THE memorable death-bed to which the eyes of all the world have been recently directed, suggests that we may provide an interesting and profitable subject of thought by gathering together a few anecdotes of the last moments of celebrated men. "Thoughts of mortality," says an old writer, "are cordial to the soul," which is but natural, seeing death is an untried experience which sooner or later every one of us must face.

In the South Kensington Museum another such scene is depicted in D. W. Wynfield's painting, which represents Oliver Cromwell drawing near his end—his wife and children about him, and Owen, Goodwin, Sterry, with a company of others, in an adjoining room pouring out their hearts in prayer for his recovery. That, too, was a memorable scene. The Protector himself was willing enough to have done with the world. "It is not my design," he said, when some refreshment was offered to him, "to drink or sleep; but my design is to make what haste I can to be gone."

He died—"The Lord bore him to his everlasting rest," says one who was in attendance—on the 3rd of September of 1658; it was the Thanksgiving Day for the victories of Dunbar and Worcester. A terrible tempest swept over England and part of the continent just at the time. "It was," says Clarendon, "a day very memorable for the greatest storm of wind that had been ever known, for some hours before and after his death, which overthrew trees, houses and made great wrecks at sea, and the tempest was so universal, that the effects of it were terrible both in France and Flanders, where all the people trembled at it; for besides the wrecks all along the sea-coast, many boats were cast away in the very rivers." The enemies of Cromwell said that Satan came with the wind to fetch his soul away; his friends, that nature could not see so great a spirit take its departure without giving vent to signs of strong emotion.

A resemblance has often been pointed out between the death of Napoleon Bonaparte and that of Cromwell, so far as stormy weather was concerned. On the 4th of September, 1821, the island of St. Helena was visited by a tremendous hurricane which tore up almost all the trees about Longwood by the roots, including a willow under which the emperor had often enjoyed the fresh air. The 5th was another day of tempests, and about six in the evening Napoleon passed away. The last words he was heard to pronounce were, "My God . . . and the French nation . . . my son . . . head of the army . . . France! France!"

Beethoven, the great composer, is another who died in a storm. A sudden tempest of both hail and snow came on as he lay with closed eyes and breathing heavily, and it was followed by a flash of lightning and a terrible peal of thunder. The crash roused the dying man. He opened his eyes, clenched his fist and shook it in the air above him. The hail rushed down outside and as the peal died away, the hand fell and Beethoven breathed his last. The storm in the case both of Napoleon and Beethoven, happened in the evening, like the tempest in which the old Scotch lady died of whom it is told that, when she heard the thunder and the rattling hailstones, she looked up and, with a simple earnestness, remarked, "Ech, sirs, what a night for me to be fleeing through the air!"

According to the poet, "all men think all men mortal but themselves." But there are exceptions. Some people have been known so fully to recognise their own mortality that they may be held to have died simply because they had made up their minds that they would live no longer. The holding of a contrary opinion would have saved them. To this class belongs Robert Burton, the author of the often-quoted "Anatomy of Melancholy." Burton had foretold his death from the calculation of his own nativity, and he died at, or at least very near the time, he, strange to say, had predicted.

Mozart is another example. Not long after receiving a commission from a mysterious stranger for a Requiem Mass the composer remarked that he was convinced he should not be long here, and that he was certainly writing the Requiem for himself. His health and spirits gradually sank, and he died within a few months of receiving the commission, the Requiem occupying his thoughts to the end.

Fléchier, a French divine, died after having a dream, which he interpreted as foreshadowing his departure. So convinced was he that the end drew near, that he ordered his tomb, saying to the sculptor, "Begin your work at once; there is no time to lose."

By permission.]

THE DEATH-BED OF CROMWELL, FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 3, 1658.

[After D. W. Wynfield.

Hogarth, when designing "The end of all things"—the print now known as "Finis"—foretold that there would be speedily an end of the painter, and that "the sooner his work was done the better." He died only a few months after the print was published.

There is something mysterious about the way in which Cardinal Wolsey predicted his end. Two days after he had ridden on his mule into the Abbey of Leicester with, "Father Abbot, I am come to lay my weary bones among you," he asked Cavendish, his gentleman usher, what time it was. Cavendish answered that it was past eight in the morning. "Eight of the clock," said the Cardinal, "that cannot be; it cannot be eight of the clock; for by eight of the clock ye shall lose your master, for my time draweth near that I must depart out of this world."

He proved to have been mistaken as to the day but not as to the hour. On the following morning the clock struck eight, "at which time," says Cavendish, "he gave up the ghost, and thus departed this present life. And calling to our remembrance his words the day before, as he said that at eight of the clock we should lose our master, one of us looking upon another, supposed that he prophesied of his departure."

According to Gustavus Adolphus, the hero of Protestantism in the Thirty Years' War, no man is happier than he who dies in the exercise of his calling. At the battle of Lützen, Gustavus experienced this happy death in his own person. Nelson entertained the same idea, and realised his wish in dying at Trafalgar, where he expired with the roar of battle sounding his parting knell, his last words being: "Now I am satisfied; I have done my duty, thank God! I have done my duty." Sir John Moore was of the same opinion when he fell at Corunna. "You know," he said to Hardinge, "that I have always desired to die in this way."

An illustration in a humbler rank of the pursuit of one's calling carried on with spirit to the very close is found in the piper to Claverhouse's troops at the battle of Bothwell Bridge in 1679. As he was playing "Awa', Whigs, awa'," he was struck by a bullet, and rolled down the bank in the agonies of death; so intent, however, was he on the old party tune that he contrived to finger the pipes and yell out a few bars more till he plunged into the river and was carried away peaceably down the current among a great number of floating Whigs.

Desmoulins, the celebrated French physician, kept up his medical character to the last, mixing a little sarcasm, just to give it a relish, with the good advice to which he gave utterance. His fellow-physicians were crowding round his bed when Desmoulins assured them that they need not be greatly concerned, for he was going to leave behind him three physicians much greater than himself. Each of the doctors thought, "perhaps he will name me," so they anxiously enquired who they were who could surpass the illustrious Desmoulins. Their disappointment may be imagined when they heard the dying man say with great distinctness, "Water, Exercise and Diet."

When the mind grows weak before death, the dying often busy themselves in imagination with their habitual occupations. Opie, the artist, in his last delirium fancied himself employed in his favourite pursuit, and continued painting in idea till his death. Dr. Armstrong drew his last breath in the act of delivering medical precepts. Dr. Adams, the author of "Roman Antiquities," and Rector of the Edinburgh High School, imagined himself in his class. "But it grows dark, boys," he said, "you may go; we must put off the rest till to-morrow," and after saying so he immediately expired. Charles Abbot, the first Lord Tenterden, thought himself still on the bench, and his last words were, "Gentlemen of the jury, you will now consider your verdict." According to some, however, what he said was, "Gentlemen, you are dismissed."

The good breeding of the Earl of Chesterfield was exhibited to the very point of his departure. An hour before he died, a friend—a Mr. Dayrolles—called to see him. When this gentleman entered the room, the valet de chambre opened the curtains of the bed and announced his name. His lordship just found strength in a faint voice to say, "Give Dayrolles a chair." These were the last words he was heard to utter. Charles II. was even more polite; when he died, says Lord Macaulay, "he apologised to those who stood round him all night for the trouble which he had caused. He had been, he said, a most unconscionable time dying, but he hoped they would excuse it. This was the last glimpse of that exquisite urbanity so often found potent to charm away the resentment of a justly incensed nation."

"The sense of death," says Isabella, in her counsel to Claudio, "is most in apprehension." There may be pain, no doubt, in previous illness, and sometimes dread agony of spirit, but the mere act of passing away is often apparently a gentle and painless process; a relief like the laying down of a heavy burden, or the sinking to rest after a hard day's toil. The testimony has been recorded to this effect, of many a dying man who has breathed his last as if Death were really what it has been fabled to be, the elder brother of sleep. Struggle there was none, and the exit was made not only with ease, but sometimes apparently even with pleasure.

"If I had strength enough to hold a pen," said William Hunter, "I would write how easy and delightful it is to die." Louis the Great was surprised at the easiness of it. "I thought," he said, "that dying had been more difficult." "If this be dying," said Lady Glenorchy, when near her end, "it is the easiest thing imaginable." "My friends," remarked Fontenelle, the poet, shortly before he died, "I have no pain, only a little difficulty in keeping up life." All these utterances, however, have relation only to the physical conditions.

"I did not suppose it was so sweet to die," said Francis Suarez, the Spanish theologian. A similar testimony was given by the niece of Newton, of Olney. "If this be dying," she observed, "it is a pleasant thing to die." Lord Collingwood, the celebrated naval commander, when near his last breath, said to Captain Thomas who was with him, "I am dying; and I am sure it must be consolatory to you and all who love me to see how comfortably I am coming to my end." Pope, the poet, died so imperceptibly that the exact moment of his departure was not marked by his attendants.

Such facts may be encouraging to timid natures, but they are of small moment in comparison with those diviner consolations which David knew. "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me."

Against sudden death, when in a moment and without warning the soul is called to its account, we pray and with reason; it must be admitted, however, that some have been of a different way of thinking. On the eve of the day that Cæsar was assassinated, his friends at supper were discussing the question which was the happiest death. Cæsar, who was engaged in signing despatches, without looking up, said, "the least premeditated and the shortest." "An instantaneous death," says Pliny, "is the sovereign good hap of human life." Montaigne, the essayist, follows the lead of these two, remarking that death is, in truth, "a morsel that is to be swallowed without chewing." No doubt, as far as man can see, the sudden death would be best if every moment we could have all things in readiness not only for entering the next world but for leaving this.

One of the most striking of sudden deaths was that of Dr. Thomas Sheridan, the grandfather of Richard Brinsley Sheridan. He was in the house of a friend, and they were talking of the direction of the wind. Sheridan said, "Let the wind blow east, west, north or south, the immortal soul will fly back to the destined point," and leaning back in his chair he immediately expired.

About some deaths there is a singular appropriateness accompanied not unfrequently by considerable poetic beauty. Such a death was that of Petrarch whom his servants found dead in his library with his head bent over a book; he had breathed his last surrounded by those silent companions he loved so well. Falconer, the poet, had also an appropriate end; it was he who wrote the "Shipwreck," and after weathering many hard gales of fortune he perished in actual shipwreck when on his way to India.

The last hours of Cavendish, the chemist, were in keeping with his timid and reserved life. When his end drew near he dismissed his attendant, telling him not to return till a certain hour. When the servant came back his master was dead. There was something specially beautiful about the closing hours of Sir Walter Scott. The great magician drew his last breath amidst scenes which he had rendered for ever famous; he died on the afternoon of a glorious autumn day, every window open, and the ripple of the Tweed over its pebbles distinctly audible in his room. Turner, the artist, had as poetic an ending. The window of his death-chamber was turned toward the west, and the sun shone upon his brow in its setting and rested there as he expired.

Archbishop Leighton's idea of a fitting conclusion he used often to express to his friends. If he was to choose a place to die in, he said, it should be an inn; it looked so like a pilgrim's going home, to whom this world was all as an inn. The wish was granted; the Archbishop died at the Bell Inn, in Warwick Lane, London.

Of all memorable death-beds few leave a pleasanter impression than that of Susannah Wesley—the mother of John and Charles Wesley. She died when she was in a good old age, ready and willing to depart, and the closing scene was a triumph in its happiness and confidence. "I sat down," says her son John, "on the bedside. She was in her last conflict, unable to speak, but, I believe, quite sensible. Her look was calm and serene, and her eye fixed upward, while we commended her soul to God. From three to four the silver cord was loosing and the wheel breaking at the cistern, and then, without any struggle, or sigh or groan, the soul was set at liberty. We stood round the bed and fulfilled her last request, uttered a little before she lost her speech:—

"'Children, as soon as I am released, sing a psalm of praise to God.'"

The last words of remarkable people, as given by their biographers, are occasionally, it is to be feared, apocryphal, and represent, not so much what they did say, as what they would have said if they had only thought of it. Doubt has been thrown on the "Et tu, Brute" reported to have been the final exclamation of Julius Cæsar as he fell beneath the blows of his assassins. And it is not improbable that the "Oh, my country," of William Pitt is a fable, however true it may be that the last words uttered by that illustrious statesman, whilst he knew what he said, were broken exclamations about the state of public affairs.

There are some last words, however, about which there can be no reasonable doubt. When Bunyan breathed his last at his lodgings on Snow Hill, "Take me, for I come to Thee," were the final words he was heard to speak. Holy George Herbert—dying without an enemy, "if," as Izaak Walton quaintly says, "Andrew Melvin died before him"—laid down the burden of life after exclaiming, "And now, Lord—Lord, now receive my soul." The last words of Tasso were in the same pious vein, "Into Thy hands, O Lord!"

The last word John Wesley was heard to articulate was "Farewell!" addressed to the friends who knelt around his bed. "God bless you all!" spoken to his family, were the last words of Sir Walter Scott. Dr. Johnson's last words also took the form of a benediction. "God bless you, my dear!" he said to a friend's daughter who came to him at the last to ask his blessing. When Boileau, the French poet, was expiring, a friend entered his room. "Good day and adieu," said Boileau: "it will be a long adieu," and instantly died.

Sir Walter Raleigh kept up his character for coolness to the last. At his execution the headsman made an unexpected pause. "Why dost thou not strike? strike man!" exclaimed Raleigh. When Washington lay dying, he gave instructions to his secretary as to his funeral, then he asked, "Do you understand me?" "Yes," said the secretary. "'Tis well," answered Washington, and never spoke again.

The last words of Lord Byron were "Let me sleep" or "I must sleep now." When life was ebbing with the poet Cowper, he was urged to take some nourishment. "What can it signify?" he said, which was his last utterance. One who was present when the Earl of Eldon died, remarked to him that it was a cold day. "It matters not to me, where I am going," said his lordship, "whether the weather be cold or hot," and so passed away.

"Happy!" was the last word of Sir James Mackintosh, used in answering an enquiry as to how he felt. We have a striking contrast in the last words of Oliver Goldsmith. When the poet was on his death-bed a doctor attending him made this remark—"Your pulse," he said, "is in greater disorder than it should be from the degree of fever you have. Is your mind at ease?" "No, it is not," answered Goldsmith and passed away without speaking again.

Schiller's last words were "Many things are growing plain and clear." This he said looking up with a lively air, then he closed his eyes, and, says Carlyle, "his sleep deepened and deepened till it changed into the sleep from which there is no awakening." About the last words of Goethe there was a singular appropriateness. "His speech," says his biographer, "was becoming less and less distinct. The last words audible were 'More light!'"

JAMES MASON.

JOTTINGS FROM THE SOUTH PACIFIC.

A TRIUMPH OVER CANNIBALISM.

I WAS painfully interested on one occasion by an address delivered by Raekura, who laboured awhile as an evangelist on Lifu, one of the Loyalty Islands. He lived with Paoo, the Apostle of Lifu, assisting that noble man in his work. From Paoo's lips the following narrative was derived.

When Paoo and Zekaria landed on Lifu in 1843, they providentially became the friends and guests of Bula, the powerful chief of the eastern part of the island. On the evening of their first day ashore, Bula asked—

"Why did you come to Lifu?"

"To make known to you the word of God."

"What God?" interrogated Bula.

"Jehovah, who made heaven and earth and all things. It was He who created man."

"Where is that God of yours now?"

"In heaven. He is a Spirit; therefore He cannot be seen by the natural eye. Moreover, He is too sacred for us to gaze upon."

And so the conversation was continued.

Bula was greatly astonished; at some of the statements of the teachers he laughed outright. Nevertheless, his personal kindness and powerful protection were unvarying from that day forth. Several times it was proposed that the strangers should be slain and cooked; but Bula withheld his consent.

Not long after their landing on Lifu, war broke out and the teachers fled to Marè in a canoe. After spending a fortnight amongst their friends there, they returned to their old protector Bula. Paoo was unwearied in teaching the heathen; but, hostilities again breaking out, the teachers gladly took refuge on Marè for three weeks. Upon their return to Lifu, after this second flight, Bula and his people formally accepted them as teachers.

Previously they had been regarded merely as guests and friends of the chief. A grand oven of food was prepared as a welcome and formal installation. Each district subject to Bula had to furnish its quota of food for the occasion; yams, taro, bananas, cocoa-nuts, sugar-cane, and sweet potatoes. The next thing was to get a fat lad as a relish! The universal rule of feasts in the Pacific was this, if the present of food was uncooked, the relish must be uncooked; and vice versâ. But should a finger or toe of the victim be abstracted, the thief must be eaten in payment. When all was ready, the contents of the mighty oven were presented to the terrified teachers in the name of Bula and the underchiefs.

The teachers thanked them all for their kindness, but stated "that they could not possibly accept the poor victim, as that would offend Jehovah; that Jesus died on the cross expressly to save men." "What shall we do then with this (the victim)?" "Bury him," was the prompt reply. "Who is to bury him?" "All of us," responded the teachers.

The delighted crowd hurried off at once to dig a shallow grave, and soon returned to report that it was ready. With shouts of joy they bore the victim on a platform professedly to his burial. But each man in the crowd was resolved to have as much of the flesh as he could; so that by the time they got to the grave there was nothing to bury but the skeleton!

The teachers tremblingly followed the crowd, grieving over what they had been powerless to prevent. It was well that so courageous a stand was made at the first; for never again was such a revolting feast made for them.

This same Bula, sovereign of one half of Lifu, had forty wives. As many as sixteen cooked bodies were laid before him at a single meal. Under the influence of the teachers, he gave up cannibalism; but not polygamy and idolatry.

Zekaria eventually returned to his home on Rarotonga. Paoo faithfully plodded on, other labourers joined him; so that in a few years, by the blessing of God, the good work advanced with rapid strides. In 1859, the Rev. S. Macfarlane took the oversight of the work. In 1863, we conveyed Paoo's orphan children to Aitutaki in the John Williams, Paoo being a native of that lovely isle. And now, in 1886, there are 5714 adherents of Christianity on Lifu, and about 2000 church members. So true is it that "God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are mighty." Lifu is one of the Loyalty Islands now under the flag of France.

CHURCH KITES.

In times of peace kite-flying was a favourite amusement of the Hervey Islanders. Kites were egg, club, or bird-shaped. The first flown was sacred to the gods. Each kite bore a name and heraldic device. Only chiefs and aged men might indulge in this pastime. Tears of joy would be shed by the victor, to whom was given the largest share of the grand feast which followed. During the flight of the kite (or "bird," as the native name imports), it was customary to chant a song, composed for the occasion, which was supposed to aid its ascent.

In these days, teachers labouring amongst the heathen are universally called "kites" or "birds." Some churches boast of having three or four "kites" flying at one time in New Guinea or elsewhere. A church that has not even one "kite" abroad flying is looked down upon as having failed in duty to the Master. It is incumbent upon those who stay at home "to hold on to the end of the string," that is, never to forget these messengers of the churches in their prayers to God. Teachers in the field often write pathetically to their friends: "How can we be expected to fly, if you at home let go the string? If you cease to plead before God on our behalf, we fall and perish."

HELP FOR NEW GUINEA.

Timoteo, of Samoa, ere starting for New Guinea on missionary work, remarked:—

A stump-tailed Heron once pathetically said to a delicately graceful Tropic Bird, "Pray give me one[1] of those handsome red feathers in your tail, for I have none." The proud beauty disdainfully replied: "Be satisfied with what Nature has bestowed upon you; I will not part with my adornments."

Now Papua is the stump-tailed Heron; Samoa with its Christian privileges is the handsome Tropic Bird. New Guinea is asking Samoa to spare some of her feathers (sons) to adorn (instruct) her; but, unlike the stingy beauty of the ancient fable, Samoa is now freely parting with her most prized feathers to beautify the stump-tailed Heron of Papua.

[1] The Tropic Bird is furnished with two red tail feathers, fifteen inches in length, much prized by Polynesians for head-dresses. This bird is unquestionably the most beautiful sea-bird of warm latitudes.

IN THE DAYS OF THE GREAT ARMADA.

CHAPTER V

IT was not only Robert Bulteel who watched with flashing eyes and bated breath the lessening line of white water that lay between the Spaniards and their pursuers. Effingham, dressed daintily as a man might dress for courtly service, stood on his good ship's towering poop, searching that serried "half moon" for the noblest game at which to strike.

His glance happened to fall on Robert Bulteel. He had already learned something of his worth, and reckoned him true metal. To him he said, "There must be no grappling-irons used with such fellows as these. The enemy has an army on board, we have none. We must fight and fly, and turn and fight again: our strength lies in our heels to-day, eh, Bulteel?"

And Robert replied grimly, "Our heels have good cock's spurs thereon, my lord. Let them feel the sting of them as soon as may rightly be."

A signal ran up to the peak of the Admiral's ship; and presently a galley, with all sail set, and urged forward also by oars pulled with a will, shot in advance of the English line and discharged her cannon at the huge "San Matteo," the bulkiest and gaudiest of the Spanish rear-guard.

A hoarse cheer rang out from English throats as the sound of the guns trembled and died on the air. But there was little time henceforth for cheering, or little silence in which cheering might be heard; the iron mouths had it all their own way, and the thunder of the cannon roared and rolled, and the soft smoke clouds rose and rioted, until the sweet peace of the summer Sabbath was turned into horror of darkness and death.

The galley which had the honour of leading the attack, was called the "Defiance," a suitable name for her work that day. It was strange to see a thing so small fling itself forward against such odds; the Duke of Medina, commanding the Spaniards, scarcely thought it worth his while to point his ordnance at so insignificant a foe.

But he soon found that his guns, point them as deftly as he might, were almost fired in vain.

For the lofty hulls and huge "castles" of the foreign ships carried their guns so far above the water-line that the shots, in spite of all the gunners' efforts, went clear over the English ships; while every discharge of Effingham's cannon sent their iron messengers crashing through the gilded timbers of those unwieldy galleons.

And still, before the brisk south-west breeze, the battle swept on. Still the great vessels crowded sail, and pressed upon their course. And still behind them hurried the Ark-Raleigh and her scanty fleet of consorts, handled deftly by all the daring of Drake, and the courage of Frobisher; and by that of many scores of other gallant souls, who were as ready as they to dare and to die for the sake of England's queen, and England's faith.

From Dartmouth and Brixham, from Weymouth and the Solent, from Portsmouth and the Sussex fishing-towns, small ships and trading coasters, ran out to join in this huge chase.

Surely never before on the broad seas had such a sight been seen. It was the hawks harrying the eagles, the dog-fish pursuing the sharks!

For four-and-twenty hours the south wind held, and the Spanish vessels, still disdainful of their adversaries, still reckoning on joining the forces of the Duke of Parma, went slowly on their way; and behind them came the English, hovering in their rear, and using with sharp effect the "spurs" of which Robert had talked.

Just as the night had fallen on that 22nd of June, Dan Lavin's sloop made good her way to the side of the Ark-Raleigh, and placed herself under the Lord Admiral's orders.

"Our teeth are not, so to speak, too sharp," shrieked Lavin, his words but half-heard through the rush of the sea (the guns were silent awhile, now that the dusk made cannonading dangerous to friends as well as foes). "We cannot bite very deep, but we have pitch-pine on board, and tar that will blaze fathoms high! Set the old sloop, the Saucy Susan, a-fire, my lord, an' it please you! She'll be torchlight for the others to dance by at the least."

Dan Lavin was just an Exmouth merchant; the sum total of his worldly gear was easily reckoned; a small huckster's shop, and that same sloop the Saucy Susan, constituted the greater part; but he was in down-right earnest as he hallooed out, "Set her a-fire, an' it please you, my lord!"

It was that spirit of self-sacrifice, of willing and heart-whole surrender that went farther than winds or waves to save old England just then.

Once the Duke of Medina turned round on his pursuers and showed determined fight. The wind changed, favouring his plan of driving Effingham on to the lee shore; and he signalled his captains to take the wind of the English, and once and for ever rid themselves of the ships that hung like a cloud of wasps upon their rear.

An easy order to give; a difficult thing to do.

Such seamen as Sir Francis Drake were not to be out-manœuvred; and that affair ended in the capture of the treasure-galleon, "a huge ship of Biscay," which, with her commander Don Pedro de Valdez, was sent by Drake a prize to Weymouth.

At this distance of time, when we know the end so well, it is difficult fully to understand the excitement that filled the land whilst this long sea-fight went on. The first shot was fired on the 22nd of July, it was not until the 1st of August that the struggle was over, and the beaten Armada, the word "invincible" resting on it now as a scorn and derision, made its weary way into the North Sea. Nine days of wild excitement! nine days of terrible danger!

ENGLISH FLEET IN PURSUIT OF ARMADA.

It was no wonder that Doris grew white and sick when she waited, as did many another maiden, woman, wife, or mother, for such news as might come. The thunder of the cannonade had long died away, the chase had swept on towards the narrow seas; but the great treasure-galleon which had been sent to Weymouth, gave ample room for talk. She had been set on fire by her own crew; and Drake, when he captured her and extinguished the flames, found more than fifty wounded men in her, pitifully maimed and scorched.

An awful thing it was to see these wretched beings, so those who came from Weymouth reported; but enemies as they were they had to be tended and succoured—the heretics they came to despoil being of wider charity than their friends who had left them to perish miserably.

Doris listened to these tales, and to others quite as terrible, and she shuddered to remember that it was against such men that Robert had gone with his life in his hand. And Earle, the young lad Earle?

Her father was very gentle to her in those days. He never seemed to notice the querulous tone that had come into her voice of late, or the nervous way she had of starting at any sudden step or sound. Himself a suffering invalid, he had learned to feel for the suffering of others: though his was bodily and Doris's was mental pain, and some folks fail to see any bond between the two.

He did not fret about Earle. His life had shown him how powerlessly we lie in the hands of the Ruler of the world. Men may plot and plan, and spend their very souls in striving to ward off danger, and to gather good; but the Judge of all things does what seems to Him best; and men's hopes and fears vanish like the smoke of a parched scroll at the breath of His decree. Thomas Clatworthy, through sore sorrow, and wrenching pain, had learned this truth. And he was not only content but humbly thankful to lie still in Hands which were loving as well as great.

To those Hands he could trust his boy.

The house was dreary now that Earle had gone; one missed his foot upon the stair, and the sound of his laughter through the old rooms. There was his last half-finished work, a decoy-cage he had been busy with, standing amid chips and scraps of wire upon the little bench.

He had suddenly left his boyhood behind him, and had gone out with men to bear the brunt of the battle. And such a battle!

"May the God of his fathers bless the lad," sighed Clatworthy, "and hold him safe for life—and for more than life: that he also may know that it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps."

Some such words Doris over-heard, and she moved uneasily; she could scarcely bear the sound of the muttered prayer; it jarred on her nerves like a blow. She did not know the calm comfort that such confidence can bring; but keeping her eyes low down on her earthly love, she beat against her "fate," as Earle's captured and caged wild-birds might beat against the bars.

She went out restlessly one morning into the fragrant airs that come early from the sea across the fields where the clover nestles amongst the stalks of corn. In the year 1588 maidens rose betimes, and Doris was a notable housekeeper. Already she had set the serving-woman to her day's task, and had weighed and measured the day's stores; already she had been busy with sundry cooking contrivances to tempt her father's appetite; and had turned the camomile flowers which were drying in the still room, and filtered the "tisane" which Dame Townshend, a sick neighbour, was to profit by. Already she had fed her chickens, and gathered the eggs from the hen-roost; yet, it was early enough to see the grass all diamonded with dew, and the rays of the sun yet shining bright upon the eastern waves.

Poor little motherless Doris! Very lonely she felt at that hour now that her morning duties were over, and it was not yet time to go to her father's bedside to spell through a Psalm to him as was her daily custom. Doris was no scholar, and "the reading" was more of a toil than anything else; but she loved her father dearly, in spite of her occasional waywardness, and to do anything to please him was almost always a pleasure to herself in the end. How he suffered—that patient kind-voiced father—and how he had suffered in those terrible days before Doris was born, when the old house on the hill had been desolated by cruel men working the devil's work in the Name of Christ.

The girl thought of those times as she stood there, watching as she so often watched that pathway through the rye.

Was it worse to meet and grapple with actual pain, she wondered, than to stand safe and helpless while her dearest and best might be dying or dead? Could the old times of torture and of martyrdom be harder to bear than her own bootless wretchedness?

She thought only of herself, and of Robert, whose love was part of herself. The mole hills of her misery hid from her eyes the mountains on the horizon of wider interests and nobler aims. But she was so young, this little Doris; and as yet she had only gathered life's flowers, and basked in its sunshine; and flowers and sunshine, beautiful as they are, do not fulfil all of the needs of the inner or the outer life. The time was coming when she would get some faint idea, some dim understanding of the events which work out the far-reaching plans of God.

DAN LAVIN AND HIS SLOOP.

Of which Divine planning all human knowledge must needs be faint and dim.

This morning, as she searched restlessly over the prospect for sign or sound of the news for which she had spent so many days in watching, she was aware of some unusual stir in the little town. She could see the people gathered like bees on the quay, though, as far as she could tell, no vessel had newly entered the port. How she wished for Earle just then! The boy's long legs would have made short work of the distance; but Earle himself was helping to make up the substance of the "story," whatever it was, that had drifted down to Exmouth from the scene of the great doings against the Spanish invaders. If Doris wished to get tidings from the town she must go thither on her own two feet.

She paused, and hesitated for a minute or two, turning her slender neck, peering and listening like a bird about to take flight. It was not her habit to go down amongst the rude frequenters of the quays, being a creature with much weight of household duty on her youthful shoulders, and having, besides, a sick father to tend and cheer. Furthermore, it was not reckoned seemly in those days for a decorous maiden in the position of Master Clatworthy's daughter to go unattended into the thronged places where gossips congregated and revellers might be making riot.

She never bethought her of her father who would soon be watching for her coming, nor of his anxiety if her usual hour for reading passed without her appearance. For a minute or two she lingered to make sure her eyes did not deceive her, to be certain that there really was something unusual stirring in the town.

And then down the field-path she sped, through the acres of the rye where the poppies' glowing blots of crimson showed gorgeous against the silvery green; across the strip of common where the cotters' cows looked up astonished at the flying vision, and started back, half indignant, from out of her headlong way. Cows are contemplative and mild by nature, and choose to chew their quiet cud unstirred by hurrying steps of thoughtless girls: it is very little indeed to them what any Armada might do!

Just where the street came stretching into the common, with small houses scattering themselves as if humbly and with apologies, in broken dots and lines amidst the green ways, Doris ran right into a group of children who were threading daisies, or moulding the dust-cakes dear to childhood of all countries and centuries. She was rushing too fast to stop herself, and more than one unlucky bairn was rolled amongst the daisies and the dust.

Contrition somewhat sobered her. She stopped to wipe away the tears she had caused, although she was too breathless to have many words of comfort to bestow. But she went onward at a moderate speed, and entered the market-place as composedly as might be.

Her heart was beating as though it would knock a hole in her side, yet it gave a bound that almost suffocated her as she caught the words "great losses," "ships taken and blown into the air"—"Ark-Raleigh, and our own brave men." Which side had lost? Which ships were taken? What had befallen the Ark-Raleigh and her crew?

A mist came over her eyes, and a dulness on her ears. She stood quite still. A sorry gleaner of news, in truth, since she could not so much as gasp forth a question!

Then, suddenly, the clash of bells filled the air: bells swinging and pealing as if the ringers were mad with the joy they caused these iron tongues to fling wide upon the world.

How they rang, those bells! and already over half England like music was echoing. Every hour the sound swelled and spread. Just as the beacon-fires flashing from hill to hill had roused the land to the sense of its danger, so the bells proclaimed England's deliverance—towers and steeples catching the sound in their turn and passing it on over town and shire—the joyful sound of victory.

And now Doris was aware of other meanings in men's words.

It was "Victory," and "brave Sir Francis Drake," and again "Victory." While those there were who reverently doffed their caps, and gave "Glory to God, who had not delivered them over for a prey to the teeth of the foemen."

And the girl drew her hand across her eyes, wondering how she could have failed to see at the very first the glad expression on all faces! Men were handshaking with each other, and laughing into one another's eyes—startled for once, by very joy, out of the sober ways of English reticence.

Back up the field-road ran Doris, her young feet winged now with glad tidings. And even as she ran her ears were filled with the sound of the bells, the broken, irregular chiming, as they thrilled and jangled, and caught themselves into time and tune again, only to fall out once more into most uneven and joyous clangours.

NEWS OF VICTORY.

It was not only for victory they rang, not only because the proud had fallen, and the strong had been discomfited; but it was in thanksgiving for freedom, and for more than freedom—for their honour, and their fatherland, and their faith!

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. VII.

Pick out eight of the words contained in this figure, and arrange them so as to form a Scripture promise.

That	In	For	On
Everlasting	He	Me	Eternal
Not	Hath	Trust	The
Death	Believeth	Of	Life

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. III.—p. 334.—AHITHOPHEL.

1, 2. 2 Sam. xv. 12; 3. xv. 31; 4. xvii. 3; 5. xvii. 8; 6. xxi. 23; 7. xvii. 23.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

"IT WAS THE TIME OF ROSES—WE PLUCKED THEM AS WE PASSED."

No. 1783.—JUNE 30, 1882.

THE LESSON OF THE ROSES.

THEY blossomed on every side. Great trails of "Gloire de Dijon" flung themselves over the cottage walls, laden with pinky buds and pearly blooms, with hearts of delicate gold, coiled up like shells. Clusters of fragile white ones, whose tiny buds flushed with eager anticipation of full fledged life, peeped in at the windows, nestling among their thick foliage. Standards stood, stately and fair, serenely sweet, if somewhat formal; and, in the borders upon every side, great bushes of old-fashioned crimson and white and pink and moss roses made the summer air rich with rare fragrance of bud and full blown flower. Beneath them trailed the little yellow Scotch briar, massed with tiny golden balls, and wide-spread single stars, among prickles and olive hued foliage; while, near the gate, the sweet briar threw out its pale fragile open hearted flowers among its perfumed leaves. The garden would not contain their wealth, it spread out over tangled hedge and rural lane, unprofitably bordered with bramble and briar, where wreaths might toss themselves unheeded in the soft breeze, above the grass, enamelled with blue speedwell and daisy and buttercup and ragwort and vetch.

Petals of those which had flaunted their day wafted slowly down, hardly distinguishable from the new-born white butterflies that spread their yet moist wings to dry in the sun, ere they could commence their joyous flight. "It was the time of roses—we plucked them as we passed."

Shall we weight our pleasure in the lovely flowers by the thought of how frail and short-lived is their beauty? by memories of sweet small hands that have gathered stores of them erst while, and that now lie, pale and quiet for ever, though the roses bloom again as fair as before? Ah, no, no! These joys are meant to be joys for ever, to remind us that Heaven has roses yet sweeter and fairer than these:—that the little hands we love are plucking them maybe even now, in joy that knows no fading. These roses are sweet even when withered and dead; we gather them up in brown heaps, and entomb them in china jars for delight in winter weather; so the memory of those other buds should be enshrined in tender hearts to make pleasant the path to the black river, and radiant golden gate beyond.

