and calling him names.

"He will live to repent of it," said the good man, and took no further notice of the insult.

Years passed, and one day, the man who had written the pamphlet stood in the good man's office, ruined, begging for assistance.

"You wrote a pamphlet against me, once" the rich man asked; and with shame the suppliant had to confess that such was the case.

After such a confession, he expected to be thrust from the presence of the man he had wronged, but, with a smile of generous pity the rich man said, "You see, my saying was true, that you would live to repent writing that pamphlet."

"I do, I do indeed repent it," said the other with tears, and then the forgiving merchant loaded him with kindness, gave him money for his immediate wants, and helped him to make a fresh start in life, thus turning a bitter foe into an ever grateful friend.

Thus we see that the noble deeds of a great man like King David may be imitated by us all in our daily lives. Let us never be afraid of being nobly forgiving in little things, because we shall thus be helped to be forgiving in great things. It is the forgiving spirit that God regards, and not the occasion. A penny given to the poor may be of greater worth in the eyes of God than many pounds given for mere display. A kind word, in answer to an unkind one, even from the youngest lips, may be as great an act of forgiveness in its way as that of David's in our text. To refrain from wounding, either by word or blow, and to give kindness instead of injury, is the duty of every true disciple of our dear Lord and Saviour.

"I never forgive!" exclaimed a British general, once in the presence of a great preacher.

"Then I hope, sir," said Wesley, "you never sin."

The reproof went home, and the general, who was about to punish his servant for some great offence, suddenly relented, and pardoned the offender.

A heathen tyrant, it is said, was once scourging a Christian slave, and he had well-nigh beaten him to death. He paused in his cruel torture to ask, scornfully, "What great matter did Christ ever do for you?"

"Even this," answered the Christian, "that I can forgive you, though you use me so cruelly."

How can any of us dare to pray—"Forgive us our trespasses—as we forgive them that trespass against us"—if we do not also cultivate a forgiving temper. May we all carry into our daily lives the exhortation of St. Paul, in his letter to the Ephesians: "Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VII.

What king was troubled by a shining star
Seen by some Eastern sages from afar?
Assyria's king saw all his army slain,
Then fell himself—who was the next to reign?
Gideon's brave band, though fainting, still pursue,
Name one of Midian's kings they chased and slew?
What Jewish maid, her kindred yet unknown,
Married a Persian king, and shared his throne?
"A choice young man" who rose to power and fame
As Israel's king—now tell his father's name?
Name of the King who rules o'er all the earth,
Isaiah gives it and foretells His birth?
What king of Judah served the Lord at first,
But with the leper's awful doom was cursed?
One who King David loved, a king of Tyre,
Sent firs and cedars at his son's desire?

Take now these eight initials, one by one,
They spell the honoured name of Abi's son.
For nine and twenty years he ruled aright,
Approved, like David, in Jehovah's sight;
And when from God a favoured sign he sought,
The shadow on the dial was backward brought.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XV.—JULIET'S EXPERIENCES.

"WELL, Miss Granby, so it is hard work that you want to find, is it? So you say in your letter, and so Dr. Meynal gave me to understand. If that is the case there will be no difficulty in obliging you; but you must be prepared for disagreeables. Hospital life is not a bed of roses."

So said Mrs. Martin, the matron of the Aylcester County Infirmary, as she surveyed with a keen, yet not unfriendly glance, the girl who had been waiting for nearly half an hour for an interview with her.

Juliet with her modest luggage had arrived at the hospital about an hour before, according to previous arrangement, and now she was confronted for the first time with the head of the department to which she was to belong.

Mrs. Martin was a large active woman, with a capable air and a manner that plainly bespoke her in a position of command. Although not perhaps a lady by birth she was by no means lacking in native refinement and good feeling; but the busy and responsible life she led had left its stamp upon her in a certain quickness of speech and abruptness of manner that led at once to the conclusion that she was not to be trifled with.

Juliet, though little in the way of feeling overawed, had an instinctive conviction that Mrs. Martin was a woman to be respected, and one into whose disfavour it would not be pleasant to fall. So she felt that the best thing to be done was to try and make a good impression at starting.

"I do not expect things to be easy or pleasant," she answered. "It is because I am tired of ease and idleness that I have come here. I want hard work, and to see something of life."

Mrs. Martin glanced at her a little keenly.

"Well, some people never know when they are well off. I always say every life has its own work and its own lessons if people will but look for them. However, you have chosen for yourself, and you ought to know your own business best. You will see something of life here, undoubtedly, but whether your experiences will please you or not remains to be proved."

Juliet made no reply, and after a short pause the matron continued to speak:

"You understand that we have no special arrangements here for lady nurses?"

"Yes."

"You will have to take your place as an ordinary working probationer, under the orders of the head nurse of the ward in which you are placed, and to a certain extent under the assistant nurses also. If you are not prepared to obey promptly and unquestioningly those who are placed above you, it is useless your coming here at all."

But Juliet was in one of her heroic moods, and she was not at all daunted by this prospect, though obedience was not exactly her strong point.

"I am quite prepared to do my duty, whatever it may be."

"Very good. Your duty is to learn your own work, which can only be done in the first place by close attention to orders, and by diffidence in acting, even in the smallest matters, upon your own responsibility, which is a thing that only really experienced nurses should do. Your ward work you will learn of course in the wards—I need not attempt to define it here. There will be a good deal of drudgery that does not come under the head of nursing proper, and yet which must be done, and a large share of that always falls upon the probationer. Are you prepared for that?"

"Yes," answered Juliet, "quite."

She was thinking in her own mind that it would not be long before she should work her way up by her talents and force of character to a less subordinate position, and meantime she must make the best of matters as they were. But she said nothing of this to Mrs. Martin, as she felt that it would not be understood.

"Very good, I am glad to hear it. I hope you may have a less rough time of it than some of my ladies have had."

"You have had ladies here before?"

"Yes, occasionally; but with one or two exceptions they have not stayed long, and, to tell the truth, they have been but little liked."

"Why?"

"Because they have not entered upon their duties in a proper or practical spirit. They have come here, not because they loved the sick, or felt any talent for nursing, but because they were dull at home, or thought that nursing would be an easy way of making a living. They held themselves above the other nurses, were intolerant and careless, and often idle; and generally after making themselves thoroughly unpopular throughout the building, they have gone away angry and hurt with everybody and everything."

Juliet was silent.

"Now those I call my real ladies, have acted very differently," continued Mrs. Martin. "They never made any fuss about themselves and their position; but did their work with readiness and good humour, and by the self-command and gentleness and quickness that belongs, in a greater degree, to the upper than the lower classes, made themselves generally beloved, and showed a capacity that quickly made them of value wherever they went. One of these ladies is now superintendent of a large London hospital, and another comes to me every year to take head duty in the different wards while my head nurses go away for their holidays. If you can emulate them, Miss Granby, you will do well, and will have a chance of rising in the profession, if that is your wish."

"I should like very well to have the management of a large hospital," answered Juliet.

Mrs. Martin smiled.

"You will require a good deal of training before you will be fit for such a post."

"I suppose so; but I generally learn quickly. I suppose there is promotion even here when the rudiments are mastered?"

"Promotion cannot be very quick, for learning takes time. A probationer must serve her year to become an assistant nurse, and as a nurse she may probably go on some years before she would receive an appointment as head nurse here. Vacancies are not very frequent, and we do not always find it advisable to promote our own nurses. A stranger from another hospital often does better, and has more influence over her under nurses than one taken from their own ranks. However, Miss Granby, you had better give up all thoughts of coming promotion for the present, and content yourself with trying to make a good and docile probationer. As I have hinted before, there is a certain amount of prejudice against ladies among the nurses; it will depend upon yourself whether you conquer it in your case or add to it."

Juliet hardly knew what she was expected to say, so she asked a question instead:

"Am I to begin work to-morrow morning?"

"Yes, in a men's medical ward. Your head nurse will be a Mrs. Beasley, an elderly woman and an excellent nurse, with whom you ought to have no difficulty in getting on. She is rather short-handed, as her probationer has to take 'special' duty in watching a delirious patient. She will be glad of your assistance."

"I suppose I shall have surgical work to do by-and-by?"

"Certainly; but I generally put new nurses into medical wards. There is less that is unpleasant to unseasoned nerves, and none of the hurry and bustle that is bewildering at first in the accident wards. We must all walk before we can run; and you will learn your routine better under Mrs. Beasley than under any other head nurse."

Juliet would have preferred the activity and bustle of the accident wards, had the choice been given her, but it was not; and there was something final in Mrs. Martin's manner that hindered her from objecting to her decision.

"I will have you shown up to your room now," she said, ringing a bell. "You will find it small and bare, but you did not come here expecting luxuries. Supper for the day nurses is at nine o'clock, and prayers follow immediately after. At ten all lights are put out, and at six a bell will awaken you each morning. Breakfast is at half-past six, ward work begins at seven. From twelve to half-past the probationers dine; from half-past twelve to one the assistant nurses. Tea goes on from five to six, and you go down as you can best arrange amongst yourselves, each nurse being absent half an hour. On alternate afternoons the probationer has two hours for air and exercise, which on fine days is to be spent out of doors. The assistant nurses have their time off in the evening, and each nurse in the hospital, of whatever standing, has one day's holiday in the month. Now I think I have explained everything, and I dare say you will like to go upstairs and unpack. I will send you up some tea after your journey, and if you prefer to remain upstairs in the nurses' parlour, or your own room and go to bed early, you are at liberty to do so. You will not be bound by the ordinary rules before to-morrow morning."

A servant had now made her appearance.

"Take Nurse Granby up to her room—No. 16 in the top gallery."

Juliet followed her guide through long lofty echoing corridors, and up many, many flights of wide stone steps. She passed many ward doors in her ascent, some of which were closed and some open, giving glimpses of the busy life within.

She saw several nurses going up or down the stairs, on various errands, all seeming too busy and intent to give her more than a passing glance; and a strange feeling of loneliness and isolation came over her as she realised what a mere atom she was in this vast hive of human toil and industry.

When the three tiers of wards had been passed, the stairs still led upwards to a long, long gallery, that contained rows of doors with numbers upon them, rather, as Juliet fancied, like prison cells. The gallery was divided into sections as it were, the larger rooms being given to the assistant nurses, two of whom shared one together, whilst the night nurses were lodged at the extreme end, so as to be as quiet as possible by day, and the probationers had a series of little cells, only divided one from the other by wooden partitions, rather like stalls or loose boxes in a stable.

"This is your room," said the maid, opening the door of one marked 16 and handing Juliet the key. "Your boxes are up already, so you can unpack and get all put to rights. You've got to keep everything very tidy, you know."

Juliet was rather offended at the freedom of the tone, but the girl, a clumsy, good-humoured provincial lass, had not the least idea of such a thing.

"Have you ever done any nursing before?" she asked.

"No," answered Juliet briefly, as she began examining the narrow limits of her room, which contained only the plainest of furniture—a low, narrow bedstead, a washing-stand, a chest of drawers, which served also for a toilet table, and beneath the little window a small cupboard, for boots and other odds and ends. All the hanging space was a few pegs on the door, and Juliet, who had been used to plenty of accommodation and dainty fittings about her, felt an odd sense of dismay and disgust.

"Well, I almost wonders you took to it then. I often say to cook as I'd ten times rather be a scullery-maid than one of them nusses. We don't have such a bad time of it downstairs, though to be sure there's plenty to do of a morning with all the dinners to do—patients' and nusses' and doctors' lunches and all. But we do slack off a bit towards evening, and can have a bit of a gossip round; but them poor nusses is always at it hard, and is that druv sometimes as they don't know how to get along. If I was you I'd change my mind and come on as a servant, I would."

Juliet was not given to see the humorous side of a situation, and she got rid of the well-meaning Nancy in so summary a fashion as to give a good deal of offence to that damsel, in revenge for which affront the promised tea was brought up cold and sloppy, whilst the accompanying food was anything but appetising.

Juliet was growing depressed by her surroundings, and she had little inclination to eat, but as she shrank from facing the strange nurses in the supper room she took the refreshment provided for her, and spent the rest of the evening in unpacking and arranging her things in her drawers and about her room. She had brought a few pictures and favourite books and contrived to give a little homeliness and finish to the sordid surroundings which had shocked her at first; and then feeling very tired and not a little dispirited, she went early to bed, and as she was a good sleeper, she fell fast asleep, and knew nothing till aroused by the bell in the morning.

Juliet was not fond of early rising, and at home she had seldom been down to a half-past eight o'clock breakfast, but she had no choice in the matter now, and signs of life around her warned her that there was no time to be lost. Her hospital uniform with regulation cap and apron was all ready for use, and by seven o'clock she was ready to go down.

She heard the other doors open and the sound of voices in conversation as the occupants of the adjoining rooms streamed past, and she followed at a short distance the other nurses, who were descending to the dining-room. This room was in the basement, and was dreary and dark even on a bright summer's morning. Long tables were there, spread with coarse cloths, and the fare, though plentiful enough and good, was exceedingly plain and to one of Juliet's tastes and habits coarse also. A housekeeper presided over the meal, told Juliet where to sit, and saw that she got plenty to eat and drink. There was a great deal of quick talking and rather loud laughing amongst many of the nurses, but Juliet's neighbours happened to be silent, and she was too much bewildered to notice what passed farther away.

"Can you tell me where I shall find Mrs. Beasley's ward?" asked Juliet, as there was a general rise from the table.

The housekeeper looked round her quickly.

"Nurse Ray," she called out, "you're in York just now, aren't you? Well, here's your new probationer—Nurse Granby isn't your name?—Just show her the way and set her to work. She's new to everything you know."

"Come on, then," answered the dark-eyed woman who had answered to the name of Nurse Ray. "I hope you mean to work, for we're run off our legs in York just now. Mrs. Beasley wants two probationers I always do say, but one is supposed to be enough."

Talking thus she led the way up several flights of stairs to the wards in the long wing on the first floor, and Juliet found that she had at last reached her goal and was in the midst of hospital work.

At seven o'clock in the morning a hospital ward is a dreary place; all the work has still to be done; beds are to be made, patients attended to, and all the dusting and sweeping and scrubbing must be got through that makes the place so neat and spotless later on.

Charwomen and nurses were hard at work as soon as ever they set foot in their domain; but Juliet stood in helpless uncertainty, not knowing what to do or how to do it.

"Here, you may as well help me with my cases," said the night-nurse, a bustling old body, who was busy with a man who looked terribly ill. "I'll put you in the way of making beds and all that sort of thing. These young nurses have no patience with beginners—you'll not learn anything from them. New hands are always more trouble than they're worth; but there, you'll learn it all in time. Don't you be discouraged at starting."

For the next two hours, so long as the night-nurse remained on duty, Juliet had plenty to do in helping her, and she picked up a good deal of desultory instruction from her new friend. She learned which were her own special "beds"—those that the probationer was expected to make and attend to, and the night-nurse helped her with them in return for the assistance she had received; and if the work was not very pleasant, at least it was work, and kept her fully occupied all the time.

But as the day passed on, Juliet began to doubt very much the wisdom of her choice. She resented being sharply spoken to by the other nurses, and they were offended at her holding aloof from them. It was as much strangeness as pride, as it happened: but Juliet had never tried to be pleasant and courteous to those beneath her, and she could not in a moment change the habits of a lifetime.

Then, of course, as in actual nursing she was entirely untrained, the work that fell to her share was more entirely of the menial kind than would be the case a little later on, had she only realised it. There was plenty of true nursing to be done by all those who knew how to do it, but until she had obtained sufficient experience to see what was wanted, and how it was to be accomplished, she was powerless to set to any task upon her own account. Mrs. Beasley was too busy at this particular juncture to give the time she sometimes bestowed on a new probationer, and Juliet was too proud to ask for information, or to appear anxious to learn, in case by so doing she should further reveal her ignorance.

And so, as it seemed to her, the first week of this hospital life, to which she had looked forward as something so grand and beautiful, was spent in washing up medicine cups and administering doses, in carrying bottles and jars backwards and forwards from the wards to the dispensary, and in going on errands that any child could have done just as well, whilst her feet ached with the perpetual tramp up and down the hard stairs, and her mind revolted against the menial drudgery forced upon her.

It was only pride, and a sort of instinct of the way in which people would talk of her "fiasco," that prevented Juliet from giving up at the end of a week and going back to St. Hilda; but pride came to her aid, and she made no sign that could be construed into repentance for the step she had taken. She had more to learn yet of the sweets of her own way.

After the first ten days matters seemed to mend somewhat. Juliet was not stupid—by nature she was quick, capable and observant—and she soon began to pick up knowledge, and to apply herself with zeal and energy to her work. Had she taken pains to be pleasant and courteous to the other nurses, she might have been very happy in her new life; but she had resented their sharp speeches and scant courtesy at the outset, and did not try to be agreeable herself when they would have met her halfway. As soon as she proved herself capable of skilled work, and showed that she could be both industrious and capable, she might have made many friends; but somehow she just failed in doing this, held herself aloof, and kept to the wards as much as ever she could, only going out when absolutely ordered. She was several times reproved by Mrs. Martin for shirking her proper exercise and recreation, and she fancied herself ill-used on these occasions, feeling that her devotion to her work merited praise rather than blame, and not understanding the wisdom that laid as much stress on the needful hours of rest for the nurses as on those for work.

She began to get the reputation of a clever and hard-working, but an obstinate girl, and Mrs. Beasley, who in a quiet way exacted absolute obedience from her nurses, often had a good deal of trouble with her new probationer.

When, however, Mrs. Beasley went away for a fortnight's holiday, and a stranger came for a time in her place, Juliet had a very happy time of it and was for a time in all her glory.

Miss Conway, although a capable nurse, who often came in as a locum tenens to the infirmary, had no knowledge of the individual cases of which she had to take sudden charge, and she naturally turned to the most capable of the under nurses for help and information. Juliet had by that time been two months in the wards, and the intelligent interest she took in her work made her invaluable to the new head nurse, who consulted her about everything, placed her tacitly almost upon a level with herself, and treated her with marked favour and consideration.

Juliet was capable enough to be exceedingly useful, and it was so pleasant to her to feel herself practically at the head of affairs that she began to consider the position as her own by right, and to forget that she was only a subordinate and probationer.

So long as Miss Conway remained nothing disagreeable occurred. Juliet gave orders, rebuked the under nurses, and kept a firm hand over the patients, and nothing was said or done to show her that her conduct was resented. Neither would it have been of necessity resented had the girl been pleasant and friendly during her temporary elevation, but unluckily, old habits of imperiousness and impatience awoke with the exercise of authority, and she made herself exceedingly unpopular without intending to be offensive.

When Miss Conway went away and Mrs. Beasley returned, Juliet found the tables turned upon her in a way that was totally unexpected. At first she fancied she would be allowed to retain a portion of the authority she had been enjoying, and Mrs. Beasley's quiet remark that "she was able to manage her wards without instructions from her probationer" had to be repeated many times before it did its work.

The assistant nurses were less judicious and openly made game of her, and Juliet's haughty displeasure was foolishly displayed, and only won for her more ridicule.

She became decidedly insubordinate; was in disgrace many times for breach of rule, and finally was removed from Mrs. Beasley's wards at the head nurse's special request. She was learning her life's lesson in a hard school, and was learning it all the more slowly and hardly from the self-will in which she had so long encouraged herself. She had won for herself a bad name already, despite her undoubted capacity and industry, and she was finding how hard it was to get on with any sense of pleasure when she failed to win the liking or confidence of those about her.

Yet perhaps this training was what she most needed and would teach her the lesson that it was most necessary she should learn—distrust of herself and a less eager desire after her own way.

Memorials.

UPON the small fresh-mounded grave
She laid her wreath, forlornly turning
To toils of life, which could not save
Her eyes from tears, her heart from yearning.

When next she sought that tiny mound,
Her place of weeping and of praying,
She, sobbing, kissed the hard cold ground;
But her frail wreath was all decaying.

Fond tokens which her hands renew—
They fade, 'tis only sorrow lingers!
But soon she finds memorial true,
Set there, as if by angel-fingers.

Where sunlight shows through leafy trees
The tiny grave her place of weeping,
Fresh greenness of young grass she sees,
And little wild-flower buds new peeping.

Through summer's warmth or winter's frost
Heaven's love remains though years are flowing,
Nor can she deem her own flower lost
Since God keeps earthly flowerets growing.

FREDERICK MANN.

THE HYMN-WRITERS OF WALES AND THEIR HYMNS.

IV.

WITH the close of the eighteenth century the Golden Age of Welsh hymnody began to decline. There has been a succession of great national poets since; but they are bards of the Eisteddfod rather than singers of the sanctuary. At the same time it deserves to be noted that the chief Eisteddfod poems of the present century have nearly all some sacred subject. The great poets have failed, as usual, to write great hymns. Still the period is not void of interesting illustrations of the songs of the church.

THOMAS WILLIAMS, of Bethesda, in the vale of Glamorgan, was originally a well-to-do farmer; but owing to a bitter controversy concerning the alleged heresy of an eminent Methodist divine of the time—the Rev. Peter Williams—he, with a number of sympathisers, organised an Independent church, of which he afterwards became minister. Religiously, he was a child of the eighteenth century; and his hymns have a close spiritual affinity to the hymns of David Jones and Morgan Rhys and William Williams. But here and there we find traces of the natural reaction which followed the fervour of the Great Revival. A chill melancholy steals sometimes over his faith—like the sound of an autumn breeze shuddering among the brown leaves after sunset. But it passes, and he rejoices again. His volume of hymns, entitled "Waters of Bethesda," was published in 1823. It takes its name from its first, and one of his best-known hymns.

I also, like so many more,
Am here beside the pool;
Waiting the Holy Ghost to stir
These waters deep and cool.

And shall it be that I must die
Who have remained so long?
Before me others always go
And wash, and they are strong.

I was the first of all to come,
But they were first made whole!
When shall the day of healing dawn
On my unhappy soul?

Here I shall tarry, come what may,
For who is there can tell
But the Physician will Himself
Come soon and make me well?

This other little hymn speaks with less hesitancy:

The Tree of Life in barren soil
At length has taken root,
And bends its branches to the ground
That all may taste its fruit.

Through wintry months of dark and cold,
The fruit is on it still;
Its leaves bring healing to the wounds
Of mind and heart and will.

If on this side the stream we find
The fruit of Christ so good,
It will be better, better far,
The other side the flood.

When strength has failed within my heart,
When human help is past,
In Thine own bosom, Jesu, Lord,
Grant me to rest at last.

In the good Providence of God the national revival of the eighteenth century was followed by a period of wise constructive energy. After the solemn awakening came the broad and sober reign of education. Catechisms were used largely and with much profit: theology was organised, and church polity was defined. Among those approved workmen in constructive religion, no name is more honoured than that of "Charles o'r Bala." The memorable little incident of "Mary Jones and her Bible," has made him known everywhere as the pioneer and one of the founders of the British and Foreign Bible Society. He edited the hymns of Ann Griffiths, and inserted one hymn of his own of great merit. His younger brother—DAVID CHARLES, of Caermarthen—has the Christ-given honour of having written one of the first hymns in the language. The biography of O fryniau Caersalem ceir gweled, like that of the "Miners' Hymn," can only be written in heaven. The poet had heard "the shout of them that triumph," and he was no longer afraid of the weariness and perplexity of his pilgrimage in the desert. Some day he would reach the cloudless hills of Zion, and look back on the meanderings of the journey to find that it was the nearest way home.

To us from the desert ascending
God giveth in Paradise rest;
Our soul after weary contending
Shall peacefully lean on His breast:
There we shall escape from affliction,
From sin with its shame and its pain;
Enjoying the full benediction,
The love of the Lamb that was slain.

From the hills of the Beautiful City
The way of the desert is clear:
What joy will be there in reviewing
The journey's meanderings here!
To look on the storms as they gather,
On terrible death and the grave;
While we shall be safe with the Father,
In peace on love's shadowless wave.

While dying lips have murmured in anticipation this joy of the heavenly retrospect from the hills of the City, the gate of pearl has opened to many a soul; and the faltering strain of earth has glided imperceptibly into the choral song of seraphim and saints redeemed.

The REV. DANIEL EVANS (Daniel Ddu) was born at Llanfihangel-Ystrad, in the county of Cardigan, in the year 1792. He studied at Oxford, and afterwards became a Fellow of Jesus College. He used to spend much of his time between the terms in the neighbourhood of his birth, where he was half-worshipped by the peasantry. They held some strange notions with regard to Oxford; and nothing could put out of their heads the belief that its ancient colleges were the favourite haunts of a motley crew of ghosts of very doubtful character. He himself was considered an expert in "raising spirits;" and as to his familiarity with the "black art"—how could there be a doubt of it, when he could speak Latin as well as Mephistopheles himself? If he never abused his power to do them ill, it was only another proof of his good nature. In the latter part of his life he was much troubled with melancholy, and died when he was fifty-four years of age. He wrote some very successful Eisteddfodic poetry; but nothing that he has written is so well known as the following hymn-poem on "The Prodigal Son," with its effective arrangement of light and shade. Its dramatic cast stands in the way of its being used as a whole; but some of the verses are extensively known.

Who is yonder weary pilgrim
From the desert now appears,
Coming home with cheerless footsteps,
And his cheek bedewed with tears?
Worn and tattered is his garment,
There is famine in his face:
Peace has made a vain endeavour
In his heart to find a place.

Hear him to himself bemoaning—
"Father! in thy house make me
But a servant!—me, unworthy
Any more thy son to be!"
What is this—this strain celestial
Now I hear above the sky?
Harps ten thousand times ten thousand
In sweet harmony on high?

Oh! the softly flowing echo
From the instruments of gold:
"Journey on, thou weary pilgrim,
Welcome home from deserts cold!
The inhabitants of Light-land
Now with joy thy spirit greet:
See, the robe is ready for thee—
Soon shalt thou the Father meet.

"Journey on, thou weary pilgrim,
Through the desert journey on;
Though thy face is marked with sorrow,
Song for weeping cometh soon:
Heaven's eyes watch every footstep,
Haste thee on, O sorely tried!
Flow, ye tears, a little longer,
Till at home ye shall be dried."

Who is He that brings the garment
Beautiful as light of dawn?
Kisses him, the weary lost one,
To His bosom closely drawn?
Loud and louder swells the music
Of each glowing golden string:
Little soul, art thou so precious
In the palace of the King?

Yes, there will be joy in heaven,
If from evil ways thou flee;
There is always, always welcome
In the Father's house for thee:
Leave the husks and vanished shadows,
And a world of falsehood spurn:
Thine the fulness and affection,
Thine the home: return! return!

Two other clergymen of the Established Church in Wales have rendered valued service to the national psalmody. One of these is the Rev. Morris Williams (Nicander), who, in the spirit of the High Church revival, published "The Church's Year." He also undertook a new version of the Psalms; but he did not succeed in supplanting the old Psalter of Edmund Prys. While his services were largely confined to the psalmody of his own church, another clergyman—the Rev. Evan Evans (Ieuan Glan Geirionydd)—has given some choice hymns to the nation at large. He was born at Trefriw, and had his early imagination charmed by the picturesque surroundings of his home. His parents were renowned for their piety, and were the pioneers of Calvinistic Methodism in the neighbourhood. Like most great men, he owed his greatness largely to his mother. He started life as a schoolmaster; but a marked success at an Eisteddfod having brought him into public notice, he was induced to devote himself to the ministry of the church. He held successively the curacies of Christleton and Ince, in Cheshire. Ill-health compelled him to leave Ince, and he spent some time in retirement among the beloved hills of Trefriw. When he had partially recovered, he was appointed to the curacy of Rhyl. This took place in the month of July, 1854. On the 21st day of the following January death came and led him into rest.

Nearly all his hymns are prayers—prayers full of the tenderest appeals, as if his faith trembled in approaching the Golden Gate. The following is given as an instance:

To Him, who bends to hear the weak,
I bring my simple plea:
In every pain and sore distress,
Turn not away from me!

Although unworthy to enjoy
Thy presence full and free,
Deserving but to be cast out—
Turn not away from me!

When my acquaintance, one by one,
Leave me in misery;
And friend and comrade stand afar,
Turn not away from me!

For Thy dear cross and precious death
On lonely Calvary,
And for Thine intercession now,
Turn not away from me!

When I must face the stormy flood,
Where many sorrows be;
And through the valley walk alone,
Turn not away from me!

When Thou shalt come the second time,
With awful majesty,
To judge the living and the dead,
Turn not away from me!

The technical intricacies of these two verses have not debarred them from the attainment of wide popularity:

My race beneath the sun
Is very nearly run;
Life fades away in sad decay,
Soon shall my day be done:
My fragile tent is sorely rent,
My strength is spent well-nigh;
The hour is near—I must appear
In doubt and fear within the clear
Immortal sphere on high.

Grant, Lord, Thy peace to me,
And Thy dear face to see;
Before my day has passed away,
All sinless may I be!
Thy gracious light in death's dark night
Shall soon my fright dispel:
In Thy right hand on yonder strand
Where fears disband my soul shall stand—
Sweet land! where all is well!

While for years the thought of death was so present to his mind, it was natural for him to sing this wistful:

I linger sadly near
The stormy river;
And long to cross, but fear
Lest none deliver:
Oh! that I might but soar
Above its rush and roar,
And on the other shore
Be safe for ever!

From every dismal wave
Come dark foretellings;
I think of all the brave
Lost in its swellings:
O soul of mine, so frail!
What if the flood prevail,
And thou at last shouldst fail
To reach those dwellings!

But see! from yonder shore
On high ascended,
My comrades in the war,
Their sorrow ended:
Why should I feel alarm?
They crossed on Jesu's arm,
And I shall know no harm,
By Him befriended.

A version of this hymn, changed so as to be an address to the poet, and beginning

Thou, often wandering near
The stormy river,—

is inscribed over his grave in Trefriw churchyard, where he lies beside his parents and his wife, under the sombre shadow of "the twin yew-trees."

H. ELVET LEWIS.

THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE BETRAYAL.

"And as they sat and did eat, Jesus said, Verily I say unto you, One of you which eateth with Me shall betray Me. And they began to be sorrowful, and to say unto Him one by one, Is it I? and another said, Is it I? And He answered and said unto them, It is one of the twelve, that dippeth with Me in the dish."—Mark xiv. 18–20.

THIS little group of men had not been with our Lord for those years in vain. They had learnt at least to trust His word and to distrust their own nature. When, at supper together for the last time, He out of His profound prescience brought forward this tremendous charge, "One of you shall betray Me," they all felt that it might be true of any one of them. And so their light talk and laughter were stayed. The current of their emotions was changed. "They began to be sorrowful." And, after the first stun of perplexity and hesitation was passed, they began to speak. Each one asked for himself, could the dark and dreadful charge be true of him? They said unto Him, one by one, "Is it I?" and another said, "Is it I?"

This is indeed a state of mind which it is helpful for us to welcome and utilise. Even those who are really scholars of Christ, those who have personally learnt some of His truths, and have personally experienced some of His goodness, those who have many a time joined in the Communion, and have received the spiritual strength and cheer appropriate to the sacred act; it is to such as those that this charge may carry a piercing strength of significance.

When we think of the betrayal of Christ, we may well withdraw our eyes from one another, for we read on each countenance a similar expression of alarm.

Looking into ourselves, knowing, ah, so well, the moral weakness and wickedness of our own nature, we may indeed re-echo the question, saying, one by one, "Is it I?" And then, after a pause, even the most mature and experienced of us all may give up our self-confidence, and add, "Is it I?"

Such introspection will do us good. The best watch needs sometimes to have its outer cases opened, and the delicate, intricate mechanism laid bare to sight. It is so with the human heart. Otherwise the microscopic dust of worldliness and the adulterated oil of human wisdom will clog its action, hinder its keeping right time, and presently even stop it altogether. Only for such search we need the illumination of the Holy Spirit as the watch examiner needs the magnifying glass, and the fine skilful touch of the

THE ANNOUNCEMENT OF THE BETRAYAL.

Saviour's counsels and comforts, as the watchmaker needs his instruments for cleaning and rectifying.

But some may say, "Is the danger a real one? Is it possible that the betrayal of Christ can be repeated? Was it not Judas who betrayed Him? Was He not crucified as the result of the betrayal? Has He not now ascended into the heavens, far above the reach of all human malignity and treachery?" That indeed is so. It is true that the act of betrayal, as perpetrated by Judas, is done and cannot be repeated. But it is also true that the spirit of betrayal may, and does find a place in the bosom of Christ's scholars. As a spirit—like that of envy, or pride, or jealousy—it abides in human nature independently of time, or distance or nationality. As a spirit, it may exert its baleful influence upon our acts and deeds.

And Christ and His character are still the same; Christ and His cause are still the same; Christ and His kingdom are still identified. For us then to injure His character, or His cause, or His kingdom is for us to injure Him. For us to betray either of these into the hands of His enemies is for us to betray Him. Thus the spirit of Judas still lives, and the act of Judas may be still repeated, and the guilt of Judas, may, at least, to some real degree, come upon those who repeat the act.

1. The spirit of the betrayal of Christ may show itself in a deliberate preference of our own thoughts to His teachings.

This is where Judas began. Our Lord once spoke a hard saying about the necessity of eating His flesh, and drinking His blood in order to possess eternal life. Many of His followers left Him then. Turning to the twelve, He said, "Will ye also go away?" Then said Peter, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life, and we believe and are sure that Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." Then it was apparently that Judas first hardened himself and resisted such teaching. And our Lord with His omniscient eye searched him and said: "Have I not chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil," an adversary, a slanderer of the truth?

It is possible for us to prefer our own light thoughts and superficial opinions to His weighty teachings and lofty truths. We may permit ourselves to cultivate disinclination, dislike, and even disgust at His severer claims. We may play fast and loose with His commandments. We may treat His grand, far-sounding eternal words as ringers treat church bells when they assemble in the belfry to ring. After pulling the ropes down they let them slip up again through their hands, otherwise the rebound of the ponderous metal to which they are attached would drag them up and dash their brains out against the roof. But in dealing with Christ's words of eternal life, there is no roof against which we can hurt ourselves. We must hold on. Drawing them towards us with clasped hands of prayer, we should soar up with them in strong faith in their mighty recoil heavenward. And our lives would fill and thrill with sweet, solemn, sonorous music as the words of eternal life peal out and make us blest. But to draw off from the Master's teaching about Himself, His sacrifice, His dominion, and to prefer our own poor thoughts about what is right and good before God, is to pronounce ourselves treacherous and traitorous. The Judas spirit of betrayal has its home in our heart.

2. It is possible for us still to betray Christ if we prefer parsimony to generosity in His service.

Once, towards the end of His life on earth, Mary of Bethany took her alabaster vase of very precious ointment, and broke it, and poured the fragrant, cooling contents over His head and feet. Murmurs were heard, headed by Judas: "Why was not this ointment sold for three hundred pence, and given to the poor? This he said, not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and had the bag and bore what was put therein." Our Lord, however, defended the lavishness of her generosity, and declared it a fit memorial of His burying. "For ye have the poor always with you, but Me ye have not always."

It is possible for us to give to the poor—not from care or love for the poor—but just for the distinction it brings and the influence it gains. It is possible for us to urge gifts to the poor at times of famine or depression, not for care of the poor, but because we can secure some portion of it for ourselves. It is possible for us to distribute our three hundred pence in feeding and clothing the poor; but even when that is done, the best is still undone. What about the spiritual life and its nourishment? What about spacious and even stately buildings in which religion may be taught and worship carried on? What about ways and means of various kinds by which the day of Christ's living (for His burying is over for ever) might be kept prominent before the people? We should give our best and most for these purposes. At seasons of great demands our ornaments and luxuries might well be all lavished forth and heaped up for His personal honouring. It is by generosity, and not parsimony in His service, that we keep our hearts warm and elastic with divine love. If we aim only at the supply of the lesser needs of the poor, and become satisfied in giving them food and raiment, and eager also, perhaps, for the praise and distinction that such things bestow upon us—then we may well beware lest the Judas spirit of the betrayal of Christ has not, unconsciously to ourselves, made its home deeply down in our hearts.

3. We may betray Christ by giving more esteem to the possession of money as a form of wealth rather than to the possession of moral and spiritual qualities.

Judas sold Him at last for thirty pieces of silver—which is about £4 in our English currency. He calmly and deliberately put the Son of God into the hands of His foes for money's sake. It was a fatal bargain; and he soon changed his mind about it. But it was too late—and there was no rectification. If we care for Christ, then what He loved most we shall seek to love most; and what He possessed most we shall also seek to possess as of most value. He was a poor man all His earthly days: but how rich in good works! how rich in noble and generous qualities!

The estimate of the value of money is far too high. The search and struggle for money are far too absorbing. When we permit it to swallow up the time we should give to prayer and worship, we are betraying Christ. When we permit it to exhaust or destroy our strength so that we have no energy or enthusiasm left for good work, we are betraying Christ. When we begin to love it more than we love honesty and honour and benevolence, we have betrayed Christ. In these and things like to these were His life. Those only are rich who having faith do make it their chief aim on that basis to accumulate moral and spiritual qualities; adding to the "faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness love." Thus we at once follow the Master and become rich towards God.

Our only safety as the scholars of Christ is to yield ourselves wholly to the teachings of Christ as regnant and supreme. To come into His presence self-suspicious and self-distrustful; and so far as possible, empty of self, except as the longing to be filled with Him is present with us.

It was once thought no great disgrace if men or women were unable to sign their names to any important document, but had instead to make a cross as their mark. That was in the days of low education and is not tolerated now. But in the case of Christ and the soul, matters are quite reversed. When we would avail ourselves of the fulness of His salvation and secure to ourselves the title deeds of eternal life, there is no need or room for our name. The effect of our best education in self-knowledge is just to accept for ourselves and verify before God the mark and claim of His Cross. All belonging to self we must ignore and leave unwritten. We are nothing in that great enterprise, and His cross is everything. And under its bitter, yet benign influences we shall be preserved from repeating the crime of Judas, and betraying that great Saviour to be crucified afresh thereon.[1]

EASTERN FASTS AND FESTIVALS.

II.

I PASS now to Mohammedan festivals. The population amid which I lived had a mixed character; and both because the mass of the people were Moslem, and also because of their intrinsic elements, these festivals were to me of far deeper interest than any other. It is not my province to describe all the festivals, nor indeed to present the particulars belonging to any one except so far as is necessary to the understanding of my personal connection with it. Two of them stand out very prominently—the Ramadan and the Mohurrum. The first belongs to all Islam, and the second specially to the Shiahs ("Adherents"), the smaller of the two chief of the Mohammedan sects—the other being the Sunnies ("Traditionists"). Of the Ramadan my recollections relate chiefly to the self-righteous vainglory of our zealous Moslem servants, who would boastfully open their mouths for inspection (!) in proof of complete abstinence from food and water; and the vociferous rejoicings which welcomed the termination of the days of fasting. But the Shiah festival of the Mohurrum is suggestive to me of the most vivid pictures.

I will try to give a clear notion (which is not easy to get) of the subject of this celebration. At the time of the death of the prophet of Islam there were four "companions" of the prophet eligible to be Caliph ("Successor"). Two of them were his fathers-in-law, and the other two sons-in-law. But only one of the latter had children, and he moreover was cousin-german to the prophet—Ali—a man of universal genius as well as of extraordinary courage from his boyhood—and this one therefore, more especially as representing grandsons of the prophet (Hassan and Housein), is declared by the Shiahs to have been the only rightful heir to the prophet's place and authority; and is indeed regarded as actually equal to the prophet himself. It is a fundamental rule that the Caliph must belong to the prophet's tribe—the Koreish. (Undoubtedly, therefore, the Shereef of Mecca is the legitimate Caliph, and not the Sultan of Turkey.) All four belonged to this tribe, and moreover were connected with the prophet by marriage (Mohammed had seventeen wives), but Ali, as relation by blood, and as the father of the sons of Mohammed's daughter Fatima—the mother and sons being the only surviving lineal descendants of the prophet—fully represented blood relationship with the prophet, and thus certainly had, with his other qualifications, supreme claims to be Caliph and also Iman (semi-inspired teacher) or rather Iman-ul-Mussilmin (chief prophetic Teacher of all Moslems)—(Mohammedanism is without a priesthood). But the other three, through the struggles of faction, preceded Ali as Caliphs and Imans; and Ali, after his accession, was assassinated in a mosque (A.D. 661), and subsequently his two sons Hassan and Housein, the grandsons of the prophet, were treacherously slain. The Shiahs accordingly (including the whole of the Persians) reject the authority of the three predecessors of Ali as that of usurpers, and also all the traditions (Sunna) belonging to their several Caliphates, consisting of expositions, comments, and additions to the Kuran. The Mohurrum is the annual celebration in Memoriam of the violent death of Ali and his two sons—but more particularly of the two sons, Hassan and Housein, as the canonized martyrs of Islam.

When it is remembered that now nearly 1200 years have passed away since the tragic events occurred which are thus commemorated, it is something astonishing to see the powerful emotions still excited by the recollections of them. Often these emotions are roused to a pitch which amount to frenzy, and find vent in furious fights with the Moslem dissentients and their supposed sympathisers. I often wonder how my father and I, absolutely defenceless as we were, escaped violent handling or vehement execration from the crowds, in turns raging and wailing over the various scenes belonging to the commemoration.[1] I can vividly recall that sometimes I shuddered and sought flight as I looked upon the representation of the murderers of the martyrs as demons from hell—men whose naked bodies were made densely black by charcoal and oil, with streaks of red paint on their faces, dancing in circles, howling, and yelling, and beating time, each with two short and stout sticks in his hands. I remember too, on the other hand, rows of young men, solemn and tearful, draped in white muslin, arranged in successive files, walking in slow procession, one apart, moving backwards, with his face towards the others, plaintively reciting verses descriptive of

MOHAMMEDAN FANATICS AT THE MOHURRUM FESTIVAL.

[1] It is well known too that no Musalmans are more intensely zealous than those of the Malayan race. A large proportion is supplied by it of the Hadjis or pilgrims to Mecca. Some Malays (men and women) perform the pilgrimage twice and even oftener in their lives.

the martyrdom, and his monotone broken at intervals with refrains (chiefly consisting simply of the two names Hassan! Houscin!) from the rest in sounds of wailing, accompanied by the simultaneous rising and falling of their arms, and the rattling of metallic castanets. I know it was sometimes hard ourselves to keep from tears as we saw and heard them.

Then there were here and there the gorgeous but ephemeral tabūts, structures of bamboo-paper and tinsel, representing the tombs of the martyrs —carried about the streets each evening, and at the end of the festival publicly destroyed. Near to the mosque would be ornamented sheds open to the streets with white-robed and turbaned moollahs (mosque officials), seated under canopies, reciting narratives and eulogies of the martyred dead. Passing from these to the spacious open court of the chief mosque—we became witnesses of scenes which have filled my mind with weird memories, in which astonishment, horror, and admiration are mingled. What I saw, and saw frequently, I should hardly venture to put upon record, lest I should be charged, to use part of the famous antithesis of Sheridan, with going to my "imagination for facts," were there not already published a complete confirmation by the high authority of Mr. Laurence Oliphant in "The Land of Gilead" (p. 426).[1] My only doubt is as to whether the scenes belong to the Mohurrum or Ramadan; their fanaticism savours of the first, but the orthodoxy of the sect to which the performers belong (described by Oliphant) points to the second.

Turning to our left as we passed through the entrance gate of the yard, we came to a small charcoal fire with five or six large tambourines lying near to it, and a number of roughly made iron daggers, skewers and swords. Soon after our arrival a man appeared, somewhat advanced in life, stirred the burning embers, and put the ends and edges of the implements into the fire, and then taking up a tambourine placed himself opposite the fire in a kneeling posture, swaying himself to and from his heels, beating his drum, and vociferating "La Illah Illallah." He was followed, one by one, by six or seven men (whose Sheikh he was), in the prime of life, sparingly clad, of strong build, and resolute look. Each as he arrived took up a tambourine, and placed himself at the side of the Sheikh, so as eventually to form a half-circle, with the fire before them, in the same attitude as the leader, striking his drum and shouting in concert with him. The beating becomes more and more violent, and the shouts (Ya Allah!) quicker and louder, till the sweat falls heavily from each to the ground, and the whole soul of each is evidently absorbed in passionate and well-nigh maddened enthusiasm. The few sight-seeing stragglers who come after us soon grow into a crowd of eager spectators, arranging themselves around, and as the performers increase in their excitement, become themselves so intensely moved as to echo back their shouts. Suddenly one of the band throws down his drum, rushes to the other side of the fire, seizes one of the daggers, towards one end of which is a circular hollow ball, formed of rings, and whirling himself round and round, he plunges it to the ball into his abdomen! Soon after another follows him into the open space between the fire and the crowd, and seizing the skewers, runs one through his throat from the front, a second through his mouth from cheek to cheek, and a third through the fleshy part of one arm, and a fourth through the other arm. The drums, if possible, beat louder, and the cries yet become quicker and stronger, as the men run from side to side, and show themselves and their wounds to the people. This is followed by the rising of three men, one

[1] See also article in the "Daily News" of Dec. 28, 1883, entitled "A Visit to the Holy City of Kairwan." The writer, an English lady, says:—

"By degrees the devotees rose from the carpet, and stood along the wall of the room opposite to us. They then began to sway from side to side, keeping time to the music; then as the music became louder they swayed more and more, sideway and forwards, at last bending down on one knee and rapidly rising again.

"At last one of them began to roll his head round and round on his breast. Upon this the lesser priests brought him forward on to the matting, and removed the fez, turban and white cap, leaving his head bare. The head was shaved, with the exception of a long, thick bunch of hair in the centre, which sometimes hung down to the waist. With this the Prophet will lift them up into Paradise. The music played louder and louder, and they all began to groan—or rather, I should say, to howl—until the noise was almost insupportable. Then one after the other became seized with the delirium, rolling their heads and eyes in a manner that almost frightened me. Then the assistant priests removed the garments from their shoulders, and the brazier was handed from one to another, over which they held their heads to inhale its fumes. Each man then knelt before the high priest, who prayed into each ear in succession. A number of swords were then brought forward. They consist of broad blades of steel; instead of handles these swords were fitted into round blocks of wood, about six inches in diameter and two inches thick. The devotees seized them with both hands at the handle and point, and began to raise them over their heads and bring them down with all their force against their waists. Several then knelt down, and placed the points of the swords against the muscles of the shoulder near the neck. The priests then drove the points into the flesh with small wooden mallets, so as to project through the skin on the other side. They then walked about with the swords hanging down from their skin. Very little blood flowed from these wounds, which were not inflicted in dangerous places. A quantity of pieces of sharp broken glass and crockery were then produced, and the devotees commenced to eat them. These pieces of glass were about the size of an ordinary hen's eggs, and consisted of broken lamps or vessels of any description. These they crushed up with their teeth and swallowed them, sometimes lying and rolling over on the floor in agonies of pain. A French officer handed me one of these pieces of glass, which resembled a piece of a broken wine glass. The noise and confusion became deafening, and the worshippers had evidently lost all control over themselves. I then saw a man appear at the door with a large branch of prickly pear. He was carrying it on his shoulders. It was at once torn in pieces, and the large oval leaves covered with thorns an inch long thrown on the ground. The priests then pressed the backs of the devotees down upon the leaves with some force, and in this manner their backs were covered with spines, which were picked out by the high priest. Some commenced to eat the leaves, with the thorns upon them. The pain these men suffered must have been intense, the perspiration stood on their foreheads, and tears streamed down their faces, but they never ceased to shout and call upon the name of Allah. So occupied were they that they did not seem to notice us, though as they strode about the room I had to shrink back to the wall to keep from contact with them."

of whom seizes the sword from the fire. This is held by two of them, with the edge uppermost, at one end by the hilt, and at the other the point, with a bundle of rags, while the third man raises himself, stands with bare feet on the edge of the sword, sometimes lifting them alternately up and down, keeping his balance by touching the heads of those who carry him on the sword. When this is over, the sheikh or head dervish follows, and seizing a piece of red-hot flaming charcoal, throws it into his mouth, and crunches it into powder, and, if I am not mistaken, swallows the whole.

Mr. Oliphant appears to have seen more of a like kind, but I only describe what I can remember. The most extraordinary part of the facts is that not only were the men apparently uninjured, but not a drop of blood was to be seen either on their flesh or on the implements used, nor any sign of swelling or inflammation about the wounds inflicted. Each, however, had the marks upon him of former inflictions, appearing like indurated or cicatrised flesh. Mr. Oliphant quotes a surgeon who went with him to the sight at Damascus, and who had for some years examined the men during their performances, as declaring that he was utterly at a loss for any explanation, and never ceased to wonder that there was neither death nor permanent injury, and never even an effusion of blood. It should be borne in mind that tenacity of life is often found to exist in special proportion to the perils which threaten it. This is often noticed in reference to infant life; so of savages. A case is given in Oates' "Matabele Land," p. 209, of a man who had been "hacked with axes and left for dead." When Dr. Oates (now deceased) went with a lantern to look at him, he found "a hole at the base of the skull, perhaps two inches long, and an inch-and-a-half wide," and it "penetrated into the substance of the brain, so that a mouse could have sat in it." "I poured," he says, "some arnica and water into the hole, and when he lifted up his head, a perfect stream of it ran down his back." The man "enjoyed his supper," started in the morning on a long journey, and was seen again the following year, "apparently in perfect health." As to the absence of blood, may this not be traceable to the weapons being heated, and therefore singeing the wounds as they are made? Mr. Oliphant does not, however, refer to the implements seen by him as heated. I am quite sure on this point, as it respects the scenes belonging to my experience.

I have spoken of the feelings induced as comprising admiration in them. I knew even then this much, that all this was done in the name of Allah, and as the outcome of consecration (however fanatical) to Him and His service. Mr. Oliphant gives details on this aspect of the subject of deep interest. The men I saw doubtless were dervishes of the order he describes—numbering some ten thousand—found in all parts of the Moslem world, and gathering disciples from every class and sect. The founder, Sheikh Said Ahmed el Bedaur, lived two hundred years ago, and lies buried in Egypt; but though he organised the order, the power ascribed to the miraculous interpositions of God existed, it is affirmed, for ages before him, but is only bestowed where there is intense consecration of the will in the exercises of prayer, the practice of virtue, and the cultivation of spiritual purity. There is also in use an elixir, which is said to give healing properties to saliva, so that when applied to wounds which bleed, it stops the flow of blood, and also in other ways prevents ill effects. The power, it is declared, is given for the glory of God and His prophet, and unless there be the consecration required, any attempt to perform "the miracles" must prove fatal. No one can be surprised that scenes of the kind described are among the most vivid of my recollections, and I hope I can add that there has come from them something of moral influence on my life. What means of good and evil lie in the living pictures retained by memory of the scenes and events of youth!

"I find no fault in Him."

"Pilate saith unto them, Take ye Him, and crucify Him: for I find no fault in Him."—John xix. 6.

WHAT evil hath He done?"
He made the blind to see,
The famish'd crowds He filled,
He set the captive free,
The raging storm He still'd:
This did He, God's dear Son.

"What evil hath He done?"
He gave the weary rest,
He cleansed the sin-defiled,
And to His loving breast
He took the little child:
This did He, God's dear Son.

"What evil hath He done?"
He saved from suffering dread
Who touched His garment's hem;
He raised to life the dead,
To die Himself for them:
This did He, God's dear Son.

"What evil hath He done?"
As man our griefs He bare:
He strove our peace to win,
Till anguish and despair
O'ertook Him—for our sin:
This did He, God's dear Son.

"What evil hath He done?"
The oracles are dumb;
But hark! through ages past
A voice sounds: "Lo, I come:
Death shall be slain at last
In God's immortal Son."

Ah, Lord, what hast Thou done,
Thus stooping life to give
For us who lay in death,
That we through Thee might live,
New-quickened by Thy breath?—
Praise we the Eternal Son!

F. W. ROOSE.

THE LADY ELFRIDA.

CHAPTER II.

"RUTH, what is it?" asked young Redwood, in a low, hurried tone, for he feared to disturb the worshippers in the chapel, as soon as he had reached his wife's side, "is anything the matter with the child, our little Kate?"

"I left the child smiling in sleep as if an angel sent by the dear Master was whispering to her," answered the young mother, a gleam of light passing for a moment over her troubled face as she spoke of her little one; then, before she said more, she took her husband's hand, and drew him hastily behind a little thicket of trees which grew near the chapel.

"Harry," she said, when at length they paused, "my lady is in sore peril."

"What do you mean?" he asked uneasily.

"When I had put the child to sleep," Ruth went on, in quick, yet distinct tones, which told of a mind that can keep its balance, even in an hour of sudden danger and alarm, "I wandered out to catch a few echoes of the hymns you might be singing in the chapel; I know how sweet they are, when they come floating on the evening breeze. When I neared the southern entrance of the sacred building, the entrance on the side towards the castle which is always used by us, I saw several figures lurking behind the wall of the park enclosure."

It should be mentioned here, that the little chapel stood in the castle domains in the park.

"But were they not most likely some of our congregation who came too late for the service?"

"Men who come on the holy, peaceful errand of offering up prayer and praise to God do not bring arms with them, such as I saw gleaming in the hands of those who are watching and waiting yonder. The moon shone out for a few minutes from behind a cloud just then, and I could see the glitter and flash of steel, Harry."

"Are you sure of this, Ruth, sure that no woman's fancy has deceived you?" he cried, beginning, in his turn, to show anxiety in his face and manner.

"As sure as I am of the love and care of Him who reigns above," she answered firmly.

"How many of them are there? Did you notice, can you tell, Ruth? You have in general a quick eye."

His questions hurried rapidly on one another, for his perception of the danger of the situation was growing apace.

"I think there were about ten."

"Then may God help my sweet mistress!" exclaimed he, in a burst of agitation.

"And He will," said the woman's voice, softly, yet steadfastly.

"The men in the chapel are all unarmed; I and her two serving men are ready to die in her defence. I can speak for my two comrades as for myself; but what are three against such odds?"

The young man's eyes flashed as he spoke, yet there was a sad, despairing cadence in his voice.

"It would be but a vain waste of God's good gift of life; you must not be sacrificed like this, my own true love and husband, the father of my child," said Ruth, her sweet mouth trembling as she spoke.

"Yet so it must be, Ruth. My trusty comrades and I have not even our swords at our sides to-night to make an effort to protect her; yet still we will rally round her, our noble, generous mistress, and make our bodies, for a brief space, her shield, while we commend her and ourselves to the great Captain of our Salvation."

"The blood-hounds of the queen and her priests must have scented out the high work for God and man my lady is doing, even in these retired west country solitudes, and have come to catch her just as she passes out of the chapel," said Ruth, her eyes glowing with indignation. "Oh! surely, Harry, the Master will show us some way in which we can prevent this great, cruel wrong being done to His faithful servant, just when she is working for Him."

"Ruth, unless your woman's wit can strike out a fresh, unexpected spark of light, I have not the faintest glimmer of thought which shows me even a hope of saving her."

"Wait for a few minutes before we quite despair, Harry; the meeting in the chapel will not be over for another half-hour or more, and till then all is safe. Wait for a few minutes, Harry, we have not prayed over the matter yet."

"Well said, my own true handmaid of the King."

Then the young man bared his head reverently, and they knelt down side by side, there with the night wind sighing round them, and the leaves whispering hard by, and the faint light of the watery moon over head, knelt while they poured out their whole hearts in a strong earnest prayer for guidance and protection.

When they rose, they both stood silent for a while. Ruth leant against a tree with her cheek resting on her hand. Her husband watched her rather curiously, wondering what was going on in her mind, and what could bring that intent expression into her face; it seemed strange to him that, at such a moment as this, she could concentrate her mind, so entirely and fixedly as she appeared to be doing, on any subject.

"I will save her, God helping me;" she said at length, speaking out in a clear decisive tone, like one who knows something which cannot be doubted.

As the words left her lips, her figure, which was as full of active grace as if the moorland breezes had rejoiced to brace each limb and muscle, was drawn up to its utmost height as though moved by a sudden, resolute impulse that put power into her whole frame. An earnestness of purpose, that might have suited the countenance of a grave man, who has ripened some well-considered design, stamped itself upon her sweet young face; the eyes lately veiled with sadness, sparkled with keen intelligence, and the cheeks, just now so pale, glowed like the morning.

"What do you mean? What do you intend?" asked her companion, starting as he heard the unexpected words.

"I mean that a way has been shown me, coming into my mind like a flash of light from on high, as surely it is."

"Aye, my girl, I can well believe that it is such," he answered, with simple, manly faith in his tones, "and I think, too, that the mind of a good woman is like a clear mirror which can reflect the promptings that come from above quicker than the minds of us men that come in closer contact with the evil of the world."

"Harry," she went on, hardly seeming to heed his words, so full was she of what was in her heart and brain, "you must go back into the chapel at once, and warn the lady and all there of the danger which is at hand. You must bid them all leave the chapel as quietly and noiselessly as they can, by the door through which you just now came out, the door on this side, of the existence of which the queen's men have, as yet, apparently no idea, as they leave this part of the building unwatched. They must go to their own homes as rapidly as they are able, so as to excite no suspicion by being abroad at this late hour; but my lady must follow yonder track up across the heather on to the moor attended by you."

The castle stood in a sheltered hollow close to Exmoor, which rose up close at hand in an indistinct dim outline.

"The other two serving men," continued Ruth, going straight on with what she had to say, in a calm, yet rapid fashion, which gave her half bewildered husband no time for words:—"the other two serving men must speed, taking a round-about road, to the castle stables; there let them saddle my lady's palfrey and three horses besides. A short cut through the pleasure-grounds will lead them up to the great bog on the moor, the one they call the punchbowl, where you and my lady will meet them. Then you will ride, guarding my lady like a precious jewel, to our nearest sea-port, where we chance to have sure knowledge that a ship is just about to set sail for the Netherlands."

Harry Redwood drew a long breath when she at length ceased to speak. She stood there with the night breeze playing softly with her dress and hair, looking as composed and resolved as if she were in the castle laundry, making up her mind which frill of her lady's should be starched first.

"It looks a somewhat doubtful plan, if truth must be told, to my man's eyes," he said slowly, after a minute's thought in which he had gathered up and put together all she had proposed, "and yet I cannot but deem that God's hand is with you in the matter."

"Harry, do not delay, hasten back to the chapel, or the hymn, with which the meeting will end, will arouse the attention of the watchers and make them more on the alert."

"But how about the boy? My lady will never go to the Netherlands leaving him in England."

"She will; for as God's mercy has been pleased to appoint, he is just now on a visit with his tutor at the house of my lady's kinsman, Lord Courtney; he, as you know, is the most powerful Protestant noble in the west, and he will easily manage to send the child to his parents."

"But they will so soon follow in pursuit of us," said Redwood still hesitating.

"I will answer for it that you shall have at least a considerable start of them," replied Ruth, with a strange assurance of tone and manner which surprised him.

"And you yourself, Ruth, how will you escape?" he asked, repressing his wonder as graver cares gathered round him; "you have not said anything about that."

"My Father above will hold me in the hollow of His hand, till the storm has swept over me," she answered, with steadfastness lighting up her brow, and a sweet, serious smile just dawning on her lips.

Then she hastened him to go and do her bidding in the chapel, and he went, feeling that there was, in truth, no time to waste in questions; but before he went she laid her head upon his breast, and whispered softly, "Dear Master, have him in Thine own strong keeping!"

Redwood did not heed much those words then in his haste and trouble of mind; but afterwards they came back to his memory.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VIII.

To what epistle may we turn and read
God's goodness doth to true repentance lead?
Whose scanty meal a precious birthright cost,
He afterwards a promised blessing lost?
Who, warned to watch and pray, securely slept,
Then sinned three times, but soon repenting, wept?
Mother of one before Messiah sent
To tell His coming and to cry—Repent!
Who preached repentance to the world around
Before the flood by which they all were drowned?
Whose late repentance just before he died
Won sweet forgiveness from the Crucified?
Who to secure a kingdom vainly tried
Grieved David's heart and, unrepenting, died?
What leper from his healer turned dismayed,
But soon repented, and his word obeyed?
One of the towns to which our Saviour went
And warned of judgment should they not repent?
What scribe, confessing Israel's trespass, said
"Iniquities increase above our head"?
St. Peter tells of God's forgiving love,
Which seeks to gather all with Him above;
He is not willing one should go astray
Or be rejected at the last great day.
Take these initial letters now and read
What those must come to who forgiveness need.

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XVI.—GERALD'S RESOLVE.

REMONSTRANCES.

GERALD stayed away from home a whole week, during which time his family heard nothing whatever of him beyond the message that Mr. Leslie had brought.

His mother, now that her anxieties were once aroused upon the subject, worried herself almost into a fever over this protracted absence, picturing her son led away into every kind of mischievous dissipation—learning all manner of evil ways that he had never known before.

Wulfric was so closely cross-questioned as to his own opinion, that he was obliged at length to admit his suspicions as to the probability of Gerald's having gone to the races, and the bare idea of such a thing threw his mother into a fever of anxiety and distress.

"Why didn't you stop him? Why didn't you tell me, that I might have stopped him?" she would moan, rocking herself to and fro in a half distracted way. "What a cruel son and neglectful brother you are, Wulfric! You knew all about these races and suspected that Gerald would wish to go, and yet you never lifted a finger to stop him. I cannot understand it—I cannot, indeed. Well, well, I suppose some people have no natural affection. I always told your dear father that you had none. Oh! if only he had lived I should have been spared all this!"

Wulfric took all these reproaches very patiently and quietly. He knew that they were the outcome of his mother's morbid condition of health, and accepted them without any chafing or murmuring; but it made his position at home a trying one, and he dreaded when the time came that he must face the invalid and hear all the restless outpourings of her anxiety and trouble. She always expected that he would bring home news of Gerald, as though his time had been spent in hunting up news of his brother, and his ignorance upon the point that so engrossed her thoughts was always the signal for the commencement of a fresh attack.

As days passed by, Mrs. Meynal became quite feverish and overwrought.

"Wulfric," she would say, "I cannot stand this. Gerald must be told that it cannot be allowed. When he comes home you must be severe with him—you must tell him plainly that you cannot and will not have it—nor I either. A little more of such anxiety would fairly kill me. If he wishes to live here, he must have more consideration. Tell him so very plainly, as I have said before. Do not forget. Let him know that if he cannot behave better, and if he will not give up his bad associates, he cannot go on living here. Frighten him and threaten him. Don't let him turn you round his fingers as he always turns me. Mind you make him understand."

"I will do so, if you wish, mother," answered Wulfric, "but I am very doubtful whether threatening Gerald will be a very wise or successful measure."

"Of course you will oppose anything I wish. It has always been so all along; but I do know Gerald a little better than you do, I know what will be likely to take effect upon him."

"But will it be the effect you really wish to produce?"

Mrs. Meynal, however, would hear no reason. She had taken an idea into her head and she clung to it tenaciously. She was sufficiently frightened to feel that strong measures must be used, and she was unable to see any point of view but her own. Victory was secure she thought, if only matters were managed in her own way.

Wulfric was in his study one night, when he heard the sound of a latch key being fitted into the front door. The door was locked for the night, as Gerald had ceased to be expected at late hours, but Wulfric stepped out of the room and quietly unfastened the bolts and locks. Next moment the brothers were face to face.

"Ah, thanks, old fellow," said Gerald easily and unconcernedly. "How are you all? All in bed but you? I want something to eat. Are the servants gone too? Well, I'll go to the larder and forage for myself."

"There is cold meat in the dining-room," answered Wulfric, as he turned to refasten the door. "I was late in myself to-night."

Gerald turned accordingly into the dining-room, whither Wulfric followed him almost at once and stood leaning his broad shoulders against the high mantelshelf, whilst his brother attacked the viands on the table. His face was very grave and sombre and he seemed in no hurry to speak. Gerald, on the contrary, was in excellent spirits, and apparently had not the least suspicion of being in any way in disgrace.

"How has the world been wagging with you?" he asked, looking up when the keen edge of his hunger was appeased. Then catching sight of the expression of his brother's face he laughed banteringly. "Talk of a skeleton at a feast! Why a death's head would be a cheerful object as compared with you! Anything the matter, old boy?"

"Where have you been all this time, Gerald?"

"Oh, I've been about with Hector Thompson and some chums of his, seeing a little of the world, and getting ideas for my novel."

"You mean, I suppose, that you have been at the Aylcester races?"

"Well, yes, we certainly did spend a few days there. The horses were magnificent. I think I shall take to painting horses. I got several first-rate ideas. It doesn't do to stagnate in a little hole like this all one's life; one must get a change from time to time."

"Why did you not write and let us know your whereabouts?"

"Oh, I am a shocking hand at letters, besides I told young Leslie to let you know."

"You did not tell him where you were going."

"No, I hardly knew myself. I told him to say I might be away a week, and I've only been two days over time. I don't quite know though why you should call me over the coals like this. I'm not responsible to you for my comings and goings."

Gerald spoke with perfect good temper, yet with a sort of assumption of independence that showed the way the current was setting.

"I am quite aware of that, I am not speaking on my own account, but, in the character of a medical man who has to think seriously of his mother's state of health."

Gerald looked up quickly,

"Mother is all right."

"I beg your pardon; she is anything but right: and your absence and silence have had a very injurious effect upon her."

"How so?"

"She has been extremely uneasy about you: in total ignorance of your real proceedings, but imagining everything that was most distressing. In her condition of health a strain of this kind is most injurious. You ought to have more consideration."

Gerald was fond of his mother in his own careless and rather selfish fashion; but Wulfric's manner was hardly conciliatory, and he did not choose to accept with any degree of humility a rebuke administered by him.

"She might have known I was all right. I can take care of myself."

"Can you?"

Gerald flushed a little at the tone.

"To be sure," he answered easily. "I am quite capable of looking after my own interests."

Wulfric was silent for a moment or two, knitting his brows in lines of deep thought.

"Look here, Gerald, it has come to this, and I am bound to speak out. You must pull up and look round you, and spend your time after a different fashion. You are idling away your life and getting into mischief, and it won't do. You have not got too far already to come back. You can turn over a new leaf and start afresh. But this sort of thing cannot go on. It is worrying our mother into her grave."

Gerald had risen by this time, and now stood facing his brother. He did not appear exactly angry, but there was more of settled, defiant resolution in his face than Wulfric had ever seen there before. The suspicion occurred to him that his brother had been fortunate in his first taste of the turf; and that he had come home with plenty of money in his pockets. Possibly he believed like so many youths who are unlucky enough to win at starting that fortunes could be made without any labour or trouble. Surely had Gerald returned with empty pockets and in debt, he would not be so full of spirits, or confront the world with such an independent and defiant mien.

"My dear fellow," he said, with an air of great assurance, "it is all very fine your talking like this, but what on earth has put it into our mother's head that I am getting into mischief, as you are pleased to call it?"

"I am afraid there can be little doubt upon that point, Gerald."

"In point of fact you have heard rumours, and have stuffed her head full of terrors!"

"You can look at it as you like, and say what you choose, but you will not alter the facts of the case. Our mother is very unhappy about you, and her anxiety once aroused will not be laid to rest unless she has sufficient evidence that you have turned over a new leaf. If you do not care to do it for your own sake, you must do it for hers."

"Must!"

Gerald flushed a little under the steady glance of Wulfric's eye, and his blood began to rise.

"Well, yes, practically you will find that you must, for you will hardly care to accept the alternative."

"What is the alternative?"

Wulfric looked steadily into his brother's face and did not answer at once. He felt that the position was difficult, that he had a part to play that required the greatest skill and care, whilst he was hampered with directions that did not approve themselves to his convictions, and lacking in the power of diplomatic finesse so much needed by one in his position. He could feel much of sympathy with his brother, even whilst he condemned his conduct, and his was a nature that could well discriminate between hating the sin and hating the sinner. He had always been fond of Gerald, and he was fond of him still; yet he was called upon to play a part in which unbending sternness and the exercise of an inflexible authority were indispensable. Wulfric was sufficientiy roused by his brother's selfishness and indifference to feel a good deal of anger, and his stern countenance betrayed this sentiment, whilst concealing the more kindly feelings that lay beneath.

"What is the alternative?" repeated Gerald.

"The alternative is to make an independent home for yourself, where the irregularities of your life will not have an injurious effect upon our mother, as they will do if you persist in them here."

Gerald drew his breath rather hard.

"You threaten me——?" He paused as if uncertain how to conclude his sentence, and the flush deepened in his face. There was no dismay in his expression, rather, as it seemed, a gleam as of triumph; and Wulfric fancied he could not have understood the drift of the conversation.

"I have not the least wish to threaten. All I wish is to obtain your promise to give up your present associates, and to set to work in good earnest to make your own way in life."

"You have said all that before."

"Yes; but I am afraid you have done nothing to bring about the desired result."

"What result?"

"Your own independence."

With a smile of triumph Gerald drew from his pocket a roll of bank notes, and showed them for a moment to his brother. Whatever was the value of those notes they must represent a considerable sum of money.

"That is something like independence, eh? You cannot say I have not fulfilled my share of the compact."

Wulfric's face was stern and set.

"That money was never honestly earned, Gerald."

"It was honestly won, then—which comes much to the same thing," was the careless answer.

Wulfric laid his hand upon his brother's shoulder.

"Gerald, I implore you to restore that money, and have no more to do with gambling in any of its forms. If you had seen as much as I have done of what it leads to, you would never be tempted to bet again. Ah, Gerald! you smile, you think I am a simpleton, but you don't know what you are doing—you don't know and I do!"

A slightly supercilious smile played over Gerald's face. Wulfric's sudden vehemence, born of a real agitation and fear for his brother, seemed ridiculous and childish.

"My good fellow," he answered impatiently "you may be very clever over your medicine bottles and bandages, but you do not know everything, and I will not submit to be lectured by you to this extent. Oh, yes, I understood you perfectly well just now. You were a little ashamed to put it into plain words, but your meaning was clear enough. You meant to say that, unless I was prepared to be tied to my mother's apron strings, or to do my brother's bidding entirely, let him choose my friends, and regulate my life for me, I was to be turned out of house and home, and made to feel my own dependence and helplessness by having the part of the prodigal son forced upon me. Oh, yes, you meant all that, my good fellow; it's all very well to try and cry off now you see I have my pockets well lined and can afford to laugh at your threats; but you did mean that, and a very noble and brother-like threat it was,—about as just as it was generous. Well, Wulfric, you have had your say, and I have had mine. It is plain we shall never agree; so I take you at your word, and I leave home at once and for ever."

Wulfric had let his hand drop from his brother's shoulder. His face was very grave and anxious. He was increasingly disturbed by each new turn the conversation took. This Gerald was not the Gerald he had known from childhood, but, as it were, a stranger to him: a man intoxicated by the first smile of fortune, who sees wealth and ease and plenty lying before him, and is dazzled by the sight into an utter incapacity for seeing the dangers of his path or the sterner aspects of life.

"Gerald," said Wulfric quietly and very earnestly, "do not take any step rashly. Pause and think well what you do. If I have spoken hastily, I too will reconsider and retract my words, if I have gone beyond what is just and right. We are brothers, Gerald, and I, at least, have every wish that our relations with each other should be friendly and brother-like. For our mother's sake we must avoid any undue heat and rashness. Let this matter be quietly considered, and, above all things, do not act in haste, or take any step that shall grieve or distress her. She is little able to bear any anxiety or pain."

"You talk very like a book, my dear fellow," answered Gerald, with one of his rather magnificent smiles, "but the fact remains that you were pleased to threaten me in a very decided fashion so long as you believed me penniless, and only turned round when you discovered that I could afford to laugh at your threats. Your game is very plain to read. You wish to coerce where you cannot convince, and I object to that line of policy. History has a way of repeating itself, you know, and I would rather meet a threat like that when my pockets are full, than when they are empty. I have long had some thoughts of going away to see life to greater advantage. It seems to me at a crisis such as this, that there is no time like the present."

Wulfric was depressed and weary. He felt he had made a mess of the whole business, and he knew that Gerald's late successes on the racecourse had completely overset both his own plan and that of his mother for gaining an influence over this pleasure-loving youth. In some points Gerald was very like his mother. He never could see any point of view but his own,

"Think it over, Gerald, think it over," said Wulfric again. "Do not act in heat and do not act in haste."

Gerald smiled, but made no reply. Wulfric looked steadily at him for a few seconds, and then laid a hand upon his shoulder once more.

"My dear boy, I know I am not a great deal older than you, but I have had a good deal more experience of life. I don't want to dictate to you, or to make myself in any way offensive; but I do ask you to pause and consider before you take any decided step. We have always been good friends, Gerald; don't let us begin to quarrel now."

Gerald laughed a little, but he shook off the hand from his shoulder with some petulance.

"Who talks of quarrelling?" he answered; and moved away to the door.

Wulfric looked after him almost wistfully. He felt as if a gulf had suddenly opened between him and Gerald. Some instinct warned him that his brother's purpose had not changed, but Gerald left him and went up to his room, and Wulfric knew that no more words would be possible that night.

Next morning the following note, found in Gerald's empty room by a servant, and brought to Mrs. Meynal before she ever knew that he had returned, threw her into a paroxysm of agitation and distress.

"My dearest Mother.—I came home last evening, but was given my congé by Wulfric so emphatically, that I have decided to clear out, bag and baggage, without the fatigue of farther adieus. I am going to London to seek my fortune; when I am a great man you shall hear from me.—Your affectionate son, Gerald Meynal."

Of course this step of Gerald's became at once the talk of the place. St. Hilda was excited over it, and although inclined to prophecy fame and glory for the departed favourite, yet resented the hasty way in which the departure had been made. Friends had been cheated out of the pleasure of saying farewell, and of talking the future over with the young man, and giving him good advice. They did not approve of this, and the story that it was Wulfric's harshness that had driven Gerald away obtained ready credence amongst those who respected Wulfric's talents without understanding his nature.

Poor Mrs. Meynal's distress and despair when she received Gerald's note and learned that her darling boy had again left home for an indefinite period knew no bounds. For some days she was really ill, and even when she recovered her usual health, her distress in no whit abated, and, of course Wulfric was the scape-goat upon whom all her upbraidings and lamentations were lavished.

Wulfric was the only member of the family who had seen Gerald, and he had been so harsh and unkind that he had actually driven his brother out of the house, and turned him adrift upon the world. It was unnatural, inhuman, and shameful. Mrs. Meynal grew daily more excited over the thought of the interview, and ended by an absolute conviction that Gerald had been forcibly ejected from the house by Wulfric's own hands. Celia, who owed her elder brother no good will for putting a decided check upon her intimacy with the Thompson family, rather encouraged than checked her mother in her diseased imaginings; and as for Barbara, nobody heeded her. She was looked upon as a child and an enthusiast, and her protestations and arguments were passed over and unheeded.

Wulfric had given his own account of the interview between himself and his brother when first questioned, but he made no attempt to repeat the story in extenuation of the charges perpetually brought up against him.

Truth to tell, poor Wulfric was growing sadly wearied by the constant reproaches levelled at him. A species of depression foreign to his real nature was beginning to weigh him down, and he was inclined to believe that he had made a great mess of the whole matter, and was really the chief person in fault.

Life had gone somewhat hardly for Wulfric during the past six months. His father's death had been a shock none the less keenly felt because so quietly borne; then had followed the renunciation of all the cherished hopes and schemes that had made life look so bright to him before, and the settling down to a life of irksome, monotonous toil little to his liking, and in which even the fruits of his labours were not his own, any more than the home that his hands supported.

Not that Wulfric complained even to himself of the necessity of supporting his family. He took upon himself the position he occupied with a quiet readiness that left all but Barbara in ignorance of the sacrifice it really was; and he had never for a moment regretted the step he had taken. And yet looking forward into the future he could not blind himself to the fact that the prospect was but a gloomy one. There seemed no future for him save one of weary toil, no home save this house in which he was no real master, and where his presence seemed more of a source of discord than of pleasure.

Wulfric had no present thoughts of marriage. His mind was engrossed by too many matters to have room left for tenderer and more personal feelings; yet of late there had sometimes stolen over him, in his few leisure moments, sweet soft dreams of what life might be, shared with some gentle, woman, who would share as by living instinct his loftier ideals and yet be a willing helpmeet in the thousand little cares and sorrows that go to make up the run of daily life.

What had first started such a train of thought Wulfric could not have said, but it had haunted him of late at rare moments and had always been followed by the chill sense of conviction that marriage was not for him.

How could he bring a wife into that cheerless, loveless home of his? He breathed no reproach even to himself against his fretful, fault-finding mother; but he suffered too much at her hands himself, to be willing to subject another to the infliction of her querulous tongue. Celia's seemed a nature little likely to add harmony to life, and Barbara's impetuosity did rather harm than good, well-meaning as it always was.

No, to that home Wulfric could never bring a wife, and yet the cost of an independent establishment for himself would be, as he plainly saw, altogether beyond his means. He could not turn his mother away from the house that had been her home ever since she had come to it as a bride thirty years ago, and the costly way in which the household was maintained made saving all but an impossibility. So Wulfric, with a weary sigh, put away from him all the brighter dreams—which after all were only dreams—and took up his daily duties and troubles with a steady courage and resolute acceptance of his lot that, little as he knew it, were transforming him into something of a hero.

Suffering is a great master, if a hard one, and in his school we learn truths that perhaps we might never grasp elsewhere.

Wulfric Meynal was learning lessons now—lessons of patience, fortitude, self-distrust and trust in God—which were slowly fitting him for brighter days in store for him as perhaps nothing else could have done.

A Welcome to Spring.

A TRUCE at last to biting cold,
And cumbering wreaths of drifted snow;
The leaden clouds, asunder rolled,
Allow sweet heaven its face to show:
The happy earth is all aglow
With sunbeams showered on hill and plain;
The lambs are in the fields below,
The lark is in the sky again!

On the treetops, the chiff-chaff bold,
With cheery note, flits to and fro,
Herald of melodies untold
Which April airs o'er ocean blow;
From faithful merle and mavis flow
The long-pent raptures of their strain,
And I too sing, as on I go,
"The lark is in the sky again!"

I dream no more that I am old,
No more I move with footstep slow;
The furrows on my brow unfold,
Am I not younger than I know?
Upon the cloud I see the bow
Which glorifies life's day of rain;
Amid the grass the violets grow;
The lark is in the sky again!

Oh, thank the Love to which we owe
The buoyant throb of heart and brain!
Shall we be sad in spring time? No!—
The lark is in the sky again!

RICHARD WILTON.

LIFE IN NEW GUINEA.

BY THE REV. JAMES CHALMERS.

I.—INTRODUCTORY.

SIXTY miles north of the Australian continent lies the island of Papua, which is about 1400 miles in length, 490 broad in the widest part, and contains an area of over 300,000 square miles. From the shallowness of the water in Torres Straits there is reason to believe that these two lands were once connected. If such were the case it must have been at a remote period in the world's history, as, while in many respects the fauna and flora are similar, in some important species there are marked differences which would take a long time to effect.

It is said to have received the name of New Guinea from the Spaniard Alvaro de Saavadra, in consequence of the resemblance which the inhabitants bore to those of the Guinea Coast of Western Africa.

D'Abreu was the first European to sight the country in 1511, but a landing was first effected by Don Jorge de Meneses in 1526. In 1606 Captain Luig Vaes de Torres, in the Spanish frigate La Almiranta, sailed along the southern shore and passed through the straits which have since then born his name.

In 1676, the Dutch Captains Schouten and Le Maire visited New Guinea, and being short of water sent a party ashore to obtain a supply. Unfortunately the natives came upon the party unexpectedly and killed eighteen of their number.

Captain Cook visited the south-west coast in 1770, and in 1775 an English officer named Forrest passed several months on the north-east coast in search of spices. He was followed in 1791 by Edwards, and in 1792, Bligh, of the Bounty notoriety, sailed to the south of it. In 1799, Flinders, who has left his name in and around Torres Straits, added a little more to the very scanty knowledge of its coast. In the beginning of the present century, the French ship Astrolabe, commanded by De Urville, and accompanied by the distinguished naturalists Quoi and Eagmard visited the island, and did much to add to the information then possessed of the country.