Roses! How lovely they are upon childhood's cheeks, in maiden's blush, on the withered cheek of honoured age; they harmonise equally with the flaxen curl, the nut-brown tress, the silver-hued band; they are welcome in the stately palace parterre, in the homely gardens, on the lonely untrimmed hedge. Who is there that does not love them? The princess culls a knot to adorn her dainty dress; the village maiden plucks one to carry with her prayer-book to church. The world-worn, storm-tossed man puts a sweet bud into his button hole to refresh himself as he toils in the close city streets; and the child pulls his baby fingers full, and carries his pinafore heaped with them to his mother. The girl is decked with them for her ball; the bride is crowned with them for her bridal; the strong man lays them on the pillow of the fading invalid to cheer the fainting soul; the bereaved strews them on the mound which marks the resting-place of the beloved one gone before.

They never come amiss, in gaiety or in gloom, among songs or among sighs; to youth or to yearning age.

Carry a bunch of them through the low quarters of a busy town, and see how children, with longing eyes, will shyly venture to beg "Missus, will you give me a flower?" Take a posy to the hospital where pain and suffering lie drearily on each side, and see the weary eyes brighten for a moment as you lay the cool fragrance in the hot feeble fingers. "They mind me of the place I lived in when I was a girl," some one is almost sure to observe.

Have a basket full in your hand when you enter the busy shop in the heart of a town, and notice how the civil shop-walker is almost certain to linger a moment, after placing your chair, to remark upon them; and the girl who serves you will, with the smallest encouragement, say she supposes the country is looking very lovely now.

Should your garden lie in the track of holiday makers from manufacturing districts, and should you cut a few for some pallid hard worked man or woman, you will be repaid with such a glow of gratitude, as goes far to prove your benefaction has been the crowning joy of an unfrequent pleasure.

Has all this no tale to tell, no simple word to teach? The wealth of roses comes but once a year—gather them while ye may—"old time is still a flying." Yes, gather them. The power of giving pleasure comes but seldom too, yet the life that gives no pleasure would be as incomplete as the year in which no roses bloom. Meagre indeed must be that existence which never owns the power of giving pleasure; but it must seize the opportunity when it can, for "old time is still a flying." There is nothing more sad than to stand by the grave of one who will never be missed by those he has left behind; who leaves no one the poorer, no one the drearier, no one the less happy for his loss, to whom has been said the solemn words "Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground?" Far less sad the streaming eye, the heaving breast, the wail, "How can I live without him!"

If our existence is blessed like the rose-tree, with health and beauty and vigour and admiration, will you hug all these delights to your own bosoms, nor give out the fragrance of your enjoyment far and wide to those who cannot share in it, nor own the like?

If our existence is deprived and bare and sad, is there no balm in making others happy, in cheering others' sadness, in brightening other gloomy lives? Say that our power is but small, shall we hide it in a napkin, and bury it in the ground, because God has not seen fit to entrust us with a larger one? It is the berry from the poorest and commonest rose from which the healing conserve is made. The petals of all alike make the delicious pot pourri. The sweet briar fragrance is richer than ever when drenched in showers of rain. The rose-bush blooms more fully this June because the liberal knife cut freely from it last year.

Ah! let us learn the lesson of the roses. Let us make dark places bright where we can. Let us strew sweet petals of beauty and joy among those who cannot attain them else, and so cheer our own sense of loneliness and gloom. The sad, as well as the poor, are ever among us; and, though the roses are in their glory but through June, they bloom among us, more or less, all the year round.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER LI.—THE HOME-COMING.

"HARK, Joan! Hark, Nellie! There are the bells! They must be coming now. Come, Nell! Come, everybody! We must all be there to welcome them!"

Roy sprang up from his post by an open window, and dashed into the hall with Nellie on his heels. The door stood open wide, admitting the somewhat keen blast of blustering autumn wind, but the servants were assembling there fast enough, ready to welcome home the master and his sweet young wife, and no November gale could chill the warm hearts of the loyal retainers. Cold it might be without, yet the sun shone bright and the joyous pealing of the bells came clearly borne to the listening ears through the clear bright air.

The next minute the clatter of horse-hoofs up the drive became audible, then with one hearty, ringing cheer the escort of mounted tenantry reined back of their own accord, and the carriage bearing Marcus Stratford and his young wife to his ancestral home dashed forward alone and drew up at the door.

"Marcus! Muriel!" cried Roy, throwing himself down the steps and upon the carriage door before any servant could anticipate him. "Ah, isn't this something like, having you both home again! Muriel, if you go on growing prettier at the rate you are doing now, you will have to be put in a glass-case soon and labelled 'for ornament only.' Marcus, you look as if wedded happiness suited your complaint! I'm afraid you both heartily wish me at the other end of nowhere, but I'm afraid I'm a hopeless fixture here."

"Dear boy, you do look well!" said Muriel, kissing him with sisterly affection. "Joan must have taken the best care of you. I hope you have not let them go. I want to see her so much again, and Uncle Andrew, too. My little Nellie, how pleased I am to see such roses in your face!"

"Oh, I kept them here fast enough, though Joan did her level best to escape. Here she is to answer for herself. Marcus, you must have the honour of leading your bride in."

He took Muriel's hand with a smile and slight pressure that said more than words; and as she crossed the threshold he just kissed her brow with a whispered, "God bless you, my sweet wife—welcome home!" and she, answering only by a glance and a smile, turned to Joan with a greeting of warm affection.

"It was so good of you to come, and so good of you to stay. It made us quite easy about our boy all this while. And you, Joan, you look better yourself. Your father, I hope, is well, too? This cold does not try him too much?"

"He grows weaker, I think, but he is very happy and content. His mind wanders sometimes, but in no painful way, and he delights in Roy's merry ways and boyish tricks. He always calls him Hubert, though; he lives more in the past than the present."

The old man came out now to see what the bustle was about, and, aroused to partial recollection, greeted Marcus and Muriel by name; but they could see that an interval of three months had aged him perceptibly, and began to fear that another trouble for Joan might not be very far distant.

"Do you hear from your brother often?" asked Muriel, as, the festal first dinner over in her new home, she sat alone with Joan by the blazing fire in the drawing-room.

"I went to see him once whilst you were away. They have got settled into their new house now, and seem a great deal more comfortable there. They have a few friends now that they are in the town, and Mildred, when she is at home, says it is almost cheerful sometimes. She is very much improved, and looks altogether brighter and happier. Her aunt will remain another year in London, and Mildred is to spend a good deal of the time with her cousins, who seem very fond of her. Mrs. Kynaston was so very kind as to send her an invitation for the Christmas holidays. She was delighted. She enjoys the society of young companions immensely, and looks forward greatly to seeing Roy again. I have not room for her, because I want to get Roger and Caroline over if I can at Christmas, if only for a few days. Father asks for them sometimes. I think they ought to see him again."

"Will they come?"

"I hope so; they did not refuse, but they are not much in the way of visiting, and I think they are just a little bit afraid of the proximity of your house. They gave me no final answer; but I said that we should expect them, and I really think it is quite possible that they will come. They do not reproach us for what we have done. I told them about father's failing health, and though they said little I think it touched them a little. We may not have him with us very long now. I should like Roger and his wife to be with us this next Christmas, if they will come."

Muriel looked at her with sympathetic eyes. Joan caught the meaning of the glance and answered quickly.

"Oh, but he is so happy and content that I cannot wish it otherwise—it is so different from anything I used to think of that all the sadness seems taken away. I think it was this weakness coming upon him that first seemed to melt him and soften the hard shell that had grown round him all these years. Then he began to be susceptible to influence and to softer feelings, and the old hardness all melted away. I know what it was that really wrought the change; but I think he would have gone on closing his heart against it had it not been for the physical infirmity that began to steal upon him and weaken the iron force of his will. I shall grieve when he is taken, of course, for I love him more dearly the more dependent he grows; but now I shall not sorrow without hope, and I shall know that with him it is well. Lonely? Myself? No, I do not think I shall ever be that now. I have been in my old life, but here I am surrounded by friends, I have my home which I love better every day, Nellie will always, I think, be more or less my child now, and my work—well I need not say how I love my work, nor how its charm grows on me as I learn more experience, more understanding of it, and of those with whom it brings me into contact. Muriel, to you I can imagine that my life looks colourless and a little dreary; but it is not so to me. I am very happy in it—happier than I once ever thought to be, and I think I am not altogether useless. More than that I do not need to ask. I have enough."

"We can none of us wish for more than that," said Muriel with a smile. "It is not often in this world, I suppose, that two people could say, as we can, that they have all they wish for."

Joan looked quietly intent, and presently said in a low voice almost as if to herself:

"Perhaps it is because we have learned that what God gives us is enough, and that the wish for more brings with it only misery."

In the adjoining room Marcus and Roy were enjoying a talk together—a luxury appreciated to the full by Roy—whilst the old man dosed peacefully by the fire. The home news and the details of the three months' wedding journey had been duly discussed and now other questions were being brought to the fore.

"No, no, Marcus," Roy was saying eagerly, "I have quite got over that foolish discontent. I wish to be guided entirely by you. I will not go anywhere or do anything of which you do not approve."

"But I do approve, my boy, and I always did. I am no advocate of exclusive home training, and I think a university course would be the best thing possible for you. If, as you told me once, your wish for the diplomatic service is changing for one of entering the church, you must go, as a matter of course."

Roy flushed a little.

"I do mean it," he said, "I want to dedicate my life in some way—but I am afraid I shall never be good enough."

"You need not harass yourself with that question, Roy; you are too young yet to take any definite step or resolution, but if the call should come with advancing years, you had better feel yourself prepared to meet it. Your mother's sole objection to your leaving home was grounded upon a slightly exaggerated fear of your guardian's power and probable conduct, and especially of the questions likely to be asked you as to your parentage and antecedents. She had a nervous fear of the effect upon you of hearing the true story, and as the name of Edington is uncommon, and as many shared in the ruin caused by your father's downfall, she felt assured that the truth would be forced home upon you in some very painful way. Her peculiarly tender love for you made her most anxious to spare you, and I pledged myself to carry out her wishes. But, as matters now stand, these objections cease to exist, and she would be the first to desire that your very reasonable wish should be carried out. Moreover, I have made careful inquiries on the subject of your father's failure, and I find that he was less to blame in the matter than your relatives have believed—it is often those nearest of kin who are most hard upon a fallen man—he was too sanguine, too rash in his schemes, and led on by success to heights of ambitious daring. He attempted too much, and at last he lost. The failure unhinged his mind temporarily, and the result you know, but I do not consider that any absolute disgrace rests upon his memory, and though you must always regret his conduct, you need not blush to call yourself his son."

Roy looked up with a flush of glad gratitude.

"You are something like a brother; thank you a thousand times, old fellow. I only wish I may live to redeem the name my father has left me, and make myself worthy of being indeed your kinsman."

CHAPTER LII.—CHRISTMAS.

THE festal Christmas dinner at the Hermitage was over; in the square hall, now a bower of brilliant holly and graceful mistletoe, all the large house party had assembled, and the youngsters were eagerly setting on foot some of those frolicsome games that seem naturally to belong to the season. The Kynastons, together with their popular young guest, Mildred Edington, were all spending this first Christmas in the married home of Marcus and Muriel; the father and mother sat together beside one of the two glowing fires, smiling with well-satisfied contentment at the comely group of well-grown sons and daughters clustered about them. Foremost of these was Muriel, loving and dutiful as ever, both as sister and daughter, yet graced with that nameless charm and simple dignity that sits so graciously upon a young wife who is striving to take up her new position, and blend the new duties with the old in the spirit that actuated her. Father and mother were learning that they had gained a son rather than lost a daughter, and Marcus was showing already in a hundred little unobtrusive ways how good a son he could be.

They had been married six months now; the last part of which had been spent at home in busy, happy usefulness. Roy was with them still, though he was to go to Oxford in January, and his cousins were adopted as cousins not only by Marcus and Muriel, but by the whole of the Kynaston household too. Little Nellie was Lilias's favourite comrade and playmate, and was sharing the visit to the Hermitage, and Mildred, who had been for a week at the Kynaston's before coming to Roy's home, had made her way very fast and was a great favourite already. Happiness had made of her another creature, as it had made of Nellie too.

Christmas had been Christmas in the best sense of the word to all the neighbourhood of which the Hermitage was a sort of centre. How busy Marcus, Muriel, and all her brothers and sisters had been during the past days, to say nothing of their coadjutor Joan Edington, they alone could say; yet their labour of love had in no way fatigued them as it seemed, and as little Lilias whispered to her sister, Christmas had been so much happier because she knew everybody else had spent a nice, happy Christmas too.

It was delightful to all to be assembled again under one roof, and Roy and Marcus were just like brothers to all, adding rather than detracting from the home-like feeling of the house. It was a novelty to the young Kynastons to be actually staying as guests at the Hermitage, and they enjoyed the new experience vastly.

No stranger was of the party, though there was one face they all hoped to have seen at the dinner-table that evening, one face whose absence all had regretted; but even as some words to this effect were passing between the master and mistress of the house, the hall door was opened from without, and two figures appeared both lightly powdered with feathery snow-flakes.

"I have brought her," said Frank Lee's hearty voice. "I looked in half an hour ago, and was charged by Mr. Edington to bring her up, on the principle that late was better than never. May I stay too, Mrs. Stratford? It is so long since I had a good game of blind-man's-buff?"

Muriel smiled a glad assent, and Topsy and Jacko seized on this new recruit with a joyous clamour. Joan went straight up to Muriel, her eyes shining with a strange light of happiness.

"They have come," she said. "I had given them up when it began to grow dusk, but just after dark they came. The trains were so slow and so bad to-day, or they would have arrived earlier. They were tired; but I think our welcome and our home did them good. I was glad to leave them alone with father. The sight of Roger roused him up, and made him more himself, more wide-awake than he often is now. I saw he wanted to talk to him, and I think they will understand each other better without me. So when Mr. Lee offered to bring me here I was glad to come. It is pleasant to see Christmas again. It reminds me of the time when I was a child, and Cousin Alicia used to have a Christmas tree for us. At Windmill House Roy made us one last year. Otherwise, I think we hardly knew when the day came round."

Muriel pressed her hand in sympathy and drew her to a seat beside her near to the other wide fire-place.

"I am so glad, Joan," she answered with glad congratulation, "It seems a time when all feuds should be healed. Does your brother seem changed at all in his feelings?"

"I think so, a little, for he said he should like to see Roy again some time, and was glad, I am sure, that he had got quite strong again. He wondered if your husband would see him, and said with a sort of laugh, that he believed he owed him an apology for several things. It does not sound much, I know; but from Roger it means a good deal."

"I dare say it does, perhaps some day he will be more of a brother to you than before. If Mrs. Edington would like it, I should be so pleased to call upon her. I like her girls very much, she might like to come here some day, and see how popular they are."

Joan smiled, "I think she would like that very much. She has more ambition for her children than for herself."

"That, at least, is something in her favour. I do not wish, nor does Marcus, that Roy's relations should think themselves separated from him, or debarred from seeing him. The guardianship has been formally made over to my husband, but his cousins will always be his friends. He has some very grateful reminiscences of Windmill House, and he is very fond of Mildred and Nellie. Are they going to let the little girl live with you altogether?"

"For the present, yes. Mr. Lee wishes her to do so; and Milly will come and stay with her for a time too when we have room to take them in again."

"Milly has many homes open to her now," answered Muriel, and Joan smiled, thinking how well pleased Caroline would be to see this realisation of her fondest maternal hopes.

Joan was not however permitted to remain long in her quiet corner: Roy came to claim her attention, and to laugh with her over reminiscences of their first introduction (he could look back on those days with a sense of amusement now, tempered with a deeper feeling of thankful gladness) and then the young Kynastons came up with an eager petition that she too would join the game.

Oddly enough this grave, self-contained woman was an immense favourite with the boys and girls of the place, and she was as pleased to receive their attentions as they were to offer them. Perhaps the very fact that she had known no happy, careless girlhood of her own, gave a sort of fascination to that of others. Her childhood had been extinguished, as it were, in a single hour, and the dreary season that followed had little in it of the spring-tide of hope.

The young bright life around her attracted her strangely, and young people were at home with her at once without understanding why. They felt that she was pleased to be with them, that there was nothing forced or feigned in her interest in their pursuits. She liked to learn all about these, and to join in them when she could, and in consequence they loved to include her in their pastimes whenever it was possible to do so.

It was a very different Joan from the pale, indifferent, care-worn woman of twelve months back. She still dressed with scrupulous simplicity and plainness, always in black and always without ornament of any kind; but there was a grace and dignity in her carriage that had a distinct charm of its own, and there was a sense of rest and harmony about her, much more easy to feel than to describe. Her face had gained in depth and purpose, her dark eyes shone with a light of settled resolution and peaceful contentment. No one could pass her by without a second glance. One felt instinctively that she was a woman with a history, and a history it was impossible not to desire to know.

Muriel's eyes often followed her about as she joined for the first time for so many, many years in the merry games of childhood, that the light-hearted boys and girls set on foot. The fun waxed fast and furious, all the party was more or less drawn into the vortex, and Joan perhaps enjoyed the merry tumult more than any one else there, though her laugh was never heard, and her voice hardly ever sounded in the eager clamour of tongues.

Roy was the life and soul of the games; all his old buoyancy of spirit had come back to him, and was none the less bright and winning for the deepened power of seriousness and concentration that had been developed in him by the events of the past months.

"If only his mother could see him now!" said Muriel softly, as she stood with her husband a little apart, watching with shining eyes the merry party around them.

"Perhaps she does," answered Marcus with his thoughtful smile. "I often think that at this season of all others, the veil between the home here and that above grows very thin. I do not think our loved ones are quite excluded from a share in our happiness, or we from a sense of theirs."

"Nor I, indeed," she answered, "how glad and thankful she will be for all, and how proud of her boy!"

"Yes, he has come very nobly through the struggle, and conquered temptation bravely. He will be all the better and stronger a man for the trial through which he has passed."

"I am sure of it," was Muriel's answer. "I am sure that sorrow and trouble are sent in love and not in anger. See what they have done for Joan."

Marcus looked across at the group, singling out the figure indicated.

"Poor Joan," said Muriel softly, "I am afraid there is more trouble in store for her. Her father will hardly last long. Perhaps another Christmas over, he may not be with her."

"Yet happiness is a wonderful medicine," said Marcus, "and he is very happy. Nor do I think, even if he is taken, that Joan need be alone in the world, unless by choice."

Muriel glanced quickly at her husband and across to the spot where Joan stood in earnest conversation with Frank Lee.

"I see what you mean. I have thought the same myself sometimes; but I hardly fancy Joan will ever give up her work and her independence for another kind of life. She is so useful and so much loved, I do not think she will ever feel alone."

"Nor I. I believe whichever vocation she chooses, she will be a happy and a noble-hearted woman, scattering happiness wherever she goes; but when a year or two have passed, and our hopes have, in part at least, been realised as regards our poor and their needs, I cannot help thinking that she may find room in her life and heart for a closer and more personal individual love. We know how sweet that love is, my Muriel. Surely we may wish that it may be God's best gift to others besides ourselves."

She answered by a look; she had no time to speak, for little Lilias came running up to claim her sister's notice.

"Well, little one," said Marcus, lifting her in his strong arms, "has it been a happy Christmas?"

"Oh, so happy. The nicest Christmas we have ever had. Everybody says that, every one of them."

"And why so, pussy? What has made it the nicest?"

A sweet look of gravity crossed the child's face, but the answer came quickly and spontaneously:

"I think because it has been so like what the angels want it to be—'Peace on earth, good will towards men,' Nellie and I were talking about it just now. She says she never understood about that till she spent Christmas here. But she understands now."

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

SOME ANSWERS REVIEWED.

A GRATIFYING proof of the interest which these papers have excited lies before us now in a number of letters, in which our answers to many of the queries are criticised; different solutions of Bible difficulties being in many cases proposed, and other questions raised. We now propose to lay before our readers a selection from these papers, with further comments of our own. A miscellaneous arrangement must needs be adopted, according to the great variety of subjects which our readers have thus discussed.

We take first the interesting and important topic of Christ's DESCENT INTO HADES.[1] A correspondent, "W. G." proposes to interpret the words "Thou wilt not leave my soul (nephesh) in Hades (sheol)" by certain passages in the Law of Moses, and one in Haggai, in which nephesh is applied to a recent corpse (Lev. xix. 28; xxi. 1, 11; xxii. 4; Num. v. 2; vi. 6; ix. 6, 7, 10; Hag. ii. 13). Hence our correspondent understands the declaration to mean, "Thou wilt not leave my corpse in the grave to see corruption." It is not however the case that, apart from one particular connection, nephesh ever signifies a dead body. The phrase, literally meaning "unclean by a soul," is applied by a metonymy to the body from which the soul has recently departed. This is the phrase employed in six of the above nine passages; in two (Lev. xxi. 11; Num. vi. 6) the word for death is added to nephesh, "a soul of death," or "souls of death," i.e. a dead person, or "dead persons;" and in one (Lev. xix. 28), "Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead," the rendering is literally "for a soul," i.e. for the life that has gone from the body. This particular application of the word cannot authorise us to understand it in other connections as itself signifying a dead body. Nephesh occurs in hundreds of places in the Old Testament, and with the above exceptions always means soul, life, self. The possessive form naphshi (my nephesh) cannot possibly be construed my dead body. It may be added that Sheol, although sometimes rendered grave, does not properly mean "sepulchre," the "place of interment," but is the abode of departed souls.

Another much controverted passage is the apostolic reference to being BAPTIZED FOR THE DEAD.[2] On this "S. V. H." sends a quotation which he has found helpful. "'Baptized for the dead' is to become a Christian, with the view fixed on those who have fallen asleep in Christ, and particularly as being slain for Him. The word translated 'for' is frequently used in these Epistles for 'in view of,' 'with reference to.'

"The 29th verse is connected with the 18th, thus: 'Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished . . . . What shall they do which are baptized for the dead, if the dead rise not?' So verses 30–32 relate to the 19th, thus: 'If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable . . . . Why stand we in jeopardy every hour?'" etc.

The connection of the passage indicated in the latter paragraph, seems to us legitimate and beautiful, although it does not quite clear up the difficulty in question. Our correspondent goes on to ask, "May not 'the dead' be translated 'death'?" Hardly so; although to render the phrase "baptized in view of death" would undoubtedly cut the knot. The only possible translation makes "the dead" personal and plural—"those who have died"—in many cases no doubt as martyrs to the faith; and the question returns, "What is it to be baptized in view of, or in reference to these?" Our correspondent goes on to suggest that "to be baptized in those days, i.e. making a public confession of Christianity, was tantamount to a rear-rank man stepping into a front-rank man's place on his being shot down: saying by his baptism 'I am ready to be pitched to the beasts, as those before me have been.' It is like a man enlisting in time of war for active service, in view of being shot—becoming, as the cant phrase is, 'food for powder'—the motive, faithfulness to Christ; the alternative, 'absent from the body, present with the Lord;' the guerdon, 'Well done, good and faithful servant.'" The criticism is at any rate worth attention.

With regard to a very different subject, the NINETY AND NINE JUST PERSONS who need no repentance,[1] "J. J. W." remarks:

"On reading the context I cannot agree with the explanation given. The ninety and nine just persons are compared to the sheep which did not stray at this particular time; surely our Lord would not compare the self-righteous Pharisees to these. The sheep were really safe, and were not so merely in their own imagination.

"I think the just persons are those whose sins have been forgiven, because they have already repented; they are justified by faith. The ninety and nine sheep may have wandered before, and will certainly require watching to prevent their wandering in future. But now they are 'just persons by faith,' they have obtained 'remission of their sins,' they are 'justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus.'"

Our readers will judge of this for themselves. To bring in the idea of justification by faith, seems to us pressing the words of our Lord beyond their obvious intention, which, we still think, was to take the Pharisees at their self-valuation.

We conclude for the present with an Old Testament question. In reference to the difficulty respecting the early intercourse between SAUL and DAVID[1] "G. S. L." writes that only one of the apparent discrepancies has been met (1 Samuel xvi. xvii. xviii.)

[1] See SUNDAY AT HOME, April, 1888, pp. 238, 9.
[2] See SUNDAY AT HOME, Sept. 1887, p. 589.

[1] SUNDAY AT HOME, March, 1888, p. 141.

In the sixteenth chapter, David is not only described as an experienced warrior, but it is stated that he repaired to the court of Saul, and ingratiated himself with the king; he must consequently have been well known personally to Saul and all his servants; while in the seventeenth chapter Saul is said not to have known who David was, and Abner the chief captain is equally ignorant. It seems to me that this inconsistency may be solved by transposing the two chapters, and supposing the events narrated in ch. xvii. to have occurred before those mentioned in ch. xvi.

But here another difficulty suggests itself. In ch. xvi., the events of which according to this theory were subsequent to those narrated in chs. xvii., xviii., David has risen high in Saul's favour, and been appointed his armour-bearer. But in the two chapters last mentioned, the events of which according to the same hypothesis preceded the history in ch. xvi., Saul is stated to have conceived a fierce hatred against David immediately after the death of Goliath, on account of greater prowess having been ascribed to David in the songs of the women out of all the cities of Israel. In ch. xviii. 10, 11, it is stated that on the morrow (that is, I conceive, on the morrow after the battle) Saul made the first attempt on David's life. How is this discrepancy to be explained?

It is certainly hard to believe that the youth who had already been Saul's armour-bearer was the ruddy shepherd lad, unpractised in the use of arms, who slew Goliath with sling and stone, and concerning whom the king said to Abner, "Inquire who this stripling is." This may be fairly acknowledged, and yet any attempt to transpose the incidents, as it seems to us, leads into difficulties yet greater. The occurrences after the death of Goliath are consecutively told. When David returned from the encounter, he was brought to Saul by Abner; at the end of the interview between the king and the stripling, Jonathan was attracted to David, and their friendship began. "Saul took David that day, and would let him go no more home to his father's house." Saul at once makes him a general in his army; then the king's jealousy is excited by the songs of the women; this rises almost immediately to frenzy, he makes an attempt upon David's life, then removes him from the court and makes him "captain over a thousand." There is absolutely no place in all this history for the incidents related xvi. 14, 23: and, notwithstanding the difficulties of the case, it would appear that these must have preceded the combat with Goliath. Two suggestions will make the sequence of events somewhat easier to understand. One is that the statement "David became Saul's armour-bearer" (xvi. 21), is inserted by way of anticipation. When first called to court he was but a minstrel-lad, the historian adding, in the account of this, that he became an armour-bearer afterwards. The other suggestion is that, during the interval which elapsed between David's first summons to court and his victory over Goliath, Saul had actually forgotten the son of Jesse. That which had happened to the king in the days of his mania became a blank in his memory. No student of mental disease would pronounce this to have been impossible. David had returned to his sheepfold, and came to Saul a second time, as a stranger. This seems on the whole the likeliest hypothesis; but the case is one of those in which, not knowing all the facts, we are necessarily left to conjecture.

[1] See paper by Mr. J. Inglis, SUNDAY AT HOME, Nov. 1887, p. 717.

A.B. writes: "I should be grateful for an explanation of the apparent contradiction between Acts vii. 22: 'Moses was . . . mighty in words and in deeds,' and Exodus iv. 10: 'Moses said unto the Lord, O my Lord, I am not eloquent, but I am slow of speech, and of a slow tongue.'"

It might be sufficient to reply that the passage in Exodus gives the estimate which Moses had of himself, that in Acts the estimate which Stephen had of Moses. Yet, in fact, a man may be "mighty in word" without being what is generally termed eloquent. Great and memorable words have often been spoken with hesitating speech and stammering tongue. Moses very probably was not fluent or ready in expression. Aaron might be the orator; but the utterances of Moses had something more in them than eloquence. Many instances might be given from ancient and modern history of power in speech when the words have been halting and slow, with a meaning and a purpose behind them that have made them far outweigh the rhetorician's most sounding periods.

M. E. P.[1] writes: "Will you kindly give an explanation of Rev. xxi. 8. Why are the 'fearful' classed with murderers, etc.?"

There is undoubtedly a fearfulness that is an infirmity rather than a sin; but there is a cowardice which is base and infamous. The reference is not to such as "Mr. Fearing" in the Pilgrim's Progress; but to persons who were led by fear of men to forswear their faith, thus incurring the condemnation of apostates. It was especially needful in days of persecution to show that "cowards" must be classed with the "unbelieving" and with "liars." They renounced the hope of heaven for fear of what they might have to endure on earth, and their doom was in reality self-chosen. A human analogy may be found in the infamy attached to a soldier's desertion in the face of an enemy.

[1] For an explanation, also requested, of Luke xvi. 9, we would refer our correspondent to the SUNDAY AT HOME, for 1887, p. 204.

A Hymn for Nightfall.

O GOD of ages, in Whose light
  The darkness as the dawn appears,
Before whose clear, unclouded sight
  One day is as a thousand years,
Once more at eventide we come
To find in Thee our rest and home.

Like shadows drifting o'er the hills,
  Like waves that vanish on the shore,
Our little life its course fulfils,
  Our days speed on and are no more;
With Thee eternal glories shine,
Unchanged, unchanging and divine!

From Thee are all the joys we know,
  All gladness in Thy presence springs;
By night or day we cannot go
  Beyond the shadow of Thy wings,
Our midnight and our noonday prove
How safe the shelter of Thy love.

Grant now, we pray, for Jesu's sake,
  Such blessing as Thou deemest best;
To hands that droop and hearts that ache
  Vouchsafe the comforts of Thy rest;
Speak peace to those who wake and weep,
And give to Thy beloved sleep.

Reach out Thy guiding hand, O Lord,
  To those who wander from Thy ways,
By Thy great wealth of love outpoured
  Constrain and keep us all our days,
Till, in life's eventide, we come
To find in Thee our heaven and home!

MARY ROWLES.

THE LAST DAYS OF HANDEL.

FOR a considerable time before his death Handel was afflicted with blindness, and was in feeble health, compared with the vigour and energy of his former days. Yet he continued to labour to the end. In 'The Public Advertiser' of April 5th, 1759, there is an announcement of a performance of the Messiah "for the last time this season." There had been nine performances since the opening of the season on March 2nd, all of which had been under his personal direction. In the year previous he had felt himself "declining apace," as he said to a friend. After the performance of the 6th April he felt faint, and on his return home he was placed in the bed from which he never rose.

The few remaining days he spent in pious preparation for the great change which he knew was approaching. He had not left till then his preparation for death. Sir John Hawkins tells how he used to attend divine service in his own parish church, St. George's, Hanover Square; and how he and others saw the half-blind old man "on his knees, expressing by his looks and gesticulations the utmost fervour of devotion."

This blindness had been coming upon him for some time past.

Mr. Sharp, his surgeon-oculist, having asked him if he was able to continue playing the organ in the performance of the oratorios, Handel answered in the negative. Sharp recommended the blind organist Stanley, as one whose memory never failed; upon that Handel said, with a laugh, "Mr. Sharp, have you never read the Scripture, if the blind lead the blind, they will both fall into the ditch?"

He sent for John Christopher Smith, son of his early friend Schmidt or Smith, the son he had himself trained from youth. When Smith played the organ, during the first season of Handel's blindness, Samson was performed, and Beard sang with great feeling,

> "Total eclipse—no sun, no moon,
> All dark amid the blaze of noon."

The reflection that Handel had set this air to music, and was now sitting by the organ blind, so affected the audience that they were moved to tears.

Although no longer able to preside at the oratorios, he still introduced concertos on the organ between the acts. Sometimes he played from memory, at other times he relied on his ready and inventive imagination, charming the audience by his voluntaries. It was a touching sight when, in response to the applause of the audience, he was led to the front of the stage to make an obeisance of acknowledgment.

Not long before his death, the good Countess of Huntingdon went to see Handel, at his own particular request. In a letter she refers to this visit. "I have had a most pleasing interview with Handel,—an interview which I shall not soon forget. He is now old, and at the close of his long career; yet he is not dismayed at the prospect before him. Blessed be God for the comforts and consolations which the Gospel affords in every situation and in every time of our need. Mr. Madan has been with him often, and he seems much attached to him."

In his early career in London, Handel had conducted concerts at the house of the Earl of Huntingdon, as he had also at the Earl of Burlington's, the Duke of Rutland's, and the houses of others of the nobility. Lady Huntingdon was a good judge of music, and was well acquainted with the eminent composers and performers of that time. Giardini, the first violin player in Europe, was also a favourite with Lady Huntingdon, who got him to compose some tunes for the hymn-book used in her chapels. Horace Walpole refers to this when he says:—"It will be a great acquisition to the Methodist sect to have their hymns set by Giardini." In Handel's career Lady Huntingdon had always taken lively interest, especially after he confined his attention to sacred music. We can imagine the pleasure she felt in hearing of the solid and rational piety of his later years, and can understand the satisfaction expressed as to the interview with him. To Mr. Madan and others he often spoke, in these closing days, of the delight he had experienced in setting to music the sublime passages of Scripture; and said how much comfort he then found in those Psalms which suited his condition and feelings.

John Christopher Smith tells that about three weeks before Handel's death he desired him to receive the sacrament with him; Smith asked him how he could join in the communion when he was not at peace with all the world, and especially when he harboured an ill-feeling towards Smith's father, Handel's oldest friend. At Tunbridge Wells, four years before, they had quarrelled, and in disputing, Smith senior had left Handel in an abrupt manner. This so vexed him that he declared he would never see him or speak to him again. Friends interfered to effect a reconciliation, but the offence was only partially forgiven. The younger Smith was with him one day, when Handel took him by the hand and said he was determined to substitute his name for that of his father in his will. Smith declared that if he persisted in that resolution he must leave him, and could no more assist in the oratorios. "What would the world think," he added, "if you put aside my father and leave his promised legacy to me? They will suppose that I tried and succeeded in supplanting my father for my own advantage." It was to this quarrel that he alluded when asked to join Handel at the Holy Communion. Already he had been persuaded by the son's remonstrances as to altering the will. And now, on being faithfully appealed to, and reminded of the necessity of making his peace with all men, Handel was so affected as to express his wish for complete reconciliation, and warmly received his old friend to his heart. He did alter his will, but it was to increase the legacy from £1000 to £2400. He felt how wrong it was for one offence, however great, to forget the affectionate and faithful companionship of thirty years.

The end came on Friday, the 13th of April, only eight days after he had last directed the performance of the Messiah. On the 11th he had added a short codicil to his will, and signed it himself.

Some discussion has taken place about the exact time of his decease, but the testimony of Dr. Warren, the physician, is decisive. He had expressed a wish to depart on the day of the Passion, and Dr. Warren says that he died before midnight on Good Friday, April 13th, 1759. The burial, in Westminster Abbey, took place on Friday night, the 20th, a vast concourse of people being present. The monument, in Poets' Corner, was erected in July, 1762.

The latest and best biographer of Handel, W. S. Rockstro, in speaking of Handel's early compositions, refers to "the never-failing presence of the religious element." It is in the chapter of his book describing the sacred pieces composed when Handel was director of music for the chapel at Cannons, now the parish church of Whitchurch, Middlesex. The first English oratorio, "Esther," was produced at this time, the first performance being on the 20th of August, 1720.

During many years other themes occupied his time, but in the latter years of his life he devoted his talents and labours wholly to sacred music. It would have been well for his own comfort, as well as for his fame, if he had sooner abandoned Opera for Oratorio. He would have been spared endless trouble and anxiety, as well as great pecuniary losses; and have been deterred from speculations, ruinous to his peace and injurious to his health. In the busiest times of his active life, and amidst the greatest temptations and distractions of the world, he never lost the influence of the early training of his pious mother, the daughter of a worthy Lutheran pastor. The character formed by her pains and prayers proved a protection to him in prosperity, and a comfort in adversity; and the blessing of Providence rested on him in the evening of his days. When he finally resolved to confine himself to sacred music, he said it was "better suited to a man descending in the vale of years." Whatever his immediate motives were in abandoning the lyric drama, his prosperity from that time returned.

It was at Dublin, in 1741, that the first performance of the "Messiah" took place. Dr. Beattie, author of the 'Minstrel' and the 'Essay on Truth,' records an interesting anecdote told him by the Earl of Kinnoul. Calling on Handel a few days after the first performance, he naturally paid him some compliments on "the success of the noble entertainment which he had given the public." "My Lord," said Handel, "I should be sorry if I only entertained them, I wish to make them better."

If regarded as "entertainments" there is force in the objection felt by many people to the performance of oratorios, even for charitable purposes. But it is scarcely fair to leave out of view the higher design and nobler feeling by which many are animated in regard to oratorios. In this supreme case of the "Messiah," it is known to every one that it was written by Handel in the most devout and reverent spirit. Miss Hawkins, in her Anecdotes, tells that Handel being questioned as to his ideas and feelings when composing the Hallelujah Chorus, replied, in his imperfect English, "I did think I did see all heaven before me, and the great God Himself." While he was composing, his emotion was so great that he would burst into tears. It is recorded that a friend, calling on him when in the act of setting these pathetic words, "He was despised, and rejected of men," found him absolutely sobbing. "I have heard it related," says Shield, in his Introduction to Harmony, "that when Handel's servant used to bring him his chocolate in the morning he often stood with silent astonishment to see his master's tears mixing with the ink, as he penned his divine notes." A still more touching proof that this feeling was deeper than any artistic enthusiasm or transient sentiment, we have in a letter written by the composer from Dublin (Dec. 29, 1741), to Charles Jennens, who had selected the words for the libretto: "It was with the greatest pleasure I saw the continuation of your kindness by the lines you was pleased to send me, in order to be prefixed to your oratorio, Messiah, which I set to music before I left England." The lines or mottoes here referred to as being welcomed with pleasure, were these: (1) majora canamus (let us sing of loftier themes); (2) the text, "And without controversy great is the mystery of godliness: God was manifest in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory" (1 Tim. iii. 16); (3) "In whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge" (Colos. ii. 3).

The thankful and joyful adoption of these mottoes surely shows the thoughtful appreciation of the subject of the oratorio by the great composer. We know also that some of the leading performers were of kindred spirit with their chief, not only as to art, but in the pleasure of being associated with him in the charitable purposes to which he was always ready to consecrate his talents. His liberal kindness towards the Foundling Hospital, the Society of the Sons of the Clergy, the City of London Lying-in Hospital, and other charitable institutions, is well known, and he was heartily supported in these performances by some of the first artists of the time.

Amidst the vast audiences there must also always have been many who sought and found more than artistic pleasure in the music. There must have been many who sympathised with the feeling expressed in these lines:

> These hallowed lays to music give new grace,
> To virtue awe, and sanctify the place;
> To harmony like his celestial power is given,
> To exalt the soul from earth, and raise the thoughts to heaven.

May there be ever increasing numbers of those who are thus worthily impressed by the majestic strains of Handel!

JAMES MACAULAY, M.D.

IN THE DAYS OF THE GREAT ARMADA.

CHAPTER VI.

ELIZABETH AT TILBURY.

"THAT hideous tempest which so thundered and threatened out of Spain"—to use the term of the old writer before quoted—did not die down into harmless quiet all at once.

The terror of the Spanish fleet lasted intensely all the time that the Duke of Medina kept on his way, for who could tell that he would not make good his plan of joining the Duke of Parma off the Netherlands, and yet succeed in throwing the united armies upon the English coast?

Queen Elizabeth had given her fleet into the hands of her captains tried and true, but she reserved the control of her army for herself.

The nominal commandant was Robert, Earl of Leicester; a man who, while clever enough at marshalling tournaments and warlike pageants, had not come off with much glory from his solitary experience in real soldiering. The queen, though she was foolishly fond of this bad, untrustworthy man, had no idea of trusting the honour of England in his hands at this crisis. She knew that her handful of troops, undisciplined, and hastily raised as they mostly were, could ill stand the onslaught of so formidable a foe. But she knew that every man of them was aware of the issues at stake; she knew they would fight "as long as they could see or stand."

She rode down the ranks one morning—the very morning that Drake's guns were pounding away at the Armada then rounding Beachy Head—and many historians have loved to tell how her army welcomed their stout-hearted liege-lady.

She forbade her retinue to follow her, and with only Leicester bearing the sword of state at her side, and a page boy following her with her plumed helmet, she rode along the lines amidst the rapturous applause of the soldiery.

She was fifty-five years old, and had ruled England for thirty years. Age had faded her youthful beauty, and cares had furrowed her brow, but her piercing eye was as full of fire as ever it had been, her tall figure as erect and queenly. She looked, every inch, what the daughter of the long line of England's kings should be, and as royal as any Plantagenet of them all!

The words she spoke that day have been conned over and over by every boy and girl who has read their history; but they are noble words, and will bear a good deal of re-reading.

"My loving people," said she, "we have been persuaded by some that are careful of our safety to take heed how we commit ourselves to armed multitudes, for fear of treachery. Let tyrants fear! I place, under God, my chiefest strength and safeguard in the loyal hearts of my subjects. And therefore am I come among you at this time, not for my recreation or disport, but being resolved, in the midst and heat of the battle, to live or to die amongst you all—to lay down, for God and my kingdoms, my honour and my blood in the dust. I know that I have the body of a weak, feeble woman, but I have the heart of a king—and of a king of England, too! And I think foul scorn that Parma, or Spain, or any prince of Europe should dare invade the borders of my realm; to which, rather than any dishonour shall grow by me, I myself will take up arms! I myself will be your general, judge, and rewarder. Not doubting but by your obedience to my generals, your concord in the camp, and your valour in the field, we shall shortly have a famous victory over these enemies of my God, of my kingdoms, and of my people."

Was it any wonder that the shouts that rent the air were long and loud? Was it any marvel that, one and all, those men resolved to die for such a cause, for such a queen?

But it was not the queen and the army that won the victory. That was left for Effingham, Drake, and their seamen; for the crews of the ships that fought on, day after day, untiringly, from the Start to Calais-roads.

There were many gallant deeds done in that stretch of blue water. On the twenty-fifth, off the Needles, the Santa Anna, a galleon from Portugal, had her main-mast shot away, and fell behind her consorts. Three small English ships surrounded her, and cannonaded her with tremendous effect until a detachment of the enemy turned to the rescue.

"By towing," rejoined Robert. "We have strength enough, surely; and our ships are but light compared with those yonder. We might easily tow them just where your lordship desires them to be."

The admiral turned his pair of splendid black eyes full on Robert, and his glance spoke volumes although no word said he, at least, to him just then. But presently the order was given, and Lord Thomas had to stop his stamping rage, and get the Golden Lion forward by the help of the strong arms of her crew, and three or four stout hawsers from her bows.

And the end of that affair was that the English "spurs" struck home again, while the "great shot" of the Spaniards whistled yards too high to work much harm; though when the vessels came to close quarters the Spanish and the admiral in the Ark-Raleigh came to the help of his ships. Then the wind fell.

THE FIRE-SHIPS.

So great was the calm that there lay the big Spaniard, motionless on the water, and there lay the English, just out of gun-range, as helpless, seemingly, as their foes; while, still feeling the breeze, the Armada and its pursuers went sailing, hull down, towards the horizon.

Effingham, the courteous admiral, bit his lips, and held his peace. His kinsman, Lord Thomas Howard, raged and tore not two cables' length away, in his ship the Golden Lion. It was maddening to lie with flapping sails, on an oily sea, almost within hailing distance of their enemies.

"The boats, my lord, the boats might do it." So spoke Robert Bulteel.

"Boats' crews board those floating castles? scarcely so, I think," returned Effingham, measuring with his eye the towering Spanish galleons, whose decks and turrets were crowded with armed men, visible enough, although out of reach.

musketeers galled the English terribly. But notwithstanding this the Santa Anna fell a prize to Howard in spite of all that her unwieldy consorts could do to protect her.

That night Robert Bulteel lay in his berth faint and pallid, but a proud-hearted man! The admiral had knighted him with his own good sword, as he had his sovereign's special commission to do, "in reward for acts of signal valour." He was "Sir Robert Bulteel," but he had a musket-ball in the left shoulder, and had been drained of half the blood in his body.

He had pulled an oar in the foremost boat, and so had earned his honours and his wound: and earned also a few quiet words of Effingham's praise, words which pleased him more just then than the touch of the sword on his shoulder, or the sound of the unwonted title. For Howard of Effingham had that great secret of success as a commander—the power of winning the enthusiastic love of all who served under his flag.

He had also the kindred gift of remembrance of small things, of words and faces.

He had not forgotten Dan Lavin, and his sloop, the Saucy Susan.

On the 27th of July, the Spaniards had made good their way as far as Calais. Here in as sheltered a position as he could find the Duke of Medina cast anchor.

He wanted a little breathing space: a little time to refit and repair damages. He sent messengers to Parma, bidding him to put to sea with his army, "which the Spanish fleet would protect as it were under her wings till it were landed in England."

There just off the French coast lay the "Invincible Armada;" looking splendid and powerful enough yet for the conquest of all Britain in spite of what Effingham and his sea-dogs had done against it, the silken banners still flew in the wind, the gilding upon the prows and "towers" was as bright as ever it had been. The San Mattio, the Santa Anna, and two or three frigates had been lost it is true, but King Philip must have expected to pay some price for the gratification of his darling ambition:—the conquest of England could scarcely be a costless game.

So the Duke of Medina ranged and rearranged his floating castles there in the narrow seas; looking meanwhile at the cliffs of Kent white and fair in the morning sun; and glancing, not quite so contentedly, at the vessels of Effingham's fleet which were lying well in sight. The English also were pausing to gather up their strength for the last struggle, the greatest and most terrible of all.

It was then that the English admiral remembered Dan Lavin's shout, "Set her a-fire, my lord! Her cargo of pitch will prove a torch for the rest to dance to."

The Saucy Susan and a few other such small craft, blazing "fathoms high" as Lavin had said, would prove very pretty emissaries against that wall of anchored galleons.

It was worth thinking about. Many a time, in former sea-fights, had fire-ships done good work; why not try them now?

Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, Cecil, Howard, and a few other of the leading captains were summoned on board the Ark-Raleigh. It must have been a fine sight to see those ardent and war-worn men holding conference, while the issues of events yet hung in so ticklish a balance. They were making English history there; and perhaps they knew it!—although, more likely in their simple, honest souls, they thought only of doing the work they had to do, and cared very little for anything just then, but their ships, the Spaniards, and the queen.

The wind blew fresh west-north-west; there were ugly-looking clouds lurking low on the edge of the sea. "A gale," said more than one sailor to his mate, as he marked the sky-signs, and heard the uneasy rattle of the rigging above his head. "A battle and a gale together! well, our tight craft will walk through it better than the strangers yonder, with those high-sided tubs of theirs. But the night looks awkward."

And presently it looked more awkward still.

Eight of the smallest of the English fleet were being crammed with every attainable combustible; pitch, rosin, brimstone, oil, anything and everything that would flare and flame in the strong and rising wind.

And then Lavin—with Earle Clatworthy in his boat—and the owners and captains of the rest, got out their hawsers, and towed these eight exactly to windward of the centre of the great block of blackness, out of which the Spanish masts rose like reeds by the river-side.

Then at midnight, when silence had sunk over the shore and the sea, suddenly as with one flash, the saturated ships burst into light and flame.

Higher and higher the red tongues reached, wrapping mast and spar in their fiery cloak, licking up the shrivelling rigging with their fierce breath. Dan Lavin was right, a cargo of pitch-pine and tar can burn and blaze, and hold a torch that can light up very wonderful "dancing" indeed.

Nearer and nearer, drifting full upon the Spanish fleet, those fire-ships came driven fast and furious by the wind. Dense volumes of smoke rolled low upon the waves, and through and above that smoke the fire-tongues leapt and sprang. Surely a more awful onslaught than any that Effingham and all his crews had managed to make from Plymouth to Dungeness!

Far and wide the blaze was reflected; the waves themselves seemed tipped with fire; the low clouds caught the blood-red hue. And through the smoke and fire came, hot and fast, the English cannonade.

The Ark-Raleigh, the Golden Lion, the Bear, the Mary Rose, and a score of other British ships were speaking again, death and destruction in every roar from their hoarse iron throats. The night was hideous with this noisy storm of fire and shot. The Spaniards were roused in earnest now.

In vain the cumbrous craft strove to weigh anchor with all speed; the haste and confusion threw them against the very danger they sought to avoid. The flaring sides of the Saucy Susan scorched more than one gilded galleon, and sent them crashing one against another in a panic of fear and dismay. Cables were cut, and anchors lost, and the great outcry drowned all orders, making the few cool heads and courageous hearts as helpless as the terrified crowd that tugged madly at ropes, and strove to shake out sails.

And moment by moment the storm rose. Louder and louder the wind moaned and howled. On their lee were the shoals and shallows of the French shore; and ever nearer and faster came the fiery squadron, and the savage cannon-mouths of the English broadsides.

What could Medina do but fly before the howling tempest that had burst on him?

More than one of his great galleons went ashore there and then, presently to be boarded and taken by the foe—the crews and soldiers slain, and the treasure and stores pillaged. But the bulk of the huge Armada got clear of the shallows into the wider waters of the North Sea. And there the full force of the gale fell on the devoted ships.

"Let them go," said Effingham, when the dawn showed him fully what had befallen. "Their hearts have failed them. They will trouble England no more."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

ON THE HEROINES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

NO. XIII.

Back through the centuries, as in a glass
We see her still,
Sitting at Jesus' feet, and of His words
Drinking her fill.
O meek-eyed chooser of the better part!
God's wondrous plan
Of love, hath surely been reveal'd to thee,
Who seest the God in man.

1. Sav'd by the daughter of thine enemy;
Thy mother wages earn'd for tending thee.

2. It falls! It sinks 'neath waters dark and cool!
"Alas, my master! 'Twas a borrowed tool!"

3. Forget not thou the sign! Midst deadly strife,
A slender scarlet line shall save thy life.

4. God said to Abraham, His favoured one:
"At this set time, Sarah shall have a son." M. E. R.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE Upper House of the Convocation of Canterbury has appointed a committee to consider what new organisation may be needful to enable the church to reach those classes of the population now outside its ministrations. The Bishop of Rochester, who has known South London for more than thirty years, speaking on this subject, bore testimony that never were wiser or better efforts put forth than now, though there is an immense amount of work yet to be done. In many populous places the parochial system had disappeared owing to the unreasonable calls, religious and secular, made on the clergy, who were in consequence unable to do their duties in the way they would like. There had been sporadic efforts going on to evangelize the people, some of a character which drew forth their sympathy, but to which they could not give the concurrence of their judgment and co-operation. The most important movement of the last few years, he thought, was in the direction of what might perhaps be found the best way of approaching those who were outside religious ministrations—he meant the movement by certain public schools and colleges of both Universities for planting settlements in various parts of London, where the spectacle was presented day by day to the people living around them of continuous sympathy, religious life, devotion, and sacrifice. There was also an important experiment going on at All Hallows, Barking, under Canon Mason. In his own diocese he had seven mission stations, maintained at the expense of several colleges and a public school; and they were resuscitating on a new basis the Wilberforce Mission, in South London. He hoped he was not foolish, but he had had long brooding in his mind the conception of a new church brotherhood, to consist of men and women—he said nothing of vows or of details—who should be willing to go and live among the people themselves. He believed it was true that the world was saved by individuals, but when individuals were living together in the manner contemplated, their enthusiasm was more lasting and their perseverance greater. It was in his opinion of immense social benefit that all classes should be included in this kind of work, and he was pleased to be able to state that in one of the South London parishes some young clerks had taken a house where they met and did church work. The Bishop of Chichester remarked that though there were many sources of anxiety, it was solacing to know that fresh life, and life of the very best kind—unpretending, spiritual, energetic life—was showing itself in every possible form.

THE infallible head of the Romish church has made a strange blunder. A book which had received the blessing and approval of the "Holy See" has been found, on further consideration, to be dangerous, and therefore has been remitted to the Index Expurgatorius, or catalogue of condemned works. The story may be told in a few sentences. Colonel Henry Lasserre, an officer of artillery in the French army, was recommended by his friend M. Freycinet to go to Lourdes for cure of weak eyes. He came back better, just as the gouty London alderman came back better when Abernethy sent him on a journey to Inverness, to consult a Doctor Aire, famed in the Highlands. Colonel Lasserre was a devout man, and believed that his cure was due to the miraculous potency of the waters in the cave of the Virgin at Lourdes. He wrote a book called "Our Lady of Lourdes," the style of which was so charming that the fame of the book and its author and of Lourdes spread everywhere. In fact that book was the "making" of Lourdes. After returning to Paris a copy of the Gospels came into the hands of the colonel. He knew nothing of the story of Jesus Christ, except from the passages used in the service book. He was so delighted and surprised by the narrative that he resolved to make a translation from the original Greek, for he was a classical scholar as well as a charming writer. The result was that the French people got the "old old story" told in the brilliant and picturesque style familiar to the faithful in the glowing pages of "Notre Dame de Lourdes." Edition after edition was sold, some of them cheap, others with splendid illustrations in costly form, till above 100,000 copies were in circulation. The Archbishop of Paris had given his imprimatur, and the Pope gave his sanction and his blessing. But the Jesuits or other enemies of the gospel took alarm, and induced the Pope to issue a decree placing Lasserre's version of the four Gospels in the index of forbidden books. So effectual was this decree that the book vanished from circulation, and it was only after a careful search that a copy was obtained by Dr. Wright of the Bible Society, who tells all this strange story in the "Contemporary Review" for May.

LARGE numbers of pilgrims have visited Rome this spring—not only has the Pope again celebrated Mass in St. Peter's, but he has given audiences, and made short speeches to the various groups, who according to their nationalities have presented gifts. A large contingent of Polish pilgrims brought rich offerings, but it is said that their visit has been marred by a serious controversy. A concordat with Russia has been negotiated on condition, as the Czar insists, that the Russian language be used in all ecclesiastical functions. The Poles have taken umbrage and declare that rather than renounce Latin and their own language they will form a separate church.

THE attitude of Russia in this matter may be better understood from the fact that after the close of the present year no Lutheran minister in Riga, Revel, and other towns on the Baltic, will be allowed to conduct service in the German language. As the inhabitants mostly speak German, this decree involves great hardship. Another indication of the temper which reigns in Russia appears in the stop suddenly put, without warning, to the operations of the American Bible Society, in the Baltic.

THE Protestant pastor at Malaga, Senor J. M. Villa, has been condemned to two years' imprisonment, and a heavy fine, for the publication of a reply to a violent pamphlet by a priest against the evangelical movement. Senor Villa has appealed to the Supreme Court at Madrid. He had dared to assert that the manger out of which the priest's horse ate, and the image of the Virgin of Sorrows, were made out of the same timber, and had one as much virtue as the other. The pastor has popular sympathy very largely with him, and has had crowded services since the trial. From Seville, on the other hand, we hear that there is now no open persecution. Two reformed congregations worship in comparative security in that city—one, occupying the very church where are the tombs of the Inquisitors, the other worshipping in part of the Church of the Ascension, where the Church of England services are also carried on. Both of these congregations are presided over by Spanish pastors, who are doing good work. The services are liturgical, the liturgy in use being based on that of the ancient Morarabic Church of Spain. In all the essentials, the Reformed Spanish Church is at one with the Church of England. The same organisation is adopted as far as possible as is in use in an English parish.

WHILE tidings from Mr. Stanley are awaited with growing anxiety, the aspect of affairs in Central Africa is gradually changing. There, as elsewhere, missionary interests are in danger of being involved in commercial and political questions. The jealousy of the natives also has been aroused by recent arrangements; and the hostilities of the slave-dealers become more aggressive as they find their opportunities becoming more limited. Recent attacks on the mission-stations show a new peril. Meanwhile the Portuguese are advancing impossible claims. Portugal and Germany have partitioned a large tract of territory to the north of the Zambesi. On the strength of possession Portugal asserts a right to block the navigation of that river. Thus, evangelisation and commerce are alike in danger. A deputation from Scotland has recently laid the facts before the premier, and other steps have been taken to arouse attention to the necessity of action. Thirty years since Lord Clarendon gave the express sanction and countenance of the Government to British missions and British trade in the Nyassa region. Both have been pursued with energy, with good results, and with auspicious promise. Both have now been subjected to unwarrantable molestation. It is stated that the Government have spent 30,000*l.* in that part of the world; the English Universities Mission 50,000*l.*; the Scottish Missions double that sum; the African Lakes Company—the headquarters of which are at Glasgow, and the operations whereof have been carried on in a style which links intercourse, industry, commerce, arts, and the useful sciences with Christian influences, as, unhappily, they have not been always linked—double that again. The questions now raised cannot be permitted to slumber.

THE intertribal war on the south-east coast of Madagascar has ended. "By a little prayerfully directed persuasion and advice," says Mr. Shaw, "I have induced some three of the tribes and their chiefs to make an alliance (according to their custom, by blood), and to agree that they will not only never fight again, but do their utmost to prevent war among any of the neighbouring tribes. They are three powerful tribes, and, I believe, if they chose to exercise their influence with a little pressure, they would be able to prevent war in this part of the country. By attending to the sick and wounded, who have come to me at the rate of fifty a day, I have been able not only to establish the fact that we have come to help them, but also have become known far and wide as a teacher and not a trader. The war has been a serious affair indeed for the vanquished. Many hundreds have been killed (the exact number is not yet known), and about 700 have been taken captive to be sold as slaves on the West Coast. However, 130 of these have been recovered by the Hovas, who, although doing absolutely nothing to prevent or stop the war, evinced an extraordinary anxiety and developed a wonderful amount of energy in recovering the captives. With regard to ourselves, we had twice to pack up in haste and hurry across the lagoon, because of threatened attacks on that part of the town in which we were then living. We are now staying in a native-built house belonging to a Creole on the north side of the Mànambàto. I have been visiting many of the villages around and along the banks of the rivers, as also Ambòhipèno, Imàhamànina and their vicinities. Everywhere the people seem inclined to be friendly."

AN illustration of quiet growth is afforded in a letter from the Rev. W. D. Rowland, of the China Inland Mission, at Pai-chan, in the Cheh-kiang Province. When he first went there in 1870, he found only two native Christians; at a conference held this year a dozen native helpers gathered around him, and many Christians. In two of the out-stations the Sunday services are now conducted by voluntary workers. The work of the Bible-women also is beginning to tell. The native contributions, too, show signs of improvement. "One donation deserves special notice. One of our members had no tidings of her husband for seven years. She prayed that God would either send him home or give her some clue as to where he was. Some time after, hearing that he had been seen in the city of Hang-chau, she determined to go in search of him, and went with a letter of introduction from our native pastor to the pastor there. She was kindly received, and helped in her inquiries; but it was six months before she found her husband, now an opium-smoker. Having no family, she took a place as a servant at Dr. Main's, of the Church Missionary Society, sent two dollars as a thank-offering for having found her husband, and got him into Dr. Main's hospital, to be cured of opium-smoking. The woman was so poor that she only got to Hang-chau by walking most of the way—about 190 English miles! This makes her gift the more liberal."

THE Christian Colportage Association has now ninety-one colporteurs at work. The total sales for last year amounted to 42,363 Bibles and Testaments, 390,950 books, 370,700 magazines, and 152,470 Scripture text cards, of the total value of 11,117*l.* The figures give but little indication of what the labour has been. The seed has been sown in faith and with much prayer, and at a great many houses, when no sales have been effected, earnest words of life have been spoken. Many of the books which are purchased are sent to friends abroad or living at a distance, and tidings of spiritual blessings come from far and near. The Rev. Archibald G. Brown, of the East London Tabernacle, speaking at the anniversary meeting, quoted the words of the late Lord Shaftesbury "England needs 1,000 colporteurs: 10,000 would not be too many."

THE London City Mission met under the presidency of Mr. F. A. Bevan, who spoke in emphatic words of the blessing which had accompanied the work of the past year. From the report it appeared that there were now 473 missionaries on the staff. The receipts for the general fund had amounted to 87,738*l.*, or 24,935*l.* in excess of the receipts of the previous year. Among the speakers were the Rev. Sir Emilius Laurie, the Rev. John Bond, the Rev. G. F. Head, M.A., and Mr. Simmonds, a missionary from Battersea.

THE Young Women's Christian Association met to celebrate its anniversary in great force at Exeter Hall, under the presidency of Lord Kinnaird. It was a gathering almost entirely of women-workers, the hour of half past eight, at which proceedings commenced, suggesting its character. Mr. W. T. Paton spoke on "Signs of Progress." He said that in London alone 18 branches, and 1,310 members had been enrolled during the year. The Rev. Marcus Rainsford dwelt on "The Power of Union," and the Rev. F. B. Meyer, on "The Possibilities of a Girl's Life."

THE great success of the Polytechnic since its transformation into an institute for young men has led Mr. and Mrs. Quintin Hogg to attempt a similar work for young women. They have acquired a fourteen years' lease of a large house in Langham-place, and fitted it up with everything that is wanted to enable the business-girls of the neighbourhood to spend their evenings pleasantly under its shelter. There are two large drawing-rooms, which, by means of folding-doors, can be thrown into one, and they are handsomely decorated and brilliantly lighted. Two smaller rooms, called social parlours, are similarly furnished. Another room will contain newspapers, magazines, and a lending library. Adjoining this is a work-room, containing sewing-machines for the use of the industrious. In the upper storeys are four class and music rooms, and, in regard to music, it should be mentioned that the resources of the Institute include three pianos and two American organs. The luxury of a swimming bath is secured for the girls by reserving the bath at the Polytechnic for them one night weekly. Important educational advantages are offered. Twenty-three classes are at work already, and the subjects include dress-making, millinery, mantle-making, plain and art needlework, and plain and high-class cookery. For the moderate fee of sixpence a girl may attend a course of ambulance and nursing lectures. The classes at the Polytechnic, nearly 200 in number, are also open to her at ordinary members' rates. A Bible-class is conducted on Monday evenings.

AT Shaikh Othman, not far from Aden, where the devoted and accomplished Mr. Keith-Falconer died in May 1877, steps have been taken to establish a permanent mission, under the auspices of the Free Church of Scotland. A mission-house, school, and dispensary are now being erected, and the missionaries, one medical and the other an ordained evangelist, have been appointed. The Dowager-Countess of Kintore and the Hon. Mrs. Keith-Falconer supply the salaries, and the Free Church of Scotland is responsible for the buildings and maintenance of the mission premises. Everything promises to prosper, under God's blessing, and the Arabs of those regions retain a warm and reverential feeling for the memory of the too short-lived friend who came to them, Ion Keith-Falconer.

THE jubilee of Dr. Horatius Bonar, whose hymns have carried his name into all parts of the world, was fitly celebrated at the Chalmers' Memorial Church in Edinburgh. The Lord Provost of Edinburgh, Sir Thomas Clark, presided. Dr. Bonar was presented with four addresses: one from the Chalmers' Memorial congregation, one from the Kelso Free Church, where he laboured for thirty years; and two others from the Free Presbyteries of Kelso and Edinburgh. Sir William Muir, Principal of Edinburgh University, in presenting Dr. Bonar with a silver salver and a cheque for one thousand pounds, said that Dr. Bonar's work and influence had been confined to no time or place or section or denomination of the Christian Church. His hymns were household words in every land where the English language was spoken, and they were used even in Roman Catholic Churches. On rising to acknowledge the gifts, Dr. Bonar received an enthusiastic greeting. He said he rejoiced to think that they would accept his unuttered feelings. He rejoiced, too, that there were in the midst of them so many of different denominations. His concluding counsel was—Brethren, pray more for one another.

THREE HUNDRED YEARS AGO—LIGHTING THE BEACON FIRE.

"On the same day (Friday, July 29th, 1588) and night the blaze and smoke of ten thousand beacon-fires, from the Land's End to Margate, and from the Isle of Wight to Cumberland, gave warning to every Englishman that the enemy was [illegible] on them."—EV.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARGARETA COLBERG.

A TALE OF THE REFORMATION.

"THE EDICTS ARE TO BE ENFORCED."

CHAPTER I.—THE MICHAELMAS FAIR.

DOWN a narrow, ill-lighted street in Valenciennes, a small procession of eight persons wended its way late one September evening in the year of our Lord 1561. First there came a man bearing a long staff in his hand. Directly behind him, walking side by side, were two ladies, entirely concealed in their hooded cloaks; and at some paces in the rear followed five more men with baskets on their heads. Arrived opposite an oaken door, heavily barred with iron, and studded with immense round-headed nails, they came to a standstill, while the leader struck his long staff sharply against the panel, at the same time crying out with a loud voice—

"Ho, within there! Open to my lady!"

The challenge resounded through the empty street, arousing the slumbering echoes, which, however, speedily betook themselves to sleep again among the overhanging gables of the opposite houses. A rattling sound of chains being unfastened came from behind the ponderous door, bolts were carefully withdrawn, the portal swung open and a gleam of light fell upon the group awaiting admittance. A shrivelled-up old woman with snow-white hair kept the door open with one hand, while in the other she held aloft a lamp that illumined the features and figures of the newcomers.

"Hi, sirs!" she exclaimed shrilly, in the rasping voice of old age, "but ye are late. This hour and more have I sat within the doorway listening for your footfall."

"My footfall, Rosa?" inquired the younger of the two ladies with a smile, for the old woman appeared to be addressing her at the moment.

"In faith, no, not yours, my heart's core," answered Rosa; "but I knew you came not without the Vitzel here, and his step is as good as a drummer's. The deaf could easily keep time to his gait."

Here Vitzel, who was at that moment engaged in lowering his large and heavy basket from his head to the ground, muttered something about not treading like a sparrow when one had a ton weight on the pate; but the old woman instantly cut him short.

"Hold there!" she exclaimed. "Thinkest thy lady cares to hear thy silly tongue wag? Keep it quiet in thy head till someone asks thee how thou chancest to be the wiseacre thou art."

As by this time the ladies were no longer present, they having passed on upstairs to the sitting-room, Vitzel ventured on a parting shot at his enemy.

"A bargain—if thou'lt hold thy peace till thou art asked how thou camest to be such a beauty." A sally which was greeted with much approval by the other serving lads.

Rosa permitted herself considerable freedom of speech with her master and mistress, but she was very jealous of any want of extreme deference shown by any of the servants, among whom her sour wit and jibing tongue made her anything but a favourite.

The hall into which the old servant had admitted her two ladies with their attendants was a large apartment which clearly served for other purposes besides that of entrance merely, since it was lined with shelves from floor to ceiling, and on these shelves lay rolls of cloth carefully cased in linen covers. It was, in fact, used as the ware-room and shop where worthy Simon Colberg stored and sold his famous brocades, the one article in which he dealt. Shops such as we know them—vast emporiums where every product of the globe is gathered together under one roof—are distinctly a modern phenomenon, the offspring of railways and steamers; they had no existence three hundred years ago.

Then each small manufacturer, himself probably a skilled craftsman, surrounded by a dozen or more apprentices, worked at his own particular industry. The travelling merchant, illustrious ancestor of the degenerate pedlar, went to these various craftsmen, taking from each a small quantity of goods until a fair assortment was attained, which he then distributed throughout the country. Noble ladies living in far-off châteaux, distant many days' journey from the great cities, were thus occasionally provided with the latest fashions in cramoisie, damask, and brocade, and so life was made tolerable to them. In those unenlightened times, however, the style of women's dress remained unaltered for years. Clothes could not become old-fashioned; they simply wore out, and girls donned their grandmothers' gowns, not as nowadays, only on the occasion of a fancy ball, but as a matter of daily economy.

Twice a year were held those great fairs the memory of which still lingers in Leipsic and elsewhere in Germany. At such times merchants flocked in from the lesser towns and villages, crowding the highways with their waggons and dotting the rivers and canals with their boats.

In the market square of any such city where a fair was in progress arose a multitude of tiny booths in which articles were exposed for sale, and for the time being the whole population lived in the streets and the square. Thither came merchants to buy and weavers to sell, housewives to lay in their half year's stores, and young maidens to spend their little all upon pretty nothings according to their wont. Burghers and landfolk thus met together and exchanged news from all parts of the country. These fairs were great events—at first merely commercial in their nature, they soon acquired a political significance. They were the railways and the newspapers of the age, since they brought together men and ideas which might otherwise never have been associated, while in times of trouble they formed the only safe means of communication.

It was from such a fair that dame Colberg with her daughter and six attendants was returning on the evening when our story opens, and the basket upon whose weight Vitzel had commented was one of the five containing the good wife's winter stores.

Ascending a narrow winding stair, built in the thickness of the wall, they entered the sitting-room overhead and found the house-father awaiting their return.

Simon Colberg was a man about fifty years of age, tall and strong-limbed, his broad shoulders, somewhat bent, however, from long standing over the loom when a young man. His hair, iron grey in hue, was cut close, leaving a massive square forehead exposed to view. The hard white outline of his starched ruff was broken by that pointed beard which gives such a look of precision to the portraits of the time.

"Oh, father, are we very late?" exclaimed the young girl as she followed her mother into the large sitting-room.

"Aye," he answered, laying down the small book which he had been reading, "no doubt you are late in your home-coming, and no doubt you come back with light wallets. I warrant now you have not between you the price of the ferryboat out of all the guldens I gave your mother this morning."