In 1793, two of the East India Company's commanders annexed New Guinea, and for some time their troops held an island in Geelvinik Bay. This portion of the country was subsequently taken possession of by the Dutch. As suzerain nominally under the Sultan of Tidore, they claim possession of the western part of the island as far east as Lat. 141° 47′ E. The trade they carry on is said to be worth £20,000 a year, and their missionaries have been stationed around the coast of Geelvinik Bay for many years.

Partial surveys of the south coast were made in 1845 by Captain Blackwood, who discovered the Fly River; by Lieutenant Yule, who sailed as far east as the island which bears his name; and in 1848 Captain Owen Stanley made a survey of the south-east coast. But the most important survey work along the coast of New Guinea was done in 1873 by H.M. ship Basilisk, under the command of Captain Moresby. He discovered the now famous harbour, Port Moresby, laid down the true eastern coast-line of the island, discovering China Straits, and exploring the north-east coast as far west as Hosken Island.

It was however by the missionaries of the London Missionary Society that accurate information was obtained respecting the south-east coast.

Three European powers claim that the island shall be divided between them, although it is rather a fanciful proceeding on their part to announce even a "protectorate" over large portions of country as yet unknown to them, inhabited by tribes supposed to be hostile, and hitherto untrodden by any white man.

Thus we have the Dutch possessing the western part of the island up to Lat. 141° 47′ E. Germany has announced protection over the north-east, and Great Britain, to safeguard her rights to the waters adjacent to Australia, has reluctantly given protection to the south-eastern peninsula.

In German New Guinea explorers have recently been and are now very busy. Captain Dallmann, in April, 1886, ascended a large river named by him after the Empress Augusta. This river was subsequently traced by Captain von Schleinitz for 200 miles. Much is expected from a scientific expedition fitted out by the New Guinea Company which arrived at Fuisch Harbour in April, 1886, under the leadership of Dr. Carl Schrader of Arctic fame.

With regard to the interior, that portion of the island under the care of Great Britain is the best known. Missionaries and naturalists have scaled some of its mountain ranges, and several expeditions, journalistic and otherwise, have gone over the same ground as their predecessors in travel, but have not succeeded in penetrating so far. In its valleys and on its river banks miners have prospected for gold, whilst by others nefarious efforts have been made to entrap the natives into slavery.

The watershed of British New Guinea is formed by an irregular chain of mountains, some peaks of which exceed thirteen thousand feet in height, stretching down the centre of the peninsula from W.N.W. to E.S.E. The chief portions of this chain are known as the Sir Arthur Gordon Range, Albert Mountains, Yule Range, Owen Stanley Range, and Stirling Range. The land between these mountains and the sea contains numerous detached ranges and many high ridges and spurs with deep valleys, whilst stretches of level land occur between. Nowhere does the earth's surface present a country of similar extent with more diversified features, and it is not surprising that land should be found in all stages of productiveness.

The peninsula is well drained by numerous rivers and streams. Many have been discovered and named, such as the Jones, Hercus, Kemp-Welch, Larogi, Aroa, Coombes, Annie, Wickham, and Aird Rivers, besides others yet unnamed.

West of the mountains the great Fly River debouches into the gulf by many inlets. It has a large delta formed by numerous islands. From its sluggish motion, and the immense volume of water it discharges, it is surmised that it drains a large area of level country. The chief branch of the river, at thirty miles from its mouth, is like an inland sea, another arm to the north-east being about as large. One cannot think of this body of fresh water without feeling that doubtless it is the grand waterway into the interior, and destined to bear upon its bosom no small portion of its future commerce.

Then south-west of the Fly comes the Baxter River, a large stream which was explored last year, by Captain Strachan in the steam launch Herald.

The swamps constitute a characteristic feature in New Guinea scenery with their tropical foliage. It can certainly vie with any country in this respect, for every variety is to be found. Upon the coast, a narrow strip of good firm land is usually to be found fronted by a mangrove swamp. In many parts it extends to the base of the mountains.

Where everything is upon such a varied scale it is to be expected that the coast-line and country immediately adjacent should exhibit changeful features. East of the peninsula lies the D'Entrecasteaux Islands and also the enormous coral barrier of the Louisiade Reef, which extends from Teste Island for two hundred miles in an easterly direction, and is beaten on by an everlasting surf, blown on by the south-east monsoon for eight months of the year, and set on by strong currents which make approach dangerous. Along the southern part of the peninsula there is comparatively little level ground, and it diminishes the nearer you approach the east end. Beginning at East Cape and in by the Stirling Range, continuing to the south end of the Owen Stanley Range, or east side of Milne Bay, the greater part of the narrow coast land is a mangrove swamp. The hills are clothed to their summits with a most luxuriant vegetation, and in the valleys, which are well watered, the natives have good plantations with plenty of food of all kinds. Around the other side of Milne Bay to Discovery Bay are extensive swamps on the coast, and inland low ridges lying between the head of Milne Bay and Poroai or Orangerie Bay. On the coast-line from Discovery Bay round the foreland through China Straits as far as Inveraray Bay, the hills come down to the waters' edge, and unless on the sides of the steep ridges of Bohoboho there is no land fit for cultivation. Behind the Leocadie Islands and along Catamaran Bay there is the usual narrow belt of land with its accompanying swamp up to the hills. On the sides of Cloudy Mountain, and on the Lorne Range the hills and valleys are all fertile. There is thick vegetation up the top of Cloudy Mountain. The ridges are very steep and need much watering. In a very dry season—which fortunately seldom occurs—there is great scarcity of food and consequent starvation both to the dwellers on the coast and inland. The best piece of country in the east end of the peninsula is that extending a few miles in width from Cloudy Mountain and Bohoboho to Poroai, but the approach to it is almost inaccessible. The islands of the coast at East Cape are similar to the mainland, and have plantations to the summits of the hills.

The driest time of the year at the east end is from November to January; during the other months there is frequent rain. Although the Eastern portion of the peninsula is more productive, it cannot be compared to districts further west for healthiness, where there is less rain and vegetation, as also a greater scarcity of food. From Tree Point westward the coast continues differing only in the extent of swamp. It is intersected by two fine harbours, Port Glasgow and Port Milport, both discovered by Mr. Goldie, where vessels are safe in any weather.

The Aroma district has some splendid plantation ground but the Animarupu Hills are not very productive, having much the same bare appearance as those around Port Moresby. There is much swamp from the Hood Lagoon to the Macgillivray Range. The valleys are about perfect and will vie with those at the back of the Astrolabe Range in their productiveness. Behind Kalo and along the peninsula to Hula is perhaps the finest piece of country in all known New Guinea; whilst nothing can surpass the well-watered valleys of the Saroa district, including the Ikolu, Palauai and Geregese hills. From the summits of these hills most enchanting views can be obtained of this great country. From Kapakapa to Port Moresby the range of coast hills are not productive, but on the coast side of the Astrolabe to the Epakari hills, the soil is very rich. As the natives here, and on the hills to the west, plant only on the coast ridges and valleys, they suffer much in the dry seasons.

Port Moresby, situated where coral and white sand has succeeded the low mangrove covered coast, lies in latitude 9° 30′ south, and longitude 147° 10′ east. The entrance is good and the land rises gently on either side to a considerable height.

The inner portion called Fairfax Harbour, is an irregular basin surrounded by low-topped grassy hills with rich valleys between. The depth of water is from four to seven fathoms to within a few yards of the beach. Outside the port two passages have been discovered in the coral reef, the nearest, which is due south of the entrance, is called Basilisk Passage, while the other exit is by an inshore route between the mainland and Barrier Reef and leads into Redscar Bay. A singular feature in the surrounding hills is the almost total absence of running water. The soil is very porous and the streams probably take an underground course until they reach the swamps in which the valleys, abutting on Fairfax Harbour terminate.

REMAINS OF HEATHEN TEMPLE, TUPESELEI.

Beyond the Port Moresby Hills and up the Laroki there are extensive swamps. When the river is in flood the country looks like one vast lake. Westward of Port Moresby up to Manumanu the swamps continue, varied by salt water creeks, but the country behind is very different to that eastward. One of these creeks which runs from Kido to Lealea forms a large island, and west from Manumanu to the mouth of the Aroa River, there is a fine tract of level country extending back to Rabadi eight miles inland. The level land from Hall Sound to Cape Possession, forming the Lolo, Mekeo, Maiva, and Kevori districts is a really splendid country in which every description of food known in the tropics would grow. The country beyond is swampy, with here and there an oasis of good land. The size of the sago swamps is truly astonishing. Behind Vailala, up to the Searle Hills, are patches of fine planting ground. Nowhere in New Guinea has been seen such a profusion of tropical plants, food bearers and others, as in this district.

The country west of the Annie River becomes more open, and everywhere food seems to be abundant.

The temperature both on the coast and inland varies greatly. On the ridges it is very chilly in the night and usually a keen wind blows. The thermometer on the high land at sunrise stands at 70° and at mid-day it is 84° in the shade. Lying in the torrid zone there is not much variation in the length of days and nights.

New Guinea is a truly wonderful country, but travelling in it is not an easy matter. Besides the dangers arising from the suspicions and jealousy of the natives the physical difficulties presented are enormous. To attempt exploration by ascending rivers only, is a very unsatisfactory method to pursue, and the information thus gained is of little real value.

ON SENSITIVENESS.

IN the "mystic unfathomable Song" that was the voice of ten silent centuries—the Divine Comedy of Dante—are many wise utterances that may be taken from out their lurid setting, and applied to the experience of modern life. The wondrous mediæval poem tells how Dante, with Virgil for his guide, entered the despair-emblazoned portal of the Inferno, and penetrated down through circle after circle of ever-increasing woe. As the two were witnessing the rain,

> Eternal, maledict, and cold, and heavy,
> Athwart the tenebrous air pour down amain,

Dante asked a question as to degrees of suffering, answered thus by Virgil:

> Ritorna a tua scienza,
> Che vuol, quanto la cosa è più perfetta,
> Più senta 'l bene, e così la doglienza.
> Return unto thy science
> Which wills, that as the thing more perfect is
> The more it feels of pleasure and of pain.

In other words, sensibility becomes more acute in proportion as the nature is highly-wrought and richly-endowed. Not the least of those "who learn in suffering what they teach in song," was Dante himself. Look upon his portrait—the laurel encircling his brow, but the stamp of sorrow on his stern, worn features, the contraction of pain upon his lips. His story was not one of unparalleled misery, as human lives go. He loved Beatrice Portinari from boyhood; she wedded another, and died soon afterwards. His merits raised him to the position of chief magistrate of Florence, but in the disturbances of the time he was banished from his native city. Sad indeed is the record, but many a man would have sought and found consolation. Dante was wounded beyond healing. His gloom and taciturnity brought reproof and dislike upon him at the courts where he found a temporary shelter; and in his heart-soreness he brooded ever more and more upon the Eternity to come, until, with pain, and toil, and exhausting effort, he wrote the book that will not die; wrote, as though with his very heart's blood. And his face of tenderness frozen by isolation, of hope repressed into despair, looks out, after all these centuries, on the modern reader, as a commentary upon his own words:

> Quanto la cosa è più perfetta,
> Più senta 'l bene, e così la doglienza.

Not without equal capacity of appreciating pleasure was he, for there are are many passages in his poem that show him to have been keenly alive to the beauty of the world; and as his story proves, he was of a nature most susceptible to tenderness. But it is Dante who is quoted when Tennyson says,

> This is truth the poet sings,
> That a sorrow's crown of sorrow is remembering happier things.
> Nessun maggior dolore
> Che ricordarsi del tempo felice
> Nella miseria.—Inferno, v. 121.

Do we need other examples of keen sensibility in the great and gifted? Look, two centuries after Dante, at the young Savonarola, pacing with sad and downcast face along the streets of Florence, eschewing all youthful diversion and the company of his fellows, because of the degradation of the Catholic Church, and the oppression and suffering of his countrymen. Never would he, even as a child, approach the doors of the ducal palace, because he knew that wretched prisoners were confined in its dungeons.

The first power in Italy—the Pope—connived at crime, and injustice of all kinds was a twice-told tale to his youthful ears. So the lad went on his way, ever bearing about with him the burden of the woes of others, until he sprang into the reformer's career that ended in the martyr's death:—

"In the sad eyes of those who stand in the foremost ranks of great men" writes Ellen Watson, "we read the height of pain, the height of unconquerable resolve."

This very keenness of feeling helped to make Savonarola what he was. It inspired him with a horror of cruelty and wrong that flashed forth in words of fire. It added magnetism to his glance, power to his impassioned and tender address, and gave him an easy conquest over the hearts of the young. True it is that this very intensity of feeling wore upon him till he was emaciated and exhausted, but the soul within the frail tabernacle triumphed over weakness. His sensibility, though it involved untold suffering, was half the secret of his power.

Yes—the capacity for keen feeling, both of sorrow and of joy, is a characteristic of most who strive to lead the higher life. And it is the fault of the present imperfect state that sadness, rather than joyousness, sets its mark upon them. For sympathy with the world's woes must come before the effort to cure them, and in this sense it is true that

> Spirits are not finely touched
> But to fine issues.

The world has learnt the lesson, taught by Dante six centuries ago, that the highly gifted are also the keenly susceptible; but in some respects it has learnt it amiss. For there is a tendency to suppose that because sensibility characterises the noble nature, sensibility in itself, apart from nobility, is good.

Nothing can be a greater error; for the worth of this keen susceptibility altogether depends on the other elements of the character wherein it finds a place. "Fine sensibilities" says John Foster, "are like woodbines, delightful luxuries of beauty to twine round a solid upright stem of understanding, but a very poor thing if, unsustained by strength, they are left to creep along the ground."

Much might be said concerning the spurious sensibility that hates to see or to hear of suffering, but so long as it is not obtruded, cares nothing for the bare knowledge that it exists, and does nothing to relieve it; nay, is even willing that it should exist, as a means of rearing luxuries for the owner of these same sensibilities! When the youthful Marie Antoinette was on her way from Strasburg to Paris, the regulation was issued that no deformed persons, cripples, or invalids were to show themselves upon her route. No fault it was of hers, for the spirit that issued such a decree was the spirit of the age. So the young and lovely girl entered her dominions with nothing but that which was fair and sightly to meet her gaze. Bands of maidens dressed in white flung the sweetest flowers of spring before her; crowds of peasants with smiling faces lined the roadside, forgetting for the moment that they had left the suffering, the aged, the half-starved at home. And behind the bride's chariot hovered the awful shadow of the French Revolution; the inevitable outcome of a state of society where the "sensibilities" of the nobles were held of more account than the griefs of their fellow-men. Marie Antoinette herself possessed genuine tenderness, and never shunned the wretched, but she had, poor child, to bear the penalty of the false standard of her time.

Much might be said of the spurious sensibility of those days:

> . . . pampering the coward heart
> With feelings all too delicate for use.

and characterising

> The sluggard pity's vision-weaving tribe,
> Who sigh for wretchedness, yet shun the wretched,
> Nursing in some delicious solitude
> Their slothful loves and dainty sympathies.

It was current in England at the beginning of the present century, and Coleridge, in his 'Aids to Reflection," found it necessary to denounce it with vehemence. The very word "nervous," as he points out, had had its meaning reversed. Formerly it meant strong and vigorous; but the prominent idea suggested by the word "nerves" had come to be that of exaggerated, unhealthy feeling, rather than natural energy.

Fortunately there are signs of a healthier tone of public opinion at the present day, and mere sentimentality is recognised as an evil rather than an amiable weakness.

But there is another type of sensibility misdirected, which as yet is less generally condemned, and which is nevertheless a most objectionable foe to character. It is known by the name "sensitiveness."

There is a plant familiar to botanists as the Mimosa pudica, and to the general public as the "sensitive plant;" a native of Brazil, but frequently to be found in English hot-houses. At a touch upon the apex of any leaflet it moves quickly upwards and the opposite one does the like, till the leaves meet. Each pair below follows the same example, until all the leaflets are shut, when the stem on which they grow suddenly collapses downwards in a hopeless manner. This action is an illustration of Dr. Johnson's definition of "sensitive." "Having sense of perception, but not reason." Now the word "sensitive," as frequently applied to human beings, might very well bear the same definition, for they appear to have "sense of perception, but not reason!"

The poet Cowper is not a favourite in the present day, and yet one may find many gems of sound sense, as well as of fine poetry, in his neglected works. In a fable, not remarkable, it must be confessed, for poetic beauty, called "The Poet, the Oyster, and Sensitive Plant," he has well explained the difference between sensitiveness of a certain type, and true sensibility.

An oyster cast upon the shore, laments that he had better have been born a stone,

> Than with a tenderness like mine
> And sensibilities so fine.

He envies the "sensitive plant" fast rooted in the soil hard by. The plant indignantly retorts that she is exposed to the investigations of many an observer, who—

> With curious touch examines me,
> If I can feel as well as he;
> And when I bend, retire, and shrink,
> Says, well—'tis more than one would think:
> Thus life is spent, oh, fie upon 't!
> In being touched and crying, "Don't."

The poet, who overhears this colloquy, puts the matter on its right footing.

> And your fine sense, he said, and yours,
> Whatever evil it endures,
> Deserves not, if so soon offended,
> Much to be pitied or commended
> Your feelings in their full amount
> Are all upon your own account.

The oyster's rough shell protects him from all excepting direct injury; and, as to the sensitive plant, the poet thus apostrophises her:

> If all the plants that can be found
> Embellishing the scene around,
> Should droop and wither where they grow,
> You would not feel at all, not you.
> The noblest minds their virtue prove
> By pity, sympathy and love,
> These, these are feelings truly fine
> And prove their owner half divine.

Although the poetry is homely, the lesson is one that needs more than ever to be studied in the present day. For this "sensitiveness" is a growing evil. Its likeness to something fine, misleads its possessors to fancy it a becoming and a desirable quality—something that distinguishes them from the common herd. Cowper puts it in plain unvarnished language. Sensitiveness of this order is "all upon one's own account." The difference between that and the sensibility of a noble soul lies in the fact that the former feels on behalf of itself, the latter on behalf of others as well. Sensibility is ever ready to rejoice in kindness; sensitiveness receives it as a due, and will even try to pick out flaws in the fabric.

A favourite type of character for story-tellers and biographers is that of the delicately-wrought highly-strung nature, thrown by circumstances among the rough and unappreciative. The misery of such a lot is no light matter, and frequently receives delineation. But there is another kind of suffering not so often brought forward, and yet equally worthy of compassion; that of the tender-hearted honest man, of generous though not superfine feelings, anxious to do a kindness but repelled by ultra-sensitiveness, and made to feel that he has mysteriously acted amiss just where he most intended to give pleasure. The bewildered distress of such a man is a piteous thing to see.

"Sensitiveness" is frequently only another name for a diseased egotism. Selfishness and vanity enter largely into its composition, and many a man or woman who would be ashamed to say, "I own I am selfish;" "I own I am vain," will observe with complacency, "I own I am very sensitive."

Who does not know these "sensitive" people? Victims perhaps of an unwise education, or of too much introspection and self-regard, the misery they suffer themselves is scarcely greater than that they inflict upon their friends. Life for them is spent

Inmates of a wisely-ordered family are scarcely likely to suffer from "sensitiveness," but if it does enter a home it is a mortal foe to happiness and content. The grown-up daughter who is "too sensitive" to bear a word of suggestion as to her conduct; the governess who is unexpectedly found weeping in secret at altogether imaginary slights; the invalid who takes the sacrifice of the health and blitheness of others as a due, and "is hurt" if any chance allusion betrays their deprivation of cheerfulness and change—these, in spite of the far greater proportion of heroic women among the solitary and suffering—these are types not quite unknown. And the "sensitive" relation who arrives on a visit, and, on suspecting (quite gratuitously) a little less than the accustomed warmth in her greeting, is discovered weeping in her bedroom—how hard is the task of consoling her! Reasoning is all in vain, for sensitiveness is "perception without reason." One can but lavish caresses and assurances until the tears are slowly dried, with the whimpering remark, "I wish I were not so sensitive."

"We wish you were not," is on the tip of our tongue to reply; but, as this would inevitably bring on a deluge greater than the first, we content ourselves with the mental determination to be "very careful all the while poor dear So-and-so is with us." She deserves our pity; sensitive people generally do, but none the less their woes are of their own creation.

Surely this "sensitiveness" is found more than it ought to be in the sphere where men and women are bound, if anywhere, to strive to live on a high level—in the Christian Church. The present writer believes it to be a serious evil, not the less dangerous because it masquerades, almost as a virtue, or at least as a specially interesting weakness, professing to be one, if not

> The last infirmity of noble minds.

It is difficult to enter what may be termed the social religious life of churches and chapels without finding that it is necessary to walk most carefully for fear of treading on somebody's toes. If there is an amateur choir, woe betide the wretched individual who dares to suggest to its leader or members that any improvement is possible! In organising religious work, the first lesson to be learnt in many communities by the organiser is, not to wound the sensitive soul of such-and-such persons, who will be "hurt" if they are asked to do this, or not asked to do the other, till the Christian who has the Master's cause at heart is ready to exclaim in grief and indignation at the paltriness of such miserable personalities.

A Sunday school teacher, for instance, "hurt" because he conceived his superintendent overlooked him in some trifling matter, resigned.

After a year's absence, he returned to the school. "It is a pity you left us," observed a colleague. "Well, I am too sensitive, I know," returned the other with an air of pride in the distinction. "Too egotistic, you mean," was on the lips of his friend. "Too ready to fling away the chance of doing good for twelve long months because your vanity was hurt."

Absurd as it seems, this is not an exceptional case; and though the partially-educated are the most prone to be affected by this vice, instances can be found among the cultured and intelligent.

If the Christian minister allows himself to be "sensitive," after this fashion, to watch for admiration or disapproval, to let his glance sink from the cross of his Master to the praise of men, his life will be robbed of peace and of half its cheerfulness. Woe to the man who lets the fine word, "Sensitiveness," blind him to the wretched reality, "Egotism!" The weakness will grow with frightful rapidity, till he comes to be "hurt," at unnumbered points, and to regard every trifling difference of opinion between himself and any member of his flock as tantamount to persecution. The hapless layman who dares to exercise the right of private judgment is likened to a High Priest of yore, the minister himself to a suffering Apostle, and things grow from bad to worse. For egotism, especially if cultivated under the shelter of religion, is a plant of deadly poison.

Love of self—that is the enemy against which to fight. "The excessive love of self is in reality the source to each man of all offences," said Plato, three and a half centuries before the Christian era. When Sir Percivale was unsuccessfully wandering on the Quest of the Holy Grail, he was told by the hermit that he had not beheld the perfect vision because his self-abnegation was not yet complete:

> Thou hast not lost thyself to save thyself.

And herein lies an allegory.

"A great idealist never can be egotistic," says Ruskin. "The whole of his power depends on his losing sight and feeling of his own existence, and becoming a mere witness and mirror of truth." The words may seem overstrained, but there is a deep meaning in them. For the very significance of morality is "the renunciation of the private or exclusive self, and the identification of our life with an ever-widening sphere of spiritual life beyond us." No soul can be truly great that does not escape from the limits of its own particular sorrows and joys, to enter into the sorrows and joys of others, to make them its own. Sensibilities—yes, the keenest—are compatible with such moral excellence, but sensitiveness of the kind described?—never!

For we follow One who holds up before us a lofty standard of goodness, and even the minor moralities of life should conform to His excellent way. In His scheme of duty there is no room for the nursing of selfish idiosyncrasies. "Forget thyself for the sake of others," is His teaching. "He that loveth his life shall lose it." "It is more blessed to give than to receive." In the face of such directions as these, who can tend his own petty grievances, or look out for stabs at his vanity? The aim of the Christian is to forsake himself and to find God. And daily duties, looked at in the broad clear light of a noble purpose, may be made a means of casting away the poor and contemptible fragments of human weakness, and entering more and more into the life that is Divine.

EASTERN FASTS AND FESTIVALS.

III.

I HAVE often thought that of all pagans the Chinese stand in the front rank as to the realisation of the immortality of man. The majority of them are Buddhists, and of course Buddhism acknowledges this great truth, but it so teaches it as certainly to obscure the idea of conscious personal immortality. There is considerable confusion and even contradiction in its various theories about the state of Nirvana; but it appears to me that among the Chinese the universal prevalence of ancestral worship corrects the notion of Nirvana as a condition in which personality and identity are lost. Although every other sign of religious faith may be wanting, I presume there is no Chinese family that has not somewhere in its possession one or more sacred tablets on which are inscribed the names of its ancestors, and to this tablet occasionally if not habitually, offerings of a religious kind are made.

It is not perhaps so well known that the Chinese government not only zealously encourages the worship of the individual spirits of deceased men and women who have won distinction by public character or service, but actually, by formal decree, deifies them, and ordains temples to be erected, and offerings to be presented to them. In fact Dr. Edkins' "Religion in China," 1878,[1] states that it is a common belief that the emperor has power to appoint to posts of authority in the unseen world the spirits of the dead, just as he thus honours living men in his earthly empire. No doubt the future life is to the Chinese made a realm of dark and shifting shadows by the heterogeneous teachings and customs which prevail; but I cannot but believe that notwithstanding there is among them something that may be regarded as a positive belief in the existence of the soul after its separation from the body, and that this belief is more distinct and practical than is to be found anywhere else in heathendom.

Freely admitted because of my presumed innocent youthfulness, among all classes of the native communities found at Penang, I well remember the ancestral tablets, and the candles and sticks of incense which burnt before them, and the cups of rice and of spirit presented by the head of the family on his knees. Once I was present at a very remarkable funeral scene. The father of the household had died; and dressed in his best clothes, the body was placed in its huge coffin. No doubt the form of the Chinese coffin is familiar to most of my readers. Sometimes two or three of them are piled one above the other outside a Chinaman's house, on the right or left to the entrance of the house. I recollect my father saying that at first he often thought this circumstance a remarkable indication of the Chinaman's desire to have his mortality always before him as a motive to prompt action and a virtuous life. Each coffin thus located, was, he thought, a solemn memento mori, to the various members of the family for whom the coffins were intended. But inquiry divulged the characteristic, but very mundane fact—that coffins being expensive articles—being from four to six inches in thickness—were bought when it happened from various circumstances that they could be got at a cheap rate. These coffins, therefore, instead of being means of moral teaching were simply the signs of clever bargaining! I saw the dead man, at last, in the coffin he had long before bought. On his left side stood a relative who seemed to be master of the ceremonies. On the right, arrayed in grey sackcloth, were the widow and fatherless children standing in a row with the mother at one end and the youngest child at the other. There was no loud and boisterous lamentation, but quiet weeping with an occasional moan from the widow. As they thus stood at the bier, the man on the left placed on each side and at the head and feet of the deceased father, copper coins, his long pipe and its pouch filled with tobacco, and packets of uncooked rice and other food. He then took up from the floor—where lay a bundle of canes of different lengths—the longest, and, addressing the dead man, said, as he put this cane on one side of the body, "Here (naming the deceased) is your wife (naming her) who has loved you so long and will be with you wherever you may go." The poor widow I remember uttered her name aloud as the man put the cane in the coffin. He then took a shorter cane, and repeating the name of the eldest child, as the mother mentioned it, said, as he put the cane at his side, "Here is your eldest child." Then came a son, and he was spoken of as his constant companion and comfort, and so on with the third and fourth to the last. The heavy lid was then placed on the coffin, and the bearers came in, fastened their stout cords around it, and by poles under them and across the top, lifted the bier and bore it away. The coffin was preceded by a tiny gilded pavilion, in which was carried the ancestral tablet, and by some men beating gongs, and others firing crackers, and others again, dropping square pieces of paper with strips of silver or gold leaf pasted upon them—the latter to be turned into coin in the world of spirits, and thus made available for the deceased man's service, and the gong and cracker sounds to alarm and drive away the demons that hover about the dead, that they may catch the spirit, which is near, or at least disturb its peace. The procession moved rapidly, all seemingly going at a trot, the bearers being relieved from time to time. I did not go with them to the Chinese burying-place, but I knew it well,—spread on the hillside, and its tombs shaped like the last letter of the Greek alphabet, Ω, and had often seen there the relatives of the buried with candles and incense, and flowers, and rice, as gifts to their dead. These visits were periodical—but twice, I think, every year there was a general visit for the benefit and honour of the dead. The tombs are then swept and repaired, and streamers of white and red paper affixed to show that this duty has been fulfilled. Returning to the scene in the house, I ought to remark that I have never heard from any one else of a like ceremony among the Chinese, and I imagine that perhaps an explanation for it may be found in the circumstance—that the widow was a Malay woman (Chinese women do not leave their country), and the language spoken throughout was Malay. Possibly the ceremony was the outcome of the combination of the Mohammedan teaching on immortality with the Chinese rite of ancestral worship. It is to me a pleasant memory—a relief as I think of death among the heathen in its hopelessness.

Once a year, I believe in the month of August, there was a Chinese "All Saints' Day." I can recall the proceedings at these times to the very faces of the priests, and the look of the dishes set on the tables. First came dramatic performances, which usually take place on a stage erected in front of a temple, and are designed for the amusement of the gods, who are roused to attention by gongs and crackers preceding the play. The gorgeous dresses, and decorated swinging girdles, the fiercely-painted faces of the warriors, the clashing of arms in mimic fright, the imbecile look of lads as make-believe maidens, the marching round and round of regal processions, together with the piercing pipes, squeaking fiddles (of three strings), and clinking bells, and booming gongs which did duty as music—I can see or hear again at any moment, night or day. Chinese music has often been likened to that of Scottish bagpipe minus the droning bass. Thence we proceeded to the temple, and heard the chanting of the shaven priests in their masses for the dead, accompanied by beatings on a hollow wooden block, and looked on the long tables groaning beneath mountains of rice, slaughtered outstretched swine, and of multitudinous sweetmeats. Large quantities of silver paper (to represent money), and others of many diverse colours (to represent clothes), were burnt for the benefit of the dead. Besides these in various parts of the Chinese quarter were large huts of mat, ornamented with lanterns within and without, in which were placed images of the Chinese Pluto, and his grim assistants. Large pictures too were exhibited, depicting the joys of Paradise, but particularly the terrible punishments of hell, which were forcibly recalled to me as I looked on the well-known block representations at Antwerp of the tortures of Purgatory.

But numerous though the lanterns were on these occasions, it was at the beginning of the Chinese year that they reached their culminating glories. There were then lighted lanterns here, there and everywhere. Lanterns of paper, and silk, and horn, and mica, and glass. Lanterns square, round, oblong, lozenge shape, octagonal. Lanterns in the form of birds, horses, tigers, fishes, snakes and crocodiles. Lanterns white, blue, green, red, and yellow. Lanterns in the fashion of jewels of gold, and vessels of silver. Huge solitary lanterns and strings of tiny and many coloured lanterns. Lanterns stationery, and lanterns peripatetic. Lanterns of wheels circling within wheels, and lanterns of men galloping on horses, and lanterns of men fighting with spears and swords. The musical clamour was at this season accompanied by the firing of blunderbusses.

But still more fascinating was a like celebration at another season of the year, in a festival designed, I believe, to pay honour to the arts of husbandry, but how, I cannot conceive, except by the appearance of the buffaloes. (I believe in China proper the festival is called "meeting the spring.") Look! here it comes—a huge cart, dragged by buffaloes, bearing erect within it a lofty tree. From its branches hang lanterns, and here and there among the clustering leaves, as if borne on "the circumambient air" itself, are little maidens, draped in green and gold, with necklaces and girdles of flowers, standing in shoes of spotless white, with mimic jewels sparkling in their plaited hair, their figures motionless, and faces placid, so as to be without sign of fear, and scarcely of life. It is impossible to exaggerate the captivating effect of the sight—a scene, it seemed, not belonging to earth, but a sudden unveiling of a part of a new and spirit world. Then would come musicians with gongs, bells, lutes and pipes,—and after an interval of glittering lanterns, another umbrageous tree, thus peopled as it were by pure and beautiful creations with nothing of vulgar earth or ignoble flesh about them. How I can yet dream all these bright scenes over and over again!

I must not conclude without recording that if we Christians were interested in the native festivals of the East, we were not without the sympathy of natives in the observance of our own. My recollection of Christmastide in those regions is still vivid. The first signs of its approach are not now as common as they were then. Perhaps we thought the gospel narratives to be committed to memory rather long, the collects monotonous, the hymns didactive—but then the subject was exhilarating! And there was moreover the stimulus of expected recompense. I remember well a library of little books bound in red calf and inscribed "Rewards," fresh imported from our never-failing benefactors, the "Religious Tract Society," containing a collection of all the juvenile stories which that society in those days seemed to stand alone in providing, and how these were divided among us, eager children, after the recitations of Christmas morning! Then there was the going to church in our gayest attire and the public singing of our practised carols and of the immortal Adeste Fideles. After this the Malay service in the Mission Chapel, where gathered the teachers and pupils from all the district day schools, clad in their best apparel, to hear the story of the incarnation, and be examined on its details and lessons, and to sing in their own musical tongue our "Hark! the herald angels sing." And after this the Christmas dinner! There was not always the orthodox roast beef (for it could be only occasionally obtained and then not of the primest order), but never was the plum pudding omitted, nor the mince pies! In the evening came a children's party, beginning uniformly with blind man's buff, and ending with snap dragon in the darkest room. All took part from the oldest patriarch to the youngest baby. And so it went on, night after night in various homes, till the finis came on New Year's evening in the feast of Bruder cake at the hospitable house of our oldest and dearest friends who hailed from Holland. Nor were our Malay and Hindu servants unconcerned. As soon as there was light to see we found on Christmas morning our gateway gaily decorated. A plantain tree with its spreading leaves was fixed to each of the two pillars, and stretching from tree to tree, was an arch of reeds profusely covered with the brightest flowers. No sooner was breakfast over, than servant after servant appeared, and made his humble salaam, and laid on the table his present of flowers, or fruits, or sweetmeats, and bade us each in his own way "A merry Christmas and a happy New Year!" There are now but two left of all who gathered in that house in those by-gone days of sacred joy.

"The Trees of the Lord are full of Sap."

IF the trees of the Lord are full of sap,
Then whose, ah, whose are we
That stand so silently,
Where the forest of God has hands to clap?

Ay, hands to clap; green leaves that are born
Of the gushing stream within,
Which now doth thus begin
Its higher life in the spring's sweet morn;

While we, with our spreading branches bare,
Mournful and barren cry,
"O spring-time, pass not by Ere we are meet for thy season fair!"

Take hold, O roots, of the precious things!
Incorporate with you
The priceless rain and dew
That nature's God from His treasures brings:

And then, we too, as trees of the Lord
Shall grow so full of Him,
That ere life's days are dim,
The wealth of our leaves shall be spread abroad.

THE fields for April flowers make room,
The cuckoo—blithe new comer—
Outpours his song where woodstars bloom,
The snowflakes of the summer;

Joy rings through Nature's evening voice,
And bids the world good morning;
And we, too, glad at heart rejoice
In hope of our adorning,

When He who decks the grass with flowers,
No blade or bloom denying,
Shall clothe these longing souls of ours
In loveliness undying!

MARY ROWLES.

THE LADY ELFRIDA.

CHAPTER III.

THE plan of escape made by Ruth had succeeded so far, and the Lady Elfrida stood with Harry Redwood just preparing to mount her horse, and ride through the night from her persecutors. Everything had fallen out just as Ruth had intended, with God's blessing, it should do. The congregation had dispersed noiselessly and swiftly, leaving the chapel by the little back entrance. The two serving men sent for the horses had brought them by the way pointed out by Ruth, to the place of meeting with their mistress. Unperceived by the watching soldiers of the queen, the Lady Elfrida and her faithful attendant, young Redwood, had arrived in safety at the spot where they were to take horse.

"But where is Ruth?" asked the lady, glancing round, just as Redwood was about to help her into the saddle.

That was a question which had been occupying uneasily the young husband's mind for the last few minutes while he had been standing there with his mistress waiting for the horses. In the hurry and anxiety of dispersing the congregation in the chapel, and conducting the lady through the night up the rugged path on to the moor, he had let his wife slip, for a while, out of his mind; he knew that she was better aware than any of them of the danger which threatened them, and had therefore concluded that she would, in some way, provide for her own safety.

Now, however, that he had a little time for thought, he began to be somewhat troubled about her. He tried to remember whether he had seen her in the haste and confusion of the sudden departure from the chapel, and the unexpected breaking up of the little meeting; but he could not recall anything concerning her, since the moment when he turned hurriedly away from her to go and perform the task on which she had sent him. No, he certainly could not recollect having caught so much as a glimpse of her figure among those of the other women whom he had seen speeding away through the dim light. Thus it came to pass that he answered his mistress's question falteringly.

"Oh, my lady! my lady! I cannot tell, I do not know where she is; I have not seen her lately."

"You have not seen her lately," repeated the lady. "Redwood, you must hasten back at once to look for her, and at least see that she is safe."

Harry Redwood hesitated. He saw that his generous mistress was quite ready, for his wife's sake, to endanger her own chance of escape.

But should he be justified in allowing her to do so? Every minute to-night was as gold for the Lady Elfrida and in returning to the neighbourhood of the chapel how many of these precious minutes must be lost; very probably such a delay would frustrate their whole plan of escape for the lady. In short, to linger even a little under the present circumstances, was almost sure to result in fatal consequences for the Lady Elfrida.

On the other hand it did not seem that Ruth, though left behind by her husband and her mistress, could be exposed to any great peril. The object of the men-at-arms was most certainly the arrest of the Lady Elfrida Acland; reformers of a lower rank, who were not brought especially under their notice, would most likely in this retired district remain unmolested by them. Ruth Redwood, though a staunch Protestant, had hitherto done nothing remarkable on the side of the good cause that could bring down upon her the special vengeance of the Romish persecutors. Ruth, with the presence of mind which had characterised all her actions and words and thoughts that evening, had, no doubt, taken all this into consideration, and had also reflected, that, as there were but four horses in the castle stable, her joining the lady and her attendants, must have retarded their flight: for she could only have gone with them on a pillion behind her husband or one of the other men, and this double burden must, of necessity, have lessened the speed of one of the horses, and so most probably of the whole party. Their kind mistress would have been sure not to allow one of her little train to be abandoned on the road. The more young Redwood thought over the matter, the stronger grew his conviction that such had been the course of reflection followed by his wife; and that, therefore, she had purposely glided quietly away through the night, and had joined herself to one of her humbler friends who was leaving the chapel, and in whose house she would be sure to find a safe asylum for a while. Ruth was a great favourite in the neighbourhood of the castle, and any of the peasantry or farmers would regard her as a welcome guest in their homes. There she would, doubtless, remain till the earliest opportunity which should offer itself for her following her husband and her mistress to the Netherlands. Another cause, which most certainly would prevent Ruth from undertaking the long hurried night journey, was her young child, who would have been an impediment to the party in their rapid escape, and whose health, moreover, at such a tender age, would most likely have suffered in such an adventurous enterprise as this hurried travelling to the sea coast was sure to prove.

As all these thoughts passed swiftly through Redwood's mind, he grew more easy with regard to his wife's situation; yes, she was most certainly now by this time in a place of safety with her child. He therefore communicated in short but explicit words his conviction on this point, and his reasons for forming it; adding that under the circumstances it would be a vain, and foolish sacrifice of her ladyship's own safety to return and seek for Ruth.

At first the Lady Elfrida was difficult to persuade on the subject; but as she listened to him she saw that all he said was but reasonable; it seemed certain that Ruth and her child was safe, and as for herself, it was her duty, for her husband's and son's sake, to save her life if possible. She therefore shed a few tears over the parting from her loved friend and attendant, for Ruth Redwood was both to her at the same time, and then mounted into the saddle, with a prayer for the young mother and child on her lips.

"Keep them, dear Lord, under the shadow of Thy wings, till we meet again, and shape and guide all for them with Thy mighty hand."

Such were the words she spoke, and the husband and father, standing by, added a strong, earnest "Amen."

Then the little band rode away into the night.

Meanwhile the men at arms, sent by the queen and her government to arrest the Lady Elfrida, and bring her to London to answer for her so-called heretical practices, watched on, outside the wall just where Ruth had seen them standing, waiting for the congregation to leave the chapel, when it was their intention to lay hands on their prisoner. From where they stood, they could command a full view of the principal entrance into the sacred building, and they believed it to be the only way of egress from it. The labouring man from whom they had extracted their information about the meetings of the reformers held under the Lady Elfrida's protection and sanction, had spoken very unwillingly, and with scant words under the pressure of force, for the lady was beloved in the whole neighbourhood for her deeds of christian charity and mercy, and nothing but the threat of instant death would have made the man tell even as much as he had told. He had kept silence with regard to much concerning the castle and the locality around, and, among other things, had made no mention of the little door on the north side of the chapel. Thus the men at arms and their leader were quite unaware of its existence, and deemed it certain that, in process of time, they would see the congregation pass out.

"The heretic minister must be feeding his flock with such a superabundance of rank grass to-night, that her ladyship, to whose share a good portion of it no doubt falls, will carry with her enough to last her till the fire at the stake burns up, at once both her and the foul, false doctrine on which her soul pastures," said one of the men at length, yawning and stretching himself, as he lent upon his halberd.

"And how silent they are," rejoined another; "not even a torn scrap of psalmody comes floating towards us upon the breeze; we might be watching near a churchyard."

"I shall e'en fall asleep here at our post," chimed in a third, "if we have to wait much longer. It is a dull, dreary work this constant errand on which we are being sent to arrest women and children. I would that Her Majesty would take pleasure in some foreign war instead. That would give her soldiers more honourable service to do for her."

The monotony, however, of which the last speaker had just been complaining, was now most suddenly broken in upon by a loud, startled exclamation from the leader of the band. Hitherto his eyes, in common with those of his men, had been exclusively fixed on the chapel. But just then, tired perhaps like his comrades of the long delay, he chanced to glance round in the opposite direction, where the Castle stood behind a low belt of trees, which, however, as it was built on somewhat rising ground at the other side of the hollow, left its front distinctly visible.

"St. Peter!" he cried, "look yonder!"

In a moment all were gazing at the object upon which their leader's eyes were riveted, and this object was the whole front of the old house brilliantly illuminated with lights that shone in every window.

"That vile knave on whom we relied for all our information must have been deceiving us," cried the captain of the band. "He was mocking us when he told us that there was a meeting of the heretics here to-night. The lady must be having a grand revel in her castle, instead of being here listening to a sermon."

"Let us go and search the chapel," exclaimed one of the men, hurrying towards it.

But the examination of the building only showed them emptiness and silence.

"Well, if we can't catch our fair madam with her psalm book in her hand, we will catch her at the banquet," cried one of the men with a brutal oath.

"Aye, that we will," rejoined the captain.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. IX.

1. Find the name of a prince whom his father sentenced to death.
2. Cut off the first two letters, and there remains the name of a prophet who gave sentence of a child's death.
3. Cut off the two last letters, and leave out the fifth, then see the name of a preacher who asked for his own death.
4. Place the second letter before the last instead of after the first; then begin at the end and with four letters spell the name of another preacher who survived a large congregation whom he had warned of death.
5. Take the first three letters and place the sixth between the second and third: the four spell the name of one of whom it was said that he should not die.

CHRYSOSTOM.

BY THE REV. JOHN GIBB, D.D.

A CALL TO THE IMPERIAL CITY.

IN the fourth century a change took place in the outward circumstances of the Christian church as marvellous as any transformation ever imagined by romance. At the beginning of the century the church seemed threatened with utter destruction. Its ministers were driven into exile; its sacred books burned; and the humble edifices in which Christian flocks worshipped were destroyed by imperial authority; for a great emperor was resolute to make an end of the sect which threatened the unity of the empire. Before the century was half over, Christian congregations were worshipping in stately basilicas erected by imperial munificence; emperors and high officers of state were to be seen kneeling before bishops to receive from their hands the sacraments of religion; and the bishops in the great cities were the chief counsellors of the civil authorities. The change brought many new duties to the Christian clergy. Formerly persecution stood at the door of the church as an angel of discipline; and few cared to enter who had no longings after the religious life. But when the empire became Christian, and the name of Christian brought honour rather than disgrace, careless crowds poured into the churches to witness ceremonies, or to listen to sermons; and the crowds with light hearts called themselves Christians. The clergy were confronted with the task of teaching a corresponding practice to the mixed frivolous mob that had assumed a Christian name. They had also to instruct the despotic rulers of the empire, and to make them understand that having taken the yoke of Christ, their position in the church was that of discipleship and not of lordship. The task was all the more difficult, because they had to contend with friends. The people were friendly, the emperors were munificent to the church, and it seemed plausible to say that the true policy of the church was one of great indulgence, especially toward sinners in high positions. The clergy—at all events the higher clergy—did not bear the ordeal of sudden prosperity as well as they had borne persecution. Fawning bishops, indulgent and self-indulgent clergy spread themselves over the empire, and brought down the standard of Christian morality by their own lives, and by their lax administration of discipline. Some, however, manifested Christian fidelity, and steadfastly refused to lower the demands of Christian law, even in the supposed interests of the church; but waged unceasing war against the evils they found in their half-heathen flocks, and against the arrogance of the civil rulers. In the West, Ambrose of Milan, and in the East, John, or Chrysostom, as he was named in later times, the golden-mouthed preacher, were eminent examples of fidelity and courage.

Chrysostom was made archbishop of the residential city against his will. His predecessor Nectarius, died in the autumn of the year A.D. 397, and as soon as it was known that the see was vacant, bishops flocked into Constantinople from all quarters, and commenced an active canvass for a post which, next to the Roman chair, was the most splendid ecclesiastical position in the empire. The candidates were all disappointed; for the electors, probably at the suggestion of Eutropius, the Imperial Minister, resolved to call a simple presbyter of Antioch to their cathedral church. Eutropius had before paid a visit to Antioch, and had heard much of the eloquence of John, a preacher of whom Antioch was proud. Eutropius was neither a good man nor a just minister; but he was naturally anxious to add to the attractions of the capital by bringing the greatest orator of the age to its cathedral pulpit. He was also doubtless of opinion that by gifts and graciousness it would be easy to enlist in the service of the court the golden oratory of the new archbishop. The mode of John's translation was characteristic of the times. It was not probable that he would accept the call to Constantinople, and it was certain that the turbulent populace of Antioch would employ force to retain their favourite preacher. Eutropius solved the difficulty by instructing Asterius, the Count of the East, to employ a stratagem. He invited John to visit in his company one of the churches outside the city walls. The good man gladly went on the pious pilgrimage. An imperial chamberlain with an escort of soldiers met him, placed him in a carriage, and conveyed him to Constantinople. He was consecrated with great pomp by a number of bishops on February 26th, A.D. 398; and on the same day he delivered his first discourse to the people of Constantinople, in which he likened himself to David coming up against Goliath with sling and stone. In Constantinople, as in Antioch, the oratory of Chrysostom acted like a potent spell. He had not the physical gifts which the orator usually possesses. He was of small stature; his voice was not powerful, and he cannot have used much action, for he commonly sat while he preached. But he was master of rhetoric, and he used in due subordination to his main purpose, the arts which he had learned in his youth in the school of the most famous rhetorician of the age. He was profoundly versed in the Holy Scriptures, and expounded them with rare lucidity, and with a good sense not common at the time. He had great command over the noble language which he spoke, and a boundless store of illustrations were at his command. Above all he possessed the supreme gift of the preacher, a joyful confidence in the message of peace and good-will of which he was the herald. He did not refrain from very plain speaking, and reproved with impartial severity the vices and follies of the rich and of the poor, sometimes with the seriousness of a Hebrew prophet, and sometimes with the liveliness of a Greek satirist. Congregations were not decorous in the fourth century, and Chrysostom's congregations testified their admiration for his eloquence by loud and rapturous applause, and by shouting disapprobation and leaving the church in large numbers, when a stranger took his place.

Had Chrysostom been content to be a mere preacher, he would never have suffered persecution; and he would have enjoyed to the end universal popularity. Some preachers are like musicians; they leave their words to take care of themselves, and do not ask themselves or others whether they have become deeds. But Chrysostom had the apostolic spirit, and could not satisfy himself with the rôle of a religious performer. He was resolute in endeavours to translate his words into action in his own life and in the lives of his flock. He denounced the luxury of the rich, and called upon them to give their superfluities to the poor who were starving at their gates. He applied the doctrine to himself; and refused to attend the splendid entertainments to which he was invited; and, unlike his predecessor, he never entertained in his own palace. The rich furniture and costly ornaments of his palace he sold, and gave the proceeds to the poor. He preached pastoral fidelity, and virtuous living to his clergy; and he repelled from the communion and deposed presbyters and even bishops who neglected their duties, or were false to their vows. The strictness of his administration raised up against him a host of enemies; but his ecclesiastical opponents would not have been able to injure one so highly-placed, had he not incurred the displeasure of the Court. Arcadius, the son of the great Theodosius, was a weak man, and was governed by his minister, and by his wife Eudoxia. Chrysostom offended Eutropius by rebuking him for his oppressive government, but when the minister fell, Chrysostom generously afforded him the sanctuary of the church and saved his life. The empress was at the beginning an ardent admirer of the sermons of Chrysostom, whom she named the "thirteenth apostle." She took part in processions to the tombs of the martyrs, and gave liberal donations for charitable and ecclesiastical purposes. Chrysostom, who was the most generous and confiding of men, exhausted the vocabulary of his grand rhetoric in praising the piety of the empress. The friendship did not last. The young Frankish empress was fond of ostentatious luxury, and her private life was not beyond suspicion. Chrysostom boldly rebuked vices and frivolities which the empress encouraged, and sometimes, it is said, aimed his words at herself; and this gave deep offence to Eudoxia. The court party united with the ecclesiastical malcontents to rid the city of an archbishop who would sign no truce with evil. In the year 403 the ecclesiastical enemies of Chrysostom met in Synod at a suburb of Chalcedon named "The Oak." The president was Theophilus, the Patriarch of Alexandria, an enemy of Chrysostom's, and the Synod was largely composed of Egyptian bishops who were brought to Constantinople for the purpose. A number of trivial charges were preferred against Chrysostom, but the chief charge, and that on which his accusers relied, was that he had called the empress Jezebel in one of his sermons. He refused to appear before the Synod, which had indeed no rightful authority over him; and he was deposed from his office by the assembled bishops. The deposition was ratified with indecent haste by the emperor, and sentence of banishment pronounced. The archbishop went into exile, but was quickly recalled; for an earthquake awakened the superstitious fears of the empress, and she sent him a penitent letter begging him to return to the city. There was a temporary reconcilement, but about a year later Chrysostom was sent into a second and final exile. The people were deeply attached to him, and he had a large circle of devoted friends in every rank. When it was known that he was to be sent into exile, the people watched night and day before his palace to prevent the execution of the sentence. But Chrysostom refused to be the cause of a popular tumult. He left his palace, and entered the church which had been so often the scene of his oratorical triumphs. To those who accompanied him, he said: "Let us pray and say farewell to the Angel of the Church. At my own fate I can rejoice; I only sorrow for the sorrow of the people." He then left the cathedral by a side door to avoid the notice of the people, and quietly surrendered himself to the imperial officers.

He was sent to Cucusus, a mountain village on the eastern range of Taurus, on the confines of lesser Armenia; and his enemies hoped that he would be soon forgotten in Constantinople. A new bishop was appointed, and this time the authorities did not make the mistake of appointing a man of genius. He was eighty years of age, and, according to the biographer of Chrysostom, "muter than a fish and more incapable than a frog." The fame of the exiled archbishop increased rather than diminished, although the magnetism of his personal presence was removed. "Every tongue," writes Gibbon, "repeated the praise of his genius and his virtue; and the respectful attention of the Christian world was fixed upon a desert spot among the mountains of Taurus." The exile kept up a constant correspondence with his friends in the city. These letters give a beautiful picture of his spirit and temper. He suffered cruelly from the climate; but the general tone of his letters is one of hopeful courage. It is he, rather than his correspondents, who acts the part of comforter. He recalls to their recollection the sufferings of Christ, and of the many saintly men who have suffered for the sake of righteousness. The only real evil, he wrote, is sin, and misfortunes such as his are rather to be gloried in than bemoaned. When in Constantinople he took a great interest in the conversion of the heathen. He established a service for the Goths, and excited the ridicule of many by having a service in his own cathedral in the rough Teutonic tongue. He sent missionaries to the Goths to Phœnicia, and to other heathen lands. He continued to superintend these missions from Cucusus, to procure money for them from his friends in Constantinople. Nor were the spiritual wants of the villagers of Cucusus neglected by the illustrious exile.

Chrysostom spent three years in Cucusus. At the close of that time, an order was sent by the Imperial Court for his removal to Pityus a savage and desolate spot on the eastern coast of the Euxine. He was entrusted to the care of two Prætorian soldiers, who compelled the delicate fragile man to perform the journey in great haste. It was said that they were encouraged to hope for rewards if their prisoner died on the way. He reached Comana in Pontus but could proceed no further. He was taken to the precincts of a church which had been erected in honour of a martyr, Basiliscus. According to a legend narrated by his biographer, the martyr appeared to him by night and said: "Be of good cheer, for by to-morrow we shall be together." Next day he received the Eucharist, bade farewell to some ecclesiastics who were present, and expired. His last words were: "Glory be to God for all things." He was buried in the same grave as the martyr.

About thirty years later his remains were removed to the city from which he had been expelled. A disciple of his own was elevated to the see, and he sought and obtained the consent of the emperor to bring the remains of the great archbishop to his cathedral church. They were brought in great pomp to the shores of the Bosphorus, and the people with torches and acclamations received the remains of the persecuted prelate. The young emperor, laying face upon the reliquary, asked pardon for the wrongs which his parents had inflicted upon the saint; and the reliquary was deposited near the altar of the church.

Chrysostom is one of the greatest names among the fathers of the church. He was not a profound thinker like Augustine, and his writings have not influenced the theology of later times as those of the African father. He never descends to the abysmal depths of speculation; and he was not versed in the profounder struggles of the inner life which Augustine describes with so much power, having himself passed through them. Chrysostom in his youth experienced certain mental struggles, and he received ordination with reluctance: and it is remarkable, considering his subsequent career, that he seemed chiefly to fear that he would be found wanting in the skill and courage necessary for the discharge of an office which placed him in the position of a guide and ruler. In excuse for his reluctance to be ordained he said: "If any one brought to me a great ship full of rowers and laden with a precious cargo, and then stationed me at the helm and bade me cross to the Ægean or Tyrrhene sea, I should recoil at the first word, and if any one asked me, Why? I should reply, 'Lest I should sink the ship.'" The manner in which Chrysostom discharged the duties of his high position showed that his fears were groundless. He served his own generation and the generations that came after by setting a luminous example of pastoral fidelity, and by following up eloquent and persuasive words by deeds which proved that he had faith in his own exhortations. Like all men, he was a son of his own age and shared in its errors and foibles. Although of an eminently cheerful and rational disposition, he was sometimes unduly influenced by the prejudices of the monastic piety in which he had been reared. He patronised customs which were superstitious; and he sometimes inveighed not only against vices and luxuries, but against the comforts and decencies of life. He had a genuine zeal for the conversion of the heathen, but he persuaded the civil authorities to adopt means against heathen worship—painfully suggestive of the persecutions which the church had endured at the hands of heathen authorities. To judge men justly, we must take into account the times in which they lived and the condition of contemporary opinion; and, if judged by this standard, few men who have lived in the fierce light of public life deserve more honour than the Archbishop of Constantinople, who died in exile for the sake of righteousness. His faults were the faults of his age; his virtues were his own; and he owed them to that firm and joyful faith in God which was the animating principle of his brave and saintly life.

MISS CRANKSHAW'S MOTTO

"BELIEVE EVERYBODY HONEST, BUT TRUST NOBODY."

BY RUTH LAMB.

"I HAVE made that my motto through life, and acted upon it, and I can assure you, my dear Lilian, that it ought to be printed in letters of gold, and hung up in every house. I give it to you, because you are, in a manner, making a fresh start in life—taking a step that I never could make up my mind to risk. Not for want of opportunities; I have had plenty of them. But I have a firm conviction that really disinterested affection is a thing almost unknown in these days. To my mind, men are the incarnation of selfishness. They generally choose their wives, not for what they are, but for what they have.

"I suppose I ought not to say this to you, when you are on the eve of marriage. Your case may be an exception, indeed, I hope it is, and I wish you every possible happiness. But do not forget my motto. Experience will prove its value."

Miss Rebekah Crankshaw, a maiden lady of forty or upwards, was the speaker. Most likely her age was upwards, but in regard to dates that had reference to herself, Miss Crankshaw trusted nobody, so her actual age remained a subject of speculation to her neighbours. Most of these gave her credit for having seen more winters than the registrar's certificate would have done. Moreover, whilst those who knew Lilian Hepsworth would have counted her years by so many summers, Miss Crankshaw's neighbours would have used the opposite season to reckon hers by.

Lilian was paying a round of farewell calls before her marriage, and knew better than to omit Miss Crankshaw, even though she rejoiced that her new home would be too far away to allow of frequent visits from that lady, when she had become Mrs. Frank Bright.

Perhaps Miss Crankshaw felt as kindly to her young visitor as she did to anybody, and thought she was doing her a real service, by striving to impress on her mind the value of her own favourite motto, "Believe everybody honest, but trust nobody."

To Lilian with her frank, loving, trustful nature, it seemed like imbibing poison, as she listened perforce to Miss Crankshaw's words, and she answered warmly, "I know my case is an exception. Frank could not seek me for what I have, because, with our large family and modest income, my father can give no fortune with his daughters."

Miss Crankshaw gave a pitying smile as if she felt sorry for the girl's credulity, whilst triumphing in her own superior sagacity.

"Ah, my dear," she replied, "there are other relatives beside fathers and mothers. There are rich uncles, and godmothers who have neither chick nor child of their own, but with plenty to leave. I know, my dear, I know."

Miss Crankshaw nodded sagaciously, thereby irritating Lilian almost beyond endurance, and provoking her to answer: "I never reckoned on having money left to me by anybody, and I am certain Frank could not. I do not believe he knows anything about my godmother, and, as to my uncles, they have swarms of nephews and nieces beside myself, and no special favourites."

Lilian rose to go as she finished speaking, feeling that a speedy retreat would be the safest course for her to adopt. She pleaded that she had many other calls to make and very little time, and begged to be excused.

But Miss Crankshaw was not to be hindered from replying.

"Well, Lilian," she said, "you are young, and youth is naturally credulous and ready to believe the best and even expect it. It would not do for everybody to be so—what shall I call it?—prudent as myself in spite of temptations to the contrary. If there were not plenty like you, ready to believe and to trust in lover's professions, I suppose the world would come to an end. I hear such tales often, my dear. I do not offend those who come to tell them by any rudeness. I simply say that I quite believe they are in earnest, thank them, and so on, but trust them, never! As to your running away in such a hurry, of course I cannot expect you to stay long when there are so many others who will look for and get more than a formal call. Friends nearer than myself, but none who more sincerely desires your happiness."

If Miss Crankshaw thought that Lilian would deny this statement she was mistaken. The girl was far too honest. She had friends whose love was precious, whose loving counsel, far removed from Miss Crankshaw's style, had sunk deep into her heart, and would, she trusted, abide in her memory and influence her life. As to what she had just heard, she would have liked to forget it, but that was not easy. To make it less so, Miss Crankshaw held her hand tightly and repeated as her last farewell—

"Don't forget my motto, Lilian, 'Believe everybody honest, but trust nobody.'"

We will not accompany Lilian to other homes, for our business is to look yet more closely into Miss Crankshaw's manner of life. Happily the girl's surroundings were of a different character. She had been brought up in a home where love reigned, and truth's harvest sprang from the seeds of trust. Where the charity that "thinketh no evil" was in constant exercise. So Miss Crankshaw's sinister advice did less harm than it might otherwise have done. It was, however, like the page of a bad book glanced at unawares, and because of its badness impossible to forget; or the dose of poison inadvertently swallowed, which leaves its traces in the system, in spite of antidotes, to the end of life.

Lilian could not get wholly rid of Miss Crankshaw's motto, though she would have hated wilfully to act upon it, and in after days, when the little worries inseparable from human life, came upon her as wife and mother, the words would also come to mind again, and suggest mistrust.

Miss Crankshaw had much mischief of the kind to answer for, but if she succeeded in rendering others unhappy, she did not secure their share of happiness for herself. She could speak with pride of what she called "temptations," and liked to count her "offers," albeit she had refused them all.

"In earnest! Of course they are in earnest," she would say to herself. "But they cannot get over me. It is the money they want, only they dare not say so."

"Declined with thanks," might have been Miss Crankshaw's formula, only in her own mind she would probably have added, "Thank you for nothing. I will take care you have just as much to be obliged to me for and no more."

Miss Crankshaw was not a delicate person, but she was subject to occasional attacks of an ailment which confined her to her room while it lasted. At such times she liked to be the object of many inquiries and attentions.

True—it was not agreeable to be disturbed by the frequent ringing of the door-bell, but it would have been a greater trial not to hear it. The inquiries were a comment upon her favourite motto. She knew what they were worth, but would have been sorry to miss them.

There were really kind, disinterested people who pitied Miss Crankshaw, feeling that a woman who had no real faith in humanity could only be a miserable person. They felt for her in her isolation, voluntary though it might be, and would fain have broken down the wall of mistrust within which she had imprisoned herself. They were, however, afraid of saying kind words, or doing kind acts, lest their motives should be misjudged. They were thus denied the larger blessing of giving—not money, but what money alone cannot buy—Christian sympathy, and Miss Crankshaw shut herself in from the lesser one—but still a blessing—of receiving.

A good neighbour who was justly proud of his fine hothouse fruit, determined to send Miss Crankshaw a large bunch of grapes during one of her attacks of illness.

"She will think you want to get something in return for them," said his wife, as he deposited the rich cluster on a bed of vine leaves. "I have often heard her remark that the sending of gifts to rich neighbours, was only 'throwing a sprat to catch a mackerel.'"

"She cannot say it in our case, my dear," was the answer. "You and I must be above suspicion. We have all that reasonable—I had nearly said unreasonable people can possibly want, and can gain nothing by propitiating Miss Crankshaw. She can buy grapes for herself, though there are not many equal to these." And the speaker covered them slowly, as if it were a pity to hide such a picture. "I am sending them as a proof positive that people do such things unselfishly, and out of goodwill and a desire to give pleasure. I hope our neighbour will take this lesson along with the grapes, and benefit by both."

The wife looked incredulous. She and Miss Crankshaw had been school-girls together, and neighbours ever since her own marriage, and she doubted whether that lady could understand the motives which prompted the offering.

Miss Crankshaw received the grapes, and sent back a polite message of thanks. But she said to herself—

"I can buy grapes for myself. If these were sent because I am not well just now, why did not Mr. Willerton pass on a bunch to that old bedridden woman in Fog Lane? She never sees or tastes any, I warrant. There is something at the bottom of their coming here, though perhaps it is only to let me see what fine fruit Clara can have on her table every day, and grown on the spot, too. She was poor enough when she was a girl; taken on lower terms at school on condition that she helped to teach the little ones. She would not like to speak of those days now."

Miss Crankshaw finally decided that the grapes sent by Mr. Willerton were propitiatory in this sense, and meant to bribe her to say nothing about his wife's girlish days when she had to earn her own education by imparting the elements of it to pupils younger still.

She was mistaken. Mrs. Willerton was perhaps more humble in her prosperous wedded life, than she had been when young, and early struggles had taught her to feel for the sorrows of others. The bedridden woman in Fog Lane could have told Miss Crankshaw of many a visit from Mrs. Willerton, whose bright face had always been like sunshine in that poor little room—the whole world of her who was never able to leave it.

"If I had no money, I should have no visitors," said Miss Crankshaw.

"What a blessed thing it is that I, who have next to nothing else, have so many kind friends, who give their time to make what would be such long days, pass more pleasantly and quickly," said the woman in Fog Lane.

One lived in continual mistrust, and turned her back upon the light of human love, while professing to believe in the Divine love.

The other received the kindness, basked in the warm rays of human sympathy, and thanked God for having alike inspired the loving thought, and word and work which had made her happy, in spite of weakness, pain and poverty.

Poor Miss Crankshaw made her sick bed harder to lie upon, lost the flavour of the grapes, and the enjoyment from the very visits she would not have liked to miss, by her determination to "trust nobody."

"I have not lived so many years in the world without knowing what men and women are. People are all alike in one thing, and that is in looking after themselves. They may have money, but nobody has so much as not to wish for more. There is no little attention shown me, but there is something below it that will not bear daylight. Plenty of them pretend to be anxious about my health, when they are only making my illness an excuse for calling and putting in a word about something which concerns their own interest.

"There is Mrs. Hesketh. She has called every day. I can see through her easily enough. She wants that post for her son, and knows that if I spoke on his behalf, I should be listened to. But I shall do nothing of the kind. The youth has been steady so far, and is better than most; but young men are never to be trusted. I am glad the mother has not asked me to speak for him, though in any case I should have declined the responsibility."

Thus mused Miss Crankshaw, and in her thoughts did a grievous injustice to a worthy woman. Mrs. Hesketh had known all that Miss Crankshaw might do if she would, but she had never dreamed of asking her help, and just at this moment she paid her daily call on the invalid. Her face was radiant, for, thanks to the unasked influence of a friend, who had watched her son's career thus far, the desired situation was already secured for him.

She told Miss Crankshaw this, and in the fulness of her heart expressed her thankfulness to God and the friend He had raised up for her son, thus manifesting the faithfulness of His promises to the widow and fatherless.

Miss Crankshaw congratulated her visitor, and expressed her hope that her son would continue to be a source of credit and comfort to his mother. But, when Mrs. Hesketh's back was turned, the old spirit reasserted itself.

"The lad has got the post it seems, and without any help from me. It was as well Mrs. Hesketh had two strings to her bow, and that the first proved strong enough, or she would have tried to make me the second."

Did it stagger Miss Crankshaw in this belief, when Mrs. Hesketh continued her visits, apparently from real interest and kindly feeling? Not at all. If she could discern no signs of any selfish motive, she was fully convinced that there was one, and that some day it would become apparent to herself.

Miss Crankshaw was in one sense a liberal woman. She gave handsome subscriptions to societies, and regarded it as due to her position that she should be at least as good as her neighbours in contributing to objects of public interest. But of the real blessedness of giving she was ignorant. She knew nothing of being stirred by a tale of sorrow and suffering, nothing of the terrible realities which so many writhe under, because she was never brought face to face with them. She would not know, she would not see.

"I give," she would say. "Nobody can say that I do not distribute a large percentage of my income for charitable objects. But I do not believe in giving to those who can pull a long face, and whine out a miserable tale to excite one's charity."

She was right and wrong. Right in speaking against indiscriminate giving; wrong in debarring herself from a share in that personal ministry for the relief of sorrow and suffering, which calls forth more heartfelt gratitude than the money itself. Miss Crankshaw put her hand in her pocket and gave money willingly enough. She saw her receipt for the same in reports and subscription lists, and so far, did well. But she lost a more precious harvest which those reap who give words and deeds of love along with their money, and who dare to trust in humanity for the sake of Him who once clothed the Divine nature with the form of man.

Miss Crankshaw was a good customer to her tradespeople, that is, she paid ready money and purchased the best articles. But in her dealings with these, she acted upon her favourite motto, "Believe everybody honest, but trust nobody," adding thereto another remark when she visited a shop on a fault-finding expedition, "I would rather give a pound than be cheated out of a penny." She never would believe that a wet season could affect the quantity of, say, dried fruits, and insisted that a grocer was trying to palm off an inferior article, if the muscatels of one year were not equal to those of the previous one. She watched and weighed, she doubted the assertions of honest tradesmen, and caused so much trouble by her fault-finding and mistrust, that it was often considered rather a relief than a loss when she closed her account.

As with tradesmen so with servants. Miss Crankshaw deemed it her duty to suspect all around her. She would come home unexpectedly, in order to surprise them, feeling profoundly convinced that no sooner was her back turned, than they began to entertain "followers." She usually locked up every cupboard, but would now and then leave valuables about, drop money as if by accident, or let the keys remain in some conspicuous place to test the honesty of her servants.

She spoke of her plans to a friend, and asked if she did not think she was acting wisely in thus trying those who served in her house.

"If I thought my servants needed such tests, I would not keep them," was the answer. "It would make me miserable to live in an atmosphere of mistrust. Did you not tell me that you had very good servants?"

"Very good, as girls go," replied Miss Crankshaw. "But none of them can be trusted entirely."

In some cases, the servants learned lessons of deceit from the very means used by the mistress to prevent them from deceiving: One girl said to Miss Crankshaw—

"Don't you think I am honest, ma'am?"

"To be sure I do," was the unhesitating reply, for the girl had stood all the tests her mistress was accustomed to apply to her domestics.

"But you do not trust me, and, if you please I should like to leave in a month. I have always been trusted, and I have tried to act the same when a mistress's back was turned as when she was looking on. I would rather have less wages than stay where I am suspected." And she did go, though her mistress would fain have kept her. Like many another she valued most what she could not retain.

As Miss Crankshaw grew older she did not grow more trustful. Sometimes she wished she could believe in the sincerity of those around her, but life-long habits are not easily changed. Having spent her years as the slave of mistrust, while professing to believe everybody honest, she had doubted all.

So her life had been lonely, because she had no faith in the existence of unselfish love. She had received endless kindnesses, but they had given no sweetness to her existence.

One tainted spot in an orange gives a bitter taste to the whole of it. Mistrust did the same for Miss Crankshaw's life. She did not believe in human truth or gratitude, so denied herself the blessed exercise of human sympathy and steeled her heart against all tender emotions.

The beloved disciple and inspired evangelist wrote, "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" And this commandment have we from Him that he who loveth God, love his brother also.

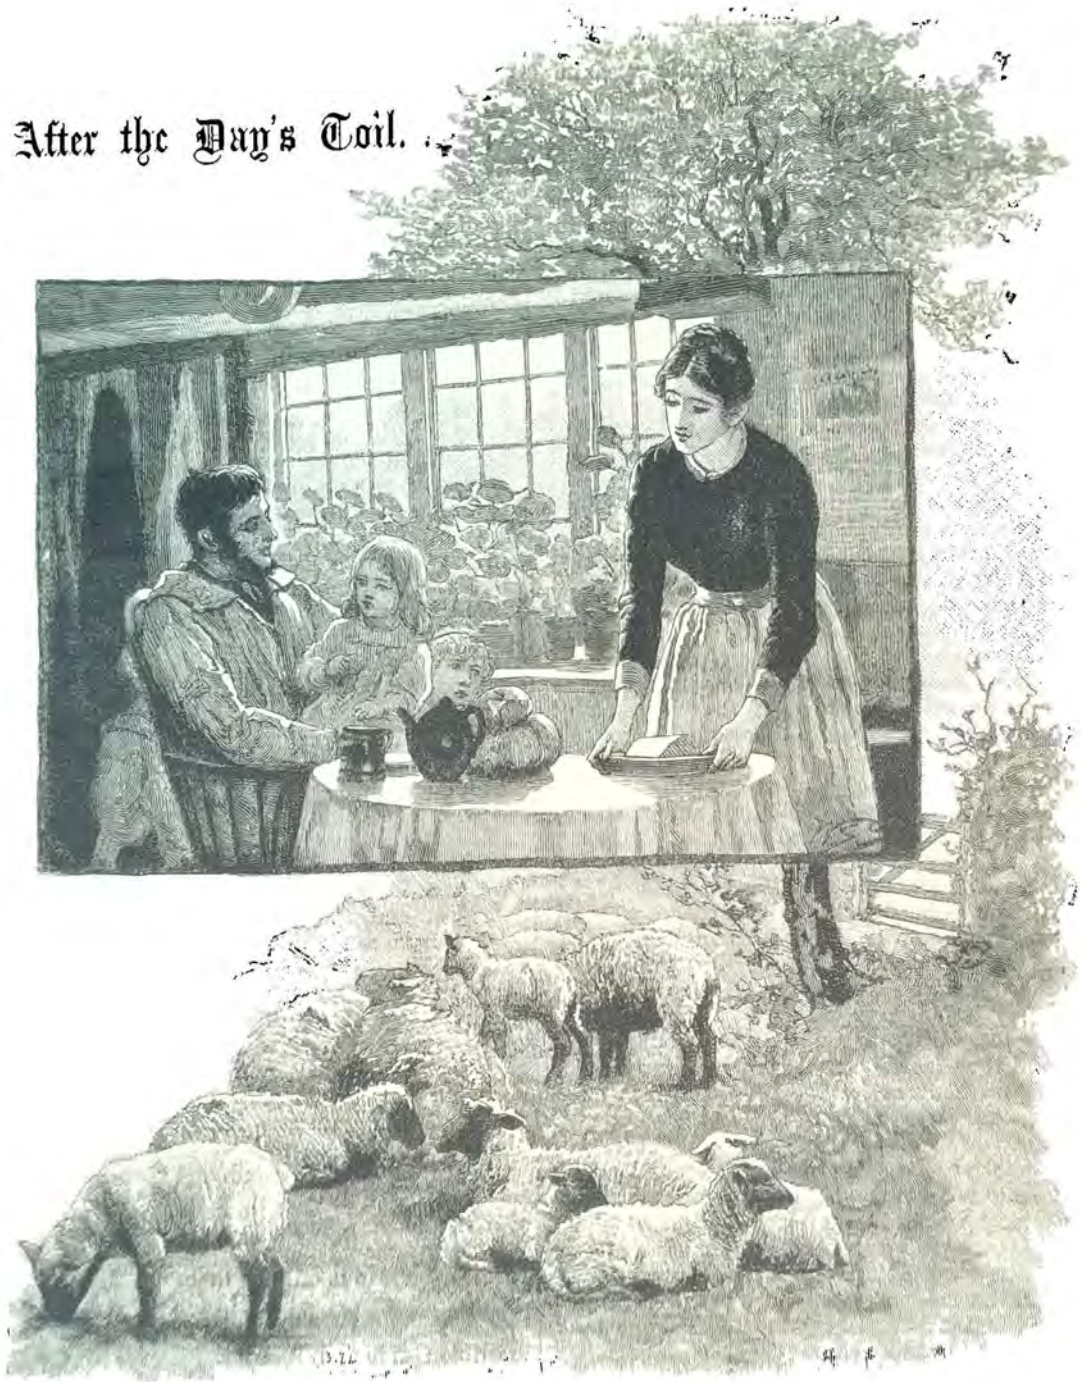
If Miss Crankshaw had been asked whether she believed in God as Father, Son and Holy Spirit, and whether she took the Bible as the word of God, she would have been equally shocked and indignant. If able to reply, she would have asked in turn, "Do you take me for an infidel? Do I not Sabbath after Sabbath, confess my belief—both by my presence in God's house and with my lips when there? Believe! Of course I believe."

Miss Crankshaw's belief was a mere matter of course. There was as much reality in her faith in God as there was in her trust in human honesty, and that was a mere form of words, whilst in acts she contradicted them.

Alas, that there should be so many believers of Miss Crankshaw's sort! Believers who never trust. Who say they believe in God, as a matter of course, but He is only to them an Abstract deity. They never realise in Him a loving Father, a perfect Saviour, a never-failing Friend, an infallible Guide and Teacher.

They read the invitations of the Bible, but never dream of accepting them; they find no joy or comfort, no peace or pardon. They profess to believe but never trust in God's faithfulness to perform all that He has promised. And thus having no real faith in God, love finds no place in their hearts, either towards God or men. Without these, the present has no real brightness; and the future must be devoid of hope.

After the Day's Toil.



OH, the pure and innocent pleasure
In the going down of the sun,
When labour hath filled its measure,
And the tasks of the day are done;
When the little ones, safe and happy,
Are all at home in the nest,
And night, like the shade of an angel's wing,
Is brooding low in the west,
And God's good hand, in this pilgrim land,
Is giving His people rest!

The thought of this nightfall-greeting
Hath brightened the father's way,
And strengthened his heart for meeting
The burden and heat of the day;
To rest in his own home stronghold,
The work and the care laid down,
In blessed freedom and safe repose,
To many a king unknown,
With baby wiles, and responsive smiles,
And a love that is all his own!

His dwelling-place to another
Might seem all lowly and mean,
But within it a joyful mother
Bears rule as a love-crowned queen.
At home in its narrow chambers
The bountiful sunbeams fall,
And heart's-ease blossoms within its shade
As under a palace wall—
And the peace of heaven, to the faithful given,
Sheds happiness over all.

When years, with their changeful story,
Have passed o'er the love-lived nest,
And the old have grown bent and hoary,
Or gone to a happier rest,
Yet strong for good to the children,
Whatever may go or come,
The holy memories stored in youth
Shall follow where'er they roam—
Through good or ill, re-echoing still
The music of love and home.

Oh, Father, in heaven preparing
A welcome for all who know
The blessing and joy of sharing
Thy work and Thy will below,
Thou who hast love for the wayward,
And grace for the worn and tried,
Bring all Thy children at last we pray
Where never the years divide,
Thy face to see—to sit down with Thee,
At home in the eventide!

MARY ROWLES.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XVII. — MRS. DUMARESQ IS ALARMED.

IF Wulfric Meynal was to taste more happiness in the future, the present at any rate looked sufficiently dark and gloomy.

His mother's health gave him great uneasiness. He was terribly anxious about his gay young brother, and his anxiety was not altogether untinged by remorse, which made it doubly hard to bear. He blamed himself, and yet hardly knew in what he had been wrong.

Barbara was always a staunch ally, and he fancied that Celia's manner had grown somewhat more gentle towards him of late, although she was so impassive that it was hard to speak certainly on this point; but his mother never saw him without uttering reproaches and lamentations that cut him to the heart, and cast a dark shadow upon his difficult path.

Yet as there are always spots of brightness as well as dark shadows upon the chequered path of life, so amid the wearing troubles and perpetual distressful fault-finding to which he was subjected, there were brighter days and hours at times in which Wulfric was conscious of a sense of pleasure and satisfaction for which he could by no means entirely account.

There had been a sad accident in a mine not many miles distant from St. Hilda. Some score of poor miners had been badly injured, and as their village lay nearly two miles away from the mouth of the shaft, and they could ill support the rough journey, a large shed generally used for storing the ore had been converted into a sort of rough ambulance or hospital.

Wulfric was the nearest doctor, but as he had not time to undertake, single-handed, so many critical cases, he had sent for two qualified students from the county infirmary to take main charge of the sufferers, whilst he came over daily to give his opinion on the worst cases, and to see that all went well.

It was upon the fourth day after the accident that, the moment he entered the rude ward, he became aware of some subtle and pleasant change, and standing still in the doorway he looked round him trying to make out exactly what it was.

For one thing there were flowers everywhere, and the scent of roses and clove carnations made a sweet fragrance in the place. Then there were blinds fixed in the bare windows, so that the hot sun could be shut out on the south side, and there were white counterpanes upon the beds, where yesterday there had been only coarse and not always very clean blankets.

Altogether the place was transformed, and as Wulfric looked about him in silent surprise, he became aware of the presence of two visitors, who quietly emerged from behind a screen at the far corner, and a clue was at once put in his hands. One of these visitors was Mrs. Granby, the other Reinée Dumaresq.

The girl saw him in a moment, and advanced with her instinctive frankness and courtesy. Her smile was bright and very sweet. Ever since the adventure upon the cliff Wulfric had been a great favourite of hers.

Wulfric smiled too. He did not generally know what to say to young ladies; but with Reinée Dumaresq he always felt at ease, possibly because she was always perfectly natural and at ease herself.

"So you are the good fairy who has been at work here?" he said. "I was just wondering what had happened."

Reineé looked up at him and spoke quickly and earnestly.

"I only heard about it yesterday. Mrs. Granby told me, and we came here together in the afternoon, and she told me what she thought was most wanted. You had gone, or we should have consulted you; but I know you will not mind our having used our own discretion. We were afraid to meddle with the diets; but I should so like to bring them something nice, if only I could get to know what would be best. Poor men, they are so dreadfully hurt, some of them."