"But, father," objected the daughter in excuse, "you know the fair comes only twice a year."

"Thank the Lord it is so," retorted Simon Colberg, "I should be clean ruined if they were oftener."

"And what, I pray you, master, should young maidens do except spend the money their kin have earned for them?" spoke up Rosa, the ancient serving-woman. She idolized her young mistress and always helped her in any argument, sometimes, it must be confessed, with more loyalty than logic.

"Tut, tut, Rosa, wouldst have thy foster-child a spendthrift?" said the master, frowning portentously at them all. But although he spoke thus and looked so stern, the genial smile that lurked about the corners of his mouth betokened anything but wrath towards the culprits.

"Come, come," resumed her father, "spread the cloth and lay the supper, for I'm hungry. While we sup, thou shalt tell me, Margareta, all thou hast seen and all thou hast heard, and so, perchance, I'll get something for my money."

Laying off her hood and cloak, Margareta proceeded to help Rosa to place the supper upon the table, while the father, leaning back in his high-cushioned chair, watched her lovingly. In truth, she was a pleasant sight for a father's eyes, this happy, graceful girl moving deftly about at her work, ever and anon looking towards him with a nod and a smile. The daughter had the same square, open brow, and the same large brown eyes observable in the father, but here the likeness ended, for Simon Colberg's stern mouth and pointed yellow beard were represented in Margareta by a pair of rosy red lips wreathed in smiles, and a soft, round chin wherein nestled a little dimple. Her hair, of a rich golden brown hue, was like her mother's, but while it was dame Colberg's sole beauty, it was only one of Margareta's charms. In a single heavy braid it was coiled at the back of her head, according to the sober fashion of her time.

No slim, die-away maiden was this, with languishing mien and lisping voice, but a strong, healthy woman, tall and well formed, with a voice full and sweet like the softer tones of an organ. A girl of deep and enduring feelings, not to be lightly moved, perhaps, but when once stirred certain to last firm through any trial.

Women such as these seem to belong to a hardier race and time than our own. They are born to be the wives of soldiers, that they may transmit to their sons the stern virtues of men who have to fight. Of such are the mothers of heroes.

"And so the fair has been most splendid, has it?" remarked Simon, as they seated themselves at the table.

"Oh, yes, father," replied Margareta, "it was indeed most fine. I could not tell all we saw, but I think everything that ever was in the whole world must have been collected there. I saw that wonderful merchant from Paris whose silks are everybody's admiration; he has little puppets dressed up in the modes used at the French court, so different from ours. And, father, Beta van Oost is going to have a gown of silk for the Stadtholder's entry. She asked me if I should have a new gown."

Margareta hazarded this remark in a doubtful manner.

"And what did you tell Beta?" asked her father.

"I told her I did not know yet, and then she said 'I suppose it will be a Queen Eleanor dress,'" replied the young girl.

"I hope you said you would be proud to wear a dress like that I had the honour of weaving for our gracious queen, the Lady Eleanor," answered Simon Colberg with stout loyalty.

Margareta remained silent, and her father continued:

"It was a piece of brocade, the like of which never was seen before, so all the world said. I have the secret of the pattern—I doubt if any one else could weave it. Many great ladies have asked for a gown like it, but I would never part with an ell of it. I have, however, the queen's permission to let all the women of my name and house have a dress like the one I wove for Her Grace."

Simon Colberg spoke with the slow deliberation of conscious pride. It was a great event in his life when he was selected from among all of his craft to weave the gown that the city of Tournay presented to the popular queen regent. Margareta, it must be confessed, did not quite enter into his feelings on this head, and did not view the subject with the same complacency. The historic dress was woven before Margareta was born, and instead of feeling elated at having a gown similar to that once worn by the old queen, it seemed to her rather hard that on State occasions she should always be compelled to wear that ancient Flemish costume, when her girlish fancy would have led her to prefer the newer and more captivating French modes.

But Margareta was accustomed to yield the willing obedience demanded by the fashion of the age as well as by her father's temperament, therefore she said no more about the dress, but again reverted to the subject of the fair.

"And, father," she resumed, "I saw the merchant from Rome who has the pearls—oh! such large and beautiful pearls!—and cheap, very cheap. You know they are not real pearls, father, but they look just like them."

"Ah! methought so," muttered Simon under his breath. "The real pearls we Netherlanders have received from Rome, my daughter, have not been very many."

And so they chatted happily on together about one thing and another until supper was over, when Colberg appeared suddenly to become aware of the fact that his wife had not spoken a word since she came in.

"Eh, how's this, dame?" he cried, turning cheerfully towards her, "hast no news for me? Or dost reckon the cost of the day so deeply that thou hast never a thought for aught else?"

His wife being thus directly addressed, raised her eyes towards her husband. They bore traces of tears while her face was very pale. Leaning across the table towards her, his own countenance assuming a look of anxiety, Simon asked:

"What is the matter? What has happened?"

"The Edicts are to be enforced," replied his wife in a voice scarcely above a whisper.

Simon dropped his arms heavily upon the table and drew a gasping breath like a man in pain, then he said slowly:

"The Lord have mercy upon us, and preserve us from this affliction."

CHAPTER II.—THE EDICTS.

THE Edicts were a dread reality in the Netherlands in the sixteenth century. The name was used to denote almost exclusively that group of enactments which related to heretics, as all those were denominated who did not profess the Roman Catholic faith. Nearly all the laws which have cast so dark a shadow upon the reputation of Philip II. were in truth promulgated by his father Charles V.; but that very politic personage allowed them to rest long in abeyance, being too busy with his foreign wars to risk irritating his tax-yielding subjects in the Low Countries. Philip, on the contrary, kept out of war for the express purpose of turning all his energies to the purification of the Netherlands. The way he purified was by fire, and the process was very simple. Whenever any person, man, woman, or child, was convicted of heresy, he was forthwith burnt alive. People, even in those times, having a conservative dislike to whatever was new, vast pains were taken to assure them that the objectionable Edicts were an old institution. Knowing as men did what was the character of the emperor's laws, it is not hard to understand the consternation which would ensue upon the news that the Edicts were in future to be enforced.

Now Simon and his wife understood this perfectly, and to them the words were fraught with awful meaning. Not so Margareta, who was too young to remember the emperor's time and from whom precise knowledge about the Edicts had been purposely withheld.

She sat in speechless bewilderment during the colloquy between her father and mother, looking from one to the other as if trying to catch their meaning. At last, unable to restrain her feelings any longer, clasping her father's arm, she cried out: "Oh, what has happened? Tell me, dear father, what is it? Why are you suddenly distressed?"

"Child, child," replied the father in a broken voice, "we are beset by dangers and there is no safety for us, none. The Edicts, oh the Edicts!"

"But, father," exclaimed Margareta not in the least comprehending him, "what are the Edicts to you? Why should you dread the laws? What have you done?"

"Done?" echoed her father, his voice rising louder and louder as the bitter thoughts now surged up into his mind, "what have we done, sayest thou? Know then we have done that which deserves death. We have ventured to worship our God according to our conscience. We have done this dreadful thing, daughter; thou, thy mother, thy father, and Rosa, thy nurse, have all committed this crime; and by the laws of our most gracious king we can all be burned alive for it."

Simon's eyes flashed with anger in uttering these words, and his hand clutched at his belt as if to grasp a sword.

"Husband, speak not thus," urged his wife. "We are in the hands of the Lord, and He will deliver us."

"Peace, Alice," he answered, sternly. "It is time the brethren were up and doing or we shall be slaughtered like so many sheep. These are truly fine pearls from Rome for our Michaelmas Fair! We have been left quiet so long I thought, like a foolish man, our troubles were over."

As he spoke Simon moved towards the corner of the room and reached down his round velvet cap with ruffled edges.

"Do you go out to-night, father?" asked Margareta, seeing him going to the door.

"Yes, child," he replied, "I will go to friend Mallart's; we must advise together at once. I warrant the hell-hounds of inquisitor Titelmann run fast upon the scent. It behoves us to lose no time if we would be prepared."

When the father was gone Margareta seated herself upon a low stool beside her mother, and sought comfort in this anxiety from her who never failed to grant it.

"Mother," she said, looking up with quivering lips, "it is all a mistake, is it not? Surely no law can strike our father—so good, so just, so upright as he is; he need fear no man. We harm no one by not going to mass. Why should they seek to injure us for praying in our own room? We always pray for the king," she added naïvely in conclusion.

"Nay, child," replied her mother, "that we do no harm is not sufficient; it is made a crime to believe in God, and to worship Him according to our conscience. People have before now been burnt for no greater crime than that."

"And does the king command this?" asked Margareta with a look of horror.

"Yes, alas, he does indeed!" answered dame Colberg. "He has long been a scourge to our people."

"Then I shall never again pray for so wicked a man," said Margareta in anger.

"Tush, child!" said her mother reprovingly. "We should pray for those who despitefully use us, and perhaps the Lord will turn their hearts."

For some minutes there was silence in the room, the two women sat wrapped in gloomy thoughts. At last Margareta spoke.

"We have many and good friends, I will never believe they would let harm come to our father. They would gather around him, and save him from any danger; there are the Van Oosts—they have influence, being Catholics. They would save him, I know they would."

She hesitated a moment, and the tell-tale colour rose fast to her cheeks.

"Then there are others too, you know, mother, who have great influence, and who would never let harm come to him."

"Yes," replied the mother, "I know what you wouldst say. The young knight is a brave gentleman, no doubt; but when it comes to such a test, friends sometimes fail. He is a Catholic, my child."

"I know that, mother; but surely a Catholic may be a true friend, may he not?"

"I trust, indeed, he may prove one," replied the mother. "But if we are in peril we must hold by our brethren of the faith, lest by leaning on a broken reed it should pierce the hand."

Another long silence followed. Finally dame Colberg spoke again.

"Be not too much cast down, my daughter. Perhaps it may not be as bad as the first tidings would seem to warrant. Above all, it were most unwise to let the household perceive that we are terrified. We must be serene and calm before them to give encouragement to those who perchance look to us for example."

She bent down and kissed her daughter's forehead, and then lovingly passed her hands over the glossy braid that crowned the shapely head.

At eighteen the heart finds grief an irksome companion, and it turns gladly towards cheerfulness. When the hair has become grey we find it much harder to do so. Sorrow then is our well-known companion who has spent so many dark days with us, and stood by us during so many bitter nights of watching, that we bear his companionship at least with resignation, feeling how inevitable it is; but at eighteen how different! Margareta had scarce reached even that short span of years, and hitherto her life had been one long summer's day of peaceful happiness. She had never seen sorrow face to face, and she could not realise his stern aspect. It was not that she was wanting in feeling, far otherwise, but she was new to trouble. Her heart had given one great throb of terror when the idea first suggested itself that her beloved father might be in danger; but under the influence of her mother's reassuring words she gradually resumed her wonted cheerfulness of look.

Simon stayed late abroad, not returning till the night was far spent; but the two women at home had no thought of going to rest. On the contrary, they were still in the sitting-room when he returned, eager for any news he might bring.

"Ah!" he said to them as he entered; "my good news must have been wafted before me, you look less doleful than at my going. There were several of the Faith at Burgher Mallart's, gathered to talk over this news; some thought it all a lie, but all agreed that nothing certain is known. There is a report from Brussels that the Edicts will henceforward be enforced; but men say the prince's party is stronger than ever, and we know the heart of Orange is turned towards us. Your countryman, wife, my Lord of Egmont declares for the prince, and he is a powerful noble."

"Does he so?" rejoined Alice, "he is a valiant knight, I trow; but report used to run in Holland that he was not over stable in his wishes. This side one day, that side the next. Men used to say he was a gallant foe, but an unsteady friend."

YOUNG'S "NIGHT THOUGHTS."

BY THE LATE REV. EDWIN PAXTON HOOD.

THOSE of our readers who have passed the meridian of life will remember Young's "Night Thoughts" as a favourite in all serious circles, and the index for most frequent quotation in the pulpit. To say that it has now fallen into something more than mere obscurity and neglect, is, we fear, only to give it a place among many other works not only venerable but inestimable still in their pre-eminent value; fountains of the wealthiest thought, rich in gems of the most brilliant, suggestive, and compact expression; with many such, we say again, the "Night Thoughts" has passed, like a constellation, behind a cloud. But, unlike the "Night Thoughts," few of these other works which we might name, have not had to suffer from deteriorating, and misrepresenting criticism.

It must be admitted that there is much in this great poem which at first sight seems to be out of harmony with the thought and structure of the mind of our own times. Persons who do not, or have not read it, are willing to suppose that it belongs to the less masculine type of our literature—to that effeminate, and, it must be admitted, sentimental vein of expression which our, nevertheless, dear and beloved James Hervey indulged in his Contemplations on the "starry heavens," and other such pieces; and that the sombreness, and even the, so-to-speak, hatchmented grandeur, and hearse-like splendour of this poem is as unreal as the mutes and plumes of an ancient funeral. This estimate is entirely false: the poem is, certainly in parts of it, simply one of the most massive and majestic pieces of work in our language. It is true, if we were to appropriate a term from architecture to describe it, we should call it Cyclopean; its majesties are unhewn, almost shapeless; they are hung together like the awful architraves of Stonehenge; its great words stand in a kind of mysterious solitude like the old men of the Desert, as such stones have been called. Far away from a Corinthian finish, they do not approach even a Doric, or Ionic simplicity of taste; lines and sentences stand like fragments whose only architects were the fingers of the lightning, or the shivering chisel of the thunderstone; but, if any person said to us, "Do you regard Young's 'Night Thoughts,' as a great poem?" we should reply, "Do you regard Stonehenge as a great building?"

Then another kind of unfairness has been dealt out to this piece of work; some recent critics, and especially one whom we need not mention, have treated the whole poem as a piece of mere unreality, and this is indeed most unjust. Young lived to a great age, and, octogenarian as he was, he lived two different and distinctly separated lives; doubtless the first years of his life were passed in the atmosphere of a court not remarkable for its purity, and in a life and round of fashion, frivolous, and certainly unsuccessful. Assuredly he saw enough of folly and worldliness to justify some of those sufficiently bitter satires in which it seems he took a kind of revenge. It was late in life when he became a clergyman, and a clergyman in a remote country village, and his conduct there was unquestionably that of a faithful, exemplary minister; and the stories which represent him as flying from balls and routs to put down his sombre meditations are without any foundations in fact. His "Night Thoughts" were written in his village rectory when he had pretty much given up the great world, excepting in what may be called a not unnatural visit to it. Far less justice has been meted out to him in those afflictions by which he had indeed been bereft of the persons he tenderly loved. He was a solitary man, with apparently an old woman—a termagant and a tyrant—for a housekeeper; he was a disappointed man, perhaps he had a right to expect that such powers as he unquestionably possessed might have procured for him some position in the church better than an obscure country vicarage. But so it was, and the preparatory exercises for writing the "Night Thoughts" were not, as has been said, routs and balls, but solitary rides on horseback through lone country lanes, and across Hertfordshire moors, especially when storms were up—as on that night when, amidst the wild thunder and rain, he surprised a friend by saying it was "a fine night," and when his friend expressed wonder and surprise, Young replied: "The Lord is abroad!"

Young's poem is indeed remarkable as being with all its splendour and coruscation of expression, the fruit of old age; it was the consistent work of his country vicarage. He always had an ambition to be a poet, and, from his early college days, had put forth efforts more or less successful; but they may be regarded as all, for the most part failures, they would not win our attention, or perhaps even detain us for an hour, if they were not curious appendages to the life of the author of the "Night Thoughts."

Edward Young was born in 1681, at Upham, in Hampshire; his father was rector of the parish, a chaplain to King William, and Dean of Salisbury. Young's college course was, probably, studious and creditable; he studied at Oxford, where he obtained his Fellowships, and took his degrees as Bachelor, and Doctor of Civil Law. We need not dwell upon his literary efforts in his earlier years, or his connection with the celebrated Duke of Grafton. He was forty-seven years of age, when, turning from a life which must be called one of dissipation, and ambition connected with writing for the stage, he entered on the work of the ministry. Satirists have said that in this he was like a disappointed young lady taking the veil, and retiring to a nunnery. In fact, it seems to us, that, before he took this step, for many years he had been panting for a better and purer life than that which the neighbourhood of courts, and the aliment of fashion could satisfy; and probably the disappointment of Young did not arise so much from the unsuccess of his circumstances as from the hunger of the heart. He was very soon appointed chaplain to George the Second; and there is a not uninteresting story told how, upon one occasion, when preaching before the flippant and indifferent Court, when the King himself was present Young was so overwhelmed by the evident and undisguised carelessness of the congregation, that, unable to proceed, he flung himself back, sat down, and burst into tears. This story, surely, is not unworthy of the author of the "Night Thoughts." He did not marry until the age of fifty; his chief support had been derived from his Fellowships, but when, in 1730, he was presented by his college, in Oxford, to the rectory of Welwyn, in Hertfordshire, he married the Lady Elizabeth Lee, daughter of the Earl of Lichfield, and, although young, the widow of Colonel Lee. The marriage appears to have been an eminently happy one, but its relationship on earth did not last long. His wife had a daughter by her former marriage, to whom he was tenderly attached; she married, and Young was as much attached to her husband as to the lady herself. In a short time both of them, with his own wife also, were reft away by death; and it is to this he alludes in that line in the "Night Thoughts"—

> Thrice flew the shaft, and thrice my peace was slain.

It was after all this bitter experience, when he was left a solitary man in his lonely village, that he recreated himself in his solitude, and commenced, when beyond his sixtieth year, his great poem, the "Night Thoughts." Remembering all this, there is something, it seems, not merely wanting in knowledge, but wanting in tender human sympathy, in the verdicts which have sometimes been passed on Young. It is rather remarkable that, in some particulars, the best estimate has been formed of him from a pen we might, perhaps, least expect to understand him, that of Lord Bulwer Lytton. Knebworth, Lord Lytton's beautiful house, is not far from Welwyn, in the same county, and this may, perhaps, in some measure, account for his interested knowledge; but there was something in the course of the lives of the two men which furnished a foundation for Lytton's estimate. They both knew the life of courts and fashion well, and both, after draining that cup, turned to more pure and refreshing draughts for satisfaction. Lytton says: "Young, popular as he is, has not received justice; he has never yet had a critic to display, and make current his most peculiar and emphatic beauties; he is, of all poets, the one to be studied by a man who is about to break the golden chains that bind him to the world; his gloom does not appal nor deject, the dark river of his solemn genius sweeps the thoughts onward to Eternity—if we recoil and shudder at life, it is as children who, in tears at some past peril, bound forward to their mother's knee; so we hasten, as our comfort and parent, to the bosom of Death." This is the spirit in which the "Night Thoughts" were composed, and thus we are to see Young, an old, but still hale man compensating his solitude in the old Rectory—pursuing his course of thought in his lonely rides; and returning, most likely, often enough to sit up late, outwatching the stars, those dazzling points of fire which brought to his page, in the lonely study, so many and such marvellous ministrations. All this gives a tender pathos to the following lines from the "Night Thoughts":—

> Bless'd be that hand Divine, which gently laid
> My heart at rest, beneath this humble shed.
> The world's a stately bark, on dangerous seas,
> With pleasure seen, but boarded at our peril;
> Here, on a single plank, thrown safe ashore,
> I hear the tumult of the distant throng,
> As that of seas remote, or dying storms:
> And meditate on scenes, more silent still.

As life passed on, and he descended more deeply into the valley of years, some of his habits changed. We do not wonder to learn that he continued always remarkable for absence of mind, strangely forgetful of the times of meals, yet his life was very systematic. He rose very early, and gathered all his domestics round him in family prayer; his walks were now pretty much limited to the churchyard; and unlike the time of the composition of the "Night Thoughts," he retired to bed punctually at eight o'clock. So he lived on until 1765, when at the age of eighty-four, he passed to those regions of immortality which he, beyond any other English poet, had celebrated in glowing and inspiring verse.

Then, as to the book itself, its designation, in a most sufficient and satisfactory manner, describes it,—it is "Night Thoughts." It consists of pearls of speech, or diamonds strung almost at random; no tales are interwoven, nor, in fact, is there much that speaks directly to human sympathy, excepting by a glance of inference; its interest is chiefly intellectual, and, although we used just now the term "random," it is also true that, in many parts, a severely logical process of thought, not the less logical because frequently illative, chains the attention. That would be a large book which should group together all the fine and noble things which poets and others have said of Night. There have not been many finer from uninspired pens than that of Isaac Taylor. "Night," he says, "has had three daughters,—Religion, Superstition, and Atheism;" to this we may add that, of the three, if religion be the oldest, atheism is the youngest, and a very large-headed, wild-eyed, and weak-limbed child she is. Certainly atheism has said nothing about night to exalt or refine our affections.

How true it is that "Night showeth knowledge;" how ignorant we should be concerning the vastness of the material universe were it not that night unveils the heavens and calls upon us to survey those troops of stars which, as he looked up to them and considered, extorted from the great Hebrew poet the cry "What is man that Thou art mindful of him?" Thus the night side of nature, while it quickens the sense of mystery, widens also the vistas of the majesty of the universe. The wonderful light which breaks from all those spheres, and constellations, proclaims a prevalent harmony and unity,—

> For ever singing, as they shine,
> The Hand that made us is Divine!

And not less wonderful and mysterious than the orderly marching and continuous procession of all those shining orbs, is the blessed arrangement of sleep in harmony with night—that as darkness veils us round, the medicinal lotion bathes the whole body, supples the muscles, gives to joints made rigid with labour a blessed bath; at the same time, most marvellous of all, providing a "balm for hurt minds," often throwing open the gates of fancy, and setting the imprisoned spirit free into a strange dream sphere. Such are the suggestions of Night, and Young has played upon them all as chords, waking what seem to us to be sleepless echoes in the soul, giving a similar tone to that of the Psalmist when he says, "My reins also instruct me in the night season."

We do not much like to refer to that astounding vanity of the modern Frenchman, Comte, in which he denies the truth of the great Psalmist's thought that "the heavens declare the glory of God," and affirms that they only declare the glory of Euler, and Kepler, and Newton. If blasphemy could ever be amusing, surely this provokes at once amusement, contempt, and horror; if this were true, then the little child who learns his alphabet is greater than Cadmus who invented it. One of the most sustained pieces of irrefutable logic in the "Night Thoughts" is that in which Young so sublimely argues with the atheist the existence of the Divine creating and sustaining intelligence, and, in an eminently noble way, long before Comte was born, anticipates, and shivers to pieces his blasphemous fallacy. The argument runs through pages; we can only quote therefore those few lines immediately pertinent to the fallacy. Speaking of those orbs, Young says—

> Much design
> Is seen in all their motions, all their makes;
> Design implies intelligence, and art;
> That can't be from themselves—or man; that art
> Man scarce can comprehend, could man bestow?
> And nothing greater yet allow'd than man,
> Who motion, foreign to the smallest grain,
> Shot through vast masses of enormous weight?
> Who bid brute matter's restive lump assume
> Such various forms, and gave it wings to fly?
> Has matter innate motion? Then each atom,
> Asserting its indisputable right

To dance, would form an universe of dust:
Has matter none? Then whence these glorious forms
And boundless flights, from shapeless, and reposed?
Has matter more than motion? Has it thought,
Judgment, and genius? Is it deeply learn'd
In mathematics? Has it framed such laws,
Which but to guess, a Newton made immortal?

Thus it will be seen that Young brings out the religion of the stars; his inspiration is from Isaac Taylor's first daughter of night, as he says—

Devotion! daughter of Astronomy!
An undevout astronomer is mad.

The "Night Thoughts" remind us of two books; they remind us of Pascal and his Thoughts, where, in a splendid and well-known passage, he speaks of the superiority and infinite value of a human soul in its abiding consciousness, as in contrast to the most magnificent planet, in that, in virtue of its immortality, it would retain its consciousness and existence, while the shivered planet would be unaware of the calamity which had fallen upon its being. And the other work of which Young reminds us, is Nichol's splendid scientific poem, for it is nothing less, "The Architecture of the Heavens." The magnificent language of the man of science may in some measure apologise for those raptures and flights of Young, which have sometimes been thought extravagant; but, indeed, it is rather hard to fall into cold forms of expression, and rein in language to the thin proportion of hedgerows and little garden paths, when an infinite soul dilates amidst the vast avenues of an infinitely extending creation. Time and space seem almost to burst their barriers, and yet vainly to call on words to attempt some adequate expression. Thus the same sense of vastness carries the pen of Young along with tremulous nervousness as he dwells upon the immortality of the soul, and then upon the mysteries and grandeur of the atonement. If sometimes his ideas and his language seem to dilate to extravagance, let us remember that it was an age when a rhetorical mould was thought to be a proper form of literary expression, and in this his Christianity is not more extravagant than the deism of Pope. As to the truths themselves, the time had not set in for paring down their importance. It is manifest in every line that Young believed; and tradition tells us that he preached in much the same massive, moodily bright, and brightly moody manner as that in which he wrote.

But one of the most noticeable characteristics of the "Night Thoughts" is their intensity, the concentrated sententiousness of expression. Few poems have given to us so many passages, words which pass from lip to lip. Take a few—

"Procrastination is the thief of time."
"All men think all men mortal but themselves."
"Death but entombs the body—life, the soul."
"He sins against this life who slights the next."
"Our dying friends come o'er us like a cloud."
"As bodies grow more ponderous robbed of life,
Good lost weighs more in grief than gained in joy."
"The course of Nature is the art of God."
"How few can rescue opulence from want!
"Who lives to nature, rarely can be poor;
Who lives to fancy never can be rich."
"Like Milton's Eve, when gazing on the lake, Man makes the matchless image man admires."
"Pigmies are pigmies still, though perched on Alps;
And pyramids are pyramids in vales."
"Learn well to know how much need not be known."
"A soul without reflection, like a pile Without inhabitant, to ruin runs."
"Tears pumped up by Death,
Are spent in watering vanities of Life."
"Reason pursued is Faith, and, unpursued
Where proof invites, 'tis reason, then, no more."
"How blessings brighten as they take their flight!"
"Thoughts shut up, want air,
And spoil, like bales unopened to the sun."
"The bell strikes one. We take no note of Time
But from its loss. To give it then a tongue
Is wise in man."
"Tired Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep!
He, like the world, his ready visit pays
Where Fortune smiles; the wretched he forsakes."
"The world's a prophecy of worlds to come."
"Men may live fools, but fools they cannot die."
"A Christian is the highest style of man."
"Life is most enjoyed
When courted least; most worth when disesteemed."
"Thought, too, delivered, is the more possessed; Teaching, we learn; and, giving, we retain."

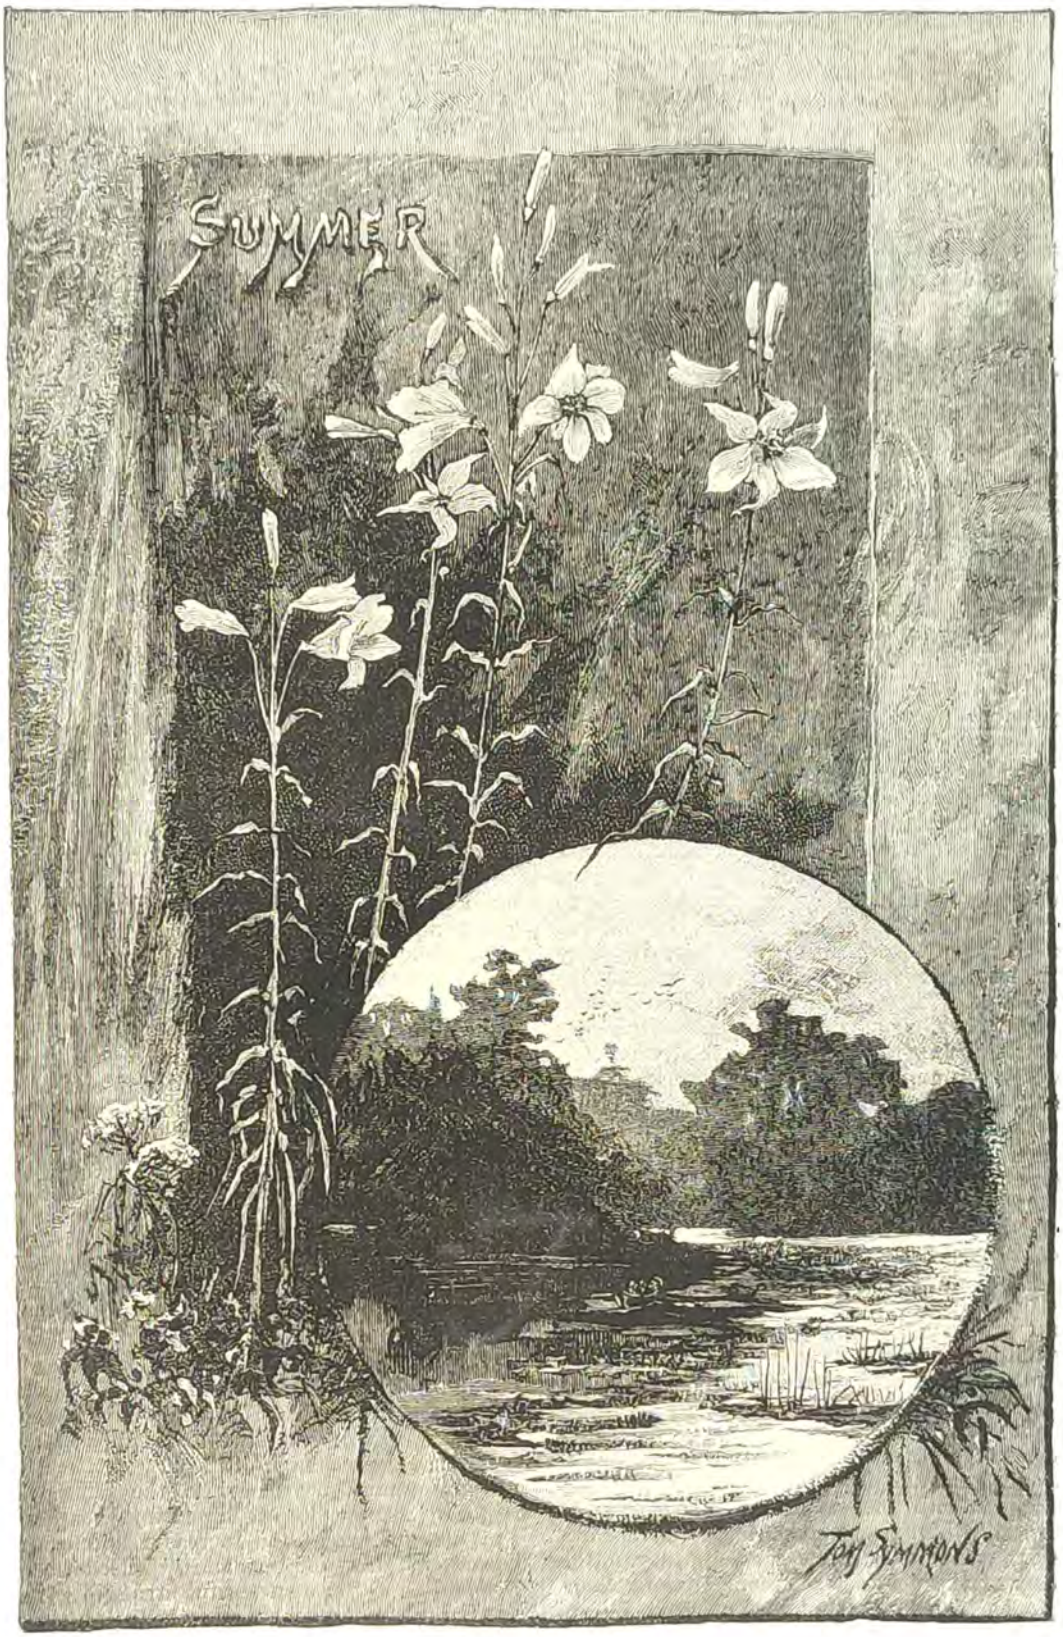
But we must stop; the work is full of this golden coin. Lord Lytton refers to Young's wonderful powers over metaphor—he says, Milton himself has not surpassed him. This is very true, and, if our space permitted, we should like to give several illustrations, one must suffice. Here is an extraordinary one, the truth of which we realise every day.

Time, in advance, behind him hides his wings,
And seems to creep, decrepit with his age;
Behold him, when passed by; what then is seen
But his broad pinions, swifter than the winds?

Such, then, was Edward Young, and such are the "Night Thoughts." Perhaps it may be thought that the work possesses merits which might give it a claim to the condescension and regard even of our very dainty and self-opinionated age; we almost dare to say that the book is so full of suggestion in thought, as well as suggestive imagery and nervous expression, that the pulpits in which our grandfathers were wont to lay these "Night Thoughts" so much under contribution, were perhaps, not so badly served after all. But we have been especially desirous to rebuke, and to repel the fallacy that the "Night Thoughts" was a piece of moral inconsistency. This idea seems to have resulted from the fact that he had exhausted life on its side of courtly vanity and fashion, and, trying life in its quieter avenues of home-born loves, he found himself disappointed again. There is no doubt a great deal of the strain of the Preacher: "Vanity of vanity! all is vanity!" He is said never to have been a bright man again after the death of his wife, but from his lone churchyard, from country lanes and their hedge-rows, and from the cottage gardens and farms of his villagers, he looked back, and spake the wisdom of experience with new and living force.



SUMMER
Jay Symmons

Summer.

WHEN summer scents the balmy air,
Earth seems as stainless and as fair,
As free from passion and unrest
As the white lilies on her breast,
Which nothing know of toil or care.

Away in heaven's unclouded blue
The skylark carols lost to view
(More raptured music ne'er was made),
While hidden by yon leafy shade,
All day the happy ringdoves coo.

New beauties every night adorn,
New glories wait returning morn;
And in the noontide's languorous heat
Sweet berries store their luscious treat,
And golden grows the goodly corn.

Most loving Father, Thee we praise,
Wondrous in all Thy works and ways!
Teach us to take as from Thy Hand
The fruitful increase of our land,
And the fair gift of summer days.

SYDNEY GREY.

EARLY MISSION WORK IN IRELAND.

BY E. J. WHATELY.

III.

COLUMBANUS—a namesake of Columba—trod in the steps of his predecessor in his zeal for evangelistic work. He was born in Leinster; and while still in early youth left his home to place himself under a renowned teacher called Senile. He then became a monk in the famous monastery of Bangor, where he spent many years, but at length his desire to preach the Gospel in other lands became so strong, that having obtained with some difficulty the consent of his abbot, he set out with twelve companions. They came first to France, and proceeded to Burgundy, preaching and teaching in all the places they came to. In every house in which Columbanus stayed, he was sure to turn the attention of the inmates to their spiritual interests.

The first place in which he settled was in the department of the Vosges, where he and his companions had to lead much of the life that pioneer colonists have to do in the Australian or West American bush, "roughing it" in every sense of the word, and often suffering from actual scarcity of food. But the missionaries turned their hands to whatever work came in their way; they felled trees, built houses, tilled the ground, and in time founded a regular agricultural as well as educational settlement, and could supply all their wants. Many persons in the neighbourhood came to place themselves under his direction, and he found it needful to erect a larger dwelling to accommodate them; this led to his constructing his famous monastery of Luxeu (or Luxeuil), at the end of the sixth century. But so many of the nobles and others brought their sons to be his pupils, that the place at Luxeu was soon "too strait" for them, and he erected another monastery, which he called Ad Fontanas (now Fontaines), from the abundance of springs near it. He placed superiors over these establishments, and took great pains to establish a strict rule of government.

But he was not allowed long to remain in peace. The King of Burgundy, Theoderic, and his mother, Brunehilda, were enraged with the plain-spoken denunciations of Columbanus of their abandoned and profligate lives; and the queen-mother especially never rested till she could have him banished. A band of soldiers was sent to force him into exile, and none of his associates but those born in the British Isles were allowed to accompany him.

The little band of exiles were conducted under a strong guard to Nantes, and put on board an Irish merchant-vessel; but bad weather having stranded the ship, the captain thought his passengers had brought this misfortune upon them, and insisted on putting them and their goods on shore. This enabled Columbanus to pursue his mission work in France; he retired first to the dominions of Clothaire, King of Soissons, who gave him a friendly reception, and then to Paris and towards Switzerland by the Rhine, through the realm of King Theodebert of Austrasia. He settled at last, after two or three changes of place, at Bregenz on the Lake of Constance, where he found a Christian priest named Willima, who showed him much kindness.

He was the means in this new settlement of bringing many heathen into the church, and restoring many who had lapsed into heathenism. But after a while the increased and extended power of his old enemies, Theoderic and Brunehilda (after a successful struggle with the brother of the former), made the neighbourhood of Constance no longer a safe one for Columbanus, and he removed to Italy, finally settling among the Lombards, and founding the famous monas-tory of Bobio, in the Apennines, near the river Trebia. Here he died two years later. He held views on monastic celibacy, and the virtue of personal austerities, with which no Protestant Christians could sympathize, and which are certainly quite unlike the teaching of the New Testament; but though he had thus imbibed some of the errors of his day, he was an ardent and intelligent student of Scripture, and his writings abound in quotations from the sacred volume.

His companions were animated by the same spirit. One of them, Gallus, was left behind at Bregenz ill of fever; the only one of his Irish brethren at Constance who did not accompany him to Italy. This detention of Gallus proved a means, however, of spreading the Gospel: for when he recovered, he removed to a place on the little river Stinace, where he founded the abbey which has now given his name to the town on the same spot, and indeed to the whole Canton of St. Gall. He was offered the bishopric of Constance, but declined, and spent the remainder of a long life in active missionary labours in the country in which he had settled, and in training others to continue their labours, which have gained him the well-deserved title of Apostle of the Allemanni and Suevi.

Deicolus (in Irish, Dichuill), a half-brother of Gallus, had remained in Burgundy when his countrymen left it, and settled in the neighbourhood of Besançon, where he founded an abbey, and is still remembered in the district under the name of St. Diè.

These were the principal of the immediate associates of Columbanus; but their spirit did not die out with them. Furseus, another distinguished Irish teacher, came to England about the middle of the seventh century, and laboured assiduously among the East Anglians. Later he came to France, and worked at Lagny.

Maidulf, another eminent Irishman, came to England a little later, and opened a school which eventually, like most schools of the time, became a monastery, and was called from him Maidulfsbury.[1] The most celebrated of his pupils was the famous writer and abbot Aldhelm.

Kilian, another Irish missionary, was called the Apostle of Franconia, because the scene of his work was the capital of that district in Germany, Würzburg, now in Bavaria. His labours among the heathen of those parts were extremely successful, and their ruler Duke Gorbert professed himself a convert and was baptised. While a Pagan, Gorbert had taken his brother's wife, Geilana; Kilian wisely waited till the prince had received some Christian instruction, and then faithfully set the sin of such a connection before him, and induced him to promise he would break it off.

But Geilana, like Herodias of old, vowed vengeance on the Christian teacher, and sent an executioner, who seized on Kilian and his two principal colleagues while they were singing their nightly hymns, and put them to death on the spot.

Even as late as the eighth century, Ireland was still a centre of missionary work, both at home and abroad. While the English missionary Boniface was preaching to the heathen tribes east of the Rhine, Virgilius, an Irish teacher, was engaged in a similar work in Bavaria. A controversy, however, rose between the two missionaries. Boniface insisted that if an ignorant priest (no uncommon case) had pronounced the baptismal words incorrectly, the whole rite must be performed over again. This Virgilius opposed, and Pope Zachary, when appealed to, sided with him instead of with Boniface. The latter, probably much disconcerted at the Pope, whose faithful subject he considered himself, having taken part against him, brought forward another complaint against his fellow-worker, which, to modern readers, is extremely ludicrous. He charged Virgilius with the horrible crime of maintaining "that there was another world and other men under the part of the earth they were treading!"

Here he had the Pope on his side. His Holiness agreed that to maintain the existence of the Antipodes was "a perverse and wicked thing," and desired that Virgilius should come to Rome and give an account of his opinions.

Whether he came or no, and what the result, we know not; very likely he was prudent enough to keep out of harm's way and avoid the fate which met Galileo some ages later: his subsequent history, indeed, makes this nearly certain; for he became bishop of Salzburg, and was the means of bringing the gospel into the neighbouring State of Carinthia, of which he was called "The Apostle," and whose duke he baptised. His labours extended far beyond this, indeed, and before his death he made a general visitation of his large diocese, and proceeded as far as the frontiers of the Huns, near the Danube. He died towards the close of the eighth century.

But Ireland was renowned, not only for sending out missionaries to foreign parts, but for being a centre for the best instruction, both in religious and secular learning. Anglo-Saxon writers continually recorded of distinguished men among themselves, that, "He was sent to be educated in Ireland."

It would appear, indeed, that it was from Ireland that the ancient English first received instruction in forming the letters of the alphabet, as the characters of the old Anglo-Saxon language are nearly the same as those to this day used for the Irish.

But these days of glory and blessing were fast drawing to a close. Rome was tightening the iron grasp on the country, and with her complete supremacy, the spiritual religion of the Gospel died out, and with it, the secular learning and civilisation. The church of Rome often seems for a time to be the patron of learning; but sooner or later the countries under her entire and undisputed sway, sink in intelligence as well as in rational piety.

There is a curious legend of a vision or dream said to have come before St. Patrick while engaged in his labours in Ireland. He was said to have seen the country as if on fire, and the "fiery mountains" as it were, in all parts of the country, rising to the skies. This fire, he thought an angel told him, represented the fervour of Christian faith and love. But by degrees the flames died away, and the light was reduced to a few hidden embers nearly extinguished. In deep sorrow the missionary repeated, weeping, the verses of the seventy-seventh Psalm, beginning, "Will the Lord absent Himself for ever, will He be no more entreated?" etc.

[1] Afterwards called Malmesbury.

The angel then desired him to look to the east, and in that quarter he beheld a light, first feebly struggling with the darkness, and at last illuminating the whole island, till it was restored to its first luminous condition.

Whether this dream, if it really took place, was caused by the fevered imagination and intensely earnest feelings of the Apostle of Ireland, or whether it belonged to one of those curious cases of "prevision" or "second sight," of which we have records in all countries and all ages, it is not here the place to inquire. Certainly the first part of the vision is a true picture of the spiritual history of Ireland hitherto—its early brightness, and its subsequent gloom.

The dark days, alas! are very, very far from being passed. But we do know, if we are Bible-reading Christians, that what Ireland needs is the Gospel; and surely we may trustfully look forward to a time when the third part of Patrick's vision shall be accomplished, and the light of true, Scriptural, pure Christianity be restored to that long troubled land, throughout its length and breadth, to heal her wounds and make her again what she was once truly called, "The Isle of Saints!"

"DOCKY."

THE Isle of Arran is the epitome of the beauty and sublimity, of the majesty, the grandeur, and the "stern frowning glories" of the Highlands and the Hebrides. All who have made the tour of the island, and in their wanderings have paid a visit to Loch Ranza, with its fishermen's huts and its ruined castle, so well described by Sir Walter Scott as "the lone hamlet which the island bay and circling mountains sever from the world," have acknowledged that there is no lovelier or more romantically secluded spot on the western shores of Scotland. In summer time, or, better still, in middle autumn when the heather dons its richest purple, and the birch-trees shake out their golden tresses to the low soft wind of the West—the last sigh of the dying beauty of the year—Loch Ranza is the paradise of seclusion.

Thirty years ago a fisherman, George McKinnon, resided in one of the huts on the shore of the bay, along with his wife Margaret and his only child Alice, a brown-haired little beauty about three years of age. Unfortunately, the wife of McKinnon, after the birth of this child, became subject to spasmodic fits, accompanied by intense agony, which, when they passed off, left her in a state of extreme prostration. These fits attacked her at night when her husband was away in his boat down the Sound of Kilbrannan, whose waves, when the stormy west wind blows, send their spray over the roofs of the cottages that cluster round the bay of Loch Ranza. While the mother lay moaning in bed, tended, to the best of their ability, by her kind-hearted female neighbours, the child would sit by the fire of peat on the hearth, following and noticing everything with her great blue eyes. Wordsworth tells us that a little child can form no idea of death—what understanding could Alice McKinnon have of pain? She might dimly divine from the whispered words of the watchers and tenders that it was something that should not be, something wrong; and she noticed that each time her father returned home and found her mother laid in the bed, he would put his hands over his eyes and sit and shake till the tears trickled out between his fingers. Day or night the child would sit on the hearth, wondering and noticing, till she dropped asleep, and a bed was improvised for her at the fireside.

A few weeks passed on and Mrs. McKinnon's fits became not only more frequent, but began to attack her in the daytime, and they did so one afternoon when her husband happened to be at home. He resolved, whatever the cost, to procure the services of a skilled medical man, and such Dr. Longlands, of Millport, was reported to be; but to bring him from such a distance would involve much expense. McKinnon had some little money laid by, yet he could ill-afford to break upon it, for it was kept against the evil day that might come when his nets should be lost or his boat shattered and swamped. But Margaret's life was more than boat or nets to him. He started at once across the mountains for Corrie, which he reached in time to catch the up Clyde steamboat, to the steward of which he entrusted a letter to Dr. Longlands. At an early hour on the following afternoon the doctor arrived by steamer at Corrie, and, having procured a gig from the innkeeper, in less than an hour stood by the bedside of the sorely-afflicted woman, who was then in a prostrate state, without motion and apparently without life. He felt her pulse, raised her eyelids, and, turning to the women who had been attending to her, gathered from them a tolerably clear and concise history of the case. Little Alice was seated as usual by the fireside. Her large eyes seemed to grow larger after the arrival of the doctor. She followed his every movement. She saw him take a bottle from his pocket, hold it against the window-light, uncork it, and, putting it to his lips, taste the contents and nod his head approvingly. She saw him pour something out of it into a teacup and go to her mother's bedside, and, after a while, she heard him say, "I am glad, McKinnon, I have got your wife to take it. I will wait for half-an-hour or so and give her another dose." She heard this but knew not what it meant. By-and-by Mrs. McKinnon rallied so much as to be able to sit up and partake of a cup of tea. The first words she spoke were "Doctor, I thank you," to which McKinnon added, "And so do I. In God's good and great mercy you have preserved my wife to me; glory be to His name!"

[1] For the materials of this article I am chiefly indebted to the valuable "Church History of Ireland," by the Rev. R. King.

The doctor, when he was about to depart, said in an encouraging tone, "Now that summer has really set in, and the good folks of Glasgow are making their way to the seaside, I shall frequently visit Arran and will not forget to give you a call." McKinnon and his wife's faithful attendants followed the doctor to the outside of the cottage and wished him God-speed on his journey home as he stepped into the gig and was driven away. Alice also had toddled to the door, and stood watching the gig till it rounded the head of the loch and disappeared among the hills.

Several weeks elapsed before Mrs. McKinnon, in her own phrase, was able to be about the house. In the absence of her husband, she and her child were well looked after by the neighbours, one or two of whom never failed to call during the day. Though the sunshine might be bright and the children of the hamlet running and racing in their joy beside the sea-waves, that came dancing up the sandy shores of the loch, Alice never thought of leaving the cottage, but would sit at the fireside fondling at times the cat, but ever watching her mother or gazing on the bottle, now empty, which the doctor had brought and which was now placed on a shelf at the foot of her mother's bed. That bottle had a strange fascination for the child; she regarded it fearfully and reverently as the savage his fetish, but both it and the bringer of it were things too great for her mental grasp.

Ever since the departure of the doctor she had been repeating his name, as she dimly guessed it to be, to herself. "Docky, Docky," she would lisp in whispers as she gazed alternately on her mother, and the talisman that had silenced her mother's sobbing and shrieking, and made her father and the neighbours all look so happy. Did the thought ever enter the brain of that three year old child, that the bottle possessed no power in itself, and that only in the hands of him who brought it could it work wonders? It did.

It was now the middle of autumn, when the highland mountains clothe themselves in their splendour; when the heather has intermingled its shades of red and purple; when a warm tint suffuses the lichens and mosses on crag and boulder, and the straths and glens are carpeted with velvet wrought in many hues and patterns by the grasses, the rushes, and the wild flowers. Better than all the beauty of mountain and valley to the fisher folks of Loch Ranza was the substantial fact that in this particular autumn, the herring shoals were surpassingly abundant in the Sound of Kilbrannan. The Loch Ranza fishermen landed their catches at Campbelltown on the opposite side of the Sound, and did not set sail for home till the afternoon of the Saturday. During McKinnon's necessarily long absence his wife fell ill, and symptoms of a more than usually alarming nature began to develop themselves.

One Saturday, just before sunset and about the time McKinnon might be expected home, his Margaret was struggling convulsively between life and death. Her kindly neighbours were round her bed, but they were powerless. In their eager anxiety for the mother they did not observe the child climb on to a chair, take the empty medicine bottle from the shelf, pass the door which stood open to admit as much fresh air as possible to the sufferer, and toddle off in the direction taken by the gig on the day when the doctor went away. She, the brown haired, bright-eyed baby passed the half dozen houses which comprised the hamlet unnoticed, for the girls and boys and the old men were away to bring home the turf from the hillsides, and the children had not returned from their play among the shells and seaweed at the entrance of the loch. Beyond the narrow bounds of the village, Alice knew nothing of the road; nothing more than this, that it was the way the doctor went. On she toddled, muttering "Docky, Docky," and looking, doubtless every now and then at the bottle which she carefully and tightly grasped in her tiny hands, fearful, perhaps, that it might fall and break or even fly away. On she went with her eyes fixed on the road, unconscious of the darkness that was following fast on the gloaming. Close by the shepherd's hut on the shoulder of Ben Hoosh she was overtaken by a party of anglers who had been fishing Loch Tanna and were hurrying on to Corrie. One of the party, a medical student, as was afterwards ascertained, stopped to pat the chubby cheeks, and to him she earnestly repeated the words "Docky, Docky," which he supposed was some Gaelic expression of thanks or greeting. So the party passed on, never doubting but that the hut they saw on the mountain side was her home. On she went, until in the darkness she wandered from the road.

While the child was toddling onwards, helplessly lost in the deepening shadows of the night, the father, in his boat, was speeding across the waves of the Sound, that were rising wrathfully with the rising gale. The lightnings were flashing round the summit of Goat Fell. An autumn storm was impending; brief but terrible. The tempest burst forth in all its madness, as McKinnon's boat, pressed by the gale, dashed into the shelter of Loch Ranza. Not a light gleamed in any cottage window but his own. He knew all was not right at home, and he made up his mind for the worst. He halted, trembling, at the door, he scarcely knew why. He entered; all was still. He gently pushed the women aside who stood round the bed, and looked on his wife. Her eyes were closed as in a painless slumber, and as he bent down to kiss her, her spirit passed away.

He sat down at the head of the bed, but neither sobbed nor wept. The blow had fallen, but not unexpected. Gazing on the dead face, he said softly, "Come, Alice, come to me, darling! You and I are all that are left now." The child was missed for the first time by the watchers. They were afraid to tell him so. Impatiently he cried, "Why don't you bring the child?" and meeting no reply, he raised his head and looked round the kitchen, and into the faces of the women who stood around him dumb. "Where is she?" he asked, with bitter impatience, "What have you done with her? Is she also dead? Oh, God, Thou hast filled to overflowing the cup of my sorrowing, but trusting in Thee I will drink the draught." He sank back in the chair for a moment and then stood up erect and calm. "Can none of ye tell me anything of my child?" and none could. Heedless of the tempest's fury, he stepped into the darkness and hurried along the road leading to Corrie, shouting at every step, "Alice! Alice!" but beyond the roll of the thunder and its reverberations as it shook the silence of the mountains no sound met his ears. He reached Corrie about midnight. The inn was lighted up; the angling party had not retired to rest, and when they heard of McKinnon's trouble they volunteered to assist him in the search. Lanterns and blankets were procured, and when the storm had passed away and the golden dawn was stealing down the sides of Goat Fell, the medical student discovered the child among some ferns that grew around the base of a gigantic boulder-stone. Its eyes were closed, and as he lifted it, it feebly muttered "Docky." The student took the bottle from her chilled grasp, stripped her of her damp clothes, and wrapping a blanket round her, placed her in her father's arms. McKinnon spoke not one word of thanks, but looked a thousand. Unbuttoning his pilot jacket to fold Alice in it, he went his way to Loch Ranza, accompanied by the student. When they crossed the threshold of the house of death the child was dead, and McKinnon laid it on the bed beside its dead mother.

Before the year came to a close, George McKinnon died of what is vaguely termed shock to the system.

When the tourist sets forth from Brodick or Corrie, and passing over the eastern ridge of Goat Fell, or down the grassy declivities of Ben Hoosh, descends on Loch Ranza, he will see the quiet hamlet, the little children playing round the boats drawn up upon the beach, the mothers on the door-steps clasping their infants to their bosoms, and looking across the Sound of Kilbrannan for the fleet of tawny sails, but the memory of little Alice has passed away. Father mother and child, are laid to rest in one nameless grave in a churchyard near Corrie, the saddest and sweetest spot in the island.

R. P. SCOTT.

IN THE DAYS OF THE GREAT ARMADA.

BY CRONA TEMPLE.

CHAPTER VII.

"THEIR hearts have failed them." Effingham's words were true. The pride and courage of Spain had broken, broken as a stately tree may be snapped by a hurricane. It was no longer a mighty fleet in orderly array, but a mob of ships, torn and shattered, that ran before the gale into the stormy waters of the North Sea.

"Their hearts have failed them." Yes; it was in vain that Medina strove to rally some few, at least, of his huge craft, and collect strength enough to force the straits in the teeth of the wind and the English.

"He is mad," those highborn and most terrified Dons said as they heard his useless orders and frantic pleadings. "Mad! for who but a madman would talk of taking ships vast as ours through narrow seas into the actual jaws of death? The English—we are men, and can fight with men—we could master the English; but who can battle with the tempest? Who can sail against the wind? Who can control this evil storm?"

So northward they sailed, more willing to try the dangerous navigation round the whole British Isles than to face again those fatal straits.

Disasters fell on them thick and fast.

The wild currents and tide-eddies amongst the western islands baffled them. Dozens of ships were lost on the coasts of Scotland and of Ireland; hundreds of soldiers and seamen were drowned, and hundreds more, reaching land with pain and peril, only met with a more horrible death from the fury or the avarice of the wild clans of the west.

The old historian, Camden, thus sums up the matter in his quaint language:—"This great Armada, which had been three complete years in rigging and preparing, with infinite expense, was, within one month's space, many times fought with, and at the last overthrown; not an hundred men of the English being missing, nor any one ship lost (for all the shot from the tall Spanish ships flew quite over the English) and after it had been driven round about all Britain, by Scotland, the Orkneys, and Ireland, grievously tossed and very much distressed, impaired and mangled by storms and wrecks, the remnant enduring all manner of miseries, at length returned home with shame and dishonour."

And meanwhile the bells that Doris had heard clanged out their tale of deliverance and joy. And Queen Elizabeth went in high state to "Paul's Church" through the city streets, which were all hung with blue, and there she and her people returned solemn thanks to God—as, indeed, they had good cause to do.

There was wonderful rejoicing through England in the days that followed.

The lifting of the cloud of uncertainty and fear that had hung over the nation for years was in itself a blessing for which to be glad. No one would dare to invade the land now; Philip and the rest of the jealous Catholic kings had received their lesson. England and her religion were safe.

And over the victory itself the nation went wild with joy. The storm had done much: the elements had fought against the Spanish, it was true, but the valour of English seamen had done its work before ever the storm arose. The army had not drawn a sword, but every man felt certain as to what the army would have done had the enemy made good his footing on English soil! And as for the queen—perhaps never before or since has sovereign been so firmly fixed in the proud hearts of a people.

On her side Elizabeth did not do all that she might have done for the men who had served her with such ardour. But she showered honours and rewards on the Admiral and his captains. She thanked the volunteers who had fitted out ships at their private cost; and who had themselves sailed off to the fighting, being ready to risk, not only their ships and their substance, but their very lives to defend their country and their faith.

Dan Lavin, in after years, was never weary of telling how in St. James's palace he had stood with his cap in his hand "along with many other nobles and gentlemen," and how the queen came slowly by, with all her gallant train, and how she blazed with jewels, and how the small crown topped her royal head like the vane on a mast, and how she spoke to one and all, but specially and most particularly to him, Dan Lavin. "She held out her hand to me, and I squeezed it with all due respect," honest Dan would say, "and I went down on my bended knee while I held it tight, for I know what is due to a queen."

Earle Clatworthy who, as a gentleman-volunteer, was present at this famous reception, declared that Dan not only held the royal hand "tight," but pulled himself up from his knees by the help of it; but then Earle was always a graceless and a mischievous lad, and was not at all properly impressed by the dazzling dignity of the maiden queen.

"Her gown was very, very, very fine," he said afterwards to Doris, "but her face was as thin as my hatchet, and much about the same shape. She gave me her hand, too, and I kissed it, just as I had seen the Lord Admiral do, but it was hard and bony—not a bit like your hand, Doris. But her eyes—they were sharp! Like blue needles. It was good enough hearing to be praised by her, but I would rather face the Spanish fleet over again than earn a scolding from our Queen Elizabeth."

Sir Robert Bulteel was not able to go to St. James's palace. That wound of his went sore with him, and for many days he lay in the narrow cabin of the Ark-Raleigh, too ill to heed either victory or queen. In the hurry and turmoil of those days immediately after the capture of the Santa Anna there was only time for very rough and ready surgery. Robert's wound had been probed and the ball extracted, but no one had much leisure to spend on nursing and tending; and when the Admiral brought his ships into the Thames the man he had knighted "for conspicuous valour" was so near to death that it seemed certain he could never live to enjoy his share of the glory.

Effingham, as soon as he recollected him at all, did all in his power to save him. Like many extraordinarily brave men the Admiral was as gentle as a woman, and his visits to the dark little berth where poor Robert tossed in misery, were the first thing that made the sufferer wish to get better.

For he suffered tortures from his wounds; tortures also from the fever which had followed, and very dark and dreary thoughts took possession of him. Life seemed a queer jumbled thing to him as he lay there on the confines of that "undiscovered country" the looming of whose shore makes our world look so mean.

WORDS OF CHEER.

He had fought up through hardship and through disappointment;—he had succeeded. And of what worth was success to him now?

He had earned a living honestly; and though an unknown unfriended lad, had made himself a place amongst honourable men. He had won Doris's love, and at the thought of Doris that poor despairing heart of his thrilled painfully—it was, after all, hard to die when life held promise of things so sweet! And yet, so the half-formed thoughts went drifting on through his brain—and yet might not love itself prove to be as vain as all the rest?

How he had panted for victory over the Spaniards! Now they told him victory had been given; and what cared he? How he had longed to make for himself name and fame that the girl he loved might be proud of him! He had earned his title: a coat of arms, for a surety, should he wish to take them from the Herald's College; and like the rest he would be praised and rewarded as one of those who had saved England in her need. But how little he cared for it all!

Life, and its good things shrank until nothing remained for him except the dim sense of loss in place of gain, of failure where all had been success. And Robert Bulteel groaned in the bitterness of his spirit as the future rose before him, the future which he was so ill-prepared to meet.

And then to him came Lord Howard of Effingham.

Perhaps the Admiral had fought through some such experience himself—certainly he appeared to divine some part of the trouble that was weighing on Robert's soul.

"You must keep your pluck up," he said, smiling down on him with those dark eyes that always appeared to Robert as though they could see further and deeper than other men's eyes. "You must look forward to the days when your people down in Devon will nurse their hero back to strength, and soon patch up that angry spot on your shoulder. A whiff of Devon air will bring the life into you."

"I don't know that I want much more of life, my lord; and I have no people."

"But some one you have, who loves you, that I'll warrant, Bulteel. And as for life—why, my good fellow, you have not begun to know the meaning of it yet, and do you want to pack out of it without an inkling of its just value?"

"You have not begun to know the meaning of it yet." Had not Thomas Clatworthy, Doris's father, said some words like those long ago? What did they mean? Was it necessary to pass middle age before a man might comprehend such a simple thing as existence?

"You see," went on Effingham, speaking very quietly, almost coldly, but with an earnestness that showed symptoms of the fire below the snow, "you see we are deceived by our passions, blinded by our wills, tossed this way and that by 'circumstances' as we say, but really by the outcome of our ungoverned thoughts and ill-judged doings. Some men rail at what they call their 'fate,' some men follow what they think is pleasure, and strive to forget there is any 'beyond' at all. And some men just try to do their duty all round."

Robert gazed up at the speaker. Would he not say more? Were there not men who had got further than this? For Robert himself had tried to do his duty, and in these days (which might be the end) he found no comfort therein.

We cannot tell what were the deeper thoughts of the great Englishmen who fought these battles. But we to-day know that there is more than duty required of us: though perhaps that "more" may sound to be less. It is love. There lies the meaning of life. Our Captain above has given all for us: He lived a man's life for us: He died a man's death for us: He loved us, He loves us; and He asks for our love in return. Duty—well it seems that none who love Him would wish to leave duty undone: not one of His servants would willingly fail in their service. But our sense of duty can never be the measure of His great love to us.

This wounded man who had found life a pleasant thing, a noble thing—who had faced death calmly half a score of times—felt that in his existence the thought of this love had no place. "The Captain above" had had no service from him.

He had not known the meaning of a man's life. It is just that—to use our days and months and years for the service of Him who has granted our time to us: not rendering ourselves up as bond-slaves, held by fear, or by duty, but loving Him because He Himself holds us dear. And in such loving service there is light, and joy, and exceeding liberty.

When Effingham left his cabin that day, Robert Bulteel fell into a long reverie. Higher thoughts came to him.

And Doris? Did she know the purpose for which her earthly years were given?

"We will strive together," he said, "to make life more worthy, if so be that God will grant me yet a little while wherewith to find His face."

Presently, when the sailor who brought his food entered the cabin, Robert Bulteel was asleep; and at the sound of the step he stirred and smiled, and the man heard him murmur the broken words, "Love. . . and light. . . and joy. . ." and then his sleep fell more deeply on him, and he lay quite still; but the smile yet lingered on his lips.

"He will weather it now," the sailor said, as he looked down on the quiet face. "His life has come back to him."

And it was a truer and greater life that had come to him then: although even Robert himself did not know it for many and many a day.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XIV.

By the following description find the name of a city in Israel, not far from Mount Gilboa.

1. A woman lived there who became the wife of a good king.
2. A sick man rested there and received a friend.
3. A good man lived there who was basely slandered.
4. It is mentioned by a messenger sent by Elisha.
5. It had a watch-tower and a fountain.
6. Two kings drove towards it in great haste, but at different times and for different reasons.
7. Two kings met there and both were killed; the "destruction" of one was "of the Lord."
8. On two occasions very dreadful sights were seen at its gate.
9. Ahaziah's father had a palace there.
10. A king and a prophet entered it together and afterwards met there.
11. Horses, chariots and dogs are often mentioned in connection with it.
12. A woman lived there who used witchcraft.
13. A public fast was held there.
14. A great slaughter took place in it.
15. The names of four persons are given who were killed there. One was shot, one was stoned, one was "smitten"; the death of the fourth was unlike that of any other recorded in Scripture.
16. It was part of the dominion of a king proclaimed by Abner.
17. Its "rulers" and "nobles" twice received royal commands which involved murder, and obeyed them.
18. Its early inhabitants were very difficult to drive out.

L. T.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. IV.

1. He was a companion of an apostle.
2. He is known to have followed a certain profession.
3. He wrote two books in the Bible.
4. They were written specially for a single person.
5. One of them is the only book in the New Testament that contains a song.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMAS.

NO. X.—p. 302.—MARTHA.

1.	M-anoah	Judges xiii. 1-20.
2.	A-nt	Prov. vi. 6-8.
3.	R-ameses	Gen. xlvii. 11.
4.	T-aberah.	Num. xi. 1-3.
5.	H-ammedatha . . .	Esth. iii. 1.
6.	A-damant	Zech. vii. 12.

NO. XI.—p. 320.—FAITH, WORLD.

1.	F-ollo-w	1 Thess. v. 15.
2.	A-bed-nego-o	Dan. iii. 23, 25.
3.	I-nne-r	Acts xvi. 24.
4.	T-oi-l.	Gen. xli. 51.
5.	H-ee-d	Acts iii. 5.

ANSWER TO HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. V.—p. 334.

Hatred stirreth up strifes: but love covereth up all sins. —Prov. x. 12.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DANK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARGARETA COLBERG.

A TALE OF THE REFORMATION.

BETA THREW A VAST AMOUNT OF MOCK HUMILITY INTO THE LOW REVERENCE WITH WHICH SHE GREETED HER FRIEND.

No. 1785.—JULY 14, 1888.

CHAPTER III.—THE KNIGHT OF THE BLUE RIBBON.

VALENCIENNES, as its name commemorates, was founded by the Emperor Valentinian, and by him it was destined to be a city of refuge for thieves and outlaws. In the times before anything like impartial justice was known, kings of kindly impulse sometimes created these asylums, as they were called, in order to give the weak some chance against the powerful. Soon, however, it appeared that the object aimed at had not been attained, the cities of refuge becoming mere dens of thieves and cut-throats who preyed upon the surrounding neighbourhood. By degrees order asserted itself, and the character of Valenciennes had been thoroughly reformed long before our story opens. Lying in a fertile valley on both banks of the Scheldt it was admirably adapted to become a thriving city in an age when rivers were the best ways of transport. Being near the frontier of France the place was well fortified with castle and walls, but more dependable than walls of stone were those walls of water with which at need the town could be surrounded in a few hours. A few sluices had to be opened, a few dykes struck down, and the kindly river did the rest. It sent great volumes of water over the plain, filling the valley, leaving here and there a church perched upon an island to show the baffled enemy where lay the cunning city they could not conquer. More than once when hard pressed has Holland cast the cloak of her waters about her, bidding defiance alike to the rage of an Alva, the craft of a Farnese, and the might of a Louis Quatorze.

But to-day there was no thought of fighting. Valenciennes was decking herself in banners, and her children were putting on their gayest attire. This was the great day when their Stadtholder, the most noble marquis Berghen, was to make his solemn entry into the town.

Margareta's heart beat high with expectation. She had no longer reason to tremble for her father's safety, for the rumour about the Edicts had not been confirmed; everything seemed peaceful as of yore, and she looked forward to a day of great enjoyment. Her filial pride had been gratified, for Simon Colberg had been chosen for the post of honour—he was to bear the standard of his guild—he would march at the head of his company and be seen by every one.

"Oh, father, how splendid you look!" cried Margareta, clapping her hands for joy as she stood admiring him.

"Yes," assented Colberg cheerfully, as he put his shining helmet decked with plumes upon his head, "fine feathers make fine birds."

"No, it is you who make the clothes seem fine," said Margareta enthusiastically. "That crimson cloak wouldn't appear wonderful on anybody else, but it makes you look like a king."

"Fie, fie, that's treason," said Colberg with mock severity.

"Your father is a much taller man than the king," said dame Colberg in her usual matter-of-fact manner. "I saw him once in Brussels, he is small, and his knees are crooked, and he is very yellow."

"Oh, that's always the way with you fair women," retorted Colberg, "you deem everybody ugly who is not as white as yourselves."

"No," answered the wife composedly, "you had never a white complexion; but I remember I thought you a very handsome young man."

"And so he is now," affirmed Margareta energetically, for she did not approve of the past tense in which her mother spoke. "He is the finest man in Valenciennes, and will be the very handsomest in all the procession, I know he will. There is not one can compare with my father."

"What, not one?" asked Colberg slyly.

Margareta blushed.

"Ha, ha!" laughed the father as he tapped her playfully on the cheek. "I thought so; however to-day I shall walk first, let who will ride after me."

The procession in which Simon Colberg was to take so honourable a part started from the Hainault Gate, where the keys of the city were presented to the Stadtholder by the Burghermeister, and after passing down the principal quay, and through the market square, proceeded to the cathedral, where the chief persons in the pageant heard mass. Of course, throughout the entire length of the way, the windows were crowded with spectators, and every available spot was full of them; but it was chiefly in the market square that the greater portion were collected.

Margareta and her mother had been invited by the Van Oosts to come to their house, from the windows of which, situated as it was in the middle of the market square, a good view could be obtained; and thither they went immediately after the departure of Simon Colberg to join the procession.

Beta van Oost threw a vast amount of mock humility into the extravagantly low reverence with which she greeted her friend—

"Your gracious majesty deigns to honour us with the presence of her gown."

Margareta smiled good humouredly at the short, stout, silk-bedecked figure bowing before her. It is true she wore the famous Queen Eleanor dress, but she must have been more than blind not to know that it became her magnificently. The lustrous yellow-tinted fabric, with its gold-embossed flowers, seemed merely the suitable and proper adornment for her rich beauty. Her splendid figure, though she moved with rare unconscious grace, was set off by its simple folds. A high-backed ruff of transparent Brussels' point lace, seemed to hold her white throat in a dainty nest. Her hands were bare, for in the days when Margareta lived, gloves were worn merely for protection against cold.

Our hands have, in a modified degree, succumbed to the same evil destiny which has overtaken the feet of Chinese ladies. The main object being to convince beholders with the fact that they are undeveloped by any work, they are accordingly forced into gloves far too small for comfort, with the result that each individual finger stands out stiff and shapeless like a wooden peg. They have lost much in character by this senseless compression. The cultured lady of to-day effaces her hands as far as possible, with what evil effect let all artists deplore; and while we train many other members of the body with individual and particular care, we have curiously enough treated with almost complete neglect one of the most beautiful and expressive of them all.