Reinée's face was full of compassion. She stood there in the midst of much that was rough and uncouth, surrounded by the sad and suffering; and the contrast between the delicate beauty and high-bred refinement of the girl herself and the bareness of all around struck Wulfric as something at once strange and yet beautiful and appropriate. He could not define the sensation, yet he was conscious of feeling very glad to see Reinée there, looking, despite her loveliness, as much in her right place amongst these sick miners, as she had done in her father's drawing-room. The peculiar adaptiveness of a truly sympathetic and unselfish nature struck the young man with new force just now.

He shook hands cordially with Mrs. Granby, and then turning to Reinée, he said: "If you will allow me, I will make my tour of inspection, and then I will profit by your kind offer and tell you what I can allow my patients to receive at your hands."

"Suppose we come round with you, Wulfric?" said Mrs. Granby, "and we can take notes as to what seems wanted in each case."

Wulfric acceded readily to this suggestion, and the ladies accompanied him and his assistant round the ward. Reinée's skilful, gentle fingers were often in requisition to remove a bandage or change a dressing, and although she had not received any regular training, her quick eye and watchful readiness gave to her the power that is rather born than acquired, of doing the right thing at the right moment.

Reinée, born and reared in luxury, and carefully shielded from everything painful or disagreeable, did not shrink in fear or disgust from what she saw that day. She had not come there with any idea of taking an active part amongst the sufferers, but when she saw that ready hands were needed in their service, it seemed to her not only right, but perfectly natural, that hers should at once be given to the work. Mrs. Granby set the example which she quickly followed, and as the doctors completed their round they congratulated themselves on having gained the services of two such skilful nurses.

His assistant was talking to Mrs. Granby, and Wulfric turned to Reinée. He noted that a little of the soft colour had faded from her face. Her eyes looked full of thought.

"I am afraid this has been a little too much for you, Miss Dumaresq. You are not used to such sights and sounds."

She looked up brightly, yet her face was still set in lines of gravity, and her lips expressed a certain tender compassion that was wonderfully sweet.

"No, I am not used to it; but I have liked being here to-day. Dr. Meynal, please tell me the truth, and do not be afraid of hurting my feelings. Can I really be of any use to these poor men? Can I do anything for them myself? Please tell me the truth. I know that girls are often a hindrance and not a help when they come and try to be useful; but if I could——"

She stopped short, and Wulfric answered gravely and kindly, "Miss Dumaresq, I hardly think it needs me to tell you that true sympathy and consideration are never thrown away, least of all upon the sick and suffering. You have done more good to these poor fellows to-day than I. Do you not see how their eyes follow you about, and how they look at the little gifts that you have brought? Many people might bring them things that can be bought, but you have given them what cannot be purchased with gold, and they have the sense to know it."

Reinée knew herself to be understood, and sudden tears started to her eyes, adding to their soft brightness.

"Thank you," she said softly. "You know what I mean; but they think too much of it, and you too. It is so little, so little that I can do, and their gratitude makes me feel ashamed, almost."

Wulfric smiled.

"Much and little are comparative terms; it does not seem little to them. Their lives are not like yours—a little brightness goes a long way."

"I know, I know—it seems so hard to understand. Why do some have so much, and some so little?"

"I suppose because He who made man and the world has ordained it so. Possibly in part to teach us what we owe to one another."

Reinée was silent. It was a subject on which she had thought much of late, and she would like to have heard what such a man as Wulfric Meynal had to say upon it; but it was hardly now the time or place, and her older companion was beginning to look tired.

"Then I may come again?" she said as she held out her hand in farewell. "May I come every day? And will you always let me know what is wanted, so that I may come provided?"

"You may certainly come, and the oftener the better for my patients' sakes," answered Wulfric, "but I think you will find every day rather a tax upon your powers."

Reinée smiled, but made no reply. She was not given to protestations; yet there was more tenacity of purpose about her than in many who professed more.

As the carriage drove away, Reinée turned to her companion and said: "I am so very, very much obliged to you for bringing me. I have been very happy, although it was so sad."

"We will go there regularly, if you wish it, my dear," answered Mrs. Granby smiling. "You can hardly go alone, but you can always command my services when you need them. Poor fellows, they were very grateful and pleased to see visitors."

"Yes, and are they not brave and patient, lying there in that bare place? Think how we should feel! Oh, I am glad we went to see them!"

Wulfric, after handing the ladies to their carriage and watching it roll away, fell into a deep reverie.

"Ah!" he said to himself at length, drawing a deep breath, "if there were more women like that in the world, it would be a happier place than it is."

Reinée kept her promise faithfully, and the poor maimed miners lying in the bare shed, had reason to bless the day when the young lady from the Hall first visited them there.

They did not bless her merely for the comforts that she brought them, though these were keenly appreciated and gratefully received; but what they valued far more were the sweet smiles and gentle words she had for each, the sense that she was their friend and really cared for them, and visited them not merely out of compassion, but because she felt a true interest in them and liked to be there bringing sunshine and light with her. The rough fellows could not have put the thought into words; but it was in each one of their hearts, and not one amongst them but would gladly have laid down his life to serve or help her.

Clive often accompanied his sister, and Mrs. Granby was always of the party. Mrs. Dumaresq sent little delicacies to the wounded men, and her husband afforded substantial assistance to their families. Reinée was very grateful to both her parents, and her mother smiled a little to herself as she thought of the length of time that this new "phase" had lasted, and concluded that unless strengthened by opposition, it must of necessity soon die out.

It amused her to watch Clive and Reinée playing the parts of almoner or sister of mercy to the sick and poor. It was a pretty little game of which they would soon tire, and then would come the reaction that would lead them to plunge the more readily into the gay life that awaited them beyond the walls of this quiet home.

Mrs. Dumaresq was a clever woman of the world, and believed that she knew her children thoroughly, and could count with absolute accuracy upon their future conduct. Reinée's increase of gentle sweetness was not lost upon her, and she thought she read its meaning very clearly. She felt her girlhood slipping away, the deeper feelings of the heart were rising within her, and she was betraying unconsciously the happiness that she felt in the thought of the future opening before her.

All this was most satisfactory to Mrs. Dumaresq; she could look with indulgent toleration upon Reinée's present occupations, and avoid any apparent disapprobation of her pursuits. She was sorry that Arthur Trevelyan had gone away without the ratification of the tacit engagement that bound him and her daughter together; but she knew nothing of what had passed between him and Reinée, and she was not a woman to be disturbed by trifles. She knew that he was very much in love, and that he would not be long in returning to claim the hand he looked upon as his by right.

Meantime she was in no hurry to lose her daughter who was very dear to her. For with all the wants and the hardness of her nature, Mrs. Dumaresq loved her children with every fibre of her being.

But it was not very long before the mother's eyes were to be opened to a state of affairs which caused her a great deal of anxiety and annoyance, and went far towards upsetting the well-balanced theories that had hitherto given her so much satisfaction.

The first shock she received was in a conversation she had with Clive. He was driving his mother out one day, as he did from time to time, and she began to talk upon a subject on which she thought that she and her son were in complete accord.

"When do you think of asking Arthur Trevelyan down again, Clive? You must be sadly dull here with no companion but your sister."

"Reinée and I are never dull," answered Clive loyally. "She is a queen of a girl."

"I admit that fully; but a young man always wants companions of his own tastes and pleasures."

"Well, there's Meynal, you know. I see a good bit of him. I don't know if he isn't quite as much to my taste as Trevelyan."

"The young doctor! My dear Clive, what are you talking about? He is quite a common young man!"

"Pardon me, my dear mother, he is a very uncommon young man."

"He is hardly a gentleman even."

"I beg your pardon again. He may not have that outward polish and address of which, to tell the truth, I am sometimes a little tired, but he is a gentleman to his heart's core, and what is more, he is a man—and that is no small recommendation in my opinion."

Mrs. Dumaresq lifted her eyebrows.

"Well, you ought to know best; though I was never prepossessed by him, but we must not speak against him, as he did you good service one day."

"Saved my life only," answered Clive quietly.

"Well, that is putting it strongly. Saved you from an awkward accident, at any rate."

"Yes, and at the risk of his life."

Mrs. Dumaresq smiled.

"Well, if you are determined to make a hero of him, I will say no more. But you have not answered my question about Arthur Trevelyan."

"What of him?"

"When do you think of asking him down here again?"

"Oh, I don't know. I am in no hurry about it. He took himself off rather cavalierly last time. I don't particularly yearn for his society, you know."

"You did not quarrel with him?"

"No," answered Clive laughing. "I never quarrel with anybody."

"You will have him for the shooting, I suppose?"

"I doubt it. The covers are in a shocking state; and nobody about here preserves, as far as I can make out. I shall have to go away for what shooting I want, I can see that pretty clearly. As for asking any fellows here to shoot, it would be ridiculous. They would not thank you for it. Besides, my father isn't up to having people in the house yet."

"No, except Arthur."

"Why Arthur, in particular?"

"My dear boy, you know that as well as I do. He is like one of the family."

"I don't see that now. He used always to be with us a few years ago; but lately we haven't seen much of him."

"Well, that will be soon mended now. We shall see a great deal of him in the future, I hope."

There was no mistaking Mrs. Dumaresq's meaning, Clive had fenced long enough. He ceased to do so now.

"That depends upon Reinée," he answered, flicking a fly from the flank of the off-horse with his whip; and his face was rather grave and set.

Mrs. Dumaresq glanced quickly at him.

"Reinée's mind has been made up long ago."

"Possibly; but which way?"

"I cannot imagine what you mean, Clive," Mrs. Dumaresq spoke with more heat of manner than was at all usual with her. "Reinée has been engaged to Arthur Trevelyan ever since she was a child."

"Those engagements made for girls by other people do not always come to anything in the end, you know, my dear mother."

"I wonder what you are driving at, Clive. Are you trying to tease me, or have you some real grounds for what you say? Has Reinée been talking to you—or Arthur?"

"Trevelyan is not a talking man, and Reinée has hardly exchanged half-a-dozen sentences with me on the subject; but I have eyes in my head."

"So have I. Reinée seems to me to show very plainly how her feelings are going."

"Just what I say, too."

"But your conclusion is—?"

"That she does not even like Trevelyan—let alone love altogether."

"Nonsense, Clive! Impossible!"

"Well, that is my opinion, if you want it."

"Impossible!" repeated Mrs. Dumaresq. "She cannot possibly have any fault to find with him, Arthur has always been irreproachable."

"Query there," returned Clive coolly.

His mother turned upon him quickly.

"You know nothing to his discredit?"

"Not in the sense you mean, only in the sense in which Reinée meant it, when she told me one day that he was not a good man."

"Reinée said that?"

"Yes; and I believe she is quite right."

Mrs. Dumaresq bit her lip, but she did not allow her annoyance to betray itself.

"Did Reinée mean by that that he did not share her newly developed religious and philanthropic views!"

"I did not discuss the point; I think we both felt alike. I do not know that I could easily define what we mean by a good man; but I am convinced that Trevelyan is not one."

Mrs. Dumaresq looked hard at her son.

"You, too, Clive! This is rather too much."

"What mother?"

"That you should be led by Reinée into her last foolish craze."

"I was not aware that she had one."

Mrs. Dumaresq was silent for awhile. Presently she turned to her son and asked quietly,

"Do not affect to misunderstand me, Clive. Just tell me plainly what all this means."

The young man was looking out straight before him. His likeness to Reinée was more than usually marked just then: yet there was a masculine resolution and purpose in his face that gave it a power not generally seen there. His mother glanced sideways at him, saw the clear outline of his profile against the blue sky, and she could not but say to herself: "What a handsome fellow he is! He ought to have been in the army. He looks every inch a soldier."

Clive's answer was somewhat long in coming, but it came at length, clear and to the point.

"I think, mother, it means that Reinée and I have both reached the conclusion that this world is not the only one for which we have to live."

"Well?"

"And that it is of the other life that it is, after all, most important to think."

"Après?"

Mrs. Dumaresq was not going to make her son's task any easier; but he was not disconcerted by these little dry questions.

"I think," he answered very quietly, "that when we come to change the short life here for the one that will meet us in the great hereafter, things will assume altogether different proportions from what they do now—the great will be small, the small great. I hardly know how to make myself intelligible to you; but I know what my own idea is. I should like my life to be laid down upon lines that will not look altogether mean and unworthy when the great day of awakening comes—the day that we generally call death."

Mrs. Dumaresq sat perfectly still. Never from the hour of his childhood had she ever heard her son speak after any fashion of this kind. She had believed him to share her own indifferent conventional carelessness upon all subjects connected with the spiritual life. To hear him speak in this way now produced a curious and paralysing effect upon her.

"And who, pray, has taught you these extraordinary views?"

"I hardly know; they do not seem to me extraordinary. They have been floating in my head for a good while. I think Reinée has helped to give them definite form."

After a pause his mother said rather sharply, "It is a great pity Reinée ever left London."

"Why?"

"Oh, you would not understand—you encourage her in her folly. It is plain she is getting quite spoilt."

"You said only yesterday that she was sweeter every day, and I am sure it is true."

"She is improved in some ways, I admit; but—but—well we shall see."

"See what?"

Mrs. Dumaresq's answer was rather impatiently spoken.

"See what it all comes to. I have always found Reinée dutiful and obedient so far."

"You will not find her less so now, unless, indeed——"

Clive paused there.

"Unless what?"

"Unless you try to push authority beyond its legitimate bounds."

Mrs. Dumaresq had by this time recovered her self-command, and could speak with her usual composure.

"I am not given to being unreasonable," she said. "I have no intention of being so now."

In a very thoughtful mood she descended from the carriage and reached her own room.

"This begins to look serious," she said to herself, "but possibly it is all a passing enthusiasm. I will give her line a little longer, and then I must begin to work in earnest."

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

A correspondent from Dover asks: "Why are the words given differently in Daniel, ch. vi. verses 25 and 28?"

The word in verse 28 is Peres, Chaldee for "divided." Parsîn (written Pharsîn by aspirating the p, according to rule, after a vowel sound) is a plural form from the same root, meaning "divisions." The initial U is the conjunction and, prefixed to the word according to Hebrew and Chaldee usage. Upharsin therefore means, "and divisions"; but in explaining the word the prophet takes the simpler form Peres. It has often been remarked that as Parsîn may also denote "Persians," there is a concealed prophecy of the agents by whom the distinction was to be brought about.

Our Dover correspondent asks how the prophecy of Isaiah vii. 14, can be applied as in Matthew i. 23.

Ahaz, king of Judah, is filled with consternation at the approach of two hostile allied powers, the Syrians under Rezin and the Israelites under Pekah. He has gone out with the princes of the royal house to inspect the fortifications of Jerusalem, when suddenly the prophet Isaiah confronts him, announces the coming downfall of the allies, and bids Ahaz to be of good courage. The king seems unable to credit the prophet's words, and is offered "a sign" in confirmation of them, "in the depth or in the height above." Ahaz in his faithlessness refuses the offer. Then, in the name of Jehovah, Isaiah himself gives the sign. A young woman then of marriageable age shall in due course give birth to a son, and his name shall be called Immanuel; and before that child shall have come to years of discernment Syria and Israel shall both have been overwhelmed by the power of Assyria. With all this there is a solemn warning to Ahaz not himself to enter into the Assyrian alliance, or his turn to be destroyed would inevitably come. Such is the obvious purport of the whole wonderful passage (ch. vii. 1–viii. 10), ending with the words, like a motto or refrain of the whole: "God is with us." The sign then was for immediate fulfilment: for how could Ahaz be assured of present deliverance by the promise of an event which would happen between seven and eight hundred years afterwards? But this deliverance became a type of a greater salvation; and the words of the prophet were to be fulfilled—their whole meaning brought out and realized—in the birth of JESUS. Bishop Lowth well remarks: "The prophecy is introduced in so solemn a manner; the sign is so marked, as a sign selected and given by God Himself, after Ahaz had rejected the sign of his own choosing out of the whole compass of nature; the terms of the prophecy are so peculiar, and the name of the child is so expressive, containing in them much more than the circumstances of the birth of a common child required, or even admitted; that we may easily suppose that, in minds prepared by the general expectation of a great Deliverer to spring from the house of David, they raised hopes far beyond what the present occasion suggested; especially when it was found, that in the subsequent prophecy, delivered immediately afterward (ch. viii. 8), this child, called Immanuel, is treated as Lord and Prince of the land of Judah. Who could this be, other than the heir of the throne of David, under which character a great and even a Divine person had been promised? . . . St. Matthew, therefore, in applying this prophecy to the birth of Christ, does it not merely in the way of accommodating the words of the prophet to a suitable case not in the prophet's view, but takes it in its strictest, clearest, and most important sense, and applies it according to the original design and principal intention of the prophet."

Whether the child who thus became the type of Christ was to be a son of Isaiah himself, or of a prince in the house of David, is uncertain. Hezekiah himself was nine or ten years old at the time. Nor have we any clue as to who was meant by "the young woman" (this is the translation of Cheyne, following Hitzig and Gesenius), who was apparently on the eve of marriage when the prophecy was delivered.

The whole passage, it may be added, has been largely discussed by commentators, and could hardly be adequately considered without raising the whole question of Old Testament Messianic prophecy. The explanation above given is substantially that of most modern commentators. Some, like Hengstenberg, maintain the exclusive application of the prophecy to Christ, although they fail to explain how its fulfilment could be a sign to Ahaz. The note of Albert Barnes on the passage is well worth reading.

A correspondent writes: "Kindly explain the following text: 'And they said, Lord, behold, here are two swords. And He said unto them: It is enough.'"—Luke xxii. 38.

Our Lord had intimated to His disciples the change that must henceforth come over their work. They would no longer be received with kindly welcome and ready hospitality; they must be prepared to pay their own way (taking purse and scrip) and must even count upon open hostility. The recommendation to take the sword was an emblematic way of bidding the disciples to be ready for conflict with the world's evil. But they took it literally, and, with some pride in their own forethought, produced the two swords which they had procured. But Christ with mournful irony puts these by (Godet) as though He would say: "Yes, for the use which you shall have to make of arms of this kind, those two swords are enough." The disciples soon found that they needed another kind of sword for their warfare! "If it were possible for us," says Lange, "to imagine the Lord Jesus, during any moment of this paschal night, with a melancholy smile upon His heavenly countenance, it would be at this proffer of the two swords. Two swords to oppose all the powers of the world, of hell, and of death, which were about to attack Him! He esteems it impossible to make the whole absurdity of the idea as evident to them as He feels it to be, and hence breaks off the conversation on this subject in the tone of one who is conscious that he shall not be understood, and therefore esteems all further conversation useless."

The passage was misused in mediæval times to prove that the Papal See possessed the right of temporal as well as spiritual jurisdiction.

J. C., Chelsea, asks: "I should feel obliged, if you would furnish an opinion as to whether the words 'us,' 'we,' and 'our,' in the first chapter of Ephesians, include those persons to whom the apostle is writing. It seems to me that the commencement of the thirteenth verse with the words, 'in whom ye also,' shows that they do not; especially as a distinction appears to be made in the preceding verse by the words, who first trusted in Christ—made emphatic in the Revised Version by the repetition of "we." I may remark that the apostle breaks out in praise to God, immediately after the salutation, just as he does in the first chapter of the second of Corinthians, where the similar pronouns evidently do not include the Corinthians.—J. C.

The remark is interesting; but may we not rather suppose that the apostle, in speaking of us and our, refers to Christians generally; leaving the question, as it were, open for the moment as to whether these Gentile believers were included. Then his phrase "and ye also" is impressively brought in: "You too belong to us! We are not two companies, but one. On our part there is no exclusive privilege, but ye also are fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of God." Such seems the whole strain of the Epistle, which may profitably be read afresh for the sake of noting how in some passages the we and you are commingled, how sometimes they seem to stand apart, only again to flow into one.

L. A. writes: "In the letter to Thyatira: Rev. ii. 26, 27, 'He that overcometh—to him will I give power over the nations, and he shall rule them with a rod of iron, as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers.' What does this mean?"

This seems to be a highly impressive way of saying that Christ's people reign with Him. The thought is that in the second Psalm: "Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron"; in the Septuagint, the Greek version from which the quotation in the Apocalypse is taken, "Thou shalt rule them"[1]: the word for "to rule" both in the Septuagint and the Revelation being literally to shepherd, and rod being equivalent to sceptre. The notion is that of power involving care and guidance, and wielded inflexibly, so as to secure the complete triumph and sovereignty of holiness over every form of evil. Only truth, righteousness, and love are lastingly mighty. "The nations"—emblem of all forms of opposition to Christ's kingdom, as the Gentiles were in ceaseless antagonism to the Jews—"shall be broken to shivers"—entirely crushed—"that, their fierceness and pride being brought down, they may accept the yoke of Christ" (Trench). And this power of Christ is in a sense the power of His people also. He acts by them, and a true, lasting ascendancy over the wills and passions of men is attained by the forces of truth and goodness. In this lofty sense "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High" (Daniel vii. 27).

The same correspondent says: "Lately I have been much wondering what was our Lord's real meaning when He said: 'Behold, I come quickly,' to the Church in Philadelphia, Rev. iii. 11, and again in Rev. xxii. 7, 12, 20. I have heard it explained that He was coming quickly according to His own measure of time; but I feel, with reverence, that that really conveys nothing either to the Philadelphian Church, or to us. I know that 'one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.' Yet, surely the message must have meant something for those to whom it was addressed, while they were living, not when they had been dead nearly or quite two thousand years."

The suggestion is an important one. We cannot now discuss the whole subject: only observing that there was a crisis, a "day of the Lord" before that generation passed away, in which He came, in His judgments and His love, to all the churches that professed His name.

THE LADY ELFRIDA.

CHAPTER IV.

IN the wide, solitary rooms of the old castle, where every window was ablaze with light, as if to shed down radiance upon a brilliant crowd within, though there was not a foot-fall in the long passages, not a face appearing in the many doorways, not a voice sounding on the broad staircases, stood Ruth Redwood, waiting and listening. Her face was very pale, her eyes were very grave, yet there was calmness resting, like a holy shadow cast by a guardian angel's wing, on her brow.

When Ruth had glided away from her husband's side, after those last sweet words of parting prayer, she had first waited outside the chapel to catch the castle female servants as they came out. It so happened that that evening all the women belonging to the Lady Elfrida's household were attending the religious meeting, with the exception of Ruth herself. Their mistress liked them all, if possible, to enjoy every means of grace which came within their reach, and as Ruth had had to remain at home with her child, and being braver than most of them, did not at all mind being left alone in the house, they availed themselves of the opportunity, and had all gone to the chapel. They were all young women of the immediate neighbourhood, who had been brought up on the castle estates, and as they left the sacred building, Ruth bade each one of them to hasten at once to her own home, saying that it was the best and safest thing to do in the present emergency. They had all great confidence in Mistress Redwood's superior sense and courage. In any difficulty or danger, this trust in her had been born of their daily experience of her in the common troubles and misfortunes of life; therefore in their present condition of alarm and anxiety they had very willingly obeyed her. She detained none; but as soon as she had seen them all disperse, took swiftly her way alone to the castle.

Ruth's plan for helping to save the Lady Elfrida was simply this. She would rapidly illuminate the old house from top to bottom, so that its brightness, shining through the night, must infallibly attract the attention of the watching men-at-arms, and naturally awake in them the belief that the Lady Elfrida must be holding some grand revel there, and therefore, after all, could not be in the chapel. This would be sure to draw them to the castle, where, as they would find the strong Gothic gateway barred, and the massive oak door held with more than one firm iron bolt, it would take them some little time to gain an entrance. Thus the Lady Elfrida and her attendants would be far on their way towards the sea coast before the soldiers had even found out that she had left the castle and its neighbourhood; and as Harry Redwood, familiar as he was with the whole west country, would lead the party by by-ways and lanes where strangers would find it very difficult to follow on their track, there was good hope that, under God, the lady would make her escape from her persecutors.

Yes, the Lady Elfrida would soon be in comparative safety. But how would it be with the mother and child who were alone in the castle to-night? Ruth Redwood knew that the woman who had for years stood in a parent's place to her, and the husband who was dearer to her than her own life, were both in extreme danger, if that night they were overtaken by the queen's soldiers. Calmly and resolutely she determined to put herself in a position of great peril, in order that she might carry out a plan to insure their escape, so far as it was possible to insure it. If her daughter had been older, she would have endeavoured to send her with her father, but in the case of so young a child, who could not do without a mother's care, this had been impossible.

So far Ruth had carried out her plan just as she had hoped and intended; now she stood alone in the old house, with the light streaming round her from a hundred tapers; stood waiting for the first sounds to show that the soldiers had reached the castle gate. Those sounds would proclaim that her second mother and her husband were safe from pursuit. Those sounds would also proclaim that danger was close to her and her child. Up and down she wandered through the brilliant, solitary house with her child in her arms, for she had taken her from her cradle where she had been slumbering, because she found in her a sweet companionship that seemed to take away half the fear and trouble of her situation.

The little one had caught hold of a gold chain—her mistress's gift—which hung round her neck, and was laughing, in sweet baby unconsciousness of fear and danger, to see how it glittered in the glow of yellow light around them.

"Thou dost well to laugh so tranquilly, my bird," she whispered. "For surely thou knowest, from some inner teaching, that the dear Master, who took the children in His arms, is near thee, caring mightily and tenderly for thee and thy mother."

Then again she moved slowly up and down the brilliant, deserted rooms and in and out through the long passages, singing softly to herself a hymn as she went. The chairs and couches looked as if they were not the same objects which had been so familiar to her since her childhood; they all had a strange, unhome-like appearance about them. The long table in the dining-hall had something wondrously cold and dreary about it as it stretched out its bare oaken length beneath the blaze of the tapers, which sure must be meant to shine down upon a merry band of guests. The portraits all followed her about hither and thither with their fixed, motionless eyes. The voices of her husband and her mistress seemed to be mingling in the night breeze, as it swept round the house, with the voices of her long-lost parents. Then, as the gloom grew thicker round her heart, she brought a steadfast light back again by the almighty power of prayer; and when the prayer was done, there came calmer, and more uplifting, thoughts.

Was it not a brave and beautiful thing for a woman to do, to meet danger for others, and those others both so dear to her? Was it not fair and noble for a daughter of the Heavenly King to dare peril in His cause? If the Lady Elfrida were taken prisoner, the Reformed Faith would lose one of its strongest supports in the west of England; yes, come what might, it was a high, sweet thing to be ready to give up her own life for her husband and her religion. Besides, she had good hope that her Father above would keep her and her child from harm, strange and perilous though their position now seemed; had she not the faithful promise to cling to that He will never leave or forsake?

Thus the minutes went on, marked out slowly by the hands on the broad white face of the large clock in the hall. How was it that, as yet, she heard no sign of the soldiers at the castle gate? Had they found out her plan of rescuing her friends? And were they even now pursuing them through the night, and pressing hard upon them?

Hark! what was that? Was it the sound of the wind in the wide chimney? was it nothing more? She listened, every sense concentrated in the one sense of hearing; sure she was not deceived this time, it was a loud knocking at the outer gate. Now let her thank God that those two she loved were riding on unmolested, drawing each moment nearer to freedom and safety; now let her lift up one last prayer for herself and the child.

The noise grew louder and louder, until there where she stood within the house, it seemed to her as if every beam of old seasoned wood, every bar of firm iron were groaning at once. The courtyard, and the out-buildings, and the old house re-echoed in deep hollow tones as those sounds continued, until the whole air around was full of them. Next there began a bursting, and a cracking, and a grinding, and a few minutes after there was a great crash, the gate had fallen at last.

They were in the court now, she could hear their feet hurrying across the stone pavement, could distinguish the angry oaths, the evil words which were leaving their lips at each step, mingled with threats of revenge. Soon they were at the door, which, though of solid oak, would not hold out as long as the gate did. It seemed to her, now, that everything to-night had happened with such terrible quickness, as if there were, at this moment, only one thing to long for, a little more time, a little more time; a little more time for those she loved to escape, a little more time for her to think of some way for saving herself and the child. Then she clasped her hands and cried,

"Father, send Thy angel, as Thou did'st to Thy people of old, to guide them through the night in a fiery pillar. Father, who did'st save Thy servants in the midst of the burning furnace, save me in Thy love and might in this hour of trial."

Scarce had the words left her lips, when suddenly an idea flashed through her brain.

"The store-room window, the store-room window," she murmured; "it opens on the ground floor into the little back garden of herbs."

Then she clasped the child closer, yet closer, and fled through the rooms and passages, extinguishing the lights as she went, so that darkness might cover her retreat. It was high time, for she could hear the door giving way. A few moments passed by, a few moments filled with intensest hope and fear. Then she cried out a strong thanksgiving: she was beneath the free air of heaven, hastening away through the night.

SUNDAY ALBUM.

NO. IV.—RAVENS.

"NOAH opened the window of the ark which he had made, and he sent forth a raven, which went to and fro until the waters were dried up from the earth." Gen. viii. 6. 7. In this very early mention of the raven we see how strong is the contrast between the bold fierce bird first sent out, and the gentle dove which would not remain on the desolate earth till she could bring to the ark an olive leaf as a sign of its being once more a fit abode for man.

Among the unclean birds that were forbidden to be eaten or offered to God in sacrifice we find "every raven after his kind." Lev. xi. 15, also Deut. xiv. 14. Yet even for these unclean creatures their Creator makes provision, listening to their cry, and caring for their wants. "Who provideth for the raven his food, when his young ones cry unto God, they wander for lack of meat." Job xxxviii. 41. He giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry." Psalm cxlvii. 9. Now, my dear young readers, I want you to lay to heart two lessons. The one is that if God cares for them, we may be very sure that He is displeased with us if we are guilty of being cruel to any of them; they are His, He watches over them, feeds and protects them, and will not suffer them to be cruelly treated. The next lesson is one taught by Jesus Himself, a very precious lesson of comfort for the anxious, and hope for the fearful and troubled in heart; I hope you will write the words not only in your albums but in your hearts. "Consider the ravens; for they neither sow nor reap, which neither have store-house nor barn; and God feedeth them; how much more are ye better than the fowls!" God's little children are very dear to Him, much more precious than His ravens; they may be sure they will never be forgotten before Him.

We have a remarkable instance of this care over one who sorely needed it, and for whom He made provision even through the means of ravens.

In obedience to God, the prophet Elijah went and dwelt by the brook Cherith. And there in his loneliness, in obedience also to God, "the ravens brought him bread and flesh in the morning, and bread and flesh in the evening."

There is yet one verse about ravens, a very awful one; I trust the warning it contains may never be needed by any of my readers!

"The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagles shall eat it!" Prov. xxx. 17.

For the next Sunday Album lesson take the subject of THORNS.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XVIII.—GERALD.

"YOU HAVE MY ULTIMATUM," HE SAID QUIETLY.

GERALD MEYNAL left home with a sense of triumphant exultation and independence.

He had managed very well, he told himself; he had avoided all "scenes" with the women folk, and had shifted on to Wulf's broad shoulders the blame of the step, should blame attach to it.

He had no intention of plunging into dissipation or vice. He believed in himself and in his own power of stopping short whenever he chose. He had a boyish admiration for Hector Thompson, and with him for a companion, and money in his pocket, he felt quite at peace with himself and the world.

The money he had ostentatiously displayed before his brother's eyes was not all his own, as a matter of fact. Still he had had that fatal luck that so often lures the young gambler on to his destruction, and he felt a confidence in his own good fortune that made him start upon his travels with an easy mind and a buoyant sense of hope and pleasure.

Some day he would settle down steadily to work, but for a time at least he intended to enjoy himself.

He slept that night at Aylcester, and the day was far advanced before he rose. He telegraphed to Hector Thompson to tell him his whereabouts, and ask him to join him, and then, as he was wondering what he should do with the time upon his hands, he recollected that Juliet was a nurse at the County Infirmary, and he thought he could not do better than go and see her and tell her all about himself.

Perhaps one of the best traits in the young man's character was a capacity for affection that was more than a mere transitory emotion. None of his own near relations had inspired him with this affection, which is often not drawn out towards those that are nearest to us in blood; but he was sincerely fond of Juliet Granby, and had been so from the days of their childhood. Whoever else changed towards him, Juliet was always his friend and admirer.

Juliet had always stood to her colours and had always believed in him. That might not be a very elevated basis on which to erect friendship or affection, but in this case it had proved a very solid one, and had stood the test of time without crumbling or quaking.

Gerald could not get on without admiration. It was as necessary to him as the air he breathed. A friend who could stand as it were aloof, and criticise him, in however kindly a spirit, could be no friend to him. He shrank from and resented such a course of action with curious and vehement distaste. If people could not like and admire him and be blind to his faults, he would have nothing more to do with them.

In proportion as he turned from those who as he expressed it, "failed him," so he valued increasingly the friends upon whom he could depend; and foremost amongst these stood Juliet Granby.

So he went up the steps of the infirmary and boldly asked to see the girl. After explaining to Mrs. Martin that he had known her all his life, that he was Dr. Meynal's brother, and had just come from St. Hilda and wished to say good-bye to her before leaving that part of the country altogether, he was shown into the nurse's parlour which at that hour was quite empty and was told that Nurse Granby should come to him there as soon as her duties would allow of it.

Gerald stood at the window, staring down into the dull quadrangle formed by the great building. He felt depressed by the atmosphere of the place and the silence of the long upper corridors that were tenantless now.

"How can she take to a place like this—with her ideas too—so like my own? Women are past comprehension. St. Hilda was dull, I admit, but the dismal dulness of a life in a prison-like place such as this!—it must be something awful!"

Then, turning quickly at the sound of a step behind him, he found himself face to face with Juliet in her nurse's garb.

"Gerald!" she exclaimed, "I could not imagine who it could be. How good of you to come."

"I could not go away without saying good-bye to you, Juliet."

"Are you going away, then? Where?"

"Eventually to London; but I dare say I shall go and see the world a little first. We have both cut ourselves adrift from the old life you see, Juliet. I wonder who will have the best time of it. How do you like your choice?"

"Well, middling, it was not exactly my choice, Gerald, but the only thing I could manage. I think it is better than St. Hilda, but the people are dreadfully sordid and common, and there is a great deal to put up with. I suppose they are jealous of any one a little superior to themselves, and are determined to keep them from rising. It seems like it anyhow; but they will not keep me in subjection long; as soon as I have a little more knowledge and experience, I will assert myself, and show what I can do."

This interview took place before Juliet had been many weeks in the hospital—before her temporary elevation and sudden fall.

"That is right Juliet. Never you allow yourself to be put upon. It never answers. I have been much too easy-going myself; but I have asserted myself at last, and Wulf will find that he cannot trample on me with impunity."

"What has Wulfric done?" asked Juliet.

So Gerald told his story in his own way, and she listened with great interest and sympathy.

"And so you have really left home for good? Oh, Gerald, how I envy you! If only I had talents like yours, and could be free to go where I would and make myself great and famous! How I shall look out for notices in the papers about you. I wonder what you will do first to make yourself known. Which of your pictures have you taken away with you?"

Gerald laughed a little constrainedly. He did not quite know how to explain to Juliet that it was not by his art that he meant to rise in the first place to affluence and importance. He had a strange shrinking from, in any way, lowering himself in her eyes. After all, why should he? she could not understand him. She was but an inexperienced woman.

"Oh, I can have my pictures sent after me when I have got a studio to put them in; but I may not settle down all at once. I mean to travel about first for a time. I am not sure that I shall not go to Italy."

Juliet clasped her hands in sympathetic delight.

"Oh, Gerald! how lovely! But—but—if you have quarreled with Wulf and have gone away without leave from any one, how will you get the money to go?"

Gerald smiled mysteriously.

"Oh, I have the money safe enough. I made that myself."

"You have sold a picture!" cried the girl with sparkling eyes, "one of your great pictures. You are famous already. Some dealer has heard of you, and has come down to buy your work! Tell me all about it Gerald! You don't know how pleased I am!"

Gerald was smiling still in his rather provoking fashion. He did not mean exactly to be deceitful, but this sort of thing was very pleasant to his vanity. He could not forego the pleasure of enjoying it.

"Come now, Juliet, don't be so importunate. You know I don't care about blowing my own trumpet. I've got the money—that is the great thing—and I can go to Italy or anywhere else that I choose. It is a very jolly feeling to know that one is independent, and that there is more to be made as soon as funds get low."

Juliet smiled triumphantly.

"Did not I say you would be rich and famous one day? I always knew it!"

"You always stood by me, so, of course, I came to you first with the tale of my good luck."

"Don't they know at home?"

"I told Wulfric I had money, but I did not specify how I came by it. I dare say he thinks I stole it, and am now flying from the pursuit of justice," and Gerald laughed gaily, Juliet joining.

"Wulfric is no judge of art, and Barbara's opinions no doubt influence him. Barbara never understood you. How small she will feel when this all comes out."

Gerald began to feel a little small himself, and attempted to change the conversation.

"Never mind, Barbara; she means well, and so does old Wulf. I suppose they can't help being rather obstinate and unreasonable. Look here, Juliet, you'll always stand my friend, won't you? I dare say you will hear some hard things of me when you go back; but I should like to feel that I had a friend in you."

He spoke with more earnestness and feeling than was usual with him, and Juliet, herself somewhat lonely and unhappy, was touched by it.

"Indeed Gerald, I will," she answered. "You have always been my friend; when I was unhappy and other people laughed, you understood and stood up for me. We have the same ideas of life. We cannot be content to rust out our existence in a narrow, petty little village. Oh, yes, Gerald, I will always stand up for you. I will fight your battle when you are not there to fight it for yourself."

He looked at her affectionately, and laid his hand upon hers.

"You are a good girl, Juliet. You are something like a friend."

Tears were very near Juliet's eyes, but she kept them back, and answered with assumed gaiety, "And we will show them that we are right after all, Gerald. People are very fond of talking as if it were very wicked to want one's own way, and to get it; but we will show their mistake and folly. You and I have each taken our own way to a certain extent, and we will prove to the world how well it will turn out!"

Gerald looked on his companion with a smile that was a little uncertain, comparing his own purposes with those of this girl beside him—this girl whose very garb bespoke that her vocation was to minister to the sick and suffering, and to give up her youthful pleasures, her time and strength, in a noble labour of love. Juliet might be headstrong and unwise in the way in which she set about her tasks, but surely she was more truly wise than he. At least she could ask a blessing upon her labours, but could he do the same?

Gerald was not wont to moralise thus, yet such thoughts as these struggled through his mind during Juliet's last speech, and gave him an uneasy twinge. He started up, determined to get rid of them as quickly as possible.

"Well, good-bye, Juliet; I was told not to stay long. I have a great deal to do and to think about. I am glad I have seen you. I shall always look back to it with pleasure, and I shall write sometimes to tell you how I get on. Think well of me, Juliet, always, wish me well, and remember me in your prayers. Good-bye,—next time we meet we ought to have a good deal to say to one another."

He spoke hastily, and was gone almost before the words had passed his lips; and Juliet with a softer and tenderer feeling at her heart, went back to her work in her ward.

So Gerald vanished from his home and from St. Hilda, and his mother wept for him, and laid the blame upon her other son, and pined for news that so seldom came, whilst doubt and trouble preyed upon her health.

Wulfric took her undeserved reproaches very quietly and patiently, and as time passed by he began to feel that his mother, despite her fretful words, leaned upon him and clung to him in an unconscious way that roused the love and tenderness within him to more active life.

Barbara sometimes noticed this too, and would speak of it with a happy light in her eyes, and Wulfric would flush with pleasure, and say in his deep, gentle voice—"Poor little mother!"

Barbara was very happy in those days, dull and monotonous as they appeared to outsiders. She had not struggled in vain during all these long months. She had not marked her progress day by day and hour by hour, yet when she looked back to the time succeeding her father's death, she could see how many victories had been won. She was never irritable now with the ailing mother, whose fretfulness had tried her so hardly once. She had drawn a little nearer the sister, who had once been such a stranger to her, and she had begun to realise that Celia too, had her own troubles, hopes and fears, little as she showed them; Barbara felt quite certain that the visible devotion of Mr. Leslie, the young clergyman, had touched her sister's heart, although she was struggling against its influence, in the deep-seated desire to "make a good match," and marry a rich man.

There was no doubt about Hector Thompson's admiration for Celia; but Barbara had never liked him, and since his influence had led Gerald to leave home for months together, and ignore all his mother's piteous appeals to return, even Celia had seemed displeased, and had looked grave and abstracted when his name was mentioned. Yet Celia was weak, as her sister well knew, and she feared for the effect of any personal influence that might be brought to bear upon her, and Hector's sisters always treated her almost as if she were one of themselves.

Fergus Thompson was a constant visitor during this time, when so much anxiety was being experienced about Gerald. It almost seemed as if he tried to take the place of the absent son and brother; and the keen sense of regret—almost of shame—that he felt with regard to Hector's conduct proved very plainly how little he thought his brother was to be trusted.

Barbara learned more from him of the dangers to which Gerald was likely to be exposed, than she did from any other source. It was a relief to both to talk freely on a subject that was shunned in ordinary conversation; and as Fergus and Barbara had known each other from childhood, it was the easier for them to speak freely of those so nearly related to them.

Fergus, too, began to talk to Barbara of his own plans and prospects. He was getting on well, he said, and this report was confirmed by others, who spoke of the young engineer as a man likely to rise in his profession.

And very gradually Barbara began to understand the drift of these confidences, and to know that a new element was stealing into her life and sweetening it in a wonderful and inexplicable way

She did not let herself give too much prominence to this new sense of happiness. She took it humbly, gratefully, without questioning too closely its nature, and she busied herself about her work as earnestly as ever, and was glad to think that Fergus took so much interest in it, and always spoke with kindly sympathy of the poor and needy, whose wants she tried to relieve.

And Fergus would talk to her softly, sometimes of the mother he had lost, whose teaching he had never forgotten, and Barbara knew, by the way he spoke of that and of her, that he at least would understand her aspirations, and help, not hinder, her in the path she fain would tread. This conviction brought with it an added sense of happiness.

So days and weeks slipped by. October had come and had almost gone when the news came that Hector and Gerald had reached London, and the former was very anxious for his father to fulfil a half-formed promise of taking a house there for some six or nine months and letting the girls see something of life.

Of course Georgina and Harriet were enchanted at the prospect, and Mr. Thomspon, who was a good-natured, easy going man, was not proof against the pressure brought to bear upon him on all sides. He rather liked the sense of importance that would be conferred upon him by a residence in the metropolis, and Hector was instructed to look out for a suitable house in a convenient and central locality.

Barbara felt relieved when she heard of this plan. She thought that Gerald would have had a kind of home at the house of these friends, even if he did not live beneath their roof; and she hoped that their presence so near would stimulate him to work, and so justify the promise of future greatness which they had one and all accorded to him.

Fergus however did not evince any enthusiasm over the plan, and he sought occasion to speak to Wulfric in private.

"I hear," he said "that your sister Celia is to be asked to join the party and spend a good deal of time in town. If you take my advice you will not let her go."

Wulfric looked up quickly.

"Why not?"

"I suppose you know that my brother Hector admires her very much, and my family are anxious to forward the marriage, as they have an idea that it would 'steady him.' For my part I have no faith in the steadying process built on no more secure foundation than that; and though he is my brother, I must frankly say that I believe his wife would be a very unhappy and neglected woman,"

Wulfric drew his brows together as he had a way of doing when perplexed.

"You are frank with me, and I will be the same with you. You know almost more of my sisters than I do myself. Do you think Celia would be in any danger? Do you think she cares for him?"

"I do not think her heart is touched in the least: but she is easily worked upon, and—pardon my saying it—she is susceptible to admiration and flattery. I believe if she were to pay this visit, she would engage herself without much serious consideration, that is what my sisters reckon upon, I fear."

Wulfric looked serious. He was very much of the same mind himself.

"I am much obliged to you for putting me on my guard," he said. "I will take care that Celia does not go."

"You will do wisely," answered Fergus. "Hector is not the man to make a good husband. Sometimes I have very grave fears what will become of him."

Wulfric knew something of those fears himself; he said nothing more, however, and Fergus shook him by the hand and departed.

Two days later, when he entered the drawing-room late on in the evening, he was aware of an unusual flutter and excitement in the manner of his mother and sisters. Celia was flushed, and looked unusually lovely. Mrs. Meynal was tremulous and a little agitated, and Barbara looked perplexed and excited.

"How late you are, Wulfric!" exclaimed his mother, "you are always so late when we want you especially."

"I have been very busy all day, mother," he answered gently. "Well, what is this important matter under discussion?"

"Celia is going to London with the Thompsons next week. She will see Gerald—it is such a relief to me. I wish they were going at once. She must have some money, Wulfric. I want you to write a cheque for £50, she will want a great many new things before she goes."

Wulfric sat quite still for a few minutes gazing in the fire. Barbara looked at him keenly, but nobody else understood the reason of his silence.

"You don't congratulate me, Wulf," said Celia, playfully, she was in unusually high spirits tonight. "You don't say what a fortunate girl you think me for having the chance given me of a long visit to London."

Wulfric got up and stood with his back to the fire, there was something in his look and his gesture that aroused the attention of the onlookers.

"Celia," he said, "I don't like to disappoint you, but I cannot sanction this journey to London."

A quick flush rose in Celia's cheek; for a moment she looked curiously like Gerald.

"Then I must go without your sanction," she answered with a slightly scornful inflexion in her tone.

"Pardon me for contradicting you, Celia, but I must tell you plainly that this visit is not to be paid."

She drew herself up haughtily.

"And pray, by what right do you lay down the law to me like this?"

"I have no wish to lay down the law, I would much rather persuade you, if it were possible."

"I am afraid your powers are unequal to the task; I mean to go, and I defy you to show me a single good reason why I should not do so."

"I can show you a good many, Celia. In the first place, these friends of yours intend to lead a life of continual gaiety and dissipation, and as our father has not been dead more than six months, it would be unseemly for you to share in these pleasures, and you would hardly care to be excluded——"

"Nobody in town would know," interrupted Celia quickly.

"You would know yourself," returned Wulfric with rather cutting emphasis, and with a gleam in his eye that Barbara felt she should hardly care to encounter, and then passing on quickly to the next point, he added very gravely: "It is due to the direct influence of Hector Thompson that Gerald has become what, I fear, he now is. It is unseemly and indeed intolerable that you should go about with a family, in terms of close intimacy, to one member of which we owe a debt of that kind. I cannot and I will not sanction your meeting young Thompson as a guest beneath his father's roof."

Mrs. Meynal was dissolved in tears, and sobbed without any attempt to speak. Barbara felt a great respect and admiration for her brother, whilst Celia looked a little pale as she drew herself haughtily up.

"And suppose I go in spite of you?"

"You cannot do that," he answered coolly, "for I have the purse strings."

"You are ungenerous!" she flashed out hotly.

"I am not so willingly; but upon this point you will find me inflexible."

He waited to hear if she had anything more to say, and as she remained mute and indignant, he turned to quit the room.

"You have my ultimatum," he said quietly. "If I can make up to you in any other way for the disappointment, I shall be very glad to do so," and then he quitted the room without waiting for a reply.

Too Tired to Talk.

DEAR LORD, they say I'm laid aside
Great things for Thee to do,
By spending hours before Thy throne
In fervent prayer, and true.

They tell me that my work is now
For those to intercede
Who, busied in Thy harvest field,
Have many a pressing need.

They speak to me of wrestling prayer;
I tremble with dismay;
I am so weary and so weak,
I seldom seem to pray.

But like a wearied child I feel
Upon his mother's breast—
Too tired to talk, who only cares
To lie quite still and rest.

Who looks up sometimes with a smile
To meet that mother's eye,
And knows she tells his every want
With ready sympathy.

And sometimes few and broken words
Are murmured soft and low,
That others might not understand,
But mothers read and know.

Some words about his joy or grief,
About his work or play—
Some simple words of love to her
That only children say.

And she is satisfied, because
He lies upon her breast—
She knows he is too tired to talk,
And only wants to rest.

Her joy, her bliss, is just in this,
That he takes shelter there,
And seeks no other resting-place
Beside his mother's care.

Dear Lord, and am I wrong to talk
Like this to Thee to-day?
Far tenderer than a mother's words
The words that Thou dost say.

More sweet Thy smile than e'en the smile
Upon a mother's face,
And softer than a mother's arms
Is this my resting-place.

And Thy great love has made me bold
To be a child with Thee—
A tired child that lies at rest
Whilst Thou wilt talk to me.

THE DUTCH ORPHANAGE AT' NEERBOSCH.

A WORK OF FAITH AND LOVE.

HOLLAND has long been celebrated for its benevolent and philanthropic institutions. Nearly every town of any importance throughout the little kingdom contains its home for old men or old women, its orphanage, its institution for the blind, or its beggar colony. Walking along the quiet old-fashioned streets, like those which abound in Hoorn, Enkhuisen, or any of the "dead cities" of the Zuyder Zee, the curious gabled houses, the tall church spires with their carillons, the ornate town halls, the irregular market places, enable the traveller in imagination to recall something of the old sixteenth century life. Glancing in through an open doorway he will see that the long hall, running quite through the large but unpretending house, is paved and lined with Carrara marble, and thus, in an instant, the thought is carried back to the time when the Dutch Republic "ruled the waves." The façades of many of the houses are elaborately carved and decorated; and in many cases the decorative group that most readily attracts the eye is one showing that it adorns the refuge for the respectable and aged poor, or for the lonely and helpless orphan. Among the many interesting and abiding impressions produced by a journey through Holland, none is more constantly deepened than this—that the people of Holland recognise fully the claims of the afflicted and needy, and do much in the way of meeting these responsibilities.

The purpose of this paper is to describe one of the most modern and most successful of Dutch orphanages. By interesting the reader the object of the paper will be only partially secured; it seeks also to produce a clear conviction that the work is eminently the outcome of faith and love, that its success is a striking instance of answer to prayer, and that its beneficial and blessed results defy all attempts at accurate measurement.

Among the most picturesque towns in Holland, and one of the richest in historical associations, is Nymegen, situated along a steep ridge upon the left bank of the Waal. Any one standing in the grounds of the Valkenhof, where to this day are to be seen some scanty remains of Charlemagne's church, looks over a beautiful landscape and sees spread out before him the famous island now known as Betuwe or "good meadow," formerly familiar to Julius Cæsar as the home of the Batavian legions. Nymegen was a favourite residence of the Carlovingian emperors. Strong by natural situation, and strongly fortified, it has stood many a siege and has been often taken and retaken. But in the last few years the land formerly covered by its massive fortifications, has been laid out as public gardens and promenades, and as sites for streets of comfortable modern villas.

The irregularly-shaped market place with its fine old church spire and its curiously decorated Weigh House, dating from the early part of the seventeenth century, occupies a central site upon the top of the ridge on which the city stands. From one side of the market-place the ground slopes abruptly to the river, and is covered by a number of narrow, winding, unprepossessing streets. One of the dingiest of these is called Brouwerstraat. In this street twenty-four years ago stood a large roomy house, silent and unoccupied, enjoying the reputation of being haunted. Mr. Van t' Lindenhout, an evangelist and colporteur, during his journeyings through Holland had been painfully impressed by the sight of the sufferings of many orphans whom none of the existing organisations seemed able to reach, and the desire to do something for them gradually passed into resolution and action. He saw this old haunted house; he took it entirely by faith and in reliance upon God's help; he determined to fill its empty rooms and replace its imaginary occupants, by very real and very needy Dutch boys and girls. On November 1st, 1863, two orphans entered into possession. Mr. Van t' Lindenhout had none of this world's goods, and, judged by common-sense worldly principles, the enterprise was quixotic and predoomed to failure. But he was strong in his trust, in his love and sympathy for the helpless, and in his conviction that God would make the work His own. The discouragements at starting were neither few nor small. In August, 1863, all preparations for the first two orphans had been made, a few friends had assembled to welcome them on their arrival. The time came, but instead of the children the following letter reached the expectant benefactor: "Sir,—Having learnt from reliable authority that you lack funds to support the children sent to you, and that your work is upheld by no rich and influential person, I prefer to leave the children with the peasants who are taking care of them for a small remuneration. If they must suffer misery—and this will without doubt be the case if they come to you—they had better remain where they are."

Such was the first response to Mr. Van t' Lindenhout's benevolent efforts. Such was the way in which irreligious prudence judged his labour. Still he resolved the work should begin, and a few weeks later, two children, a boy and a girl, came under his loving care, and by July, 1864, eighteen very real children, especially in the way of requiring food, clothing and training, had banished the ghosts from the old house, and no less than 120*l.* had been contributed for their support.

Although the way was sometimes rough, and faith was sorely tried, the work has gone steadily onwards since that day. Mr. Van t' Lindenhout has known what it is to have many depending upon him and to be to all appearance, entirely at the end of his resources. On May 7th, 1864, he writes: "We were so short of money that we had nothing wherewith to pay a debt of twenty-one shillings; nevertheless the debt had to be paid that day. All day long we besought the Lord to help us, feeling sure that He would show favour to us. And towards evening we received by post an anonymous gift of fifty shillings."

Nevertheless, so steady was the progress that in four years the number of orphans increased to sixty-five, and the old house in Brouwerstraat was filled to overflowing. It became evident that the place was too strait for the work, and ardent prayers were offered that God would indicate the way in which the enterprise could be enlarged. Attempts had been made to collect money for a new home, but only about 16*l.* had been received. In 1866 Mr. Van t' Lindenhout received a letter from a friend stating that he and his brothers and sisters intended buying a farm at a village called Neerbosch, about three miles from Nymegen, and that if they succeeded in purchasing it they had promised before the Lord to give part of the land for the use of the orphans. The purchase was made and the land given. Mr. Van t' Lindenhout's heart was further cheered by gifts of money amounting to 80*l.* and it was resolved to begin at once the erection of suitable premises. This resolution was met with the usual comments from candid friends. He was told the house would never be built. People walked out to see whether operations had actually commenced. Many were the prophecies of failure. But the work went forward, never very fast, and sometimes the hearts of those at its head were heavy with care, but it went steadily forward to completion. Gifts of tiles, of furniture, of money, came to hand, and at length on May 6th, 1867, a house capable of receiving thirty-four orphan girls was opened.

So that in 1867, the work begun with two poor children in 1863, had increased until sixty-five were cared for in the old house and thirty-four at Neerbosch.

Let us now see to what this small beginning had increased in 1886.

In the summer of 1886, that is seventeen years after the first building was opened at Neerbosch, it was the writer's good fortune to visit the orphanage in the company of a Dutch pastor who has for many years been one of the warmest friends of the institution. It was a beautiful July day, and as we drove out of Nymegen, we caught glimpses of the Rhine spanned by the great railway bridge, and we looked out from time to time over a wide expanse of fertile country. The winding road passed by many trim villas, where bright shining windows, spotlessly clean appearance and well-kept gardens, spoke of abundance, comfort and refinement. At length, leaving the main road, we passed along a narrow country lane, flanked on either side by flat fertile fields. Unlike many parts of Holland, there is in this district an abundance of wood, and the foliage looked very pleasant in the full light of the summer sun. The carriage stopped at last near the door of a quiet unpretending house, which turned out to be the home of Mr. Van t' Lindenhout, the founder and director of the orphanage. Large in build, with a kindly face and pleasant smile, he strikes a stranger at once as a man of heart, and one has only to see him among the children to recognise instantly that those shrewd judges of character regard him as a loving friend.

In a few minutes we set out upon our tour of inspection. The thirty-four orphans of 1867, had increased in 1886 to over eight hundred, and the one small house into the colony of buildings which now cover a large area. As the children come very young, and not unfrequently even when they are babies, and as they stay until as young men and women they are ready to enter upon the battle of life, and as each boy and girl is taught some trade or occupation by which they can support themselves, a great variety of buildings is required. We began by visiting the workshops. We first entered a printing establishment and saw all the processes of a large printing business going energetically forward. Here various kinds of work are undertaken, and they have even successfully printed a Sanscrit New Testament. The foremen and leading workmen in all the shops in nearly every case had entered the place as helpless orphans, and hence they have a fellow-feeling and true sympathy for the boys and girls, who come under their training. We passed on to the bookbinders' building, and then to watch the processes of an employment that appears strange to an English eye, the manufacture of sabots that is the cutting of blocks of wood into wooden shoes, which, if they cannot be described as elegant, are most certainly useful. More than 5,000 pairs are turned out annually. We looked in upon the young cabinet makers and carpenters and blacksmiths; upon the tailors busily making the orphans' clothing; upon the laundry where bright rosy-cheeked girls were washing and ironing the vast quantities of garments forming the weekly wash of the institution; and then we looked over the large farm with its barns and sheds and dairies.

The girls for the most part are trained as domestic servants, and before they leave they have a thorough knowledge of the different parts of household work. The boys are allowed to select their own trade, and in those cases only where the boy cannot make up his mind does the director decide for him. Not only do the orphans thus learn useful trades and become fitted to take their place in life as good citizens, but their labour, while at Neerbosch, in addition to supplying all the requirements of the institution, is a source of considerable revenue.

Side by side with the work education is going on. Most of those in the workshops pass part of the day in school, and hundreds of the children are wholly occupied with lessons. So, after looking at the work departments, we made a round of the school-room. We visited first the nursery and saw several babies flourishing under the care of nurses trained in the orphanage. It was pleasant also to see four or five white-headed plump youngsters, three or four years old come running up to Mr. Van t' Lindenhout as to an old friend. In turn, we saw the junior schoolroom. There were many of them, and were all bright, airy, and very well appointed. It was a pleasure indeed to look upon row after row of rosy, healthy-looking faces. In fact it must be hard for children to get ill at Neerbosch, and one felt that it was not wholly a misfortune to be left an orphan when it lead to an entrance into and a claim upon such a home. Compared with the lives of multitudes of the poor, who live with their parents, both in Holland and England, these children were in luxury. Not that there are any signs of luxury and indulgence about the various buildings and schools. Everything is as plain as it well can be. There is nothing to pamper the children; but on the other hand all things seem adapted to meet the wants of healthy childhood and to develope the education, self-control and fitness for the duties and responsibilities of life.

At a sign from the teacher in one or two of the rooms the children rose and sang some hymns and national airs and recited. As this took place in the Dutch language the enjoyment to an English visitor consisted in watching the bright faces, noting the careful drill and accurate combined execution, and marvelling that a language which looks in its printed form so repulsively unharmonious could ever be made, even by children voices, to sound so pleasant.

A visit to the dormitories showed us room after room full of tiny cots, all spotlessly clean and airy and comfortable. Land being plentiful there has been no effort to erect large and imposing buildings. Instead of one or two huge erections, there is a large number of two-storied buildings, schoolrooms on the ground-floor and dormitories above.

In one part of the establishment there is a fine large wooden church, built and finished entirely by the orphans. It will seat more than one thousand persons. While inspecting this, a portion of the choir entered and sang sweetly some of the hymns used in their ordinary services.

Wandering from farm to laundry, from workshop to schoolroom, from the large and handsome church to the unpretending home of the director, almost losing oneself in the variety and number of the buildings, it was hard to realise that only twenty years ago this was open fields, yielding little, if anything, to the culture of man. Now the whole establishment stands as evidence of what, under the blessing of God, may be done on behalf of the needy and helpless by the faith and zeal and enthusiasm of one devoted Christian man. It is true that he has had helpers and sympathisers and fellow-workers. Circles of friends hold working meetings on behalf of the orphans in all parts of Holland. Places as remote as the islands of Marken and Urk do their share. In 1886 Mr. Van t' Lindenhout visited America to stir up among the many Dutch emigrants in the United States interest in, and sympathy and aid for his work. But, making all allowances for the support thus given, one cannot but feel in the presence of the founder and director that it has been all largely the work of his heart, and that the children judge by a true instinct when they show by their manner that they look upon him more as a father than as a master.

Ties are kept up as far as possible with those who go out from the institution. If misfortune, or illness, or any of the chances of life throw any boy or girl who has once belonged to Neerbosch upon the uncertain mercies of the world, there is always a welcome, and such help as they may need waiting for them at the old home.

And the work is still going forward. A letter received only a few days ago tells of new extensions, and of projected building that will permit of raising the number to nine hundred. Any one who may be inclined to think that practical Christianity is losing its power would do well to visit Neerbosch; remembering also, that successful as the work is, it is after all only one out of the myriad enterprises which the Christianity of Europe is carrying on for the help of the suffering and friendless. Such a visit should tend to remove doubts, to strengthen faith, and to quicken a desire to take part in works that bear such fruit.

THE ORPHANAGE CHURCH.

HOSPITALS AND HOSPITAL WORK.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER II.—I GAIN EXPERIENCE AND A FRIEND.

ON seeing the house surgeon a couple of days later, he thanked me for my care of the poor weaver, and said if I still wished to help he had a peculiar case which required gentle, observant nursing, one which puzzled and interested the whole hospital staff, and he and the physician must have some one on whom they could strictly rely.

So, once again, I found myself by his side, accompanied by my friend the physician and two or three of the young doctors. We made our way to the woman's side of the hospital this time, and to Ward No. 6, which I learned was an extra one.

At the door we encountered the matron, a sour-looking little woman of about forty-two years of age, with some pretensions to good looks; she had large blue eyes tinged with yellow, thin lips with a malicious smile playing about them. She took no notice of me; nor, indeed, of any of our little group, except one tall, good-looking intelligent young doctor. To him she extended her thin dry fingers, and said in sharp discordant tones: "The girl is too sickly to be beautiful. Some people are fond of making a fuss." The young doctor remained to explain while we went into the ward.

I soon singled out the object of the matron's remark.

At a glance I saw that she was very beautiful, I could not have told you why, had you asked me at the time; indeed, there was no need to scan the features—the conviction was arrived at before you had time to do so. The eyes were without doubt the most conspicuous beauty, they had depth, softness and brilliancy. Her hair was of bright dark chestnut colour, with the glossiness so remarkable in that fatal disease, consumption. The forehead was transparently white and broad. An admirer of more beauty in a woman might have said that the forehead was too intellectual, and the mouth too small. The beautifully shaped nose, the thin curved nostrils moving with every difficult respiration, and the varied expression with each passing emotion showed that there was no lack of sensibility.

Alas! the bright red tinge of the cheek and lips, the unearthly fairness of the complexion, only showed, I thought, how delicately Death was adorning its bride.

She was sitting propped up in bed, reading out of one of the hospital New Testaments. As she put it down, I saw that she had been reading out of the 15th chapter of St. Luke. What, I asked myself, can this young gentle stricken creature have to do with the erring sheep, the lost drachm, or the returning prodigal?

As the physician felt her pulse we noticed that he seemed greatly moved; and, in the silence, one of the pupils, a silly, reckless sort of youth, whispered in the house surgeon's ear, but so loud as to be distinctly heard, "The Doctor says it is confirmed consumption." A scowl from the doctor somewhat disconcerted him, but the effect of his folly upon the patient was most distressing—her lips and cheeks blanched instantly, and her head sank back upon the pillow. At this moment she put out her hand for her handkerchief, the only article of dress or belonging in which she differed from the other patients in the ward—its quality, texture, and colour were excellent. In her distress it had fallen to the floor. I stooped quietly, picked it up and put it into her hand.

A slight colour came into her cheek, and she bowed as I did so. Instantly blood from the mouth stained the thin cambric and she fainted.

After a few restoratives were resorted to she recovered. We left her under the care of the regular hospital nurse, and all moved out of the ward, I among them, to receive my directions, which were few and simple. She was to be kept as quiet and unexcited as possible, and to have nourishment often, and as there were no surgical cases in the ward, no one would enter without permission from the physician or house surgeon.

I returned to my place beside the sick girl's bed. She was quiet and apparently restful, and I sank into a fit of musing. Whence and who is she? Of gentle birth, I feel sure. But why in a public hospital? At this moment the young doctor who had been delayed by the matron was about to enter the ward when I went towards him quietly, and told him of the physician's and house surgeon's orders. As he was going out I said, "Is it really consumption?"

"I should say galloping," was the answer.

"But it is possible to cure consumption, is it not?"

"I have heard so a thousand times, but when the cures came to be investigated, there was always a loose point somewhere," he said sorrowfully.

"Will she die?" I whispered.

"I should say emphatically Yes. Everything worth living for dies," he said in a dreamy way, "but she is in good hands, and has a gentle nurse, so be hopeful."

My watch went on for a day or two without anything to mark it but the visits of the doctors. My charge wrote a little and slept a little, and you may be sure I strictly obeyed every direction.

One afternoon I left her in the care of an old nurse to get a little fresh air, and entering the hospital about five, I went to the matron's room to get a cup of tea before returning to my duties. I found the house surgeon and the matron already there, and I was struck with the excitement which lighted up the sallow face of the woman. At length she said: "What a ridiculous story about that girl in the extra ward!"

"What story?" asked the house surgeon.

"Her wonderful beauty, and—being quite of gentle blood—and our nurses not being good enough for her."

"Who says that, Miss Gage?" asked the doctor quietly.

"Why, of course, all the students are talking of it, and think it a shame that you and the Doctor have kept them out of the ward, but they will manage to get in somehow, and quite right too."

I was drinking my tea when the house surgeon echoed my thoughts, saying in a far-off sort of way, "Who is this girl? Where does she come from? And what is her name, and how came the Doctor to bring her in here."

"Who can tell?" retorted the matron. "I have been there to try and find out, but the artful thing (emphasising the term with a toss of her head) pretends she never asked to be brought here, and requested to be left in quiet or to be sent out."

I did not wait to hear more, but rose and left the room, and went straight to the ward, where I found the sick girl distressingly roused and sitting up in bed with flushed cheek and anxious eyes.

"Has Miss Gage been here, nurse?" I asked as calmly as I could. "Answer me, if you please." The answer was simply, "Yes."

"You have broken your trust," I said to the nurse. "I shall report you to the Doctor."

The sick girl would have spoken to me, but I remarked, "Do not trouble to explain; the intrusion was out of all order, and you are absolutely free from all responsibility to answer impertinent questions put by any one; your only duty is to get well as quickly as you can."

By this time the house surgeon had arrived, and putting his finger on her pulse, became aware that no time was to be lost. I gave the made-up preparation at once, and waited silently for results. As the quieted pulse restored the placidity of the girl's manner, I noted for the first time a smile flit across the face, and the eyes lost their dangerous brightness. As the house surgeon left me, he said, "Have no anxiety. I will take steps to secure your ward from all interruption; but, pray keep the matron's affair from the Doctor."

"I cannot promise this," was my reply

I took up my watch, waiting patiently until the physician's evening visit. He seemed to have been very angry downstairs, and on asking for the matron, heard she had gone into the town.

It was well for her she had, I thought. He came into the ward, where he found my charge sleeping tranquilly, and the air of quiet which pervaded the ward acted soothingly on him. He looked at her long and searchingly, and said, "Be on the watch, and as soon as she wakes she must have nourishment." I walked with him to the end of the ward, when he paused, saying: "The face of that child haunts me, and brings back so vividly to my mind memories of my early years; I cannot help thinking I knew her mother. Has she told you her name?"

"No," I answered, "but she gave her name to the matron as Mary Cummins, I think."

"That does not help me," was his answer, "neither do I believe it to be her name."

"How did she come here, Doctor?" I asked.

"I found her senseless, bleeding and wet through on the road-side when making my rounds, and brought her in here."

I went back to my watch. The next day was Sunday—Easter Day. The bells of the neighbouring churches were calling the scattered worshippers for prayer and praise for the third time. A solemn, mysterious calm seemed to pervade the ward, and my heart and soul went up in earnest prayer for the beautiful girl given into my care.

The only interruption was the opening of the door by the young doctor who had been detained by the matron on my first day of nursing; twilight was just deepening into gloom, yet I saw that he beckoned me and that he had a letter in his hand. I went noiselessly towards him. "The postman," he said, "brought this letter last evening, but was told that no person of the name of Mary F. Cummins was in the hospital. He brought it again just now when I happened to be in the way, and it struck me it might be for your beautiful charge; so I undertook to give it to you, and if it should be a mistake, to return it to him on the morrow. It was good of the old postman, who said, 'I thought I'd make another try, 'cos some o' them poor things sets a great store by a letter.'"

I thanked the young doctor and took the letter, and it flashed across my mind instantly that it could be for none other than my charge; the shape, style, seal, writing and appearance confirming my suspicion that she was the only person in the hospital to whom such a letter could belong; beside, at one corner—although almost illegible—was written "Ward No. 6."

You can hardly believe what strange emotions I experienced as I returned noiselessly to my post. The room was nearly dark, except for a couple of rushlights on the table by the fireplace which threw their feeble rays in definite lines across the middle of the ward. An assistant nurse was sitting near the lights with closed eyes and depressed head. All the curtains of the beds were drawn close round the feet; and from the peculiar quiet which reigned the ward seemed asleep.

I bent down by the bed of the girl, and said, "Do I disturb you?"

"No!" was her reply. "I am too restless to sleep."

"I have a letter, which from its appearance I think must belong to you—it is addressed to Mary F. Cummins."

"It is for me. Thank you," said the excited girl in tremulous tones. She broke the seal, and I went to the table for a candle. I placed it by her side, and was about to move away, when she said: "Oh, pray tell me, do the doctors think my case hopeless? Is there any chance of my recovery? Is this death-like languor the beginning of the end?"

I made an uneasy movement, for this was so unexpected.

"Oh, do not deceive me; pray do not. That which I value more than life will be lost, if I die without an opportunity of explanation."

She paused, looking searchingly into my face.

For some moments I could not utter a syllable.

At length, with choking utterance, I said, "You must see how little I know of these things; I am only nursing you because I want to comfort myself."

"Oh, you are too kind-hearted to deceive me, except under the delusion that it is for my good. Yet, I assure you, you will do me a great injury if you conceal the truth from me. I see that the Doctor speaks freely to you, and therefore you must know his mind."

"Indeed, indeed, I would gladly be of real service to you. I know you are very ill, but I believe you to be much better than when you came here. Doctor —— has never told me his opinion. I have great hopes that you will get better, but every time you get excited you lose a chance."

There was a longish pause; then she said in a tone of deep anguish: "Ah, no! I shall not get better. My father repulses me with scorn. I shall die here with a blot on my name and dishonour on my guiltless head." She hid her face in her hands.

"I will do anything I can, if you will show me how I can serve you. You need not distrust me, because I am young and a stranger," I rejoined, almost beside myself with wretchedness.

She turned her eyes languidly upon me and said, "You have been very kind to one in need, and without earthly helper." She laid her cold hand on mine as I sat there choked with emotion. I felt it begin to tremble and to grow even colder.

At length in a feeble tone she said, "I wrote to my father to come and see me here. I had no strength to write an account of my leaving home. He has construed my silence into an acknowledgment of guilt, and with much bitterness he refuses to see me."

She wept, and feeling about the pillow produced a packet, and then resumed, "Since I have been here I have written my narrative. It is complete, except the circumstances attending my being found and brought in here, which I do not know. I am in perplexity. Would you undertake to learn for me my story and set my father right, when—when I am dead?"

"I will."

"In this soiled packet you will find my mother's diary—part of which only you will have to wade through—and my history. If you do not weary of the task, I will, if spared, supply you with information, and show in what way you can serve a friendless and wretched girl."

I took her hand in mine. I kissed her and said I would be quite at her service to do whatever she required of me. I begged her to try and sleep while I looked over the packet. It contained a stained diary in a lady's handwriting, some letters in the poor sick girl's writing, the last being in pencil; a few notes in a gentleman's hand, two locks of hair, one nearly white, the other rich auburn; and several loose papers.

I felt puzzled about a beginning, but I did begin, and read through every line, sitting up long to do so.

Her own story was that her father, knowing her to love a good man, a clergyman, but very poor, was hurrying on her marriage with a man of wild and wicked character because he was very rich; that she loathed him, and the day before the marriage she had left home to wander, she knew not whither. All day she was without food, and as the night came on a fearful storm of rain, thunder and lightning overtook her, and in her terror she fell, and, as she thinks, fainted. She must have lain there some hours before kind Dr. —— found her and brought her to the hospital. Her father, she said, believed her to have left home under the protection of the clergyman, whom she had neither seen nor spoken to.

Days bring on results in county hospitals just as surely as in the policy of a nation.

The beautiful girl in No. 6 Ward took a favourable turn. If she had been a princess our physician and house surgeon could not have more rejoiced. I was permitted to mention a few facts to them both which enabled them to write to Lady C—— concerning her, and also proved the doctor to have been right when he thought he traced in her the features of a friend of his early days.

The result was that I accompanied my charge in the physician's own carriage some twenty miles distant to the house of this lady, who had been a dear friend of her mother's. I remained there a month, receiving every kindness and seeing my charge daily improving in health. We remained fast friends as long as she lived.

Things New and Old.

THE CONSTELLATIONS MENTIONED IN THE BIBLE.—References to the glorious spectacle exhibited by the host of twinkling luminaries which bespangle the nocturnal skies, and the soul-elevating lessons to be derived from their contemplation, are not infrequent in Holy Scripture. In particular, our readers will doubtless at once recall that beautiful expression in the last chapter of Daniel, applied to those who are privileged to become blessed instruments in God's hands of turning many to righteousness, in which it is said that they shall "shine as the stars for ever and ever."

Few, however, of the constellations, as the star-groups are usually called, are mentioned in the sacred volume. Indeed the only references to any of these are those contained in the Book of Job, and in that of the Prophet Amos. In the ninth chapter of the former, the ninth verse, the Authorised Version reads: "Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south." Commentators have come to the conclusion that the word here translated Arcturus does not mean that or any other individual star, but the group called the Great Bear, which also goes commonly under the name of Charles's Wain or waggon. The original Hebrew word literally means bier or litter, and the four stars forming the body of the waggon or hindquarters of the imaginary bear were anciently frequently taken as representing a bier, and the three other stars which form the tail of the bear, or horses of the waggon, were conceived to suggest a train of mourners following the bier; this in fact is the true signification of the word rendered literally "sons" in the Authorised Version of Job xxxviii. 32. With regard to the other constellations mentioned in Job ix. 9, it is probable that they are correctly given in our version. The word translated Orion (which occurs again in Job xxxviii. 31, and in Amos v. 8) literally means fool. Now this large group of stars does suggest the idea of a warrior, and it is called in the oldest classical writers "the strength of Orion," i.e. the mighty Orion; the Hebrew word is probably connected with the idea of the foolishness of mortal strength if put in comparison with the almighty power of God. The signification of the Hebrew word rendered Pleiades in the Authorised Version of Job. ix. 9, is a cluster; in all probability it really does here mean the cluster of stars which we, after the Greek writers, call the Pleiades, although the Vulgate substituted the more diffused cluster known to us as the Hyades. It is the same word which in Amos v. 8, the Authorised Version renders the seven stars, but the Revised Version more consistently again calls Pleiades, intended doubtless by the other as being supposed to consist of seven stars. With regard to "Mazzaroth" in Job xxxviii. 32, it is a word adopted into Hebrew from Babylonian; it is the plural, and literally means "watches" or "stations," and there can be little doubt that it is here applied to the signs of the Zodiac (as it is explained in the margin of the Revised Version), as representing the successive stations or stages occupied by the moon during her monthly circuit through the sky.—W. T. Lynn, B.A., F.R.A.S.

COMING OF AGE.—"I hear that the Queen has written a letter to the Prince of Wales, announcing to him his emancipation from parental authority and control, and that it is one of the most admirable letters that ever were penned. She tells him that he may have thought the rule they adopted for his education a severe one, but that his welfare was their only object, and well knowing to what seductions of flattery he would eventually be exposed, they wished to prepare and strengthen his mind against them; that he was now to consider himself as his own master, and that they should never intrude any advice upon him, although always ready to give it him whenever he thought fit to seek it. It was a very long letter, all in that tone, and it seems to have made a profound impression on the Prince, and to have touched his feelings to the quick. He brought it to Gerald Wellesley in floods of tears, and the effect it produced is a proof of the wisdom which dictated its composition."—The Greville Memoirs.

THE LADY ELFRIDA.

CHAPTER V.

HOW long she fled at her utmost speed, grasping her child as if she thought that every instant it would be taken from her, Ruth Redwood could never afterwards exactly tell. She had a dim, yet strong idea that she was being pursued, or that at any moment some one might spring out in front of her and intercept her flight; and this notion urged her forward, making her hasten on without knowing what way she was taking. Her only distinct feeling was that she had a chance of escape from the danger which lately threatened her so closely and that she must make the most of this chance while it was within her reach. Each tree seemed to her a waiting man-at-arms, the wind was filled, for her ears, with threats of vengeance. Every minute as she fled, she glanced fearfully over her shoulder, thinking that she caught the sound of footsteps behind her.

At length she paused, stopped by sheer weariness and want of breath; the child was no very light weight, and she had been running lately up hill. Then, as she looked around, she found that she had taken the path which led from the castle up on to the moor. She breathed a word of thanksgiving when she became aware of this, for it was the safest direction in which she could have come; surely an angel must have been near leading her and the child. The moor was on the opposite side of the old house to that on which the soldiers had entered it, and its solitary heath would not be so likely, as any of the more low-lying ground, to be chosen for a station by other men-at-arms who possibly might be in the neighbourhood. Moreover, if they came in pursuit, they would not track and find her so easily here in the semi-darkness. They had after all no idea of who it was who had invented the plan of the illuminated castle to cover the Lady Elfrida's flight, and they would certainly not know, as they had caught no glimpse of her, for whom to search to receive the weight of their vengeance. If she could be well out of the near neighbourhood of the castle before daybreak, when, if they saw her, they would very likely lay hands upon her as the probable criminal, she and her child should have a considerable hope of safety, God favouring them, as He had surely in His mercy hitherto done.

As these thoughts went travelling through her mind, she took courage, and having strengthened herself again by a short prayer, and refreshed her mother's heart by opening the mantle which she had caught up as she fled through the rooms of the castle, and in which she had wrapped the child, and seeing that the little one slept as sweetly as if she were in her cradle with twenty watchers round her, she set about thinking in the quick, calm, resolute way peculiar to her in any trouble or anxiety, what she should do. She glanced back at the castle, the lights of which still illuminated the night like a huge chandelier, and which was very clearly visible from the high ground on which she stood. She gazed round her, but could discern nothing in the gloom save the heather stirred by the night wind. She raised her eyes towards the sky, and saw that it was overcast with heavy clouds, but that the moon managed to send forth a watery gleam which would be some guide to her steps. She would go forward across the moor at once, following, if possible, a horse-track which was very familiar to her, and would hope to reach, before dawn, the cottage of an old woman, who was of the reformed faith, and who, being bound to the Lady Elfrida by ties of gratitude for many benefits received from her, would willingly, she knew, take her, Ruth Redwood, under the shelter of her roof, and let her lie there concealed for a few days. When all danger of discovery was over she would endeavour to make her way to her husband and the Lady Elfrida wherever they might be; she had taken the precaution to hide some money about her person during the time that she was waiting in the castle to see the success of her plan, feeling it needful to be ready for anything which might happen. Thus she would be able to meet the expenses of a journey.

On went the brave young Christian mother through the night, speaking softly now and then to her child, as though the little sleeper could understand her words.

"The dear Lord who walked upon the waters, coming to His own to bring them peace and safety, is walking beside us now across the heath, darling," she would whisper. "We need not be afraid. He is everywhere with His servants, both on land and sea." Or it would be of her husband that she would murmur. "Think my sweeting," she would say, "it is you and I who, with God's help, have saved father's life; you and I that he used to call his two jewels that he must guard with such dainty care. Aye, he will find out now, won't he, that his jewels are good for something else besides lying sparkling in a case."

Then, when she began to grow somewhat weary, as was but natural, what with the length of the way, and what with all the anxious care and watching of that night, she would revive her fainting courage with the verse of a hymn or with some sweet text, which was sure to come just as she wanted it, the very right one to suit her wants and circumstances.

"The King sends down His angels to bring us the gracious words exactly at the right moment, my blossom," she said, "it is the manna He gives us for the way."

She was out in the middle of the moor by this time, and was managing to keep the horse-track with tolerable accuracy as far as she could tell in the uncertain light. It was strangely lonely and desolate all around her; she could see nothing save the wide expanse of the heath, stretching round her in what seemed immeasurable expanse. Now and then there was a little silver glimmer among the heather, showing where a stream had its birth, or where there was a patch of moist, boggy ground, for the moonlight twinkled faintly on the water. Once she caught sight of shadowy forms in the distance and started for a moment; but quickly she knew that it was only a herd of red deer feeding quietly. She had been used from childhood to the frequent sight of them, for then, as now, they abounded in Exmoor and its neighbourhood. The only sounds which met her ear were her own footsteps passing through the long heather, and the wail of the wind as it swept ceaselessly past her.