Margareta's hands were large and shapely; they were firm, loving hands, with supple fingers deft in many feminine crafts; hands that would return the clasp of a friend with heart-felt pressure, and not lie limp and nerveless in the grasp with the meaningless flexibility of a dead fish.

It was indeed a gorgeous sight upon which Margareta looked as she leaned out of the window. A clear October day did not a little with its bright sunshine to render the scene brilliant. The square was already filled with spectators, while in every window the sunshine flashed upon a hundred colours in silks, velvets and satins, and lighted up a thousand gems.

The free-handed Flemish nobles, always loving a display, spent immense sums of money upon themselves and their suites on occasions such as this. The city burghers, not to be out-done in magnificence by their neighbours from the castles, had taxed their guilds heavily in order to furnish funds to enable them to appear splendidly in the procession.

"There's your father," said Beta van Oost, as the compact troup of weavers approached immediately behind the city train-bands who led the van of the glittering array.

As Simon Colberg passed beneath their window, he waved his banner slightly, and Margareta acknowledged the salute by kissing her hand to him.

And now a mighty shout rent the air, as the Stadtholder rode into the square, and from every window went forth a white flutter of welcome, as the women waved their kerchiefs.

The Marquis Berghen, governor of the province, was one of the most stately of all the nobles who gave lustre to the court of Brussels. In the prime of life he was a man of commanding stature and military aspect. Although the expression of his countenance was somewhat harsh, he had the reputation of being among those of the Regent's councillors who advocated mild measures with regard to heretics. The Stadtholder rode a superb black charger whose fiery temper he curbed with the skill acquired in a hundred tournaments. He was dressed in a demi-suit of gilt armour, while two curly-haired pages, walking at each stirrup, carried his plumed helmet and his sword.

"Do you hear that, Margareta, they shout, 'Liberty and the Fatherland?'"

Both young girls leaned far out of the window to catch, if possible, a glimpse of the Stadtholder's face when this patriotic cry reached his ears. The shouting continued, almost deafening them. "Long live Berghen!" "Down with the Foreigners!" "Drive out the Spanish dogs!" After every such daring watchword, the cheering became tremendous.

"He accepts the applause," said Margareta. "See! he smiles even."

"Ah, he is a true Fleming at heart," cried excitable little Beta. "A Berghen for ever!"

"Hush!" cried Margareta. "Girls must not shout."

But the warning came too late. The Marquis heard the shrill salute just over his head, and looking up, he waved a gracious acknowledgement.

Margareta drew back confused, but a secret longing impelled her to look forth again immediately. There was one in that throng behind the Marquis, whose eyes would seek anxiously for her, and she would have felt the scene lacked some of its brightness, had she missed that glance.

A young man of about two and twenty, in a gleaming steel corslet, with a velvet cap and plumes on his head instead of a helmet, came slowly on amidst the train of nobles. He rode a spirited dappled grey, but he seemed more intent on examining the windows beneath which he passed, than in paying attention to the restive movements of his impatient horse. At last he found what his eyes searched for, and a bright smile lit up his countenance. He bent low over his saddle, and then standing up in his stirrups, he raised his lance upright. On the end of it fluttered a tiny blue ribbon.

"Margareta, yonder knight salutes us," said Beta. "Do you know him?"

"Yes," replied her friend with heightened colour.

"He has a favour on his lance. Who is he?"

"The Sieur de Swarte."

"What!" exclaimed Beta. "Is that the knight who asked you for a favour at the Midsummer Tilt, and who rode so splendidly?"

"Yes," replied Margareta, watching the fluttering blue ribbon as it was borne onward amidst the waving field of lances.

"He is right to show the favour he maintained so gallantly in the tilt," said Beta emphatically. "I did not see his face then as he had his visor down."

It was now six months since the eyes of this fair-haired young soldier had first rested upon Margareta, and by this time she was conscious that they were different to her from all the other eyes in the world.

CHAPTER IV.—BERTRAND TO THE RESCUE.

It happened in this way.

Margareta had been to the city gate with Rosa to visit a poor sick woman who lived near by, and being detained later than usual, it was dark before she set out upon her return. In a lonely street they were suddenly accosted by a couple of Spanish soldiers belonging to a troop recently quartered in Valenciennes. These ruffians loudly declared their belief that Margareta was an accursed heretic, and with oaths and insults announced their determination of taking her then and there before their commanding officer, in order to have her orthodoxy inquired into. Just as one of the fellows seized her by the arm, intending to carry his threat into execution, he received a smart blow on his shoulder from a small sword.

"Begone for a dog, lest I give thee a thrust instead of a blow," cried an angry voice from behind, and the two soldiers shrunk away with muttered curses.

This timely newcomer was a young man in military dress, who had been attracted to the spot by Rosa's cries for help. He raised his cap deferentially, and standing with it in his hand, begged to know might he escort the "gracious damoiselle" to her home, and protect her against further annoyance.

Poor Margareta was for the moment too terrified to answer a word. Rosa therefore struck in with great animation and volubility, to declare that her young mistress owed her life to his excellency —that her father would be forever bound in gratitude to his greatness—that they dwelt in the Rue de l'Etoile at the sign of the Crown—that his highness doubtless was acquainted with Simon Colberg the renowned weaver from Tournay. Most assuredly, Rosa would have gone on to relate the family triumph of Queen Eleanor's gown, only that Margareta silenced her, and in a low tremulous voice thanked the young cavalier for his kindness, at the same time intimating that she would gladly accept his escort.

It was too dark for the knight to see the face of the maiden whom he had rescued, but the trembling voice was very sweet, and he rightly conjectured that it belonged to a young girl. Accordingly when she accepted his hand to be led forward, such being the fashion of the day, what could he do but press it reassuringly since it quivered so pitifully in his grasp? They went forward in silence, with Rosa following close behind.

When they had arrived at the door of her house the youth ventured to hope that the lady had now recovered from her fright, and Margareta thanked him for his courtesy. The young man remained beside her in order to render her into her friends' safe keeping, and as it was Simon Colberg himself who opened the door he surprised that excellent man not a little. Instead of Margareta and Rosa merely, there stood his daughter, pale to the very lips, attended by an extremely handsome young soldier, who was moreover a total stranger to him. Seeing the look of amazement which crossed the father's face as this sight presented itself to his eyes, Margareta made haste to explain. She was much indebted to the honourable knight, she said, for having come to her assistance when she was beset by two Spanish soldiers, and for having freed her from them, and afterwards for bringing her safely home. At the mention of the hated Spanish soldiers, Simon looked with a quick glance of pleasure towards the young man, and when his daughter had ceased speaking he stepped forward and said cordially:

"Sir, be pleased to enter and receive my thanks and those of my wife."

The young gentleman was nothing loth to accept the invitation, as he was willing to pursue somewhat further an acquaintance so happily begun, and moreover Margareta's beauty had not escaped his observation during that short pause at the door, and he would gladly see a little more of her. Accordingly he entered the great hall and counter-room where the apprentices were busy putting away for the night the piles of Colberg's rich tapestries. Simon led the way upstairs into the sitting-room where his wife was waiting somewhat anxiously for Margareta's return. He spoke as he entered the room, at the same time indicating the young stranger, saying:

"Wife Alice, here is a gentleman, to whom our very deepest thanks are due for having brought our child home safely out of the clutches of the Spanish soldiers."

The mother uttered a faint cry, and turning hastily to her daughter, who had come close to her while Simon was speaking, said in an agitated voice:

"Oh Margareta! My child!" she then kissed her and passed her hands eagerly several times over her hair and shoulders, as if desirous of assuring herself by touch that her darling was safe. She then turned to their visitor, and holding out one hand to him while with the other she kept fast hold of Margareta, said:

"Sir, be very welcome among us."

Bertrand de Swarte, for such was the young knight's name, did not fail to respond to so tempting an assurance. He came the next and for several succeeding days to inquire for Margareta and to ask if she had recovered from the fright she had received. But at length he ceased to make use of an excuse so flimsy, and came simply because he liked the visits and knew that he was welcome. Bertrand was the youngest son of a noble family of Utrecht, one which could boast of more gentle blood than guldens. Like most younger sons in those times he sought to carve out a fortune for himself by the sword. For the time being he was at Valenciennes performing military service under that excellent commander Louis von Brera, governor of the citadel. Bertrand, though a Roman Catholic, was intensely patriotic, and looked with the utmost hatred upon all Spaniards, though he more than once insisted to dame Colberg that he was much beholden to them, and even owed them the deepest gratitude. For was it not the Spaniards who were the cause of his becoming acquainted with her and her family?

This then was the beginning of Margareta's acquaintance with Bertrand, an acquaintance which was surely ripening into that deeper feeling so apt to spring out of friendships between young men and maidens.

At the jousts on Johannistag Bertrand had publicly flattered Margareta by asking her for a token under favour of which he hoped to win a good place in the lists. As he reined up his steed suddenly before her, and sat silently in the saddle, according to the old-fashioned manner, waiting for her to place something on the point of his lance, she thought this was the finest figure in the tilting yard. Of course Bertrand was clad in armour, and his helmet was closed, but Margareta was not in the least doubt as to who it was.

"What shall I give him?" she asked hurriedly, somewhat embarrassed by the sudden appearance of the knight, for she knew nothing of his intention to try his luck in the tournament.

"A favour, a favour!" cried the bystanders, with that ready instinct of giving advice which makes a crowd yell fiercely to a jockey to ride on in a race, as if he did not already exert himself to the utmost to do that very thing.

"Give him thy neck band," suggested dame Colberg with a genial smile. She suspected shrewdly enough who the armed knight was likely to be, and did not feel averse to having her daughter distinguished by good tilting. For in some inscrutable manner the skill of a knight successful in the lists reflected honour upon the lady whose favour he bore.

Margareta, with her face lit up by one of her rare blushes, accordingly unfastened from her throat the narrow blue ribbon that adorned it, and with fingers trembling with excitement she tied the feeble silken streamer around the lance presented to her. Naturally enough after that, the tilting-yard contained for Margareta but one rider, around whom the rest continually revolved and were interesting only as far as they were concerned with the knight whom she had decorated. It must be admitted that he did honour to her ribbon and bore it gallantly throughout the day, and although not the victor of the tournay, Margareta's champion was among the three who were declared "worthy," and they passed out together to enjoy the acclamations of the delighted spectators. The young girl's heart swelled with pride, as she heard "The Blue Ribbon! the Blue Ribbon!" shouted again and again by those who admired the splendid horsemanship of him who bore that device.

Since this is the history of the Blue Ribbon it is small wonder if Margareta should look for its bearer with secret eagerness when viewing the Stadtholder's procession. Yet when the scrap of fluttering silk passed beneath her window she turned her eyes away from it after the first glance. For beneath the tiny banner her eyes had met a well-known face turned upwards towards her and two deep blue eyes looking straight into her own. She had turned her face away. Unkind Margareta! But the knight did not look much chagrined, he even smiled as if he suspected that she would look at him all the more when he had passed. And this is precisely what she did. Margareta watched that figure alone until the cortége of nobles, passing round a corner and turning down the Rue de Roi, was hidden from her sight. Then she gave a slight sigh, and as far as she was concerned the procession was over, although splendid cavaliers were still riding past the window.

ST. JOHN:

APOSTLE, EVANGELIST, AND SEER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

III.—THE DISCIPLE WHOM JESUS LOVED.

THE prominence assigned in the first three Gospels to the Apostle John is shared by his brother James, and by Simon Peter; in one case by Andrew also. "Peter and James and John and Andrew asked Jesus privately," [1] as though belonging to the inner circle of His fellowship: perhaps as the four original disciples, perhaps from some high qualities marking them out from the rest. The three, again, without Andrew, are the privileged spectators of the miracle wrought on the child of Jairus, and afterwards of the Transfiguration on Hermon,[2] and of the Agony in Gethsemane. That John himself describes none of these memorable scenes is only another illustration, and perhaps the most striking one, of the fact that his Gospel, written with the others before him, was intended in great part to supply their omissions. One reference however he seems to make to the Transfiguration. "We beheld His glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father." [1] So had St. Peter written of the same hour of supreme revelation, "We were eye witnesses of His majesty." [2]

We shall inadequately understand that scene upon Mount Hermon if we regard it as simply a manifestation of the Saviour's divine greatness, symbolised by His robes of light and by the homage of celestial messengers. It was that, undoubtedly; but it was something more. Our Lord had gone up into "the mountain," one short week from that memorable interview with His disciples at its foot in Cæsarea Philippi, when He had first spoken fully to them of His

[1] Mark xiii. 3; Luke has "some"; Matthew, "His disciples." Mark gives St. Peter's own report of the conversation, and is naturally more precise.

[2] It may be taken as sufficiently established that Mount Hermon, and not the traditional Tabor, was the scene of the Transfiguration.

[1] John i. 14. Revised Version. See also margin.

[2] 2 Peter i. 16-18.

approaching sufferings and death. The three evangelists who record the Transfiguration connect it by express notes of time[1] with His deepest lessons on taking up the Cross, and on self-sacrifice as a condition of attaining the life eternal. And "after these sayings," as though to throw light upon their mystery, as well as to impress their memory for ever on His disciples' hearts, He led them into the solitude of the mountain height, and called into His presence the saints of olden time, that they might speak to Him and to His future witnesses to mankind of "His decease which he was about to accomplish at Jerusalem."[2] Moses and Elijah—or rather let us say the Law and the Prophets thus impersonated—appear to give their final testimony to those who are to be their successors in announcing God's truth amongst men; from the solemn past there comes a voice to the living present, declaring the mystery of God about to be fulfilled. God Himself proclaims that the ancient covenant was superseded: "This is My beloved Son: hear ye HIM." "And when the voice was past, Jesus was found alone:" the tables of the Law and the harp of Prophecy are at His feet, not indeed to be disregarded and cast away; but that the one may utter its holiest sanctions, and the other breathe its sweetest music, in connection with "the decease to be accomplished at Jerusalem."

The Transfiguration, then, was Christ's great symbolic, outward designation for the Cross. The three who beheld that sight represent the ministry in every age, whose theme should be Christ crucified. In their persons we seem to see the whole "goodly fellowship of prophets, the glorious company of the apostles, the white-robed army of martyrs":—

> Here, where the Apostle's heart of rock
> Is nerved to bear temptation's shock;
> Here, where the Son of thunder learns
> The thought that breathes, the word that burns;
> Here, where on eagle wings we move
> With him whose last best word is Love.[3]

Nor only so. Was there not some special preparation in the case of the several disciples who entered that cloud with their Redeemer?

To PETER, appointed to bear the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, the first preacher to Jews and Gentiles of a completed Gospel: to JAMES, destined to become the earliest martyr of the apostolic band: and to JOHN, who was to be the latest survivor of that goodly company, was this special revelation given. Thus would it be a presage at once of that mighty ministry in which the Cross should be the central theme, and of that last agony in which the Cross held before the closing eyes should take away the sting of death; and of that harder conflict of protracted life, with its temptations to be overcome by the blood of the Lamb, and its sorrows to be soothed by the voice of the Beloved Son. Heaven thus prepared the disciples for work, for testimony, for any fate that life or death might bring; and when the same disciples not long afterwards beheld the sorrow of Gethsemane, the lesson was but confirmed.

May we not note, again, some characteristic distinction between the recorded impression of the scene, as given by the two apostles? To Peter, the practical, the vision brought confirmatory evidence, attesting the claims of the Messiah, and making "the word of prophecy more sure."[1] "He received from God the Father honour and glory, when there came such a voice to Him from the excellent glory: This is My Beloved Son, in Whom I am well pleased; and this voice we ourselves heard come out of heaven when we were with Him in the holy mount." But John, with quickened insight, pierces at once to the very heart of the revelation. "We beheld His glory: glory as of an only begotten from a Father."[2] That glory at once revealed its source. No need of processes of reason to bring confirmation! The beloved disciple beholds the Light, and whence it flows. From that time the inner glory of Christ's work becomes more and more revealed to His disciple. It is true that, as we have seen, fresh from the wonders of Hermon and the vision of the great Elijah, he was disposed for a moment to take Elijah's part against the Samaritan despisers of the Lord; but the better mind prevails, and the apostle henceforth dwells upon the revelation of the heart of Christ, amid all the external scenes of His last great days on earth. The Entry into Jerusalem, described by the other evangelists with such wealth of detail, is briefly dismissed by him, while the profound words occasioned by the desire of "the Greeks" to see Jesus are recorded by him alone. The saying must have seemed, even to the dim apprehension of the half-instructed disciple, like an echo from Hermon: "I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men towards Myself." As St. John records the words, he bethinks himself of the vision which Isaiah beheld: "The Lord sitting upon a throne, high and lifted up; and His train filled the temple, and above Him stood the Seraphim." Isaiah "saw His glory, and he spake of Him."

Unconscious, in some measure, may have been the attraction which seemed to draw this apostle closer and closer to the Saviour's side. For he had not as yet fully grasped the truth, and was but a questioner like the rest. Yet a nearest place to his Lord was henceforth his, as if by the right of a deeper comprehension, and a holier love. John himself declares this with a frank ingenuousness; for it cannot have escaped the notice of any student of the Gospels that it is to him alone that we owe the announcement of his high distinction, as the "disciple whom Jesus loved."[3] Of this special affection the other

[1] Matthew and Mark, "After six days"; Luke, "About eight days."

[2] Luke ix. 31.

[3] Dean Stanley.

[1] 2 Peter i. 19. See Revised Version.

[2] John i. 14. Revised Version, margin.

[3] This description occurs five times; once in the account of the Supper (ch. xiii. 23); once in that of the Crucifixion, when the mother of Jesus is entrusted to his care (xix. 26); once in the narrative of the Resurrection morning (xx. 2), (where, as will be noted below, the word is slightly different); and twice in the account of the significant interview by the Sea of Galilee (xxi. 7, 20). In all these cases, there was some special reason, quite apart from the self-consciousness of the narrator, for noting the affection of the Lord for His disciple.

evangelists give no hint. But to John himself it was the one fact which had shed its illumination over all his lengthened life; and he could not but preserve the exquisite remembrance.

When we read, however, of John's "leaning on Jesus' bosom," we must rid ourselves of the idea of sentimental languor, which some minds associate with the phrase, and which has found such abundant expression on the canvas of Italian art. The meaning simply is, that after the Eastern fashion of reclining at table, the place of John was next to Jesus. Every guest was "in the bosom" of his neighbour.[1] Two words, which place the whole scene before us, are used in the narrative of the Supper. John "was at the table reclining in Jesus' bosom:" Peter beckoned to him, and asked him to ascertain from Jesus which was the betrayer. On this, John "leaning back, as he was, on Jesus' breast, saith unto Him, Lord, who is it?" This "leaning back" was to whisper, or to ask the question in a low tone, and our ordinary version, "lying on Jesus' breast," suggests a mistaken idea.

From this time we see and hear no more of the beloved disciple as distinct from the rest who listened with him to those divine discourses which no other evangelist records. These words were addressed to all; all overheard the great high-priestly prayer. Then with his brother James and his comrade Peter, John went forth to Gethsemane and beheld the Agony, of which again he says nothing, as having been adequately described by the other evangelists. But only he notes the divine majesty which prostrated the soldier-band, before Jesus surrendered Himself to their power. Then, as Matthew and Mark expressly state, "the disciples all forsook Him and fled." Was John then a fugitive with the rest? If so, he quickly recovered himself, with Peter his friend. "Simon Peter followed Jesus, and so did another disciple." Archbishop Whately endeavoured ingeniously to prove that this disciple was Judas; but his arguments have not carried conviction. The general opinion, identifying the disciple with John, appears to rest on solid grounds: he was "known to the high priest"; he went "and brought in Peter"; the particularity of the account suggesting an eye-witness—a horrified, almost heart-broken, yet silent witness—of Peter's threefold denial! "Peter went out and wept bitterly;" but his companion, intent upon every step and word of Jesus, does not note those tears. With vivid, more than dramatic minuteness, St. John details the trial before Pilate; mentioning, like Mark and Luke, the purple robe and the crown of thorns, but adding to their accounts the wonderful colloquy on the Kingship of Jesus, and the pathetic Ecce Homo. Still, our only glimpse of John's personality is when our Lord was actually on the Cross. The disciple was standing in the little group of which his own mother and the mother of Jesus formed a part. In that supreme hour, when the dying Sufferer said to Mary, Woman, behold Thy Son, and to John, Behold thy mother, He recognised the tie of blood as well as of affection, and hallowed for ever the home of the beloved disciple by the sacred trust. As to the new sonship thus indicated, we may be sure that it did not supersede the old, and that, under the roof of John, Salome and Mary[1] were reunited, as in the old days of their sisterly companionship at Nazareth. Where the home was, at Bethsaida or Jerusalem, we cannot tell; the latter is suggested by the phrase, "from that hour that disciple took her," but this cannot be pressed as a certainty. That John was in circumstances to enable him to undertake such a care, we have already seen. One difficulty sometimes raised in regard to the incident, bears upon the question of the "Lord's brethren." It is argued that had these been really sons of Joseph and Mary the mother would have been committed to their care rather than to that of a nephew. The argument has undoubtedly some weight; but it may be observed on the other side that the brethren of Jesus did not believe in Him,[2] and that the circumstances would warrant the withdrawal even of a parent for a time from their unsympathising companionship. It is true that we read in the first chapter of the Acts of Christ's brethren with His mother in the company of believers. Regarding them as the same persons in both cases, may we not seek an explanation of the change in their belief in the statement of the Apostle Paul, that Jesus after His resurrection appeared to James?[3] The James best known in the apostolic history was "the Lord's brother"[4]; and it is pleasant to think of him, and of his brothers also, as the first-fruits of Christ's resurrection. Their unbelief, which had resisted the influence of His life on earth, was broken down when He revealed Himself to them as risen from the dead; they enrolled themselves among His willing disciples; and James soon rose to a place of honour in His church. In this case, however, it may be asked, would not Mary have exchanged the home of John again for theirs?—a question which, as we do not know the facts of the case, it is impossible to answer. A late ecclesiastical tradition states that she remained with St. John in Jerusalem for eleven years, dying there in her fifty-ninth year; and from the sixth century the "Tomb of the Virgin" has been shown in the Holy City, beneath the Valley of Jehoshaphat.[5]

The two occasions on which St. John appears after the resurrection of Jesus, are full of interest, not only from their connection with our Lord's crowning triumph, but from the distinct stages which they mark in the spiritual history of the disciple. Very graphic is his own narration of that visit to the tomb, when Mary of Magdala had brought first to Peter, and then to John, the [1] Professor Westcott observes that John, "reclining on Jesus' bosom," held the second place of honour at the side of the Lord of the feast. Peter, on the other side of Jesus, held the first.

[1] The Fourth Gospel does not mention either by name. No doubt Zebedee and Joseph were both dead.

[2] See John vii. 30. Compare Acts i. 14.

[3] 1 Corinthians xv. 7.

[4] It will be seen that we regard this James as distinct from James the Less, the son of Alphæus. The present is not the place to discuss the question, but the reasons for this conclusion seem to us irresistible.

[5] "Land and the Book," p. 635.

two beloved disciples,[1] her breathless announcement of the empty sepulchre; followed by the eager race to Joseph's garden, in which the younger feet of the son of Zebedee outran the tardier steps of his elder companion, who however went straight into the tomb, whereas John, with a deeper awe, was gazing and pondering.

> Reason and Faith at once set out
> To search the Saviour's tomb;
> Faith faster runs, but waits without,
> As fearing to presume,
> Till Reason enter in, and trace
> Christ's relics round the holy place—
> "Here lay His limbs, and here His sacred head,
> And who was by, to make His new-forsaken bed?"[2]

"Then went in also that other disciple, which came first to the sepulchre; and he saw AND BELIEVED." In these words surely we have the dawning in the disciple's mind of a true and noble faith in the risen Lord. He "believed" not what Mary Magdalene had said, "They have taken away my Lord"; but that He lived. He believed, it is added, on such evidence as he had, apart from the testimony of Scripture, which ought, nevertheless, to have convinced him. "So far from the belief of the disciples being based on a previous interpretation of Scripture, the fact itself first illuminated the sense of Scripture."[3]

John and Peter had not seen the angels: "they went away unto their own home:" and to the patient loving watch of the Magdalene the first vision was vouchsafed of the risen Christ.

To the narrative of our Lord's subsequent manifestations to the twelve, is added, in a kind of Appendix to the Gospel,[4] the touching and beautiful account of His appearing to the seven disciples on the Lake of Tiberias, when the apostleship of Peter, who had thrice denied Him, was by a threefold charge explicitly and formally restored. This disciple naturally held the foremost place in the scene: but the incidental part taken in it by St. John was full of expressiveness. At the close of the interview, and after the prophecy of Peter's martyrdom, our Lord, in some symbolic adaptation of His action to the lesson He wished to convey, calls upon the disciple to follow Him. Probably He walked some paces along the shore, summoning Peter to tread in His steps.[1] John with a natural eagerness follows the example;[2] and Peter asks whether the symbolism has a meaning for him also. Jesus replies in the enigmatic words: "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou Me."

Significant as was the rebuke to Peter, it held a yet deeper meaning concerning the son of Zebedee. The other apostles misinterpreted the saying, in their poor literalistic way: but John saw deeper into the mystery, although he himself could not explain it all: he was content to wait its solution.

Even when the apostle was laid in the grave, there was a widespread belief among his former flock at Ephesus that he really lived, and that the turf above him was softly heaved by the breathing of the buried saint.[3] Professed eye-witnesses of the wonder were not lacking; and it is easy to conceive how their imagination may have deluded them into the conviction of the reality of the phenomenon. We need not stay to show how alien all this was from the Lord's meaning. And yet it would appear that there was to be a tarrying on the part of the disciple until He came, at least, in that great event which was to be the "consummation of the age;" the fall of Jerusalem and the passing away of the Jewish state. Henceforth the life of the Apostle would be a looking onward and reaching forward to the accomplishment of that mystery of God.

[1] John xx. 2: "To the other disciple, whom Jesus loved." Professor Westcott remarks that the form of expression here employed "leads to the conclusion that both disciples alike are described as objects of the same feeling." In the other passages where John describes himself as the beloved disciple, the verb is different, ἠγάπα, diligebat; here it is ἐφίλει, amabat, denoting warm personal affection.

[2] "St. Thomas' Day."—Christian Year.

[3] Westcott.

[4] See subsequent paper of the present series, on "St. John's Gospel."

[1] Trench: Miracles, p. 471. Possibly this symbolic act and the lesson it conveyed was in St. Peter's mind when he wrote (1 Eph. ii. 21): "Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example that you should follow His steps."

[2] Westcott here notes that the description of St. John here given is not that of his "reclining" by Jesus at the feast, but of his "leaning back" to convey Peter's question; showing the close connection between the two apostles.

[3] This belief is discussed by Augustine (in his Homilies on St. John, 124) This father seems to think the story worthy of some credit.

THE HEIGHTS OF THE HIMALAYA.

> Man climbs the marvellous mountain, with its deep,
> Rich foliaged gorges, and its ever steep
> And steeper rising precipices dread,
> Until o'erhead,
> In still, ethereal solitude, appears
> Its granite peak, which awfully uprears
> Its inaccessible form, as bearing meet
> Kindred to stars that proudly still retreat.
> The stars look down on the vain mountain's love,
> And man, o'er mount and stars, soars up to God above.

IN the Zoroastrian Genesis we are told how man departed from Paradise to dwell in the first place created by Ormazd for the Aryan race, and how that place was the town in the Zarafshan valley. The town still exists, and will doubtless one day have its railway station, for the valley of the Zarafshan is that of the river, which flows by Samarkand where the great Timur lies buried, and the Russian flag now floats. Along it dwelt the Fans, an old people even in the days of Alexander, whose name still lingers in many compounds, including the Fanmir or Pamir as we now have it on our maps. It is a lovely country, rich as a garden old, the river in its higher reaches one of the most beautiful in Asia, and flowing from Asia's highest mountains, whence, "as from the higher hills the sweetest river ran," there grew perchance this legend of the first settlement of man. Where could he better make his home than by the side of the rippling stream that gathered its waters from the glittering slopes of the Himalaya, "the abode of snow," the hills of the earth rising nearest to his heaven?

MOUNT EVEREST.

[From a Drawing by Colonel Tanner.

The highest mountains in the world are these Himalayas, stretching for fifteen hundred miles along India's northern frontier, where the Aryan and Turanian meet; but which of the peaks is the highest is not really known. The Hindus, following the great rivers as they came southwards and settling first on their banks, naturally looked on the mountains in which the rivers rose as the highest and most inaccessible. But which were these? The sources of a river are so many. The poets sent the genii floating in thousands round the sacred crests of snow, but so vague were they in their descriptive touches that the peaks they meant are undistinguishable. Meru, "the golden mountain," Srigavat, "clad in all minerals," the Kailas, "formed of gems," and Nilor, "made of lapis lazuli," are but the hills of dreamland to us, and the higher buttresses of the Tibetan table-land that rise behind them might as well be drifting cloud.

The world's highest peak is yet to be found. The encyclopædias tell us it is Mount Everest, and give its height in due number of feet, 29,002, but they do not mention that this is merely the greatest height yet measured by an Englishman; that no Englishman is at present allowed by the Nepalese Government to go within eighty miles of the peak so measured, and that the ranges to the north are still unexplored. Only five persons thought competent to judge have yet seen this northern region, and returned to us, and they all report mountains of enormous height, seemingly higher than Everest. But until such measurements cease to be matters of estimate and become matters of fact, Everest, or Gaurisankar, as the natives call it, may well retain its position in our books as monarch of the hills.

It is, indeed, a mighty mountain. Some impression of its enormous size may be gained when we remember that to see it at its best from British territory we have to go ninety miles away from it, or as far as from London to the Cotswolds. From this spot, Sandakphu, thirty-five miles from Darjiling, the mountain's outline, though fairly sharp, has none of the ruggedness we might expect, but it forms the prominent feature of a magnificent view. A long snowy slope lights up its northern flank, and glorious does it look

> At early dawn, when the first rays of light
> Play like a rose-wreath on the peaks of snow;
> And late, when half the valley seems in night,
> Yet still around each pale majestic height
> The sun's last smile has left a crimson glow;

the snow-clothed peak rising from a ring of other gleaming peaks, which in their turn are girt by dark mountain masses clear of snow.

Sunrise in the Himalayas! What a subject for a painter, if only his pigments were pure enough! In March 1883, Mr. W. W. Graham attempted to scale the heights of Kinchinjanga, the mountain from which the Zoroastrian river flows, and this is what he tells us of his first sight of its summit.

"Suddenly, far away in the dark and yet incredibly high in the sky, a pale rosy pinnacle stole into light. It was the summit of Kinchinjanga. Downwards stole the first glow, tipping the peaks in succession with a golden glory; then suddenly it vanished, leaving them cold and grey against the dim sky. Presently followed the true sunlight, and again the summits flashed forth their glories as the sun leaped suddenly from the horizon. Only this, only the simple warm red tint appeared; we did not see and probably no one ever does see, the atmospheric colouring which is so characteristic of sunrise in the Alps. There were none of those vivid colours, the prismatic green framing to the gorgeous blue, the red to the yellow; no peak gleamed like an opal before the god of day."

Mr. Graham found the snow ten thousand feet above the sea: the rhododendrons, in a thick impenetrable jungle, rising above the trees and leading up to it. From his camp on the moraine of the noble saddle glacier on the summit of the Kangla pass, Kinchinjanga lay to the north-east of him; to the north of him lay Junnoo, with its awful southern cliff; to the east lay Kabru, with its western face like a wall, over which hung glaciers as a cornice breaking off into thundering avalanches. Up among the avalanches and the granite peaks he made his way; but he was too early in the season for his enterprise, and Kinchinjanga remained unwon. Later on in October, he attacked Kabru and reached the greatest height on this earth yet trodden by civilised man. His way lay up the mountain's eastern glacier.

"On its banks," he writes, "we met with immense quantities of Edelweiss, the climber's flower, and success was prophesied accordingly. We climbed up the highest moraine I have seen, fully 800ft. to the base of the eastern cliff of Kabru. There was only one route to the higher slopes, and that we could not find in the mist. Heavy snow fell, and we camped where we were. Next day we found our opening, and worked up it. We then went on ahead, and pushed straight up the face of the ridge, intending, if possible, to camp on its summit. This we reached at mid-day, but found that we were cut off from the true peak by a chasm in the arête, so that we were on a detached buttress. We descended, met the coolies ascending, and turned north along the steep snow-slope, finding at last a small ledge just big enough to accommodate the Whymper tent. This was I think the highest camp we had, being certainly 18,500 feet. The night, however, was mild, and the coolies, who were very tired, preferred to stay up instead of descending as before. We were off next morning at 4.30, and found at once all our work cut out for us. The very first thing was the worst. A long couloir like a half funnel crowned with rocks, had to be passed. The snow was lying loose, just ready to slide, and the greatest possible care had to be taken to avoid an avalanche. Then a steep ice slope led us to a snow incline, and so to the foot of the true peak. Here we had nearly 1000 feet of most delightful rockwork, forming a perfect staircase. At ten we were at the top of this, and not more than 1500 feet above, was the eastern summit. A short halt for food and then came the tug of war. All this last slope is pure ice, at an angle from 45° to nearly 60°. Owing to the heavy snow and the subsequent frost, it was coated three or four inches deep with frozen snow, and up this coating we cut. I am perfectly aware that it was a most hazardous proceeding, and in cold blood I should not try it again, but only in this state would the ascent have been possible in the time. Kauffmann led all the way, and at 12·15 we reached the lower summit of Kabru, at least 23,700 feet above the sea. The glories of the view were beyond all compare. North-west, less than seventy miles, lay Mount Everest, and I pointed it out to Boss, who had never seen it, as the highest mountain in the world. 'That it cannot be,' he replied; 'those are higher'—pointing to two peaks which towered far above the second and more distant range, and showed over the slope of Everest, at a rough guess some eighty to one hundred miles farther north. I was astonished, but we were all agreed that, in our judgment, the unknown peaks, one rock and one snow, were loftier. Of course such an idea rests purely on eyesight; but looking from such a height, objects appear in their true proportions, and we could distinguish perfectly between the peaks of known measurement, however slight the differences. It has been suggested to me since that we mistook Mount Everest; but this is impossible; for just here occurs the remarkable break in the chain, and there is no snow range at all between Kabru and the group of Mount Everest. However we had no long time for the view, for the actual summit was connected with ours by a short arête, and rose about 300 feet of the steepest ice I have seen. We went at it, and after an hour and a half we reached our goal. The summit was cleft by three gashes, and into one of them we got. The absolute summit was little more than a pillar of ice, and rose at most thirty or forty feet above us still, but independently of the extreme difficulty and danger of attempting it we had no time. A bottle was left at our highest point and we descended. The descent was worse than the ascent, and we had to proceed backwards, as the snow might give way at any moment. During the ascent we saw a pair of snow-white hawks at a height of quite 22,000 feet, and their flight did not seem to be in the least impaired by any atmospheric effect."