She shuddered a little at the utter loneliness of her situation: suppose she should faint by the way, suppose she should lose all knowledge of where she was. Then she said to herself, and took heart as she said it: "God is all the nearer for man being far away."

Onward, still onward over the dreary heath, through the chill wind, through the night; onward, still onward, with faith and hope for her companions, with her child sleeping on her heart. Old memories came thronging round her with strange distinctness, as though to brighten with familiar faces and scenes the unfamiliar position in which she now was. There came pictures of her early childhood, when she sat on her father's knee in the castle library, and he told her sweet Bible stories; there came pictures from her girlhood, when Harry wooed her.

"Perhaps the Master sends the blessed spirits of my parents to bring me such images to cheer me," she said, and went on with a lighter, swifter step.

Wrapped about with thoughts and fancies like these, and very intent, as she was, on making her way onward, she did not at first notice that the night was growing much darker. Thicker and thicker banks of cloud had been gathering together, and spreading themselves over the sky, so that the moon, which hitherto, being at full, had been able to make something of a fight against the gloom and storm which had been threatening ever since sunset, was entirely obscured. The wind had risen, and was hurrying now over the moor in wild, angry gusts. A little rabbit went scurrying by, as if it had a dim instinct that bad weather was at hand, and wanted to reach a place of shelter in its burrow. A black-cock, one of the aristocracy of these western moorlands, soared up from his covert in the heather, startled by her tread, and darted off with a short, shrill cry, as though prescient of evil to come. A little way off to the right, there was a mass of white vaguely standing out amid the shadows, and Ruth, as she gazed at it, knew that it was a flock of the moorland sheep huddling together that they might the better withstand the shock of the wind,

"The Father, who counts the sparrows, is letting all His creatures know that a storm is coming," thought Ruth uneasily. "I must press forward, though to say the truth I am weary. It can't be so very much further to the cottage now."

So thinking, and soothing softly the child, who just then woke with a little moan as though she too were troubled by some inner warning of harm, she hastened onward speeding her steps which were beginning to flag; but before she had gone much further the storm burst full upon her, burst with a wild shriek of wind, with a fierce gust of rain and sleet, with a tumult in the air which whirled and raged around, lashing the heather till the dry stalks struck together with a dreary rustle, shaking the furze bushes around till they groaned in every twig like living things, until the lonely moor was all ringing and sobbing with a vast sullen roar.

Ruth Redwood sent up a great cry for help, and then strove to keep still in the track, which hitherto she had been following; she was no delicate, town-bred dame used to nothing but gilded halls and silken hangings. She had faced more than one storm upon the heather before, though in truth never under such circumstances as these. But brave and resolute though she was, the rain and sleet blinded her, the wind deafened her, the darkness enveloped her in its impenetrable curtain, she soon felt that she had lost irrecoverably the track, and was getting into soft, miry ground, which very likely might be the outskirts of one of those large dangerous bogs which are to be found at intervals in all parts of Exmoor.

She stood still, at first almost bewildered, almost ready to sink down then and there and give herself up as lost; quickly, however, her faith in God, her love of her child, came to her help.

"Master, Master, save us!" she murmured. "Let my little one live to praise and serve Thee for a while here below!"

Then again she strove to make her way forward; earthly hope seemed indeed hopeless, for she had entirely lost all idea of where she was; but the light of heavenly faith was with her still, shining amid the darkness and the storm round mother and child. She did not sink into any deep bog, but her situation grew each moment, she felt, more desperate. All at once she found that she was running up against something hard. Oh, joy! oh, wonder! it was a stone wall. She felt her way along it with her trembling hand, and at length reached an open door; she entered, and, with a low cry of thankfulness, sank down unconscious.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. X.

Who said "I know thy pride and haughty heart"?
Who from her daughter nought but death could part?
Who mighty Samson of his strength despoils?
The home of one whom Satan smote with boils?
Who did a band of Christians say was mad?
Whose heathen marriage made his father sad?
Who once unjust suspicion sorely felt?
A faithful martyr slain where Satan dwelt?
Before whose shrine did Naaman's master bow?
Whose son declared "Thy servant vowed a vow"?
Father of one who made two calves of gold?
The land where Joseph as a slave was sold?
Samaria's city close to Jacob's well?
What holy prophet did at Ramah dwell?

Now with these capitals a sentence spell,
Paul's charge to Timothy his son they tell,
Warning the youthful bishop he must fight
As a good soldier in his captain's sight.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE "church parade" of the Socialists at St. Paul's Cathedral had features of more than passing interest. It was evidence to all the world, as its promoters intended it to be, of the growing urgency of social questions. It was, moreover, with all its scandal and disorder, an appeal in some sort, though unconscious and inarticulate on the part of the majority, to the higher law declared by Jesus Christ; and it will be memorable for the manly and Christian spirit in which the procedure was met. The Socialists —if that name can be truly applied to so mixed a multitude —came from districts far apart, in processions with banners and badges; and were reinforced by a miscellaneous crowd. Every part of the vast building was thronged. One feature was the presence of three hundred children brought from Clerkenwell as representatives of the young who were sufferers because of the poverty of their parents. Every preparation had been made to give these masses of the poor and unemployed appropriate welcome. They were received with courtesy, and supplied with hymns and prayers. The service was for the most part conducted under continual interruptions, amidst a babel of sounds; but there was no organised tumult. When the words of the Magnificat, "He hath put down the mighty from their seat, and hath exalted the humble and meek," were sung there was an outburst of cheering, which gave way to jeers at the verse, "He hath filled the hungry with good things, and the rich He hath sent empty away."

Archdeacon Gifford, who preached, took for his text Prov. xxii. 2, "The rich and the poor meet together: the Lord is the maker of them all." He said that these words were "true for all time; true for Israel, true for England; never more true than in our own day." But when presently he went on to state that "in every age, and in every country, under every form of government, and every code of laws that the wisdom of man had been able to devise, there had been, and there must be, the rich and the poor," he was met by a loud shout of "No!" and from that point forward was subjected to a running commentary of hostile criticism. Coming to another aspect of his theme, he said, "Mutual help was the first law of social life. . . . We ought not to be content with feeding the hungry and clothing the naked. We ought to try and prevent as well as relieve their misery. (Cheers.) Such efforts had not been wanting to any class of society. Those who could look furthest back knew best what an immense amount of good had been done during both this and the preceding reign, both by public legislation —(cries of 'Oh,' and hisses)—to secure the rights of the labouring classes, and by private benevolence to relieve their condition." There were signs of dissent, and cries of "We don't want charity;" but the preacher quietly repeated his sentence. "There were too many whose bodies, minds, and souls all cried aloud for loving aid, and happily there were also many in these days, more he believed than in any former age, among the noble, the rich, and the influential, who made it their happiness to devote time, thought and personal labour, to promote the welfare and relieve the distress of the weak and suffering." He concluded by saying: "Of the thousands gathered here to-day God grant that many may find cause to say 'the Lord is in this place; and I knew it not.' With whatever thoughts and feelings you have come here to-day, come again—('Hear, hear,' and a voice, 'Next Sunday')—to pray with us as often as you can. You will always be welcome. The doors are nearly always open; there is some service going on during most hours of the day. Here let the rich and the poor meet together to kneel before the same Throne of Grace, to join in the same praise, to listen to the same Gospel of Peace. So, in learning to love the same Heavenly Father, and the same merciful Saviour, we may learn also for His sake to love one another as brethren of the same family of God, sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty."

So great was the noise, that the sermon could have been heard but by a small proportion of the audience. Meanwhile a great crowd surged round the cathedral. A short service was accordingly conducted by Canon Gregory on the steps under the western porch. Then, as the multitude cleared away, the Socialist leaders rallied their followers; and numerous small meetings were afterwards held on their homeward route.

SOME aspects of the times have been made the subject of "A Remonstrance" by a party of London clergymen, "concerned at existing social conditions and conscious of their own faults." We give a few of their sentences. The following, they say, "are offenders against the law of Christ: —1. Possessors of knowledge, beautiful objects, or luxuries who do not share them with the poor. Owners of houses and parks, givers of dinners who invite to the enjoyment of their best those only who can ask again. 2. Women who carelessly wear fine clothes, without having inquired into the possible cost in a sister's shame or death. Bargain-mongers who forget that some 'cheap' things are too dear for 'human' use. 3. Employers who take their profit and do not concern themselves to know how the employed live. Men who think that five per cent. is a law of God, and that the body He created to be the temple of His Spirit can be fed, clothed, and recreated on a few shillings a week. 4. All who, having earned or inherited a livelihood, plead that they have no time to make friends among the poor, or to perform public duties." The contrast between the condition of the rich and poor is becoming unbearable in the light of modern publicity. "Many are driven to think that only by the use of force will the poor obtain from the rich the means to develope their capacities for knowing, feeling, and doing. We believe, on the contrary," say these remonstrants, "that by the use of force the poor would grow in greed and selfishness, gaining with the wealth many of the vices which have gone with riches. And our hope is therefore that the rich, moved to follow Christ themselves, may offer such sacrifices and make such personal efforts for the sake of their brethren that rich and poor together may be able to live their life as God's children."

THE Church Missionary Society last year organised a series of simultaneous meetings, which were held in more than one hundred and fifty towns. This year a similar movement has been attempted in London. On Sunday, the 6th of February, eight hundred missionary sermons were preached, and in the week following nearly two thousand meetings were held. Some of these meetings were held in the largest halls, which were packed to excess. There were also numerous drawing-room meetings, and many special gatherings for children. The ordinary parochial engagements of the week—mothers' meetings, Bible-classes, and the like—were, in some localities, all turned to missionary account. Prayer meetings were held. Literatnre bearing on the subject was also widely distributed. The result has been one which may unite the churches of all lands in thanksgiving. The week was one of hallowed devotion, and of rare interest. The promoters of the movement had expressed their hope that all missions proclaiming the gospel of Christ might be directly or indirectly benefited. Ecclesiastical claims, as such, were subordinated; and even the pecuniary needs of the societies had small place in the programme, the first object being to communicate information, and quicken sympathy with missionary aims. This appeal to the spirit brought, however, in many churches some of the largest collections ever known. The week was itself evidence of growing life and reviving zeal. May the impulse given be felt for months to come in many a field!

A THANKSGIVING service was held at the close in St. Paul's Cathedral, when the Bishop of Rochester preached a powerful sermon from the text, "Whence should we have so much bread in the wilderness as to fill so great a multitude? And Jesus saith unto them, How many loaves have ye?" (Matt. xv. 33, 34.) He urged that our responsibilities towards the heathen do not as yet, in any real sense, build themselves into the structure of our personal religious life. "We have most of us," he said, "no conscience for more than an occasional guinea, and a crown to an offertory. As for private or family intercession as a regular and privileged habit, not one in a hundred thinks of it. In the ten years ending 1882, one hundred and thirty-six millions of money had been annually spent in the United Kingdom on intoxicating liquors, and—it sounds incredible—one million and sixty thousand pounds for foreign missionary work. And it is a melancholy fact that in one-fourth of the churches in this wealthy metropolis no effort is made of any kind for either of our own missionary societies." But there was much to be thankful for, especially during the last fifty years. "Income augmented threefold, 800 missionaries sent out, 190 stations planted, new countries occupied, eighteen bishoprics founded, communicants growing, men readily giving themselves, the church becoming increasingly awake. Yet there may be reason to doubt if the deepest and truest ground of thankfulness to God is not for the simple fact that He has spared us for better things, instead of treating us as we deserved by taking our candlestick out of its place, when we suffered it not to shine as a light to the Gentiles, and a glory to His people Israel. The unspeakable patience of God with His own professing, slumbering, heartless, faithless people is to me, at least, a far greater mystery of mercy than His long suffering with the heathen world."

At Westminster, the Earl of Northbrook once more bore testimony from his own observation to the beneficent influence of missions in India. Herbert Edwardes and General Taylor, two of the most distinguished soldiers of the time; Lord Lawrence, one of the best administrators which India ever had; Sir Donald M'Leod, Sir Bartle Frere, and many others—these men were not only Christian men but far-sighted men, some of the best business men in the world, and they would never have given their approval to the missionary enterprise unless satisfied that those conducting it, did so on common-sense principles. Speaking from personal acquaintance, he could say that he had seen many missionaries, and many missionary stations of various bodies, and he had on all occasions seen that these men were doing a great work, and in every way were gaining the affection of the people.

We still await news from Uganda. A letter from Mr. Mackay, dealing with practical questions, has been received bearing date but two or three weeks after Mr. Ashe's departure. One sentence was read out from the pulpit of St. Paul's:—"By God's grace I shall hold on here, in the hope that gradually greater liberty will be allowed. Every day, or rather night, a number of people come for a little instruction." These are brave words, and full of faith.

From Persia comes remarkable testimony to the transforming power of the Gospel. Colonel C. E. Stewart, speaking of what he had himself seen, stated that on his first visit to that country, twenty years ago, he had found about 26,000 Nestorian Christians, and 25,000 belonging to the Armenian Church. These Christians were very degraded, and required missionary work amongst them quite as much as the heathen. In spite of the prohibition against wine he considered the Persians a most intemperate people, though it was their duty to sell intoxicating drink and not to drink it. In six small towns there would be found no less than one hundred public-houses, and it was a regular thing for the Mohammedans to resort to them and to get drunk. Permission was asked to close these drinking shops, but the Mohammedan priest said, "I will not permit them to be closed; what can Christians be but immoral and drunken? I never heard of their being anything else." When Colonel Stewart told Dr. Bruce of this at Ispahan, his reply was, "What you have told me only presents an inducement to me to go." Upon his returning there, after the Doctor had been labouring thirteen years, the contrast was striking indeed; he had never seen such a change in his life. He found that every boy in the town could speak English, and he was perfectly astonished at the wonderful work which had been accomplished in the short space of thirteen years. A church had been built, schools had been opened, and the pupils could pass an examination equal to that of Oxford and Cambridge. There was now a school of 116 girls. Mothers had been found so anxious to send their children to school that it had been necessary to tell them, "if you send them, you must send cradles with them." The public-houses had all been closed, and all the time he was there he only saw one drunken man, who was a Mohammedan.

The first session of the new House of Laymen was signalised by a discussion as to the possibilities of securing a larger measure of lay help in the ministrations of the church. Mr. Sydney Gedge, M.P., brought forward a resolution to the effect that, "it is desirable the legislative enactments which now prevent a deacon from engaging in secular occupations be repealed or greatly modified." This, after an animated debate, was approved by a majority. The object of this change would be to facilitate the qualification of laymen for definite church duties.

Among the many problems that beset great cities is the question how to provide healthful amusement, free from all contaminating influences, for the tens of thousands of growing lads in their streets. One of the latest experiments in view of this need has been an endeavour to make the gymnasium an adjunct to the Sunday school. We have not heard so much in recent years of "muscular Christianity," but it is evidently not yet extinct. This is a new development. In some localities the room engaged is temporarily fitted with the necessary appliances and opened only at fixed hours on particular days. One such institute, for example, exists in connection with the Devonshire Square Chapel. A contemporary describes a visit made to it one Saturday afternoon. "We found," he says, "the preacher of the previous Sunday, the tallest of a company of about seventy or eighty young fellows, all dressed in gymnastic costume of white, short-sleeved shirts and knickerbockers, going through a series of gymnastic exercises with dumb-bells, bar-bells, and Indian clubs, led by a German instructor. Climbing ropes, hand-rings, and a trapeze hung from the beams, whilst parallel bars, vaulting-horse, horizontal bar, jumping stands, occupied various portions of the room. After the exercises were over there came the tug of war and the running maze, in all of which the pastor took an active part." Such gatherings have been serviceable in many ways. They not only promote health, they provide amusement, and a safe and friendly rendezvous for the young of both school and congregation.

The announcement that boating is henceforth to be permitted in St. James's Park on Sunday, after 2 P.M., is another indication of the gradual pressure by which the sanctities of the Sabbath are endangered. The terms in which it was made are a curiosity in their way: "They (the authorities) hope that this arrangement will, without interfering with attendance at a place of worship on a Sunday, afford increased opportunities of recreation to those who desire to avail themselves of it." A deputation from the Lord's Day Observance Society waited upon Mr. Plunket, the First Commissioner of Public Works, and presented a memorial stating various objections to the innovation. Mr. Plunket declined to go into the general question, as one on which religious men held varying and opposite opinions. He saw no reason for cancelling the rule; but admitted that the subject remained open to discussion at a future time. It is urged that boating is freely practised on the Thames, and that nothing more has been conceded than has always been permitted elsewhere; but in this instance attention is asked to the official sanction formally given.

The Jerusalem Bishopric, which had fallen into abeyance, is to be revived under new auspices. The Prussian Government having finally refused to continue the grant made by Frederick William IV., in virtue of which the appointments were alternately German and English, and the bishop had oversight of both Lutherans and Anglicans, another arrangement has been made. The English funds, which remain to be utilised, will be supplemented by aid from the Church Missionary Society, the London Jews' Society, and other sources. The two Archbishops, and the Bishop of London have taken the question in hand, with the result that the Rev. G. F. P. Blyth, formerly Archdeacon of Rangoon, has been appointed the new bishop. The change, however, has not been made without protest from Canon Liddon and others.

The death is reported of Mr. Alexander Wylie, a colleague of Medhurst, Milne, and Stronach in the work of translating the Bible into Chinese. In early life he was a cabinet-maker: then he became a printer; and in that capacity went out to help on the mission-field. He soon developed remarkable linguistic power, and lived to be ranked among the first of Chinese scholars. Among his translations into Chinese were abstruse treatises on mathematics. His last years were spent at Hampstead.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

BY EVELYN EVERETT GREEN.

CHAPTER XIX.—BARBARA'S MISSION.

"NOTHING," SAID GERALD, "WILL INDUCE ME TO RETURN TO RUST AND VEGETATE IN THAT LITTLE HOLE."

"CELIA," said Barbara "do you mind very much giving up this London visit?"

Celia flushed a little, looked somewhat inclined to resent the question, for she and Barbara were not given to confiding in one another.

"I do not chose to be dictated to by Wulf," answered she, after a short pause.

No. 1723.—MAY 7, 1887.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Barbara did not look angry as she would once have done. She only said gently, "Wulf is very fond of you, Celia. He is only thinking of your happiness."

"My happiness?" questioned Celia rather haughtily.

Barbara came and knelt down beside her sister. Since a new sense of love and happiness had begun to steal into her own heart, she had felt more tenderly towards Celia than ever in her life before, and had more of comprehension and sympathy for her than she would once have believed possible.

"Dear Celia," she said softly, "you know what I mean. You know what would have happened if you had gone to London. And Wulf thinks—other people think—that—that it would not have been for your happiness."

Celia's colour had risen a little. Barbara could not tell from her manner whether or not she was angry; but at any rate she seemed willing to discuss the matter.

"Do you not think it best for other people to mind their own business, and to keep from interfering in affairs not their own?"

Barbara did not answer at once, but looked earnestly into her sister's face and asked, "Do you really care for him, Celia?"

"What right have you to ask such a question?" asked Celia rather sharply.

"None, perhaps," answered Barbara with unwonted humility; "only you know we are sisters—and—and—well I cannot quite believe you could."

"Why not, pray?"

"Because—because—Celia, dear, let me say it, for I cannot help having heard and seen a good deal all these weeks. You must have compared them in your own mind, and I cannot think that the comparison can be in Hector's favour."

Celia's flush had deepened now.

"And who may the other be, with whom I must have compared Hector? Your favourite Fergus?"

"No," answered Barbara, her glance not wavering, "I was not thinking of him."

"Of whom, then?"

"Of Mr. Leslie."

"What makes you drag his name in?" asked Celia with affected indifference.

"Because he loves you," answered Barbara softly yet firmly. "Hector admires and likes you; but Mr. Leslie loves you."

Celia was silent for a time, and then she looked up and asked with a sort of affected scorn, "And you think I am so suited to be a poor clergyman's wife, that you must advocate his cause? Really, Barbara, you are too absurd!"

"Why should you not make a good clergyman's wife, Celia?" she asked. "If—if you loved him, I am almost sure you would."

Celia affected to laugh, but she did not meet her sister's pleading glance.

"If I did—a very safe if, Barbara; and if not?"

Barbara made no answer; but Celia's face had said more than her words, and it gave her sister courage to speak more decidedly.

"I believe you will love him, Celia; I believe you are beginning to do so already."

Celia suddenly rose from her seat, and moved away to the window with hasty steps.

"I do not want to love him," she answered with sudden vehemence, such as Barbara had never heard before from her lips. "I do not wish to be a poor man's wife, or a clergyman's wife. I want to be rich and to live at my ease—it is all I am fit for. That is why I want to go to London. If I did that; if I were to get away from this place and from everybody, things would arrange themselves just as I wish. I had made up my mind—I hate to be baulked. Wulf had no right to stop me. I can't trust myself now. I don't know what may happen if I stay here; I shall do something foolish and sentimental and regret it all my life afterwards. And when it is too late he will find out his mistake too. Why will he persist in thinking me utterly different from what I am?"

Celia stood with her back to her sister and spoke with a freedom and rapidity quite unusual with her. She revealed more of the struggle that had been going on within her than she had any intention of doing, and Barbara's eyes shone with sisterly sympathy and satisfaction in what she heard.

With a sudden confidence that almost surprised herself, she said: "Perhaps he knows you better than you know yourself, Celia, or than we know you. I sometimes think that love is not blind, but very, very far-seeing. I think, perhaps, Mr. Leslie judges you more truly than you judge yourself."

Celia stood quite still for several minutes, and neither sister broke the silence, then she turned suddenly and came forward and kissed Barbara on both cheeks. It was almost the first spontaneous caress that had ever been exchanged between them since their nursery days.

"If I had tried to be more like you, Barbara, instead of despising and thwarting you, I should be a better woman than I am now."

"Oh, Celia!" cried Barbara with real distress in her tones. "Don't talk like that, please! If you only knew how ashamed I have been at the way I have so often gone on. I have always been so cross and hasty. You must not praise me. It makes me so ashamed!"

Celia smiled with unwonted sweetness.

"Very well, Barbara, we will neither praise nor blame ourselves, nor each other, but let by-gones be by-gones. In the future, I think we shall understand one another better."

It was with a softened feeling at heart that Barbara left her sister's room. It had been something of an effort to broach the subject to her; but she was more than rewarded for that effort, and felt that Celia's confidence would not in the future be altogether withdrawn. The ice had been broken and a sense of sisterly sympathy established between them.

A little time before, Barbara would have urged Celia to make it up with Wulfric, and tell him that she did not resent his interference in the proposed scheme, but she had learned wisdom and toleration of late, and was less eager to exact from others the demonstrations of good will that came so readily from her own impulsive temperament. She began to see that silence and forbearance often did far more towards smoothing matters down than all the urging and pleading in the world.

And Barbara had her reward. For one evening about a week later, when Wulfric came to pay his usual visit to his mother, it was evident that Celia had something to say to him.

Since his refusal to allow her to go to town, he had been regarded with great coldness and disfavour by her, and had had to bear much murmuring and complaining from his mother, who seemed to think that her daughter's future was being sacrificed to his caprice.

Wulfric took all this with his accustomed outward sang froid, yet it cut him a good deal, and the lines began to deepen in his face, and he looked often an older man than he had done less than a year ago when he had come home for the first time after his father's death.

He looked more worn to-night than usual, for he had had a hard day's work, and felt the less able to encounter reproach or complaint.

But as it chanced he had not to encounter either, for when he had seated himself beside his mother's couch, Celia came and stood beside the fire, looking down at him and saying gently, "Are you tired to-night, Wulf? you look so."

It was so unusual for Celia to trouble herself to make inquiries like these that Wulfric looked up quickly.

"I have had a good hard day of it," he answered. "It makes the evening's rest very welcome."

"Don't you think you are in danger of doing too much, sometimes?" pursued Celia. "You must not knock yourself up, Wulf; I do not know what we should do now without your wise, kind, capable head over us all."

If Celia spoke with an effort, at least it was not apparent. Her voice was low and clear as usual, but it had lost its intonation of languid indifference, and her face was softer and brighter in its expression.

Mrs. Meynal had a way of taking her cue from her idolized Celia, and now she broke in with eager insistence, "Indeed, no, Wulfric. My boy, do take dear care of yourself. I have lost one son; I cannot spare the other."

Wulfric laid his hand upon his mother's and looked at her with a smile.

"All right, little mother, you need not be afraid. No chance of getting rid of me. I am quite a fixture on the property."

And then he glanced up at Celia, as if conscious that she had more to say, nor was he mistaken.

"I want to thank you, Wulfric," she said, "for standing so firm about my journey to London. I am so very glad you did not let me go."

"Thank you, Celia," he said, rising and standing beside her. "It is very kind of you to tell me this."

She smiled a little.

"I was ready enough to tell you when I was annoyed and angry. It would hardly have been fair not to be ready to admit that circumstances had changed."

"And they have?"

"Yes. I would not go to town now for anything. I am most grateful to you for holding me back."

He stood by her, laying his hand on her shoulder in brotherly fashion, and looking straight into her eyes.

"Thank you," he said again.

Celia was silent, her colour rising slowly. Then she looked up at her brother, and said in a low tone, "Wulfric, will you sanction my engagement with Frank Leslie? He is coming to see you some time to-morrow."

Wulfric's hand pressed her shoulder with sympathetic clasp. He, too, lowered his voice, yet what passed was audible to the others in the room.

"What have you said to him yourself, Celia?"

"I said I would marry him, subject to your approval," answered Celia. "I would rather have that before binding myself. I trust your judgment of men and things more than my own."

Wulfric smiled the peculiarly sweet and brotherly smile that was not often called forth, and touched her forehead lightly with his lips.

"You love him, Celia?"

"I—think—so. Yes, I am sure I love him; but I wish to be guided by your opinion. I will not again go against your wishes."

"My wishes are that you may be happy, my dear sister," said Wulfric very gently; "and if I am any judge of men, Leslie is one to make you happy."

"I think so," she answered. "I have not known him very long, but I think——"

"That he is worthy of you," concluded Wulfric. "I trust it may be so. I think that you will be happy, and I am convinced that you will make the happiness of his life."

Something bright was shining on Celia's lashes; she said rather tremulously, "I hope so—I will try: but I do not know. I am very weak. Wulfric, I am very sorry I treated you so badly for so long."

"You never treated me badly, Celia," he answered with a smile.

"I did," she persisted. "Perhaps you were too generous to know it, but I did. I was often ashamed of myself, but I had not learned——" Celia stopped short, paused for several seconds, and then, lifting her face for his brotherly kiss, she concluded with almost childish simplicity, "I mean to try very hard to be good."

All this had passed so quickly that the mother and sister hardly realised its import. But when Celia turned away, and knelt down beside Mrs. Meynal's couch to whisper the open secret to her, Wulfric and Barbara slipped away, and as they stood in the hall together, Barbara could not help taking his hands in hers and giving them a joyful squeeze.

"Oh, Wulf, I am so glad—so glad!"

"So am I. Leslie will make her a good husband. You see we did her an injustice, Barbara. She did not give her love unworthily."

And Barbara smiled as she answered "No," and said no word of the struggle that she had witnessed. She would not betray Celia to justify herself, and perhaps Wulfric knew more than he chose to acknowledge. His eyes were wonderfully keen, and had a way of taking in a great deal that nobody suspected.

But the very peace and harmony that reigned now in that once divided household made the absence and the alienation of the missing one all the more marked. Gerald had almost ceased to write, and his few letters were short, cold, and unsatisfactory. He took no notice of his mother's piteous appeals or his brother's serious remonstrances. He was set on pleasing himself and going his own way, and he did not seem as yet to have tasted the bitterness that lay in the cup he was bent on draining.

Celia wrote of her engagement and begged him to come home, if only for a visit, to make good his acquaintance with Frank; but no answer was returned; and Barbara, who had once thought of him only with scorn and a sort of lofty compassion, longed ardently to extend to him that sisterly love and confidence that existed now between herself and Celia.

Barbara was learning how good a thing it was to love and be loved, and she felt that it was in part her doing that the home atmosphere had been so stormy in days gone by. She had never tried to smooth away difficulties, or curb the freedom of her impulsive speech, and with the eager generosity of her nature she felt willing now to bear all the blame and to do anything in her power to win Gerald back. If only she could bring him home, it would make amends for all else.

She heard news from Fergus that disquieted her. Gerald hardly ever went to Mr. Thompson's house now. He seemed to be making friends of his own and to wish to rid himself of the last link that bound him to the old life. So far as they knew he had done no work, and yet it was hardly likely he could support himself upon what his brother continued to allow him—for Wulfric sent frequent remittances, though almost against his better judgment, feeling it impossible to allow his brother to want for anything when he himself had enough and to spare—unless he had some means of supplementing his income; for he lived, so far as could be made out, in ease and idleness and luxury, and never appealed to those at home for assistance.

Barbara grew more and more uneasy as time passed on, until at last a bold idea entered her head. She heard that Mrs. Dart, the lawyer's wife, was going up to town for a day on business, to start by an early morning train and get back some time in the evening. Barbara went straight to her, and asked if she might accompany her upon the expedition, and whilst the elder lady attended to her business, contrive herself to catch Gerald at his rooms and secure a personal interview with him.

Mrs. Dart, who had petted Gerald from his babyhood, and had always hoped to see him a partner in the firm, entered warmly into this scheme; but advised that its real object should be kept a secret in order not to excite Mrs. Meynal or to give rise to false hopes in others. She invited Barbara as a companion for herself, and not even Wulfric knew that she cherished the hope of bringing Gerald home with her.

They reached London at eleven o'clock, and Barbara drove straight to her brother's lodgings. The day was cold and ungenial and the girl hoped that the artist would not have yet gone out, but she was hardly prepared to find him not yet up at half-past eleven, and to have to wait a good half-hour in his sitting-room before he made his appearance in dressing-gown and slippers.

He looked exceedingly surprised and by no means well pleased to see his sister, and his greeting was anything but gracious.

"So you have come up instead of Celia, have you, Bab? The Thompsons never told me that. Why didn't they ask me to meet you at dinner, instead of sending you here at this unearthly hour?"

"I am not visiting the Thompsons," answered Barbara. "I have come up for the day with Mrs. Dart. I came to see you whilst she did some business, Gerald, dear; it is such a long time since any of us saw you."

Gerald's brow cleared a little when he heard that Barbara was not staying in London. He rang for his breakfast, and invited her to take some with him, which she was glad to do, feeling that it made things more sociable and pleasant.

An undefined change had passed over Gerald that she did not like to see, although she could hardly have defined it. His eyes were slightly bloodshot, and his movements uncertain. He was pale and more thin than in old days, and his features wore a sharpened look, as if with the perpetual strain of some unwholesome excitement. His manner was restless, gay to flippancy, and yet to a certain extent embarrassed. He evidently had no suspicion that Barbara's visit to town was entirely on his account, and she could not help fancying that he would have resented it a good deal had he been made aware of the fact.

He talked fast and laughed a good deal. He made hasty inquiries as to mother and sister, but hardly waited for a reply, rattling on about Celia's engagement and affecting a mighty sense of amusement at the choice she had finally made. He seemed to have no appetite, and only played with his food. Body and mind seemed alike in a state of unsatisfactory tension.

Barbara let him talk till he had pretty well exhausted his store of subjects, and had tired himself withal. He lighted a cigar then, and she drew her chair to the fire and nerved herself to the effort she had come to make.

"Gerald," she began with a certain abruptness that was almost inevitable under the circumstances, "I want you to go home with me to-day, if you will."

He stared at her in undisguised amazement.

"Why?"

"Because we all want you back. Because you never come when you are asked; and because our mother is pining for a sight of you, and is fretting herself ill on your account."

"Mother is always fretting herself ill about something," answered Gerald coolly. "There is no reason why she should worry herself about me."

"But she does worry. Do come, Gerald."

"Not I, Barbara," he answered, his face hardening, as it had never hardened in old days. "I was turned out of my home, and I am in no hurry to return, I can tell you."

"Not for the mother's sake, Gerald?" she asked, not attempting the hopeless task of an argument.

"Not for anybody's sake," he answered sharply. "I have tasted freedom and life here, and nothing will induce me to return to rust and vegetate in that little hole."

"I am only asking you to pay us a visit."

"Which I decline to do. You all conspired to drive me from home—you, Barbara, and Wulfric together made a nice home for me between you—and now you want to whistle me back, and I refuse to come."

It was in vain that Barbara pleaded. Gerald remained obdurate, and at last refused to listen any longer. He turned fierce and resentful, and she saw that more harm than good would be done by prolonging the interview. Gerald too looked impatiently at the clock as if he wished her gone. So Barbara, grieved and disappointed, took her leave, and joined Mrs. Dart at the friend's house where they had arranged to meet.

That good lady was sadly put out and troubled by the account the girl gave of her unsuccessful mission, and of the way in which Gerald had impressed her.

The journey home in the short fading daylight was silent and rather gloomy. Mrs. Dart shared in Barbara's depression: but she did not know that the thought which most troubled the girl's mind was this: "If I had been different in old days; if I had been more patient, more good-tempered, and less scornful and hasty, perhaps Gerald would have listened to me now. Perhaps we might all have loved one another more, and the home have been too happy a one for him to wish to leave it. Oh, if only I could live those years of my life over again, how different I would try to make them!"

THE CRY OF HUMANITY, AND ITS ANSWER.

BY THE REV. HENRY ALLON, D.D.

"Oh that I knew where I might find Him, that I might come even to His seat! I would order my cause before Him, and fill my mouth with arguments. I would know the words which He would answer me, and understand what He would say unto me."—Job xxiii. 3-5.

JOB is the typical instance of human calamity. The book of Job is the epic of human sorrow. "I call it," says Carlyle, "one of the grandest things ever written—a noble book—all men's book. It is our first oldest statement of the never-ending problem of men's destiny, and of God's ways with him upon earth. And all in such free, flowing outlines—grand in its sincerity, and in its simplicity. There is nothing written I think in the Bible, or out of it, of equal literary merit."

How is human calamity to be interpreted? Is it a retributive thing so as to warrant the conclusion that a man is afflicted according to his wickedness?—This is the great contention of the three friends; because Job was afflicted, they charged him with wickedness.

Job had no other interpretation to set over against this; but his own religious consciousness rose up against it. He felt that in his own case it was not true. But the calamity came; of all men he was the greatest sufferer. God and His doings perplexed him, and he cries out against God himself. Was He not unjust and cruel in so pursuing a righteous man? On the theory of Providence, held by Job and his three friends, He was. And in correcting this theory God respects Job's instincts of righteousness. He does not rebuke Job for his rash conclusions, He simply corrects the erroneous principle which led to them.

And yet Job is grandly inconsistent with his own reasonings. He cannot feel that God is the unjust being that the logic of the circumstances demands. He appeals to God loudly and passionately, sometimes accusing Him, but more often with blind, instinctive faith clinging to Him. He cries out of his great darkness; cries "out of the depths;" cries to the God who is so perplexingly relentless, who is so mysteriously silent; cries against the charges of his severe friends; cries against the cruel circumstances that environ him. Could he but induce God to speak to him, to adjudicate upon his case, he would have no fear about the issue. "Oh that I knew where I might find Him!" His poor lonely heart cries out of the greatest desolation that a man can feel—the desolation of wronged and wounded feeling. He "looked for some man to comfort him, but there was no man." He looked for God to help and sympathise with him, but he could not find God. If only he could, God would vindicate him. It is beautiful to see in this poor buffetted soul, in the midst of all his bitter complainings and utter despondings, and rash and painful questionings of God's character and doing, such up-dartings of instinctive faith and love! It is the common mood of great distress;—confidence and despair wildly fluctuating; its complainings bursting into the midst of its prayer; its passionate cries for help breaking into quivering avowals of faith; both blending into adjurations of both earth and heaven. "Oh that I knew where I might find Him!"

Now this is simply the working of a deep human instinct; this kind of appeal to God, as a just and benevolent being, is as natural to men as the appeal of a child to its mother. It is a genuine human feeling, called out by every necessity of human life, prompted by its strongest yearnings, and satisfying its greatest necessities. Prayer is not a teaching of mere theologies, any more than a child's cry for its mother is a teaching of social philosophy. It is an instinct as deep and as true, finding expression everywhere where humanity is permitted to speak; where violence has not been done to it, where sin has not debased and blinded it. Prayer in a man whose religious life has been restored, is not a novelty, a mere product of Christian or of any other theological cultus. So soon as Christ takes off the fetters that have bound the soul and gives it freedom; cures the disease and disablements of sin, and gives it health and power, it prays—springs to its normal uplooking attitude; rejoices in its Divine recognitions. Prayer is no invention of religious systems, it is the natural instinct of human souls. Hence when great exigencies come, or great spiritual thoughts are quickened, the instincts of the soul are too strong for either materialistic negations or sinful passions, and it prays. Prayer is its natural speech. It does not wait to be taught. It prays unconsciously, from sheer natural instinct. In religious men, therefore, prayer is the natural resource in all special troubles. When calamities come and crush out the very heart of hope, they cry passionately to God and for God, "Oh that I knew where I might find Him!"

The history of Job is full of these instinctive utterances. At every turn there is some recognition of God, some cry to Him. In the first coming of calamity, "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord"—when personal disease and pain afflict him, and when his poor perplexed wife urges him, "Shall we receive good at the hands of the Lord and not receive evil?"—when his three friends reason with him, cruelly orthodox in their doctrine, he replies as often by prayers as by arguments.

There is, I think, something very important in this. If it does not attest the affinity of human souls with God—their natural religious instinct of likeness and dependence—what is it? Let us look at it. Prayer, as the untaught instinct of human souls; human hearts everywhere making their appeal to God. As if when all verbal exposition of sorrow became impossible, and all reasoning about it vain, and we have proved how little way mere words go down into great experiences of anguish, in how hopeless a silence we must suffer and struggle, we suddenly cry out passionately for God—cry out of a great darkness into a great darkness—for some help other than, and above all human sympathy, for some presence in the great loneliness which only God can supply. "Out of the depths, O Lord, have I cried unto Thee." There, wrestling with the fact, and the sorrow and the problem of human suffering, we cry to God for a sympathy that is impossible from men.

This tendency of humanity to pray, this natural cry and aspiring to God of human souls, is taken and instructed by religion, by Christianity, by "the Spirit that helpeth our infirmities," when "we know not what we should pray for as we ought." And God hears and responds to it. "I would fill my mouth with arguments. I would order my cause before Him, and I know the words that He would answer me."

I. There are circumstances and experiences of human life that extort from us this great cry of the spirit to God.

1. In the ordinary conditions of life, when we wake and sleep, and labour and rest, and hunger and eat, and feel pleasure and pain, and speculate and resolve, the sense of God may be dormant. We see the phenomenon, not of the soul starting from unconsciousness into vivid recognition and passionate prayer, but the soul maintaining its unconsciousness through long years, in the incessant reception of God's mercies, and in spite of their appeal, and of the urgings of the pulpit and of the Bible; as if nothing could induce the thought of God but some imminent peril, or sudden calamity—as if it needed a miracle to make the man recognise a mercy. Whereas the greatest of all miracles is the incessant care and untiring watchfulness of the great Father in heaven — the vigilant eye that is never for a moment averted, the sustaining hand that is never for a moment withdrawn, the outpouring bounty that is never for a moment withheld. The great miracle of my life is, not that in the course of it God should once or twice signally interpose, but that day by day and hour by hour He should sustain it in all its functions and energies—that breath should follow breath, and pulse beat after pulse, and all the delicate organism of life be preserved inviolate, both when we sleep and when we wake; that the muscles should at any moment be obedient to the will, and so every function of life be performed.

And yet precisely because of this sustained regularity and intensity of life, men lose the consciousness of there being anything Divine in it, and offer neither prayer for its need, nor thanksgiving for its blessing. This very divinity of our daily life, which more than anything else should impress us with the sense of God, more than anything else dulls it, and causes us to forget Him; so that religious feeling lies dormant and we eat and drink like the brutes that perish.

Were the religious consciousness normal, and the daily care and love that makes our life possible, to be recognised, what an urgency to thankfulness and love it would be! What a divinity is about us everywhere! What an intense and awful life of the spirit lies dormant within us! What a glorified life of Divine fellowship and love is possible to us! How little men think that this animal life contains within it such powers of unspeakable mystery, agony, and rapture, a Divine life of vision and love, and prayer and rapture!

But let a man suddenly have a breach made upon this continuous blessing—let his fig tree cease to blossom, and his herd be cut off from the stall—what a sudden revelation is made to him! His constant possession had made him insensible to its bestower. Many a blessing fills its niche in our circle of life, many a nerve performs its silent, unrecognised function for a long course of years; but let there be diminution of the blessing, disorder of the faculty, let health fail or property be lost, and what a new sense of God and of dependence upon Him is awakened!

"Our mercies brighten as they take their flight."

And then we cry out to Him whom we had not recognised in His gifts until they were withdrawn.

Sometimes, however, in the most undisturbed condition of life, the sense of the spiritual will spring up into mysterious strength; the most thoughtless has his moments of reflection, the most careless his moments of questioning, the dim sense of the mysterious life that lies hidden, and that none of the common things of life touch. Even the most irreligious is sometimes aroused and alarmed by it. And we feel somewhat of the nearness of God, and the greatness and solemnity of the soul; and the instinctive cry for God breaks from us, that He would solve the great mysteries of being, that He would help us to realise Himself. There are few men who have not so wondered, and felt, and yearned for God, who are not visited, haunted it may be, with vague thoughts and surmisings about God and the spiritual, who do not feel that life is more than food or raiment, who do not seek through great voids of life for the God who is above it. "Oh that I knew where I might find Him!"

2. But the cry is specially extorted from those whose ordinary enjoyment of life is broken in upon by some great arrest or calamity. The man of wealth or competence reduced to poverty; the man of warm and gratified affections deprived of those whom he loves; the man of lofty soul and keen sensibilities betrayed and maligned; the man of robust health stricken down in sickness—such calamities befalling as befell Job.

Even if he had not Job's piety, he would cry out for God as Job did; the natural expression and relief of his anguish would be prayer. If he had not a God to cry to, like Lear, he would rave to the winds. Human history is full of instances: men of notorious ungodliness and profanity, when great exigencies have come upon them—in a field of battle, in a sinking ship, in the chill of death—crying out for God.

All speculations about His being, all doubts about His interference vanishing like mists, and only beseechings for His presence and mercy heard. Often it is the mere cry of fear, no spiritual desire in it; but it is a cry to God all the same. Men may talk as they will about the philosophy of prayer, and logically demonstrate its absurdity, but the instinct of humanity will assert itself, and in great exigencies men will pray—often the scornful philosopher himself.

3. How men cry out for God in their moral awakenings;—when the sense of sin has deepened upon them, and the spiritual element of their nature asserts itself; when "sin by the commandments appears exceedingly sinful," and as yet the forgiveness of Christ is not recognised by them. How instinctively they pray—cry to God with "an exceeding great and bitter cry," a cry of more anguish it may be!—

> "An infant crying in the night,
> An infant crying for the light,
> And with no language but a cry;"

but yet a genuine cry to God; a cry as earnest as it is blind—"Oh that I knew where I might find Him!" It is the passionate appeal of helplessness to Almightiness. Light breaks in by-and-by; Christ is revealed in His saving grace; the prayer of ignorant human instinct becomes the prayer of faith—the human instinct, that is, is taught by the Christian revelation. The sharp and bitter cry becomes a gracious, pleading prayer.

4. And in men's manifold spiritual necessities, prayer is the cry of their religious life. The man struggling with his corruptions, his sins, his unspiritualness—often overcome by them—groping in darkness, and often wandering from the right path; fighting against temptation, and often yielding to it; yearning for spiritual fervour, and yet falling into spiritual deadness; resolving to seek holiness, and yet yielding to sin; struggling to maintain his faith, and yet overpowered by his troubles! How instinctively, how irrepressibly he prays: "Oh that I knew where I might find Him!" Only, in the religious man the instinct has become a piety; it has been instructed—the Spirit "helps our infirmity."

It is interesting to mark the workings of this great natural instinct in Christian souls. How everything in the Bible teaches it; how every impulse of the life within strengthens it; how every experience of life confirms it; until prayer becomes the very atmosphere of the Christian life, the medium of all intercourse with God; as unconsciously sought and exercised as are the expressions of love in household hearts.

The religious man does "come even to God's seat." He does realise the communion with God for which his instructed instinct craves. Prayer is more than a cry, an appeal; it is a communion with God, a getting near to God, so as to be filled with the satisfactions of God. He has "freeness of access," he has "fulness of blessing," and in all special needs he seeks teaching and strength and grace at the Heavenly Father's seat.

II. How does God answer the cry of this great human instinct? God has not given it to mock it. "I would know the words which He would answer me, and understand what He would say unto me."

There is a sense in which the instinct of prayer is in itself an answer. Why do I so cry to God if there be not a God to cry to? Why have I desires which only God can satisfy, capacities which only He can fill, a nature ever expanding and enlarging its spiritual desire as it grows to perfection? A thousand things make me feel that "a man's life consisteth not in the things that he possesses." And this in itself is a stupendous argument for God. If all fitness has its provision, if every faculty has its function, as physical philosophy itself contends, then, the fitness and cry of my soul for God are a presumption that there is a God. My nature cannot be a huge fallacy, a blank disappointment. I may and must look for the infinite, I am so made. Is there no infinite for me to find?—then am I of all creatures most miserable. If my relations to God are not real, my human nature is the greatest of failures, the greatest of all illusions.

And then, the world, the universe about me, attests the power to which I cry;—multiform forces, perfect order and harmony, an unresting, obedient activity, the forms and glories, and harmonies of the incalculable universe. Can I think all this without God? Are not these "the things of Him, His eternal power and Godhead"? I must trample down the strongest instincts of my nature, I must blind its clearest lights, if I deny Him. God is a stupendous mystery; but the mystery and the miracle of a universe like this without a creating and controlling power were far greater. My mind is so made that I cannot think it. "The heavens declare His glory, and the firmament showeth His handiwork. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night shows forth knowledge." These voices of nature answer to the cry of human souls; they tell me of the greatness and goodness of God. And when the cry of my human sorrow and want goes up like the inarticulate cries and sobbings of a dumb creature, they tell me that there is a great power that made all things. And we may not despise these imperfect teachings. Let Nature tell us what she can—and she can tell us much—and Christ will perfect her teachings.

The Bible tells us what He who made all things is. Taking our nature as it is, it tells us of the Great Creator as the loving Providence of human life, as the tender Father of His creatures, as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, as the pitying, self-sacrificing giver of the only begotten Son, with Him freely giving us all things. It tells us how God hears the cry of our human necessity, and—what only it can tell us—the cry of our human guilt. And as our sense of sin and of moral weakness distresses and disheartens us, and our prayer goes up, a great wail before God, "Against Thee, Thee only have I sinned,"—"in accents sweet as angels use" the Gospel whispers peace: "The Lord hath forgiven the iniquity of thy sin;" "I am come that they might have life, and have it more abundantly;" "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble." And in its fulness of peace, and mercy, and blessing, it satisfies every desire of my soul.

And God is continually answering the cry of our souls. In His works, in the Bible, He responds to the general cry of humanity; in the motions of His Spirit and the gifts of His grace, He gives individual answers to personal prayers. This is one of our most precious assurances; else His minute providence of life were impossible, and His personal love unavailing.

To such answers of prayer the consciousness of individual believers testifies in ways that we may not always understand, but the results of which we cannot mistake. It is enough that, consciously and blessedly, the light, the inspiration, the comfort, are given. Often He prepares us for the trial that He does not see fit to avert. And this is the best answer of all. It were a small thing to exempt from trial a feeble and effeminate soul. It is a great thing so to strengthen it, that the trial only more firmly roots it, only more spiritually attempers it.

In manifold ways of spiritual visiting, the tender Father, whom Jesus Christ reveals to us, visits His children, and answers their crying. And if we crave for His presence and seek it; if our heart pant for Him, and our soul tend to Him, He will be to us more and more our "very present help in trouble," "all our salvation, and all our desire."

Little do they surmise what they lose, who never pray—who turn no thought, feel no desire, address no cry, to the watchful and loving Father who is above and about them. Oh, the meagre, desolate, unblest life of the man whose spirit is not visited by God's Spirit; who enters into no communion with God; who knows no helper in his sin, no comforter in his sorrow; who receives all things and sees no loving hand bestowing them; who sees no world save that of sense, and realises no rapturous joys of the spirit; who is of the earth earthy; whose thought, imagination and heart are unvisited by the Divine; whose life is helpless and unguarded in the unconscious hours of darkness, and in the perilous hours of activity! How could you more reduce a human life than by saying of it, "It does not pray, utters no cry for God's forgiveness, no claim for his protection, no craving for His inspiration and fulness"?

If there be such a man amongst us, ought we not to gather round him and pray?—that God would open his poor blind eyes, and visit his cold, meagre heart, and make him know how great and blessed is that inner world of the spirit which God constitutes and fills, when He visits and blesses His creatures.

SOME ROYAL CHRISTENINGS.

FEW among the royal pageants connected with English history are surrounded with associations of more touching interest than some of the christenings of her after monarchs. The vicissitudes of life, from which no rank is secure, have been strangely exemplified in them.

To commence with the renowned Edward I. This prince was born on the 16th June, 1237, at Windsor, and was the first to receive baptism in Westminster Abbey after it had been rebuilt by his father Henry III. The renowned Earl of Leicester officiated on this occasion as one of the godfathers and to him was assigned the honour of holding the royal infant up at the baptismal font.

In the Eagle Tower of the mighty Caernarvon Castle, Edward II. first saw the light, and tradition points out a little dark den in which the good Queen Eleanor gave birth to her son.

Edward's christening took place in Wales; and in answer to the ever memorable "Ich Dien," of the conquering Edward, the haughty Snowdon knights, who had, as history tells us, "consented to take for their king a prince who could neither speak the English nor French language," sullenly imprinted the kiss of homage on the cheek of the unconscious babe and vowed fealty to the child thus unexpectedly presented to them.

The warrior King Edward III. was born at Windsor, on the 13th November, and four days after was baptized with great pomp and magnificence in the venerable chapel of St. Edward.

The ceremony was performed by Cardinal Arnold, and the heir to the throne had no fewer than seven godfathers. These were Richard, Bishop of Poictiers; John, Bishop of Bath and Wells; William, Bishop of Winchester; Louis, Count of Evreux, uncle to the Queen; John, Duke of Bretagne and Earl of Richmond; Aymer de Valence, Earl of Pembroke, and Hugh de la Spencer. Strange to say, there is no mention made of godmothers on this occasion.

Edward, the renowned Black Prince, was born and christened in the remote seclusion of the romantic Woodstock, where Edward III. and his beloved consort Philippa then resided in peaceful retirement. No unusual splendour attended the baptismal rites of this afterwards illustrious prince. It is recorded of him, however, that his infant beauty and strength won for him universal admiration; also, that the portraits of the fair young mother and her lovely boy were frequently chosen by the artists of that period as models for the Virgin and Child.

The baptism of Richard II., the sole surviving offspring of Edward the Black Prince, took place at Bordeaux. Born in the sunny south—"his first accents framed in the poetical language of Provence, and his infant tastes linked to music and song," yet evil portents touching his future destiny were whispered among the nobles and ladies of the court. These however in great measure arose out of the disappointment created by the death of his elder brother, who is described as being a "youth of rare promise," and who bore the favourite name of Edward.

Henry VI. was christened at Windsor, with great magnificence, while his warlike father, Henry V., was prosecutiug the siege of Meux. His godfathers were his famous uncle, John, Duke of Bedford, and Henry Beaufort, Bishop of Winchester. He was presented at the baptismal font by Jacqueline, Countess of Hainault, familiarly designated by King Henry as "Dame Jake."

The birth and christening of the only son of Henry VI. took place when that monarch was suffering from a severe brain attack which for a time deprived him of reason. The infant prince was born on St. Edward's Day, and baptized by that name in Westminster Abbey. The ceremony was performed by Waynflete, Bishop of Winchester: and the sponsors were the Duke of Somerset, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Duchess of Buckingham. The font was arrayed in russet cloth of gold, and surrounded by a blaze of tapers. The christening mantle in which the royal babe was received after his immersion cost £554 16*s.* 8*d.*, and was very rich with embroidery of pearls and precious stones. Within this superb mantle a fine linen wrapper prevented the brocade and gems from injuring the skin of the infant prince.[1]

The christening of another Royal Edward, the rival heir of England, was solemnised under the following interesting circumstances. This noble boy first saw the light in the Jerusalem Chamber in Westminster Abbey, which Thomas Milling, the friendly Abbot of Westminster Abbey, had given up for the accommodation of Elizabeth Woodville, the afflicted queen of Edward IV., when in her extreme terror and distress, she, with her three little daughters, her mother and the Lady Scroope, fled from the Tower by water on the approach of the victorious Lancastrians, and landing at Westminster, entered her name as a sanctuary woman, and there gave birth to her first-born son, afterwards Edward V., who together with his brother the Duke of York, was murdered in the Tower by command of his unnatural uncle, Richard Duke of Gloucester, afterwards Richard III. No splendid ceremonies were indulged in on this mournful occasion. The prince's godmothers were the old Duchess of Bedford, his grandmother and the Lady Scroope, his mother's faithful attendant. The kind Abbot charitably performed the office of godfather to the new-born heir of England.

The christening of Arthur, Prince of Wales, was an event of national interest, as in his person were united the rival roses of York and Lancaster. This magnificent ceremony took place in Winchester Cathedral, and Elizabeth Woodville, assisted by two of her daughters, the princesses Cicely and Anne, stood godmothers to her infant descendant.

Miss Strickland tells us that several untoward circumstances attended his baptism. The day was stormy in the extreme, and one of his godfathers, the Earl of Oxford, kept his royal godchild waiting three hours in the cold cathedral before he made his appearance. He was in time however to perform the part of sponsor at the confirmation; when taking the babe in his arms he presented him to the officiating prelate at Winchester high altar.

[1] When Henry VI., the last of the Lancastrian kings, was defeated in his contest with the Yorkists in 1461, Queen Margaret of Anjou fled for refuge to Scotland taking her son Edward with her. They were hospitably received by the Queen Regent at the royal palaces of Linlithgow and Falkland; and it was while they were residing at the latter place that a proposal was first made by Henry to unite the interests of England and Scotland by a marriage between the Princess Mary and his son. A far different fate, however, awaited the youthful playmates. The Lady Mary wedded a son of Lord Boyd, which marriage proved an unhappy one, and was afterwards annulled for political reasons, while the hapless Edward fell fighting in his father's cause at the battle of Tewkesbury, having wedded Anne Nevil, daughter of Warwick, the King Maker.

Then, while the king's trumpeters and minstrels went playing before, the child was borne to the king and queen, and had the blessings of God, Our Lady, and St. George, and his father and mother. The king, according to ancient usage, sat by the queen's bedside ready to give the united blessing at the concluding ceremony of the royal baptism.

The christening of Queen Elizabeth was the most splendid and elaborate in its details that was ever accorded to a princess of England.

"On the seventh day of September, being Sunday, the queen (Anne Boleyn) was delivered of a fair lady, which day the Duke of Norfolk came home to the christening. Te Deum was sung, and great preparations were made for the approaching ceremony. All the walls between the king's palace and the Greyfriars were hung with arras, and the entire way strewn with green rushes. The church was all hung with arras. The font was of silver and raised three steps high. It was placed in the middle of the church and covered with a fine cloth. Divers gentlemen with aprons and towels about their necks guarded the font, which stood under a square canopy of crimson satin fringed with gold. About it was a rail covered with red say. Between the chair and chancel, a closet with a fire had been prepared, lest the infant should take cold in being disrobed for the font. When those assembled moved forward in procession, the Earl of Essex bore the covered gilt basins; the Marquis of Exeter followed with the taper of virgin wax; next the Marquis of Dorset, bearing the salt, followed by the Lady Mary of Norfolk bearing the crysom which was very rich of pearl and gems. Last, under a stately canopy, which was supported by the Lord Rocheford, Lord Huse, and the Lords William and Thomas Howard, her maternal kinsmen, came the child in the arms of her great-grandmother, the Dowager Duchess of Norfolk, by whom this royal scion of her house was proudly borne in a mantle of purple velvet, with a train of almost royal length furred with ermine. On the right hand of the time-honoured duchess and her royal charge, walked the Duke of Norfolk with his marshal's rod, and on the left the Duke of Suffolk. Before them went the officers of arms. The Countess of Kent bore the train of the infant's mantle, assisted by the Earl of Wiltshire, the Queen's father on the right, and the Earl of Derby on the left; a procession of noble ladies and gentlemen brought up the rear. The Bishop of London with a procession of bishops and mitred abbots received the infant at the church door, and there, with all the ceremonials of the Church of Rome, this after Protestant Queen received the name of Elizabeth at the baptismal font. Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, was her godfather, and the godmothers were the widowed Duchess of Norfolk and the Marchioness of Dorset. On the conclusion of the ceremony the sponsors presented their christening gifts. The Archbishop of Canterbury gave the princess a standing cup of gold; the Duchess of Norfolk gave also a cup of gold fretted with pearls. The Marchioness of Dorset gave three gilt bowls, pounced with a cover, and the Marchioness of Exeter gave three standing bowls, graven and gilt, with covers. Then was brought in wafers, comfits, and ypocras in such abundance that every man had as much as he could desire."

The homeward procession of the newly christened babe, just four days old, was lighted on its way to the palace with five hundred staff-torches which were carried by the yeomen of the guard and the king's servants, but the infant was surrounded by gentlemen bearing wax flambeaux.

The most impressive, however, of all our royal baptismal ceremonials was the midnight christening of Edward VI. in the chapel of Hampton Court, when the future defender of the Protestant faith was presented at the font by his sister and Catholic successor, the Princess Mary. There too was the youthful Elizabeth, who, carried in the arms of the crafty and ambitious Seymour, bore the crysom for the son of her for whose sake her mother, the fair and unfortunate Anne Boleyn, had been beheaded on the Tower-hill. The Earl of Wiltshire, the father of the murdered queen, also assisted at the rite, at which he bore the taper of virgin wax, with a towel about his neck. The godfathers associated with the Princess Mary on this occasion were Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, whom she afterwards consigned to the stake, and the Duke of Norfolk. The font of solid silver was guarded by Sir John Russel, Sir Nicholas Carew, Sir Francis Brian, and Sir Anthony Brown, in aprons, with towels about their necks. The Marchioness of Exeter carried the child under a canopy which was borne by the Duke of Suffolk, the Marquis of Exeter, the Earl of Arundel, and Lord William Howard. The Princess Mary gave her godson a golden cup; Cranmer three great bowls and two large pots, which were borne by the Earl of Wiltshire.

Charles II., the first royal heir of England christened in the Protestant faith, was baptized in the Chapel Royal of St. James's Palace.

The hurried and melancholy christening of the youngest daughter of Charles I., who was born at Exeter, June 15th, 1644, took place during the civil war.

Two months before this infant saw the light, Queen Henrietta and the ill-fated Charles had exchanged a sorrowful parting at Abingdon, never to meet again on this side the grave. The poor queen, terrified at the threats of the Parliamentary army, afterwards quitted Exeter, whither she had fled for safety, and sought refuge in Holland, leaving her infant in charge of her governess, the young and lovely Lady Dalkeith. Under the protecting care of this brave and devoted lady, the little Princess remained safe at Exeter, till the arrival of her royal father, who relieved the city in person, July 26th, 1644.

On that day the ill-fated monarch gave his infant daughter a first and last embrace, and desired his chaplain to baptize her by her mother's name, to which that of Anna was added out of compliment to the French Queen. Lady Dalkeith, as the proxy of her royal godmother, Anna of Austria, presented her at the baptismal font, attended only by two or three ladies who were staunch loyalists.

Lady Dalkeith continued to perform the office of a mother to the deserted child, till the ruin of King Charles's cause determined her to escape with her out of the kingdom. Accordingly, with great danger to herself and her young charge, she set sail for Holland, which friendly shore she contrived to reach in safety, and soon after her arrival had the happiness to place the child in the arms of its exiled mother.

The next christening of great importance in our national history was that of our gracious Majesty, Lady Queen Victoria, at Kensington Palace. In honour of this auspicious event, the gold font was brought from the Tower, where it had lain long in disuse. The Archbishops of Canterbury and York officiated. The godfathers were the Prince Regent, present in person, and Alexander, Emperor of Russia, represented by the Duke of York. The godmothers were the Queen Dowager of Wurtemberg (the Princess Royal) represented by Princess Augusta, and the Princess Dowager of Coburg (mother of the Duchess of Kent, and grandmother of the Queen and the Prince Consort) represented by the Duchess of Gloucester (Princess Mary).

"God send her victorious,
Happy and glorious;
Long to reign o'er us,
God save the Queen."

A SYNOD AT NESSONVAUX.

BY A. MACLEOD SYMINGTON, D.D.

IT seems hardly worth while to write about what one has seen and heard during a week in Belgium, the way is so easy and so many go for business or pleasure; but I wish to tell of something which does not lie on the surface and which is of more importance than attractive scenery or vigorous industry or impressive architecture.

One word, however, to the tourist in search of health and natural beauty. After Antwerp and Ostend, Ghent, Bruges and Brussels, it is well to go on sixty miles to Liège, a fair city in the wealthy valley of the Meuse, surrounded by low green hills, with old buildings full of history and modern buildings that tell of prosperity and cultivated taste. There you are within a short journey of another handsome and busy city, Verviers, and the way between the two lies through scenery of quite remarkable beauty deserving its name, la petite Suisse. Even on the railway, every moment you are not in a tunnel, the eye is charmed with steep hills, rich foliage, bright little valleys and gleaming water; but it will not cost much either in time or money to go through these valleys on foot. At Chaudfontaines, in the midst of exquisite scenery, you may bathe in water from the hot springs. Leaving the Vervier road at Pepinster you climb to Spa and find yourself in grand healthy air more than a thousand feet above the sea. In the course of a short stroll past the Barisard spring, you get, almost before you are aware, into the veritable "Forest of Arden" of As you like it, and are finding "tongues in the trees, books in the running brooks, sermons in stones and good in everything." You may even discover, as we did, a melancholy Jaques watching the hiving of wild bees.

But to my story. Coming down by one of the delightful paths that wind among the forests, and entering Spa on the side next its Hôtel de Ville, you chance upon a neat little church and manse. A very handsome Anglican church has long been in view, but that is for the English visitors and has no direct connection with the diffusion of spiritual truth among the Belgian people. This more humble edifice has on its walls the words, "Protestante, évangélique," and one is set to think of the past and present of the Gospel in Belgium.

In the days of the Reformation, Flanders and the Netherlands enjoyed their share of blessing, and the Belgic Confession remains a worthy monument of a living and earnest church. But after Spain the Belgian church is the only one that I can think of as having been quite extinguished by persecution. In adjacent Holland, when William broke the dykes and raised the siege of Leyden, the struggle ended in favour of religious liberty. The continuity of spiritual life was preserved in Italy among the Waldenses, and in France by the Church of the Desert. But in Belgium, as in Spain, Alva and the Inquisition succeeded in making the profession of the Gospel cease altogether; the garden of the Lord was sheared close to the soil, leaving not a single plant. But the living roots—believing prayers and the history of faithful lives—lie beyond the reach of persecution, and the last half-century has witnessed a most genuine and interesting revival of the Church of Christ in Belgium. It is still small, and its work has not attracted general attention in the same degree as the growth of the church in Italy, and it is just on that account that I think the readers of the "Sunday at Home" will be glad to learn something of brethren who are doing the work of Christ, under circumstances of considerable difficulty, with a remarkable union of good order and earnestness.

Of the origin of the Belgian church there is little to be told: it had no heroic founder, nor did it owe its quickening to such influence from our own country as General Bentinck and Canon Gully carried into the valleys of Piedmont. From the time when civil and religious liberty were established in 1830, under King Leopold, those two great institutions, the Bible and the Tract Societies, sowed the good seed of the Kingdom, and the church grew up, one can scarcely tell how. Towards the end of 1837, a few friends gathered in Brussels and formed the Belgian Evangelical Society, and out of that there arose a few years later the church of which I had the privilege to attend the Synod last year at Nessonvaux.

Nessonvaux is one of the villages of the district called Little Switzerland, lying on the Vestres between Pepinster and Chaudfontaines. Its inhabitants, about a thousand in number, make rifle barrels, or work in factories connected with the large cities adjacent, Verviers and Liège. The ecclesiastical buildings—school, manse and church—are humble enough, reminding one of the old places of Nonconformist worship still to be found in remote parts of our country. Here were gathered the pastors and elders, to the number of forty or fifty, representing the congregations throughout the four provinces of Belgium. I shall not attempt any account of the proceedings, interesting as they were; nor shall I weary the reader with many figures. On the table of the Synod there was laid the forty-eighth report of the church's work, a document breathing the Christian spirit in every line.

From this report it appears that there are twenty-six regularly formed congregations, with fifty-four Mission Stations, so that in all there are eighty localities where regular Sabbath and week-day services are held. While the majority of the members have abandoned Roman Catholicism, there are not a few who have been snatched from infidelity, materialism, and gross immorality. It is in the great industrial centres principally that the work thrives, and the members are for the most part from the working classes.

Although the numbers are small, the individual members have, by the consistency of their lives, borne such unmistakable testimony to the transforming power of the Gospel that they have obtained considerable influence in the community. Family worship is held in honour in many homes, and in the matter of Sabbath observance there has been a marked advance. Shops have been closed, and workmen have abandoned lucrative employment in order to have their Sabbath free. One man, who was strongly pressed on this matter by his employers, met every argument with the answer: "I am yours through the week, but on the Sabbath I belong to God alone." The very first paragraph in the report was one of congratulation that, during the recent strikes, the church members without a single exception had refrained from taking any part in the riots, and, during that trying time, had adorned their profession by the meekness and sobriety of their behaviour.

Among the means employed for the extension of the church is the preaching at funerals. These are very largely attended, and opportunities have been found for addressing two hundred, five hundred, or even as many as one thousand or fifteen hundred persons. This is a peculiar feature of the work of Evangelisation, and great importance is attached to it as a means of reaching the Catholic population. We find among the statistics that the number of funerals during the previous year was 110, and the following incident furnishes a case in point, at the same time bringing into strong relief other aspects of the work.

At Barbançon there lived an aged Christian woman, a solitary believer in the midst of a Catholic population. She was on her death-bed, and through the drunkenness of her husband was reduced to absolute poverty. The lady from the castle went to her accompanied by a nun. She said, "I have brought you a little help."

"Madame," answered the invalid, "you can only offer me help on certain conditions, and I will have none of them. I answer you as Daniel answered the king of Babylon, 'Let thy gifts be to thyself, and give thy rewards to another.'" At this the lady began to weep. "Madame, I will say to you as Jesus said to the daughters of Jerusalem: 'Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and for your children.'"

The nun then interposed, but was answered after the same fashion in Scriptural language. The following day the priest made his appearance.

"You suffer much?" he said on entering.

"I suffer, but compared with the sufferings of my Saviour, mine are nothing."

He turned on his heel, and left her, not caring to hear more. She died a month later, and her neighbours, all Catholics, spared no pains to provide for her a Protestant funeral. They vied with one another in sounding her praises, each having something to tell of the holiness of her life. Both in the town and in the neighbouring villages women went from house to house announcing the hour of her funeral, thus ensuring a large attendance. In spite of a violent snowstorm there were nearly a thousand persons present, all mourning as though they had lost some near relative. They listened with attention to the Gospel story, standing during the whole service with uncovered heads.

During the year the total number of meetings addressed has been seven thousand. This means a great deal of hard work, but the pastors and evangelists have received valuable assistance not only from Bible readers, but also from members of their churches, eighty of whom conduct both Sabbath and week-day services. Besides these, there are many who help on the work in other ways—by visiting Roman Catholic families, distributing tracts, announcing the meetings from house to house, and by testifying to their faith in their homes, among their neighbours and at their daily work. During the previous year the sphere of labour had been sensibly extended.

The report of the work done by the Bible readers and colporteurs was full of encouragement. Many Catholics possess Bibles, and it is worthy of note that many of the new families have carefully studied the Word long before beginning to attend the services.

In the districts where the strikes occurred the colporteur had a special mission to fulfil, for socialistic literature has been diligently circulated, and those strange minglings of truth with error needed to be represented in the light of the Gospel. In many localities there is a growing distrust of the Papacy, and a corresponding willingness to listen to evangelistic teachings. In one district, where formerly the colporteur was looked upon as "the devil in person," there are now few families who do not possess a Bible or Testament.

Almost all the congregations had made new recruits during the year, some only two or three, but one has added six new families, another thirteen, another fifteen. These are obvious signs of life and prosperity. In some places young men's Christian associations have been formed, the members of which take an active part in the work of evangelisation, distributing tracts, helping in Sabbath school work, and accompanying their pastors in missionary tours.

The church has fifty-seven Sabbath schools, of which nineteen are for the children of Romanists. The pupils number two thousand three hundred and fifty, the teachers one hundred and sixty. One of these being asked the question, "What must I do to be saved?" referred the inquirer to some of the children, who gave him answers so satisfactory that he decided to become a Protestant.

Special interest attaches to the work of this missionary church in a mining district called the Borinage. There four congregations have been gathered with five hundred and sixty-six members, and the work for a time went on well. But it appeared that, through secular teaching and the pressure of extreme poverty in these hard times, the spiritual life of these congregatious has been nearly smothered. The Synod sent to these brethren a letter full of wisdom and warm with Christian love; and the offerings gathered at the Lord's Supper with which the Synod closed were for the relief of their poverty.

On the day following the close of the Synod a ceremony took place at Lize-Seraing, a manufacturing village three miles from Liège, which was significant of the relation which the church sustains to the large population by which it is surrounded. M. Cacheux, who had been pastor of the large congregation in Seraing, retired at the age of seventy, and a young Swiss, M. Chatelanet, was inducted as his successor. M. Cacheux, himself originally a priest, had spent forty-five years in gathering out converts from Romanism and infidelity, and closed his honourable and useful ministry by acting as moderator of the Synod.

The population of Belgium is about six millions, and while there are other agencies at work to counteract the prevailing superstition and secularism, this little church is the chief source of Gospel light and leavening. It has grown steadily in the past, and is growing with all healthful vigour to-day, straitened only by its own poverty.[1]

[1] The secretary of the church is M. Kennedy Anet, 33 Rue St. Jean, Brussels, from whom all information can be had.

Things New and Old.

Lord Ashley and Prince Albert.—An interesting passage in the Life of Lord Shaftesbury relates how, while he was yet Lord Ashley, he was specially consulted by the Queen and Prince Albert in 1848, that memorable year of revolutions:—"The Queen," he says, "sent for me to Osborne; the Fairy was ready for me at Gosport, and I went. The Queen was greatly alarmed, and so was the Prince, by the Revolution in France and the exile of Louis Philippe. They feared the continuance of commotions in England, and were desirous to know how they could exercise their influence to soothe the people. The Queen, on my arrival, expressed this sentiment very warmly, and added at dinner, 'The Prince will talk to you to-morrow. We have sent for you to have your opinion on what we should do in view of the state of affairs to show our interest in the working classes, and you are the only man who can advise us in the matter.' On the following morning, during a long walk in the gardens, lasting over an hour and a half, I discussed with the Prince the condition of affairs and the state of the nation. He asked me my advice, and how he could best assist towards the common weal. 'Now, sir,' I said to him, 'I have to ask your Royal Highness whether I am to speak out freely or to observe Court form?' 'For God's sake,' he answered, 'speak out freely.' 'Then, sir, I would say that at this juncture you hold a position in which you can render to the country far greater assistance than if you were its king. You can speak as a king, represent a king, without the necessary and inevitable restrictions of a king. Your presence, though formally different, is virtually the presence of the Queen. My earnest advice to you is that you should put yourself at the head of all social movements in art and science, and especially of those movements as they bear upon the poor, and thus show the interest felt by Royalty in the happiness of the kingdom.' 'What can I do?' the Prince asked, eagerly. 'On the 18th of May next the anniversary of the Labourers' Friend Society will be held, and if your Royal Highness will accompany me, first to see some of the dwellings of the poor, and afterwards to preside at the meeting, I am satisfied it will have a good effect. You should come in three carriages, and have the footmen in red liveries—even these things are not without their influence.' The Prince at once fell in with the suggestion." The plan was carried out, and everything went off admirably.

Dr. Arnold's Daily Prayer.—"There is a short but very beautiful prayer of Dr. Arnold," said Canon Fleming, at the funeral of Mr. Morley, "whom our late friend so admired that one of his sons bears the honoured name of Arnold. Dr. Arnold wrote it for his own use before he went into the school of Rugby every day:—'O Lord, I have a busy world around me; eye, ear, and thought will be needed for all my work to be done in that busy world. Now, ere I enter upon it, I would commit eye, ear, and thought to Thee! Do Thou bless them, and keep their work Thine; that as, through Thy natural laws, my heart beats and my blood flows without any thought of mine for them, so my spiritual life may hold on its course at these times when my mind cannot consciously turn to Thee to commit each particular thought to Thy service. Hear my prayer, for my dear Redeemer's sake.—Amen.'"

THE LADY ELFRIDA.

BY ALICE KING.

CHAPTER VI.

"WHY, who be you? And how did you come here? What be your business in my out-house? I don't like harbouring runabouts. Why, I declare you do look as scared and mazed-headed-like as if you had been blown in here by the wind last night."

Such were the first words which reached poor Ruth's ears, when sense and consciousness began to return to her. She opened slowly her eyes; and, not in the least at first remembering where she was, or recalling what had happened to her, closed them again; for she thought she was in her bed at the castle, and must be suffering under the delusion of a vivid dream, which still remained with her, even after she was awake.

"Get up, I tell 'ee. I ban't a-going to have folks lying about in my premises in this fashion."

So spoke the same rough voice which had first aroused her, and it was certainly a very real voice, there was nothing dreamlike in its tones.

Ruth re-opened her eyes, and again gazed bewilderedly around her. She was lying in a sort of shed, and a man, dressed like a small west country farmer of the time, was standing by her, bending over her with eyes that were both curious and suspicious. Then, by degrees, she quickly recollected everything, and knew she must be in the place where she had taken shelter from the storm.

When all had thus become clear to her, Ruth's first rapid thought flew to her child; the little one was lying on her breast wide awake, and catching, with her tiny hands, at a slanting sunbeam which fell through the door of the shed. The child, then, had met with no injury when the mother sank down insensible; she could recollect, now, having made a last instinctive effort to keep her in her arms, and let her lie safely. She thanked God, and then rose slowly to her feet. She understood, at once, that she must be in a shed belonging to some farmer who lived on the border of the moor, and that this man must be the farmer himself. She concluded that she must have wandered very far from the castle, as she was quite unacquainted with the man's face, and she knew personally all the farmers on the property of the Lady Elfrida's husband.

"Well now, be 'ee a-going to speak, and tell me what brings you here," began the farmer again, in his broad Somersetshire dialect, "or be 'ee as dumb as an old bell that have lost its clapper? It be seldom a woman be without her tongue, in faith."

"I lost my way in the storm last night," she answered. "And I came in here for shelter; I must have sank down unconscious, what with weariness and what with fatigue, directly I entered the shed, and then I suppose my fainting fit must have turned into a heavy sleep, for I remember nothing more till you aroused me, and I saw the morning light shine in through the door."

Her simple, straightforward manner and her sweet face evidently softened a little the rough crust of the farmer's character, for he said, speaking more kindly than he had yet done: "Poor wench, thou art too pretty a bit of goods indeed to be wandering about Exmoor in such a night, and with this blossom, which is as like thee as thyself reflected at the bottom of a well, or as the echo to the horn, in thy arms, What made thee abroad in such weather and at such an hour?"

Ruth felt that it would be decidedly unsafe to reply in full to that question, yet, still she would speak no direct untruth; so she said shortly:

"It was no evil errand that I was out on, you may rely on that."

"And why am I to rely on it, my pretty mistress?" cried he, with a return to his former rudeness of manner. "Because you have bright eyes and a nimble tongue?"

"Even because God blesses the going out and coming in of those who befriend the friendless, and I am friendless to-day, and you would make your own such a blessing," she answered quietly.

"There is more in that answer than in most women's words, my girl," he said, his tone growing once more gentler: "their talk is, in general, as a puddle in the summer time. Well, I will ask no more questions, since you have a mind to keep it very dark about yourself. There's no reason why Oliver Oatway should want to be looking into other folks' back yards, when doubtless he has a large enough one of his own. Belike you have received ill-treatment from some one who should have known better; or likelier still from your talk, it be thy religion which is at the bottom of it; the only way nowadays, if a man don't want to burn, is never to ask what his neighbour's faith is. I guess you are a gospeller. Oliver Oatway," and here his voice sank into a whisper, "would gladly enough have the blessed Book now at home on his shelf, if it wasn't for the queen and her priests, but they have long arms and long sight too, though the chief seat of their power be so far away in London."

Ruth's quick intelligence enabled her to see that her new friend, though he had given her thus a glimpse into his own religious opinions, was by no means desirous to compromise himself by hearing anything about hers; so she said earnestly but briefly: "If you have read the precious Gospel, you know the sweet text: 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me.' That text should speak to your heart to-day for my child and me."

"Aye aye," he replied, brushing from his eye what seemed very like a tear. "But I must not be standing here talking all the day. For this be my morning for going with the carrier's cart; I'll just go in and get you a bit of breakfast, and then I fear you must go your ways, for my old woman be one for poking her nose into everything; she do want to know the very brains of every matter that she comes across, and she'll leave'ee no peace, if she do find out you be here. It be generally so with women folk; they'd like to tear up the very roots of the grain, to look into the mystery of how it do grow, which be the secret of the good Lord Himself. So you now just stay quiet till I do come again, and mind you don't show a glimpse of your petticoat outside the shed, for if she was to catch sight of it, her tongue would begin to go like all the church spires at once, and every one of her gossips in the village would know that Oliver Oatway had a woman hidden in his outhouse five minutes after."

So saying, he hurried away, leaving Ruth to her own thoughts for a few minutes. She breathed a morning prayer of thankfulness that she and her child had been preserved so far in the midst of peril, and that she had been brought into contact with this man, who at least would not betray her, for his sympathies were evidently on the Reformers' side. Then she began to think of all he had said to her, and she recalled his words about going with a cart with a sudden flash of joy and hope. She was feeling so stiff and weary with all she had undergone last night that even her brave heart sank within her at the prospect of having to wander on on foot, and she felt as if she could, with difficulty, carry the child any distance that day; but what if her new friend would convey her a little way in his cart? First, however, she must know in what direction he was going, for she must not return towards the castle.

Before long the farmer was at her side again, with a basin of milk, and a large slice of brown bread in his hand.

"I've a-got it," he said triumphantly, "without her getting hold of a bit of the matter so large as a lamb's tail. She was a-rating of her serving damsel and a-scouring of her milk pans, and not looking to me any more than to the old mallard out in the yard; so I just slipped into the buttery, and brought out this here, helping myself to what I wanted without any more ado; and there she went a-scolding and a-scouring on, making so much noise, that she didn't even hear my nail boots on the stone floor as I crossed the back kitchen."

Ruth took the food gladly, for she had not tasted anything since yesterday evening; and as she ate and drank she could not suppress a smile at the farmer's description of his wife and himself. The grave cares of her own situation soon however again absorbed her; she began to question the farmer as to what he had said about going with a carrier's cart.

She found that Oliver Oatway united the trades of farmer and carrier; five days in the week he worked on his farm, and one day he put two of his horses into a large lumbering vehicle, such as the carriers of those days travelled with, and journeyed from village to village, doing the principal traffic of the country for some miles round. The village in which the carrier-farmer lived was situated on the edge of the moor, too far from the castle for Ruth to be well acquainted with it, though she had ridden through it two or three times when in attendance on her mistress. The chief road of the retired district ran through it, and the man's weekly journey led from thence to a little sea-port town.

When Ruth had gained all this information from Oliver Oatway, the hope which had just now started up within her, grew into a cry of joy, and thankfulness. The road to the sea-coast lay exactly in a different direction from the castle, and the sea-coast was exactly what she wanted to reach as quickly as she could. She asked the carrier, at once, whether he would give her for the whole journey to the sea-port a place inside his waggon, adding that she would pay him liberally for the service. He granted her request immediately, refusing, however, to receive payment for the act of kindness done to the lonely young mother and child, and only stipulating that Ruth should walk on a little distance from the village, so that there should be no chance of his wife, or any of her female friends seeing her get into the cart.

"Oliver Oatway be no coward," he said, in conclusion, "as you'll find out may-hap, my pretty mistress, before you've a-been long under his care. I was a sailor in days gone by, but I'd rather face the whole Spanish fleet, than a battery from the tongues of our goodies. There they'd be, a-hanging their heads and caps out of every window, if I was to drive down the village street with you in my cart, making as great a wonder of it as if I was driving a camel, such as we do read of in the days of Abraham. So you just follow yonder path that skirts the outside of the village, and I'll pick you up where it joins the road, and the gossips will know no more about it than they know what is going on at this moment in Jerusalem."

Soon after that Ruth and her child were nestling warmly in a bundle of fresh straw which Oliver had placed for their accommodation at the bottom of the rude cart, surrounded by the strange confused mass of luggage which it contained. There was a packet of huge, weighty books for the minister of the next parish; a cask of rare wine for the old squire, whose manor house they would soon pass; a bag of curious herbs sent by one notable housewife to another; a basket, through the wicker-work of which peeped the scarlet hood of a village beauty; a stag-hound pup travelling from kennel to kennel; a bale of home-spun linen for which a dame had found a customer; and a granny's bottle of cordial.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XI.

Who brought four other kings to help him fight,
When he went forth the Gibeonites to smite?
What mountain was the last which Moses trod
Before he passed from earth to dwell with God?
A plain through which a new-made king should tread,
There meet three men, and take two loaves of bread?
Who answered David in his sad despair,
"Where the king goes his servant will be there"?
Who, when his threshing-floor and wheat were sold,
Received six hundred shekels weight of gold?
One who had shared with Paul in toil and strife,
Whose name is written in the "Book of Life"?
What wooded hill concealed a hunted band
When flying from a king's revengeful hand?

Take all the answers now and set them down,
Initial letters name a Syrian town
Where Paul by Barnabas at first was brought,
And stayed a year among the church and taught.
And final letters spell that city's name
Where Paul, just after leaving Athens, came;
There God appeared and bid him not to fear,
"But speak," said He, "I have much people here."

THE QUEEN OF NAVARRE:

SOME INCIDENTS IN THE LIFE OF JEANNE D'ALBRET.

BY E J WHATELY.

CHAPTER I.

THE CASTLE OF PAU.

THE traveller who has sojourned at Pau will not easily forget the noble old castle of the Kings of Navarre which crowns the height above the town, and commands so striking a view of the picturesque old city, the beautiful river Gave, the wooded coteaux beyond, and the magnificent chain of Pyrenean snow-peaks bounding the horizon. This castle bears still the name of that King Henri IV. whose memory is yet remembered with respect and affection; but it is no less closely connected with the memory of his illustrious mother, Jeanne d'Albret, one of the most remarkable of distinguished women who play so important a part in the history of the Reformation struggles in the sixteenth century.

None of these deserve a more honoured place than the mother of Henri IV. There seems to have been a unity of purpose and singleness of heart in her that we see in very few of the remarkable personages of that or indeed of any time. Few sovereigns have accomplished more and under greater difficulties than she did in her eventful and troubled life of little more than forty years.

She was the only surviving child of Henri d'Albret, King of Navarre, and of Marguerite, sister of Francis I., King of France, one of the most distinguished women of the time. The beauty, accomplishments, learning and talents, of Marguerite gave her great influence both at her brother's court and in her own kingdom: influence which, in spite of a strong taint of worldliness which we do not see in her daughter, was on the whole well employed.

Jeanne, a fragile and delicate but intelligent and precocious child, was carefully brought up under her mother's directions, though not under her eye; her education was the best the resources of the time afforded; she was well instructed in ancient and modern languages, and early manifested powers of mind of no common order. While still a child of twelve years old, she was contracted, by the desire of her uncle Francis I., to the young Duke of Cleves. This marriage was exceedingly repugnant to her; the idea of leaving her country and going to live in Germany, then regarded in France as a land of savages, was dreadful to her. Her parents themselves disliked the match, but Marguerite was afraid of displeasing her brother the King. She tried to object on the ground of her child's youth and delicate health; but finally she yielded, and even corrected her daughter for repining. The poor child, after consoling herself by writing solemn protests against the marriage, which she concealed in her jewel-box, at last submitted. She was arrayed for the occasion in a dress so heavy with gold, silver and jewels, that she was unable to walk, and had to be carried to the church by the Constable Montmorency. As soon as the religious ceremony was over, the Duke returned to his dominions, and the little bride was taken home to Béarn by her mother to continue her education.

For three years she remained there with her parents; at last the French King insisted on her being sent to her future home. Happily, however, she had gone no farther than Soissons, when the plan was frustrated, for the Emperor Charles v., having defeated the Duke of Cleves and reduced him to absolute submission, the Duke himself renounced the alliance: and at the request of both parties the marriage was annulled by the Pope.

Meantime Jeanne had grown up one of the most beautiful and accomplished princesses of her time. Her cousin King Henri II., who had succeeded his father Francis, planned a marriage for her to Antoine de Bourbon, Duke of Vendôme, a handsome, graceful and gallant cavalier, with frank, affable manners, a brilliant military reputation, and altogether calculated to win general popularity. He and the young princess became really attached to each other, and in spite of the objections which the parents felt to the extravagance and love of pleasure which marred the good qualities of Antoine, the wishes of the young people carried the day, and they were married in October 1548.

The festivities which followed the marriage, however, were but short-lived. Queen Marguerite died the following year; her health had been already undermined by grief at her brother's death. Her daughter's marriage had been very much against her wishes, and Jeanne's grief at the loss of a tenderly loved mother was increased by the sense that she had by this step caused her pain.

Her first two children—both sons—died in early infancy. The third, the famous Henri IV., was born in the castle of Pau. The grandfather made the young mother sing an old national song, to inspire the new-born babe with courage and cheerfulness, and he himself administered wine and garlic to the infant that he might be a "true Béarnais." He was sent to a peasant woman in the country to be nursed, and being brought up in the hardy and simple fashion of the villagers, grew up as vigorous and healthy as his grandfather could have desired. Henri d'Albret, however, did not long survive his grandson's birth; in 1555 he died, leaving his daughter Jeanne undisputed Queen of Navarre.

The position of the young sovereign was a most difficult one. Her small hereditary kingdom was fitted in, as it were, between the domains of the two powerful Kings of France and Spain, each of whom ardently desired to see Navarre absorbed in his own kingdom. Henri of France was anxious to induce Jeanne to exchange her dominion for estates within the interior of France, which she could hold, he thought, with less risk of independence. He knew his cousin's resolute disposition, however, too well to propose this at once to her; he began by trying to work on the weaker character of her husband, on whom he lavished caresses and flatteries at first, and then made the proposal after the manner of a command.

Antoine, unwilling to consent and afraid to refuse, was only too glad to refer all to his wife, who was in fact the real ruler. She was indignant at the plot which had been formed against her kingdom, but dared not oppose it openly in her undefended position. She declared she must appeal to the States of Béarn, without whose consent she could do nothing. The French king made no objection to this; but sent messengers secretly instructed to try and entice the Béarnais to consent by brilliant offers. Jeanne, however, guessed what he was about to attempt, and took care to be beforehand with him in warning the most trustworthy and influential of her subjects of the intrigues carried on. She hastened to Béarn, and was there received with the warmest demonstrations of affection.

Meanwhile, the French agents had found a fitting tool in the Bishop of Mende, who was Chancellor of Navarre. He tried to find accomplices in his evil schemes; but happily, the first person he chose was a faithful subject of the Queen, an influential nobleman, the Baron Bernard d'Arros, who had been forewarned by his mistress. He listened silently to all the details of the plot, and then assembled the nobles and disclosed the whole to them. The country was in a flame: the treacherous bishop had to fly for his life, towns and castles were fortified, and the whole kingdom of Navarre was on its defence. The French king was obliged to yield, and Jeanne and her husband were solemnly crowned in their own realm.

The danger was arrested for the time; but the French court was still on the alert to gain the desired end. A pretext was soon found for fresh intrigues in the religious movement which was now rapidly spreading through France. The violence of persecution had only increased the zeal of the followers of the Reformed doctrines; missionaries were active in all the provinces of France, speaking, preaching, and distributing the books which were constantly issuing from the press in Geneva, Lausanne, and Neuchâtel.

Queen Marguerite had always been a friend to the Reformed religion; she had not had the courage or singleness of purpose which would have led her to break openly with Rome; but she had privately attended the preachings of the Reformed ministers, and made her kingdom an asylum for all who were persecuted for their faith. She had brought up her daughter in the same sentiments; but at this early period Jeanne, like her mother, was still inclined to compromise matters. She was very reserved in the expression of her own views, and even held back her husband, who had declared himself an open supporter of the Reformation, from pressing forward with the ardour to which his impulsive nature inclined him.

It was truly a case of "The last shall be first, and the first shall be last." At this early period, a looker-on would have said the husband was more advanced in his religious views, and more courageous in supporting the truth than the wife. A few years sufficed to show that Antoine's mind was like the "stony ground" in the parable; his religious feelings sprang up quickly, but they were only the result of impulse; and the first strong temptation overcame them all. Jeanne's religion was of slower growth, but all her sentiments were deep-rooted; and ultimately her faith was able to stand storms under which weaker convictions would have succumbed.

Meanwhile, she was devoted to her maternal duties. She watched sedulously over the training, physical, mental, and moral, of her young son; and as soon as he was of an age to be instructed, she placed him under the care of an excellent tutor, La Gaucherie.

Only one other of her five children had survived infancy, a daughter, Catherine; she also was carefully trained under her mother's eye. Jeanne was an admirable and most watchful and devoted ruler of her little kingdom, whose inhabitants regarded her with enthusiastic affection.

Meantime that kingdom was exposed to danger from the war which had broken out between Spain and France. Spain was as eager to recover the part of Navarre which had formerly belonged to her, as France was to absorb the whole. Jeanne and her husband saw the necessity of taking up arms in defence of their territory; but Antoine, vacillating and fond of pleasure, stayed at Paris absorbed in dissipation, instead of placing himself at the head of his troops. The Lord of Berrie took the lead in his stead, passed the frontier, and laid siege to Fontarabia; but the winter rains came on with such fury that the roads became impracticable; supplies were cut off, the troops suffered from sickness, and the enterprise was cut short without a blow being struck. It was afterwards known as "the wet war" (la guerre mouillée).

Peace was soon after concluded between France and Spain, on terms much more advantageous to the latter country than the former. The treaty of Cateau-Cambresis was signed, and as a pledge of union, Henri II. gave his eldest daughter Elizabeth, a girl of fourteen, in marriage to Philip II. of Spain. The poor child was called "the Princess of the Peace;" but to her the union was productive of nothing but misery; the policy of her father sacrificed her to a husband who knew neither love, conscience, or pity.

The treaty of Cateau-Cambresis had done more than increase the territories of Spain: it bound the kings of the two countries to work in common for an object almost equally desired by both: namely, the extirpation of "heresy." The Inquisition, hitherto only active in Spain, was now to work north of the Pyrenees, to add force to the persecutions already carried on with sufficiently unrelenting cruelty against the Protestants of France. But, as often happened, persecution seemed to lend fresh energy to the suffering Reformed Church. The zeal and earnestness of the Protestant preacher were not damped, and those who were called on to suffer for their faith displayed a true martyr spirit. The Reformed Church now began to organise its constitution, and convoked a synod at Paris two months after the declaration of war against all who followed the "new way."

Antoine de Bourbon, who had been drawn to Paris by the intrigues of those employed by Henri II.'s queen, the celebrated Catherine de Medici, was now chosen to accompany the new Queen of Spain to the frontier, where she was to be solemnly consigned to the commissioners sent to meet her by Philip. The Spanish deputies wished that this ceremony should take place at Pignon, on the point where Upper and Lower Navarre meet, and which they had seized in a former war. Jeanne considered that her frontier was legally that which separated Upper Navarre from Castile, and therefore insisted on going farther. The bad weather obliged them to stop at Roncevaux, but the King and Queen of Navarre made a distinct declaration that they were in fact giving up the young queen to Spain "in the interior of their own kingdom." This was afterwards remembered against them by Philip. The ceremony took place in the Abbey of Roncevaux and was celebrated with great pomp.

the Cardinal of Toledo and the Bishop of Burgos, in a severe and harsh tone, pronounced in Latin, as their sole discourse, these verses of the 45th Psalm: "Hearken, O daughter, and consider; . . . forget thine own people, and thy father's house. So shall the king desire thy beauty, for he is thy lord, and worship thou him." Like most highly educated young ladies of the time, the bride was familiar with Latin: these words sounded in her ears like a funeral knell. Terror seized the poor young creature, and she fell fainting into the arms of Jeanne. The Queen of Navarre (her cousin) had been her godmother; she had always called her "aunt," and an intimate and warm friendship united the two; the parting with this the last of her friends in her own country, was a very sorrowful one, and having taken a tender leave of her and all her family, the unhappy bride was delivered up to her stern guardians and went, sad and resigned, on her way. The time was not far off, however, when Elizabeth had an opportunity of showing her abiding affection for Jeanne, and that at a heavy cost to herself.

JEANNE D'ALBRET.

Great efforts were now made to introduce the Jesuits into the State of Navarre. Antoine would easily have been won over; but Jeanne firmly refused to allow them to form any establishment in her dominions. She had a difficult part to play, and to keep her states in safety was sometimes obliged to curb the impetuosity of her friends of the Reformed faith, which caused Theodore Beza at one time to misunderstand her and ascribe to worldliness conduct which was only dictated by needful prudence.

It was at this time that the famous conspiracy of Amboise was formed by the Prince of Condé and his brother Antoine de Bourbon, to counteract the machinations of Spain and the Guise family. It was discovered; Condé was sentenced to death, and Antoine summoned to Paris for an interview with the king. A plot was fabricated there to destroy him; the king was to use language so insulting as to provoke Antoine to retaliate and to speak or act in such a manner as to afford a pretext for his enemies falling on him and killing him on the spot. The plot was discovered and revealed to Antoine, and for once his better spirit appeared; he went to the king, but conducted himself with such calmness and self-command that no opportunity was offered for an open quarrel. Francis II. himself, naturally gentle and easy-tempered, forgot to play his part, and the plan was frustrated.

The enemies of Navarre were not, however, to be so easily discouraged. An attack was planned on the country by the Guises on one hand and Spain on the other. They agreed to meet on the frontier and fall upon the little kingdom from opposite sides. The pretence for the attack was the act of the King and Queen in receiving the young Queen of Spain in a place in their dominions instead of on the Spanish frontier. Jeanne, however, had trusty agents always on the watch. She learned the plot from them, and made active preparations to meet the attack, both on the French and Spanish frontiers. She established herself with her children in the strong fortress of Navarreins, ready to defend it to the last. But the attack could only have succeeded if carried on in secrecy, and the discovery put a final stop to it.

Antoine meanwhile remained captive in the hands of the Guises, and the Prince of Condé under sentence of death. But the sudden demise of Francis II., leaving the kingdom to his brother Charles, a boy ten years old, put the government in the hands of a regency, and Catherine de Medici being now in power, her jealousy of the Guises led her to act in opposition to them whenever she could. This saved the life of Condé and opened the prison doors to Antoine. Catherine's policy was now to conciliate the Bourbons; she tried to win the King and Queen of Navarre by a show of warm friendship. The King, as usual, was readily deceived.

Jeanne saw clearly the falseness of Catherine's professions; but she thought it prudent to accept her invitation to Paris, and see the state of affairs for herself.

The tide had now turned in favour of the Reformation for the moment; the Protestant "prêches" were attended by the great, and again the court ladies sang Clement Marôt's psalms to their lutes, and Catherine herself feigned attachment to the Reformed cause. The Constable de Montmorency alone made a firm stand against the new ideas. He was too honest to feign, and was himself a strict Catholic and a religious man, after a curious fashion of his own, never missing his regular devotions, which he carried on in the midst of his other work, breaking off in the middle of a prayer to give orders to hang one man or shoot another, and then punctiliously resuming the Paternoster where it had been interrupted.

This pious soldier joined the Duke of Guise and the Marechal St. Audié in the alliance known as the Triumvirate, to uphold the power of the Church of Rome, and oppose the present movement in favour of Reform.

Meanwhile the unwearied enemy of the Navarre family, King Philip, was planning a new mode of attack. He saw that all plots against them would fall to the ground while Antoine had his courageous and clear-sighted wife beside him. The object of his enemies must therefore be to separate the husband and wife; and this was not difficult with a character like Antoine's. His marriage had been indeed one of affection; but all love for his wife had died away in his fickle heart; he had long been an unfaithful and neglectful husband. Jeanne knew it well, and knew that her enemies worked on her husband's weaknesses; but like a brave and patient woman, she had borne her anguish without word or sign of complaint.

Now, however, the evil reached its climax. The secret emissaries of the King of Spain whom Antoine, in spite of repeated warnings, persisted in retaining about his person, pressed him to declare himself openly a convert to the Church of Rome, and to seek from the Pope a divorce from his wife on the ground of the marriage ceremony which had taken place between her and the Duke of Cleves. That marriage had been solemnly annulled by the Pope; but a new Pontiff filled the chair who would gladly undo the work of his predecessor in the interests of Spain and the Church. Antoine was to be offered the hand of the young widow of Francis, the beautiful Mary Stuart, to replace Jeanne; and the Island of Sardinia, which was painted to him as a perfect earthly paradise of delights, in place of the kingdom of Navarre, which was to be ceded to France. Such dazzling prospects were too much for the weak and unprincipled monarch. The flame kindled by Spain was fanned by Catherine de Medici through her tools; and at last the whole was made known to Jeanne.

She had endured her own wrongs in silence; but now her children's welfare and that of her country were both at stake. She spoke out freely and fully to her husband. She appealed first to his religious principles, but this was in vain: he who had once looked on his wife as almost lukewarm in comparison to his enthusiasm for the Reformed faith, now alleged that he could not make up his mind which religion was right. Perhaps the one his father had followed must be best!

The Old Boatman.

I KNEW a boatman, old, and grey,
And when the day was o'er,
I loved to go and sit with him,
Upon the quiet shore.
"You've had a stormy life, old friend,
You've seen hard times," I said.
A smile dawned in his clear blue eyes,
He shook his silvered head:
"Why, take my whole life round," said he,
And gazed towards the west,
"There's joy as well as grief, you see,
And One above knows best."

"But, friend, the world is full of ill."
He looked across the sea:
"Yet if you take the whole world round,
There's good as well," said he.
"But how, when winter's storms arise,
And sweep across the main,
And shroud the sunny summer skies,
In cruel wreck and rain?"
"I take the whole year round," said he,
And gazed towards the west:
"There's shine as well as rain, you see,
And One above knows best."

HELEN MARION BURNSIDE.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XX.—AT THE HALL.

THE autumn at the Hall had passed peacefully and uneventfully away. Clive and Mrs. Dumaresq had both of them been from home at different times, the young man to shoot, and his mother to visit one or two relatives, who had pressed her somewhat importunately not to bury herself alive for ever.

Mr. Dumaresq had not felt equal to the exertion of leaving home, but had urged his wife to do so, saying that he and Reinée were quite capable of taking care of one another.

Reinée had had many and pressing invitations from different quarters, but she had not been tempted away by any of them. She was very happy in her quiet home, and her life was full of little cares and interests that had become more to her than ever the old gaieties had done.

So she and her father spent a great part of October and November alone together, enlivened from time to time by Clive's bright presence, but for the most part dependent upon each other for company and amusement, and during those quiet days, tinged with that nameless sadness that follows the footsteps of the dying year, father and daughter drew very near together.

Mr. Dumaresq had never been what is termed a religious man, and yet he had a vein of serious speculation in his nature, and a reverence for sacred themes and ordinances that both his children had inherited. His marriage with a handsome heiress that had been happy and prosperous in most of its aspects, had not resulted in any sympathetic union of souls. Mrs. Dumaresq was always ready to conform in all outward ways to the standard of conventional religious propriety; but it was not a subject upon which she cared to speak, and gradually her husband had come to be as reticent and silent as herself.

But since this illness had come upon him—this slow decay of strength that seemed to sap the very foundation of his being—Mr. Dumaresq had become more earnest in many of his thoughts and feelings than he had ever been before. He began to take new ideas of life, to look upon it from a fresh standpoint, and to glance in retrospect over his past life with a keen if calm regret.

And just at this time, he and his daughter were thrown together in a manner that had never occurred before.

Reinée had always been very dear to her father. He looked upon her as a sort of living embodiment of light and life and gladness. Her sweetness, her loving caresses, her happy laugh and tender smiles made the happiness of his life. He had always determined that sadness and trouble should never come near her, that she should preserve her childish gladness and gaiety to the very end.

He had never for a moment imagined that serious thoughts and deep convictions had ever troubled her fair head. He saw the sweet serenity of her face, watched her graceful light-hearted movements, saw that she was happy, and concluded with strange inconsequence that the root of her happiness lay in the fact that she had never required to think seriously of life or to trace out its complex bearings.

But when he had been left alone with her, and they had drawn near to one another, as those will do who are conscious of a subtle link of sympathy and comprehension, then he found out his mistake—found out that his child was far beyond him upon the road to life everlasting, and that her sweet unvarying happiness was due not to indifference and carelessness, but to the full and unclouded assurance of a Saviour's love, a Father's care, and the hallowing guidance of the Spirit of Truth.

Gently and sweetly and tenderly Reinée led her father whither he would go. All was very clear and bright and sunny to her, for she had never consciously rejected light and truth, and she could not quite understand the clouds and darkness that hung in the horizon of her father's sky; but her own strong faith and childlike trust did much to drive these clouds away, and the father was never weary of hearing from Reinée's lips the sweet and simple story of her own seeking after light, of the steps by which she attained her present peace, and how, in loving care and thought for others, she first learned to understand, and take home to herself the great sacrifice and victory of love made by Christ for His loving children.

So those quiet months were fraught with great peace for Reinée and her father. Clive's comings and goings did not disturb the atmosphere, for he was in sympathy and in harmony with their thoughts, and if he were more reticent than his sister, it was not because he was indifferent; and she knew, by a hundred little nameless tokens, that the talk they had had together one summer Sunday many months ago had not been forgotten or put aside.

They had not many visitors at the Hall just then. Juliet Granby was away, so was Gerald Meynal. Barbara was increasingly busy, and although a warm friendship and strong mutual attraction existed between her and Reinée, they did not see very much of one another.

Wulfric Meynal was perhaps their most regular visitor. Mr. Dumaresq wished him to come in from time to time, as he felt confidence in his medical skill and liked to see a doctor frequently, as many invalids do, even if he had not much to say upon an individual visit. Wulfric had plainly told his patient that he could not benefit him by frequent attendance; but when the other had asked him, almost as a favour, not to be many days without a visit, the young man had not the heart to refuse, and as time was precious with him, it became almost an established custom that on Tuesdays and Fridays—the afternoons he generally tried to visit his patients in the hamlet and outlying houses of St. Hilda—he should call at the Hall on his return and dine there, and hear Mr. Dumaresq's account of his health as they sat over their walnuts and wine.

This régime was not, however, regularly started until after Mrs. Dumaresq's departure. It did not occur, however, to anybody that she would object to an arrangement that was a source of real satisfaction and pleasure to her husband, and relieved the monotony of the week very pleasantly.

Wulfric Meynal was a man that required knowing, but once known never disappointed a friend or failed to repay a closer inspection. His knowledge was considerable, his acumen and shrewdness the same, whilst he had an appreciation of the humour of life and a keen sense of the ridiculous which made him capital company when once the outward crust of reserve had melted. Then his roughness of exterior concealed a tenderness of heart and a power of sympathy not easily surpassed, and his profession, instead of hardening him and rendering him callous to the sight of suffering, as is sometimes said to be the case, rather gave additional impulse to his intense longing to relieve the sufferer and destroy the germs of the disease.

If Wulfric did not make many friends, he certainly never lost one, and those he did make were warm and true. Mr. Dumaresq and his son and daughter gradually came to look upon him as a valued and trusted friend.

As for Wulfric himself, these visits to the Hall quickly became the bright spots in a rather sad and weary life. He did not analyse the cause of this; he was content to accept it without comment, and to take the good that fell to his share with quiet gratitude, as he took the evil with manly resolution and resignation.

Between Reinée and Wulfric a bond of sympathy and mutual comprehension had sprung up as it were very early in their acquaintance and only grew stronger with time. Single-hearted, and simple, and quietly in earnest, they recognised in each other qualities that drew them together, and now that circumstances were leading their paths to cross so often, they were learning to love one another without being in the least aware of it themselves.

Matters were much upon this footing at St. Hilda when Mrs. Dumaresq returned, her round of visits paid, to take up her abode once more at the Hall. It was December by this time, and the long winter sleep had settled down over the face of nature. Clive, who found Scotland too cold for his taste, came home likewise, and Arthur Trevelyan was expected shortly on another visit.

It could not be avoided without "a row," Clive told his sister. Mrs. Dumaresq would invite him herself if he did not: he must come, but Reinée should not be bullied if he could help it.

Reinée had no intention whatever of engaging herself to Arthur Trevelyan to please her mother. Greatly as she liked to do what was told her, and to give pleasure to all about her, and especially to her parents, she knew that there must be limits to submission and even to filial obedience. Her father she now felt certain would not urge her against her better feelings, but, if he fully understood the matter, might even take her part against the marriage, and Clive was certain to stand by her; yet Reinée shrank from the approaching contest with her mother, and wished that the visitor might elect to stay away.

Mrs. Dumaresq came back full of plans and projects for her daughter's aggrandisement. A return to the old life of social pleasures had awakened within her all her old ambitions, and had strengthened her former determination; other girls, far less attractive or well-dowered than Reinée, were marrying on all sides—some of them making brilliant matches—and people began to wonder how it was that Mrs. Dumaresq's charming daughter did not "go off." Mrs. Dumaresq felt a good deal of irritation at hearing such remarks, and blamed herself for having been so easy with Reinée, and for not taking a higher hand with regard to this tacit engagement. No girl with any sense of honour could possibly refuse a man who had been waiting for her for years, and that upon the well-known understanding that she would marry him when of a suitable age. Had he not been detained by the fascinations of travel in foreign lands he would have carried off his wife as soon as she attained her majority, as had always been arranged, but he had not come back for more than a year after that time, and then there had been an odd reluctance on Reinée's part to give him the least encouragement.

But things could not possibly drift on in this way any longer. In all probability Arthur Trevelyan would succeed to the peerage to which he was heir before another twelve months had passed; and Mrs. Dumaresq was feverishly anxious that her daughter should share the elevation with him.

So she came home full of plans and schemes, and did her utmost to excite in her daughter some of that social ambition that had been so vehemently aroused in herself. Reinée listened to her mother with interest and attention, when she talked of the visits that had been paid, and of the people she had seen and met; but she did not identify herself with the gay life that had been once so familiar. Her interests lay around the house and within it, and when playfully asked if she was not tired of rustication, she would answer with pretty eagerness, that she had never before been so happy as in her country home.

Mrs. Dumaresq was keenly alive to the increase of sweetness and gentle womanly dignity in her daughter; yet it gave her some uneasiness as well as gratification, for it seemed to indicate a quiet reserve of power that might not be altogether easy to manage.

Reinée, however, was always gentle, loving, and dutiful, and her father could not be brought to see that she was anything but faultless. He indulged her in every possible way, and nothing made him happier than being asked favours or taken into her confidence.

She was very busy now with preparations for a Christmas festival for all the poor of the neighbourhood; and Clive entered with zest into the project, and became its very life and soul. He and Reinée were as happy as two children, planning, contriving and devising; and the result certainly repaid their labour and forethought.

There was a Christmas tree for the children, and a tea in the barn; and more substantial repast for adults in the laundry, whilst doles were sent round to the sick, or infirm, that they too might share in the general enjoyment.

Reinée and Clive were in their glory, and by the frank kindliness of their manner, and the unaffected interest they took in everything and everybody, won golden opinions from all.

Barbara and Wulfric came in to watch proceedings for a time, as did also Celia and Frank Leslie, and Reinée was pleased that they had cared to do so, and watched with bright eyes and a happy smile whilst Wulfric went about amongst the children, evoking shouts of laughter by his sallies and funny questions. There was no doubt as to his popularity amongst the poor of all ages and sections. Glances of gratitude followed him as he moved, and broken words of thanks—broken because he always stopped the speaker with some question or comment—were poured upon him, so to speak, from almost every person present. Reinée felt a curious sort of warm, personal pride and gladness, as she saw and heard all this.

Arthur Trevelyan was likewise present, for he had come to spend Christmas at the Hall, determined not to leave until he had won from Reinée the promise she had withheld so long. He did not mix in any way with the people, but stood aloof as a spectator merely, and with eyes only for the fair girl who attracted him more and more, the further she seemed to withdraw herself from him.

He was not unobservant and he was not slow of comprehension, and he was intensely jealous, with the jealousy of a small and unworthy nature. What he saw or thought he saw that evening, gave him ample food for meditation and meditation of no pleasant kind.

But he kept silence and bided his time. On twelfth night there was to be a ball at the great house—a dance in honour of Reinée's birthday, that occurred very early in the year and was generally marked as a fête day—and he resolved that upon that night he would speak to her and claim her as his own. She must surely have forgotten the episode that had made an unfavourable impression upon her six months ago, and she could hardly refuse a man who had been waiting for her for so many years.

So at least Trevelyan argued, and was most careful of his conduct and language during the days that intervened. When she was his wife he would perhaps revenge himself for the constraint she made him put upon himself, but in the present it behoved him to act very discreetly and circumspectly.

Had Reinée trusted him or liked him a little better than she did, she might have been deceived by the outward show he made of sympathy and interest in her thoughts and pursuits. But she was too intensely sincere and truthful herself not to be very quick to detect the least taint of insincerity in others. Trevelyan's professions did not impress her as genuine. She knew enough of life to distrust the appearance of changes that came so suddenly and with so little effort. Convictions of a lifetime do not alter so readily as his seemed to have done. But to tell the truth she thought but little of him in any way, her mind was occupied by matters in which he had neither part nor lot.

Her ball, however, was a great success, and much appreciated in a neighbourhood where such entertainments were rare. Mrs. Dumaresq was gratified by the way in which everything went off. Reinée looked lovely, and her manner and bearing were perfect. She was just a little too gracious towards Dr. Meynal to please her mother, but as the young doctor did not dance but only came to look after Mr. Dumaresq a little, this was of small consequence.

The evening was over. Clive was busy seeing the last guests to their carriages. Mrs. Dumaresq had the little cosy inner drawing-room all to herself and was resting after her exertions, when Arthur Trevelyan suddenly appeared, his face as black as a heavy thunder-cloud.

Immediately the mother divined that something was amiss, and her face grew anxious as she asked—

"What is the matter? what has happened?"

"What has happened is that Reinée has given me my congé in most unequivocal terms. Is this the result of your boasted skill and influence?"

The young man flung himself into a chair and fiercely bit the ends of his moustache. His words were rude and his manner uncourteous; but Mrs. Dumaresq made allowances for him. Indeed she was too much amazed herself to notice trifles.

"Reinée refused you!"

"Most emphatically. She would not hear a word—at least words were simply thrown away upon her. She was—she was——"

"Not insolent, surely—to you."

Trevelyan laughed mirthlessly.

"Insolent! Do you know Reinée so little as that? She was courtesy, dignity and sweetness itself. That girl was born to be a queen—her manner is perfection; she holds her own with the grace and self-possession of an empress—and with the same inexorable firmness. What has come to her? She was always lovely and bewitching; but there is that about her that makes her absolutely irresistible. Why cannot I win her? I can make her a countess in time? What more does she want? Will nothing but a kingdom satisfy her?"

Mrs. Dumaresq pressed her hands together in intense irritation and agitation.

"She cannot know her own mind. She must not be allowed to play with you. It is intolerable to be thwarted like this! What can have come over her? I cannot understand it. She has got beyond me, and I know no more how or why than you do."

"Oh, I have a very good idea how and why it has all come about," answered Trevelyan with a Vertue.

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright
The bridall of the earth and skie
The dew shall weep thy fall to night
For thou must die
Sweet rose, whose hue angrie and brave
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye
Thy root is ever in its grave
And thou must die
Sweet spring, full of sweet dayes and roses
A box where sweets compacted lie
My musick shows ye have your closes
And all must die
Only a sweet and vertuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never gives;
But though the whole world turn to coal
Then chiefly lives.

fierce sneer. "She has got some fanatical religious notion into her head, and nothing is thought of but how to square the world to a miserable superstition. I warned you long ago, but you smiled at my fears. Perhaps, now that the mischief has been done past remedy, you will wish you had listened to me to better purpose when there was still time."

"But is it past remedy?" questioned Mrs. Dumaresq with feverish vehemence. "I am not convinced of that yet. I must see what can be done."

Trevelyan sneered again.

"You will pardon me if I say I have not the same confidence in your powers of management that once I had. How was it you allowed Reinée to get so completely beyond you?"

Mrs. Dumaresq winced, yet she was fond of Arthur, and did not exactly resent the question. Tears of anger and mortification stood in her eyes. She felt that things were going cruelly against her.

"I cannot tell what has come over her," cried the mother, her usual firmness and self-possession deserting her at this crisis. "She has changed so imperceptibly that it has been impossible to note anything at which one could take reasonable exception, and yet she has grown so strong, or self-willed, or something, that I do not know what to do with her. But I will talk to her, Arthur, I will see if I cannot bring her to reason."

"You may talk—I have talked too—" answered Trevelyan gloomily, "but you will talk in vain. She has an answer ready for everything. The long and the short of it is, I am not good enough for her; nobody is who does not share her new-fangled notions of religion and philanthropy. I did try what toleration and conformity would do; but that was not one tithe of what my lady demands. It is too absurd! too ridiculous! What have you all been about to let her get so eaten up with fanaticism?" and he started up and paced the floor in unconcealed irritation.

"I am sure it is no doing of mine," answered Mrs. Dumaresq, roused to defend herself. "I have steadily discouraged anything of the kind from her nursery days. Active opposition is never any use in such cases, but all that I could do I have done."

"Which means in plain words that you have done nothing," answered Trevelyan with a sneer. "Why did you not take her away earlier from a place where she was exposed to such influences?"

"Influences? I do not know of any. She has been nowhere and made no intimate friends."

"What about that apothecary doctor-chap and his sister? Are you blind, my dear madam?"

Mrs. Dumaresq looked at him with a sudden contraction of the brows.

"What do you mean, Arthur?"

"Mean? oh, nothing. It is all nothing to me now. My game is played out, and I am not going to risk being refused a second time; but take care that your sweet, docile daughter does not foist upon you a son-in-law you would little relish. Fanaticism is liable to take odd freaks. You had better look to it before it is too late," and with that Arthur Trevelyan flung himself from the room without another word.

In the hall Reinée and Clive were standing together, but he did not observe them as he passed. The last guest had departed, and the girl had come out and laid her hand upon her brother's arm.

"Clive," she said, "I want you to come with me to mamma. I have something to tell her. Will you come and help me?"

"To be sure. Is it about Trevelyan?"

"Yes."

"He has spoken?"

"Yes."

"And you?"

"I think you know that, Clive, I have refused him."

"You have done quite right, little sister. You could never love a man of his stamp."

"Never, never."

"No. He is very different from the man he was in old days. He is not worthy of you."

"Will you come with me to mamma? I must tell her; but I am sorry to have to grieve her. She always was so fond of Arthur."

"You cannot marry him on that account," said Clive gravely. "Come, then, we will go and tell her at once."

HOSPITALS AND HOSPITAL WORK.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER III.—A GLANCE AT THE WORKERS.

HOSPITALS of the present day are as a rule built and supported by the people, by voluntary contributions, and in a large proportion the givers and receivers are one and the same.

The sick in all ages have been regarded as specially entitled to sympathy and help, but there were no hospitals in the East, where the Great Physician became a healer of bodies as well as souls and set us an example that we should follow His steps. His healing touch was always accompanied by words of comfort, and it is to His followers we are indebted for the first hospitals in which from that day to this the double work of healing body and soul has been steadily carried on.

The emperor Julian, it is recorded, was constrained to point out to his subjects the excellence and utility of the hospitals built by the hated and despised Christians.[1]

It is remarkable that hospitals, like churches, were in former years named after some special saint, and in Paris, a city which we are apt to regard as given up entirely to pleasure, there is a noble hospital bearing the proud and significant title of "Hôtel Dieu," or "Mansion of God." This speaks for itself.

Notwithstanding the earnestness and responsibility of hospital work, it is so popular that no class of people like to be excluded from it, and it is wonderful how much room it affords for the exercise of diverse talents.

First, there are the doctors, whose skill, time, talents, and even lives are entirely devoted to its service. Then there are the nurses of various grades, each with the work assigned to them that they can do best. Again, there are those who, having leisure and possessing certain gifts for reading, singing or comforting, become visitors in the hospitals; and if with these gifts they combine judgment, the good they may do is unspeakable.

This class of workers become acquainted with the histories of the patients, they learn the anxieties which produce restlessness and baffle the doctors, and between one visit and another they will frequently go to see the children or belongings of these sick people and bring back such accounts as put the anxious hearts of fathers and mothers to rest and thus give them a chance of being cured. If space would allow, I could tell you of such acts of heroism, love and courage performed in the courts and alleys of what are called the worst parts of London as must make the angels in heaven rejoice.

It is well known that many patients leave the hospitals long before their cures are effected and quite contrary to the wishes of the doctors, simply because their young children are left without any supervision, and in too many cases without the means of obtaining the necessaries of life while they, the breadwinners, are lying in the hospitals. Thus it is they go back to their cheerless homes only half cured, without strength to work, and with the same liability to disease as before, and which, ere long, necessitates a return to the hospitals.

A loving-hearted, judicious visitor may help in this direction. The good really done, and the variety of ways in which it is done, would fill a volume.

Many patients, both men and women, find these visitors waiting for them on the day of their discharge, in order that they may see them home, and make the way clear for them to start afresh. In the hospitals and out of them these loving men and women spend and are spent for the sick poor.

Two or three years ago a young woman received her discharge from one of the London hospitals on a day when it was usual for a young lady to visit and sing to the patients. She asked if she might defer her departure until she could see the lady again, as she so much wanted to hear her sing once more, "Safe in the arms of Jesus." Of course permission was granted, the visitor came, and ere she went into the ward she sat down by the young woman and began in her sweet voice to sing the hymn she desired to hear; but before the last note died away the spirit of the girl had gone to her rest.

To come to another class of helpers. There are those of every rank and position from the very poor to the very rich who take their part by giving according to their means for the support of hospitals—and I think if, on Hospital Saturdays and Sundays, we could see the contributions of many who scarcely know where to get a meal, we should be reminded of the widow's mite.

Little children do not like to be left out of this work, but what can they do? Rather ask, how much they do? Their help could not be dispensed with; it is like themselves, full of life, brightness and beauty, and brings a smile to many a wan and pain-stricken face lying in the hospital wards.

Love to the sick is very inventive, and if it cannot be shown in one way it finds another.

Children of all ranks, royal and poor alike, pluck flowers for the hospital patients, the poor children getting theirs from the woods and hedgerows; the better off from their gardens; the rich from their greenhouses. These they tie up in bunches, and attach to each a text prettily illuminated by the elder children.

These are sent to certain hospital visitors, who undertake to distribute them in the various wards, where many who may never again see God's good gift of flowers growing in hedgerow or garden may yet enjoy them by sight, smell, and touch.

Many of our earliest primroses and violets thus find their way to the hospitals.

One of the visitors whose pleasant task it is to distribute the flowers, mentions going up to a poor girl who had lain a long time in one of the wards. She had neither father nor mother, and all her young life, previous to her admission into the hospital, had been spent in a squalid London alley where things beautiful found no entrance. She offered her a bunch of primroses with the dew scarcely off them, saying, "I have brought you some flowers."

"Are they for me? Oh, how lovely! How beautiful!"

"If you look," said the visitor, "you will find something else for you."

The girl turned the nosegay round and read slowly, "God so loved the world——"

"This is not for me, thank you, ma'am, it is for the great people; but I'd like to keep the flowers."

The visitor, you may be sure, used her opportunity. The next time flowers were sent for distribution the lady gave the girl a bunch of lilies of the valley, with the text "Jesus called a little child to Him."

[1] The first hospital is said to have been built in Rome at the end of the fourth century. A little later Pulcheria, sister of Theodosius the Younger, built and endowed several at Constantinople; they increased under later reigns.—Gesta Christi.

"Oh yes, that's me, I know," said the girl eagerly. So in this as in many another instance, the children's work of love became a messenger of life.

How surprised the children would be if only one little nosegay with its text could return with its experience and explain to them where it had been and the character of the work it had done since the day it had been sent to the hospital ward!

I will tell you why I say this.

Not long since a clergyman's son, a boy in a public school, met with an accident on the cricket ground and was taken to one of our London Hospitals. His mother came up from the country to see him, and in talking with her he mentioned in a shy sort of way that boys have, that a visitor had been in the ward and had spoken to him, offering for his acceptance a bunch of spotlessly white flowers with the text attached, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool."

The visitor, I do not know whether it were a lady or a gentleman, spoke some few words which made an impression upon the boy, and as he related to his mother, gave to the text a power, and a contrast which he had not noticed before.

"What were the words which impressed you?" asked the mother.

"That scarlet and crimson were the fastest dyes that were made, that they were in fact double-dyed, and that no power could either erase or wash them out. Don't you see, mother, that being so, the promise of being whiter than snow shows infinite love and power?"

"I cannot quite explain," continued the lad, "but the words seem to me to have more force now."

The mother of this boy came straight from the hospital to see me. While taking luncheon she related all this before three or four visitors, and before the maid who was waiting table. All were impressed and each went their several ways to convey to others what they had heard: and thus will the message be carried on and on, and who can calculate the result?

One word more of the children's work. I know that those young enough to love their toys dearly, willingly give them up to the sick children in hospitals—not their broken or cast-off toys, but those they most prize.

Another set of workers there are whose contribution would be ill-spared, as there are so few who are in a position to give it.

These are ladies having country estates and who do their part by inviting the tired, worn-out nurses to come to them as guests for two or three weeks that they may regain strength and begin the work anew. Not only so, but they have convalescent patients down for the same purpose, making them most comfortable in cottages on the estate. You can see for yourselves how great is the benefit accomplished by this set of workers.

Then, again, there are those women and girls—two thousand in London alone—who contribute their portion by standing at the corners of the streets of great towns on Hospital Saturdays to plead silently for funds for these institutions, whose doors are open night and day for the relief of pain and suffering, no matter of what country, creed, or occupation the sufferer may be, so long as there is an empty bed on which to place him.

This feature of hospitals and hospital work holds good in all countries. Let me give an example.

On our way to Mürren last July we paused at Basle for the Sunday. The English chaplain, who was returning on the morrow, told me of a sad accident which had occurred to an English woman, a lady's maid, who, in driving from one station to the other was thrown out on to the bridge and so severely injured that for some time she was thought to be dead. She was taken at once to the hospital, a quarter of a mile distant from the bridge, where without question she was received and placed in the accident ward and cared for with the utmost skill and tenderness. He asked me if we could possibly remain in Basle a few days and visit her and help the nurses, as no one in the hospital could speak English, and the patient knew no word of German. This, of course, we did, until a responsible friend came to her from England. The time thus spent afforded us the opportunity of becoming acquainted with this admirable "Burger Hospital." Had there been no hospital near she would probably have died, and even had she lived would have been crippled and disfigured. Now she is back in England and writes me word that she is well.

We were quite sorry to leave Basle, for we had made friends with all in the accident ward—three dear children, and two women beside the English girl. Their faces, pale and drawn though they were, lighted up as we entered and laid roses on their beds. They were so beautiful and abundant in Basle just then, and the pleasure they gave in the ward was great.

Nothing could exceed the kindness of the authorities, who set aside all laws and allowed us to go in when we pleased.

The hospital itself is a grand building in the form of a square, with extensive grounds and gardens in the centre. I learned that out of the number of patients received here during the year, a hundred and forty-two were foreigners, many of them English.

Hospitals are not a far-off object; the need of them is felt in every street, square, and alley; in every occupation and under all circumstances. Their benefit is acknowledged in every home. Their value can only be fully known where they do not exist. For an example of this my mind goes back to that horrible German War of 1866, when I myself was present at Aschaffenburg, Wurzburg, and Botzen, and saw poor soldiers, whose wounds had been undressed for days, jolted along for miles and miles to the nearest hospitals or places of help.

Oh! what would we not have given for efficient medical help—for hospitals such as are to be found scattered over London! What would we not have contributed even to our last farthing for one on the spot! In their very absence we learnt their value. They are the people's own institutions, supported by the people for the people, and the variety of work connected with them opens up a way for every class and age of the people to give their mite, if not in one form then in another.

Although they are the people's institutions, they have royal workers in them. First among these stands the Queen of Saxony, who goes to the hospitals two or three times a week, helping with her own hands, visiting every patient, no matter what the disease may be. She seems utterly fearless. It was she who formed the Band of Nursing Sisters in Dresden, and in time of war or epidemic she may be seen working among them in like dress and with the same self-denying devotion.

The people of Dresden would find it impossible to think of hospitals or hospital work without at the same time thinking of their queen. The beautiful hospital just outside the city is called after her the Carola House. I went over it last August. It is built in pavilions, and bears a high name for skilful treatment and administration. The part near the front block contains a number of moderate-sized rooms, daintily furnished for paying patients, one of whom at the time of my visit was an Irish lady. The doctor and sister who showed me over told me that one of their best nurses was an Englishwoman. It seemed curious to see a sister in the drug department, but everything is managed by ladies.

It has been the queen's great desire to have planted in the midst of the hospital grounds, which are large, an isolated building for the treatment of diphtheria and small-pox. This building was nearly completed when I was there. It had every improvement which could be suggested to ensure the comfort and isolation of patients and attendants, and so this good queen will have her heart's desire. Our own Princess Alice was making her mark in the same direction in Darmstadt, and many a sick person in the hospital and out bore testimony to her gentle touch and kind word.

I had an interesting conversation a few days ago with Sir William Gregory, late Governor of Ceylon, about the hospitals in that island. He says they are admirably conducted, and that the nurses, who are all natives, are thoroughly well taught and trained, and he said that had he been ill there, he would just as soon have been nursed by them as by our English nurses at home. The Leper Hospital he mentioned as being extremely good, and doing immense service. This surely is a step forward when we think of the deplorable condition of these outcasts hitherto, whose "unclean! unclean!" has made many a traveller's heart sad in the midst of hallowed spots in Palestine.

Concerning many of the public institutions in various countries, a lukewarm feeling takes the place of enthusiasm as time goes on, probably because the institutions fail of the promise with which they started. This can never be brought against hospitals, because the need of them grows with the growth of the population, and disease and accidents being every-day occurrences, the hospitals are the friends to which people fly.

Taking London as a centre for observation, we see that the hospitals contain 6000 beds which are in constant use. This means in round numbers, and considering the average stay of each patient, 68,000 persons annually housed, fed, cared for, and tended with the highest skill our country can boast. Why, it is a population equal to that of a large town—almost as large as Plymouth, for example.

You must take in at the same time the army of workers, medical men, nurses and attendants required for such a permanent population before you can realise the picture.

Beside this number of 68,000 relieved within the hospitals, and known by the name of in-patients, 1,168,000 out-patients are on an average relieved in the year, and the number of attendances registered is about four millions.

Out of a population of over five millions in London, one and a quarter millions of the inhabitants receive actual benefit from the hospitals.

It may be of interest to see what the cost of the relief thus given amounts to in a year. I could scarcely have done this but for the kindness of Mr. Frewer, the Secretary of the Hospital Saturday Fund, who has devoted much time to this question.

The cost of each in and out patient varies considerably in the various hospitals. Taking the average, we obtain a good idea of the money spent.

Every bed occupied costs

	£	s.	d.
£1 14*s.* 4*d.* a week. Total for year	535,600	0	0
Total cost for year of out patients	137,550	0	0
	£673,150	0	0

The income of the seventy-two hospitals and thirty-nine dispensaries of London is about 675,000*l.* per annum, barely covering the expenditure, and allowing no scope for extending the relief so needed. It is nonsense to talk of people seeking out-door relief from hospitals who could afford to pay a doctor. Let any one who thinks this, go and take his or her place among the groups waiting for advice and medicine, and the opinion would not be held for a moment. It is not reasonable to suppose that people willingly leave their children or their work to walk perhaps a long distance, and then wait about for an hour or two amongst disease and sorrow, if they could at all manage to pay for a doctor at home. The worst of it is that the majority of us are compelled to form our opinions without seeing with our own eyes the actual state of things. I happen to know that among the out-patients there are those who cannot even afford to buy the bottle for the medicine, and that it is not a rare thing for the poor people to help each other with farthings to buy it.

THE LADY ELFRIDA.

CHAPTER VII.

RUTH, as they journeyed silently on, grew more hopeful than she had been since she left the castle. The Master who had shaped and guided all for her so far, would shape and guide still. If she could but reach the sea coast undiscovered, there was every probability that she would soon find means, at the little port, of gaining a passage in a ship to the Netherlands, whither she knew her husband and mistress were sure to have gone. There was, of course, still a fear that they might not have escaped after all, and that her devotion had been vain; she had not the faintest tidings of what had befallen them. There was, of course, still danger for her and the child that they might be arrested before they reached the coast, as having something to do with the Lady Elfrida; but she had a strong bright faith that all would now be well.

It was a crisp, glowing autumn morning, a morning when summer seemed to have returned to pay the earth a brief visit. The yellow leaves shone, as if the corn, which had but lately, in these high regions, been gathered in, had left them its golden tints. The rain had freshened the fields and spread over them a green mantle: the streams were laughing and sparkling, as though they were exulting in in their autumnal fulness: the air was so clear, that the distant hills were all visible standing out in sharp outline, and in strangely varied form and shape: the deep lanes, through which the cart frequently passed, were still, in their sheltered recesses, all draped with delicate ferns and soft mosses, and here and there starred with late flowers.

At intervals the cart would draw up to do its many commissions by the way. Now it was a grey-headed serving-man, with stately mien and pompous voice and manner, who came issuing forth through a high gateway to fetch some parcel for his master, and who plainly deemed himself doing the carrier an unspeakable honour when he exchanged with him a dignified "Good morrow." Now it was a rosy village dame, who regaled Oliver with a jest and a cup of posset, and seemed very ready to forget her household duties as she gossiped with him. Here a little bright-eyed maiden came running out of a cottage to stop the carrier and assault him with eager questions. There an old countryman stood making wild gestures with his crutch, in order that the carrier might make an exhaustive search among his piles of luggage for a minute bottle which was sent him by a wise woman of the neighbourhood, and which contained a certain cure for his rheumatism. Wherever the cart passed there were inquiring, waiting faces peeping out from every door and window, as though each man, woman, and child in the villages and on the road had, at least, a vague hope that the wonderful vehicle might bring them something new and strange.

Ruth Redwood lay quietly enjoying the varied sights and sounds around her; she knew that a time of difficulty and effort, and perhaps of danger, must be near at hand for her in the future, but she thanked God for the present calm and rest, and took courage. Sometimes she would, wearied as she still was with last night's hardships, fall off into a light doze, lulled by the monotonous chorus made by the hoofs of the horses, and the jingle of their bells, and the humming of an old air by the carrier. Sometimes she would rouse herself, and watch with interest the faces of the different people who came to the side of the cart, and form, in her fancy, little histories about them. Sometimes she would whisper to her child sweet words about the father and husband from whom they were parted; and baby would do her portion of the conversation by a crow or a smile.

Nothing so far had happened to disturb the fugitives, or rouse feelings of alarm or even anxiety in Ruth's mind. They were nearing by this time the little seaport which was the bourne of their journey, and she was beginning to think what she had best do on her arrival there. All at once she noticed that the carrier was turning round to look at something behind him, with an earnest, half-troubled expression in his face.

"What is it you see?" she asked, her fears, naturally enough, aroused in a moment.

"I see three horsemen riding quickly after us," he answered, in a calm, yet grave tone. "Now my pretty mistress, don't you go a-leaping into the river to meet trouble halfway, as most womenfolk are inclined to do. These men may have something to do with us, or may not; anyhow, when they overtake us, and especially if they stop us, you show that you have a few ounces more of sense and courage than most dames and damsels have, and keep yourself and the child hidden in the bottom of the cart as long as you can, and if you must speak, speak with man's judgment and woman's gentleness. There ban't a woman in our village that I could talk like this to, but somehow I do fancy you be different from other womenfolk; there be something, I can't exactly say what, in your eyes, that be so calm and restful-like, something that do remind me of the moon-light. It do come, I'm beginning to see, from Him above that you do serve; He do make them brave and steadfast in all danger and difficulty, who do love and serve Him with all their hearts and lives. I have not been bold enough yet in His cause; I do know, it's been in secret that I've been His disciple, like him that laid His blessed body in the garden tomb; but, with His dear help, I'll be braver for Him from henceforth, now that I have seen in you what a true servant of His can be."

"Praise be to His dear name, if through me He has let a Christian soldier be taught to be more loyal to Him," she answered, with serious sweetness in her eyes; and then added, after a moment's pause, "If danger is indeed near for my child and me, I will lay myself and her in His dear arms in prayer, and, after that, I will wait what is to come, as calmly as I may. If I must speak, He will give me the right words at the right time."

"You've agot hold of the right, Christian way of looking at it already, my girl. Now here they be close to us, and a-bearing down upon us, that's certain; put your trust in Him Who died that we might live, and be sure that old Oliver will do his best to shield you and your pretty blossom."

The horsemen were now in truth close to the cart, but the carrier showed no signs of fear. He went jogging on his usual steady, regular pace, and seemed to be taking no heed of them or their movements.

"Pray, my girl, pray; now's the time for not forgetting that you're a daughter of the King," whispered the old man, turning round for a moment to Ruth, and then fixing his eyes again on his horse's ears, as if he had nothing but them to think of.

"Stop, in the queen's name," cried out one of the riders, for they were now near enough for their voices to be heard by those in the cart.

The carrier drew up with an air of the coolest assurance; Ruth lay perfectly still with her child under the loose straw and sacks which the cart contained, and which she had carefully and dexterously disposed so as to hide them both completely from view.

"What is your business with me?" asked Oliver in the most unruffled tone.

"We have heard in one of the villages which you have driven through," answered the same horseman who had spoken before, and who was apparently the leader of the little party of soldiers, for soldiers they were, "we have heard that you have a woman and a child in your cart, and we want to have a look at them, for there be certain contrabrand goods just now going about the country in the shape of run-away heretics, and we misdoubt that your passengers may be something of the kind; besides, we have heard that there is a Mistress Ruth Redwood, who belongs to the household of the Lady Elfrida Acland, and who answers exactly to the description of this woman; and we have a keen suspicion, moreover, that this same Mistress Redwood has played justice a villainous trick in helping towards the escape of the lady, she, Mistress Ruth, being, we hear, a woman of most shrewd and malapert wit."

"I know nothing of any Mistress Redwood," replied the carrier, who, in truth, did not know Ruth's name, or where she came from, though he began to suspect that it was, in reality, Mistress Ruth Redwood whom he was befriending.

"Aye, but if you don't, the inside of your cart may," rejoined the soldier, dismounting and darting a sharp, inquiring glance towards it.

"Well, my good sir, have any of my bales or parcels the look of a petticoat heretic, think you?" asked the carrier, with a smile.

Ruth had, in truth, so cleverly concealed herself and the child beneath the varied contents of the cart, that it was impossible to perceive the slightest trace of their presence. She lay very still, holding even her breath, and the child was asleep.

"No, by the Mass, I can see no trace of so much as the gleam of a shoe-buckle," cried the Papist soldier, half disappointed, half laughing.

He was just about to turn away, when the child woke, and uttered a low cry. A spark of mischievous intelligence flashed into the soldier's face.

"Aye, master carrier," he exclaimed, "some of thy goods do consist of strange wares; babies in their cradles, belike."

Then he stretched out his hand to remove some of the articles in the cart, but the carrier resisted him steadily.

"All that travels in my cart is under my sole care!" he cried, "and I allow nothing to be touched till it reach its destination."

Hereupon there began a struggle between the two men which might have ended in bloodshed, for the soldier raised his musket to his shoulder, when, all at once, like a vision of God's own sending, the young mother sat up in the cart, holding her child in her arms, her face all sweetness, her bearing all womanly dignity.

"Master Oliver," she said, "let no violence be done; I am ready to answer for my action done in God's own cause."

Both men turned to gaze at her involuntarily, and, as he gazed, a bright thought darted into Oliver Oatway's mind. With the handle of his heavy whip he struck the soldier, who was just then off his guard, a blow which made him fall to the ground stunned and senseless. Then he sprang to his seat, and turning his horses down a narrow side road, which by good fortune, however, was broad enough to admit the cart, urged them onward at their utmost speed; they were two spirited little animals of hill-country breed, and at once obeyed their master's voice and whip.

The other soldiers were some little time in following in pursuit. They had dismounted to assist their fallen leader, and thought soon to overtake the audacious waggoner; but they were mistaken—the cart was out of sight in the deep lane when they were again in their saddles. When, at length, they rode after the fugitives, they became perfectly entangled in a network of winding country roads, each more stony than the one which went before, roads where their heavy cavalry horses stumbled at almost every step.

That evening the Lady Elfrida and Harry Redwood were standing on the deck of a vessel with the shores of England rapidly receding from their sight, when the ship hove to for a few minutes to wait for a boat which had put out from the land. Out of that boat got a woman and a child, and a moment after young Redwood found his wife and his little daughter lying on his breast, while she cried out with joyful tears—"Oh! my love, my love! The dear Lord is almost letting us know beforehand what the bliss of meeting in heaven will be like!"

Through by-ways, across fields and streams, the brave carrier had brought the mother and child to a little village on the sea coast, from whence they had taken a boat to reach a ship which was known to be just then sailing for the Netherlands.

Several years after, when the accession of Elizabeth enabled the Lady Elfrida and her friends to return to England, good old Oliver praised his Master above for letting him hear once more the happy voices of the mother and child.

NATURAL HISTORY NOTES

ON THE REVISED VERSION OF THE BIBLE.

NO. IV.—SPIDER.

THE 30th chapter of Proverbs contains the names of several animals which the revisers have found it necessary to alter. In ver. 28, for instance, we have what seems to us a very natural mention of the spider: "The spider taketh hold with her hands, and is in king's palaces." Knowing, as we do, that the spider is found in almost every house, and that the palace of royalty is no exception, it does not seem at all out of place to find this allusion. There are other passages, viz., Job viii. 14 and Isaiah lix. 5, where no doubt a common spider is meant, and any one reading the passages will see the resemblance at once. But in the Proverbs, above quoted, it should be the lizard. This is an animal scarcely known in England; indeed many persons would hardly believe that it is found here at all; but it may be seen sometimes sunning itself in a warm nook, just as its fellows do in warmer countries. The species alluded to in the Proverbs is apparently one of the kind called Geckos. Some have thought that the Bible words indicate a power of walking up walls and along ceilings by means of apparatus like that on the foot of the common house-fly. More likely it means only that the feet of the animal spread out very much like a fan, so that it has the appearance of taking hold wherever it walks. Its food is flies and small insects, which of course are to be found in king's palaces as elsewhere.

Next we notice the greyhound, v. 31. Here the margin tells us it may be a war-horse, but it also tells us that the Hebrew really means "well girt about the loins." We cannot then be sure of either greyhound or war-horse; but we can see how it is that those words are put here. When a man girds up his loins, as Elijah did on one occasion, it is that he may run fast. So the word has been understood to indicate an animal of great speed, such as a greyhound would be. Again, the war-horse was often covered with fine trappings, tasselled with gold and silver, hanging over his loins. That is why the word war-horse is proposed instead of the greyhound, though as far as speed is concerned the latter would do just as well. Others have said that it means a wrestler, who bound up his loins tightly before entering upon a trial of strength. If this is not very satisfactory, it may yet help us to understand the difficulty the revisers have often had in performing their task.

In the 15th verse of the same chapter we have the word horse-leech. The revisers have not altered this in the text, but in the margin they have put a word that was not there before: vampire. Many people will be quite satisfied with the original word. Leeches are not so well-known to young people of this day as they were to their fathers and mothers in their young days; still everybody knows that a leech is a blood-sucker, and will not let go till he is full of blood. A horse-leech of course is a bigger leech than usual, fit to draw a horse's blood. Tristram says, "It is very common in all the stagnant waters of Palestine; it is in the habit of entering the nostrils and mouth of the horse when drinking, and attaches itself firmly to the inside of the nostril or to the palate, causing much pain and loss of blood." The animal is taken as an example of insatiable thirst or covetousness, and its eagerness for gain is set forth by the mention of two daughters, as though it was not one alone, but a mother and two daughters that have to be satisfied. The alternative word proposed by the revisers gives us the same idea. The vampire is one of the bat tribe, the curious bird-quadrupeds that flit in the dusk round houses in the country. In the east there are other kinds—the delicate flying foxes, which some may have seen at the Zoological Gardens, and the terrible vampire. This, like the horse-leech, is said to be a blood-sucker, and very horrible stories have been told of its settling on people when asleep and sucking their blood. Scarcely any instances have been reported by persons whose word is to be relied on, though it has certainly been known to fasten on horses. Indeed, the whole of its ill repute seems to arise from foolish stories about dead men coming out of their graves and sucking the blood of sleeping people. The vampire has been taken to represent these, and hence its bad name.

QUESTIONS.

1. On what occasion did Elijah "gird up his loins?"
2. When were the Israelites told to eat with their loins girded?
3. Why is the trust of the wicked said to be as a spider's web?
4. In what part of the Bible is there a full description of a war-horse?
5. Give the passage where we are told to gird up the "loins of our mind?"

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA

NO. XII.

A man of Macedonia Paul baptised,
And held in high esteem?
River which Naaman, angry and surprised,
Preferred to Jordan's stream?
City that fell before the Hebrew's sword
And changed its name to Dan?
A country cursed from whence a crowd outpoured
To see the Son of Man?
Home of a prince's son whom David sought,
Though lame on both his feet?
A priest who, when disastrous news was brought,
Fell backwards off his seat?
Prophet of God whose heaven-directed hand
A spring of waters healed,
And turned a city's dry and barren land
Into a fruitful field?

First and last letters now two districts show,
Each bears a well-known name;
To Jesus' presence when He dwelt below
They owe their lasting fame.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS

CHAPTER XXI.—SURPRISES.

JULIET'S RETURN.

"I WONDER you are not ashamed to look me in the face after your wilful, headstrong, disobedient conduct," said Mrs. Dumaresq as she raised her eyes and saw Reinée standing before her. "Do you want to break my heart by thwarting the most cherished plan of a lifetime?"

"Mother, dear," said Reinée gently, "I cannot bear to distress you. It hurts me as much as it hurts you. I would do very much to please and gratify you, but I cannot marry Arthur even to do that. If you knew my feelings towards him, I do not think you would even wish it."

Mrs. Dumaresq lifted her head with a gesture indicative of displeasure.

"And pray what are your objections to him?

I have known him intimately nearly all his life and I have no fault to find with him. What have you to allege against him?"

"I do not wish to say anything against him: but I do not love him. I do not even like him. Surely that is reason enough against promising to be his wife?"

"Pardon me, but it is not. You have been partially bound to him for years. He has been waiting for you during the best years of his youth. Something more than childish caprice is wanted to justify you in throwing him over at the last."

The colour deepened in Reinée's face, but her glance did not waver nor her voice falter.

"That provisional engagement was no doing of mine," she answered steadily, "and I cannot accept the responsibility as if it were. Nor is it caprice that makes me refuse him now. It is an absolute conviction that we are entirely unsuited to each other, and could never be happy in a united life. How could I vow to love and honour him, knowing that I could do neither?"

"And pray why could you do neither? Who are you to set yourself up as a judge of a man who has been a friend to your parents for many years?"

"I do not want to judge him, but I cannot blind my eyes."

"Really! And pray what do those eyes of yours see?"

"I see a great deal I would rather not," answered Reinée regretfully. "Mother, dear, do not turn away from me so sternly. Let me try to explain a little. I have tried to like Arthur and to believe in him—indeed I have; but I cannot. When Clive was nearly killed before his eyes he stood by without lifting a finger to help him, and had only sneers for the man who had risked his life in averting the accident. Who but a coward, a man without any sense of nobility or manliness could sink so low as that? It opened my eyes to his true nature as nothing else perhaps could have done so effectually. And then—and then——"

"Well, what then?"

Reinée looked wistfully at her mother as if doubtful how far to venture.

"Mamma," she said softly, "do you think he is—a good man?"

"What is your definition of a good man? A sort of religious fanatic, I suppose?"

"No," answered the girl quietly. "I think I mean a man who is perfectly upright and sincere, acting in all things according to his conscience, and always striving after a high and noble ideal. I think that a religious man is most likely to be all this, for I am sure that it is loving God and trying to follow His footsteps that helps us most. But it is not because Arthur is not religious exactly that I cannot trust him. It is because he is not truthful, not sincere. He pretends to be what he is not when it suits his purpose, and he simulates thoughts and aspirations that in his heart he scorns and detests. Oh, yes, mother, he does—I know it well. That is what I cannot and will not stand. Many noble-hearted men whom we love and reverence have been troubled by doubts, have never been able to share our confidence in unseen things, but then they would scorn to pretend it was otherwise with them. Their doubts are honest and sincere like themselves, and we respect and honour them even if we disagree. Arthur is not honest, he is not truthful. He is a time-server and does not regard the truth. He is a coward too. How could I ever be his wife? Mother, if you knew him as well as we do, I think you would not even wish it."

"I think not," said Clive, who had stood beside his sister all this time, but so far without speaking. "Trevelyan has been my friend, and I have no wish to bear witness against him now. But he is not worthy to be Reinée's husband. I think I would sooner see her laid in her grave than married to him. He would break her heart and blight her life. I have suspected as much some time. I am sure of it now."

Mrs. Dumaresq looked as if she had no power to say more. She had had such blind confidence in her own power, and in Reinée's eventual obedience to this great wish of hers, that when she realised herself to be powerless she was strangely crushed and unnerved.

Clive thought he saw his advantage, and stepped forward and took his mother's hands in his.

"Now, mother, dear," he said in the playful, caressing way, so characteristic of him, "you must not worry yourself any more about this, nor make Reinée unhappy. You would not, believe me, have liked Trevelyan as a son-in-law, nor I him as a brother; and we are none of us in a hurry to get rid of our little queen, are we? Let Trevelyan go, and we will settle down and be happy and comfortable as we used to be before he came to trouble us. The father will be delighted to think that he is not going to lose Reinée, and so am I, and so I think are you. So we will forget our annoyances and take the good things of life as they come."

Now Mrs. Dumaresq idolised Clive, and could seldom resist his pleading, moreover as a wise woman she was not given to the error commonly designated as "crying over spilt milk," so that she was not altogether deaf to this appeal to her better nature.

"Well," she said, drawing a long breath like a sigh. "It is a dreadful disappointment to me, and I cannot help feeling it. However, there are other men in the world besides Arthur Trevelyan, and other good matches to be made. Reinée," she added with some energy, looking full at her daughter, "if I consent to say no more about this, I shall expect a promise from you in return."

"What is that, mamma?"

"Promise me that you will never marry without my consent—mine as well as your father's."

The colour rose in Reinée's face, as she looked steadily at her mother.

"I promise," she answered quietly. "I shall never take any step so important as that without your consent. Are you not my mother? I know you will always put my happiness and welfare first."

There was a sort of pleading sweetness in Reinée's eyes and voice that touched the mother's heart in Mrs. Dumaresq's rather cold breast. She kissed her daughter with unwonted gentleness.

"You are a good girl, Reinée, even if we do not always agree. Well, we will let the past go, and I will try to hope that all has turned out for the best."

So Arthur Trevelyan vanished from the house and from the lives of those with whom we are concerned. He went away deeply offended, and Clive hoped that there would be no need to keep up a friendship he little valued or desired.

Life went on very quietly in that quiet place. Reinée was happy and busy, and Clive amused himself by desultory shooting and hunting, and in assisting his sister in her many duties and pleasures.

Little Jack Stone was still his favourite protégé, and he had already promised him a berth on board his yacht as cabin boy next time she made a voyage. Lame Alice, though distrustful of all the world besides, was faithful to her love for the young Squire as the people were beginning to call him, and he always treated her to just the amount of notice that suited her erratic temperament.

At the Meynal's house life was running more smoothly and pleasantly than in times past. Celia's marriage began to be talked of, and Barbara's engagement to Fergus Thompson had become an established fact. Both sisters were happy, and had drawn much together in their happiness and mutual confidence; but the lines of care had deepened in Wulfric's face, for a sort of mystery seemed to hang about Gerald, and it had become impossible to hear anything at all about him.

Very gradually his letters ceased. He was so bad and irregular a correspondent that a long silence did not surprise them, but when at last they grew uneasy and wrote again to him, the letter was returned through the post-office. He had left the lodgings he had occupied so long, and his present address was not known.

Hector Thompson knew nothing of his whereabouts. Inquiries elicited no information. Wulfric made a journey to town to try and trace him, but the attempt proved altogether unsuccessful. It seemed as if he had vanished utterly, leaving not a trace behind, which was the more remarkable, as this disappearance deprived him of the pecuniary assistance he had been in the way of receiving from his brother.

Juliet knew nothing of him. He had ceased to correspond with her. She had herself been very silent of late, but St. Hilda was soon to see and hear more of her again.

One fine mild evening early in the spring, Mrs. Granby was sitting in the bow window of her cosy parlour, resting alike her hand and eyes during that space of time generally described as "between lights."

It was growing a little late for visitors and therefore she was rather surprised to see the Meynal's carriage draw up at her gate; but she was more than ever surprised to see Wulfric Meynal descend and assist out a girl who appeared to be somewhat feeble and shaky.

Mrs. Granby's eyes were clear and undimmed. In a moment she had recognised her granddaughter Juliet, and she went out into the porch, full of wonder, and in some little anxiety of mind.

Next moment a pair of warm arms were clasped about her neck, and Juliet was sobbing in a silent, convulsive way on her grandmother's shoulder.

Mrs. Granby gently led the agitated girl into the parlour, laid her tenderly upon the couch, and still standing beside her and caressing her tumbled hair from which she had removed the hat, she looked up at Wulfric Meynal for an explanation.

"That is right, Mrs. Granby," he said, "let her keep quiet, and give her a glass or two of port wine these next days. She will be all right again very soon."

"What is the matter?" asked Mrs. Granby.

"Nothing very much. She has got a bad throat—a 'hospital throat' as we call it, but rest and fresh air will be all the medicine she wants. She has had rather a rough time of it at Aylcester—I was afraid it might be so. Someday she shall go on a visit to the lady superintendent of my hospital in London—one of the most delightful women I know—and see the more favourable aspect of hospital life."

"Why was I not told that my child was ill?" asked the old lady, bristling up, metaphorically speaking, at the thought that Juliet had been neglected.

"Because your granddaughter, like a silly little Spartan, said nothing about her increasing feeling of illness, and in the busy life there if people are quiet they are likely to be overlooked. It was my lecturing day there to-day, and I went to see how Juliet was getting on as I generally do, found her just ready to drop, and her throat as raw as a piece of meat out of a butcher's shop. So I just took law into my own hands and brought her straight off home. My own impression is that home will be the place for her for some while to come."

"I am very much obliged to you, Wulfric," said Mrs. Granby. "If you have time will you look in to-morrow to see the throat?"

"Certainly," answered Wulfric, as he shook hands, "but I leave her in excellent keeping. I have no uneasiness about her now. Good-bye, Juliet, keep up your heart; you will soon feel ever so much stronger and better."

Juliet's answer was an inarticulate murmur, and as soon as he had gone the sobs burst out once more in that painfully convulsive way.

"Grandmother, oh, grandmother!" she said, and once more she flung her arms about Mrs. Granby's neck and wept upon her shoulder.

Gently and tenderly the old lady soothed the agitated girl. She made her swallow a glass of wine, bathed her hot head and feverish hands, and insisted on her keeping perfectly quiet without attempting to talk.

Juliet, worn out and exhausted, was glad enough to obey these injunctions; only from time to time she would glance up wistfully to say, "How good you are to me, grandmother!"

Later on, when the girl was lying in her own spotless bed, with a fire burning cosily in the polished grate, and all the dainty prettiness of her own room surrounding her—and how pretty and dainty it did look after the bareness of the little narrow cell she had left behind!—the tears started once more to her eyes.

"Grandmother, dear," she said softly.

Mrs. Granby came and leaned over the bed. Juliet's glance was touching in its shy humility.

"Grandmother, dear, can you forgive me?"

"Forgive you for what, my dear?"

"I think you know, grandmother—for going away as I did."

"But you had my permission to enter the hospital, my dear; it was done with my full consent."

"Yes, I know, grandmother; you have always been so kind. I can see it now, you had given me everything you could to make me contented and happy. But you must know how much I need forgiveness, not, perhaps, for the going away, but for the way in which it was done, for my wicked discontent and ingratitude."

Mrs. Granby took both the girl's hot hands in hers. Her face was grave, yet very gentle and loving.

"My dear," she answered, kindly and quietly, "I do know what you mean, and I forgive it all fully and freely. If you have learned a lesson of contentment by your experiences, you will not have bought it too dearly."

"Grandmother," said Juliet, looking up through blinding tears, "I have learned to love God since I have been so unhappy and so much alone. Some day I should like to tell you all about it, but it is that that has made all the difference, I know."

There was a sparkle too in Mrs. Granby's eyes as she bent to kiss her granddaughter.

"God bless you, my child," she said softly and tenderly. "I think we shall understand one another now."

"You always understood me," answered Juliet with a little tremulous smile. "It was I who could not or would not understand."

"Ah! my dear, you are young, you know. There is a great deal that only time and experience can teach us."

And then Mrs. Granby laid her hand softly upon the girl's lips, and bid her try to sleep, and not talk, or even think any more that night.

For two or three days Juliet continued weak and feverish, and spent a good many hours of each day in her bed, but nevertheless the days were very happy ones.

It was such luxury to lie there in that quiet, pretty room, to feel that there was no rush of work going on below, no need for her to worry herself over neglected duties, for which she was not fit, or dread a return to the interrupted work of the ward.

She could lie still in this quiet place, and be glad and grateful for its dreamy repose. She recalled almost wonderingly her old irritation and distaste, her restless longing for change, and her absolute conviction that she could be happier anywhere else. A thrill of shame ran through her sometimes as she recalled the past, reviewed all the unfailing kindness she had received from her grandmother, and the ingratitude with which it had been received. Once she quite disliked to have to sit with the old lady or talk to her, now her happiest hours were those spent in her company.

She liked telling Mrs. Granby all about her hospital life, its interests, its trials, its pleasures, and its difficulties. Now that the girl had frankly recognised the radical defect of her nature, and had learned to see herself more as others saw her, many points that had puzzled her before now became clear, and she was not disposed to put any false gloss upon her story, or to lay upon others the blame that attached to herself.

Juliet had learned a lesson of self-distrust in a hard school, but she had learned it effectually; and she had learned another lesson too—the lesson of contentment. Her nature had not radically changed; but she knew now that change of scene and place alone would not satisfy the longings of the heart or cover the defects of nature, but that to those who had learned to love God, and to live their lives for His glory all places could furnish a round of daily tasks that should not be despicable in His sight,—could give us

> Room to deny ourselves, a road
> To bring us daily nearer God.

St. Hilda might or might not be the spot where her future lot would be cast. Juliet had not altogether renounced her wish to live in a great city where life would stir more rapidly round her; but she was prepared too, to look with kindlier and less blinded eyes upon the duties of a quiet life, and not to fall into the old blunder of overlooking little things in the search for big ones.

She had had experiences in her hospital life of which it was rather hard to speak frankly and openly. She had known all along that insubordination and carelessness as to rules could not be really right; and yet her love of independence, her confidence in her own powers, combined with a consciousness of mental superiority over those placed above her had led her into all manner of difficulties, had made her very unpopular, and had placed her many times in false and unenviable positions.

Self-will had been too strong to be easily crushed, yet the girl had been very unhappy, and her loneliness and depression had done more for her than perhaps any happiness could have accomplished.

When she once made up her mind to confide fully in Mrs. Granby, the very painfulness of telling all put many things before her in a clearer light than she had ever been able to see them before; and her grandmother was so kind, so gentle, so full of sympathy and comprehension, that the girl's love and gratitude sprang up towards her as it had never done of old, and the hearts that had long been sundered drew very close together now.

St. Hilda was rather disposed to make a heroine of the girl, who had returned from her hospital duties knocked up, as it was reported, by the zeal and ardour she had displayed at her post.

She was not, however, puffed up at all by all this notice; and although it was only to Barbara and Reinée that she told the whole story of her folly and obstinacy, she never forgot the humiliation she had been through, and knew better than to believe that to get her own way was to reach the summit of human happiness.

Mrs. Granby was very kind and judicious with the girl. She did not urge her to lay aside all her old ideals, or to make up her mind never to leave the beaten track of an uneventful country life. On the contrary, she told her plainly that if she felt any real call of duty elsewhere, or even a very strong desire for change, she would do her best to gratify her, and with far more confidence now than she could have done in old days when the girl had so very very much to learn and so little disposition to learn it.

Wulfric after a while renewed his offer of introducing her to the lady superintendent of his old hospital, and getting her on a visit there where she could see everything and be in the wards as much or as little as she chose, without the necessity for so much menial work, and with the addition of the companionship of other girls —lady probationers of her own social standing.

This idea, coupled with the prospect of seeing something of London, pleased Juliet, whose interest in hospital life had not been quenched by hard experience, and who was still eager to fit herself as a nurse in case of any outbreak of war. Mrs. Granby quite approved the plan, and would not hear of Juliet's giving it up on her account. The months of her absence would pass very quickly, and she should be a great gainer when the girl came home full of interesting information.

So Juliet at last looked forward to seeing London and learning more of nursing at one and the same time, and very pleased she was with the prospect. The project however was delayed for the present by a new turn in the aspect of affairs.

It was upon a warm day in April that Juliet first heard the news that resulted in her detention at St. Hilda.

She was sitting in the garden with a book, when she was aware that Barbara Meynal was hurrying towards her.

"Ah, Juliet," she said, "I am glad you are at home. I wanted to consult you, because I think you will know most and be most useful if you are not afraid of infection. Diphtheria in a very bad form has broken out in the hamlet. Three children died to-day and more are sickening; and it has attacked some of the grown-up people too. Wulf thinks it is caused by the drains, and that there will be a regular epidemic."

THE BEATITUDES.

BY THE REV. RICHARD GLOVER, BRISTOL.

I.

"Blessed are the Poor in Spirit: for theirs is the Kingdom of Heaven."—Matt. v. 3.

WITH fear and trembling I would attempt to expound and enforce the great Beatitudes. The Sermon on the Mount is not the opening utterance of the Saviour's ministry. He first gathers disciples and appoints apostles, and then in this ordination charge, gives His New Testament Church her great prescriptions. Since it was delivered, successive generations of all classes and kindreds of men have felt the authority of God in its tone. Since it was spoken, mankind has found in it, their law of duty, their light on God, their consolation of sorrow. Not merely all who went before but all instructors of men who followed after have fallen short of this great teaching. It has quickened the universal conscience, raised the general hope, enriched all men with the consolation of the living Providence of God. The great throne-speech of Christ—it is the great date of history, when old things began to pass away and all things to become new.