This is the highest climb yet recorded. Mont Blanc is, it will be remembered, 15,781 feet, and this was half as high again! But there are many mountains higher than Kabru. Kinchinjanga is 28,160 feet above the sea, and the so-called K2, once claimed to exceed Gaurisankar, attains 28,278 feet. In the central range, near the Dras Pass, are Nun and Kun, each over 23,000 feet, and Nanga Parbat, whose summit has been seen from a distance of two hundred and five miles, has an unbroken slope of almost as much and a total height of over 26,000.

Such a gathering of giants cannot but be impressive. Taking the range as a whole, with its three parallel chains, it is, at a moderate estimate, fifty miles wide, and fifteen hundred long, and there must be quite a hundred peaks in it over four miles high. And it is a picturesque and varied range, not like the Kuen Lun on the other side of the Tibetan plateau, a mere dead wall, for from the gorge of the Indus to the gorge of the Dihong, the rain-clouds break up against it direct from the sea, and their watery burden has in the course of ages sculptured its valleys and ravines and left the serrated ridges of its harder rocks. Geologically, like all mountains, the Himalaya, as we know them, are in their youth, the Sub-Himalayas being built up of soft massive sandstone of late Tertiary age, while the central core is formed of metamorphic rocks not yet determined that have carried the sandstones up with them, at least for a little way, although this later elevation may have been after a sleep of centuries whose number to man's mind is really inconceivable.

But all through those ages the sculpturing has gone on. When Hwentsang, the pilgrim, came from China to India twelve centuries ago, he found Mount Aneuta, the hill of the four precious things, figured as resting on a golden wheel and washed by the waters of the mighty ocean, while from its flanks rushed the everlasting sea divided into four sacred streams which flowed round and round in concentric valleys so as to linger as long as possible near the mother mountain. And these valleys were the ruts made by the chariot wheels of the gods! Think of the grandeur and truth of the image, for did not the Divine forces move in the frost and snow and rain and storm that wrought the denudation?

The Beacon Light.

WHEN storms are wild on life's unresting ocean,
And struggling souls are wearied in the strife,
How strong and clear, through all the dark commotion,
Shines the soft radiance of the Word of Life;
Though fears run high, though griefs and doubts appal,
The good old Book hath strength and cheer for all.

Its precious truths on childlike hearts engraven
Shall guide and bless through all that lies before;
To aged pilgrims, drawing nigh the haven,
Its rays reveal the welcome on the shore;
In life our hope, our trust when shadows fall,
And in the floods of death our All in all!

MARY ROWLES.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR.

MISS STIRLING'S HOMES.

THE Guthrie scheme concerns itself only with children over six years of age; Dr. Robertson's, as we have seen it carried out in the Vennel, deals only with such children as are of age to come to school; The Industrial Brigade takes them only after they have left school. What is done for the younger children, the weak and helpless, left by the unfortunate, the reckless, or the sodden, to starve and die? It is a horrible thought, and much against what we call nature, but those who know the problem best are only too well aware that among the very poor the child is often regarded as a nuisance, and treated as such, until it becomes old enough to be a paying investment, that by begging procures the wherewithal for its legal owners to get drunk upon. It will be said by many who judge all men by their own measure, that no one would sink low enough to be cruel to a little child. They are mistaken, nevertheless. The world is full of tales of self-sacrifice, in which the parent, even among the lower animals, has died for its offspring, but do not let us forget the other side; we know what we have to encourage, let us see what we have to stamp out; it may enable us to lessen, in some degree, the burden that makes our progress so painfully slow.[1]

What are we to say to a case like this? In a cellar in one of the Edinburgh byways a policeman on his round hears a mysterious noise of stifled sobs and moans. He breaks open the shutter; and there, on the bare ground in the corner of the vault, shut out from all light, is a group of five little children huddled together, and almost in the last stage of starvation. The eldest is a girl of eight, the youngest a baby of eighteen months; four of them are asleep—a sleep leading unto death; the eldest is awake, and it is her cry of grief and hunger that the policeman has heard. For two whole days and nights have they been in this loathsome den, without a scrap of food, locked up and left to perish; the mother dead, the father, on being searched for, found just turned out of a whiskey shop, heavily drunk, and with money in his pocket that he had hoped to spend on further drink.

Or this? Three deserted children, aged six, four-and-a-half, and two-and-a-half, found by the police in a dying state from want of food, to so frightful an extent that they ate everything they could lay their hands on; two of them tottering in the streets picking up crumbs of bread and stumps of cabbages. The youngest, left helpless on a heap of dirty straw, which he had almost entirely eaten, had his hair turned perfectly white by his sufferings, and its true colour only returned after many months of careful nourishment.

[1] We commend to our readers the record and work of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.

Or this? A family of children, aged twelve, nine, seven, five, three years and nine months, deserted by the mother during the father's absence at work in the country. They were suffering dreadfully from hunger and neglect, and when rescued by the police they are apparently as near death as is possible from starvation. The neighbours, though very poor themselves, have given what food they can to the elder children, but the younger ones are too far gone to eat it, and it is only by the merest touch that their lives are saved.

Enough! These three cases, not the worst we could find, will serve our purpose. They are all within the experience of one of the most deserving of Edinburgh's charities, endeavouring to cover the ground left vacant by those of which we have given examples. This, "The Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge," which has the Earl of Aberdeen at its head, took its present shape on the 3rd of March, 1886, when a conference with the directors of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children resulted in the amalgamation of that Society with the older institution, which, under the management of Miss Stirling, had for nine years been at work so usefully and successfully. Miss Stirling's Day Nursery and Infant Homes are, we believe, the only asylums in Edinburgh and its vicinity in which children of tender years can take refuge from the brutality and neglect of their parents and guardians. The Shelter, in the High Street, is open night and day, and is regularly taken advantage of by the police, especially in those cases where the cruelty is such as to justify the imprisonment of the parents. In the year 1886, eighteen of such cases were sent in by the police, and of the other cases three were sent by the School Board, and over a hundred others were brought by missionaries or neighbours, or else came to the door themselves; many of the children being thereby saved from misery and depravity truly dreadful. "Neglected, bruised, maimed, starved, dying children," as Miss Stirling describes them, "who seek the refuge of the high windows, thick walls, and strongly-barred door of the Shelter, knowing that there they will find food, safety, and kindness; and, although my description reads wonderfully like that of a prison, there is a great deal of merriment in the Shelter, and as much bright sunshine as can be had in the old town of Edinburgh. I often thank God for the sun when I am in the Shelter, and see the little ones playing in the sunshine on the floor, the babies even trying to catch the sunbeams as they fall upon them—so many of them have come from dark places of the earth—and I pray it may be the dawning of a better day for them. I have been there often enough to have admitted with my own hands little girls to its walls, who have fled for refuge, as they might have done to the old cities which God appointed long ago in Israel—mere children, flushed, panting, terrified, as if the destroyer were at their heels."

Sometimes as many as seventeen children are in the Shelter while their cases are being inquired into, the stay varying from a few hours to several weeks, according to circumstances. It is the head-quarters and receiving-house for the Homes into which the children not otherwise provided for are drafted. Complementary to it, and providing for more grateful cases, is the Day Nursery in Mackenzie Place, established in 1877, on the good old principle of helping those who help themselves. To many scores of women struggling for a livelihood, who have no one with whom to leave their young children while they are out at work for them, this Day Nursery has been a great boon. The seed, originally planted at Stockbridge, soon took firm root in the hearts of the people around, and it is now "a big family tree," with its numerous branches, and active, capable boys and girls, who were brought as babies in arms, or "very little children just able to toddle in and out after one like a flock of ducks, whose greatest pleasure was a dirt-pie, and greatest grief to be inadvertently left behind when the rest of the family had adjourned to have dinner in the kitchen. The Nursery still is full of little people. Wee babies go to sleep in the quiet waiting-room, with its good fire, swing-cradles, and low bed in the corner for sleepy day children. There are also cradles with babies put into other quiet warm corners, whose mothers will come for them at night; but," says Miss Stirling, "I do not leave my Home babies there, for I like them to have country air and country milk, and be members of a smaller family than we are at the Day Nursery."

In these homes there are over 160 children, of whom about 100 are girls. There are six houses: one in Mackenzie Place, one at Granton, and two each at Leadburn and Burntisland. Each house is conducted on the family principle and is complete in itself. The treasurer of the house is some friend in the neighbourhood, who is responsible for the management of the stores and accounts, and has to see that the stores are used in the best way, and actually given to the children in the proportions deemed fit by the directors at head-quarters.

The daily bill of fare may as well be noted. Breakfast is served each day between 8 and 9; dinner from 12·30 to 1·30; supper at 5. The breakfast invariably consists of porridge and milk, the supper of bread and milk, but the dinner is never the same two days running. On Monday it is of pea soup and bread; on Tuesday and Thursday of corned beef and potatoes; on Wednesday of fresh meat broth and bread; on Friday of pea or potato soup and bread; on Saturday of fresh meat and potatoes; on Sunday of fresh meat, potatoes and dumpling.

Next in authority to the treasurer, the mother in the home, though she is not called so, is the nurse. It would not do to call her mother—the children would resent it as near akin to sacrilege—but she has to look after her large family very much as a mother, with plenty to do and not much to do it with. Food there is to be cooked in time for the bigger children due in from school, washing and ironing to be done early in the week, clothing to be mended, stockings to be darned, all in a humble way, in much such a home as the children may expect to have when they grow up. "I think it a more wholesome life," says the founder, "for those who are to be working men and women hereafter, than, even if we could afford it, to keep them in a highly polished institution where domestic work is done in classes, food prepared by steam, and washing and getting up clothes by machinery. We have no wonderful arrangements for saving labour of the kind; no ingenious modes of clothing the children in odd patterns that take very little stuff and are made without trouble. When you meet our children on the road, or see them in the public school, they are clad exactly like other respectable working people's children. When they are sick I must do the best I can. There is no means of nursing sick children by machinery. When they are naughty I must just fight the battle with them in the best way that occurs to me, having no stronger motive power to bring to bear upon them than that of a respectable family. Our Homes are not in any sense a reformatory. Ours are perfectly innocent children, whose only crime is their poverty, and that they have in many instances been so harshly treated as to be very thankful for the care and affection which they receive from us. The consequence is things go on naturally; babies grow into trotting children almost imperceptibly, and very soon get big enough to go to school, or play at school at home. Then they soon begin to help a little in the house, and, by-and-by, grow into tall boys and girls able for place." [1]

But the Homes are not enough to hold the children that pass into them through the Shelter, and an auxiliary system of boarding out has gradually grown up. This scheme is also under the supervision of local treasurers and visitors, who do their work thoroughly, and prevent those abuses which are apt to creep in under such circumstances of management as we in England are familiar with. This is, however, but a development of the original idea of bringing up the children in a home instead of in an institution, of training the child as an individual, and not as a wheel in a machine; and the soundness of this treatment is manifest when the child is fit for service or emigration. For the Stirling scheme not only gives the child a home; it looks after it till it is old enough to have a home of its own, even in the New World.

Recognising that in the Colonies lay the best chance in life for those passing out into the world from her care, Miss Stirling a year or so ago bought a farm near Aylesford in King's County, Nova Scotia, to serve as a headquarter, to which those caring for a colonial life could be sent, from which they could be placed in situations, and to which they could return as to a home in case of illness or failure of employment. In most schemes of emigration this institution of a local centre of effort is a detail forgotten. Its advantages are obvious: it not only affords a base to which the young emigrant can retreat in case of temporary failure, but by its presence it continues in the new land, under new conditions, the influence which has done so much for the true welfare of the boy or girl in the old home. We need not wonder therefore that the plan has proved a success. It has commended itself to the Colonial authorities, and the youngsters sent across the Atlantic are welcomed and not despised. They are all satisfactorily placed and thriving, and have done everything to bring credit to their benefactors. As they did well in the old Scotland, so are they doing in the new.

[1] See "Our Children," by E. M. S. First and Second Series; obtainable of the Treasurer, John Macdonald, Esq., Royal Bank of Scotland, Pitt Street, Edinburgh.

W. J. GORDON.

IN THE DAYS OF THE GREAT ARMADA.

CHAPTER VIII.

WHEN all fear of the Armada was over, and the English ships safe in the Thames, the wounded were landed with all possible care and loving-kindness. It was not only the Devon folk who were anxious and proud to nurse their heroes back to health and soundness.

Queen Elizabeth had some excellent qualities: but open-handed generosity was not amongst them. It was therefore the more to her credit that she took pains to see that rewards and honours reached many of those who had deserved well of their country; adding names to lists with her own pen, making personal enquiry of the Admiral and of Drake as to who had most distinguished himself either for valour or for devotedness; and as far as possible giving every one personal evidence of her pride in her sailors, and in their doings.

DAN LAVIN SHOWS HOW THE FIRE-SHIPS ATTACKED THE SPANISH FLEET.

Sir Robert Bulteel was lodged in a house close by the Tower of London—a house reckoned to be in a fine situation in those days; though now, when the smoke of the huge town has spread north and south, and east and west, the neighbourhood is scarcely what one would select for an invalid.

"At her Majesty's charges," was the order graciously given by the court messenger who was sent to arrange matters. "Sir Robert Bulteel is the queen's guest here."

Earle Clatworthy came to see him the very day of the reception at St. James's. The boy was over-brimming with spirits! Not six weeks since he had left Exmouth, and he had had such great doings as would last through the life-times of twenty such men as lived in those quiet Devon valleys where nothing ever happened.

Something like this he was saying when Robert cut him short.

"Things have happened in those quiet valleys, as I have heard from your father, Earle,—perhaps, if all was over-counted, we might find that he has shewn courage more staunch than either you or I."

Earle knew at once what he meant, and hung his head a little shamefacedly. Then his frank bright look flashed out again as he said, "I believe I've been boasting! But you know the things of which you speak happened long before I was born, and that it is hard to quite understand about them. And my father never refers to them. My father never boasts."

Robert looked at the boy's ingenuous face and smiled. Earle would not "boast" much in the future either, he thought silently;—he was too weak and weary to talk any more.

"And it must have been hard to endure, that torturing and taunting," the lad went on more to himself, than to Robert, "and all alone. Lonely pain. Pain getting sharper and more sickening every instant, when a few words would end it all, a few words of denial and recantation. Yes, Robert, you are right: God's courage is the best courage after all."

"God-given courage" was what he meant. And in the years that were coming that "best courage" was granted in large measure to him also. For when his own hair was grey, and the pride of his manhood passed, he fell into the enemies' hands while fighting the king's battles in the untried southern seas. There was little generosity in those days, still less mercy: and Captain Clatworthy, of the English frigate Triumph, was barbarously tortured to force him to reveal the whereabouts and plans of the British fleet. "You offer me my life to turn traitor?" he said slowly, between his set teeth. "A traitor's life is not worth the taking at your hands. Do your worst." His own men rescued him:—but not before those stalwart limbs of his were wrenched and twisted by pain. Perhaps he remembered in that time of trial what his father had borne, and gave God thanks that he too had been found strong to suffer for conscience' sake.

There was more bell-ringing in Plymouth when the ships came back to the Haven. The Ark-Raleigh stayed at the Nore, together with the Golden Lion, and most of the larger vessels, but the Little Bear came beating back against the adverse winds, and on board of her were the Devon and Cornish men who had volunteered for the queen's service. And amongst these were Earle and Dan Lavin.

The Saucy Susan was reduced to a few scorched fragments tossing in the tide on the Flanders shores, but Dan had never been so proud to own his sloop as he was to return without her.

"I tell you," he said, when at length he stood again on his own house floor, an admiring audience around him, "I tell you that it was herself, my sloop no less! that very sloop the Saucy Susan that first frightened the Dons. They were not beaten till then, not they! We had hurried and worried them well, that I don't deny; but there they lay in their flaunting lines waiting for the Prince of Parma. When down the wind in dead of night what should come against them but the Susan! A small thing, my masters, say you? aye. But the cargo she carried was large enough to affright Medina and all his men! You might recollect the tar and pine that I did not take time to clear out from her hold, when we rushed off in such haste at the heels of the Dons? Well, that remnant of cargo was what did the business! That tar the Susan carried, flaring and spluttering, right into the Spanish throats. I crave your patience:—see, it was in this way:—here, we will say, lies the Armada.——"

And Dan ranged a circle of working-men's boots (boots being part of the stock-in-trade of his store) to represent the Duke of Medina's fleet; seized a large tin can for the Saucy Susan, and half-a-dozen very small porringers for her sister fire-ships, and finally laid a broom-stick in the background which was to stand for the English.

"There! a fool might understand the thing," cried he, vigorously pushing on both can and porringers, "what could the Dons do in the face of such an onslaught as that?"

And his listeners, hanging breathless on the tale, watching every movement of the queer collection illustrating his story, looked on Lavin himself with a respect they had never before felt for their bustling tradesman. Dan Lavin, shopkeeper and owner of the Saucy Susan, was as nothing in comparison with Dan Lavin whose sloop, though lost for ever, had taken the first place in the rout of the ships of King Philip, and who had been rewarded for his devotion and thanked by the queen herself in her own palace in London!

And as for Dan's wife and three rosy-cheeked daughters, they held their heads higher to the day of their death on the strength of Dan's share in the defeat of the Great Armada.

* * * * *

The news of the return of the Devon men ran through the country like wild-fire. It was not only Mistress Lavin and her daughters that had cause to be proud; other folks living on the shores of Exe had heroes to welcome, and valorous deeds to hear of.

And up on the slope—where the rye was reaped, leaving bare stubble, with here and there a wild pansy, and here and there a struggling poppy-bud, and again a bit of chickweed trailing humbly with its milk-white stars—stood Doris.

It was one of her father's good days; he had been carried into the open air, and lay in the mellow sunshine, his hollow eyes looking as wistfully as Doris's down towards the town.

He knew now how dearly he loved his boy.

He had given him up to danger, to probable death—(for who could imagine that the victory could have been so cheaply purchased, at such small cost of life to England?) And now he was about to welcome him home. Such parting and such meeting times probe to the very depths of human love.

"Doris!"

The girl retraced her steps, and came from the edge of the field to her father's side where he lay, with the late summer flowers making the air sweet above him, and the clematis from the porch swaying its load of blossom above his head.

"Doris, how long is it since he went away?"

EARLE GIVES DORIS A LETTER.

"Nine weeks and three days, my father."

"Nay, child, and that cannot, cannot be——"

She blushed as red as the rose-petals beside her.

"You ask of Earle? Of Earle surely. . . Barely six weeks, dear father. 'Tis now the end of August, and he left us the day the word came that the Spaniards were in sight."

She had been thinking of her lover, it was not alone for Earle she was watching; it was not only Earle who had carried a bit of her heart with him off in the Lord Admiral's ships.

But it was only Earle that came up the hill in the sharp cruel sunshine that showed so plainly the lad's solitary figure. Was Robert loitering then? Had he greetings in Exmouth that must come before his greetings to her? Or . . . and her cheeks faded from rose-red to lily-white,—or had something terrible happened? Was it that he would never, never come back at all?

It seemed like a dream to her, afterwards, that hour that followed. Earle, so full of joy; with his proud glad-heartedness held well in check lest he should again be betrayed into "boasting." Her father with a light in his eyes that she had not seen there for long years, and on his lips deep broken words of thankfulness for his boy's safety and for his country's deliverance. And above them the deep blue of the summer sky spread like a benediction over the world. While murmurs from afar,—snatches of music, the hoarse voice of British cheers, and those untiring bells —spoke of the great chorus of England's rejoicing. Then neighbours came trooping in,—even old Dame Townshend whom nobody had seen walking for ever so long!

And amongst them all Doris stood like one under the spell of a dream. She would have given the dearest thing she possessed to have had power to ask "Where then is Robert Bulteel?" And yet after all it was the possible answer, not the asking of the question that daunted her.

In the midst of all that joyous talk Earle suddenly caught sight of her face. "Selfish wight that I am!" he cried, "I'm keeping your property, Doris, while I talk you all deaf." And he took from his doublet a packet which was tied and sealed very securely, and superscribed "For the dear hands of Mistress Doris Clatworthy, these."

The girl's reading powers were sadly limited; ladies following the example of their learned queen were yet rare in England, and it is said that even Shakespeare's daughter was unable to write her own name! But Doris managed to decipher every word of that letter, notwithstanding.

It was a strange letter.

There was in it just what she longed to know. Her lover lived, and loved her still. When that was plainly to be read it was easy to bear the next words:—he had been wounded almost to death; but he was mending now, under kind care from noble hands whose tendance was greater honour than he deserved.

Doris did not believe that! Her hero had deserved from England the highest and noblest that England could give. Then what did these next lines mean? Had she read them quite rightly?

"There are many things to be learnt through pain, dear-heart. Some truths there are which show more sharply in the valley of the Shadow than they ever do in the careless light of health and prosperity. I have learned something of the meaning of life:—that Meaning of which thy father spoke one day, and I failed to grasp the sense of his words. Now, day by day, it grows clearer to me. It is not success, Doris, or possessions, or victory, however great and grand, it is not even duty done that gives a man peace when he lies as I have lain at the threshold of the Dark Door. But a Message of Peace reached me there, dimly and in wavering clearness; and when I return to thee, sweet-heart, —if such joy there be yet in store—thou wilt help me to understand it more perfectly; that thy life together with mine may be given to that Service which alone is Love and Liberty."

It was no marvel that Doris failed to comprehend such words as these.

They held the secret of all existence, the sum of all knowledge. Our life is our Father's gift, sealed with the Infinite Image, sanctified with the incarnate life of His sinless Son. And this life is not to be spent for man's pleasure or gain or glory, but in the Service of the Father.

And in that Service all duty is enfolded; all love is included; all joy is held. And truest dignity, and highest honour, and widest worth all given to the "meek which inherit the earth."

Not yet could Doris grasp such truth. But it is to the simple and the childlike that such "wisdom" is revealed; and to her simple childlike heart it came at last.

They tell yet on Plymouth Hoe of how the news came of the approach of the Great Armada; and stories yet are handed down amongst the fisher-folk of the sea-fight that was fought off shore. But deeper traces and clearer evidences than any that the weed-grown reef can show exist of the Victory won for England in the year 1588. Once and for ever the bonds that would fain have enthralled men's consciences were shattered and cast to the winds. There are open Bibles in every home,—the pure simple English worship of God in every village in the land. It was not only Queen Elizabeth and her people, not only such as Doris Clatworthy and Sir Robert Bulteel that had cause for rejoicing.

And we ourselves, in this free England of ours, have now, at this very day, cause to thank our God for the victory which He helped British hearts and hands to win three hundred years ago.

SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. VI.—THE TEMPLE.

1. What is the first mention of David's wish to build the temple?
2. In one of the Psalms he mentions having thought of doing so, long before he was king. Find the passage?
3. Why was he not permitted to build it, and why was the honour granted to his son?
4. We are told that David prepared gold and silver, iron, stone and timber, with a view to building. Find the passage?
5. In order to build the temple, Solomon obtained help from Hiram, king of Tyre. What was the agreement between them?
6. What class of Solomon's subjects were set to this labour?
7. Who was Solomon's chief helper in the actual work?
8. Where were all the molten vessels for the temple made?
9. The pious kings of Judah made a point of repairing the temple. Give three instances?
10. After the captivity, who were the chief persons commissioned by the kings of Persia to rebuild the temple?
11. Which of the prophets encouraged the people in their work?
12. What remarkable prophecy was uttered by one of these with regard to the second temple, which found its fulfilment in our Saviour?
13. When the Jews said to our Lord "Forty and six years was this temple in building" (John ii. 20), to what did they refer?
14. From what part of the temple did our Lord drive the traders and money-changers?
15. Mention two other parts of the temple that are named in the New Testament?

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XII.—p. 368.—DORCAS.

1. D-aniel . . . . . Dan. vi. 1, 23.
2. O-intment . . . . . Luke vii. 37–46.
3. R-od . . . . . Ex. vii. 17; viii. 5, 16.
4. C-amels . . . . . Matt. iii. 4.
5. A-pollos . . . . . Acts xviii. 24, 25.
6. S-anballat . . . . . Neh. ii. 19; vi. 1–9.

ANSWER TO HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. VI.—p. 368.

O Lord our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth!—Psa. viii. 1.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARGARETA COLBERG.

A TALE OF THE REFORMATION.

CHAPTER V.—THE MINISTER.

FUGITIVES IN THE MARSH.

IT was about two weeks after the state entrance of the Marquis Berghen, that the Colbergs were assembled one evening in their sitting-room evidently expecting guests. Several chairs were placed in the centre with certain regularity, while the large long table, which usually occupied so conspicuous a place, was pushed away to the side of the room. By-and-by there entered a tall spare man about forty years of age, with startlingly white hair and beard. He wore a dark brown cloak reaching nearly to the ground, fastened around the waist by a broad leather belt; and on his head was a fur cap. Although he had the air of a person of authority he wore none of those buckles, steel plates or broad ruffs which were supposed to lend distinction to a man in the sixteenth century. The instant he appeared at the door both Simon and his wife hastened forward to greet him, while Margareta stood slightly behind her mother.

"Ah Brother Faveau!" cried Simon, holding out his hand, "right glad I am to see thee once more, and take thy hand."

"Yes, indeed, Simon," answered the minister, for it was he, "it is with joy we meet again in this world. Each time we say farewell, we feel that very likely it may be for ever."

Dame Colberg, after her own greeting, introduced her daughter by slightly turning towards her, and saying:

"This is the child, she is much grown."

"What," exclaimed the minister, "is this comely maiden the little child I used to know? This then is my little Perlchen." Margareta came forward and bowed her head to receive his blessing. The minister looked at her for an instant with tenderness, and then raising his hands over her, said:

"Child, may thy life be long a blessing to thy father and thy mother. But should the Lord require it of thee, may'st thou be ever ready to join the white and shining company of His martyrs."

For a time after the minister's voice had ceased there was stillness in the room. Every one felt that it was a solemn moment. Margareta, who had hitherto been the child, the one to be shielded from all thought of peril, was now received as one of the fold, one who must be ready to lay down her life for her faith as so many had done before her.

"I see," said the minister, "that some of the brethren are to meet me here to-night. It is well, for I would say a few words to them before I go forth to the preaching to-morrow."

Very soon the guests began to arrive. First to come was a stout elderly man, in a ruff of vast width, and fur-bordered cloak. This was Robert Ogier, a master tanner whose yard lay outside Valenciennes on the road to Cambray. He wore big spurs which jingled as he walked across the oaken floor and took a seat far distant from the fire. Then followed several worthy citizens, an armourer with piercing grey eyes and a kindly smile about his large good-natured mouth, two weavers, friendly rivals to Simon, who came in breezily talking of the sales they had made at the Michaelmas fair. There were besides these a couple of travelling merchants of aspect slightly foreign. They had seen the world. One of them had once even beheld the great Luther and had heard him preach years ago. That sermon had produced a great effect upon him: indeed, considering that the difference of dialect was so great that it prevented him from understanding more than one word in twenty, the effect was little short of miraculous. The good man always alluded to that sermon as the most eloquent and soul-stirring he had ever heard. Though a great admirer of minister Faveau he had often been heard to lament that that very excellent preacher had not had the advantage of hearing Luther, even if it were only once. The men thus assembled in Simon Colberg's house were the elders of the Protestant community of Valenciennes, and were all men of some consequence, though they belonged emphatically to the citizen class. Still they waited. Evidently some one else was expected without whom the minister seemed loth to begin. At last Rosa once more appeared at the door, and this time with great ceremony and many bowings she introduced a tall man who wore a plumed hat on his head. The minister and Simon welcomed the stranger, greeting him by the name of Mallart. All those in the room seemed anxious to show him deference. He was called Francis Mallart, and he was one of the chief burghers of Valenciennes, a man of great wealth and of considerable influence in the councils of the city. He was but a new convert, having embraced the reformed faith a couple of years previously on the death of his beloved wife who was one of minister Faveau's most ardent disciples. Between the minister and Mallart a deep friendship had long existed which was made the more lasting by this fact.

When all were seated the minister rose, and after a few moments of silent prayer, he addressed his small audience as follows:

"My brothers and sisters in Christ, the time of trial is at hand—the time of trials far more bitter than any which we have yet known. The brief period of quiet which we have enjoyed is to be changed for one of bloodshed and cruelty passing the tongue of man to describe. But the Lord watches over His people, and in His own good time He shall stretch forth His hand and save them from destruction. Since I was last among you many of the followers of the Lord have been called upon to testify unto Him. They have not refused the call. They have met death bravely as became Christians. In Antwerp terrible indeed have been the doings of the unholy ones. Men have been burned and women have been buried alive for reading in the Book of Life; yet our men are not terrified, nor are our women faint-hearted. At the last season of preaching at Tournay I gathered many new souls into the garner of the Lord, and perchance I may be blessed with a good harvest in Valenciennes if I receive a blessing upon my labour."

Much more the minister said, and then he referred to the coming meetings, and in a few words explained his plans for the season of preaching. Then they arranged the places of meeting, and after attending to some farther matters of business detail, the minister ended with a fervent appeal to them to stand fast and be true before all and against all.

Margareta had been present during the meeting, and her young heart throbbed sympathetically to the earnest words of the minister. She was fired with holy zeal and began to feel the eager joy of suffering for the truth. But there seemed nothing for her to do at the moment; indeed she almost had a revulsion of feeling when she saw the minister, after his exhortation was over, go among his congregation and speak pleasantly to each one. Margareta's young nerves were strung up to the pitch of some great action. She did not realise the calm continuous heroism of a man who in the midst of ever-present peril could appear placid and unconcerned, yes, even happy.

Yet the minister's gentle blue eyes, now beaming from beneath his grey eyebrows, had looked on terrible scenes; they had witnessed the lingering death of friends bound to the burning stake, while his lips moved in prayer, not for the martyrs, no, but for the miserable beings who tortured and slew his dear ones.

The figure of the white-haired minister was well-known in the Netherlands where he had preached for several years, but he was not a native of the Provinces, he came from over the border, from the pleasant land of France. This is briefly the story of the minister and of his white hair which had looked strange enough when he came to the Netherlands years before while still a young man. His hair had turned white on the night of the sack of St. Quentin by the soldiers of Philip II. of Spain.

The Faveaus had lived in St. Quentin for generations, and had at one time formed a numerous clan. The minister's father was a copier of manuscripts and a man of considerable learning; he died when his son was but fifteen years old, leaving his small store of manuscripts to his family, a legacy of rapidly diminishing value, however, now that printing was becoming so common. The young lad had always shown himself of such a gentle disposition that once his father had declared he was born to be a monk, but the boy himself felt no sort of predilection for that life. Shortly after the father's death, when the Faveaus were plunged in sorrow, an old friend, whom they had not seen for many years, arrived at their house. This man came from Wittemberg, and was filled with zeal. He had just embraced the purified faith of the great monk whose name was then being muttered vengefully in Rome. To the sorrowing family the new teaching was a revelation. Mother, son, and daughter were soon proud to call themselves followers of Luther. The friend went his way after a time, leaving behind him a Bible, and from that day began Faveau's ministry. By nature endowed with eloquence, and through his father's care not without learning, an ardent living faith alone was needed to make the young Faveau a great preacher, and this faith came to him in his fresh youth and grew with his manhood. For years the youthful preacher laboured on in peace, gathering one after another into his fold. The French king, Henry II., was easy-going and too much devoted to his pleasures to be very energetic against heretics, and Catherine de Medicis was as yet his much neglected queen-consort, without influence at court or in council. The minister therefore went his way undisturbed, loving and beloved.

Suddenly all his happiness came to an end; there was war between France and Spain. The enemy was marching upon St. Quentin. The Spaniards in countless thousands were coming, led by their young king and headed by the chivalry of Flanders. All during that terrible siege Faveau went about ministering to the sick and dying, until one day he himself was struck down and was carried home to his mother and sister with a cruel wound in his shoulder. At last the end came, the town was stormed and the infuriated Spaniards rushed in like fiends from hell, killing, burning, and destroying. At the first alarm of the assault, Faveau had crept to the ramparts, and in this horrible mêlée he was borne outside the walls by some of the escaping garrison. They spent the night in the marshes without the doomed town, while the demons' orgies went on within. In the morning, St. Quentin was a blazing ruin, strewed with the mutilated bodies of its inhabitants, and the minister Faveau stood before his companions in misery, a haggard sorrow-stricken man with hair as white as snow. He returned to the spot where once had stood his father's house. It was a blackened smoking mass, and there was left no one alive to tell him how or where his mother and sister had died. He could but hope that it was some swift bullet or deep searching sabre which had cut the thread of those dear lives. Escaping into Flanders the minister found refuge with the Colbergs, with whom he spent some months trying to recover his calmness and strength. Margareta, then a young girl, became much attached to him, and her childish affection did more than anything to soothe and comfort his broken heart.

CHAPTER VI.—THE WARNING.

THERE had been several days' preaching since the arrival of the minister narrated in the last chapter, and he was sitting one evening later than usual talking with the Colbergs when a knocking was heard at the house door. As in those unquiet times people did not pay their acquaintances friendly calls at so late an hour, Simon started to his feet in some trepidation, saying,

"I know not who it may be, friend or foe. Bide ye all here. I will go to the door, and hark ye, if I call out lustily and bid the visitors loud welcome, then know it means danger. Thou, Brother Faveau, wilt conceal thyself where wife Alice will point out. But if I make no noise in my greeting, then all is well."

With that he went down the winding stairs, while Margareta stood at the top, her ears strained to catch the first sound and transmit the signal to those within the sitting-room who were waiting almost as anxiously as herself. There was a whispered exchange of greeting in the hall beneath, then silence for a moment, and Simon was heard returning accompanied by the firm measured steps of some one who walked like a soldier. Margareta must have felt suddenly relieved of her anxiety on the minister's account, since she returned quickly to her place beside her mother while her cheeks were lighted with a faint glow of colour, that had not been there when she listened at first. Immediately afterwards Simon re-entered the room followed by Bertrand de Swarte muffled in a long cloak. Margareta's heart gave a bound at the sight of his well-known figure, but the next moment she reproved herself for it, saying to herself: "It must be something untoward which brings him here so late, and so evidently disguised. Dame

Alice looked rather anxiously at the minister, but this latter turned his eyes mildly toward the stranger and said:

"Son, I bid thee God's blessing. I trust thou art of the Fold."

The young man looked keenly at the minister and replied:

"I have not been brought up in your faith, but I wish you no harm, sir. I come now with a warning, and if I mistake not it is you that should receive it. I know that the inquisitor, Peter Titelmann, has arrived to-day, and I believe it is you that he seeks."