The Sermon on the Mount summing up the the Saviour's teaching, the Beatitudes sum up the Sermon. For the qualities Christ blesses are the essential graces elsewhere enjoined in more detail; and the Benedictions He utters are the promises elsewhere more fully made. It is therefore impossible to do justice to their wealth of meaning. At the same time their very wealth makes it easy to draw some comfort and quickening from them. This latter is all I dare hope to realize.

The crowds are becoming impracticable in their thronging, their excitement, and their vulgar curiosity in His works of healing. It will relieve Him of the more listless and worldly if He removes His quarters to a higher altitude and a distance from the throng of men. He goes therefore "up into a mountain," or "the mountain;"—up, that is, from the low shores of Gennesaret to the upland plain which stretched away from seven hundred to one thousand feet above it—with mountains on every hand rising higher still. To one of these summits He repaired—perhaps alone—to pray; and, after a night of prayer with God, in the morning came down from the summit to the elevated position where He had left His disciples. There He chose and ordained the twelve, and there preached this sermon to them and the multitude.

The Beatitudes are His Salutation to mankind. Entering the world He greets it with His peace. It seems at first as if He had forgotten for a moment the world in which He was and used the familiar salutation of the world of light. But the description He gives of those He blesses, and the nature of the blessings He proclaims reveal that there is no mistake. The congratulation is given and benediction addressed to large classes of this suffering world.

John the Baptist gazing on the world saw little in it but sin, and his greeting was the cry Repent. The great and gentle Gaudama—the founder of Buddhism—gazing on the world, saw little but its misery, and proclaimed Patience as the great wisdom, and hope of ultimate extinction of conscious life, as the great consolation of man. But the Saviour sees more than sin, and more than misery. In His Divine Heart, He feels a Boundless Love. In the heart of man, He sees a boundless capacity and a responsive life. He has such Divine energy of faith and hope that He can greet class after class, as "Blessed," as rich in joy, possessed or within their reach; as having a life grandly worth the living; as being bathed in and filled with the benediction of God.

The Lament over Jerusalem is not uttered over the world at large. He can look on its misery without shame, and without despair. The verdict, "Very good," which He passed on the glories of creation he finds not altogether unsuitable for the results of providence. This brightness of the Saviour's view is so marvellous that we should note and copy it. We look on the very classes which He greets, and their apparent misery drives us to despair. It is exactly the sight of the poor in body or soul, of the sorrows of the bereaved, the ill-usage of the meek, the seemingly fruitless hungering after righteousness, the impotence of the merciful to effect their purposes, the solitude of sanctity, the distresses of the peacemaking, the sufferings of the godly, that moves men everywhere to feel "the world is out of joint," and to gather despair alike of the reality of Providence and the sufficiency of Grace. But here those features of the world that move your compassion or despair receive Christ's congratulations. He reverses all current estimates, and corrects our erring pity and our needless despair, as He exclaims, happy are the poor, the mourners, the meek, the pure, the persecuted! He, whose heart melted with pity over every woe, sees, notwithstanding, mercy in all misery, advantage in loss, privilege in all hardship, right ordering in confusion, the success and wisdom of God in what seems the failure of human history.

It is something in a world where Pessimism is a sin that easily besets us, to draw nigh to these utterances of comfort, and try to look below the surface of manifest misery, till we see the secret roots of compensating good.

For these words are not lightly uttered. They are not the paradoxes of conceited contradiction. They are not the satire of some heart cursing the hollow gladness of the world. They are not the poetry of inexperience. As man He shared every sorrow He felicitates and knew its anguish. As God, the woes of men had sought refuge and relief in His heart. And it is with the profoundest knowledge of their working that He speaks. Yet class after class, multitude after multitude, He hails as blessed, happy, enviable!

These words which treat our calamities as kindnesses, our woes as mercies, and argue hope from the premises of despair, are to be our theme.

The first is given in briefer form by Luke: "Blessed are the poor." I prefer that of Matthew, for he probably heard the sermon, was possibly converted by it, and certainly reports it more fully. He gives the first benediction in the words, "Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

This word confronts us in its simple majesty. Let us endeavour to understand it: not diluting it, to make it more credible and intelligible, but wistfully and devoutly addressing ourselves to learn its mystery.

At the outset, we mark that here we have evidently the keynote of the whole series. All the classes successively named, might be included in the description "poor in spirit." For the "mourners" are "poor" for want of gladness: and the "meek" for want of their rights: and the "hungerers after righteousness" for want of grace. And all the blessings named are included in "the kingdom of heaven," for it brings comfort, righteousness, mercy, rewards in heaven. So that if the Beatitudes sum up the sermon: this first Beatitude presents us with the sum and essence of the rest.

In endeavouring to attain its meaning, consider: First: THOSE BLESSED:—"BLESSED ARE THE POOR IN SPIRIT." Second: THEIR BLESSING:—"THEIR'S IS THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN.

I. And first: THOSE BLESSED: "THE POOR IN SPIRIT." The strangest of all paradoxes! If the benediction stopped at the word "poor," and meant only the indigent, it would have been more intelligible. For we see the perils of wealth: its tendency to produce worldly content, to foster pride, to permit men to take liberties with duty, to divide us from our fellows and from our God. And we all can discern in the roughness of earthly discomfort, an influence waking better longings and raising looks for help from heaven.

But poverty in the soul, is a kind of indigence which seems to have no redeeming feature, and all wise men shrink from it. To be rich in soul is what our wisdom aspires to—for who is blessed, if not he who is rich in power of will; in glow of feeling: in light: in happy memories: in buoyant hope?

Yet the Saviour here says, "Blessed are the poor in spirit;" not those who "feel poor," not merely the lowly; but those with poverty-stricken souls—souls in want of all things; those starving for want of bread of life, sinking for want of wine of life: those poor for want of light on God; poor for want of light on duty; those so poor in strength, that they dare face no temptation: these so poor in soul-forces, that every duty strains them: those without raptures, without complacency, without joy in God or in success: without serenity, without satisfaction in the past, or confidence for the future!

If any are pitiable is it not such? And every one of my readers who feels heart and soul poor within him, feels himself one to be commiserated and presents this poverty as a plea for sympathy for pity, for help. His poverty is his despair. If he were only rich in soul, he would be indifferent to any poverty of body—but to be without the qualities, the forces, the faculties we most of all desire, is to be poor indeed.

Yet the Saviour says: "Blessed are the poor in spirit." What does He mean? How can the pitiful Christ speak thus?

The secret comes out in the reason He assigns. He saw what we see not—an infinite wealth of God available for all; surpassing all conceivable wealth of soul or circumstances. He saw a heart of God bent on imparting this wealth to human hearts; but, baffled in its efforts to do so, by finding them pre-occupied and satisfied with the poorer wealth of earth, and only succeeding where some aching void was craving for help and strength, and love. To His eye, therefore, wealth was poverty, as it tended to keep out the truest wealth, and to His eye poverty of soul was wealth, as that which, ready to admit, was certain to secure the true wealth of God.

He speaks from the consciousness of bringing infinite wealth within reach of the souls of men, and, from His point of view, those were most blessed who had most room within them for the heavenly wealth He brought. Possession seems to him the real poverty, for the lesser wealth tends to prevent the getting the higher, and the lesser comfort to prevent the getting the heavenly comfort, and the common strength of character tends to prevent the gaining of a higher strength of grace, and natural hope prevents the finding a hope in the smile of God. The Pharisee's self-righteousness tends to prevent the attainment of "the righteousness of God." As what is glorious has no glory in the presence of a glory that excelleth, so what is rich has no preciousness if it prevents our gaining something richer still. We are the poorer for having our hands full of silver, if that prevents our getting them filled with gold. And because the Saviour felt Himself the bearer of divine delights, of infinite salvation, richest pardon, all-conquering grace, He pitied all who had no room for His gifts, and congratulates all the hungry-hearted on the wealth now near them.

This is most solemn as well as most comforting. For it warns us in our contentment, as much as it cheers us in our despair. "What is gain to us," we, like Paul, perchance, should count as loss, as damage, as something standing between us and true wealth. Many a man's wisdom prevents his seeking and finding inspired wisdom. Peter's strength moved him to presume and ended in a fall, where weakness might have watched and prayed, and found a strength which overcame. Our great possessions may make us, like the young ruler, turn away from "the treasure in heaven" the Saviour promises to us. Like the Pharisees, we may, in our complacence reject the counsel of God against ourselves, while publicans and harlots in their despair welcome and enter His kingdom. Like Paul, when weak, then are we strong, for weakness supplies the occasion for "the power of Christ to rest on our hearts." And so constant is the connection between self-emptiness and the fulness of God's power resting on us that we like him would do wisely to welcome, and even glory in, the infirmities that attract the great forces of God to our hearts.

We have therefore to take this word in its simplest, strangest, fullest meaning as the truth of God. Blessed was the woman who washed Christ's feet with tears; blessed, the dying thief; blessed, the Syro-Phœnician woman in her grief; blessed, Zaccheus in his contrition; for the soul-emptiness, yearning, necessities, permitted the wealth of heaven to flow into them.

And blessed to-day are all those in deep soul-need; most blessed, the most needy. Fear not to take this comfort, ye "poor in spirit." You to whom life is a great struggle, who yearn for more vitality, who have not strength for your cares nor for your duties; you, who have deep sorrows needing solace; you who have neither plea, excuse, nor sufficiency; you who have not sufficient light to see what you should believe; you who want all things for earth and heaven, blessed are you—for Jesus brings nigh a great salvation, forgiveness, grace, comfort, light—all. And if there is only room in us for His mercies, He will fill us with all the fulness of God. O mourn no longer your poverty, but claim your share in the great benediction of God.

In marking those who are truly blessed, we have necessarily anticipated a good deal concerning the Benediction. I need add therefore only a very little on my second point. Consider—

II. THEIR BLESSING: "THEIRS IS THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN." By "the Kingdom of heaven," the Saviour always means that kingdom of grace—which He, man's true King, sets up in the world. The kingdom whose subjects serve God, find now and here His protection, His salvation, His guidance, His mercies; and find all these in fulness and perfection hereafter. The kingdom of heaven is, therefore, in the experience of men, grace, life, righteousness, peace, joy in the Holy Ghost; every blessing of relationship and grace.

And the Saviour proclaims that this Great Kingdom in all its great mercy belongs to "the poor in spirit." It is theirs, as meant for them. The citizenship is open to them. Christ's demand is only need. Grace, like air, fills every vacuum of the heart. Not righteous only, but sinners are called to it, and for them are the gates opened, and to them the welcome given. The infinite treasures of the kingdom are for these, the great atonement, the everlasting pardon, are for all, but specially for those in deepest need. Peace with God, God's love shed abroad in the heart, hope full of immortality, life abundant, grace sufficient, power of victory, power of usefulness, power of prayer, the great employments of the kingdom, its highest equipments, and its great rewards, all these are for the poor in spirit, all these things are theirs, in the great sense of being provided for them, brought to them, pressed on their acceptance "without money and without price."

And this being so, every sort of soul-poverty is a blessing, as giving room for the grace and wealth of God, and the more large the need, the better for him who has this wealth within his reach.

Thank God, that when none are worthy, all are welcome, and that the more needy the more welcome we are to Him. And the provision being so rich and free, and God's love so great, multitudes of poor souls have entered the kingdom, and been enriched with all its wealth! Some chiefs of sinners, some waifs and strays, some wrecked and seemingly ruined, some bankrupt backsliders, some despairing doubters, multitudes that none can number have felt their poverty, have carried it to their Saviour and lost it in the kingdom of heaven!

Blessed are the poor in spirit still, and if you have room for more light, for protection, for increase of strength, help in self-mastery; if you need more peace, more joy, more hope, more feeling; if you have room, in a word, for salvation and the love of God, blessed are you, for the kingdom of heaven is for you.

LIFE IN NEW GUINEA.

BY THE REV. JAMES CHALMERS.

II.—THE INHABITANTS.

I LOVE savages, not with a sentiment born of philanthropy or Christian zeal, but as the result of experience gained during many years of happy intercourse with them. Although they are unvarnished, and have many dark spots which the arts of civilisation would fain teach them to hide, I prefer real things; and a simple savage, if he seldom has noble traits, is intensely human and capable of sincere and enduring friendship.

It is often said, "Why not leave the savages alone in their primitive state? They only are truly happy." How little do those who thus speak know what that life really is. A savage seldom sleeps well at night. He is in constant fear of attacks from neighbouring tribes, as well as the more insidious foes created by his superstitious mind. Ghosts and hobgoblins, those midnight wanderers, cause him much alarm, as their movements are heard in the sighing of the wind, in falling leaves, lizards chirping, or disturbed birds singing. If midnight is the favourite time for spirit movements, there is another hour when he has good cause to fear the first-mentioned enemies. It is the uncanny hour between the morning star and the glimmering light of approaching day—the hour of yawning and arm-stretching, when the awakening pipe is lighted, and the first smoke of the day enjoyed. The following will show what I mean.

Some six years ago, the people of the large district of Saroa came in strong battle array, and in the early morning ascended the Manukolo hills, surrounded the villages, and surprised and killed men, women, and children, from the poor grey-headed sire to the infant in arms. About forty escaped to Kalo, but were soon compelled to leave, as Saroa threatened to burn Kalo if it harboured the fugitives. They pleaded for peace, but without avail. Saroa said, "Every soul must die." The quarrel began about a pig.

Here is another incident—alas! only one of many I could narrate—equally demonstrative of the dread fear attached by them to that early hour of day.

Paitana is a village situate on one of the creeks running from Hall Sound. It is surrounded by mangrove swamp, but in the village cocoa-nut, betel-nut, and breadfruit trees grow luxuriantly. The inhabitants have always been regarded as a treacherous crowd; but, having visited them, I hoped they would become more friendly. Returning several months after, I found that some had arranged during the first visit to have my head, and I now remember many things which then appeared very suspicious.

Several years ago two foreigners were killed in Hall Sound by the Paitana natives, and they have also killed people from Delena, Maiva, and other villages. The climax was reached in September, 1883, when they killed a man from Lese, who was visiting them as a friend. When the news of the murder reached Lese, the people there determined to wait until planting season was over, and then to take their revenge.

To the Papuan mind, the duties of friendship are of a sacred character, and this violation of them appeared the most flagrant transgression of their savage code of honour. For a long time the people of Paitana, fearing an attack, lived away from their village, but thinking that the Lesеans had in their delay given up all thought of "payment," they returned to their home. Meanwhile the people of Lese were preparing revarevas (war canoes), and keeping very quiet about their intentions. The blow fell at last, and a terrible retribution it proved to be. Paitana fancied her peculiar position rendered her secure. The village lay far up a creek, and had to be approached through very long grass; it was surrounded by a thick mangrove bush.

[From a photograph.

NEW GUINEA WOMEN GOING FOR WATER.

The sleeping inhabitants little dreamed of what the early morning would yield.

Twenty-four revarevas were prepared by Lese. These are made by lashing poles across two long canoes, and upon these poles a platform is erected. Men with paddles sit at the head and stern, whilst the platform is crowded with warriors in full war paint, armed with spears, bows, arrows, and clubs. This fleet started, and pulled all night. Arriving on the south-west side of Yule Island, they remained there until the following night. After sunset, when quite dark, they advanced up the creek, where they met a canoe with a man and two women in it, belonging to Lolo. They made the man a prisoner, saying, they did not wish to kill him, but to save his life and the women's, he must be their guide. To this he consented, and after leading them to the village, was allowed to return. The village was surrounded, and a strong party sent into the main street. All sat down quietly. The morning star was up, and soon there would be sufficient light for their dreadful work.

A native awakes, lights his baubau (pipe), has a smoke, a yawn, a stretch; then looking out, and seeing people in the village, calls out—"Who are you?"

"We are Leseans come to pay for our friend you killed. Long have we waited to see you punished for your murdering propensities, but all seem afraid of you. You have tried your hand on us, and now we will take the matter up."

In other houses the aroused natives are now in a state of confusion. Already the arrows fly in showers, and men, women, and children are wounded. Many flying are caught and clubbed. Others remain in their houses, hoping to be omitted in the general carnage. The houses are entered, everything valuable is carried away, and speedily the whole village is in a blaze, when the dead, the wounded, and the living are all burnt in the one great fire.

I asked a native who got through the environment how many were killed. He said, "It is impossible to tell the number of the dead, only ten who slept in the village that night escaped."

Flushed with victory, and weighted with loot, the Lesians returned to their revarevas, pulled down the creek and along the coast, with horns blowing and men and women dancing and singing on the platforms. Their return was celebrated with feasting and dancing; and again and again in the midst of the festivities the scenes of that morning were recounted with pride.

Ah! savage life is not the joyous hilarity some writers depict. It is not always the happy laugh, the feast and the dance. Like life in civilised communities, it is varied and many-sided. There are often seasons when tribes are scattered, hiding in large trees, in caves, and in other villages far away from their homes. Not long ago, inland from Port Moresby, a large hunting party camping in a cave were smoked out by their enemies and all killed but one. Once when travelling inland, I found the Makabili tribe in terrible weather living in the bush, under shelving rocks, among the long grass, and in hollow trees. The people at Port Moresby say that now for the first time they all sleep in peace, and that as they can trust the peace of God's word, they mean to keep to it. This is significant, coming from those who not long since were the most noted pirates, robbers, and murderers along the whole coast of the peninsula.

But I must hasten on to describe as succinctly as possible some of the traits in these interesting people.

Upon this immense island the two types of Malay and Polynesian seem to meet, and often to commingle. There is no homogeneous race forming a national transition from one to the other, like the Anglo-Saxon. The Malay, of medium height, slender build, small head, straight hair, and regular features, is found settled in many communities along large tracts of coast. These vary in colour from light slate to dark brown. The Polynesians are tall, muscular, hard-working people, very excitable; they range from dark brown to deep black in colour, and have the head large, with bushy crinkled hair often very long. There are also to be seen in small numbers among some of the hill ranges and on certain islands the remnants of a negro race, in some respects but little above the aborigines of Australia, and possessing some striking resemblances to them. I believe this race to be the original inhabitants of the country, and that they have retired before the advances of superior tribes.

The Motu tribe is one of the most important at present known on the peninsula. They stand first both in energy and mental power. As they were once pre-eminent in wickedness, now that the Gospel is exercising its sway over them they are an example for good, enabling the missionary when speaking to other natives, to point out the great change wrought in them by its power.

Childhood is a happy period in New Guinea. Many of their games resemble those of English children, and rounders and skipping are just as much appreciated there as here.

Boys early learn the use of weapons, and miniature bows and arrows, spears and clubs are made for them by their fathers; whilst a girl is soon initiated into the arts of cooking, planting, weeding, manufacture of pottery, and other duties which are woman's lot in life.

The people are usually of a very lively temperament. They love excitement, and revel in fighting and rows. Some tribes gesticulate much when speaking, and it is most laughable to observe them when excited. Their grimaces are remarkably expressive, and not a few possess great powers of mimicry. When bartering, they haggle very much, and depreciate the articles offered. A market is almost as noisy as a fight, and behind each long row of buyers or sellers stands a line of sentinels, spear in hand, ready to settle any dispute in the most summary fashion.

Parents are very fond of their children, and the affection is reciprocated with interest in the shape of a profound veneration which deepens with years. Lads of twenty will not engage for a few days' trip unless mother consents, and often a man of forty, while willing to be employed, will say, "Let me first go and hear what my mother and wife say, and if it be all right I shall be back in a few minutes." The trouble of maternity is comparatively a light one, and often on the coast a mother will immediately walk down to the sea and bathe herself and new-born child. Families, as a rule, consist only of four or five children. Occasionally one with eight or nine is found. There is no infanticide in any of the tribes known to me.

The New Guinea woman does not think herself overwrought, and will not allow any interference in her own departments of work. Her cooking duties are not heavy. It is, however, right to remark on this point that the people are very hospitable, and their chief method of welcome is the readiness and promptitude with which they set to work to prepare food. They never seem weary of cooking for friends who come from a distance.

The food is usually cooked in earthenware pots, after the fashion of Irish stew. These pots are made only by certain tribes, and when war arises near the manufacturing districts, the pottery business is seriously hindered, much to the disgust of the makers, and the inconvenience of their customers.

A place for cooking is made of stones and earth in the centre of the floor of the house. A circle of stones being formed, wood is placed within it and lighted, and upon that the pot stands. Inland, ovens are made by digging a trench, and filling it with wood and with hard stones. When the stones are brought up to a white heat, the remaining wood is withdrawn, the stones are spread out, and banana leaves placed upon them. On these is placed the food to be cooked; it is then all covered up with banana leaves, whilst on the top is heaped all the burning wood which remains. The chief foods are sago, bananas, bread-fruit, yams, and taro.

Inland from the coast, ginger is used with food and much relished with salt. I like green ginger and salt. They have a great distaste for the red pepper berries.

Pork is very seldom used, and pig-killing affords an opportunity for inviting many friends to partake. Annual feasts and house building are occasions for such display.

They all like fish, especially in times of sickness, when they have a failing appetite. The species caught on that coast are mullet, roach, cod, &c., together with many kinds of shell fish.

They have no intoxicating drink, and very little water or cocoa nut milk is drunk at any time. This is very significant when the great heat is considered, and can only be accounted for by the quantity of water contained in their usual articles of diet.

One meal a day is the universal rule, and that is taken in the afternoon. Father and sons eat together, and the mother and daughters do the same in another place. Children at certain ages can only eat particular kinds of food. When the husband is tabooed, his wife must not cook food for, or hand it to him, neither may she speak to or even look at him. His daughter, niece, or other female relatives may do it. Men tabooed can only eat certain kinds of food, and will have no other sort. I have been troubled often with my boat's crew and carriers in order to secure food for those who were tabooed for any particular reason.

In the Gulf cannibalism is of old standing, the habit of many generations. It is scarcely sixty years since it was introduced into the East end of the peninsula. But human flesh cannot be said, in the most inveterate cannibal districts, to be a staple article of food. The Motuans when amongst the cannibals will not use the pots of the latter, lest they should have been used for cooking human flesh. An old chief who was much attached to Mrs. Chalmers brought her a very dainty bit, the breast of a man, as a proof of his affection. It was laid at her feet. She spoke kindly to her cannibal friend, gave him a present, and asked him to take with him that which he had apportioned as her share, saying that we never partook of such, and hoped he would soon give it up. I do not think the old man again tasted human flesh until the day of his death, which happened some years after.

In speaking of native dress you touch upon a slender topic, so slight indeed that it almost eludes description. Everywhere the women wear a grass petticoat, varying in length and thickness according to their tribal custom. The only exception I know of on the coast is that of some of the old women in the Elema district, who are content to wear only a flat white shell. At the east, in the Milne Bay and Dahuni districts, the men make a maro from the young sago palm leaf, and are well covered. I do not think they require much more dressing; what they wear they attend to well, and it becomes them. Others have a narrow strip of native cloth, but in the districts further west the men only sport a string. "Attention to dress" or otherwise consists in the varying degrees of slackness or tightness with which the string is worn, and in a slight increase or diminution in the width of the cloth. In all the districts where the string is used it is amusing to see the care they take in adjusting it, and they would as soon think of being without it as more civilised nations would of going without their trousers or kilts.

The women are the burden-bearers, both on the coast and inland. When travelling I have seen them with loads piled high on the head, and with infants on the top, climbing 1600 feet apparently with as much ease as they would walk along a good road.

In many tribes the women are tattooed on the face and body, some in lines and in a Z pattern, others in a style something like a Maltese cross.

The men do the fighting and hard work of planting, such as clearing the ground, first planting and fencing, fishing, house-building, canoe-making, and weapons of all kinds.

THE HYMN-WRITERS OF WALES AND THEIR HYMNS.

V.—DR. WILLIAM REES—EMRYS—ISLWYN—HYMNS OF TO-DAY.

IN some respects the Rev. Dr. William Rees (Hiraethog) ranks as the greatest Welshman of the nineteenth century. Preacher and lecturer, journalist and reformer, poet and essayist, there are whole pages in the national history of Wales covered with his broad and sturdy handwriting. But his poetical genius was too massive to produce hymns of the first order. Most of them lack the smoothness of expression and neatness of form so necessary in the making of a good hymn.

One of the gifts of his muse is a new poetical version of the Psalms. How the ministry of affliction helped him to accomplish this undertaking is told in his own words:—

"Failing health kept me almost wholly at home during the winter and spring of 1872-3, even as late as the middle of the month of April scarcely venturing out of the house, except on the Sabbath. I consecrated every hour of every day that my weary nature could endure, through the space of the time mentioned, to the task of completing what remained of this work, together with attending to the calls of the pulpit:—and when the clock was striking four, in the afternoon of Friday, March 21st, 1873, I was letting the pen out of my hand, having written the last line of the versification. It would not be easy for me to forget how I felt that moment. I gave thanks from my heart, I believe, to the Father of all mercies for having suffered me to live to see this labour completed; and I tried to dedicate it to the blessing of Him who had supported and strengthened me to carry it through, with a degree of confidence that some might derive benefit and pleasure from its perusal through that blessing. Many a time when, suffering and afflicted, I was at the task, I thought of the words of the Psalmist—'Unless Thy law had been my delights, I should then have perished in mine affliction.' So I said:—Had the Psalms not been my delights, I would have perished, from suffering of body and depression of spirit, many a day during that season when I was like Paul, to some extent as it were a prisoner in my own hired house."

Of the two Psalters of the present century that of Nicander is more marked for smoothness and more likely therefore to enrich church-song; but that of Hiraethog possesses more originality, and makes a very useful companion of the Psalms in the study.

The hymn-poem, of which a version is given below, gains an additional interest from the undertone of personal experience easily recognised among the broader movements of a universal theme. Its dramatic cast, however, renders it, like his Psalter, more useful for private devotion than for public worship. It has found its way into most of the later hymn-books of Wales, and is known far and wide.

THE SEARCH OF A TIRED SOUL FOR REST.

I went searching through creation
For my soul a place of rest—
Disappointment and vexation
Everywhere repaid my quest.
From the world and flesh to tempt me
Came a thousand promised joys;
But I found them false and empty,
Lying dreams and gilded toys.

Then I asked the white and holy Angel-thousands of the skies—
"With a sinner poor and lowly
Have you one will sympathise?"
Gabriel answered my appealing—
"Not with us; no, there is none
That can have a fellow-feeling
With a soul unclean—undone!"

Hope in utter darkness vanished,
And I cried in agony—
"All deliverance is banished!
It is over now with me!"
Stormy clouds on Sinai setting,
And my spirit trembling sore—
Oh! there can be no forgetting
Of that anguish evermore!

On the throne of high possession,
Through my tears at last I see,
In His robes of intercession,
Him who bowed the head for me:
"There He is!" my soul exclaimèd,
"I can read it in His face—
He will never be ashamèd
To receive me in His grace."

To His throne my soul proceeded,
Deigning at His feet to fall;
And for love and pardon pleaded
Through the blood that saveth all:
"What?"—I mused—"Should I conceal it,
All this grief and broken cheer?
Hide the wound while He can heal it?
It is Christ!—why need I fear?"

When I opened, slowly, sadly,
My dark bosom, sin-oppressed,
Then He opened quickly, gladly,
For my shelter His own breast:
All my burden He removèd,
Yea, He gave me full release;
With the smile of my Belovèd
Came the joy of perfect peace.

Body, spirit, now I owe Him,
I belong to Him henceforth—
Oh, that I might live to show Him
Everywhere in all His worth!
When I join the host surrounding
His serene, eternal throne,
I shall sing of grace abounding,
And the song shall be His own!

Dr. Rees was born in the month of November, 1802, at the foot of Hiraethog hill, near Denbigh. It was in the same month, eighty-one years later, that he fell asleep in the city of Chester. "The search of a tired soul for rest" came to an end, when the Saviour met him at the door and asked him to come in.

A close friend and fellow-worker of the last was the Rev. William Ambrose (Emrys). He was born at the Penrhyn Arms Hotel, Bangor, August 10th, 1813. The course of his life was even and calm as the flowing of a river through a level land; his death alone adding an incident of startling impressiveness to his earthly story. He was preaching in his own pulpit at Portmadoc, on Sunday, April 27th, 1873. For some time he had been suffering much from the effect of a paralytic stroke; but that was a day of marked power, and the people felt the peculiar nearness of the spirit land. The text of the evening sermon was Isaiah vii. 15: "For thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and the holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble and to revive the heart of the contrite ones." It was a remarkably powerful sermon; and hundreds were rejoicing that night in the hope of restored eloquence and further guiding of their soul through him into the doctrine of Jesus Christ. But he had scarcely come down from the pulpit when he was seen to grow pale and lean heavily back. It was the final stroke—the hand of death was laid upon him as he was coming out of the shining cloud. For six months he lingered; and all that time the silver tongue was speechless. It was on the 31st of October, the same year, that the silent Hand once more was laid upon him, and more heavily. But it was only to make his spirit free, and to lead him to the land where the word of eloquence can never be hushed any more.

His poetry, like his life, is beautifully clear and tranquil. This hymn, for instance, does it not sound like the footsteps of the Spirit of Peace in the house of life?

Give me quiet resting-places,
Lord, beneath the shade of palms:
Where the heavenly pilgrims gather,
Where they sing their joyful psalms:
There they linger to make mention
Of Thy faithfulness and grace,
Till their sorrows are forgotten
In the pleasure of Thy praise.

Happy is the brethren's discourse,
They who seek the better land;
Not an evil tongue to flatter,
Nor a traitor's cruel hand:
Heavenly dew on each experience,
Words of faith in glad refrain—
All are filled with sweet home-longing,
Where the end is glorious gain.

Lord, until we reach uphold us!
It is but a little while;
When the journey darkly closes
Let Thy sunlight on us smile:
Let the breezes of the Home-land
Meet us in the valley's gloom;
Till our feet are safely treading
Hills of light and fadeless bloom.

The Rev. William Thomas (Islwyn) was born at Mynydd-islwyn, in the county of Monmouth, April 3rd, 1832. His life was spent in the secluded and undisturbed neighbourhood of his birth; and there he died November 20th, 1878. Purposing in his early youth to become a land surveyor, at the age of twenty-two the inward impulse led him to the pulpit. He was ordained at Llangeithio Association in 1859, but he never took a pastoral charge. He suffered much from melancholy. In consequence his preaching engagements were not kept as faithfully as they should have been. Sometimes an elder would announce him in the following significant terms: "Islwyn will preach here next Sunday—if he comes." His poetry stands among the best in Welsh literature; deeply tinged as it is with the unfamiliar idealizings of a mystic soul. Only three of his hymns are published. The one given below has already found a place in the hymnody of the Welsh church, and has its record among the songs ordained of the Holy Spirit to give stay and patience of hope to the righteous in the hour of sorrow and death.

See, my soul, the land of brightness
Far above the clouds of time;
Where the breeze with balmy lightness
Bloweth through a genial clime;
Joyful thousands!
Moving in its rest serene.

Life has there its crystal fountains,
Peace—whose rivers softly flow,
To refresh its vales and mountains,
To immortalize its glow;
And salvation
On the sunny shores is breathed.

Never can a mortal arrow
On its nearest province fall:
Death's dominion is but narrow—
There it cometh not at all:
Life abundant;
Immortality at home!

Every breeze of winter changes
On the shore to heavenly calm,
O'er its fields no sorrow ranges,
Where each sigh becomes a psalm:
Into Jordan
Falls the last most bitter tear.

There—there is not one that mourneth,
There—there is not any sad;
There—the gall to honey turneth,
There—the bound is free and glad:
Joyful thousands,
There abiding evermore!

Now my heart is filled with blessing,
And a sacred joy is mine,
In the hope of my possessing
That inheritance divine:
Joyful thousands,
Drawing near that promised land!

So far, for the present, these sketches of the singers of the church of Christ in Wales. No one must for a moment suppose that the list is exhausted. Some names have been omitted, it may be of equal honour with some of those included. The Rev. B. Francis, of Horsley, Gloucestershire; Mr. Edward Jones (Maesyplwm); Mr. Peter Jones (Pedr Fardd); Rev. W. Hughes, Dinas; Mr. T. Lewis, Tal-y-Llychau—such names may appear to an English reader as a chance group out of some dusty chronicle of forgotten names. But had their hymns not been in the possession and ritual of the Welsh church, its anthology would be so much the poorer. In most cases their verses did not adapt themselves for translation. Enough, for present purposes, that all our readers should know how many hands—known or unknown—have touched the harp of Zion in the Principality; and left melodies which can only die with the ancient language of the land. And may that fate be sine die!

There is also a later generation of Welsh hymn-writers; but to these I may return at some more convenient season. Their songs are under probation; and some, at least, appear to have in them the hope of permanent service. In the meanwhile I select a hymn written by a preacher, as well-known almost in England as he is in Wales—the Rev. Herber Evans, of Carnarvon.

Keep me very near to Jesus,
Though beneath His cross it be;
In this world of evil-doing
'Tis the cross that cleanseth me:
Should there come distress and darkness
Let this hope with me abide—
After all the gloom and sorrow,
Light shall be at eventide.

Bring to mind my past experience—
That shall take my fears away;
For Thy goodness and Thy mercy
Shall be mine till close of day:
Through the tears, the clouds, the tempest,
Shine on me, O Crucified!
There's a promise in God's rainbow—
Light shall be at eventide.

Lead me onward to the future,
Where I fear one step to move;
Still the love of God upholds me—
Love beyond a mother's love:
Calvary enough has proved,
Hear the song on yonder side—
Though the cross stand in the pathway,
Light shall be at eventide.

For all the hymns which have been written, there is room in the Wales of to-day for a new school of hymnody. Every age has its peculiar mode of religious expression; the age now dawning in Wales emphatically so. It will be an age of transition and suspense; it will claim the guidance of strong, progressive thought. I trust the Eisteddfod will not exhaust the muse of all its bards. Some of them, surely, will not consider it a vain thing to give the church of Christ the psalm that will sanctify its anxiety, that will teach it where to find rest and hope and light.

Things New and Old.

BILLS OF CREDIT FOR THE FUTURE LIFE.—About sixteen miles east of Ningpo, China, lies a noted mountain, Ling Fông, to which tens of thousands, from all parts of Chekiang, go up yearly to worship. The first day of the ceremonies few besides women attend. Although the path up the mountain was paved, and the steeper ascents were furnished with steps, still it was a tedious climb, even for one with natural feet. The wonder grew upon us how the women, with their little bandaged stubs, could not only climb the mountain, but walk miles to reach it. As we neared the place we were beset by vendors of incense sticks urging us to buy. Arriving at a level space, about half-way up the mountain, we found rows of wretched straw huts on either side of the path leading to a building scarcely more than a shed, containing one large room. In it were a few small, dilapidated idols, before which the people burnt incense sticks and made prostrations. A desire to worship was by no means the only motive that brought these eager throngs hither. They had come to make preparation for death. And the preparation considered necessary was not purity of heart and life, but money. These multitudes had left their homes and busy pursuits to come hither for the special purpose of buying bills of credit to be burnt at death in order to secure a large sum of money in the next world. These bills of credit, costing twenty-four cash, or about two cents, are small strips of yellow paper, upon which are roughly printed a few characters. These are supposed to be good for about thirteen hundred dollars after death. Behind tables stood men selling these bills. Others were busy stamping with red paint pieces of cotton cloth, which were carried away as evidence that they had been to the sacred spot. The more years they make this pilgrimage, and the more bills of credit they get, the greater will be their merit and wealth in the next life.—Woman's Work in China.

DILIGENCE.—"All the water is lost that runs beside the mill, and all thy thoughts are waste which help thee not to do God's work withal in thy general or particular calling. The bee will not sit on a flower where no honey can be sucked, neither should the Christian."

"SEEK YE FIRST THE KINGDOM OF GOD, AND HIS RIGHTEOUSNESS; AND ALL THESE THINGS SHALL BE ADDED UNTO YOU."—Matt. vi. 33.

Would you the Kingdom of Heaven possess?
Would you that Christ your soul should bless,
And save you out of all distress?
Then make Him "First."
He left His throne that you might be Rescued from death, from sin set free;
He suffered death upon the Tree,
And Satan's worst.

Would you the Holy Spirit gain;
To sanctify, reprove, restrain,
And cleanse your soul from every stain?
Then make Him "First."
For He alone can make you pure;
By Him you may all scorn endure;
Heaven's glory by His aid insure;
No longer curst.

J. Turn.

Upon the sadness of the sea
The sunset broods regretfully,
From the far lonely spaces slow
Withdraws the wistful afterglow.

So out of life the splendour dies,
So darken all the happy skies,
So gathers twilight, cold and stern,
But overhead the planets burn.

And up the east another day,
Shall chase the bitter dawn away,
What though our eyes with tears be wet;
The sunrise never failed us yet.

The blush of dawn may yet restore
Our light and hope and joy once more,
Sad soul, take comfort nor forget
That sunrise never failed us yet.

LIPHOOK'S FLATS.

NATTY lived in Liphook's Flats. She was a little cripple scarcely nine years old. Some people pitied her, as the "stump, stump" of her one crutch—she had not a pair—was heard on the staircases. But as a rule the tenants of the "Flats" were too much taken up with their own trials to trouble themselves much about the little crooked creature with the golden hair.

And such hair it was! There was one little old man in the buildings who said that he had never seen such hair before, and he had been in the world a very long time. He was a hawker by trade, and he used to stay at home sometimes in his one room making his stock of microscopes, which were nothing more than little glass globes filled with water. His window was opposite Natty's, and now and then he would pause in his work to take a look at the little golden head which was peeping out of the window of room 417.

The "Flats" were such a large place. Room 417 was on the ninth floor, and when you reached the top landing it was a matter of some little difficulty to get one's breath. It was especially hard for Natty's mother, with her racking cough. She was a sempstress in a clothing factory; so that she was away all the day long, leaving little Natty in charge of their one-room home. This room was not much larger than a cupboard, and it was on the inner side of the quadrangle, in which Liphook had planned his "Flats." The only prospect which the apartment had was a dreary view of the opposite side of the court, a great wall with so many windows that they were quite tiresome to gaze at.

Outside the hawker's window the old man himself had placed a small shelf, upon which stood a pot with some plant growing in it. What it was little Natty did not know, it was too far off to tell the shape of its leaves; and even if she had been closer to it, she would not have been able to say whether the pot held musk, creeping-jenny or mignonette. It was rarely that the crippled girl could get into the streets, where it was possible for stronger children to see sometimes the plants "all a-growin' and a blowin'" upon the costermongers' barrows. She envied those boys and girls whose shouts echoed in the court, as they romped in the playground which they made of it. They were free, out of Board School hours, to come and go as they pleased, and for them the steep stone staircases, with their many landings, were no hindrance to their enjoyment. But a journey to the ground floor, and the climbing back again, was a painful and laborious task for Natty, and there was little pleasure to be had, for she found herself roughly pushed about by the youngsters in the yard. They would pull her hair through their coarse fingers, in rude admiration of its silkiness, but such behaviour was not altogether pleasing to the child. They said, too, for they were Londoners, bred and born, and in spite of their tender age, fully alive to the practical side of life, that Natty was an "odd young 'un." She had too many dreams to suit them, and they could not understand the contemplative look in her blue eyes.

If it had not been for the little old man who made and sold the "magnifiers," as he called his globes, Natty would have felt very lonely and sad. These two became acquainted. One day he had come up Natty's staircase to see a lodger on that side of the "Flats," and he had saved her from falling. Her crutch had slipped upon a piece of orange peel which some careless tenant had dropped upon the stone steps, already sufficiently dangerous. It was on that day that the old man had told her about her hair. Not long afterwards he sent up one of his magnifiers with a request that she would have it. I fancy, too, that "Old Phil" brought and fixed up the flower pot outside his window principally for Natty's sake.

"You're a little lonesome this morning," said Natty's kind friend, as he pushed open the door of No. 417.

"Oh, no," replied Natty with a sudden smile, as she recognised old Phil, "at least, not now."

"Yes, yes, you are," the old man persisted; "you must be in this poky little place. I wish old Liphook hadn't been so werry anxious to put us up in the sky, afore our time."

The old fellow was catching his breath as he spoke.

"How kind of you to come so far," said Natty; "it's a dreadful long way up. But it ain't so noisy as down below, do you think?"

"Well, I don't take much note of noise; I am pretty nigh used to it by this time, and old 'uns don't hear so well as young folk."

"Won't you come in?"

Old Phil was all this while at the door, fumbling with something which he held behind his back. There was a chirp heard as he took a step into the room.

"There," chuckled he, "he was in too great a hurry. He's let the cat out o' the bag of hisself; leastways, he don't mean to be hid any longer. Ain't he a beauty?"

"Why it's a bird!" almost screamed the little cripple in her delight, as Old Phil took out of his handkerchief a battered cage, with its feathered inmate hopping about on the perch.

"A bird, and that it is," answered he, placing the cage in the girl's hands.

"For me?" she asked.

"Yes, my girl. I thought you might be a bit lonesome, and I picked him up cheap, 'cos he's moultin'."

The bird was indeed moulting. He was a sorry specimen, with rusty plumage and no tail worth mentioning, but he seemed to liven up every moment. Perhaps he mistook Natty's golden hair for the sunlight. At all events he made a feeble attempt to pipe his song.

"I'll be going now," said Old Phil. "I am working Cheapside to-day. I hope it'll keep fine."

"Thank you, thank you, oh, so much," said Natty. "I'll kiss you, if you like."

The old man bent his weather-worn cheek toward her and she kissed it, twice. And so they parted.

That day a dreadful thing happened. There was an accident in Cheapside. An old man was knocked down by a restless horse. His stock of "magnifiers" was scattered, and Old Phil, for it was he, was picked up, crushed to death by the wheels of a heavy van.

There was a formal inquest at the hospital—one of half-a-dozen "accidental deaths" disposed of in half an hour by an over-worked coroner—the customary verdict was returned, and nothing more. Old Phil's empty attic in the "Flats" was speedily re-let, for recent improvements in the neighbourhood had led to the pulling down of a considerable number of the dwellings of the poor, and their tenants were obliged to crowd wherever lodgings could be got.

The new occupier did not care for flowers; and the plant which had been carefully tended by the old man soon withered. It left a great blank in little Natty's life. The patch of green on the dull brickwork amidst the blaze of windows had been a sort of companion to the girl, and had mutely spoken to her of Old Phil's kindness when he was absent. But there was one bright spot in the cloud which had fallen upon Natty's life. Tim, as Natty called the linnet, thrived splendidly. He was as happy as a bird could be, within a cage. Sometimes Natty's mother hung it outside the window, and once, when Natty dozed, some perky sparrows came down to the cage from the roof and did their best to pick a quarrel with the prisoner. But Tim was not in the least afraid, although he was a country cousin and not used to London ways at all.

"I don't know," said Natty one day to Tim, "I don't know why the sparrows seem so fond of London. Oh, dear, if I had wings, wouldn't I fly away—that's all."

Tim looked wise and put his head on one side. He could not speak, but he seemed to think, if the quick turn of his bright eye meant anything, that the sparrows knew their own business best. And I dare say they do.

It would be a long story to tell how day by day Natty became fonder of her bird, and how Tim grew to love his mistress. In Natty's belief there never was such a songster, although as a linnet Tim was poor enough in all conscience. A rude boy who lived on the same floor in the block, strove his hardest to tease Natty, and once when her mother came home from work she found her little girl sobbing, and clutching to her breast the cage in which Tim fluttered about in a state of great alarm. The rude boy, it seemed, had shouted through the keyhole that the caretaker of Liphook's was coming up to seize the bird, under the rule which said no pets were to be kept. But the porter did not do anything of the sort.

Through the long winter, Natty and her mother passed, stinted in the few necessaries which they were able to buy when times were good, for lighting and firing were expenses which made a great inroad into the widow's slender earnings. But there was always a crumb for Tim. Seasons made little difference to Natty, for they brought her no change in the courtyard. It was either cold or warm, that was the only difference between winter and summer, except that when the days were longest for a few short weeks the sun contrived to send a shaft into the courtyard to flicker on the wall for a little while sometimes.

Soon when the summer was at its best, a startling story was told in the Flats. It was brought to Natty's ears by the rude boy, who shouted through the keyhole one morning:

"We're going to the Forest, all us kids, we are."

To the Forest! Natty had heard of such a place. She had a dim fancy that there were lots of trees there, like those that were shown in a picture on the paper in which her mother had fetched some food. The child had not seen many trees, but if they were like Old Phil's plant they must indeed be beautiful.

These bright visions, which quickly passed through her mind, were as quickly driven away by the cruel boy who yelled again: "We're a-goin' to the Forest, we are; but cripples can't go—Yah!"

He was a young savage, full of brute strength, and showing it by tyrannising over the helpless. And he went away well-content when he overheard the sobbing behind the door of room 417.

The young savage was wrong. A kindly missioner found his way to Natty's abode. Her lameness should not prevent her, he said, from enjoying the treat. He was determined that it should not, and he was as good as his word.

I wonder if those good people who subscribe to "A Day in the Country" fund at all know the amount of pleasure which is given to the little ones of the great city by such an outing. To pass from the noise and bustle to the stillness of the woods, to breathe the pure sweet air instead of the smoke-laden atmosphere of London, to hear the myriad sounds of the insect world, to note the varied colours of the landscape, and above all to span with roving eye the wide firmament above, this is indeed liberty.

But of all the delights which Natty felt, none was greater than that given her by the songs of the birds. Their music thrilled her soul, and it was almost with sorrow that she lost sight of a lark in the fleecy clouds, that soaring upwards shook out its song as it rose. Her pleasure was not without distress. The lark seemed to throw a shadow upon the day, but she scarcely knew why.

On the road homewards she was trying to puzzle it out. The red sun sank, and the crimson clouds grew grey. There was silence in the gloaming, and it was quite dark when Natty was home again in Liphook's Flats. She was very tired, and No. 417 on the ninth storey was still a long journey off; but the good-hearted missioner carried her up as he brought her down.

"Chirp, chirp." Tim awoke to welcome his mistress. It was a very poor note, after the brilliant singing of the lark. But it sounded homely. Poor Tim! The thought suddenly came into her heart. Poor Tim, he was a prisoner!

During the long night the little crippled girl thought the matter out. Tim a prisoner; Tim, who should be free as the air. How cruel of her to keep him in the cage. She thought about the country scenes through which she had driven, and compared them with the monotonous surroundings of Liphook's Flats. It was now dawn, and very grey and cold the deep well of the quadrangle appeared. Her resolve, however, was taken. Tim must be freed. To his mistress full liberty was impossible, but she could restore his liberty at least.

It cost her a severe struggle. Not until her mother was gone did she make the final effort. She opened the window and took up the cage. Poor Tim hardly understood matters. Then she set the door wide open and cried, "Tim, Tim, please fly away. Be quick, my heart is breaking!"

Tim was only a bird. He prized his liberty as you do yours. So when he saw the door wide open he gently hopped out. He hopped upon the window-sill and pecked up a crumb or two with superb indifference. His poor little owner meanwhile hid her face in her hands. Tim next flew out in the yard, circled round as he felt the almost forgotten sensation of flying. Then he stopped on the roof. His old enemies, the sparrows, found him out. They did not want him there. And Tim, thinking that he was safest in his cage, flew back to that prison. A prison, it was plain, he did not consider it; and what is more, he could never be got again to leave it. It was his home. Tim was a wise bird to be contented with his lot; at any rate, that was the lesson which he taught poor Natty.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

THE PSALMS FOR THE DAY.

"When the child, with grave, fresh lip,
Youth, or maiden fair;
When the aged, weak and gray,
Seek Thy face in prayer . . .
Hear then, in love, O Lord, the cry,
In heaven, Thy dwelling-place on high."

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XXII.—THE DOWNWARD PATH.

AND how was it meantime with the gay and brilliant Gerald? Where was the missing one all this time? How was it he had broken off all communication with his old home? What was he doing with himself, and what giddy scenes of pleasure were alluring him from his old associations, and alienating him from all family ties?

Let us leave, for a brief space of time the peaceful surroundings of St. Hilda and the doings of those with whom we are mainly concerned, and enter the great tumultuous city into whose mighty vortex hundreds of lives are drawn each year only to be hopelessly crushed and wrecked.

There is something unspeakably sad and terrible, as well as grand and wonderful in the teeming life and ceaseless movement of a great centre of civilisation. Good and evil, happiness and misery, wealth and penury are so inextricable, mixed up and jostled together that there seems no avoiding those strong contrasts that fill the soul with a sort of awe. Life seems to whirl along at a breakneck pace, like the water at the Falls of Niagara, and it appears sometimes as if helpless lives were swept relentlessly to destruction without power to struggle or to save themselves.

Gerald Meynal, untrained, undisciplined, gay, heedless and headstrong, had flung himself blindly into this mighty stream, having neither experience nor moral stamina, neither rudder nor compass of any kind to guide him, filled with blind self-confidence and youthful pride. And now at the end of many months, let us see where the stream of pleasure had landed him, that stream along which he hoped to float in a halcyon existence whose joys should be always fresh and new.

In a dismal London attic, the top apartment in one of those peculiarly sordid, miserable places designated as "lodging houses for single gentlemen," sat Gerald Meynal in front of a canvas some two feet square upon which he was busily engaged in painting fruit and flowers in peculiarly gorgeous and vivid colours.

It would require a keen glance to recognise in this pinched and haggard young man the once brilliant and handsome Gerald, who had been the pride of his mother's heart and the spoilt darling of his native place. His face was thin and hollow, his eyes were large and bright, yet wearing that uncertain look so characteristic of a man who habitually drinks spirit. Moreover, the eyes were red-rimmed and bloodshot, the thin white hands were tremulous and hardly equal even to the coarse kind of painting upon which they were engaged with feverish activity and energy. His figure was thin and shrunken as if from want of proper nourishment as well as from chronic ill-health. Altogether he presented a pitiable appearance, and it would almost have broken his mother's heart to see him as he sat there in that cold and cheerless place.

How was it that he had fallen so low as this? How was it that he had sunk so rapidly from the ease and luxury to which he had always accustomed himself, to this melancholy condition of indigence and poverty? And how was it that when he was in a state of such need he did not write for assistance to those who, he must have known, would be so ready and willing to tender it?

To answer these questions it will be necessary to cast a brief backward glance over Gerald's career during the eight or nine months of his "emancipation and independence."

It is not a pleasant task to follow in the steps of one who is carelessly yet deliberately treading the downward path towards physical and moral ruin, and yet it is impossible to avoid doing so sometimes in order to make clear what is to come.

Gerald had plunged with all the eagerness of a pleasure-loving nature into the life of dissipation and excitement to which his friend Hector Thompson had introduced him. He spent his days upon the race-course, and his evenings in every sort of amusement that gamblers delight in.

He won and lost money with equal insouciance; and ran into debt with the recklessness so characteristic of those whose lives are spent in the excitement of speculation. His rooms were not paid for after the first few weeks with any regularity. He ordered in furniture and forgot the bills, bought everything he fancied, whether he had money or not; made payments at intervals to his creditors when he had made a "lucky stroke," and on the strength of success plunged more deeply into debt than before.

On the whole, during the first few months of his life in London he was unusually fortunate, and his handsome face and pleasing manners made him a favourite with his companions. He and Hector Thompson soon became estranged. The latter was a hard-headed cautious man—cautious even in his illicit pleasures, he never lost sight of the main chance, and always contrived to get out of any situation before it had entailed upon him any trouble or loss. He had been pleasant and genial to Gerald at first, but he took less and less notice of him as time went by, and often talked to and of him in a patronising or slighting way of which that young man did not at all approve. Moreover, Gerald, though reckless and unscrupulous enough, had still a code of honour of his own, and that code of honour was perpetually being broken by Hector, who seemed to have no scruples at all, save those of self interest.

So the two friends rapidly cooled towards one another, sharp words passed between them, and when Gerald's good fortune seemed on the wane, Hector turned his back upon him altogether and lost sight of him as completely as his family had done.

It was about Christmas-time that the tide of good fortune seemed to set steadily against Gerald. He did not attribute this to anything save a passing cloud, and played on against odds, feeling certain that the luck would turn again soon. But the luck did not turn, and he became every day more and more heavily involved. He had been an excellent billiard player at first, his eye was true, his hand steady and his nerve excellent, because he felt no undue anxiety as to the result of the matches in which he played. His most regular winnings had been at the billiard table, and he had always calculated on maintaining himself comfortably by his play. But Gerald did not take into consideration that he could not indulge his appetite for strong drink and for the perpetual excitements of fast living and yet keep his steadiness of hand and eye and nerve. His opponents took advantage of his weakness to urge him to drink and to "enjoy life whilst he was young," and little by little his skill forsook him, and yet he was too blind to understand the cause aright.

When the new year came in, his bills came pouring in by every post. He was appalled at the magnitude of his liabilities. He had no means of meeting them, and in his frantic endeavours to win back some of the money he had lost, and to drown the remorse and sense of desperation that was dominating him, he plunged deeper and deeper into the slough in which he was involved, and every step sank him to a lower level of bodily and mental abasement.

The inevitable crash came at length, when Gerald had to fly from his creditors, leaving his comfortable lodgings by stealth, with only a couple of pounds in his pocket, and the clothes which he stood up in. It was the only way, as he told himself. He must cut adrift from everything and everybody connected with his disastrous past. He would try to make a fresh start elsewhere, and when he had retrieved his fallen fortunes, he would pay off his creditors and show his face to the world once more. The young man had lost almost everything, but he retained his sanguine self-confidence yet. And why at this juncture did he not return to St. Hilda to recommence life; knowing as he could not fail to do, how gladly he would be received by his mother —possibly by all his family? Why was it that in the time of his sorest need he cut himself completely adrift from his own people and became at once an alien and outcast?

The motive for this course of action was strangely mixed. To do Gerald justice, it is only fair to say that one very strong feeling was shame and remorse. He felt he had disgraced himself so entirely that he resolved he would never entail upon his family the distress and misery of knowing all his folly and wickedness. His pride, too, revolted against confessing the fiasco he had made of the life that was to have been so successful and enjoyable, and he could not bear the thought of having his affairs looked into by Wulfric and his debts paid off by the elder brother, as he knew would be done, if he were to return home at this crisis.

No, he would not face his family and St. Hilda in his present pitiful plight. Shame, pride, and a sort of mistaken sense of good feeling and lingering affection all combined to bring him to this conclusion. He would even give up receiving remittances from Wulfric sooner than have his failure and disgrace canvassed all over the place where he was known and where his family still lived.

Hitherto Gerald, in spite of adverse circumstances, had never known the bitterness of actual want, and he was unfit, indeed, to battle with privation and misery. His experience during the months that followed he could never afterwards recall without a shudder. He knew what it was to be hungry and homeless on freezing winter nights, to receive shelter at pauper refuges and to accept alms from the charitable who judged by his looks that he had "seen better days," and pitied him accordingly.

And yet in the midst of all this misery and degradation, the passion for drink seemed still to grow upon him. It was only when indulging this craving that he forgot for awhile his own hopelessness and destitution, and could feel again something of the joy of existence. He seldom sank to the stage of intoxication; but whenever he had money to spend, it was spent in drink instead of in the food that would have strengthened him to resist the demon within him.

If he would ever have survived the bitter winter may well be doubted, had it not been for the interest of a chance stranger, who introduced him to a picture dealer, from whom he obtained employment in the manufacture of those glaring and incongruous pictures that sometimes adorn the walls of well-to-do small tradesmen and people of their class.

By this work, he was enabled to rent a small attic, and by means of unremitting labour to keep himself from actual starvation. But he suffered almost more during this period of his life, than he had done in the preceeding months; for then there had been that element of uncertainty—the belief that something would turn up for his advantage—that makes so strong an element in the gambler's life, and gives a certain zest even to the most miserable existence. Then he had occasionally won money at cards or billiards in some of those places that he still frequented whenever a stroke of good fortune gave him the opportunity. He had known moments when he had deluded himself with the hope that fortune was about to smile upon him once more, and with the strange infatuation that often possesses an ill-balanced mind, he had told himself, and sometimes believed, that the uncertainty and excitement even of this precarious existence was preferable to the dull monotony he had known at St. Hilda.

But when he was driven to constant mechanical drudgery as the only means of staving off starvation, and the sense of relief he had experienced at first in the finding of regular employment had worn off, then came a sort of despairing misery and hopelessness that not even recourse to the brandy bottle could drown.

Again and again he resolved when he took home a batch of work, never to apply for another, and again and again did absolute hunger, and that yet more terrible thirst drive him to take up palette and brushes once more, and set to work with feverish energy. The misery and degradation of such a position ate into his very soul, and yet —yet still the old feelings of pride and shame withheld him from communicating with his friends; and it seemed to him now, that whatever happened he could never bear they should know the truth about him. St. Hilda must never, never hear how he, Gerald Meynal (though he called himself George Mays now) had worked ten hours a day in a dismal attic, painting glaring daubs for a picture manufacturer! He should never survive the disgrace of feeling that such a thing were known. He would rather die of want and privation in his cold attic, as it seemed likely enough he would do.

Poor, unhappy Gerald! he was indeed reaping a bitter harvest from the seed he had sown. He had reached that apathetic stage of misery when it was easier for him to go on toiling and starving than to make the effort that would have put an end to this poverty and brought his friends to his side.

Yet as he sat hour after hour with numb fingers and aching brow, doing the work that revolted him, he had leisure for thought and reflection such as he had never known before, and the memories of the past rising up before him would often bring the tears to his eyes and show with a startling clearness the side of affairs that he had steadily ignored in old days. He saw his old idleness, self-indulgence, and conceit as others had seen it, only in far stronger colours. He saw the wasted opportunities, the slighted kindness, the good things he had scorned and refused to touch, as perhaps he never would otherwise have seen them; and he would often bow his head upon his hands and weep like a child over the past that never could return.

And then would come surging over him an intense longing to retrieve the past, to return—as the prodigal son returned—to the home he had despised and the parent he had slighted, and in ever so humble a fashion atone for the sins and follies he had committed. But mingled with this longing was the old sense of pride and shame, together with a haunting fear that he would never, never be anything but a source of misery and disgrace to them, and that if he went back repentant in his misery, the old craving for excitement would conquer him again so soon as fortune smiled once more upon him, and that he would plunge again into wild courses which would entail upon his kindred worse misery than ever.

Gerald had no faith in himself because he had had no faith in God, and therefore no sheet anchor on which he could rely to hold him back from drifting to destruction. And yet this very realising of his weakness was an advance upon the buoyant self-confidence with which he had started in life; it was the beginning of that repentance without which no sinner can turn from his sin or be reconciled with God. The poor, unhappy Gerald was nearer grasping the forgiving love extended to him by his Saviour in the hour of his deepest dejection than he had been since he had knelt at his mother's knee and lisped his baby prayers with the earnestness of a little child.

It was in this mood, torn by conflicting doubts and fears, and tossed on a troubled sea with no love human or divine to uphold and comfort him, that the early summer tide found Gerald Meynal. The winter and spring had been peculiarly cold and ungenial, and summer when it came, came all at once with a sudden burst of heat that was neither healthy nor agreeable, at any rate to the dwellers in crowded cities.

Gerald's health had been undermined by a long course of dissipation and privation, and both the wildness of the former days and the sedentary habits of the latter had told heavily upon him. His appetite had forsaken him—even that craving for drink had left him somewhat of late; his fingers grew so weak and nerveless that he could hardly hold his brush, and, despite the increasing weariness that bore him down like a leaden weight, he could get no quiet sleep either by night or day, but only such as was attended by feverish disquieting dreams and left him more exhausted than it found him.

Gradually he seemed to lose all consciousness of his present life and surroundings. He used to fancy himself back at St. Hilda, playing in the fields with his sisters; or painting the immortal works of which he had once been so fond of talking in that luxurious studio where so much time had been idled away. He still sat with his canvas before him and painted away at the gorgeous blossoms; but when he staggered down the stairs and mechanically found his way to the shop where his work was received, the master looked sharply from the picture to his face and back again, and remarked that if he could not keep sober during working hours he need not expect further orders.

He only received half pay that day, and no more canvases were given him to decorate; but he was in no condition to be troubled by either of these facts. He stumbled blindly back to his room, threw himself down upon the bed, and fell into a heavy stupor which seemed to him to last for days and nights.

He was aroused by hearing voices about him, and by feeling himself shaken, but in a quiet and kindly fashion as if merely to arouse his attention. He opened his heavy eyes with difficulty and saw as through a mist that one or two people were in the room with him. He fancied that in one he recognised his landlady, and some instinct told him that the young-looking man bending over him was a doctor; but all the rest was hazy and confused, and, although he could hear that questions were addressed to him by the medical man, and could vaguely understand their import, yet his tongue was so heavy and his throat so dry that he could frame no reply, and could only lie back with half closed eyes vaguely taking in what was spoken by those about him.

"No other case of illness in the house?"

"No, indeed, sir," this from the landlady in a shrill aggrieved voice. "It's always been a healthy house, and I call it most uncalled for for attic lodger who pays least to go and get took by a fever and give the house a bad name for the season."

"Pooh—pooh, my good woman, don't worry yourself, typhoid fever is not catching, and if your drains are all right, which the sanitary inspector has come to ascertain, there is no reason why another soul in the house should take it or even be alarmed by it. He may have taken the infection anywhere. It doesn't follow its anything wrong with the house. He looks half starved; but I suppose that is no concern of yours."

"He's always in work when he choses to do it. He can paint beautiful pictures."

"Well, well, the thing is now to get him downstairs to the hospital fly as quickly and quietly as may be. Have you a husband or a son who can lend a hand?"

And then Gerald was conscious of being lifted and carried with some difficulty down the steep ill-lighted staircase of that sordid house. He was so giddy and exhausted by the time he was put into the vehicle in waiting that he lapsed into a species of unconsciousness from which he only awoke to find himself in the unwonted luxury and cleanliness of the ward of a large hospital. He was faintly aware of a sense of unspeakable relief at feeling himself thus cared for and thought for. He was dimly alive to the fact that he was considered in a very critical state; and he closed his eyes and hoped he should die quietly there, uncared for and unknown and never awake again to the hard battle of life from which it seemed as if he had escaped at last.

And there for the present we must leave him.

LEAVING HOME.

A SHADOW of pathos falls over the brightest domestic scene, if, as we gaze upon it, we reflect that it cannot last long, for if death does not enter the little circle, withdrawing one after another until it shrinks to nothingness, then life will beckon each away, to form new circles elsewhere.

> Father and mother, many a year
> In rain and sunshine we have lived here
> And the children—
> And now that the winter days are come,
> We wait and rest in our own old home;
> But where are the children?

Sometimes, while there are only babies in the cradle or wee toddlers on the floor, the father and mother will indulge in dreams of their children's future: they will guess which boy shall be "the parson" and which the doctor, they will call their tiny daughter, hugging her doll, "little mother:" perhaps they will even get up a lively interest in educational theories or emigration enterprises with "an eye for the children." They can enjoy the excitement of an event which is too remote to make them feel its pang. That comes first when the children are old enough to discuss plans and projects for themselves. And the children do so, in their grand ignorance, regarding years as cycles, and knowing nothing of all that even the smallest change involves. "I shall be leaving school in two years" says the boy "and then I shall get father to let me go abroad." He speaks in careless sincerity—two years seem to him much the same as a century, and "going abroad" is a confused picture of a ship in full sail, a tiger hunt, and a welcome home, with a handkerchief full of curiosities, while father and mother are just as they are now and all the loved companions are still boys and girls! There is a glorious incompatibility in youthful aspirations which a sweet woman writer has well set forth in her humorous lines, rounding into pathos in the last couplet:—

> I'll never go to bed till twelve o'clock,
> I'll make a mud pie in a clean frock;
> I'll have a rose tree, always in bloom,
> I'll keep a dancing bear in mamma's room;
> I'll scold the housemaid for making a dirt,
> I'll cut my fingers without being hurt;
> I'll have a language with not a word spelled,
> I'll ride on horseback without being held;
> I'll hear mamma say, "My boy, good as gold,"
> When I'm a grown-up man, sixty years old.

But the sudden determinations and the wild wishes strike a blow on the parents' hearts. And yet if they are wise, they will strive to check the quick protest or the depressing sigh. Change must come, in whatever modified form, and they have to take care that they do not alienate confidence, by any rasping contradiction, or even check it, by too plain manifestations of the pain it gives.

Children who are good and dutiful may yet give their parents curious disappointments. Perhaps the father missed a scholastic training in his own boyhood, and having gone all his life regretting this, has secured the possibility of it for his own lad. Lo, the boy wishes to emigrate, to be a farmer in the far west or a lumberman in the Canadian backwoods. We remember hearing of the astonishment and dismay with which a worthy man, dwelling on a modest property which his forefathers had owned from generation to generation, and not without his sense of family pride and propriety, received a son's announcement that he was determined to be a butcher! An elder son was already a clergyman, with poetic and philosophic proclivities.

It was a curious case of deliberate choice of one of those callings into which it may be supposed men are generally drifted by circumstances or necessity. Why the choice was made, remains a mystery; the boy was a healthy ruddy young Englishman, fond of animals and children. He married young, and in the end, flourished as an honest purveyor of wholesome food in a big country town. Is it possible that by some sheer simple instinct, for which possibly he could not have found verbal expression, he had dumbly reached the wisdom which Ruskin inculcated when he endeavoured to console a gentleman for what he considered the perverse inclinations of a young relative, who preferred the life of a salmon fisher in American wilds, to all the prospects of a fashionable profession. The great critic and philosopher pleaded that he could not see why it was not as useful and honourable a public service to prepare potted fish as potted talk! Our young butcher belonged to a race which had done its share in defying public prejudice in creeds and politics wherever it thwarted common sense and right. And perhaps this was the fashion in which the spirit of his forbears came upon him in those days. And his good father looked into the matter with plenty of silence, and came to the conclusion that prejudices only exist to be overruled,—even one's own, which always seem so reasonable!

So the lad got his way, and the family peace and unity were preserved. And all the friends and neighbours wondered and whispered. And then somebody asked why it was less gentlemanly to kill animals with mercy and decency for food, than to kill, and hunt, and maim them for "sport"? And somebody else said it was surely as reasonable for a young man to get his living in this way in his own country, as somewhere else, out of sight, and what but this was the meaning of cattle ranches in South America or pork-packing in Chicago? And so the youth at last illustrated what has been wittily enumerated as one of the advantages of having odd people among us, viz. that they set us thinking.

Or it may be the possessor of some vast business, stretching its feelers over the world, and manipulating finances of almost princely proportions, finds his queer quiet boy thinking of nothing but how to withdraw from it all, to cultivate some artistic taste, or prosecute some scientific enquiry! Mind, this is a blow to such a father, whose life's labour and ambition are built into the organization which his son so lightly purposes to turn over to strangers. It speaks well for him if he endeavours to comprehend and respect objects so remote from his own. It means that he has mastered the true signification of wealth, if he can cheerfully submit that the pile he has made, shall not roll on increasing, though it crush his boy's life beneath it, but shall stand still (with the inevitable result of dwindling), so that his son's best manhood be developed, and he be permitted to do for the world that which he can do best. There was humour of a tragic kind in a little domestic drama we once saw enacted. A boy, one of the few heirs to an income which was counted by many annual thousands, displayed a decided talent for sculpture. His father discouraged the exercise of his gift, because sculpture is not a lucrative employment! Poor rich man!

The wisest father and the tenderest mother are those who are careful to remember that their children are God's children as well as theirs, and that His will is to be sought for them even before the parental wishes. While scrupulously training and advising and influencing the young ones, they are schooling their own hearts to accept the deep, pathetic wisdom of the poet, when she sang:—

Can I teach thee, my beloved?—can I teach thee?
If I said, "Go left," or "right,"
The counsel would be light.
The wisdom, poor of all that could enrich thee;
My right would show like left,
My raising would depress thee,
My choice of light would blind thee,
Of way, would leave behind thee,
Of end, would leave bereft.
Alas, I can but bless thee.
May God teach thee, my beloved—may God teach thee!

But at last, the decisions are made: the life-paths are decided on,—though where they shall lead, who may tell? for the most loving foresight cannot penetrate, in the words of the old song, to

The lands that I shall travel in,
Or the death that I shall die.

Only one thing is certain,—the end has come to the happy old child-life. The boy or the girl may be going across the wide ocean, or up to the great capital city, or only over to the next village—it is all one:—what St. Augustine called "the dear and sweet habit of living together" is over. The little household ways have to break off. Who will feed the dog now? who will take the letters to the post? or fetch the books from the library? The seats at the family meals will have to be set wider apart to hide the gap. There is a delegation of little duties and privileges to the younger children. There is eager talk of future days and future prospects, in which the father and mother can only join cheerfully by supreme effort. For their thoughts are rather with the past: that peaceful past from which the young ones seem to turn so readily.

But let the parents be assured, that past has left a mark never to be effaced. For good or for evil, their child's mind has received impressions which will stay forever. When the boy is far away from home, when he has made friends whose faces he has never seen yet—when he has made that dearest friendship of all, which shall be half his own life, when having been "diligent in business" he shall "stand before kings, of what, think you, will he make the scenery of his dreams by night? Of your old house, my friends—the place where he lived when he was a boy. In the land of slumber he shall commune with all the dearest affections of his heart and shall re-live all the proudest moments of his existence, in your old rooms, however cramped and dingy they may be. The great men with whom he may make acquaintance he shall see in his dreams, sitting in your old chintz-covered chair or leaning over the old garden gate. More than this, whatever has been the peculiar shadow of those early years, the sight of care-stricken faces, the struggle with unfit lessons, the terror of somebody's violent or cross-grained or captious temper, will come back in slumbers, whenever the heart is low or the nerves worn. "I must really do something to pull myself up," we have heard one say with a piteous smile. "I knew I was running downhill, because all labour was done with an effort, but I tried to believe it was fancy, till last night I dreamed of my sister, and I never do that except I am in a very bad way." How awful to be somebody's night-mare! Think of the drunken fathers, the scolding mothers, the quarrelling relatives, who must rise to haunt many a sick and weary vision! There may be such spectres in the memory of some, whose present surroundings seem peaceful and pleasant enough, and they may account for many a fitful or desponding mood which taxes the charity of those who cannot know all about them.

There is, of course, a brighter side to this fact of the permanence of youthful impressions. We can recall one, received by a little child of about five years old. She was awakened by a kiss in a room bright with morning sunshine, and she lay watching as an elder sister (dead nearly forty years ago now) went to and fro, singing in her sweet girlish voice, the old morning hymn of Bishop Ken:—

> Awake, my soul, and with the sun
> Thy daily stage of duty run;
> Shake off dull sloth, and joyful rise
> To pay thy morning sacrifice.
> All praise to Thee who safe hast kept,
> And hast refreshed me whilst I slept;
> Grant, Lord, when I from death shall wake
> I may of endless light partake.
> Direct, control, suggest this day,
> All I design, or do, or say;
> That all my powers, with all their might,
> In Thy sole glory may unite!

And on how many hours of grief and struggle has that memory flashed back—a thought of God and of effort folded between His best revelation and inspiration—sunshine and love! Those whose childhood has known the warmth and purity of a genuinely Christian home, however far they may wander from it and its ways, will never be tempted to think that religion is nothing but a cloak wherewith some choose to hide worldliness. They have been wrapped inside the cloak, and they know that a living and loving heart beats there. The church bell on a foreign shore will have its peculiar message for those who have their memories of a family pew, and Sunday evening hymn singing. Every good man and woman they meet,—every godly household they enter, will seem not quite strange, but somehow related to father and mother and home.

There is a story of a poor prodigal, who, straying into a mission meeting of a somewhat social character, was observed to come again and again, and to show evidences of a renewed struggle towards better things. What was it that had touched him? All he could explain was that "the teacups were like those mother had used, and they had made thoughts come over him!" Let us think on these things while the children are with us. Every day of home life is being written out on their memories in invisible ink, and the records shall start to view in the heat and glare of life's noontide. Let them be such as shall serve for inspiration, for soothing, for comfort, for assurance that there are good people in the world, and that the best is but a very broken reflection of the Father who is in Heaven!

Yes, it is well for us, while the children are round us, to remember the day when they will go away. For a due preparation for life, consideration of its changing scenes and thoughtful self-discipline for the playing of our own parts therein, are the best signs that we are prepared for death too. The parting time will have great agony for us, but its pain should be "growing" pain. Our love and theirs will rise to its highest mark. The simple barriers of wholesome household reserve will be washed away. There will be confessions and confidences—a great glow of yearning love, which will seem for the time to annihilate age and experience, and all the distinctions between us. Parting, when a great distance and a long time are involved, is invested with many of the dignities and privileges of death. It spiritualises love. It has its solemn exhortations and injunctions, its "last words." How we remember them! As I write, a picture rises before me. Pale sunbeams play across a long avenue of stately trees, the ground is yellow with leaves swept down by the autumn breezes. A carriage laden with luggage, is slowly driving down it, its occupants a white-haired lady and a lad. As they drive through the lodge gates, the youth bends forward to say a last good-bye to the old gardener standing there. And then as home is left behind—the house to which in less than an hour, she will return alone—the lady lays her hand on the young man's hand and says: "If I have ever spoken sharply to you, forgive me. I feel as if I had often been too severe! It was so hard to be severe at all." And the young man clasps her light, thin fingers and says: "I always knew you were kind to me, but I don't think I have been always kind to you." Yes: that is the bitterest pang of parting—the consciousness that the happy days together might have been happier still! Each thinks then only of his own failures. And this is how it may lighten parting, if we consider it a little beforehand.

And how our thoughts will go out after the children! How we shall pray that somebody will be kind to them—will notice that they are lonely and homesick—will take heed to them on those anniversaries when hearts may grow tender even to soreness—will give them a word of counsel in emergencies which not even our foresight could foresee—aye, that somebody will be self-denying enough to give them a good honest scolding, when they require it, and will yet have patience with the faults and follies that they strive to cure. Let us think how we shall feel about our children when they go away—how we do feel about those who are gone away—and let it help us to see our duty to other people's children whose "going away" from their homes, has brought them to our own gates.

The girl in your kitchen has come fresh from her father's house, and that is the dear vision of her slumbers, though you may be apt to think that your trim chambers are a good exchange for its blurred and broken squalor. Your children's foreign teachers are strangers in a strange land, —perhaps grown contented, cheerful and prosperous,—yet see how they brighten and soften if you talk to them about the customs or the scenery of their Swiss valley, or their Italian town? Think of the clerks in your counting house, the men in your shop, the very lads who leave parcels at your gates, in this connection. Can you not somehow link your disciplines and charities, your hospitalities and courtesies, with the old memories and emotions which lie within them, perhaps dormant for lack of a friendly arousing touch? Do unto these as you would like others to do unto yours, when they are parted from you. Think out the matter in each individual case and in every little detail. So may we help forward the coming of that Kingdom of God for which we pray, when

OUR ENGLISH HYMNS.

FIRST PAPER.

A HUNDRED FAVOURITE HYMNS SELECTED BY OUR READERS.

THE invitation given last January to readers of the SUNDAY AT HOME, to send lists of the best English Hymns, has met with a response so general and eager as to show how strong a hold this form of sacred literature has taken upon the minds and hearts of thoughtful Christians. Between 3400 and 3500 lists have been received, by far the greater number prepared with intelligence and care, several of them accompanied with letters indicating the pleasantness and interest of the task.

Thus, one correspondent says: "The writer has found much delight in reading and thinking over the glorious hymns from which the selection has been made, and fresh cause for love and adoration to the precious Inspirer of the songs." Another writes: "The difficulty has really been to decide which beautiful hymns to leave out; some I have been specially sorry to omit, but I thought it best to have as wide a range of subjects as possible." "For the pleasure afforded me," writes a third, "in going over so many old favourites, as well as others of more modern date, I beg very heartily to thank you." A valued correspondent, in sending a list of hymns from the interior of Asia Minor, expresses the hope "that this is the first of a series of competitions." Many others have written to a similar effect. A parent says: "This is a subject in which our little ones have taken great interest: they would like to have had many of their own children's hymns included, but I have told them that the next competition may be for theirs only." On the other hand, "A Sexagenarian" writes: "I forward the enclosed list, fully aware that it will be considered 'out of touch' with the present age. The hymns spontaneously rose to my mind after reading the paragraph in the SUNDAY AT HOME. Many of them are to me almost sacred, as having cheered the last days of loved ones gone before."

Several correspondents speak of spiritual blessings received by themselves and others, by means of the hymns selected. Some have suggestions to offer. One "would have liked the favourite tunes to have been appended to as many as possible of the favourite hymns. The old-fashioned and heart-stirring tunes," he adds, "are for the most part consigned to oblivion in these strange days, and the baldest possible ones substituted in their room." Another suggests "whether it would not be well to offer some stimulus to a collection of little known hymns," remarking that there are many "to be found only in very old collections, or printed only once or twice." Copies of any hymns under this description we shall be very glad to receive.

More than one of our friends propose that a selection of the favourite hymns should be published by the Religious Tract Society. "Such a small collection," writes one, "would come within the means of hundreds, aye, thousands and tens of thousands, and be used daily as a means of prayer and praise." "It seems to me," another says, "that a little book of selected hymns, chosen and approved according to your plan, would be a very useful pocket hymnal for cottage-lectures, Bible-classes, and prayer meetings." These suggestions may yet bear fruit. At present we publish only the first lines of the hymns that have received the largest number of suffrages, with their authors' names. These names, we may add, are very correctly given by most of our correspondents. One has taken the trouble to trace every hymn sent to the book in which it originally appeared—a labour of love for which especial acknowledgments are due.

We must defer to future articles any detailed comments upon the following list, as well as a reference to beautiful and valuable hymns not included. From the comparative numbers of the votes it will be clear that opinions are by no means unanimous as to what are really "the best." As to the first four there can be no question; and hardly any as to the first fifteen. Then considerable divergence begins. No competitor has specified as many as eighty of the collective list; and no doubt every reader would remove some hymns in favour of others. The list of the next fifty, which we hope hereafter to publish in order, will be seen to comprise many also of high excellence. Still, a general approval is more significant than any individual preference: and the largeness of the area of competition would indicate that an average of appreciation has been attained. The list, in this view, is of remarkable interest: and it seems especially to prove that the Christian sentiment of our day in regard to hymns is on the whole a healthy one. The tone of these Hundred Hymns is in general true and high. The false notes and unrealities of expression are few; and it is especially gratifying to note the clearness and joyousness with which the great verities of Evangelical truth are set forth in these varying yet kindred strains. It is this, which above all makes a hymn acceptable, that it is full of CHRIST.

The list contains hymns from fifty-five different authors; of whom, as might be expected, Dr. Watts and Charles Wesley stand at the head, each contributing seven to the aggregate. The favourite among Watts's hymns is, by general consent, his best—"When I survey the wondrous Cross"; and Wesley's greatest is as unquestionably—"Jesu, Lover of my soul." Cowper and Dr. Horatius Bonar have each five hymns, and few will question the pre-eminence among the hymns of these respective authors assigned to numbers 9 and 12 in our list. Four hymns each are from Bishop Heber and John Mason Neale; the great Missionary Hymn of the former being placed first among his compositions, while from the translations of the latter, the "Art thou weary" is selected for preference even over his rendering of Bernard's "Jerusalem." Three hymns are given, severally, from Tate and Brady, from Dr. Doddridge, from James Montgomery, from Frederick William Faber, and from Charlotte Elliott. Bishop Ken and John Keble each have two, the Morning and Evening Hymns, in which these saintly poets, if rivals to each other, are unrivalled by any besides. It is singular to see that our readers' votes have placed the "Evening" higher than the "Morning" Hymns, and have assigned to the authors, in the two instances, a reverse order. Two hymns each are also given from John Newton, Henry Francis Lyte, Edward Caswall, Samuel J. Stone, W. Chatterton Dix, Frances Ridley Havergal and Mrs. C. F. Alexander. The remaining authors have each but one hymn: and indeed there seems to have come to many a Christian poet some moment of intense feeling, or of vivid insight, or of rapture in the contemplation of Divine truth, which has lifted him out of his ordinary self, and has enabled him for the first and last time to bequeath to the Church an immortal song. The hymn at the head of our list (of which we have more to say hereafter) is a case in point; and there are others only less remarkable.

We may refer to a few examples. A youth of twenty-four, a student, poor and out of health, is one day melted to unusual tenderness of feeling, and without an effort writes down in his pocket-book the hymn, My faith looks up to Thee, Thou Lamb of Calvary.

An English clergyman, of high intellect and deep, if misguided, religious fervour, longing to understand the times in which he lives, yet doubting what is to be his task in life, is becalmed in a boat upon the Mediterranean. Here he beguiles his time by "writing verses," and among them the hymn, Lead, kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom.[1]

A devoted pastor, about to leave his people in almost hopeless quest of health, has preached his farewell sermon and for the last time administered the Communion. He then retires to spend a long solitary Sabbath evening in his own room, and when he comes out again he hands to a friend the newly-written hymn Abide with me: fast falls the eventide.

Many of these utterances come to us from the past; lovely stars of poesy, like the Adeste fideles, or Jerusalem, my happy home, telling of some sudden light breaking here and there upon souls that had else passed away unknown. Some again are nearer our own time; and amid such memorable hymns must be classed that finest of Christmas carols, Christians, awake, by John Byrom, who perhaps is best remembered for the system of shorthand which he taught the Wesleys, and in which Charles Wesley was accustomed to dash down his own hymns as they framed themselves in his devout and affluent mind; with "the English Te Deum," as it has been called, of Edward Perronet, among whose immemorable "Occasional Verses Moral and Sacred" there appears the Hymn All hail the power of Jesus' Name; also that sweetest of hymns to the Holy Spirit, Our blest Redeemer, ere He breathed, the one inspiration of a quiet Hertfordshire lady, Harriet Auber,—the writer of many hymns, but of none comparable to this; and if we may include two living names, that perfect hymn of the Rev. Henry Twells, At even, ere the sun was set; and that simple song which has given thoughts of rest and hope to thousands, Safe in the arms of Jesus; the sweet soul's-utterance of a blind lady, who has written, we are told, some five thousand "hymns and pieces" besides, and who composed this one hymn in twenty minutes.

To have given to the churches but a single good hymn is an honour almost beyond all others. "In all my preaching," said the Rev. Henry Venn Elliott, "I have not done so much good as my sister has been permitted to accomplish by her writing her one hymn, Just as I am." Of Charles Wesley's Jesu, Lover of my soul, the late Henry Ward Beecher said: "I would rather have written that hymn than to have the fame of all the kings that ever sat on the earth. It is more glorious. It has more power in it. That hymn will go on singing until the last trump brings forth the angel band; and then I think it will mount up on some lip to the very presence of God."

[1] This hymn was written by Mr. Newman, June 16, 1833: before the "Oxford Movement" had fully begun, and twelve years before he entered the Church of Rome.

Twelve only out of the hundred hymns are versions or paraphrases of the PSALMS. This number is less than we had expected; but all readers will agree that the specimens chosen are among the best. The Psalms are the 23rd, the 34th, the 63rd, the 72nd (two versions), the 84th, the 87th, the 90th, the 100th (two versions), the 104th, and the 136th. That the chosen version of the twenty-third Psalm should be Sir Henry Baker's "The King of Love my Shepherd is," shows how swiftly a really good hymn will often gain general acceptance. It dates only from 1868, and is in comparatively few hymn books. Many readers will still prefer Rous's simple and beautiful version, sometimes called "Scottish," although in fact pre-eminently English:[1] "The Lord's my Shepherd, I'll not want;' or Keble's:

> "My Shepherd is the Lord, I know
> No care nor craving need":

sung with exquisite appropriateness at the poet's funeral; or Addison's florid strain "The Lord my pasture shall prepare." Yet, in some particulars, the paraphrase of Sir Henry Baker may vie with any of them. It is said that the author's last words were a quotation from his own Psalm—the dying man gently murmuring:

> "And on his shoulder gently laid,
> And home, rejoicing, brought me."

Of the thirty-fourth and sixty-third Psalms (80, 47, in our list), as paraphrased by Tate and Brady, we need say no more than that they reach a level nowhere else approached by these writers, save perhaps in their Christmas Hymn (82) which also is a rhythmical transcript from Scripture; and all three are accordingly included in the "hundred." That grand missionary Psalm, the seventy-second, has been attempted by many paraphrasts; but the two versions selected by our readers, Watts's (32) and Montgomery's (49), remain unsurpassed. The latter was first recited by the poet at a missionary meeting in Liverpool, April 14, 1822. Dr. Adam Clarke was in the chair, and begged the MS. for publication in his Commentary, where the verses first appeared. The eighty-fourth Psalm by Lyte (50) has in it a rich fulness of evangelical thought which places it at least among the finest hymn-renderings of this Psalm, although (perhaps from old association) we should assign an equal place to Watts's "Lord of the worlds above." Newton's paraphrase of the eighty-seventh Psalm (96), though unequal, is on the whole a noble rendering of the inspired song. For the ninetieth Psalm, the one version that stands out beyond all others (19) is very properly given by our contributors as Watts's second finest Hymn. Another rendering by Bishop Bickersteth, "O God, the Rock of Ages," almost too recent for a place in many of our hymn-books, is also destined to live. Of the hundredth Psalm, of course we have William Kethe's "All people that on earth do dwell" (80) sublime in its rugged simplicity; with Watts's more paraphrastic but still noble version "Before Jehovah's awful throne." This line, by the way, we owe to John Wesley, who in his hymn-book omitted Watts's first verse, and substituted for the opening lines of the second the couplet as it now stands. It is remarkable that the hundred and third psalm appears to have no version reckoned worthy to stand among the best; but the hundred and fourth has inspired Sir R. Grant with what is unquestionably the finest production of his genius (45) as it forms one of the most inspiriting of our hymns. And, finally, the sublimest of our English poets has given us a rendering, grand in its almost boyish simplicity (92) of the hundred and thirty-sixth Psalm, with its refrain "For His mercy endureth for ever." This version was written by John Milton at the age of fifteen, while he was a scholar in St. Paul's School. As no hymn-books contain this Psalm unaltered and entire, it must be sought for in the poet's works, where it will be found in twenty-four stanzas.

We now subjoin the list of selected hymns, in their order, with the number of votes given to each. In subsequent papers, we hope to make some further comments on these hymns, with references to several not contained in the chosen "Hundred."

HOPE, JOY, PEACE.

"Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing, that ye may abound in hope, through the power of the Holy Ghost."—Rom. xv. 13.

IS this a religion of gloom, this religion of Jesus Christ? Shall we not rather say is there any religion like it—any other Gospel to compare to it in the rich blessings of hope, joy, and peace in believing? The apostle prays for his beloved converts to the "God of hope," for in this God is all his trust, and he knows this trust will not be disappointed. The God of hope had made Paul the apostle of the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 7, 8), that he might make known to them the salvation freely offered through Jesus Christ, the "Root of Jesse, and He that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles," according to the prophecies of the ancient Jewish Scriptures. And this revelation was made not to bring the Gentile world into bondage but into freedom giving light for darkness, joy for mourning, life for death.

Are we as Christians realising our privileges and living as those ought to do whom the God of hope, in answer to prayer, fills with joy and peace in believing? If we are not doing so we are not glorifying God for His mercy (v. 9). His Gospel to us is designed to raise us; why should we by our doubts or half-beliefs sink down into a state which knows neither joy nor peace? The Christian graces of a holy life cannot flourish unless animated by a holy faith; this is that abiding in Christ which bears much fruit, and the fruit that it bears through the Holy Spirit are love, joy, peace. (Gal. v. 22.)

NO. IV.

"The Lord hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad."—Psalm cxxvi. 3.

THIS Psalm is called a song: a song of "degrees."

It is one of the songs which the captive Jews sang, on their return to their own land, and it is radiant with gladness. We can imagine how joyfully it would be sung by those who had been delivered from cruel bondage, and whose mouths God had "filled with laughter," and their tongues "with singing."

We may all sing praises to God for the great things He hath done for us, if we be taught of His Holy Spirit. No life is too humble, no heart too unworthy, to feel the joy of those great things which God does for those who truly trust Him. He works in every life, but our hearts are so cold, and our eyes so dim, that we often fail to recognise His loving hand. May the Holy Spirit help us to see Him in everything.

It is told of Frederick the Great of Prussia, that having rung his bell one day, and no one answering, he opened the door of his apartment, and discovered his page fast asleep in the ante-room. Going over to awake him, he discovered a letter sticking out of the young man's pocket, and, prompted by curiosity, he took it out and read it. It proved to be a letter from the young man's mother, thanking him for having sent her so large a share of his money, and telling him that God would reward his filial affection. Stealing softly back into his room, the King took a bag full of ducats, and these he placed with the letter, in the page's pocket. Then, returning to his apartment, he rang his bell violently, and the startled sleeper came hastily into his presence, betraying by his looks, that he had been sleeping.

"You have had a sound sleep," said Frederick.

In his confusion, the young man thrust his hand into his pocket, and discovered the bag. He took it out, looked at it with apprehension, and then burst into tears.

"What is the matter?" asked the king.

"Ah, sire!" said the page, as he cast himself before his sovereign, "some one seeks my ruin. I know nothing of the money I have just found in my pocket."

"My young friend," said the king, "God often does great things for us, even in our sleep. Send that to your mother, salute her on my part, and assure her that I will take care of both her and you."

We forget that God uses many instruments. Sometimes it is a king, sometimes it is a raven. To Elijah the Tishbite, God said, "I have commanded the ravens to feed thee."

Let me tell you a story of a raven, which may help you to understand how in all things, great and small, those who look for God's providence are sure to find it.

In a village near Warsaw, there lived a pious peasant, of German extraction, by name Dobry. Without any fault of his own, he had fallen into arrears with his rent, and the landlord determined to eject him. He went to him three times in vain.

It was evening, and the next day he was to be turned out with all his family. As the family sat in silent sorrow, the church bells pealed out for evening prayer, and Dobry knelt down in their midst, and they sang—

"Commit thou all thy griefs,
And ways into His hand."

and as they came to the last verse—

"When Thou wouldst all our need supply,
Who, who, shall stay Thine hand?"

there was a knock at the window. It proved to be an old friend—a raven! Dobry's grandfather had taken it from its nest, and tamed it, and then set it at liberty. The window was opened, and the raven hopped in, when lo! it was found that in its bill was a ring set with precious stones.

The poor peasant was sorely tempted to sell the ring, and thus relieve his immediate distress, but being a God-fearing man, he felt it to be his duty to make known the fact, and he took the ring to the minister, who saw at once by the crest, that it belonged to King Stanislaus, to whom he took it, narrating the whole story.

The king sent for Dobry, and rewarded him, so that he was no longer in danger of being turned out of his home, and the following year he built him a new house, and gave him cattle from his own stall.

And over the house door there was placed an iron tablet, on which was carved a raven, with a ring in its beak, and underneath this verse:

"Thou everywhere hast sway,
And all things serve Thy might;
Thy every act pure blessing is,
Thy path unsullied light."

So, if we truly commit our ways into His hand, we shall be often singing in our hearts the words which are our text to-day.

All who have ever trusted in God have found it true in their lives: "The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad."

May all who read these words be able to bless and praise Him for having given our dear Saviour to die for us. That was the greatest of all His great things, and should surely make us glad. And having given Him, He can give us all lesser things.

"He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?"

Monthly Religious Record.

THE Ecclesiastical Bill, recently under discussion in the Prussian Upper Chamber, marks a noteworthy change in the relations between Germany and the Pope. The particular modifications which it makes in the famous May Laws are, perhaps, of less general interest than the avowed motive by which the Imperial Chancellor justifies them. The committee have proposed a clause authorising the re-admission of religious orders and bodies devoting themselves to the instruction and education of girls in the higher schools. Prince Bismarck declared that he regarded the matter from a purely political stand-point. "I desire," he said, "to conclude peace with the Curia, as with every other Power, in the interest of our country. It seldom happens that everybody is satisfied. How long peace, or what is next to peace, the rapprochement to the Romish Curia for the purposes of peace which we are trying to obtain, will last cannot be calculated beforehand. We must only consider the present, and accept that. I undertake no responsibility for the future."

THE Vatican has lost its ablest diplomatist, by the death of Cardinal Jacobini in his fifty-eighth year. The adviser of Pio Nono as well as of the present Pope, he gave proof as Pontifical Secretary of great capacity in many delicate negotiations. The death of Father Beckx, General of the Jesuits, is also reported. The principal organ of that body states that since he took office the number of those who have joined the Society has been more than doubled, that many new Provinces have been formed and new missions instituted. He was also instrumental in the beatification or canonization of from seventy to eighty saints. To him may be attributed the increased activity of the Order and the influence it has regained over the Papacy. It was at his own instigation when he felt himself unequal any longer to carry on his work, that a congregation of the Order was summoned to elect a Vicar, who at his decease should succeed him. Anton Anderledy, a native of Brieg, in the canton of Valais, was chosen, and there seems little doubt that this appointment will be confirmed. Since the foundation of the Order by Ignatius Loyola in 1541, there have been twenty Generals, of whom only three have been Spaniards, his two immediate successors, and Gonzales elected in 1686. Of the other seventeen—ten have been Italians, one a German, one a Bohemian, one a Pole, one a Dutchman, and three Belgians, including Father Beckx. At his own desire his funeral was very simple, and he was carried to the grave in a fourth-class hearse, such as is used for the poor. He had reached the age of ninety-two.

THE Religious Book Society of Toulouse, which was one of the first in France to interest itself in the moral and religious instruction of the working classes, has now completed its fifty years of labour. Looking back on its beginning, its promoters recall how at that time they found themselves confronted by a bad literature which, even then, was making every effort to extend itself among the masses, and by Roman Catholic fanaticism, from which the scattered Protestants specially suffered. Yet religion was still generally respected and atheism had not yet gained hold on public authorities; immoral novels were not as numerous in those days, and they did not then in penny numbers reach the poorest at remotest homes. Nor were the half-penny journals with which now the country is flooded then in existence, to tell the working classes, as they now do daily, that the only way of freedom is to throw off all religion. In spite of many and changing difficulties, the work has grown into strength. Suitable books have been published, libraries founded, and a wholesome Protestant literature created. There is a vast field yet to occupy. Meanwhile, many facts attest the power of the truth as thus brought into circulation.

WHILE the Egyptian question still remains unsolved, it would be lamentable if our long British occupation bore no fruit of permanent good. General Haig, who has been exploring both sides of the Red Sea with a view to evangelisation work, states that European habits and ideas are more and more spreading in the great towns, and that all the atheism and profligacy of the Levant are being poured freely into the country. At the same time he thinks the present movement better than the old stagnation. Among the people there is gross ignorance, with its natural accompaniment of fanaticism; but the popular feeling varies much in different towns and villages. His own opinion is that the British occupation is slowly preparing them to lend a more favourable ear to Christianity. The immense improvement that has been effected in the irrigation of the Delta is a thing which cannot but be widely and gratefully appreciated. The abolition of the greater part of the "corvée," or forced labour in clearing out the canals—a reform which has been carried out at an annual cost to the Government of 250,000*l.*—is another most important benefit, removing a grievance which inflicted immense loss and suffering upon the population. Large sums have been spent upon education, and still larger would be devoted to this object were it not for the existing financial pressure. Even the army, which was, and indeed still is, abhorred above all other things by the Egyptians, who looked upon enlistment as merely a step to a speedy grave in the Soudan, is in its reorganised form, under British officers, becoming an important means of training for the population. The men are now taught in school, learn habits of order, neatness, cleanliness, punctuality, and begin to feel something like self-respect. These acquirements they carry to their homes and introduce there, while they are themselves raised a step in public estimation. Meanwhile, the American Mission is beginning to make itself felt. That Society occupies seventy different stations, most of them on the Nile south of Cairo, between it and Assiout, and in fifty-seven of these has distinct Native congregations, numbering 3300, of whom 1800 are communicants. It has sixty-five schools with 5414 scholars, and no less than fifty-seven of these schools are entirely supported by the fees and the Native congregations. In the Delta the Mission has stations in Cairo, Boulac, Kafr-el-Misht, Zagazig, Tanta, Mansourah, Damanhoor, Alexandria, and other less-important places. Its converts are indeed mostly from among the Copts, but the Mohammedans are not neglected. There are 600 Mohammedan boys, and in Cairo and its suburbs at least 350 girls in its schools. If its converts from Mohammedanism are few, we have to remember the enormous difficulties in the way of an open profession of Christianity. But the truth has been widely spread, at least in Cairo and other centres, and prejudices have been broken down to a remarkable degree.

As regards the influence of Mohammedanism in Syria, the Rev. Dr. Jessup, writing in 'Woman's Work for Woman,' says: "If it be asked whether Mohammedanism is stronger or weaker than it was forty years ago, I should say, both; it is stronger in some points, and weaker in others. It is stronger through the efforts of the Government to revive the old war-spirit of Islam. The army is a Moslem army, not a national army made up of all classes, but a class army, the army of the prevailing sect. The military and civil-service schools are almost exclusively for Mohammedan youth, and the evident intent of the authorities is to favour one sect, to the disadvantage of all others. And in the civil courts, the testimony of Christians and Jews is not received. Only Mohammedans can testify, and this in spite of various firmans declaring that Christian testimony shall be received. All these things tend to strengthen the hold of Islam upon the Mohammedan population. It is for their interest to remain Moslems. On the other hand, they feel their inferiority as a nation to Christian nations, and find their religion an insuperable barrier in the way of progress. Many of them are disgusted with polygamy and its attendant evils, while they find it commended in the Koran. The Scriptures in Arabic have opened the eyes of not a few who read God's Word in secret and await the day of deliverance. The Moslems find it necessary to defend their peculiar doctrines in newspapers and tracts, quite a remarkable concession, yet we are not allowed to answer them. The repressive measures used to prevent printed discussions are justified by the authorities on the ground that they would occasion riot and bloodshed. This is probably true in the present state of society."

THE schools of the Society for Promoting Female Education in the East are threatened in Palestine by the revival of Turkish intolerance. A notice has been issued imposing conditions that cannot be accepted. It is required that their teachers should pass the Turkish standard, which would necessitate study and residence at Constantinople; next, they are ordered to furnish a programme of their daily work, to be submitted to the Turkish Board. This would mean doing away with religious instruction. The first indication of coming trouble was given at Nazareth; the work at Bethlehem had since been threatened. A serious check is feared, unless it can be averted by diplomatic influence.

FROM the scene of the recent persecutions in Uganda, the last accounts report that the English and French missionaries were well, and quiet restored, but the converts still hiding. Mr. Mackay, writing nearly three months earlier, when the fierce storm was abating, speaks of visitors coming every day, with some of whom he had read and re-read two or three of the books of the New Testament. Sometimes a fair number gathered for a prayer-meeting or address. He was himself resuming the translation of St. Matthew. "The sun," he writes, "will rise to-morrow morning. How do we know? By no great process of faith or reason. It has always done so. History repeats itself: rather, the calm and regular working of God goes on with the same unerring grandeur in both worlds—the natural and the spiritual. We will not hasten the sunrise by rushing eastward to help it: the chances are that we shall stumble in the dark. When the day begins to dawn, we can see where we are going, and can rightly recognize the lay of the land. Night has its value; but we all laugh at a cock beginning to crow at midnight. Our midnight will, however, soon be morn, and all our dark be light."

THE China Inland Mission reports numerous baptisms at various points; thus, ten at Ts'in-Chau, six in P'ing-yang, and fifty-six at Hung-tung; thirty are reported ready for baptism west of the Fen river; and already, before this news arrived, more than a hundred persons had been baptised in South Shan-si. Dr. Wilson mentions a painful instance of Chinese filial piety at Han-chung. An aged Chinaman was dying. "The family being in great consternation, the eldest son a thousand miles away, and thus unable to perform acts of filial devotion, his wife in his place performed the act which is supposed to propitiate heaven; with her own hand she cut a piece of flesh out of her own arm to have cooked and administered to her father-in-law that he might recover."

THE condition of affairs in Japan is curiously illustrated by the fact that a daily paper at Sendai not long since published two editorials on Christianity, urging all young men to press forward, be baptized, and become openly members of churches; asserting, however, that real belief was unnecessary—"only become nominal Christians, and that's enough." The Rev. T. H. Pettee appeals to America to come forward with additional missionary aid. "It was American pluck," he says, "courtesy, shrewdness, and perseverance which opened Japan to the world a third of a century ago. An American was the first representative of a foreign government to take up his residence in Japan with a completed treaty in his hands. Commodore Perry built the first railway and set up the first telegraph line in Japan. In 1872 the Japanese Government, believing the American school-system to be the best in the world, re-organised their own, using ours as a model. The new scheme has been carried out with remarkable fidelity as well as success. To-day there are nearly, if not quite, 3,000,000 enrolled students, out of a population of 37,500,000 people. Many of the earliest teachers were Americans. In literature, American missionaries and others, have done much. No help is more gratefully received and no example more carefully followed. As to distinctively religious work, Americans were engaged in it ten years ahead of other missionaries." We abridge his words, but on these general grounds he pleads with his country to recognise their Christian responsibilities. "To-day," he continues, "250 out of 300 Protestant missionaries are Americans. The type of Christianity in Japan, so far as it takes on any foreign hue, is decidedly American. In the present tremendous crisis, when native religions are losing their hold on the people faster than Christianity can get its grasp, what is needed for the next few years is a little more union of effort, and less of 'isms' in Christian work. Buddhists and Shintoists still make their 'heave offerings' of rice and money at the temples, but the quantity grows less each year and will soon reach starvation point for the poor priests. Foreign customs prevail everywhere. Priests and people alike need a new faith. They know this, and are calling for a better religion. But they will not wait. They must have it at once or they will conclude there is no true religion."

THE London Missionary Society laments the death of the Rev. Benjamin Rice, at Bangalore, after more than fifty years of service. Replying, one short month before, to an address presented to him on the occasion of his jubilee, the veteran missionary dwelt upon the advance made since he first reached India. "It is not sixty years," he said, "since an order was issued by the Indian Government that 'missionaries must not preach to natives.' Now the officers of Government themselves praise the work done by missionaries. Then it was with difficulty that Hindus could be induced to send their children to Christian schools. Now they flock to them by thousands. Then few natives would take Christian books, even as a gift. Now they buy them in great numbers. Then the education of women was looked upon with utter contempt. Now the education of the girls of India receives more attention than did that of the boys forty years ago. Nor is the increase in the number of native Christians less encouraging, the number in Protestant missions having risen from 27,006 in 1831 to nearly 500,000 in 1881, when the last census was taken."

THE thirty-fourth annual meeting of the Open Air Mission was presided over by Sir Douglas Fox, who said he thought the Gospel met with a better reception in the streets than formerly. The report stated that there are now 1086 members on the roll. Last year about 200 preaching stations were maintained in London, and 797 towns and villages reached in the country. The number of races, fairs and other holiday gatherings visited was 794, in addition to 1160 special missions and services conducted. The number of tracts distributed during the year was 1,001,075, and a total of 19,608,695 from the commencement of the mission.

A LIFE of more than ordinary promise has been brought to its close in the death of the Rev. Evelyn F. Alexander, at the early age of thirty-six. In the late autumn of 1880 he was appointed to fill the vacancy at St. Paul's, Walworth, which he undertook in the face of many difficulties. In five years' time he filled his church with a reverent and devout congregation, reorganised his voluntary school, filled the Sunday-schools with over 2200 children and 160 teachers, built a new mission-hall, and purchased another accommodating 1300 persons; and during his last year of illness comforted himself by collecting funds for a youth's institute and a new infant school. He was a man of cultivated tastes, fond of music, and a skilled draughtsman. His chief characteristics are said to have been utter unselfishness, a wonderful power of sympathy, great tact for which his own natural sensitiveness educated him, and a simple, deeply spiritual preaching. The Bishop of Rochester, who spoke at his funeral, said that he could not imagine a more beautiful testimony to the reality of his work than the way he thought of his people during his last twelve anxious months of illness. Almost the last day of his life he was painting a picture to be sold for the benefit of his parish, and he had seen him working with his own hand at needlework, making articles that should warm some of his poor people in the cold winter time. He passed away in perfect peace. "I'm so happy; so happy," were some of his last words. He died clinging to his Saviour. One who loved him with unspeakable love whispered in his ear, "Do you love Jesus?" "I trust in Him," was the faint response; and so he fell asleep.

WE note with regret the death of Bishop Titcomb. Long well-known by his ministrations in Lambeth, he became Bishop of Rangoon; and after his return, was appointed to the superintendence of the continental stations of the Church of England as a deputy of the Bishop of London. He was for a long time an active member of the committee of the Religious Tract Society.

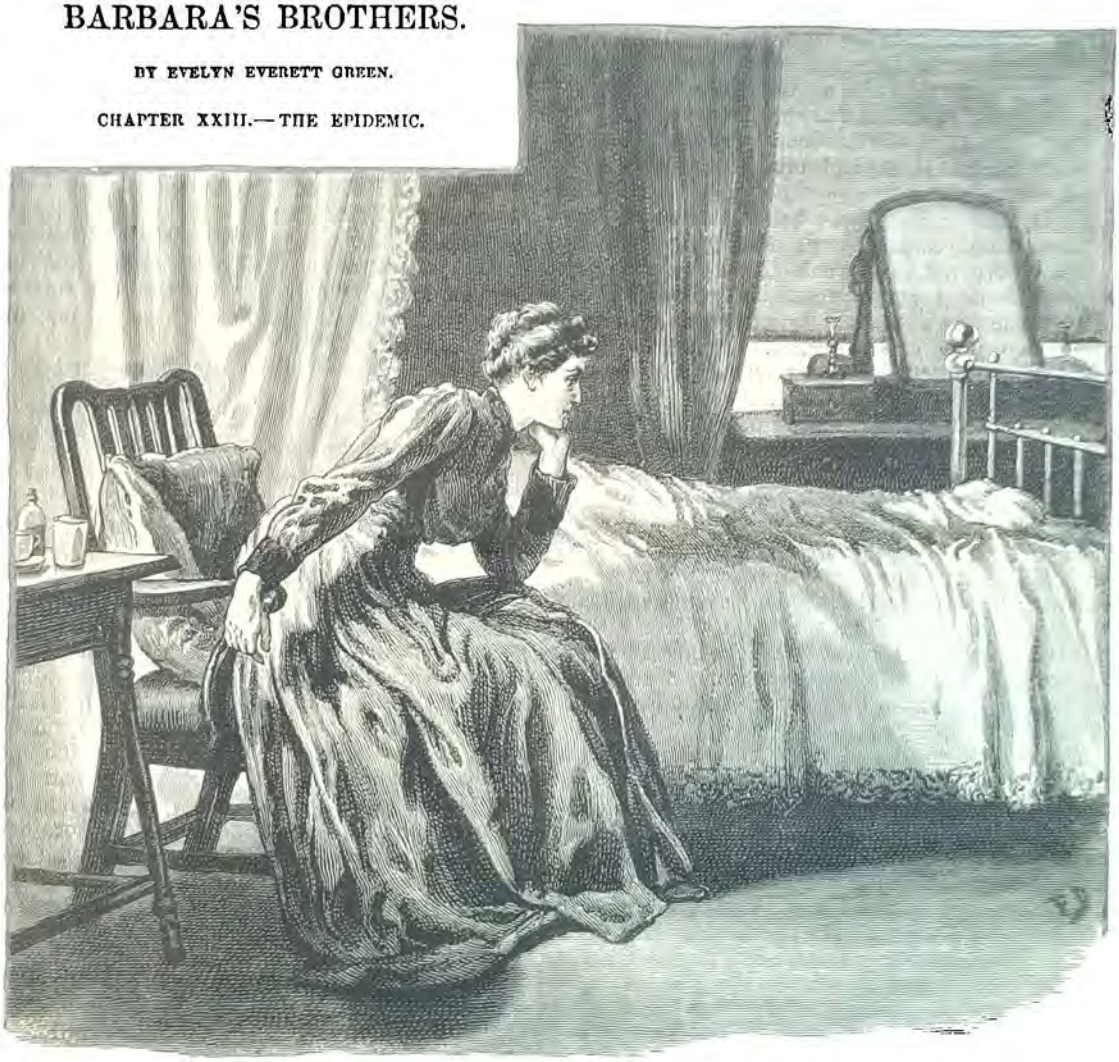
BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

BY EVELYN EVERETT GREEN.

CHAPTER XXIII.—THE EPIDEMIC.



REINÉE WAITED IN A FEVER OF ANXIETY FOR HIS OPINION.

THERE was no lack of employment at St. Hilda now, for all who were willing and able to work.

The outbreak of diphtheria was no mere panic. Wulfric Meynal had not overstepped the mark when he had spoken of it as an epidemic. The deadly disease had broken out in a bad form in the ill-drained, over-crowded fishing hamlet beneath the cliff, and threatened to spread into the town itself. The children were attacked most frequently, sickening one after the other with an alarming rapidity, and dying sometimes almost before help could be obtained.

If help was to be afforded to the sufferers it must be given promptly and courageously.

And, as is generally the case at such times, brave and devoted assistance was not lacking. Many volunteers came forward to give their help, and amongst these were Barbara Meynal and Juliet Granby, both well qualified by previous experience to do excellent service.

Wulfric Meynal gave to all his assistants clear and concise directions how to avoid the infection, directed them never to take the patients' breath, never to go to work fasting or exhausted, and laid down a few of the like simple rules, by which, if attended to, all real danger might be avoided. Some risk each one ran, and did not shrink from it; but the doctor told them that by care and watchfulness they would in all probability escape taking the complaint, as nurses and doctors generally did. Also, as the infection could not be transmitted through a third person, no isolation from their families was necessary.

Gladly indeed would Reinée Dumaresq have joined this band of workers, but her mother would not hear of such a thing, and was with difficulty brought to consent to remain at the Hall at all. Mr. Dumaresq, however, declared against a move at such a time, and encouraged his daughter to do all in her power to relieve the sufferers from the epidemic, without exactly going amongst them and ministering to them personally.

So Reinée—carte blanche being thus extended to her—took counsel with Mrs. Granby and Barbara Meynal, and established a sort of kitchen-dispensary that proved all but invaluable during the weeks that followed. The laundry was the centre of operations, for it was conveniently situated in the rear of the house buildings, and had an entrance of its own opening directly into the lane which led to the hamlet, as well as the ordinary communication with the house.

In this great building Reinée was queen and reigned supreme. Here the poor people came for the strong beef-tea or port wine, that kept alive the flickering flame of life in many a little sufferer, who must inevitably have sunk without prompt assistance of such a kind. Here disinfectants were given to all who asked, and firing, and even blankets, to such as came armed with an "order" from Dr. Meynal or one of his band of assistants.

For convalescents, stronger nourishment was provided in cases where actual poverty made it necessary; and there was so much distress and misery in the place at this time, that, but for assistance, that might under other circumstances have been condemned as indiscriminate, the people must have died by the score.

The epidemic spread quickly to the town, and the well-to-do families soon had their hands full. So the care of the hamlet fell very much into the hands of the few residents there; and Mr. Dumaresq came forward with noble liberality as far as money was concerned, whilst Reinée, under Mrs. Granby's superintendence, took charge of the practical part of work.

The servants of the household, who loved their sweet young mistress with all their hearts, entered heart and soul into her plans, first to please her, and later on out of a real sympathy with the sufferers and a wish to help them. The housekeeper never grumbled at the raid made upon her stores, or at the extra work involved in the keeping up of the dispensary; whilst the cook of her own accord told off a kitchen-maid for the making of beef-tea and soup, and the under-housemaid rose, unasked, an hour earlier each day, to get the laundry swept out and put to rights before her ordinary work began.

When a labour of love is entered upon in this spirit it has every chance of success, and not one of those who visited the sick at that time, but could speak with a keen sense of personal gratitude of Reinée's ably-conducted branch of the work. To feel in entering a cottage, where misery and sickness and death were all struggling together, that a few lines despatched to the Hall would at once bring forth a prompt response in the form of such things as were absolutely necessary at such a moment, was invaluable indeed; and so quick and capable and intelligent an insight did Reinée soon obtain into the working of the cases, that what was needed seemed to arrive almost as it were by magic, and a hundred times a day the girl was blessed by those whose sufferings were relieved or whose labours were lightened by means of her unwearied efforts.

"Ah, but I should like to share your work," she said to Barbara and Juliet one day, as they came up on their return from their daily round at the hamlet for the tea Reinée always had waiting for them. "Any one could order stores and give them out. I want to work as you do; only I am not allowed."

"I am very glad you are not," answered Juliet, with a smile many degrees more bright than used ever to be seen upon her face. "We could not do without her up here, could we, Barbara?"

"No, indeed! Reinée, you need not mind not visiting the people. We have a good staff of nurses and visitors; but nobody to take your place."

Reinée smiled sweetly, yet with a touch of sadness.

"It seems as if I were destined always to play the part of 'Lady Bountiful' as you once called it when we were talking together of ideals, Juliet. And after all, it is my father's bounty, not mine."

"But yours is the management; the quickness and invaluable promptness and despatch with which everything is done," cried Barbara. "I wish you could hear Wulf speak of you and your laundry. He says you have saved more lives than he has already—not just because you have the things to give away, but because there is no blundering; because the right thing comes at the right moment, and nothing is ever omitted or forgotten."

The colour rose slowly in Reinée's face, and a smile shone out of her eyes.

"I am very glad," she answered simply. "I will not be discontented any more. Perhaps it is better for us to take the work that offers, than to try and choose our own."

"I think that now," answered Juliet, her face flushing somewhat, "although I always feel that it is not for me to talk."

Reinée smiled, and then turning to Barbara, asked, "Have all the Stones kept well? I see the man so seldom, now that he works on the lower farm. I hope my little Jack keeps out of harm's way."

"His mother has sent him to an aunt some twenty miles away. She was afraid he would be always getting down amongst the other children, and I think she was wise. She and Alice are in the cottage. I hope it will escape; it is isolated from the village pretty well."

"Yes; I would go to see Alice, only perhaps mamma might not even like me to go that little way towards the beach; besides, Alice never will speak to me; it is Clive who has won her heart. She has always a smile and a flower for him. I wish I could get her to make friends."

"She is odd—not quite right in the head, I fancy," answered Barbara; "she will not look at me, though she does not mind Wulf much; but she has never made friends with any one but your brother."

"I call it Clive's conquest," answered Reinée, with a little smile. "He is kind to the poor little girl, and often stops to sing her a song as he goes by. It is wonderful how her face lights up when she hears music. It seems a sort of passion with her. Poor child, she will be rather dull without Jack, for she is fond of him. I must tell Clive to take her on his mind a little."

Clive Dumaresq had been away from home during the first outbreak of the epidemic, but he had lately returned, and had entered with great zeal into his sister's labours, and by his unfailing flow of bright spirits had at the same time lightened her toil and cheered her up in every way.

Mrs. Dumaresq would have liked to circumscribe Clive's wanderings as she had done Reinée's, and confine him closely to the park and its immediate surroundings; but sons are less amenable than daughters on such points, and the young man laughed playfully at her fears, and went about much as usual. He sometimes indeed visited a sick man, to carry him one of Reinée's doles, or asked after any one whom he knew to be dangerously ill, and ascertained that the family had all they wanted; but he took care not to expose himself needlessly, and had no intention of running risks for no good reason.

Clive was fond of boating, and was often up and down the cliff path on his way to or from the beach. It was in this way that he had so completely won the heart of the little cripple-girl, for he seldom passed by without pausing to say a few words, and his appearance was hailed as the main event in a somewhat sad and colourless life.

One sultry afternoon in May, when a sort of haze seemed to hang over sea and land, and to suggest ideas of sickness and infection, Clive was slowly ascending the cliff path from the beach.

He had been out in his boat, but the heat had driven him home. The day was peculiarly oppressive, and he felt tired and disinclined for exertion. As he reached the little cottage where the Stones lived, he thought he would rest for a few minutes in the shade, and sat down accordingly on the low stone wall where he had often paused before.

He had not been seated there long before he became aware of a low, continuous moaning proceeding from the cottage. He glanced round, but nobody was to be seen, and only these distressful moans broke the silence of the hot summer-like afternoon. Somebody must be ill or in trouble or pain, and, as it seemed, alone too. Clive was too kind-hearted to go away without trying to do what he could to mend matters, so he swung himself over the low wall and knocked at the cottage door, which stood wide open.

No answer was returned, but the moaning continued as before, and was more distinctly heard. It proceeded from the inner room, and after a moment's hesitation he entered the cottage and crossed the space that divided him from the sufferer.

Upon the low truckle bed in that close, airless little room lay the crippled Alice—dying. Yes, even an inexperienced eye could see at a glance that the child was dying fast. Her lips were black and parched, her eyes were dim and glazed, her breath came in painful gasps, and the efforts to swallow brought on paroxysms of pain.

Clive could well understand what had happened. The girl had fallen a victim to the fatal malady, perhaps, a day or two ago, and had been taken suddenly worse to-day. The mother had run for assistance of some kind, and meantime the poor child, growing rapidly worse, was likely to die quite alone.

A great wave of pity swept over Clive. He was not in the least disposed to run needless risk, and yet it seemed to him an absolute impossibility to go away coolly and leave a sick child to die unwatched and untended. The mother would not be long gone; at least he would stay till she came back.

At that moment the girl looked up, and murmured a hoarse petition for water.

Clive moistened the parched lips, and propped up the gasping child in an easier position. He would have opened the window if he could, for the air was very foul and turned him rather sick; but he could not manage it. The bed was in the way, and the patient too ill to be disturbed.

As he moved about Alice looked hard at him with her dim, failing eyes, and suddenly a smile like a shadowy sunbeam flickered over her face.

"It's him!" she gasped, hoarsely yet joyfully, "him—as I thought—I'd never see no more—I begged and prayed as I might say good-bye. God does hear us—after all—I do believe!"

Clive was much touched, more by the look upon the dying face than by the blunt words barely articulated. He took the girl's hand in his kindly.

"I am here, Alice," he said; "can I do anything for you?"

She looked up with more of consciousness than before.

"I'm a-dying, ain't I?"

One moment's pause, and the simple, truthful answer, "I think so."

"I'm glad on it too. I'd like to die, if God really cares for us, as Jack says. I think perhaps He do, as He's sent you. Will you stay with me—till I die?"

All this was spoken with great difficulty; it seemed almost as if every breath drawn with such pain must be the last. Clive could only stand by helpless and watch the terrible struggle.

"I will not leave you, Alice," he said.

She understood and looked her gratitude, but strength and life were ebbing fast away. With a great effort she got out two more words:

"Music—sing!"

Her eyes sought his face imploringly. It seemed as if she wanted the help of some sweet sound to smooth the rough path she was treading. Strange as was the request at such a time and in such a place, Clive did not hesitate, and his clear sweet voice sounded forth in the notes of that great and beautiful song, "I know that my Redeemer liveth."

He sang it with a strange new sense of its wonderful truth and power, and the dying girl listened with her soul in her eyes.

"It is—like—angels," she whispered with a little smile, and then, gazing into his face, she tried again and again to say some words that her parched lips refused to utter. It was a message to Reinée poor Alice wished to send—a message asking for pardon for the ingratitude with which her many acts of kindness had been met. But though Clive bent down very close over the dying girl, he could barely catch the drift of what she wished to say; yet his smile and gentle words penetrated the cloud that dimmed her sight and hearing, and it was with a smile upon her lips that the child laid down the burden of a life that had known but little of joy in this world. He—her idol—had been with her in the hour of death, and his presence had made very bright for her the dark, rough passage. To her clouded mind it was the foreshadowing of the eternal love that would meet her upon the farther shore.

Clive Dumaresq, although saddened and shocked by having for the first time in his life witnessed death, did not feel any personal alarm at having encountered the infection, nor did Reinée, to whom he told the tale, express any particular fears. She saw so many every day who were constantly with the sick, that she had begun to lose the first sense of fear lest they should take the infection.

But two days later, just when her labours for the poor of the hamlet were being lightened, a terrible trouble at home fell upon the girl.

At the dinner table that day Clive sat looking white and strange. He could not eat, and presently excused himself on the plea of headache and left the room somewhat abruptly. Reinée felt a curious thrill of cold dismay run through her. She seemed to know from the first what was about to befall them; she followed him the moment she could do so without disturbing her father by showing undue anxiety, and found him already in bed, his white face oddly flushed despite its pallor, and his whole frame shivering convulsively.

"Don't come near me, Reinée," he said, with chattering teeth. "I am afraid I've got it."

"We will send for Dr. Meynal," answered Reinée quietly, "it may be only a chill."

Brother and sister looked at each other for a moment, and sudden tears started to Reinée's eyes. Each read the thought of the other—each knew that Clive had caught the malady from the cripple-girl, who had had it in its worst form. In her case it had proved fatal in three days' time. What would it do in his?

Mrs. Dumaresq came in at this moment and saw at a glance that her son was ill. A spasm of pain crossed her face, for Clive was the idol of her heart—not otherwise very susceptible to love—and a cold wave of fear swept over her too.

"Has he been near any infection?" she asked softly of Reinée.

Clive heard the question and answered it for himself.

"Yes, mother. I saw a child die three days ago. There was nobody else there. I could not let her die alone."

Mrs. Dumaresq made no reply. A settled gravity was in her look as she went away to despatch a summons for the doctor. Clive looked after her with rather wistful eyes.

"Poor mother," he said softly.

Reinée choked back an inclination to sob, and approached the bed with gentle steps. He put out his hand as if to keep her away; but she smiled and sat down beside him, taking the hot hand in hers.

"I know all about it," she said quietly. "I will not do anything rash; but you must not send me away, Clive."—She stopped suddenly, and he added the words she had not dared even to think.

"We may not have so very much longer to be together."

There had been so much of death all round them lately, that it was not strange for such thoughts to occur to them, even in the first moments before they had had any medical opinion. Clive, with all his vigour and brightness, had never been robust. He had seldom ailed anything serious; but there had always been an undefined feeling in the minds of his family that a severe illness would go rather hard with him.

Reinée sat beside him holding his hand, and trying by prayer to school herself to calmness and resignation. Clive lay in the passive state engendered by the lassitude of fever. He had struggled hard all day against an overmastering oppression of illness, and it was almost a relief to give way at last. But for the rapidly increasing pain in his throat he could have been absolutely comfortable.

Wulfric Meynal came quickly. Mrs. Dumaresq accompanied him to the room. His experienced eye took in his patient's condition in an instant. It hardly required a glance at the throat before the diagnosis was complete.

"I know I've got it," said Clive hoarsely. "Don't let Reinée catch it; but don't banish her altogether if you can help it."

"We will try to compromise matters," answered Wulfric in his steady tones, with one of his most kindly and reassuring glances at the girl. Reinée met his eye with a quiet, trustful smile, and they shook hands, which they had not done upon his entrance.

Then with a few friendly injunctions to his patient to keep quiet Wulfric withdrew, together with Mrs. Dumaresq, and Reinée waited in a sort of fever of anxiety for his opinion of the case. The housekeeper had come in—an old and faithful servant, invaluable in times of sickness; and Reinée slipped away to hear the doctor's report. He was in the hall when she reached the foot of the staircase. She went straight up to him with the confidence of an old friend.

"Tell me, please, Dr. Meynal."

He looked at her gravely, kindly, even tenderly.

"I am afraid your brother is very ill."

"I thought so—is it the same form as the one little Alice died from?"

"I fear it is."

"Do you think he will die too?"

The question was very simply asked, perhaps that was why it sounded so infinitely pathetic. Wulfric took in his warm clasp the two little cold hands that had pressed themselves closely together as she spoke. His voice shook a very little as he answered in deep and quiet tones—"We are in God's hands, and He is very good. We will ask Him to bless the means we use and to make him well. I would lay down my life to save him, if I could."

Reinée looked up gratefully. Something in the face of this strong man touched her very much. She had always felt him a true friend—at a time like this she seemed to need his presence in a way she could not have explained.

"Thank you," she said softly. "I believe you would. You love Clive, I know."

"Yes," he answered very quietly. "I love Clive—and I love you too, Reinée." He bent his head as he spoke and kissed the hands he held tenderly and reverently, and without another word or look he was gone, leaving Reinée standing where he left her as one in a dream.

Clive, as Wulfric Meynal had anticipated, passed the night fairly, but towards the following evening worse symptoms began to set in, and strong and painful measures had to be resorted to, that had the effect of exhausting him fearfully, leaving him sometimes almost more dead than alive.

He never, however, lost consciousness, and although speech was all but impossible, his glance would follow Reinée with loving tenderness, and she could understand his unspoken wishes better than any one else could do. He often wanted to be read to—to hear the word of life from the Book that seems so beautifully appropriate to all the needs of this life, and especially to those of the sick and suffering.

Mrs. Dumaresq would sit silently by whilst Reinée read to her brother and talked to him softly of the thoughts and feelings they shared together, and of the great eternal home where partings were no more. What passed through her mind at these times no one could say; only there was a strange new gentleness in her manner, and a peculiar tenderness not only to her son, but to her daughter, which they had never received from her before.

Wulfric Meynal was backwards and forwards at the Hall continually during these trying days, and for two nights he sat up with Clive, battling against the terrible foe with a determined skill and power that seemed as if it must win the victory at last. Those who helped to nurse Clive said within themselves that if human skill could avail to save him, Dr. Meynal would pull him through.

One point in Clive's favour was his quiet resignation and willingness to die if the summons should come for him. Bright as had been his life, and happy as he had always been, he was yet ready to lay all down without a murmur if it should be required of him.

This phase perplexed Mrs. Dumaresq not a little. She was alone with her son for a brief space one evening, she was murmuring to herself half unconsciously:

"Oh, hard, hard, hard! Too terribly and cruelly hard."

Clive's eyes flashed open quickly.

"It is not hard to me, mother," he whispered faintly.

"What is not, my boy?"

"Death," he answered, and a strange gleam of bright light seemed to flash over his face.

"Not hard to leave us all, and go away no one knows where?"

"Ah, but I do know," he answered; the light deepening strangely in his dark eyes. "It is to be with Christ, which is far better. And I shall not be lost—only gone—before."

Many words were impossible; even these few had exhausted him; but they gave food for much meditation to the mother who watched in silence by his bedside.

There came a crisis in the case at length—a terrible night never forgotten by any of those that shared Wulfric's watch. Mrs. Dumaresq and Reinée never left the sufferer that night, and many times it seemed as if he must die in those terrible paroxysms of breathlessness; but Wulfric's skill and strength and tenderness seemed still to triumph over the relentless foe, and as the morning dawned they saw a change pass over the loved face.

The lines of pain and distress were smoothed away, a look of peaceful relief took the place of the old expression of resolute endurance. The breath came more easily and slowly, and the dusky flush faded to a marble whiteness. The watchers almost held their breath as these changes very gradually became apparent. Their eyes sought Wulfric's face, as if imploring him for a sign as to what this change might portend; but he stood beside the bed motionless as a statue, his fingers on the patient's pulse, watching, listening intently.

"Mother!" Clive's eyes flashed open suddenly and fixed themselves upon Mrs. Dumaresq, who approached and bent over him. What whispered petition he poured into her ear neither Wulfric nor Reinée could hear, as they stood together a little apart. They saw Mrs. Dumaresq raise her eyes and flash a quick glance at them. They saw a tremor cross her face; and they heard her say quietly, "I promise, Clive."

Then the old sunny smile played once again over the still face. Was it the last flicker before the light went out?

"Kiss me, mother; kiss me, Reinée," he said.

And after they had done this his eyes closed, and presently Wulfric said in low tones:

"Thank God, that is a natural sleep; the crisis is over, and I believe that he will live."

THE STORY OF MR. FEARING.

A STUDY FROM BUNYAN'S "PILGRIM'S PROGRESS."

BY THE LATE REV. EDWIN PAXTON HOOD.

ONE of the most delicate and dramatic of all the portraits drawn by the great dreamer in the "Pilgrim's Progress," is that, in the second part, of Mr. Fearing; by which very useful picture I suppose Bunyan intended to sketch a very common character, an intense conscience in a narrow mind, and a very feeble frame. It is curiously said he was born in the town of Stupidity. The population of that town, according to any census, is very large. It is well described as lying in the Arctic Zone, far from the sun; cold, and its inhabitants senseless, most of them described by the Psalmist as "like unto the beasts that perish." Looking back to his experience in that town, it was another Psalmist who said: "So foolish was I and ignorant, I was as a beast (that is, as a thoughtless creature) before Thee." Some have little sense beyond that of merest nature. It is said "they have cast off all fear, and restrained prayer before God,"—that is, they have no spiritual relationship with invisible things; all things are estimated by a low standard; there is little light and little heat. This country lies further north than the city of Destruction, not that it is less the city or country of danger, but its dangers differ; the City of Destruction is in danger from fire, the country of Stupidity from ice; one is in danger from sensation and passion, the other from inertness and dulness. Yet there have been noble pilgrims who have left that region, though carrying with them much of their native fear, and cold, and even sluggishness.

That was the country in which Mr. Fearing was born, concerning whom one of his fellow-townsmen and fellow pilgrims, old Honest, says: "He was one of the most troublesome pilgrims that I ever met with in all my days;" and of whom the great Captain Greatheart says: "He was always kept very low, and that made his life so burdensome to himself and so troublesome to others."

Now in the religious life this must be a very real character, for the Bible addresses itself to human fears more than any other book. It is implied all along that man is a child of many fears, and that every thing in the world is calculated to excite them. Fear holds a stern dominion over the mind, over the conscience, over the affections, and it is implied that if all be well with these, all will be well; hence from first to last, words roll forth to allay fear. Thus, in Genesis xv. 1: "Fear not, Abraham, I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward." In Exodus xiv. 13: "Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord." In Lamentations iii. 57: "Thou drewest near in the day that I called upon Thee: Thou saidst, Fear not." And Christ said: "Fear not, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Thus to gird up the loins of the mind, this is the burden of the book; it is a remonstrance with human fears. It was the boast of Obadiah: "I, thy servant, fear the Lord from my youth." It was the glory of Nehemiah: "So did not I, because of the fear of God."

We are not, I know, so much the subjects of religious fears as in Bunyan's day. The strife of life—the conflict of the fittest—eats up our soul, creates new diseases, furnishes our hospitals—our lunatic asylums, creates heart diseases, lung disease, brain disease. Yet man has a conscience still, and relations to God.

Now there are six stages in the history of Mr. Fearing.

First: He fears for the impossibility of rising out of Nature into Grace; is there a kingdom of Grace at all? Is it not all a kingdom of Nature? Thus we read of him, that "he lay roaring by the Slough of Despond for months together, nor durst he, for all he saw several go over before him, venture." He was dejected at every difficulty that came in his way, and stumbled at every straw. After he had been in the Slough of Despond a great while, one sunshiny morning he ventured, and so got over; "but," says Bunyan, "he could scarce believe it: he has a Slough of Despond in his mind—a slough that he carried everywhere about with him." But what can we say of this Slough of Despond but that it is a thick swamp of doubts, and especially of fears? There are those who are free from doubts in the intellectual sense, who are still the victims of fears. "Fears are in the way;" they feel nothing strong within them, so it seems there is nothing strong above them: they have not learned the power of Divine grace; yet, at this point, this and this only is the strength of Mr. Fearing. Think of a swift, quick conscience making itself felt in nervous fears for the future of this life even: then asking "How shall I do in the swelling of Jordan?"—with fears especially for eternity, and what is to be the end. So it sometimes seems as if we are delivered from fear to fear, as if life is made up of fears. Thus we live on from day to day, but we know not when the stroke falls which shatters happiness and hope; it seems as if the ground were strown with snakes; we know not whence the arrow flies. So the word is perpetually addressed to us, "Fear not!" And at the most, life is but a moment, and yonder, all is well.

And what more is that, "Strengthen ye the weak hands and confirm the feeble knees." I once heard a conversation going on between the various members of the body, as to which of them bore the greater share of the burdens of life. The back complained that it bore all the burden. The shoulders said: "Nay, but we bear and equalise the burden." The hands said they lifted it. "Ah, but," said the knees, "you never think of us, and yet, if we gave way, all would give way; and how weary we become!" Life is full of fears when the knees are weak, when "the strong men (by which no doubt the knees are intended) bow themselves;" but "strengthen the feeble knees," and all goes well then. As we read in Philippians iv. 6–7: "Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Jesus Christ." Let us therefore come boldly to the throne of grace that we may obtain!

And now we find the second thing to observe in this same Mr. Fearing,—he shrank from the personal obligations of a religious life. Like Joseph of Arimathea, he is "a disciple of Jesus —but secretly." Shaking and shivering, he feared to take the hammer in hand, and to knock for admission at the gate. He went in trembling, and when he was in, he was ashamed to show his face; but it is well said his weakness arose not from weakness of spirit, as to the practical part of the pilgrim's life; he feared the inward, not the outward. He had a kind conscience, and a kind, perhaps a narrow mind; but, as the proverb has it, "he could have bit a firebrand had it stood in his way." The things by which he was oppressed no man could throw off with ease. When he came to the hill Difficulty, he did not much stick at that, nor did he much fear the lions; his fear was, in the old language of that time, as to "his acceptance with God;" "his acceptance at last." So, in the Valley of Humiliation, says Greatheart, "he went down as well as any man I ever saw in my life, for he cared not how mean he was, so he might be happy at last." "There seemed a sympathy between himself and the valley. He would lie down and embrace the ground, and kiss the very flowers; and was up every morning at break of day, walking to and fro in the Valley." A beautiful spirit to meet in the king's highway; one of whom the Pilgrim's master might say,

> Thou, the more fully thou humblest thee here
> All the more perfectly shalt be my peer;
> This is the royal road leading above
> Which mine elect tread to the kingdom of love!

The third great characteristic of this Fearing is, or was, his inability personally to appropriate the spirit of grace, and all the merits of his Master and Saviour. Thus he quenched within himself the comforts of the Spirit. Thus we read of his "lying in the dark and cold outside the interpreter's house, and the nights," says his biographer, "were long and dark and cold then." And, indeed, Nature is one long, dark, cold night, until we not only find Christ, but, by the help of the Comforter, make all His work ours. It is something like this which Cowper describes:

> How blest Thy creature is, O Lord,
> When, with a single eye,
> He views the lustre of Thy word,
> The Day-spring from on high!
> That glorious orb, whose golden beams
> The future years control,
> Since first, obedient to Thy word,
> He started from his goal,
> Has cheered the nations with the beams
> His orient rays impart;
> But, Jesus, 'tis Thy light alone
> Can shine upon the heart.

There is no comfort so great as making the merits of Christ ours. We remember Luther's great words—"Last night when I awoke the Devil came and began disputing with me, and cast up at me that I was a sinner. I said, Tell me something new, Devil; I have committed actual sins, but the sins God forgives, for His dear Son's sake, are not sham sins but actual sins!"

A fourth feature of Fearing's character was that he found it easier to see himself in the sins, and infirmities, and frailties of others than in their virtues and graces: "When we were come to the place—the gibbet where three fellows were hanged—he said he doubted that would be his end also."

> When any turn from Zion's way—
> Alas! what numbers do—
> Methinks I hear my Saviour say,
> "Wilt thou forsake Me too?"
> Ah, Lord! with such a heart as mine,
> Unless Thou hold me fast,
> I fear I must—I shall decline,
> And prove like them at last!

This timidity has its unhealthy as well as its healthy side. "There goes John Bradford but for the grace of God!" said the great martyr, when he saw a felon led to execution. But this should not make us unjust to the grace of God, or willing to grieve the Spirit by which we are "sealed unto the day of redemption."

Fearing starts at shadows because he does not front the shadows with substances. "When," says Greatheart, "he was come to the entrance of the Valley of the Shadow of Death, I thought I should have lost my man; not that he had any inclination to go back, but he was ready to die for fear." But this was because his fears had taught him the dreadful reality of spiritual evil. Many of these fearful ones fear because they live in the constant clearer vision of the spiritual world. Some things so shake them because they are "not ignorant of Satan's devices;" nay, do they not "know the depths of Satan"? Therefore they tremble; their conscience is tender, and it is "conscience that makes cowards of us all." I have said that Fearing fears not the outward, but the inward. Yes, we have a haunted mind, like his who said—

> Is this a dagger which I see before me?
> Let me clutch thee:
> I have thee not, and yet I see thee still.
> Art thou not, fatal vision, sensible
> To feeling as to sight? Or art thou but
> A dagger of the mind? A false creation
> Proceeding from the heat-oppressed brain?

So it is with all of us; we want something to lift us above ourselves; so long as we are perpetually turning to ourselves we are miserable. We dwell in a haunted house. We are a kind of walking thermometer; when the weather is warm we ascend, when it is cold we go down, a sensitive thermometer, never in one stay; like the thermometer, we seem upright enough, but we feel every variety of the weather. Nothing is well with us until we rest in Him who is without "a shadow of turning." Firm health, and all things agreeable to the feelings, then the quicksilver is up; troubles come, and it is down; therefore let us never fetch our happiness, however we may our comfort, from our own frame, not from a changeful creature, but from the changeless God. In reference to the trials of life, the apostle says to the Hebrews (xii. 5), "Ye have forgotten" the exhortation, encouragement, consolation.

And the last feature of this portrait is that it was consistent with his whole character that Mr. Fearing should be in bondage to the fear of death; one of whom the apostle speaks as "all their lifetime subject to bondage." When he was come to the river, where there was no bridge, he was in a heavy case; now, he said, he should be drowned for ever, and so never see that face with comfort which he had come so many miles to behold; and so he seemed likely to fulfil the fears of his life, for he could never leave to-morrow's doubts until to-morrow. Most of the people in the Country of Stupidity have no thought for the fear of death; they die "as a fool dieth;" but a Christian cannot die so—cannot die like a brute. "But," says Greatheart, "here also I took notice of what was very remarkable, the water of the river was lower at this time than I ever saw it in all my life; so Mr. Fearing went over at last not much above wet-shod." When he was going over, Greatheart said to him, as he took his leave, he hoped he would have a good reception above; and he answered, "I shall, I shall;" then the waters parted them asunder, and he was seen no more. And so Fearing got safe home; of him, and the like of him, it is written, "Come, see the works of the Lord; He turned the sea into dry land for them; they went through the flood on foot. There did we rejoice in Him!" I think that will be the triumph of many a fearing one, "through the flood on foot."

> The great and terrible land
> Of mildness and drought,
> Lies in shadow behind me,
> But the Lord hath brought me out.
> The great and terrible river
> I stand by night to view,
> Lies in the shadow before me,
> But God will bear me through.

There are those who taste God's grace chiefly thus, like Mr. Despondency, and Mrs. Much-afraid, his daughter, of whom I should like to give some further account; they belong to the same family as Mr. Fearing. Despondency exclaimed as he stepped into the river, "Farewell night, welcome day!" and his daughter, Much-afraid, went through the river singing, though none could well understand what she said then, "through the flood on foot!"

Such was Bunyan's Fearing, and for him there were provisions made all along. He who "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," and "stays the north wind in the time of His east wind," made Divine provisions for him all the way. He was given a sunshiny morning to escape from the Slough of Despond; neither he nor any knew how, but a hand was sent to pull him through the gate. For him there were special regalements at the interpreter's house. The fiends were hushed for him in the Valley of the Shadow of Death. And we have seen that when he came to the river's brink the waves were at low water-mark. Therefore let us bless Him who rules the tides for human souls; bless Him who meets the fears of human souls. Blessings on the faith which lifts us above our fears. Blessings on the Author and Finisher of our Faith, who calms our fears. Blessings on the Book which is our staff as we pass through the flood on foot, though neither on the Horses of Intelligence, nor in the Chariots of Comfort—on foot—obtaining joy and gladness where all fears shall fly away!

A Palace for a King.

"When a strong man armed keepeth his palace, his goods are in peace. But when a stronger than he shall come upon him, and overcome him, he taketh from him all his armour wherein he trusted, and divideth his spoils."—Luke xi. 21, 22.

> OH, a Palace for a King
> Is this goodly soul of mine,
> And none but He shall dwell there
> Who has the right divine.
> The reign of the usurper
> Shall now for ever cease,
> And He shall take the empire
> Who is the Prince of Peace.
> The splendour of the Palace
> Was ruined by the foe,
> And long the rightful monarch
> Has mourned its overthrow.
> Restore, O Royal Owner,
> The glories of its state,
> Triumphantly re-enter
> Thy goodly palace-gate!
> And overcome the strong one
> Whose spoils are all Thine own,
> And take away his armour,
> O Warrior of Renown!
> O Thou who com'st from Bozrah,
> In garments dyed in red,
> All gloriously apparelled,
> Through all Thy palace tread!
> Now let Thy courts re-echo
> With melodies divine;
> Let harmonies celestial
> Possess this soul of mine!
> And every power its homage
> In duteous measure bring
> To make his habitation
> A Palace for a King!

CLARA THWAITES.

First Flights.

FAR through the boundless realms of light,
In warmth and beauty glowing,
The eager nestlings take their flight,
Their lowly home outgrowing:
So, Lord, to know the things above,
May our first quest be given,
Till, through the sunlight of Thy love,
We learn the way to heaven!

HOSPITALS AND HOSPITAL WORK.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER IV.—ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL.

LET us now describe a visit to a representative Hospital of each class. We may take St. Thomas's Hospital as one of the endowed; the Westminster and the London as representatives of the general; the Consumptive Hospital at Brompton as an example of those for special diseases; and Great Ormond Street as the mother of Children's Hospitals.

St. Thomas's, which is an endowed hospital, has many privileges. It is of ancient lineage, and its history throws light on the growth of these institutions. It does not live from hand to mouth, but has a settled private income. It is independent of public caprice, and it has a history, all of which declares it an aristocrat among the hospitals.

It was an ancient building, even in 1207, when it was destroyed by fire, with the priory of which it was a part, having been founded for converts and poor children, by Richard, a Norman Prior of Bermondsey.

In the year 1228, Peter, Bishop of Winchester, after many and great efforts, succeeded in rebuilding it, not on the same ground, where it had formerly stood, but on the eastern, or opposite side of the highway known to us as High Street, Borough.

A letter which he addressed to "All the Faithful in Christ, in the Diocese of Winchester," is a very interesting one in many ways, and explains how he obtained funds for the new building. In it he sets before them the six works of piety commended by our Lord when on earth. "I was an hungered and ye gave Me to eat; I was thirsty and ye gave Me to drink; I was a stranger and ye took Me in; I was naked and ye clothed Me; I was sick and ye visited Me; in prison and ye came unto Me"—and he exhorts them to be active in the exercise of these works that they may obtain a blessing. Having impressed this upon them, he proceeds to give them an opportunity of exercising these works of love.

"Behold," he writes, "at Southwark, an ancient hospital, built of old to entertain the poor, has been entirely reduced to cinders and ashes by a lamentable fire; the place whereon it formerly stood was not suitable for entertainment and habitation, because of the straitness of the place and because of the lack of water, and many other conveniences, and by the advice of wise men we have decided to transfer and transplant it to another more commodious site, where the air is more pure and calm, and the supply of water more plentiful."

Having related so much, he goes on to say that the building of the new hospital will be very expensive, and cannot be done without their help. He hopes therefore that they will stretch forth the hand of pity to the building of the new hospital, and give according to their ability from the goods bestowed upon them by God. And he further begs of them to receive and entertain the messengers of the hospital who come to them for their offerings, and that it shall be put down to them as a work of piety; nay, further, that those who give shall share in the prayers made in all the churches of the diocese.

And by these means the hospital was at length built and richly endowed.

We hear of it again in 1507, nearly three centuries later, "that it had become dilapidated, and was insufficient in size for its work," and great efforts were made in the country to rebuild and enlarge it.

A very interesting fact in connection with this hospital is that within its walls the first English Bible printed in England was printed by James Nycolson, of St. Thomas' Spyttell, in Southwark, by means of his famous printing press. The Bible bore the inscription: "Imprynted in Southwarke, in St. Thomas' Hospitale, by James Nycolson. Dedicated by M. Coverdale to the King, 1537."

About this time there were in the hospital a master, brethren, and three lay sisters. Forty beds were made up for poor, infirm, and impotent people who were supplied with food and firing —no word at present of its being a medical school.

Now came a very chequered time for St. Thomas's, for it will be remembered that Henry VIII. when excommunicated by the Pope declared himself head of the church and proceeded to dissolve the Catholic houses, of which a hundred and ten were hospitals of various kinds whose large revenues went to the Crown.

Sir Richard Gresham, an able and upright man, who was then Lord Mayor, seems to have been in favour of a change; at all events we find him signing a petition to the king that he would, by his high authority as supreme head of the Church of England, grant and order that the Mayor and Aldermen of the city of London should have supreme control over the lands, tenements, and revenues belonging to this and other three hospitals. The reason given for this request being that "there were now a small number of canons, priests, and monks found in them for their own profit only and not for the common utility of the realm" and that they "would see that for the future the poor, needy, sick, and indigent persons should be refreshed, maintained, and comforted; that they should also be healed and cured of their infirmities by physicians, surgeons, and apothecaries, who should have stipend and salary for their work, and that all persons unable to work should be helped, while sturdy beggars should be punished."

The king certainly intended to grant this petition, but his death occurred before it could be carried out.

The connection of this hospital with the city of London commenced in the reign of King Edward, with whose sanction the citizens instituted an enquiry as to the needs of those who had formerly depended upon the religious houses.

They found that about 2100 fatherless children and invalids were fit recipients of relief, while the remainder were idle rogues of both sexes levying contributions by feigned tales of sorrow.

The Lord Mayor and Aldermen received a grant of the hospital of St. Thomas by charter from King Edward, and everything belonging to it, with the declaration that the right of the citizens should never be disputed or meddled with by any of his successors.

In 1552, the Lord Mayor and certain citizens met and constituted themselves, by royal permission, governors of the hospital, and almoners of the money collected. In compliment to the king they named it at first the King's Hospital, though it was afterwards called St. Thomas the Apostle. At this meeting it was ordained that the hospital should receive 260 wounded soldiers, blind, maimed, sick, and helpless objects. Further there were secured to the citizens the possession of all the estates and revenues appertaining to the hospital by previous deeds of gift.

Thus the Royal Hospital was founded.

The great fire of London caused some injury to the revenues of the hospital, but the great fire in Southwark, which occurred ten years later, ceased, "as if by divine interposition," at the hospital, which was probably a very solid as well as an isolated building.

In 1693 it was found necessary to rebuild it, and in two years the list of benefactions reached the sum of £37,769.

In 1707, Mr. Guy, the founder of the neighbouring hospital, erected three wards in the new hospital of St. Thomas at his own expense. And this building, with some additions, seems to have remained until it was purchased by the Charing Cross Railway Company, in 1862, for the sum of £296,000.

It is difficult to trace at what date a medical school became connected with the hospital; it existed certainly in 1702, and in 1718 we know that medical lectures were given within the hospital. The famous Sir Astley Cooper served his apprenticeship here.

From the year 1228 to 1862 the hospital stood on the same spot, near London Bridge, when, after the purchase of it by the railway company, it was temporarily removed to the Surrey Gardens, where it was carried on until 1871.

In the meantime the governors and directors purchased of the Board of Works eight and a half acres of river-side land (half reclaimed) for £90,000. On this site the hospital was rebuilt on the pavilion system, but before this was adopted, continental hospitals were visited and well studied.

The essential feature of pavilion construction is the breaking up of a large hospital into a number of separate detached parts. Each is complete in itself, having nothing in common but the common administration; each division is as distinct in its ventilation as if it were miles away; and yet communication can be kept up with all parts of the hospital by means of light covered corridors.

In 1868 the first stone of the new hospital at Westminster Bridge was laid by the Queen. I do not suppose that any one present on that occasion will ever forget the sight. It was the first time our Queen had appeared publicly since her great sorrow, and the delight of her subjects collected under that tent, tempered with deep sympathy, was most touching.

In the short space of three years, the building was completed and also opened by the Queen.

In 1871 the patients were admitted, and the Medical School was opened.

The magnificent blocks of building which face the Houses of Parliament form one of the chief features of the river-side, but the work which goes on within is known only to a few.

It would take a year's steady labour to get a full knowledge of all which goes on night and day within these buildings; and therefore it cannot be expected that a few visits will produce a very large bundle of sheaves. But we will tell faithfully what we have seen, what we have gleaned, and what the impression upon us has been.

THE HYMN-WRITERS OF WALES AND THEIR HYMNS.

VI.—VERSES WITH A HISTORY.

NO story of the Welsh hymns would be complete without a note on the influence of single verses. The hymn book in the pew is an innovation—quite within recent years—of Welsh church-life. The hymn-book used to be the private property of the pulpit. Consequently the people had to learn their favourite hymns by heart; and a very profitable exercise it always is. A hymn in a book, however admirable its composition may be, is at best only a work of religious art. A hymn within the heart is life. But in learning hymns a special verse of each often stands out from among its sister verses. The latter may be forgotten; the one clings to the memory. This single verse of Williams, Pantycelyn, has been the password of many a powerful revival; the last two lines being doubled and trebled over and over again, as the hearts of the congregation were moved by the breath from Calvary.

Jesu's blood can raise the feeble
As a conqueror to stand;
Jesu's blood is all-prevailing
O'er the mighty of the land:
Let the breezes
Blow from Calvary on me.

It is an old funeral custom in country districts of the Principality to sing on the road from the house to the churchyard. The funerals are mostly public, and there is generally a large concourse of people. The procession moves slowly on, singing here and there, as it moves, some measured, mournful melody, with a wondrously touching effect. If any one has ever heard this music of the dead coming with muffled far-off tones from some narrow, lonely glen, he will never forget it. It is a minor melody that is sung; but the words are probably the language of hope triumphant, such as the following verse:

There shall be thousand wonders,
At break of day, to see
The children of the tempests
From tribulation free;
All in their shining garments,
Possessing perfect state:
Upon their Saviour's likeness,
They leave the prison-gate.

But no single verse has such a romantic incident in its history as the one given below; written, as it was, by Williams on the occasion of the memorable Lisbon earthquake:

If Thou wouldst end the world, O Lord,
Accomplish first Thy promised word·
And gather home with one accord
From every part Thine own:
Send out Thy word from pole to pole,
And with Thy blood make thousands whole,
Till health has come to every soul,
And after that—come down!

In February, 1797, the French effected a landing near Fishguard, in Pembrokeshire. Napoleon was then a name of terror to England; and the news of the landing spread through the country with the rushing violence of a prairie fire, bringing with it wherever it went an overwhelming sense of doom. Mounted heralds posted through the length and breadth of Wales, without waiting to ascertain the force of the enemy. In every village and town the terrible message was left, and people generally made ready for the bitter end of all things. One of these fiery heralds happened to pass by the Independent Chapel at Rhydybont, Cardiganshire, where a preaching service was being held at the time. Mysteriously he whispered his wild message to some one near the door, and away he went again to scatter broadcast the seeds of a storm. From one to another in the chapel the news mysteriously flashed—the curiosity of those who did not know being almost as tragic as the consternation of those who knew. The preacher was confounded, and he was compelled to stop and ask for the cause of such unseemly commotion. Some one shouted—"The French have landed at Fishguard!" Bad before, it was worse now. Had a lightning struck the house, the panic could scarcely have been more overpowering. No one durst move or speak; the preacher himself sat down in the midst of his sermon utterly overborne. Only one soul was found equal to the occasion—and that a woman's soul. Let the name of Nancy Jones not be forgotten in the chronicles of noble women who have dared and endured. She never for a moment slackened her hold of the Higher Will. She was a true daughter of the Great Revival: a neighbour, too, of David Jones, of Cayo. At many a service before that day, her voice had been sweetest and fullest in the fervour of song. She called to the preacher when he stopped—"Go on: if the French are at Fishguard, we have God to take care of us." But the preacher still declined. A neighbour of hers—David John Edmund by name—was present, remarkable for his gift in prayer. To him she turned next, and asked him to pray. But even he was not one of five that could chase a hundred that day. "Well, then," she said, "give a verse out for us to sing." No; David John had no heart for so much as that. "Very well," this mother in Israel added, "I shall give out a verse myself, and you start the tune." Calm and solemn and sweet echoed the words through the building—and so on to the end of the verse. Great was the fall of David John; even his tunes had taken unto themselves wings. She had to start the tune herself; but scarcely had she struck the first notes before her courage with an electric thrill restored the congregation to spiritual consciousness. They joined in the song of their new Deborah; faith grew more steady and clear; the French were well-nigh forgotten in the glorious inspiration of "the promised word." A woman's faith has often in it something of a miracle.[1]

If Thou wouldst end the world, O Lord,-

H. ELVET LEWIS.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

J. B. quotes Matt. x. 28 (Luke xii. 4, 5), which literally, and in the R.V., reads: "Be not afraid of them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul; but rather fear him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell (Gehenna)." Our correspondent asks: "Does him refer to the devil, as has been stoutly asserted, or does the original admit of two opinions on the matter?"

UNDOUBTEDLY, the words of the original may be construed either way, and Stier, in his "Words of the Lord Jesus," strongly contends that the reference is to Satan. But in this the great German expositor stands almost alone. The sense of the passage, and its parallelisms, seem to us decisive of its reference to God. Something in the turn of expression is concealed in the ordinary version. The disciple is not to be "afraid of" his enemies, but he is to "fear" One greater than they. Compare Isaiah viii. 11–13: "Neither fear ye their fear nor be afraid; but let Jehovah be your fear." Nowhere is Satan represented as an object of fear as contrasted with those who are but his tools and emissaries. Again, the two kinds of fear would not, according to Stier's interpretation, be contrasted; but would rest substantially on the same ground, being different degrees of the same dread of evil. Then, it is not Satan who "has power to cast into hell" (Luke). This is the doom of sin divinely inflicted. "According to Thy fear, so is Thy wrath." The Apostle James may have had our Lord's words in mind when he wrote, "There is one Lawgiver, who is able to save and to destroy" (iv. 12). Christ is speaking of the Father throughout, to be trusted for His love, to be feared for His power.

[1] It should be noted that the specimens given in these papers are all original translations.—ED. S. H.

A correspondent asks: "How is Matt. xxvii. 5 to be understood in connection with Acts i. 18?"

These passages describe the death of Judas Iscariot: and there are two main differences. 1. According to Matthew, the chief priests bought the potter's field; according to Luke (a parenthesis in the discourse of St. Peter) Judas himself appears to have purchased it. But it should be noted that the literal rendering of Acts i. 18 (R.V.) is "This man obtained a field with the reward of his iniquity." It was regarded as his, because bought with his money; as much as to say, "This was all that came of his bargain!" 2. The two accounts of the traitor's death plainly supplement each other, and if we knew all the facts we should be able to place the incidents together. Most expositors have adopted the supposition, which is likely enough, that the suicide first hanged himself,—possibly on some tree,—and that the cord or the branch gave way, with the terrible consequences described by St. Luke. Dr. Hackett, "Commentary on the Acts," writes of his visit to the valley of Hinnom: "As I stood on the rocky terraces which hang over it, I felt that this proposed explanation is entirely natural. I measured the precipitous, almost perpendicular, walls in different places, and found the height to be, variously, 40, 36, 33, 30, and 25 feet. Trees still flourish on the margin of these precipices, and in ancient times must have been still numerous in the same place. A rocky pavement exists also at the bottom of the ledges; and hence, on that account too, a person falling from above would be liable to be crushed and mangled as well as killed."

A. P. quotes the words of Satan in the Temptation (Luke iv. 6.): "All this power will I give Thee, and the glory of them, for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will, I give it," and asks: "Is all the power and glory of the world really delivered unto Satan?"

Assuredly not! He who uttered the words "standeth not in the truth, because there is no truth in him. When he speaketh lies, he speaketh of his own, because he is a liar and the father thereof" (John viii. 44). It is here that Satan is, practically, ruler of "this world," i.e., of the system of things opposed to God and righteousness (John xii. 31; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Eph. ii. 2, vi. 12). Scripture teaches us not only that this power shall come to an end, but that even now Christ is rightful King. There has been no "deliverance" of the kingdom to Satan, only an usurpation. True, in the willingness of men to submit to him, it has often seemed as though the bowing down to him is the surest way of success. There is some colour for the Satanic boast "Worship me,"—submit to my methods of force and falsehoods, and you will win honour, wealth, power: and there is undoubtedly a form of power and glory of the world that comes this way. But even in the present condition of things, that power turns to feebleness, that glory to shame. Only truth, and righteousness, and love, are lastingly mighty, and the cross is the way to the crown.

A. P. asks for an explanation of the words: "And the Lord added to the church daily such as should be saved." (Acts ii. 47.)

Our correspondent probably finds a difficulty in the suggestion of purpose in the words "such as should be," and may therefore be referred to the Revised Version, where the correct translation is given: "such as were being saved." So 1 Cor. i. 18; 2 Cor. ii. 15. It is not affirmed that they had been saved, or that they would finally be saved, but that they were in the way of salvation. They had not finished the journey safely, nor is it affirmed that they would infallibly so finish it, but they were on the road.

The same correspondent asks the meaning of Acts xiii. 48: "And as many as were ordained to eternal life believed."

"Set in order for eternal life" is the exact meaning of the expression. There is no reference here to predestination, only to the fact that the persons spoken of were disposed (Alford), as soldiers are disposed in array to march to a given point. The contrast is between the ready preparedness of these persons and the recusance of those Jews who "judged themselves unworthy of eternal life." [The reason why the word disposed would be an unsuitable rendering is, that it suggests the thought that the believing is the result of a person's own "disposition" in the ordinary sense; that is, of his own thoughts and purposes.] Another form of the same word is found in 1 Cor. xvi. 15, "addicted themselves," more literally "set themselves, to ministry for the saints."

In the sealing of the tribes of the children of Israel (Rev. vii. 4–8), why is the tribe of Dan omitted?

Probably because this tribe had become long ago practically extinct. In the genealogies of Israel (1 Chronicles iv.–viii.) Dan is likewise omitted. The territory of this tribe was divided into two parts, the southern portion being soon absorbed by Judah; while the northern, at the extremity of Palestine, lost its separate existence, its memorial existing only in the name of the frontier-town (as in the phrase "from Dan to Beer-sheba"). But the ancient expositors generally explain the omission mystically. Dan was a tribe specially noted for idolatry (Judges xviii.). Hengstenberg, following in part the old interpretations, remarks, "The declaration 'without are idolators' (Rev. xxii. 15) is symbolically represented by the exclusion of Dan." And Bishop Wordsworth writes: "We have here a protest against idolatry, as wholly disqualifying for admission into the number of God's saints." In Jacob's dying address Dan is described as "a serpent in the way, an adder in the path." Hence it was surmised that the Antichrist would spring from Dan, as the Christ from Judah. We need not go into these theories: the explanation above given seems sufficient. As twelve tribes were to be enumerated in the ideal Israel, and Joseph reckoned for two (Ephraim, here called "Joseph," and Manasseh), one other tribe must be omitted; and the smallest is marked for the purpose.

THE KING'S CUP-BEARERS.

"I DO wish it would clear up, Aunt Kate! Are those clouds never going to break?" cried a girl of seventeen, as she stood drumming with her fingers on the window-pane of a comfortably furnished morning-room, looking out on a neatly kept garden.

"I expect they will by-and-by, if you will only have a little patience, dear," said her aunt with a smile, as she looked up for a moment from an infant's robe she was embroidering.

"I can't think how you can go on stitching at that frock so hard, Aunt Kate. I am sure you must be tired to death of it."

"No, I am not," said her aunt cheerfully, "and even if I were, you know there is not much time to spare; it is the only thing left now, and I must get it done before we go next week."

"Yes, I suppose so!" said the girl listlessly. "I wonder you ever undertook it—really it was very good of you," she added with more animation, as she glanced at the neatly folded pile of little garments that lay on the table beside her aunt.

"I am only too glad to do what I can to help your dear mother; with so many at home, and her delicate health, I often wonder how she gets through all she has to do. But, no doubt, you are a great help to her, Gertrude," she added with a smile; "she must miss her eldest daughter."

Gertrude was silent, though a blush overspread her features, as she flashed a quick glance at the speaker, who however continued her work without raising her eyes.

"I dare say she does, in a way, Aunt Kate," she said, after a moment's pause; "but I don't think—that is—I'm afraid, I am not so much use as you think."

"Surely you must be mistaken, my child," said her aunt. "There are so many ways in which you may lighten your dear mother's burden."

"Yes, I suppose there are," said Gertrude slowly, "but you know, auntie, the boys are dreadfully tiresome, and Edith never will do what I tell her, nor let Helen if she can help it. So I find the less I have to do with them the better; I go my way, and let them go theirs; it is much the easiest plan."

"The easiest for yourself, no doubt, my dear," said her aunt, "but surely not for your mother?"

"Well, auntie, I'll just tell you how it was. When I left school, mother thought I might teach the little ones, and I did try it for a few months, but it was no use, so I gave it up."

"It requires a good deal of patience, I know, dear," said her aunt gently.

"Indeed it does, auntie," exclaimed Gertrude eagerly, "and that's just what I haven't got."

"All the more need to strive for it, my child; don't you think so?"

Gertrude coloured. "Oh, but you don't know how hard it was," she exclaimed, "and mother said she was tired of seeing the children so often in disgrace. I'm sure it wasn't my fault. I was obliged to punish them when they were naughty, or I should never have got them to do anything; but mother said at last that she thought I wasn't old enough—it was her doing that I gave it up."

"No doubt, my dear, she was certainly the best judge; but that is not the only way you can help her, is it?"

"I don't know anything else I can do; at least, I don't think . . . You know I don't like work, and I don't do it well—and mother says she would rather do it herself than see it badly done."

"I quite agree with her, my dear. I should say the same in her place. But——"

"Well, then, auntie, what else is there? I did say when I first came home, that I would have one of the little ones in my room, and look after her clothes, and be a sort of mother to her. I thought it would be rather nice, and mother was quite willing; so I chose Marcia, but I soon found that she meddled with my things, and woke me too early in the morning, and was always wanting to come in and fetch something when I was there, so that I never could feel that the room was my own. I really couldn't go on with it, so mother said she might go back to her dressing-room where she was before."

"Then your mother doesn't mind not having her room to herself, I suppose, dear?" said Mrs. Etheridge quietly.

"Oh, I don't know, auntie. I never thought about it, but you see she is used to it; she has always had one of them."

"Ah, just so—perhaps that makes it easier."

Gertrude looked up at her aunt with an uncomfortable feeling that her meaning was not what the words seemed to imply; and for a moment the wish arose in her heart that she had borne more patiently with her little sister's presence.

Mrs. Etheridge glanced at her niece, and was about to say something more, when she checked herself, and, gathering up her work, exclaimed: "See, Gertrude, the clouds are breaking at last. If you will put on your things quickly, we shall still have time to take the jelly to little Willie Marsden before dinner. A breath of air will be pleasant, and the rain must have laid the dust thoroughly."

"All right, auntie, I'll be ready in a moment," said Gertrude, as she sprang lightly upstairs, glad in her secret heart that the conversation had been brought to an end.

Mrs. Etheridge had been a widow for many years, and still lived in the house which had been the home of her happy married life. Her husband, a doctor with a considerable country practice, had been deservedly loved and respected alike by rich and poor. Gertrude Loxale was the child of his favourite sister, and was bound to her aunt not only by the ties of relationship, but by one yet stronger. She was Mrs. Etheridge's godchild; and not having seen much of her during school-life, her godmother had petitioned for a long visit from her, and Mrs. Loxale willingly consented, hoping much from her sister-in-law's influence over the girl, and thinking that after the unsuccessful start she had made in her home life, it would be better both for her and her sisters that there should be a break before the experiment was tried again. She had been staying at Kirkdale for nearly three months, during which time Mrs. Etheridge had carefully watched her, and though owing to the desire to please her aunt, and the absence of those peculiar trials which inevitably fall to the lot of the eldest in a large family, she had appeared to much more advantage than she did at home, Mrs. Etheridge, who was a keen observer, had nevertheless formed a pretty correct estimate of her character, and being really fond of the girl and deeply interested in her welfare, determined if possible to be the means of opening her eyes to the selfishness that lay at the root of all her failures.

The visit was drawing to an end, and Mrs. Etheridge was about to return with her niece to Rushmoor, where Gertrude's parents lived. She had often led the conversation to the subject of home duties, but Gertrude had never spoken so openly as this morning, and as she went upstairs to dress for her walk Mrs. Etheridge pondered anxiously on the best means of helping her to become a comfort to her over-taxed mother.

The fresh breeze that had sprung up during the last half-hour had scattered the clouds and was fast restoring the roads to their normal condition of powdery whiteness.

As Gertrude and her aunt walked briskly along they met the rector, who had just turned out of his garden gate, and was advancing rapidly towards them.

"I was just on my way to see you, Mrs. Etheridge," he said, holding out his hand in greeting, "or rather," he added with a smile, "my errand was more to this young lady."

Gertrude looked inquiringly.

"I am almost ashamed of coming upon you again," he said hesitatingly. "You have been so good in helping before; but I want to know if you would mind taking Mabel's class in the Sunday-school to-morrow. She has a very bad cold, and her mother is afraid of her being laid up again. We are obliged to be very careful, you know, since that attack of rheumatic fever last winter."

"Certainly," said Mrs. Etheridge, "you are quite right. I am sure Gertrude will be pleased to do it; won't you, dear?" and as the girl smilingly assented, the rector said heartily: "I wish we had you always at hand, my dear; I can always find plenty of work for willing workers; but we should have your mother down upon us for taking away her right hand! Well, after all, it doesn't matter where we work so long as we do what comes to hand. The honour of being the King's cup-bearers is open to us all, isn't it?" he said, glancing at the basket in Gertrude's hand. Remember me very kindly to your mother, my dear, and tell her she is very good to have spared you so long. I know she must miss her eldest daughter!"

Gertrude made no reply, but the colour rose to her cheek as for the second time that day the same words sounded in her ears, and she walked silently by her aunt's side as the rector turned back with them towards the village.

"We are going to lose you for a while, I hear, Mrs. Etheridge," he remarked, "but I hope you will not desert us for long. Kirkdale looks very forlorn when you are away."

"I hope to be back in six or seven weeks, but I cannot tell exactly. Circumstances will determine the length of my stay."

"Well, there will be plenty to welcome you back, whenever you come," said the rector heartily. "Our roads part here, I see; there is a short cut across this field to Widow Hartop's, where I have to go; but I shan't say good-bye now, we shall meet again before you go," and shaking hands heartily with both, he crossed the stile, and in another minute was out of sight.

As Gertrude and her aunt reached the cottage where lay the little invalid they were on their way to visit, the door opened, and a girl rather younger than Gertrude came out carrying a baby, and leading by the hand a little boy just able to walk; while another, a year or two older, clung to her skirt.

"Is your mother in, Maggie?" inquired Mrs. Etheridge. "But I needn't ask," she added, with a smile, "as I see you are going out. I know you never both leave Willie—how is he?"

"Very sadly, ma'am, thank you. I'm just going to fetch some stuff from the doctor's now. He was in this morning, and says he won't last long; it has put mother about sadly," and tears filled her eyes as she spoke.

"You must be brave, Maggie, for her sake, and I know you will," said Mrs. Etheridge kindly, laying her hand upon the girl's shoulder. "She has often told me what a comfort you are," she added, bending down to look at the sleeping infant, and with a grateful look at her, Maggie passed hastily out.

When Mrs. Etheridge, followed by Gertrude, entered the cottage, she saw no one, but directed by sounds overhead, she advanced towards the staircase that led to the upstair rooms. Half-way up, her face covered with her apron, sat the poor mother, trying in vain to stifle the sobs that would have their way.

"I have just seen Maggie," said Mrs. Etheridge gently, "so I know what troubles you; but I am sure you wouldn't keep poor little Willie suffering here, when the Good Shepherd wants him in the fold above."

The sobs ceased as the mother looked up, though her tears still fell fast, as she said, "It is sad to see him suffer so, poor lamb; he has just dropped asleep, and I've put Rhoda to watch by him. He had a bad turn an hour ago; the doctor was in, and says he'll maybe go off in one of 'em," and she burst into a fresh flood of tears.

Mrs. Etheridge did not attempt to check her for awhile, but as the sobs grew less violent, she spoke a few soothing words, and gently led her on to speak of her other children.

"I saw the baby with Maggie," she said. "She seems to be very fond of him."

"Fond of him!" echoed the mother; "she's that fond, I believe she'd give her life for him any day. But there, she's like a mother to them all, and she don't mind how she slaves and works if she can help to make them comfortable. I often say I never saw her like."

"No wonder you can't spare her to go to service, Mrs.

Marsden. I have sometimes thought of offering to get her a place."

"Well, ma'am, I'm had it on my mind a goodish bit as she'd ought to be doing something for herself, and I've said as much to the father, but he is loth to part with her, and me being in such poor health and all, we've put it off time upon time."

"And does Maggie herself wish to go?"

"Well, it is but natural, as she should like to be earning a bit you know, ma'am; but she never seems to give a thought to herself so long as she can help her father and me. It is always 'Plenty of time, mother—I'll wait till you're a bit stronger, and the children are out of hand,' whenever we talk about it."

"Rhoda is getting on now—she will soon be able to take Maggie's place and set her free, I should think," said Mrs. Etheridge inquiringly.

"I wish she may, ma'am, but I'm afraid she is another sort. She's clever enough with her book, and likes to go to school and that; but she makes a trouble of everything she has to do at home, and hasn't Maggie's way with the little ones at all. I'd rather by half do a job for any of 'em myself than put Rhoda to it. She might go to service for the use she is at home, only it don't seem fair to Maggie."

"Well," said Mrs. Etheridge, "depend upon it Maggie won't lose anything by being a comfort and help to her parents; she is but young yet, and when the time comes that you can spare her, I will undertake to find her a good place."

"Thank you kindly, ma'am," said Mrs. Marsden, "and though I say it as perhaps shouldn't, whoever gets her will get a treasure; it don't seem to matter to Maggie who it is as wants help. She's always ready to give it to any as stands in need."

"Ah!" said Mrs. Etheridge with a smile, "then she's one of 'the King's cup-bearers' that our good rector was speaking of this morning. You needn't fear for her, Mrs. Marsden; we have the King's own word for it that 'they shall in no wise lose their reward!'"

No word was spoken on the way home on the subject that was uppermost in the mind of both aunt and niece. Mrs. Etheridge rightly judged that the lesson had gone home, and wisely left it to do its own work. Two or three days passed away, and still Gertrude was silent; but the night before they were to leave Kirkdale, Mrs. Etheridge, who had been helping her niece with the preparations for her journey, turned to leave the room, saying as she did so, "Good-night, my child, we must be up betimes to-morrow, so get to bed early. I am glad I am going with you," she added cheerfully, as she saw tears in Gertrude's eyes. "I hope you have given a good look round, dear, so as to leave nothing behind."

"Indeed, auntie," said Gertrude, hiding her face on Mrs. Etheridge's shoulder, "I hope I have left one thing behind, and that is my selfishness. I do mean to try when I get home, God helping me, to be one of 'the King's cup-bearers.'"

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XIII.

A tent in which was placed the sacred ark?
Its special holy chamber, veiled and dark?
Where did this treasure pass to alien hands?
And whither carried by those warlike bands?
What, with the manna, does this chest enclose?
Where did it rest when fetched from Israel's foes?
When taken thence what beasts the burden drew,
When God, in anger, sinful Uzzah slew?
And, when the sacred ark the Levites bare,
What did king David and the singers wear?
What building formed its latest resting-place?
A youthful priest who died in sad disgrace?
When God smote Gath where was the ark conveyed?
What figures for the mercy-seat were made?
Who took the ark (when David did not dare)
Home to his house, and found a blessing there?
What, worked with purple, scarlet, white, and blue,
Concealed the holy ark from public view?
Who, when the ark was taken, backward fell?
The number of his years correctly tell?
Who stood within the veil, the ark beside?
Whose threshing-floor was near where Uzzah died?
Abinadab received with reverent care
The ark; how long the time it tarried there?

With golden censer, and with Aaron's rod,
And manna, too, is named this ark of God
With tables of the law which Moses bore
One verse suffices to recount them o'er;
Find it within a letter to the Jews,
Which Moses' ceremonial law reviews,
And shows it all completed in the day
When Christ, once offered, bore our sins away;
The name by which the ark therein is known
By those initial letters will be shown.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

CHRIST THE COUNSELLOR.

BY THE VERY REV. G. A. CHADWICK, D.D., DEAN OF ARMAGH.

"His name shall be called . . . Counsellor."—Isa. ix. 6.

"AND THE JEWS MARVELLED, SAYING, HOW KNOWETH THIS MAN LETTERS, HAVING NEVER LEARNED?"

THIS title is second among those by which Isaiah proclaimed the Son bestowed upon mankind, the Mighty God who was to be our Child. He knew that the Spirit of the Lord God which was upon Christ was the Spirit of counsel as well as might. And whether we observe or neglect the fact, it remains true that the wisdom of our despised and rejected Master inspires whatever is happiest and most prosperous, as well as holiest in the modern world. Do we think enough of His wisdom? We speak of Him as Redeemer, but His work avails for them only who hear His voice and follow Him.

We acknowledge Him our example; and thus

No. 1728.—JUNE 11, 1887. PRICE ONE PENNY.

What it was that she had promised to her son upon that night when all had believed that he must die, none knew save themselves. Reinée never asked, but the day was coming when she was to know, and when that promise was to be kept.

Clive's was the last serious case of diphtheria that occurred in the place. It had been on the decline before, and by the time he was convalescent, the malady had quite disappeared, and under the improved sanitary conditions which Wulfric had urged upon the authorities, it seemed probable that the place would be more healthy than it had ever been before.

Wulfric had not spared himself during this time of sickness and trouble. He had worked hand and head, night and day, against the common foe, and had won golden opinions from his townsfolk as well as from the sufferers themselves. No one attempted to deny or even to doubt that it was to his forethought, skill, and indomitable energy that they owed the salvation of many valuable lives, as well as the prevention of the spread of infection, and if the young doctor's popularity had been doubtful before, it was an established fact now.

But Wulfric was not to escape scot-free from his unremitting exertions during this trying time. He did not indeed fall a victim to the scourge itself, being, as he expressed it, infection proof; but when once the strain had passed, and the need for such ceaseless labour abated, then the reaction began to set in, and the intense personal anxiety he had suffered on Clive's account helped to exhaust such strength as was left him after the month of perpetual toil.

He did not break down altogether, but he went about looking like the shadow of his former self, and each day found him more unfit for his work and more worn out at its end than the one before had done.

Barbara and Celia pleaded in vain that he would spare himself and go away for a change and rest. He replied with unwonted irritability that he was quite well, and told them "not to bother him any more."

Mrs. Meynal was less observant than usual at this time, being much engrossed by the preparations for Celia's marriage, which was to take place some time early in the autumn, as Frank Leslie had had the presentation of a small country living bestowed upon him, and was to enter upon his duties early in October. He wished to take Celia with him to the new home, and the marriage was consequently to take place about the middle of September. This approaching event occupied the minds of mother and daughter very much, and it was only Barbara who had leisure to feel really distressed by fears for Wulfric.

But there were others upon whom his wan looks and visible failure of strength were not lost. Reinée's sweet eyes rested upon him sometimes with a vague sense of trouble, and as Clive recovered more and more of his normal strength he too would look sharply at Wulfric and draw his own conclusions about him.

And when the day came on which the young doctor recommended for his convalescent patient a change to a more bracing air, Clive stretched his limbs and laughed as he answered, "I'll go gladly on one condition, Meynal, and that is that you go with me."

"I?" questioned Wulfric rather sharply.

"Yes, you," returned Clive. "I've had the idea in my head ever since a friend of mine wrote to offer me the use of a shooting box of his in Scotland that he won't want till the twelfth of August—a good six weeks off. It is a jolly place, all amongst the moors, where the air is like new wine, and will make new fellows of both of us. Come, Meynal, be reasonable; you want a change more than I do, and you know it. Come with me to Scotland next week."

Wulfric drew a long breath.

"There is nothing I should like better—if——"

"If what?"

"The practice I was thinking of."

"Oh bother the practice! You must get a locum tenens. You know as well as I do that you are horribly seedy, and will break down sooner or later if you go on like this. Be a sensible fellow, and give up before you are forced."

Wulfric rested his aching head on his hand.

"I believe you are right, Clive; and it is inexpressibly tempting. When do you propose going?"

"Can you be ready by Monday morning? To day is Thursday."

"Yes, I'll try. I dare say I can. It is very good your asking me, Clive. I shouldn't have energy to make a start alone."

"Exactly, and I don't feel man enough to travel without a medical attendant," answered Clive, his eyes twinkling with a sort of sleepy humour. "Then that is all settled. You'll be ready to start on Monday for town, and we will go north in a sleeping-car that night. Leave all the rest to me. You'll have quite enough on your hands without being bothered by plans."

This was true enough. Wulfric was feeling wretchedly ill and exhausted, and the very sense of relaxation that came with the resolution to give up work and take a holiday seemed to make any kind of exertion the more difficult. But when he went home and told Barbara what had happened, he was relieved of all further trouble in the matter. She wrote the needful letters, securing him a substitute, let people know of the arrangement, settled matters as to the housing of the new comer, and promised to look after things in his absence as far as the poorer patients were concerned and keep him well informed of everything.

Wulfric was very grateful for the capable energy thus displayed by his sister, and his quiet thanks and the smile with which he told her that Fergus would find himself a lucky fellow some day, was reward enough to the warm-hearted girl, who was never happier than when actively engaged in some service for her favourite brother.

Mrs. Meynal had no complaints now against Wulfric. She was thoroughly aroused to anxiety by his looks, and entered with more energy than was usual with her into the arrangements to facilitate his early departure.

He was very listless and unwell himself, so much so that it was difficult for him to regard with much sense of pleasure the proposed change; still the idea of rest was very welcome, and he knew that when once he had got away from the association of the place where he had worked so hard, and known so much of anxiety and distress, he should be his old self again. Change and bracing up were all he needed, and he was glad that they were forced upon him without any need for exertion on his part.

Clive and his mother had a long talk after Wulfric had left that day, the result of which was that Reinée and Mr. Dumaresq together with a good many servants started for Scotland the next day, whilst mother and son remained at the Hall till Monday, and took Wulfric Meynal with them.

Wulfric was feeling so languid and ill that he hardly troubled his head over the unexpected presence of Mrs. Dumaresq and her maid. He supposed at first that they were only going up to town; and even when he found out that they were in the Scotch express with him and his friend, it never occurred to him that it was a family party he was invited to join at the shooting box. He quite believed that he and Clive were to share it together.

They arrived there rather early in the morning, and both he and his patient were sufficiently fatigued with the long night journey to go straight to their rooms, and Wulfric slept until wakened by the westering sun, which was now slanting into the room and glinting upon his face from the half-opened casement.

He found that it was seven o'clock and that he had slept nearly twelve hours. He felt better already. The keen sharp air blowing off the heathery moorland stirred his pulses and gave him a new feeling of vigour. He was glad to think that the dinner hour could not be very far distant.

Remembering Mrs. Dumaresq's presence in the house he dressed himself with scrupulous propriety and descended to the drawing room, but at the open door-way he paused with a start of surprise, for there was Reinée, the only occupant of the room, standing beside the long French window and singing softly to herself.

In a minute she had seen him and had advanced with a graceful and gracious welcome.

"But, Miss Dumaresq, how came you here? I thought it was only Clive who was coming north."

"Oh, no," answered Reinée with a bright smile, "did you think we could spare our boy and lose sight of him whilst he is still so much the invalid. Not even our confidence in you, Dr. Meynal, could quite reconcile us to that. Did you think it was to the luxury of a bachelor-household you were coming? Clive should not have deluded you by that tempting proposition only to disappoint you in the end."

Reinée spoke with the frank gaiety so natural to her, but the light in the dark eyes bent upon her made her suddenly pause and colour. They had not been alone together, those two, since the day on which Clive had been stricken down so nearly to death, when he had pressed his lips upon Reinée's hand and told her that he loved her.

Neither of them had forgotten that moment, and it was suddenly present in both their minds this evening as they stood together in the sunset glow.

"I am glad you are here, Reinée," said Wulfric very quietly, with just a little hesitation upon the Christian name which robbed his use of it from the least suspicion of undue familiarity, "for I have something to say to you—something to explain—and this meeting will give me my opportunity."

Her eyes had been cast down, but now they were raised for a moment to his, and something in the sweet serenity and trustfulness he read in their calm depths made his heart beat with unwonted rapidity. The entrance, however, of Mr. Dumaresq put an end to the tête-à-tête, nor was it renewed during the pleasant evening that followed. Reinée played and sang to them, whilst Clive lay on the sofa and teased his sister, or caressed the deerhound whom they had found as a fixture in the house. Wulfric played chess and talked politics with Mr. Dumaresq, and he was somewhat closely watched and listened to by his hostess, although he was not in the least aware of it.

That night Mrs. Dumaresq followed Reinée into her room, and began to speak with an abruptness unusual with her.

"Clive tells me," she said, looking straight at her daughter, "that he believes you and Wulfric Meynal to be mutually attached. Is this so?"

Reinée's fair face flushed, but her glance did not falter.

"Mamma," she said, with a little quiver in her voice, "that is a very hard question to answer now. Please do not ask me any more, but trust me to tell you everything, if there is anything you ought to know; and to keep the promise I made you, never to—to—to act in great things without your consent."

Mrs. Dumaresq looked at her daughter steadily, her own lips quivering slightly; then she took Reinée's face between her hands, and kissed it.

"You are a good child," she said, with more of feeling than was expressed by the words alone. "You have always been a loving and dutiful daughter, and I will not stand in the way of your future happiness. I can keep a promise, too, and it is after all less hard to sacrifice pride than love. If you discover in days to come that you and Wulfric Meynal love one another, you may promise yourself to him with my free consent. Yes, child, I have learned some lessons of late, and I would rather, I trust now, see you married to a good and a God-fearing man than the wife of one who could only bring you wealth and rank without happiness and peace."

"Mother! mother!" cried Reinée, breaking into sudden happy tears. "Oh, dear, dear mother, you have made me so happy—so very happy. I can never be glad or grateful enough."

The days that followed seemed to fly upon wings. It was not easy for Wulfric to see Reinée alone, for he was in great request himself, and she was more shy than was usual with her. But in the cordial unconstrained atmosphere of that house it was impossible to be anything but happy and content, and Wulfric was for once ready to let himself drift along and make no great efforts to take the management of events into his own hands.

His bodily health established itself rapidly, far more rapidly than did that of Clive, who still looked white and frail, and was incapable of any prolonged exertion. Wulfric and Reinée were his devoted slaves, and it would be hard to say which of the three enjoyed this close companionship the most.

And Clive, who watched these two with the keenness of an unselfish love, was convinced of the correctness of the conclusion at which he had arrived before, and was anxious for an understanding to be arrived at between them, as he had a lingering fear lest some scruple on Wulfric's part should allow him to consider her wealth and birth as a barrier between them.

It was his doing at length that an excursion was planned to a distant ruin, to which he and his parents should proceed in a carriage, and the other two on horseback. This arrangement would give them the opportunity to say anything that might be upon their minds; and yet there was nothing strained in the situation. Wulfric could speak or be silent as he chose.

Had Clive but known it, there was little need for words now between Wulfric and his sister. That sympathy of soul that seems so often to bind two natures together, had, during the past week, been exercising its sweet spell over both their hearts; and the footing on which he was placed in the house made it plain to Wulfric that he need not let pride or humility (it is sometimes hard to know which it should be called) stand in his way. He loved Reinée—he believed himself loved by her in return; and now he felt certain that her parents would not attempt to oppose her in following out the dictates of her own heart. A deep sense of happiness and well-being had settled upon his spirit; and for this each day of his life he thanked the great Giver of all good things.

As they rode over the wild, trackless moor together, and watched the wavering lights and shadows, as the sunshine chased the clouds across the quivering blue sky, a great sense of peace and delight came over them both. It seemed as if they two were in some beautiful new world, alone with each other, and with Him Who had made it very good.

At the top of a moorland ridge which commanded a wide view over ranges of purple hills and dark fir-crowned ridges, they drew rein by mutual consent and gazed before them as in a dream.

"Is it not lovely?" said Reinée softly at length.

Her voice seemed to break the spell of silence. Wulfric took off his hat and shook back the tumbled hair from his brow, drawing a long breath as he did so. Then he turned and looked at her.

"Reinée," he said.

Her eyes sought his with a sweet trusting confidence. She knew what was coming, and yet she did not blush or tremble. It seemed to her as if this supreme moment of her life had been lived many times over before.

He wheeled his horse round till he could look into her face, held out his hand to meet hers, and lifted it to his lips.

"Reinée," he said, in his deepest, lowest tone, "my Reinée—is it my Reinée?"

"Yes, Wulfric," she answered with a smile quivering over her face like moonlight upon rippling water, whilst the dew of happy tears stood in her eyes. He bent his head and kissed her, and lifting his hat again, he said very quietly and reverently:

"Thank God."

Perhaps no words could have chimed in better with Reinée's own feelings, or have set so sweet a seal upon their unspoken vows. She looked up in his face and read there all that depth of love that his lips could never frame in words, and which she felt it sweeter to be understood rather than spoken between them.

Perhaps no woman was ever more silently wooed and won than Reinée Dumaresq; but to her that silence of unutterable love was golden indeed, and she did not wish it to be broken.

He read her thought in her face, and smiled with a tender love and pride.

"You understand me, my Reinée," he said at last very gently. "I need not try to tell you how I love you."

"No," she answered softly. "I understand; I love you too."

And then in the sweet silence of unspeakable content, they rode on together over the sunny moorland.

IN THE PAYS DE VAUD.

BY ANNE BEALE.

CHAPTER I.—THE VILLAGE SCHOOL.

FROM the plateau of Villars-Chésières, in the Canton de Vaud, one looks upon scenes that are not only romantically grand, but homelike and interesting. Hotels and chalet-pensions command views of mountains and valleys, towns and villages, road and river, which are, at the same time, wild and cultivated. It is all unquestionably Swiss, but lacks some of the awful grandeur of the snow mountains and glaciers that the tourist loves to explore. Not that glacier and snow-mountain are altogether absent; for the glacier de Trient shows itself; and on the three giants, the Dent du Midi, the Dent de Morcles, and the grand Muveran, lie crowns and garments of eternal snow, intermixed with the sterner grey of the bare and rugged rock.

The hamlet of Villars is over four thousand feet above the sea-level, and it takes four good hours to reach it in diligence from Aigle. Its twin sister Chésières lies below it, and both are picturesque with their surroundings of pine-forests, flowery slopes, and Alpine range. But from the Hôtel Grand Muveran at Villars, you look down upon the valley of the Rhone, and wonder that so famed a river should become so insignificant by distance, and resemble a straight road through a fertile vale, with the town of Monthey beyond it. Yet how glorious is the scene, with its amphitheatre of mountains in front, and its pine-clad slopes at back and sides! But one tires of descriptions of scenery, and turns, naturally, to human interests in connection with Nature; they are manifold in the huge hotel; but people are almost as weary of accounts of hotel life in these days, when everybody travels, as they are of scenery, so we will look abroad at the dwellings of the Swiss peasantry.

The village of Villars lies below the tableland on which are situated the more ostentatious abodes built to attract the tourist. These consist, as we have hinted, of hotels and pensions, where charges are reasonable, food and attendance good, and where that desideratum, rest to the weary worker, may be obtained. Rest! Yes, you may have it if you choose, but you must resist, as we did, the temptation to climb to the Diablerets, or the Chamossaire, whence Mont Blanc may be seen in all his grandeur, and be content with what is around and beneath you. "This Pays de Vaud," said the celebrated Charpentier, who would not quit the neighbourhood to accept an honourable post in his own Germany, "contains all that man could desire." We did, however, manage to catch sight of one of the shoulders of the giant.

The inhabitants were so friendly and hospitable that there was no difficulty in becoming acquainted with them. They are, moreover, Protestants, and speak French, so we were quite at home with them. The Canton de Vaud is one of the Protestant Cantons, and we only once or twice encountered a German-Swiss, whose patois was very difficult of comprehension. One of these, an old woman, had shown us over a chalet that she had built with her savings, between Chésières and Villars, and was not a pleasing specimen of the antique. She used the word Monat for month, and told us that she lived forty miles away, and had only come to let her house to any of the visitors who chose to take it. The influx of foreigners into these parts induces speculation, and the natives either build small chalets or do up their own dwellings in the hope of gain. The house was prettily ornamented with carved balcony and outer staircase, and might attract the unwary for the summer months; but comfort, there was none! Money, however, she would have, and the peasant is not quite untainted by avarice.

Of the flowers, who shall speak or write so as to convey a clear idea of their beauty and luxuriance? Haymaking had not yet begun, but the grass was ready for the sickle. Grass it could scarcely be called, since the flowers appeared to outnumber the green blades. The fields were ablaze with colour, and as we threaded the narrow paths that led through them, we walked in a huge garden of wild-flowers and tall grasses. A fine was imposed on all who should tread down these treasures, or stray from the paths; but we had only to stoop and pluck them as we kept the narrow way. Immense Easter daisies or marguerites towered above the grasses side by side with ranunculuses. and bell-flowers of every size and hue. Gems of every colour—pink, purple, blue, yellow, crimson, even delicate green—grew together in this idyllic profusion, the names of which we could not even guess at. One curious specimen, a peasant told us, was called gueule de chèvre, or goat's throat; and an apt name it was. As to the mountain violet, it was so large and "deeply beautifully blue," that we scarcely recognized the "violet by the mossy stone." So were the campanulas—gigantic harebells indeed!

While gazing, amazed at this profusion of Nature, her many voices haunted us. As to the grasshoppers their shrill chirp was audible everywhere, and we wondered what would become of them when the hay was mown—the corn-crake also mingled his hoarse voice with theirs, and it seemed as if they could not make noise enough. As to the hum of insects, it was as remarkable as their number. And we heard the cuckoo. Why was its plaintive cry almost unnatural up there among the pinewoods on that glorious June day? All is comparative, and to us the musical cow-bell echoing among the hills, sounded more appropriate than the cuckoo's call. Cows and goats were, however, for the most part imprisoned in those picturesque cattle chalets that dotted the hills, "until the hay was mown." They, like ourselves, were interdicted tramping down those huge flower-beds of the mountains.

Why no gleam of light was permitted to enter their sheds was incomprehensible. A flood of sunshine poured into one of them when the door was opened, and revealed to us two purely-white goats which advanced, ready either to escape or butt at the strangers who obstructed their exit. Their large dark eyes were dazzled by the light, and for a moment they seemed uncertain, but were soon reassured, and licked the hand of her who kept them so imprisoned.

"They come out sometimes," she said, "and are tethered near at hand; but our winters are cold, and we should all die if we let in the frost and snow."

The truth of this was as observable in chalet as shed. The windows, and there were but two, were little more than loop-holes, and all besides was contrived so as to keep out the cold. The fire-place was a large flat stone hollowed like a basin at the top for the fuel, and the chimney was a hole in the roof whence the smoke escaped into the curiously-shaped and roofed construction which received it without. Although it was summer, cheerful flames ascended from the hollowed stone, and the wooden dwelling was not over-heated. Furniture and rafters were black as ebony from the smoke, and the two small rooms, with their earthen floors and primitive hardware and crockery, suggested that the inmates were, indeed, "inured to toil and bitter bread." And what of "the over-crowding"? A goodly show of children were at play without, and were very friendly and by no means shy. Indeed the children came round us wherever we went, examining our clothing, and taking great interest in our sketching. They were very well mannered, and looked picturesque in their blue pinafores and wide straw hats—or, in the case of the girls, tight-fitting, crocheted caps.

memorializing the Swiss government; but it was suggested that no earthly government could regulate the intense cold of the mountains. We learnt with pleasure, that cows and horses were transported to the milder shores of the Lake of Geneva, when the Villars season ended, and the dairy was closed with our hotel, for those bitter months when they were surrounded by dashing cataracts and frozen snows.

Wandering from wooden chalet to chalet we came upon the one stone house of the village, the school-house. The chalets are all of wood, and the surrounding pine-forests supply the material. The roofs are also of wood, laid like bricks, piece lapping over piece, and maintained intact by big stones laid at intervals on the curiously constructed roofage. We saw the master or régent, as he is called, and obtained permission to visit the school during class-time. At the moment, the scholars were dispersing with the customary glee of freed prisoners.

VILLARS.

It is always delightful to receive the hearty welcome of the poor, and the Swiss peasants are friendly and kind as any. Save during the three or four months of the tourist season, they must be an isolated class; for there were few, if any bettermost abodes. If a chalet of any pretension appeared, it was merely a summer residence, let to a family or a school come to Villars-Chésières for change and mountain air.

We could not get over the dark dens of the cattle, and were much afflicted when, subsequently, we visited the pretentious cow-houses, piggeries, and even stables of our host. Magnificent milch kine stood munching or chewing the cud, in the darkness of night, and with an exemplary patience; and it was a marvel how they ever got milked; but as for the swine, their grunts and groans, and efforts to get out were awful. One of our trio, a devoted lover of animals, was for

It was breaking up day when we "interviewed" the young people, and a great many were absent because the haymaking had just begun, and they were wanted to assist. The summer holiday is so timed as to give them a chance of bodily instead of mental work. The schoolroom was much like an ordinary English one, only through its many windows appeared views of mountains and valleys, any one of which would have made a glorious sketch. Desks, forms, maps, and black board were in no wise different from our own. And the children went through much the same curriculum, only their language was French. They were proficients in mental arithmetic, and did the sums on the blackboard readily. They read and recited; displayed copy-books and sum-books, and went through an effort of memory, all of which proved what has been affirmed concerning the superiority of Swiss education among all classes. The effort of memory was original. A scholar read a short story or fable from an ordinary class-book, closed the book, and repeated what he or she had read, as nearly as possible. And the poor child was not spared the moral; he had to deduce it from the tale. And one boy said, "We mustn't run away from school, sir, or we shall be taken by the giant;" which the régent improved upon by setting forth the snares in the paths of the young, and how to avoid them.

ARRVEYES.

(From a sketch by A. Beale.)

We three friends were all snares that day, for heads and faces were turned aside from the proper outlook, to gaze at us, and many unusual smiles passed between ensnarers and ensnared. The latter were not so rosy and robust as mountaineers ought to be. They were, on the contrary, rather pale and weakly to look at, bespeaking hard living and early work. Some few were very pretty, and one or two girls had flowing hair, and hats, instead of the tightly-fitting caps that cover their head from babyhood upwards. Blue blouses and pinafores were worn by each sex.

They sang several native hymns and songs very respectably, but the voices were scarcely to be called sweet, though true. The French was pure, and there was no symptom of a peculiar patois. When all was over, we wondered what we could do in return. Two of us had a magnificent scheme to be worked out by the aid of the régent; the third placed in his hand sufficient francs to afford to each child the large sum of two sous, when the said francs could be changed into Swiss money. As there were only forty present, the gift was not large, but it was electrical; and during the remainder of our stay at Villars, whenever we met the recipients, we were greeted with nods, smiles, "Bon jour, mesdames," and other reminders of our extraordinary generosity.

While the régent showed us over his living rooms, introduced us to his wife and child, and explained the difficulties in the way of the regular attendance of children living in villages two or three miles distant, the "grand scheme" was propounded. Of this, more anon.

Leaving the school-house, we came upon the fountain which supplies the village with water, and enables the inhabitants to wash clothes or vegetables, and the cattle to quench their thirst. Every village has this peculiar blessing in its centre. From the fountain, or pump-like pillar spout four jets of ever-flowing water, which falls into long troughs of stone or wood. These are always full, and round about them stand women and children, with clothes, pitchers, or such green garden-stuff, as may need attention at the moment. They are singularly picturesque; and it is curious to note that one of the troughs is usually the huge trunk of a tree, hollowed by age or industry, to receive the crystal fluid that pours down from the mountains on which it probably passed its youth and maturity. A fine chattering goes on round about the fountain, and children and dogs swell the chorus.

The carvings on the balconies and wooden eaves of the chalets often attracted our attention and were typical of Swiss talent and industry. It is interesting to look out for this carving. We found it in all sorts of out-of-the-way places: notably in the lonely and picturesque village of Arrveyes. The rougher specimens are often the work of the same hands that fashion the exquisite ornaments sold in the towns. Imagination ran riot at sight of some of the artistic carvings of the overhanging eaves, doors and balconies of the poor, homely chalets we came across. The interior of one we explored contained stores of curious furniture and household utensils which the good housewife displayed in the hope of a recommendation to a lodger. Simplicity and shrewdness are united in the character of the mountaineer: but they are in danger of being alloyed by the common lust of gain. Poverty is a stern searcher of purpose; and he who can keep a "conscience void of offence" under its temptations, is a happy being, dwell he in crowded city, or isolated village among the glorious mountains of Switzerland.

CHAPTER II.—A TEMPERANCE MEETING.

The twenty-first annual fête of the Swiss Alpine Club was celebrated at Villars-Chésières in the autumn of 1885. M. Eugène Rambaut,[1] the president, in his inaugural address, not only describes graphically the Vaudois mountains, but tells us how they were originally framed. The peasant has still a latent belief, he says, that they were built by the Giant Gargantua. The legend is, that this fabulously big personage carried a hotte or oblong Swiss basket at his back, containing the materials with which he fabricated them. There is no certainty as to the tools he employed, one controversialist suggesting a wooden sword, the other a shovel; but the hotte is beyond dispute. With its contents Gargantua formed the mountains, and it is suggested that the breaches in them are due to his various humours. But what about the lesser eminences below them? What of the small hills that dot the Rhone valley? There happened to be a hole in the bottom of his hotte, through which earth and pebbles fell as he strode along. They became hills, and the lovely acclivities that gently rise from the valleys below the mountains are the pebbles and mound that fell from the hotte of Gargantua. We are further told that he was born a giant, and Rabelais informs us that "for his first dress nine thousand six hundred yards of crimson and blue velvet threaded with gold, was necessary; and for his belt, a ribbon of silken serge, half blue, half white, three hundred yards and a half long, and proportionably wide." These colours suggest the hues of the sky at sunrise and sunset.

As said the President, in his address, the semicircular terrace on which Villars-Chésières is situated might be an English park, so beautifully diversified is it with meadows, groups of trees, and a verdant background of sloping pasturage. "It is easy to understand," he adds, "that the Vaudois are extremely attached, not only to their blue Leman, but to their mountains. Attached is not a sufficiently energetic word: they are by them entichés." Our translation of entichés—"infected by them," scarcely conveys M. Rambaut's meaning, but we understand by it the mal du pays of the mountaineer.

When Sunday came we encountered our scholars again. Most of them had been far up the mountains to gather the Alpine roses or small rhododendrons so prolific in those parts. They, like Gargantua, had hottes slung to their backs, but theirs were filled with the floral treasures springing from his mountains. We might have had all their contents if we would, for said one, "I was close to you, madame, that day in the school." A few more sous completed our conquest, and we separated, soon to meet again.

This was in the afternoon at Chésières. There, on a sort of village green beneath a large tree, a truly picturesque scene awaited us. The Swiss Temperance Society had a réunion there, and delegates from many of its branches came to strive to spread their doctrines among the people, who are grands buveurs, they say, both in mountain and valley. We arrived as they were singing a temperance hymn, and while the united voices of the assembly rose from mountain to mountain, we watched the group.

Most of them were gathered underneath the wide-spreading tree, some seated, some on foot, sharing hymn-books, or singing from memory. In the centre of those seated was a young lady with broad brimmed hat, who was leading the hymns, and near her were half-a-dozen bonny children, nés English, but naturalized in France and Switzerland. The delegates stood in the centre and sang heartily, while the outsiders joined in the chorus. These delegates of the Société Suisse de Tempérance came from various parts of the Canton de Vaud, and were making a tour from village to village. The centre of their operations was Geneva. They were very much in earnest, for many of them had been awful drunkards, and had been restored to sanity by enforced temperance. When the hymn ended, one after another of these converts gave an account of their conversion, and the stories they told were similar in kind to those related at any English Temperance meeting. The scene and language alone were diverse. A Swiss chalet on the right, a Swiss village at the back, and a range of glorious mountains in front was the scene—French the language. The human nature was identical, albeit inanimate nature differed. The word ivrogne was constantly repeated instead of drunkard: and instead of appeals to an impoverished, woebegone, city population, these were made to the hard-living dwellers among the snow-capped, precipitous, ice-bound mountains.

[1] The death of M. Rambaut has been announced since this was written.

"We love our mountains," pleaded one energetic speaker. "Quit them, and we should die of ennui. The higher the happier. Ask the women of these grand mountains if they are not happy. The answer is, 'Oui, si mon homme ne buvait pas.'"

"We were three brothers, all ivrognes," spoke another. "My mother prayed for us twenty years. I have been often manacled and in prison. I was the oldest and the worst. But God found me, and I am a new man. One of my brothers was converted from seeing the change in me, and the third is about to give up the drink. Our aged mother's prayers are answered."

"I used to lure all my friends to the auberge and the balls, and spent every sou on pleasure," argued a third. "Now I work always, and do not lose an hour. I give my money to the baker instead of inquiring, where is the tobacconist's? I am strong for labour."

A fourth: "I believed in no God; I never prayed or read the Bible. But now I have taken the Blue Cross for badge, as the ambulance corps have taken the Red Cross, and I am free to go to any church, instead of spending my Sundays and weekdays in riotous living. My wife and children are happy: we have ease and comfort. Oh! on peut se passer d'eau de vie."

It seems that the curse of the mountains is a hot, inflammatory brandy. The ordinary wine of the country, both red and white, is comparatively innocuous, the white made in the neighbourhood of Villars resembling a light cider in flavour. But this does not satisfy the ivrogne.

Many hymns were sung between the various addresses, and during one of them a procession was seen winding along the path between the villages of Villars and Chésières. It finally defiled into our green. It consisted of the school-children with the régent and the monitrice marshalling them. They were all smiles as we approached them, and the régent apologised for arriving late, stating that they had all been at Sunday school, and could not finish earlier. The secret understanding between the régent and two members of our united trio began now to be divulged. They had hinted a Treat à l'Anglaise, if masters and scholars would come first to the réunion. They were all for forming a Band of Hope, then and there. But the Société Suisse had not, as yet, embraced the children. "They were too young to understand," suggested the leader of the delegates, a shrewd and practical man. "Prevention is better than cure," was the reply. He gathered the children around him, however, and spoke to them kindly and persuasively. Meanwhile, some of them whispered to us aside that they had received their sous. The speaker caught at the word, and smiling said that "sous," and "treats" would make any number of juvenile teetotallers.

What a pretty scene it was! Régent, monitrice, delegates, friends, for the moment engrossed by the children, whose future, qui sait? might depend on an impression made then. Through the huge tree streamed the sunbeams, and the faces were kindled by their light. So were the mountains which suddenly became golden as the sky.

An English pastor, residing in a chalet close at hand, was asked to say a few words and give the blessing. He did so in French. Then he invited all the members of the Société who had come from a distance, to his chalet, together with the régent, monitrice, and ourselves.

Here was genuine English hospitality in a Swiss abode. How, first, can we describe the chalet? It was one of those embellished for hire by the proprietress who retained a portion of it for her own use, and our friends had twice tenanted it during the summer months. The balcony was actually framed and glazed into a sitting-room, which was alternately schoolroom and dining-parlour. The dark central apartment, which ran the length of the chalet, was the owner's living-room, round about which were three or four small, low apartments, appropriated to the lodgers for sleeping. One of these, however, was painted and papered, and otherwise adorned as "our drawing-room," and was furnished with sofa, easy chair, and piano.

Abundance of tea, cocoa, and cake was provided, and the chalet swarmed with human bees from the great non-alcoholic hive. The big kitchen, or house-place, was the scene of the general meal; the outsiders enjoyed theirs in the glazed balcony. It was a suggestive assembly, and represented several branches of the great Christian family.

All were able to join in the hymns that succeeded the repast. Within and without the carved wooden balcony surrounding the chalet, stood the singers, books in hand. The inspiriting "Peuple Helvétien," and the calming "Paix vous soit," resounded from chalet to mountain, and from mountain to the heaven of heavens, while the inhabitants of the village below also heard. A never-to-be-forgotten Sunday.

Before the gathering dispersed—or rather proceeded to another distant Alpine village to preach their gospel of temperance—they proffered the warmest thanks to their host. We shook hands all round, and found that the Swiss are quite as capable of the friendly grasp as the English. We watched them from our elevation wind down the valley, and pictured the banks of the blue Leman whence many of them had come. We were four thousand feet above it, and we could but respect men who thus laboured to entreat their fellow-creatures to share the blessings they had themselves received.

As we returned from Chésières to Villars—past the big cattle-chalet, past the picturesque water saw-mill, through the pine walk, and up the steep mountain road—we entered the English church, but there the service was half over. The first tablet placed in this simple edifice is to the memory of Harry McInnes, who was killed in a fall from rocks in this neighbourhood.[1]

That Sunday closed with a glorious sunset.

[1] See SUNDAY AT HOME. July, 1886.

Mountain and valley were suddenly bathed in rosy, ethereal light. The snow on the crest of the Pic du Midi and his fellows, the ice of the glacier de Trient, the waters of the Rhone, reflected the marvellous colour of the sky, and vivid carnation overspread the scene. A sense of awe silenced the spectators, and a wonderful peace hovered over Villars.

CHURCH NEAR VILLARS.

HOSPITALS AND HOSPITAL WORK.

BY MRS. BREWER.

V.—ST. THOMAS'S HOSPITAL (continued).

OF the eight blocks, the one nearest to the bridge is St. Thomas's Home, or what is called the pay block; the one furthest from the bridge is the infectious block. Not that any infectious case is ever admitted into the hospital, but it not unfrequently happens that such cases develop in the hospital, and whether this occurs in the pay block, or in the general wards, or among the nurses, the patient is at once removed.

And now we go to the pay block. This consists of two large wards and five private rooms, fitted up and furnished expressly for the use of those who belong to the upper and middle classes, and who are willing and able to pay.

The ward on the ground-floor is for females. It looks curious as you enter. Each patient, of whom there are sixteen, has a separate sleeping-room, curtained off from the others by thick impervious red-and-white striped linen curtains. Each compartment is lighted by a large window, and is comfortably furnished. The ward above this is for men, differing only in containing eight more beds. To each ward is attached a day or sitting-room, for the use of those able to sit up. At the further end of the wards are the baths and sanitary arrangements. At the entrance from the hospital corridor, is the sister's room on one side, and the little kitchen on the other, called the ward kitchen, for making tea and coffee, or keeping hot water or beef-tea.

This block is complete in itself; it has its own sister, its own resident medical officer, its own kitchen; and its accounts are kept separate from those of the hospital. It is, however, under the control of the matron.

The weekly payment for each patient in the ward is three guineas, and for the use of one of the private rooms seven guineas a week. This sum secures to the patient, board, medical and surgical attendance, medicine and appliances, and also the nursing and attention of trained nurses.

As we left the home and passed into the corridor, I said to the sister: "All is very clean and orderly, and restful in the home, but I think I would rather be in a general ward. What exemption or privilege does the patient here possess over those in the general ward?" Her answer was: "There is no lecture on her case given by the surgeon or physician to the students at her bedside; and a patient may at her own expense call in a medical man from outside to consult with the medical man of the home."

We find ourselves now in a long corridor running parallel with the river, and pause at the first door on the left hand side, which admits us into the Nightingale Home.

As the history of this will come in our chapter on nursing, we will only stay to remark that this is a standing testimony of England's gratitude to Florence Nightingale. It was founded and is supported by the public subscription, raised at the close of the Crimean War as a tribute to that lady, and called the "Nightingale Fund."

The object of the home is to give to women desirous of hospital work a thoroughly practical and scientific training.

It became located at St. Thomas's because this hospital seemed to offer certain advantages which the home required, and certainly the advantages have not been all on one side, as the nursing in St. Thomas's Hospital proves.

From this home there is a private door leading into the wards. We do not intend to pass through this, but continue along the corridor where there is much to see. On the other side, and nearly opposite the Nightingale Home, is the Ophthalmic Ward. This has a wooden division down the centre to divide the men from the women—fortunately there were not many cases at the time of our visit. This has a little theatre of its own.

The next door on the right of the corridor leads to the matron's office, and the linenry, where all the linen of the hospital is kept and mended, and given out, and under these rooms is the large dining-room of the hospital nursing staff. The matron, has held the office for the last thirty years, and to her gentle, but strict supervision, added to her power of organisation, is owing much that has gained for St. Thomas's so high a character.

The arrangements for out-patients are very good. Men and women have separate waiting-rooms, and definite hours are fixed for them to see the doctors, so that the time of waiting shall be as short as possible. After seeing the doctors they take their prescriptions to the wicket of the dispensing room, where three or four dispensers attend to them.

Out-patients are kept strictly apart from those in the hospital. A special sister and nurse attend to them, and as soon as they are gone men thoroughly clean out the apartments they have occupied with wet sawdust.

Another very important apartment is in this corridor, viz., the kitchen. Cooking in a hospital is a very essential part of the general administration, and requires to be done with the utmost regularity, efficiency, and economy.

We found ourselves in the kitchen about half an hour before dinner—there was no bustle. Potatoes were steaming, joints were roasting, fish was frying in such quantities as quite to astound us. By the way, Miss Nightingale says there should be no frying in a hospital, except fish. There are three kitchens in the hospital. One, as I have said, in the home, or paying block; a second in the Nightingale Home for the probationers, and this large one for the hospital under the steward. I asked what was done with the broken food. The steward said there was very little, as great care was exercised in the amount prepared, but such as remained each day was purchased by the milkman, for a certain annual sum, for his pigs.

We saw in the steward's office a large slate divided into squares, in which are written the quantities of food required for the day.

From this, lists are made and sent into the kitchen, and the cook sees at once how many are to have full diet, how many to have fish and fowl.

The fish comes in from the fishmonger already cut up in diets of half a pound each.

The meat is carved in the wards at dinner-time, those who are well enough sitting at table, and helping the nurses to serve it.

The orders for meat, fish, and vegetables are given daily. We saw the order going to the butcher on the Friday for Saturday and Sunday. It was sixteen stone of beef, ten stone of mutton, fourteen stone of gravy beef, and eleven chops.

Milk is used in great quantities, as much as eight or nine hundred gallons a week.

Seeing how many fires there were in various parts of the hospital, I asked how many coals were used in the year. The answer was, "About 1400 tons."

We go next to the wards, of which there are twenty-three. I am sorry to say that three of these are closed at present for want of means, for St. Thomas's Hospital, being a landed proprietor, has suffered equally with others in the depreciation of land, and for the time being expenses must be kept down.

A great grievance among the governors is that money which might be applied to the relief of pain and sickness, has to go in very heavy rates. I only state the fact, as others are taking up the question whether hospitals should not be exempt from taxation.

The wards are beautifully fresh and airy, being 128 feet long, 15 feet high, and having balconies towards the river for convalescent patients. The ventilation is perfect, but peculiar; the hot or foul air passes out of the wards, and is received in what is called the common extraction shaft which carries it quite away.

The number of beds constantly occupied varies from 360 to 390.

Since the opening of this hospital one ward has been set aside for the children. Into this we go first, and see written up Victoria Ward. Here we found thirty-nine children under six years of age, one only a few days old on this our first visit. It made one's heart ache to see little mites of babes subject to operations and so much pain. The matron and sisters alike told us how wonderfully good and patient they are in suffering, and how quickly they forget it, cooing and laughing as soon as the pain is over; and that during the night there is scarcely a sound of any kind among them. I was grieved to hear that a great deal of this pain and misery was brought upon the children through the carelessness and recklessness of parents. Many of the cases were hip disease.

The sisters seemed to understand every look and cry of the little ones, and their very touch seemed to soothe and mother them.

There were six beautiful chairs for babies in this ward, made and presented to the hospital by the employés of a furnishing warehouse.

This, like every other ward we went into, was bright with birds and flowers, and, for the children able to play with them, plenty of toys, many of which are yearly sent by "Truth."

We next go into one of the men's wards. Here we found a boy about eight in a pretty cot suffering from spinal abscess, not able to rest, and with such a patient suffering little face. This is an extra cot bought and fitted up entirely by two poor men who were cured in that ward. One gave two guineas towards it when he left, and the other, who was very clever in making "peep-shows" sold them and gave the produce to be added to the two guineas for the cot. "This extra cot would not be here," said the sister "but for the gratitude of these two poor men."

In this same ward there are a book-case and library presented as a token of gratitude from a father whose son was cured here.

Going from bed to bed, I was struck with the marks of self-control in pain, and the patient endurance of the men, and I asked as I left the ward, "What sort of patients do the men make?"

"Oh, very good," was the answer, "there is a chivalry in working men which makes them give less trouble than women."

It seems that some of the worst accident cases come from the Waterloo Station, and the nurses say that of all their patients these are the best, so obedient, so grateful, so strong to suffer and endure. Every year the railway employés make collections among themselves, and present to the hospital a hundred pounds and sometimes more, to shew their gratitude for the benefits received.

I asked how and what preparations were made for the reception of accident cases, and learned that there are four male surgical wards, each of which takes it in turn to be an accident ward. Every Tuesday, at nine o'clock, the ward is cleared of patients, who are taken on their beds by lifts to other wards while the emptied one is prepared and made ready to receive accidents. For a whole week it is thus occupied, when surgical ward number two commences on the following Tuesday morning at nine to receive the accident cases, and so on till, at the beginning of the fifth week, number one is ready to begin again. Thus the intense strain is divided.

Nurses have prayers night and morning in the wards. There are two chaplains, and a beautiful church in the hospital.

The wards are all more or less alike in look and in administration.

From the moment you put your foot into the hospital you are struck with the contrast it affords to like institutions of thirty or forty years ago. It is so clean, so orderly, so roomy, so free of bustle and excitement in every department; a sense of strength, capability, and gentleness seems to pervade the whole place. And the nurses of to-day with those of by-gone times are altogether beyond comparison.

Speaking of nurses, I find that several have been trained here for the Crown Princess of Germany, who thinks very highly of this hospital and always comes to see it when in England.

The matron tells me there have been seven hundred applications from gentlewomen during the past year to be received as nurses. The percentage of deaths in this hospital is eleven. I enquired if any Convalescent Home was attached to the hospital. The answer was, "No, but we have a Samaritan Fund, which was founded in 1852, and kept up by Voluntary Contributions, which enables us to send poor patients to Convalescent Homes, and further to assist out-patients with surgical appliances, with artificial eyes and with spectacles."

I should say that never in the course of its long career has this hospital done better service than it is doing now, and with all earnestness we wish it Godspeed!

THE QUEEN'S GIRLHOOD.

SIXTY-EIGHT years ago, a baby was born at old Kensington Palace about whom the world thought very little at the time, although she brought great joy to the hearts of her loving father and mother. Her father was the Duke of Kent, fourth son of the reigning King, George III.

Of course the royal family took some interest in the arrival of the little stranger, and her grandfather, the King, wanted her to be named Georgina. Her father wished her to be called Elizabeth, because it was a favourite name among English people; but her uncle, the Prince Regent, insisted that she should be called Alexandrina, after the Emperor of Russia. Victoria, her mother's name, was added as an afterthought, but 'Little Drina' was her name through all her early years.

'Little Drina' was the first member of the royal family that was vaccinated; and soon after this had been done she was taken by her father and mother to Sidmouth, on the coast of Devon. Here the baby had a very narrow escape of being shot in her own nursery. A young man went out to shoot small birds, and was so unskilful in the use of his gun, that the shot went through the cottage windows, and passed quite close to 'Little Drina's' head, who was in her nurse's arms at the time. Shortly after this, the Duke who had been out for a walk, returned home very wet, but could not be persuaded to change his clothes before running up to the nursery to see that his little girl was safe. 'Little Drina' was eight months old at the time, and knew her father the moment she saw him. She kicked and crowed with delight, and the Duke stayed with her a few minutes; and, sad to say, that few minutes cost him his life. The damp clothes were changed too late. A violent cold was taken, inflammation of the lungs set in, and 'Little Drina' was fatherless and her mother a widow.

Very lonely must the poor Duchess of Kent have felt, for she was almost a stranger in England; but she and her husband had often talked over the future of their little girl, and she knew how he wished her to be brought up.

Victoria was to be educated carefully and religiously as a simple English lady. Her father had always taken great interest in every philanthropic movement for the benefit of the people, and at the time of his death was officially connected with sixty-two societies, having for their object some noble or religious work. He was very generous—too generous for his means—and left the Duchess anything but well provided for at the time of his death. Fortunately, his widow had no wish to shine in Court circles; she was quite content to retire to the comparative solitude of Kensington Palace with her two little girls—for this was her second widowhood, and by her first marriage she had had another daughter, Feodora, two or three years older than 'Little Drina.'

As soon as the child was old enough, and before she could read the Bible for herself, the Duchess used to read a few verses to her every day, and taught her to say her prayers at her knees. Indeed, 'Little Drina' was left but very seldom to the care of servants. There was no nursery breakfast in that household, but the child's bread and milk and fruit were served at eight o'clock in the morning beside her mother's; and in the summer-time breakfast was often placed out on the lawn facing the windows, where they could hear the songs of the birds, and watch them among the branches of the trees, or talk about the flowers that were blooming all round.

In this way the little lady acquired a taste for simple, rural pleasures; and when she was old enough to commence regular lessons under the care of a governess, her recreation was to walk or ride in a little carriage round Kensington Gardens, or have a scamper through the rooms and passages of the palace. Very little of Court life was the child permitted to see. There was an old soldier named Hillman, a pensioner of her father's, whom he had settled with his wife in a cottage not far from the palace, and to go and see these worthy people with her mother and governess was a treat indeed. Hillman had a daughter greatly afflicted, and the little Princess was very much interested in this poor girl—the more so, perhaps, that she had so few companions of her own age.

One day the Duchess, to amuse her little daughter, invited a girl prodigy who was playing the harp with wonderful skill at all the concerts in London, to come and perform at the palace. During the time Lyra—as she was called—was performing, the Duchess was called away on business, and when she came back the two little girls were sitting together on the hearthrug, which was scattered with toys, Drina dividing them between herself and Lyra.

For some years people generally thought little of the Duchess of Kent, living so quietly and unostentatiously at Kensington. This secluded life was varied by occasional visits to such places as Broadstairs, Ramsgate, and other country or seaside resorts. But as one after the other of the royal family were carried away by death, it began to seem possible, and even probable, that 'Little Drina' might become the Lady of England.

The Princess Victoria was growing fast; she was not very tall, but upright and graceful, with a fresh pink-and-white complexion, and large well-opened blue eyes. She was about thirteen when some one told her she might one day become the Queen of England. The girl looked very serious when she heard this. 'If the honour is great,' she said, 'the responsibility is greater.'

When Dr. Davys became Victoria's teacher, her mother desired that other studies should not be allowed to crowd out the study of God's Word, but that he should read the Bible with his pupil every day. There could not have been much idle time in the Princess's day at that time, for there were French, German, and Italian lessons to learn, drawing, painting, music and singing to practise, besides mathematics and other things to study.

But it was not the head only that Dr. Davys sought to educate, for we know the girl was taught to set the highest value on self-control and self-restraint, and that she honoured it in others while striving to attain it herself. We learn this from various incidents, and this little story among others:—

Drina was very fond of going out shopping with her half-sister and governess, and the three often went, as other ladies do, to various shops at the West End. One day they went to a jeweller's to make some purchase, but the attendant was busy serving another young lady with a gold chain. She was some time selecting one, and when at last the choice was made and she asked the price, a look of great disappointment overspread her face. 'It is too much,' she said; 'I cannot afford such a high price,' and a less costly chain had to be selected.

Drina and her friends had been watching all this, and as soon as the young lady had left the shop the Princess asked if the shopman knew her. 'Oh yes, I know her; she is one of our customers,' he said. 'Then send her the chain she wished so much to possess, and I will pay for it. Tell her the Princess Alexandrina wished her to accept it for her self-control in resisting the temptation to buy what she could not afford.'

This incident shows something of the Princess's character. Thoughtful, sympathetic, impulsive, she was also warm-tempered, and sometimes imperious in her manner, which was scarcely to be wondered at considering what an important individual she had now become. When she was about seventeen her two cousins Prince Ernest and Prince Albert of Saxe Coburg-Gotha came with their father to pay a visit to the Duchess of Kent at Kensington Palace. Of course the young people saw much of each other. They went about to see all the sights of London together, and among other places they attended the service at St. Paul's Cathedral when the children of the charity schools went there, and the singing greatly moved all the young people. Princess Drina, however, observed that her younger cousin Albert paid very marked attention to the sermon as well as the singing. From this time, although Prince Albert went back to his home in Germany, they frequently heard of each other through friends. They also exchanged messages and little tokens of regard.

From the time of this visit Princess Drina went more into society. Towards the end of the reign of William IV. he insisted upon her going to Court sometimes whether her mother liked it or not. He paid very little deference to, and certainly disliked, the Duchess of Kent, but he was charmed with his niece, who was now next in the line of succession, and he would have had her at Court constantly if he could. The King greatly desired to live until his niece came of age—which would be at the age of eighteen—so that she might herself ascend the throne without the need of a regency under the Duchess of Kent; and the wish was gratified. Princess Drina came of age May 24th, 1837, and William IV. lived until the 19th of the following month.

Although his death had been almost hourly expected for some days previously, the little household at Kensington Palace went on as usual until it was aroused by a loud knocking at the outer gate in the summer dawn of June 20th, when the porter hastily summoned some of the servants and told them that the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Home Secretary had come to see the Princess.

"But she is asleep, and it is only five o'clock in the morning," said the surprised servant.

"No matter what the time is. I must see the Princess at once," said the archbishop; and so the servant went to summon her.

The lady did not keep him waiting so long as her servants had done. In her white night-dress, with a shawl drawn round her shoulders and her long, fair hair falling down her back, she hastened to the parlour where the archbishop was waiting, and there received the news that she was now Queen of England.

The news soon spread through the household, and there was plenty of coming and going for the next few hours before the young Queen received the Council. Lord Melbourne was the premier, a gentle, childless, old man to whom the young Queen could look up as to a father. Much speculation, of course, had been rife as to how she would bear herself in the strange situation she was so suddenly called to fill, but her gentle, dignified manner, the calmness she displayed, and the tender solicitude she expressed for her aunt, Queen Adelaide, won all hearts, and the most carping of critics had nothing to say but in praise of her.

The sudden elevation to such honour was enough to turn older and wiser heads than hers, but the Queen had learnt the lesson of self-control; and though she could not but be greatly moved at the change in her state, she was anxious to let her friends know that she was not likely to forget them through it. The very day after her accession, in the midst of all the bustle incident to it, she thought of Hillman's daughter, the poor suffering girl at Kensington, and sent her a psalm-book with passages marked in it, and a peacock marker that she herself had worked, with a kindly message that she would never be forgotten.

It was a gracious act graciously done, and carried a store of comfort to the poor lonely heart, and it spoke volumes for the noble lady.

Until after her accession it was not known that we should have a Queen Victoria. All the documents had been prepared in the name she had hitherto been known by—Alexandrina—but after her first Council meeting, when called upon to sign her name for the first time as sovereign, she wrote "Victoria."

As Sovereign of the realm the young Queen for the first time acted as mistress in her own household, and she soon made it known that she would not tolerate unpunctuality. One of the ladies in attendance upon her commenced her duties by being a few minutes behind the time appointed. The third morning the young Queen met her standing with her watch in her hand. The lady was dreadfully confused, and the Queen seeing it presently said a few kind words to set her at ease again, feeling sure she would not need reminding a second time about unpunctuality.

Possibly many supposed that a young girl only eighteen would be willing to do exactly as she was told by her Council and the Prime Minister, but Lord Melbourne soon discovered that she had a will of her own. When a document was brought to her to sign she not only insisted upon reading it through, but asked questions about its details, and sometimes declined to affix her signature until she had had further time for consideration. "It is with me a matter of paramount importance whether or not I attach my signature to a document with which I am thoroughly satisfied," she said one day when her Minister was urging her to sign her name at once. Another time he submitted an Act for her signature and urged expediency, when she stopped him, exclaiming, "I have been taught my lord, to judge what is right and wrong, but expediency is a word which I neither wish to hear nor understand.' No wonder Lord Melbourne exclaimed after this that he would rather have ten kings to manage than one queen, for such uncompromising behaviour in political matters was a thing almost unknown.

The Coronation took place in Westminster Abbey on June 28th, 1838. It was a wonderful and impressive scene, and the young Queen went bravely through her part in the long series of ceremonies connected with the service.[1]

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

BARBARA'S BROTHERS.

CHAPTER XXV.—THE RETURN OF THE PRODIGAL.

"MOTHER, I HAVE COME HOME."

WULFRIC MEYNAL was not destined to enjoy undisturbed the six weeks' holiday he had promised himself.

Within three weeks of the day upon which he and Reinée had plighted their troth on the sunny moor, he was summoned to St. Hilda on important family business. It was Mr. Dart, the solicitor, who had written in the first instance, and he implied that the matter he had to communicate was of an agreeable nature, and advantageous to his old friends and clients.

Wulfric had entirely recovered his wonted health and strength. Happiness is the best tonic in all the world, and he had been enjoying life during the past weeks as perhaps he had never done in all his life before. A gracious sense of well-being had settled down upon him. He felt within him the spring of hope and confidence that makes a man strong to labour, that sweetens toil, and gives a zest to life, and does not fail nor falter, but strengthens with time and deepens with years. Love had come into his life, a deep, true, God-given love, and it had transformed him at once into a new being.

He left Reinée at the call of duty, and proceeded home to learn what it was that had happened.

A wealthy bachelor uncle of Mrs. Meynal's had died. He was an eccentric old man, and had taken no notice of his niece during his lifetime, save by an occasional present of game, but at his death he had bequeathed his entire fortune to her and her children, raising them at once to wealth and independence.

The bulk of the property was Mrs. Meynal's for her lifetime, afterwards to pass to her children; but there was a substantial legacy to each one now, and to Wulfric was left the plate, pictures, and furniture of the old man as well as a valuable library. This bequest had been added in a codicil shortly before his death, with an intimation of the satisfaction it had given him to hear of his great-nephew's skill and success at St. Hilda, as well as of his benevolence and philanthropy.

The old man's affairs were in scrupulous order, and the legal formalities would be concluded as soon as the opening of the session permitted the transaction of business, and meantime the family could draw upon the bankers for any advance in reason that they wanted, and felt at once what a difference to each one of them this unexpected access of wealth would make.

Of course it relieved Wulfric at once from the onus of the support of his mother, and the establishment she required for her comfort. He was no longer tied to St. Hilda, but could seek a wider sphere of action as soon as he chose. He had private means of his own now, as well as excellent prospects for the future, and was, even from a worldly point of view, no such very unequal match for Reinée Dumaresq.

He had, however, no immediate idea of quitting St. Hilda. He had grown attached to the place where he had first met the woman he loved, and he knew that he had grown into the hearts of many there, and that he should be missed if he left them suddenly without first training a successor who should be able and willing to take up the duties he had laid upon himself.

Moreover, there was his mother to think of—the mother who leaned upon him now, and clung to him with loving dependence, and had forgotten the old feeling of fretful irritation against him. She must not be left quite alone. Her daughters could not stay much longer. Celia was to leave the old home very soon; Fergus, though very patient and considerate, could not be expected to wait on indefinitely before he claimed Barbara; the girls must go, as Wulfric told himself, and the mother could not be expected to leave the home that had been hers for so many years; neither ought she to be left alone in her feeble state of health. Reinée saw everything as he did and it was agreed between them that so long as his mother needed him their home should be at St. Hilda.

"With you, Wulfric, is home and happiness to me," she wrote, for they had not yet returned to the Hall, but were visiting friends in Scotland, and that exactly expressed Wulfric's own state of mind. Let him once have Reinée for his wife, and he had no wish left to satisfy, save that he might do his duty by her and all those entrusted to him in whatsoever relation it might be.

Yet in the midst of all this brightness one dark shadow lay upon the home. Nothing had been heard of Gerald all through the year. It seemed as if he had vanished utterly from the face of the earth. They had learned enough of his past life since he had left home to be filled with the greatest anxiety; but over his present hung mysterious silence that seemed as if it would never be broken.

It was a trouble they did not speak of very often, it seemed to lie too deep for words, but it was very keenly felt, and every possible step was taken to find him, and taken in vain. It sometimes seemed as if the certain news of his death would be a relief.

But all dark days have an end at length—and so did this one.

Autumn had followed the footsteps of summer, a bright, dry, healthy autumn that swept away all the illness that had hung about during the spring. The trees were yet in full foliage, the world was bright and sunny, and it seemed as if trouble and sorrow ought to be banished from all hearts.

Celia had been married that week, and had gone away to the new life and new home awaiting her. Wulfric was thinking of the day when he should claim Reinée as his very own, and he smiled a little in the twilight as he often did now when alone. He was sitting beside his mother's couch, and Barbara was reading at the window by the fading light.

Suddenly the door opened softly and Juliet Granby entered the room. She was closely followed by some one else, and she hung back a little in the shadow; but the other advanced quickly and knelt down beside Mrs. Meynal's couch.

"Mother," said a familiar voice, but there was a new ring in it since last it was heard, as well as a quiver of deep feeling—"Mother, I have come home."

There was a deep silence then for many minutes, broken only by the sobbing of both mother and son.

"Gerald! My boy—my boy!"

"Mother, mother, can you forgive me? Ah, if you only knew all you never could!"

"My boy! My boy! Oh, my Gerald, you have come back to me! What does anything else matter, so long as I have you safe?"

Feeling that mother and son should be left alone for awhile, Wulfric and Barbara softly withdrew, together with Juliet Granby who had brought the wanderer home.

They turned to her eagerly in the lighted hall without, to know the meaning of this strange, sudden return. It was soon explained.

"You know I went up to town three months ago to your hospital, Wulfric; what a different place it was from the Aylcester Infirmary! you cannot think how kind they all were nor how I enjoyed my visit. I had the run of all the wards; I might go anywhere and see everything.

It was most interesting. A week ago I went to visit the Convalescent Home out in the country, and there it was I found—Gerald."

"Found Gerald!"

"Yes, getting better from a long illness, brought on he says by his own excesses in the first place, and then by the poverty and privation into which it led him. He was living there under another name—every one knew he was a gentleman, but he would say nothing about himself. He has told me his tale, it is very dreadful and sad, but he has repented, oh, so humbly! I am sure the past must all be forgiven." Tears stood in Juliet's eyes, but she dashed them away and went on bravely, "He had resolved never, never to go home until he had redeemed the past, and won back for himself the position he had lost. He was so humble and yet so firm that I hardly knew him again. We had both learned the same lesson I think," she added with a tremulous little smile.

"But in a very different school," said Wulfric gravely. "And so you brought him home, Juliet?"

"Yes," she answered, her colour rising slightly. "He saw, by-and-by, that it would be right to do it, so he has come."

The drawing-room door opened and Gerald appeared.

"Juliet," he said, "I want you."

He took her by the hand and led her towards his mother's couch. Wulfric and Barbara followed at a little distance.

"Mother," he said, "it was Juliet who found me, and it is she who has brought me home to you. We love one another, and she is going to trust me, and to wait for me until I can make her my wife. You will love her as a daughter, will you not?"

Mrs. Meynal opened her arms to embrace the girl, and Gerald continued speaking in a more manly way than they had ever heard him do before.

"We came home yesterday," he said. "Mrs. Granby welcomed us, and to-day I went to see Mr. Dart. He has promised most kindly to receive me exactly on the same footing as he would have done eighteen months ago, when I finished my articles, if I had not been so obstinately set against the law, and so conceited about my talents. He told me about the legacy that has come to me. It will take about two-thirds to wipe out the miserable debts I have contracted, and which I thought would weigh me down for years. The rest will be a sort of nest egg, and in a few years' time I hope to make a home which I can ask Juliet to share with me; mother, you will give me your blessing, I know. I dare not ask to live under your roof again, but at least I may hope to see you often, and to show by my future life how utterly I repent the past."

"My boy, my boy, come to me now," cried the mother, in deep yet happy agitation, "your mother's house shall always be your home—come to it now, and bring your wife with you; it shall be her home too, as soon as she is yours. Listen, my dear, dear, boy; I am a rich woman now, but what are riches to me if I am to lose all my children? Celia is gone already; Wulfric will soon make a home of his own, and everybody tells me that he has a career before him and cannot always hide his talents here. Barbara must leave me shortly; I do not wish to stand in the way of her happiness—but you, Gerald, can you not stay and let Juliet be the daughter of my old age? My dear," she said, stroking the girl's bowed head, "they have told me that you do not like the quiet life at St. Hilda; I do not want to be selfish or unreasonable—but—but——"

"Oh, Mrs. Meynal—mother, if you will let me call you so—please do not remind me of those foolish, wicked thoughts of discontent and pride of which I am so heartily ashamed; I love St. Hilda now. I know that it is not where we are but what we are that makes us happy or miserable. If you want me, I will come; I will love you and nurse you, and be a daughter to you, if you will let me. I have never known a mother of my own, but Gerald's mother will be mine now!"

Mrs. Meynal clasped the girl in her arms. She had known her from childhood and had been fond of her; but this bond was something altogether new and sweet.

Gerald turned to Wulfric and held out his hand.

"I have not had time to speak to you yet," he said; "I am quite ashamed to look you in the face, but you are a brother that gives one confidence. You never bear malice."

His voice shook with a feeling he was afraid would over-master him. This home-coming tried his self-command sorely.

Wulfric smiled in cordial brotherly fashion.

"I should not be worth much if I did. My dear boy, I need not say how glad I am to welcome you back—like this."

Gerald's face quivered. He drew his brother aside and said in low broken tones: "If you knew all the slough I have been dragged through, I wonder if you could welcome me still."

Wulfric laid his hand upon Gerald's shoulder and looked earnestly at him.

"It has at least taught you a lesson you are not likely to forget, Gerald. Let bygones be bygones; we did not quite understand one another in old days, and the fault was mine as well as yours. Had I been wiser I might have helped you more; but at least for the future we will be friends, and that will atone for much."

"You are worth calling a friend, Wulf," said Gerald with a dawning smile; "you are the best fellow that ever lived, and I am proud to call you my brother. You are going to get your reward now, though, so I hear. I wish you joy, old fellow, with all my heart. You deserve it if ever any man did."

A light shot into Wulfric's eyes and illuminated all his face.

"Thanks, Gerald," he answered heartily, "I don't deserve it; but I am very happy."

That evening sitting round the fire all together, they listened to Gerald's tale. He told it with a quiet simplicity and unvarnished truthfulness that made it sound doubly sad and pathetic, yet it gave them all a confidence in him that perhaps nothing could have so quickly established.

Mrs. Meynal sobbed aloud when she heard of the privations which her son had endured, and Barbara put her arms round his neck and cried vehemently: "Oh Gerald, Gerald if we had only known!"

But he answered with a grave gentleness new and very strange in him: "It was better as it was, Barbara. My motives were not pure, some were very unworthy, and yet I am glad they sufficed to deter me from appealing to you. I wanted a very hard lesson, and I have had it. I do not think anything much lighter than what I suffered would have made a lasting impression on me. Sometimes I am afraid to trust myself, even now; but—" he paused, glanced at Juliet whose eyes were bright with unwonted tears, and added in very low, yet firm tones, "Juliet and I have talked it over together, and she has helped me to understand. It is not in my own strength I trust now; but in something better."

Barbara's lips caressed his hair, which began to show silver lines here and there.

"Dear, dear Gerald!" she whispered. "If only I had been a better, kinder sister to you in old days. If you only knew how it has grieved me since! Can you forgive and forget?"

He took her face between his hands and kissed it. A smile played about his eyes and lips, something of the old mischievous smile—though only a shadow of its former self.

"Most fiery of Babs, I do not know you again, so tame, so gentle, so womanly! Is it Fergus who has so metamorphosed you? My dear little hot-headed generous sister, do you think I cannot see now whose fault it was we bickered and quarrelled so in old days? Yours were home truths, Barbara, but they were truths; my arguments were shallow sophistries, and you had wit to know it if I had not."

"Some home truths are better left unsaid," answered Barbara smiling, "I was very hasty and hard in those days; but I was punished when we thought——"

"That I should never come home? So you are really glad to have the black-sheep back? Little sister, you do not know how very humble, yet how very happy such a welcome makes a man, who has gone through experiences like mine."

Later in the evening he sought his brother in his study and spoke to him with great seriousness about his future prospects.

"It seems altogether so much more than I ought to have. I am half afraid to take the good things offered me," he said with a thoughtful humility that was perfectly sincere. "Wulfric, do you think I ought to make Juliet my wife soon, and come and live here with our mother, as she has begged me to do? Ought I to yield to her wishes and to my own, or would it be more wise and right to wait—to insist on a time of probation—to prove to myself and others that I am—fit—for such a position?"

Wulfric looked at his brother with a grave smile in his eyes.

"My dear boy," he said, "I look at things in this way—our lives are not our own to plan out just at will. We are surrounded by interests of others and by circumstances beyond our own control. We believe—I think I may say we now, Gerald—that there is One who, if we will let Him, guides and rules our lives, and gives us happiness or sorrow as He sees it best. To my thinking, it seems just now as if your path were being smoothed out before you. Perhaps the living presence of wife and mother in your home will be your surest safeguard—save One—from ever falling into temptation again. Take your happiness as God's gift Gerald, and use it in His service."

Gerald grasped his brother's hand and held it in his.

"Thank you, Wulfric, I will try to do so."

And then he went to find Juliet, to talk to her of the future.

"It does not seem a dismal life to you, I hope—that of life at St. Hilda, as the wife of an embryo solicitor?"

Juliet looked at him rather as Wulfric had done.

"No, Gerald. I have learned my lesson better than that. There is work for us all to do wherever we are and whatever are our circumstances. St. Hilda is very dear to me now," she held out her hand which he raised to his lips. "I think I am quite cured of my discontent now, Gerald."

And when Juliet went home and told her grandmother all that had happened, the old lady held her in her arms, and then looking into her face with that peculiarly bright smile of hers, said, "And so I am not going to lose my granddaughter altogether? My dear, your news is very pleasant to me; and I believe that a happy and a useful life is opening before you. God grant it may be so, and that many may bless the day when first you elected to settle down amongst us. St. Hilda will be glad to keep you, I know, and I think you will, after all, be pleased to stay."

"Yes, grandmother," was the answer. "I am very glad indeed and very happy."

CHAPTER XXVI.—CONCLUSION.

On board Clive Dumaresq's yacht one lovely day in late November, stood Wulfric and Reinée Meynal leaning over the rail of the captain's bridge, watching the blue waves race past their light little vessel.

Clive himself, sailing master of his own craft, was lying in a hammock upon deck, lazily enjoying the sunshine and fresh breeze. He was still rather wan and weak, despite the months that had elapsed since he was smitten down by illness. He was always merry and bright, and made a joke of his slow recovery, saying that it was only an excuse for being lazy and having a pleasant fuss made over his interesting self. But the fact remained that he did not pick up as he ought to have done, and that is how it came about that Wulfric and Reinée spent their honeymoon upon his yacht, and that he accompanied them upon the cruise.

Wulfric was convinced that the sea would set him up as nothing else could do, for he could get all the needful fresh air and change without any exertion whatever. But he was manifestly unfit to be alone, so the only thing to be done was to find congenial company for him. Scotland grew too cold for him, and visiting became a fatigue. His old companion, Trevelyan, was out of the question now, for he had taken the greatest umbrage at Reinée's engagement, and repudiated in consequence the friendship of the whole family. They took his desertion with an equanimity that would greatly have enraged him had he been aware of it, and especially would he have resented the popularity with all the family that Wulfric had now attained. Clive liked him so much that there seemed nothing strange to either in the final settlement of the plan which made him a participator in the wedding tour. As for Reinée her love for her brother was so great that his presence only enhanced her happiness.

Clive had justified Wulfric's expectations, and had picked up with most encouraging rapidity when once they put to sea. There seemed no reason to doubt that before the close of the voyage he would be quite his old self again.