At the mention of that dreaded name, a sort of gasp was heard in the room; it seemed to come from the spot where Margareta stood.

"Sir," continued Bertrand, "if you be indeed he they call Minister Faveau, fly, fly ere it be too late! Fly this very night," he went on hurriedly, "to-morrow it will be too late. Make haste! Save yourself!"

The minister put his hand on Bertrand's arm, saying:

"Friend, art thou a soldier?"

"Yes," answered Bertrand.

"Well, then," pursued the minister, a slight smile overspreading his countenance, "if thou wert in a post of danger in front of the enemy, guarding some important point, and if a trusty scout sped to thee crying, 'Fly! Haste away! Save thyself! The enemy comes!' what would'st do?"

"Do," replied Bertrand indignantly, "why fight till death, as I am a belted knight."

"Even so," rejoined Faveau, "think then of me as the sentinel guarding the post, thou art the trusty scout."

"Nay, but you are no soldier," replied Bertrand somewhat at a loss in contending with the minister in wordy warfare. "What good can you do by staying; what can you do?"

"My son, I am a soldier of the Lord, and I can die."

During the short dialogue between Bertrand and the minister Margareta had come somewhat forward, and now as the young man turned his eyes toward her, it seemed to him that he looked upon an angel. She stood with upturned face, her hands clasped before her, her eyes dilated in a sort of ecstasy, while her lips were parted in a smile, as though soft whispers were passing through them. She was absorbed in her own thoughts and utterly unconscious of those about her in the room. She was realising with all the enthusiastic richness of her nature, what it was to be a martyr. She was then looking beyond the stake and her eyes reflected the glory of the shining crown. Bertrand felt as he gazed that she was far away from him; it seemed to him that the spirit of the Madonna had descended upon her, and that he ought to kneel down and pray to her. But the sight of the beautiful girl absorbed in her own vision only increased his anxiety a hundred fold.

"When courage can do but harm it becomes foolhardiness," said Bertrand to the minister, eager to win him to more prudent views with regard to his own safety.

"Truly that is so," assented Faveau readily enough.

"And were I by refusing to seek cover to bring my friends to destruction, I should say I were no valiant soldier but only a foolish obstinate man," continued the young man bluntly.

"Methinks I know the counsellor which prompted that wily logic," answered the minister kindly, not in the least offended at Bertrand's heat.

"Oh, bethink you, sir," cried the young man in desperation. "You would never bring desolation,—bring the fiend Titelmann into this house. Save yourself to save them." His voice had a pleading ring in it as it uttered these words. He struck the right chord too in the minister's heart.

Now Simon, who with his wife and daughter had hitherto been silent, spoke:

"Say not so. I'll have no man slip away from my house like a thief because I fear to harbour him. Nay, my door is strong and so is my heart, Brother Faveau, and you shall test both till they break."

"No, no, Simon, I pray it will not come to that, friend, though I doubt you not. But the young man hath spoken wisdom, I see it. It were wrong not to consider my friends—and the child. My little Perlchen. I pray God to spare the child. I will depart hence instantly." The minister spoke hurriedly and in great perturbation. He rose to get his cloak, but Margareta was before him, and, as it were, mutely opposed his going by standing in front of him as if to stop the way. Bertrand was ready, however, with arguments to convince her that the minister should leave, and like a skilful diplomatist used a perfectly opposite line of reasoning to that so successfully employed against the minister.

"Will you not help me in urging your friend to go elsewhere?" he pleaded to her. "Believe me, he is not safe here. Your father's house is marked. The minister is known to be under your roof. Your house will be searched, your father will be thrown into prison, then who will help your friend to find a place of safety? Urge him to go at once. Save him in spite of himself."

Margareta looked earnestly at Bertrand for a moment.

"Is it so?" she said. "Do they know he is here? Then indeed he must go elsewhere."

But she had no need to hurry the minister's departure. Accustomed to hiding and to frequent changes of abode Faveau was even ready to set out before Bertrand realised that his eloquence had succeeded in influencing the minister's conduct.

"Nay urge me not to stay," he was saying, in answer to some observations from Simon or his wife, "it would be wrong. The young man has shown me clearly that this is not my post. Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings shall wisdom proceed. I stand rebuked for my stubborn foolishness. I will proceed to our brother's house, and shall bide there in safety until the scourge of God's people be gone hence. Fear not for me, I shall be safe."

Bertrand offered to escort the minister. "The night is dark," he said, "and I may be able to be of use, if you will let me go with you. In case we meet any soldiers roaming about I could prevent their molesting you."

"Yes, thou may'st come," assented the minister. He then bade Margareta and her mother good-bye and left the room accompanied by Simon and young de Swarte. They had descended the stairs and nearly crossed the hall when he muttered: "Ah I had forgotten that," and hastily retraced the steps he had come. He said to Dame Colberg in a low tone:

"The youth speaks fair. Is he to be trusted? I don't mean trusted with the safety of my worthless life, that is a light thing, but can he be trusted with the secret of Brother Mallart's house?"

Before her mother had time to reply Margareta said with suppressed eagerness:

"You may trust him with all you hold most sacred. He is true as steel and loyal as light."

The minister bent his glance for an instant upon the fair flushed face and said briefly, "'Tis well."

When he returned to the hall Simon was in the act of giving numerous injunctions to the young knight to observe the greatest caution, and not even to speak in the street. He then bade them God-speed, and the two men stepped into the darkness. The minister led the way through streets now silent and deserted, the only lights being an occasional oil lamp glimmering above the shrine of the Virgin. At last they emerged into the market place, which was of course less obscure, though hardly better furnished with lights than the narrow and crooked streets which they had left, and then they turned under an archway, went down a narrow lane and stopped suddenly at a low door-way. Bertrand was amazed to recognise it as belonging to the house of Francis Mallart, the wealthy burgher and town councillor, but he said nothing. The minister now addressed him for the first time since they had left Colberg's house.

"Friend," he said, "this is now my resting place. 'Tis a dark night but young eyes can see far. I trust thou wilt keep the secret of my passing this door for the sake of thine own conscience, and for the peace of mind of yon sweet maiden, she said thou wert true as steel and loyal as light."

Had the night been less dark the minister would have seen the quick flush of pleasure which overspread Bertrand's face as he heard these words.

"No, by my faith," he replied earnestly, "red-hot pincers shall pierce my tongue ere it reveal the road we have come this night."

"I trust no harm will come to thee through my companionship," pursued the minister. "I would even say I trust I may be the unworthy means of a great good being vouchsafed to thee. Young man, I hope we may meet again, meantime goodnight. I will not summon anyone to the door till the sound of thy footsteps be far away."

Bertrand bade him good-night and left him, but not to seek his own lodging in the round tower of the citadel. He felt little inclination to sleep, so he walked upon the ramparts silently communing with his own heart. His mind was full of the image of Margareta as he had seen her that evening, so lovely, so inspired looking. Surely, he thought, so sweet a being cannot be a heretic. A heretic is one who is burnt in this world and damned in the next. He shuddered at the thought. I will never believe it, no, not if all the priests in Christendom should swear it. And then there crossed his mind the recollection of the minister's words. "She said I was true as steel and loyal as light." The thought sent a thrill of pleasure through him, and deep down in his heart the young man registered a vow that he would be always worthy of her high confidence. These happy reflections by-and-by gave place to others less likely to soothe him.

The image of Peter Titelmann, the inquisitor, suddenly flashed before him. What if that horrid functionary had come for others besides the minister? What if he were going to make another "holy clearance" like that at Antwerp when so many were burnt that even Catholics were shocked. What if he had come for Margareta? Ah! he gnashed his teeth at the thought, and the cold sweat stood out in drops on his brow.

"He shall not get her, my lamb, my saint," he exclaimed aloud. "I would save her, though it were with my heart's blood that I had to quench the burning fire."

With such thoughts as these to keep him company, it is easy to understand how the young soldier let the night wear far into the morning before he sought his own home. At last, very tired, he returned to his lodgings, having come to the determination to seek out Simon Colberg early in the morning and urge him to go away with his family to England, the country of the Protestant queen, where men's lives were safe from the deadly clutch of the Inquisition.

THE DANGER IN 1588.

IN the early part of the sixteenth century everything favoured the rapid progress of the Reformation. Although its advocates suffered many and cruel persecutions, they were full of faith and joy, as men who see the dawn of a better state of things. This faith and joy communicated itself to the people who welcomed the new preachers as the very heralds whom the evangelic prophet describes as bringing "good tidings of good." And this enthusiasm grew until it culminated in great but unsuccessful efforts to establish a new order of things and render this bright prospect a reality. The disenchantment began early in Germany, and followed in course of time in all the countries principally affected by the Reformation. Thus the history of the latter half of the sixteenth century is very sad; for we see the cause of the Reformation—that eternal cause of Justice and Truth, for which Latimer bid his fellow-martyrs play the man—driven back in all directions, and its opponents everywhere triumphant.

In this great duel the centre of interest passes from Germany to France and the Netherlands, from France and the Netherlands to England. That the Reformation should be forced to find its citadel outside the continent of Europe shows to what a degree it had lost ground, and what would have been the result had the invasion of England in 1588 proved successful.

The two great influences in deadly struggle as to which should have the direction of the life and future of Europe gain distinctness, if we typify them under the names of their representative men—Luther and Loyola. In the popular idea of the former, we have the spirit of the Reformation; in the popular idea of the latter, the spirit of the counter-Reformation.

The great instruments of the reformers had been preaching, education, and the press. These means, than which none can be rendered more subtle, were also among the instruments on which the Jesuits relied. The Order only obtained the approval of the Pope in 1540, but in a short while it had no less than eighty-eight colleges in Italy, while in Spain, where it was opposed by Dominican influence, it had ninety-two; and in Portugal it would appear that its colleges had multiplied on an equal scale.

But it was naturally as a missionary Order, and in Protestant countries, that the Jesuits displayed most vigour and that their successes were most striking. Before Loyola's death in 1566, they were able to say that there was not a town of note in Germany where they had not a college. In 1551, Ferdinand of Austria gave them control of the University of Vienna; in 1556, they obtained possession of the endowed school at Cologne, previously under a Protestant, and in the same year they established themselves at Ingolstadt, where they founded a university. From Vienna they went on to establish colleges throughout Austria. In 1556 they came to Prague, and in 1561 established a college at Tyrnau. About the same time they appeared in Moravia, and were soon found at Olmutz and Brunn. They opened a college at Cologne in 1561, and from thence spread all over the Rhenish provinces. Very soon they had a college at Mayence, and advancing up the Rhine established themselves at Spires. Then they tried their fortune on the Maine, and receiving a cordial welcome into Wartzburg, they spread from thence into Franconia. They came into the Tyrol, and settled at Innspruck and at Halle; and, finally, so well did they succeed at Munich, that that city was soon called the Rome of Germany. Thus in a very few years they had conquered Bavaria and the Tyrol, Franconia and Swabia, and a large part of the Rhenish provinces, besides planting their Order in Hungary, Bohemia, and Moravia.

Submit to the Church, or leave the country—these were the conditions offered to Protestants as soon as the Jesuits obtained power. Strange to say, all but a faithful few yielded. In this way, Bishop Julius, of Wurtzburg, brought back in 1586 fourteen cities and market-towns, and upwards of 200 villages. The same indefatigable prelate is said to have laid the foundation of 300 churches, whose tall and pointed spires are still a feature in the landscape. When Acquaviva, the Jesuit general, told Sixtus v. in 1587 of all these successes, the Pope was in raptures, as well he might be.

Rudolf II., a pupil of the Jesuits, who succeeded his father Maximilian II. as Emperor of Germany in 1576, helped to complete their work in Austria. Notwithstanding the entreaties of the estates, he expelled all Protestants from the Imperial cities and from all offices of State, and refused them any admission into the burgher class, or to allow them to take a degree. No citizen henceforth ventured to attend any other but a Catholic church, or to send his child to any but a Catholic school, and this in a land where twenty years earlier the Protestant cause was making continual progress. Sunday schools were established and catechisms printed for their use, probably the abridged summary of Christian doctrine published by the Jesuits, of which it is stated that there was a copy in nearly every house in Germany; this little compendium of Jesuit doctrine reaching in 1584 its four hundredth edition.

In the Netherlands the counter-reformation was made with a vigour never equalled except during the French revolutionary Reign of Terror. The Netherlands had been in the Middle Ages a land of freedom. Its cities were almost independent states, and there had grown up in consequence a powerful life, political, religious, commercial, artistic. It was here consequently that the more thorough Protestants found a refuge and gathered converts. The Anabaptists were very numerous, the Netherlands were to them what Geneva was to the Calvinists. Under Charles v. the most frightful edicts were enacted for their suppression. In 1529—at the Diet of Spires—he decreed that "every Anabaptist, every twice-baptised person, no matter what sex, no matter what age, should be put to death either by the sword, or by fire, or in some other way, and that without any previous legal inquiry." In 1565, his son, Philip II. of Spain, promulgated an edict surpassing, so it is said, all previous ones in severity, and relegating all religious matters to the tender mercies of the Inquisition. The Protestants broke out in commotion and became iconoclastic. Supported however by the timid and fearful, the Government soon gained the mastery. "Make us more concessions," was the Pope's message to Philip, who in the blackest of humours, owing to domestic troubles with Don Carlos, sent Alva to the Netherlands, to set up his bloody tribunal—the notorious Council of Troubles—and reduced the country to silence. "Monseigneur," someone asked the papal nuncio at Madrid, "are you now satisfied with the king's proceedings?" "Perfectly satisfied," he blandly replied.

The Netherlands soon awoke to the importance of the struggle, and under the Prince of Orange defied all Philip's armies, tortures and scaffolds, so that in the end the Northern Provinces won a precarious independence, while the Southern had to be allowed what to-day we understand by Home Rule.

The old Dominican style of acting having failed, Philip took his lessons in future from the new Jesuit school. He had in the Walloon Provinces a people naturally disposed to take a different course to the Flemings. The policy was to work on these race antipathies and intensify the Catholic feeling of the Walloons. The Jesuits made the country their own, having a college at St. Omer and a university at Douay. In this manner and by taking care to leave them in possession of their ancient privileges, the Walloons were won over to the King, and Philip's general Alexander Farnese gained possession of Courtnay in 1580; of Tournay in 1581; of Oudenarde in 1582; of Dunkirk in 1583, the capture of the latter place being followed by that of Nieuport and the whole coast to Ostend, Dixmunde and Furnes. He soon took Ypres, Bruges and Ghent, and in this victorious career his most effective instruments were the Jesuits, who entered every fallen city. The assassination of William of Orange, often attempted, was successfully accomplished in July, 1583, and was the prelude to the final fall of religious liberty in the Belgian Netherlands. Brussels was the first to surrender, next Mechlin, last came Antwerp. The Protestants were allowed two years to change their religion or quit the kingdom.

If we turn to France we find the same work going on again under a different form. Cardinal Guise introduced the Jesuits into France in 1574, and the Duke of Guise erected a college for them in Normandy. In a short time they were at Rouen, Verdun, Dijon, Bourges and Nevers. Their advent seemed to give new life and energy to the Catholic party, so that about the year 1580 a Venetian asserted that the number of Protestants in France had diminished by seventy per cent. and the mass of the people had become Catholics. Whatever else this counter-reformation meant, it was earnest, intense and serious, and its leaders saw clearly that the king, though the most fanatical of Catholics, was too degraded a being to lead them to anything but ruin. They accordingly appointed a secret government of Paris, called the League of Sixteen, who looked to the Duke of Guise as their head. The League had agents all over the country and branches at the chief cities. All its members solemnly pledged themselves to labour for the removal of the abuses of the government, and to allow no Huguenots in France. The volcano soon burst into flames, a great insurrection took place in Paris, the king had to fly and Guise was virtually King of Paris.

Meanwhile the Huguenot-Rome, Geneva, the centre of early French Protestantism, was menaced. In 1587 the three forest cantons of Switzerland, in concert with Zug, Lucerne and Frosbury, entered into a treaty with Philip II. in May 1587, by which either party engaged to help the other to the utmost, should a war on account of religion occur. Hitherto the rivalry of France and Savoy had been the protection of Geneva; now Henri III. was so pressed by the League, that he promised the Duke of Savoy that he would not interfere with his designs upon Geneva.

Thus in the centre of Europe the new Jesuitised Catholicism had recovered greater part of the old position. Finally victorious in the Belgian Netherlands, restored and triumphant in Southern Germany, a great democratic power in France, threatening the entire extinction of Protestantism in that country, and Geneva itself, as it seemed, about to be swallowed up, the new Catholicism had only one more great fortress to take, and its ultimate victory was assured. All might yet be undone unless England were conquered.

To effect so great an end Pius V. wished that he could shed his blood, and his successor Gregory XII. had it equally at heart. Ireland offered a tempting ground to his machinations. An insurrection was stirred up, but failed from the Pope not properly supporting it with sufficient money and troops. The English government took fearful vengeance: all Munster was laid waste and occupied henceforth by English colonists.

Meanwhile, the Jesuits starting schools, colleges and universities, sought, as we have seen, to outrival in learning the Protestant doctors. Seizing the printing-press, they inundated Protestant lands with their literature. Above all they cultivated the pulpit and became powerful preachers. But this alone would not have been sufficient. Their reactionary fervour was strengthened by the fact that no Jesuit sought his own individual advantage, each was supposed to sacrifice himself wholly for the good of the cause. They were all bound by one spirit to common ends. From their colleges they came unhesitatingly into a country where, at every step, their lives were in danger, travelling in various disguises and under feigned names. Passing to and fro in all directions they were the delicate fibres which formed the great web of the vast conspiracy of which the centres were in the Escurial or at Rome. The romance of their lives, the welcome they received from the oldest and greatest families in the land, the eagerness with which hundreds pressed to their ministrations, the thought that they were agents in a movement which was to restore the broken unity of Christendom, and to bring to nations and individuals the only true salvation—all these things helped to strengthen their sway.

As many causes had combined to bring about the Reformation, personal, social and political influences mingling in the long religious struggle, so many circumstances had contributed to the early successes of the Jesuits. There was a strange interblending of ambitions and motives, and not loss of means, in this new warfare which the devotees among them held to be sacred. The condition of all Europe testified to the peril of the moment, but if we would realise its full extent with regard to England it must be remembered that rarely was this country in greater anguish or more divided than under the Tudors.

To read Macaulay's famous poem, "The Armada," one might suppose that Englishmen in 1588 were all of one heart and one mind. To say nothing of the vast numbers of Protestants who were at variance with the established religion, a large number of the people were still Romanists, conforming to avoid pains and penalties, but ready on the first opportunity to throw off the mask. And we cannot suppose, considering the things they had suffered, that they would have stood by the government of Queen Elizabeth. After the rebellion in 1569 there was not a village in the north of England where some of the inhabitants were not hanged as a warning to the rest. And our old historian, Harrison, tells us in his Chronicle that "in the reign of Elizabeth there was not one year commonly wherein 300 or 400 persons were not devoured and eaten up by the gallows in one place or another." To prefer modern romantic notions to the actual descriptions of the times by eye-witnesses such as Latimer and Bernard Gilpin, may be patriotic, but if we want to realise the dangers from which England was preserved, and the lessons to be learnt, we must be willing to read a few pages of the history usually left uncut.

No one can doubt that the sixteenth century was one of those periods when energetic men are excited to the utmost by the thought of making rapid fortunes, acquiring great estates, and rising to high honour. Those among us who recollect the discovery of the Australian gold-fields and the rush and stir it caused in every circle in England, may have a faint conception of the effect on Europe of the news that there were gold and silver mines in the New World. The gold-hunger aroused gave a new standard to life. If men had not the daring to become pirates and buccaneers, they tried to extract as much as they possibly could of the precious commodity out of the estates they got hold of, or the money they were able to use in commercial ventures. Speculation and usury were the order of the day. Vast quantities of land were withdrawn from tillage and laid down in grass for no other object. Farms were rack-rented, the buildings allowed to go to decay, in order that the farmer might leave and his land be more profitably used for sheep. Bernard Gilpin and Latimer's descriptions of the suffering thereby caused are piteous. Thomas Levin, a grave preacher, in a sermon before a solemn auditory, ascribed to these cruel evictions the number of old fathers, poor widows and young children who lie and creep, begging in the miry streets of London and Westminster. In fact we are told that in London "the poor died in the streets from cold, and laid sick at the citizens' doors and perished with hunger."

Notwithstanding the strong government of these times, the "sturdy rogues" and "ungratious unthrifts" multiplied in such numbers that, at the time of which we are writing, the attempt to repress them was being given up in despair. There is a statement made by a justice of the peace in Somersetshire in 1596, and preserved by Strypo, which vividly paints the condition of England at the time of the threatened Spanish invasion. In Somersetshire alone, this justice states, "forty persons had been executed in a year for robberies, thefts, and other felonies; thirty-five burnt in the hand; thirty-seven whipped; 183 discharged; that those who were discharged were most wicked and desperate persons who never would come to any good." Yet he goes on to say the fifth part of the felonies committed in the county were not brought to trial, either from the superior cunning of the felons, the remissness of the magistrates, or the foolish lenity of the people; that other counties of England were in no better condition than Somersetshire, and many of them even worse; that there were at least 300 or 400 able-bodied vagabonds in every county who lived by theft and rapine, and who sometimes met in troops to the number of sixty and committed spoil on the inhabitants; that if all the felons of the kind were reduced to good subjection, they would form a strong army; and that the magistrates were awed by the associations and the threats of confederates from executing justice on the offenders. It would be strange if this condition of things were not reflected in Shakespeare. That it certainly is in several plays, but most fully and profoundly in "The Tempest," where, in the conception of Caliban, we have some idea of the condition to which vast masses of the poor had been reduced.

Thus England was not secure internally, although she made so fair a show against the Spanish invaders. There were elements of discord, and even of civil strife, that might have been easily fomented by their presence. The same influences were at work as in Europe. Had the Jesuits effected a footing there is every reason to believe that results would have followed in many respects similar to those which accompanied their advance in Germany. The issue would have been the ruin of England. The "Invincible" Armada itself was not more than the herald of a more terrible force.

It would be a blessed thing, if, at this tercentenary of the Spanish Armada, instead of glorifying men, Protestant Christians would strive to understand the lessons God has so plainly taught us in the history of Christendom. Instead of believing with our dear and suffering forefathers that it was His arm and His alone that saved England from the peril, we suppose patriotism demands that we attribute it to English pluck and the Silver Belt, and that the wisest and safest thing is to intensify our insularity.

"Make fast the doors; heap wood upon the fire;
Draw in your stools, and pass the goblet round,
And be the prattling voice of children heard;
Now let us make good cheer—but what is this?
Do I not see, or do I dream I see,
A form, which midmost in the circle sits,
Half visible, his face deformed with scars
And foul with blood? Oh yes, I know it; there
Sits DANGER with his feet upon the hearth." [1]

[1] Henry Taylor's Van Artevelde

The Armada.

O THOU who heardest from Thy throne
  Thy people's supplication,
Beseeching at Thy hand alone
  Deliverance for our nation;
For Thy great goodness in the past,
For saving strength around us cast,
  Accept our adoration.

When the Armada stretched afar
  In pride and power unbounded,
And for the fierce, unequal war,
  Its haughty threatenings sounded,—
From cot and castle, shore and sea,
Our fathers' prayers arose to Thee,
  Nor was their hope confounded.

Thou madest strong their hands to fight
  By many a pregnant token,
For God and fatherland and right
  Their valiant vows were spoken;
But Thine own Arm the victory won,
By fear and storm alike undone
  The tyrant's strength was broken.

Thy tempests scourged the baffled host
  Their last frail hopes to sever,
While raging sea and rugged coast
  Made void each vain endeavour;
The retribution of the wave
Engulphed them in its stormy grave,
  And laid them low for ever!

The records of those deeds of old
  With age are dim and hoary,
But still we hear our fathers bold
  Give Thee, O God, the glory;
Though since those far-off hopes and fears
The mercies of three hundred years
  Have filled our island-story.

To that brave past, for which anew
  Our grateful thanks are swelling,
We pray Thee keep us leal and true,
  Its faithfulness excelling;
In us, O Lord, may all men see
A people righteous, strong and free,
  Beneath Thy shadow dwelling.

Preserved and shielded by the might
  Of Love that faileth never,
To keep the faith, to speed the right,
  Be this our pure endeavour;
And high among the nations crowned,
For freedom be our land renowned,
  The home of truth for ever!

MARY ROWLES.

 These verses (the first and the last three) can be sung, if required, to the tune "Luther's Hymn."

HOSPITAL NURSES

IN LONDON AND ON THE CONTINENT.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER II.

EVERY opportunity has been afforded me by the matrons and sisters, of watching the daily life of the nurses. They have permitted me to go through the homes attached to the hospitals and to speak with the workers and to witness the day and night work.

Unless they had been good enough to do this, I could have formed no idea of the gigantic proportions of what is known as hospital nursing, nor could I have guessed at the character of work performed.

The nurses are as a rule divided into three classes: Probationers (ordinary and special), staff-nurses, and sisters. The ordinary, or nurse probationers, supply the main body of the hospital and infirmary nursing-staff; while the special, or lady probationers, eventually fill the superior appointments, such as sisters or matrons.

Let us take the work in St. Bartholomew's Hospital, which will afford a good sample of what is done by nurses in the twenty-four hours.

Those engaged in day work breakfast at twenty minutes to seven in the morning, then go into the wards to take the places of the night-nurses. They make the beds, sweep and dust the wards, polish the brasses, scrub the pulleys, cupboard tops, and window ledges, cleanse the lavatories, clean out the baths, and do other necessary cleaning.

They then look to those patients who are too ill to be bathed, washing them carefully bit by bit. It is needless to say that in this direction is to be found some of their most unpleasant work. The patients brought into the hospital are often frightfully dirty, their feet being covered with a hard horny crust of thick black dirt, and their heads literally alive. The nurses have to wash and comb these people, using for their heads what is termed a snowball—a mixture of turpentine and carbolic acid. Their caps in a measure preserve their own hair while performing these unpleasant yet necessary tasks. But one of the nurses told me that, however tired and exhausted she was after the long day's or night's work, she never laid herself down to rest without bestowing time and labour on her own hair.

By ten o'clock all is in order for the doctors to make their rounds—all the appliances they may require being set out in order by each bed—the wards looking clean, bright and fresh, and the nurses themselves in clean aprons and caps showing no sign of the rough disagreeable work they have performed.

As soon as the doctors and students arrive, quite another class of work falls to the nurses' lot. They follow each case, and if necessary bind up and replace dressings; they make poultices, dress wounds, attend in the theatre for operations, attend the matron's classes, or the lectures of the medical teachers, and give the patients their physic and their food. In short, body, mind and heart are kept in full occupation.

On asking if it were necessary that lady nurses should waste their time over work which could be done just as well by ordinary housemaids, I was answered by one of the nurses, "Consider what a large staff of servants we should require if we did not do the work, and I do not think they would do it so well or so quickly as we do."

The nurses' dinner is served for one-third of their number at half-past twelve, for a second third at one, and for the last third at half-past one. It is of the simplest character, merely hot meat and vegetables, beer or milk. They are allowed half an hour again for tea, which is taken in the little kitchen attached to each ward.

The night duty is very hard and trying for probationers, who, in full work, have two months of it in the year. The hours are from nine in the evening till seven next morning. There are three night superintendents who visit the wards occasionally throughout the night.

After the long hours of active watching they turn up the gas, if it be still dark, at six o'clock, and give the patients their breakfast. They then make the beds on one side of the ward. Twice a week they have to sort and count the dirty linen, which is kept in a box lined with zinc in the lavatory outside the ward.

Every care is taken to place new patients into clean beds and coverings. Blankets, sheets, mattress, covers, are all changed.

There are 675 beds in this hospital, and reckoning sisters, nurses, and probationers, there are two hundred attendants.

This band of workers has but little relaxation from incessant toil and responsibility.

The sisters have three weeks' holiday in the year, and the nurses only a fortnight.

Twice a week they get out of the hospital from six till a quarter to nine in the evening, and each month a whole day and a half day away from duties.

The probationers wear cotton dresses, the sisters wear dark-blue cashmere. Aprons and caps are alike for all, except that there is some little difference in the quality of the trimming.

St. Bartholomew's Hospital began to take probationers ten years ago. One or two so-called nurses' homes are attached to it, but one, that for special probationers, is nearly a mile distant. The accommodation is not in this respect so perfect as in other hospitals, but the authorities are striving to remedy the defect by adapting houses outside Little Britain to nurses' homes.

At St. Thomas's the work is much the same for sisters and probationers, but the home is much more comfortable, being on the spot and possessing the best sanitary arrangements possible. It consists of a large dining-room and sitting and class-room combined. In this last the probationers receive instruction by way of lectures from the presiding sister.

There are three floors of bedrooms, and on each floor a bath-room with hot and cold water.

There are no fires in the bedrooms, but glass ventilators over each door to let in warm air.

Each probationer, whether special or ordinary—there are thirty-four of them—has a room to herself, which she must dust, cleanse, and keep in order. Once a week, however, a charwoman scrubs it.

All dine together; but each has her own little teapot and is allowed a quarter of a pound of tea, and one pound of sugar, a week.

The home for nurses at the London Hospital was opened last year. Each nurse, of whom there are one hundred and eighty, is now provided with a separate bedroom, whereas formerly some six or seven had to sleep in one room. A good sitting-room, dining-room, and kitchen are attached to the home, and a sister-superintendent looks to the general welfare and comfort. The home has the advantage of joining the hospital.

Probationers suitable for nurses are, after a month's trial, received without payment, and are paid for the first year's service the sum of 12*l.*, for the second 20*l.*, all being found for them, except washing.

A limited number are admitted for periods of three months, on the payment of a guinea a week, and if sent by other institutions, ten shillings and sixpence a week.

Of course no certificates are given, except to those who have passed through the whole training, which in this hospital takes two years.

Here, as in other hospitals, the practical experience is gained in the wards, and in none are the advantages greater for the study of medical and surgical nursing.

The theoretical portion of a nurse's training is made a strong point.

Throughout the year there are three courses of lectures: the first, on the "General Details of Nursing," is given by the matron; the second, on "Elementary Anatomy and Surgical Nursing," by one of the surgical staff; and the third, on "Elementary Physiology and Medical Nursing," by one of the medical staff. At the conclusion of the third course, examinations are held and prizes given.

The subjects of these lectures show what a mass of information, as well as practical experience, is required to make a good nurse.

The Middlesex Hospital affords one or two deviations from the general rule, which render it of great interest.

This hospital receives both lady and ordinary probationers. Of the former, there are twelve, and of the latter, together with the sisters and nurses, there are sixty; but the thing to be noticed is that there is no hard and fast line against an ordinary probationer becoming a sister, provided she is found to possess qualifications of a high order.

The salary received by the ordinary probationers is, for the first year, 12*l.*; for the second, 18*l.*; and an additional two pounds each year until 24*l.* is reached. At the end of the third year of training, the probationer obtains her certificate, and if, as is often the case, she remains for many years, an additional tribute to her efficiency is written year by year on the certificate.

It is quite different with lady probationers; instead of receiving money, they pay a guinea a week, and are exempt from menial duties. As a rule, they come here for a year's training and experience, and generally with some definite object, such as Army or Navy nursing, or to be useful in their families or parishes. At the end of the year, therefore, they are entitled to their certificates.

Two ladies trained here—one the lady-superintendent of Netley, and another who did good service in the East—have been honoured with the Queen's Badge, of which mention has been made.

For more than twenty years this hospital has taken ordinary probationers, and for a still longer period lady probationers, so that it was early in the field fighting against ignorant and uneducated nursing.

The Home for the sisters, nurses, and probationers, joins the hospital, and is in every way good. Sleeping apartments, dining, sitting-rooms, and ventilation, are all that could be desired, and the superintendent most thoughtful for the comfort of the nurses. There is no luxury, but everything needful for rest and comfort.

But that which is specially worthy of notice, because it offers comfort to the sick throughout the country, is the building of a home adjoining that of the nurses, and forming part of the hospital itself. It is called the Middlesex Hospital Trained Nurses' Institute.

It is built upon the site of some old houses in Cleveland Street, and has been opened only a few months. It has no past to record; its work is all in the future.

Its object is to board, lodge, and keep in constant readiness a certain number (twenty-four) of thoroughly competent nurses who have been trained in the hospital for at least five years, and upon whom, from long experience, full reliance may be placed, to be sent out to any part of the country where a skilled nurse may be required. The nurse so sent out has to obey certain rules, which are so judicious that I wish I had space to write them here.

These nurses may be engaged for medical and surgical cases at two guineas a week, with two-and-sixpence weekly for washing, and travelling expenses.

The nurses receive from the hospital a fixed salary of 26*l.*, and a percentage upon what they earn. As soon as an engagement is over, each one returns to the home.

The home is simple, clean, and pretty, and is fast getting into perfect working order.

Guy's Hospital has at present no special home for its nurses, but accommodates them in dormitories within the hospital.

Each sister has a sitting and bedroom attached to the ward under her supervision.

Those in attendance on the patients have all been trained in the hospital, either as probationers or as lady pupils, the first of these supplying the nurses, the second the sisters. There is a sharp line of demarcation between them; the nurses, no matter of what social position, can never aspire to the office of sister.

As a rule, in this hospital the nurses are of the higher domestic class—daughters of farmers or of tradespeople, with here and there a sprinkling of those who could not afford to come as lady pupils; while, on the other hand, the lady pupils and sisters are all gentle-women.

Lady pupils, the youngest of whom must be twenty-four years old, live in the matron's house just outside the hospital in the courtyard. They pay a guinea a week, and provide their own uniform, so that they are no charge on the hospital.

The matron is generally able to decide at the end of three months whether a lady pupil is sufficiently capable to continue her training. She can, however, only obtain her certificate by remaining at the hospital a whole year.

The probationers do the rough work of the hospital so long as they are probationers, but this ceases when they have obtained certificates, and become nurses. The lady pupils do no rough or menial work, as it is called. In the two last points, this hospital differs from others.

Probationers at first go for a month on trial, for which time they receive no wage. If after the trial they still wish to remain, they must do so for three years—the first year as probationers, the second and third as nurses.

The wages for the first year are 12*l.*, and for the two following years 18*l.*, with uniform.

The hours for day nurses do not begin in the wards until eight o'clock.

Guy's has an institution for trained nurses in St. Thomas's Street, No. 12, and the nurses are in great request, for they not only attend in ordinary illnesses, but in fevers, diphtheria, small-pox, and nervous cases, the payment ranging from one-and-a-half guineas to two-and-a-half a week.

The system of nursing in King's College Hospital was reorganised some two-and-a-half years since, in consequence of serious disagreements.

A matron was selected to replace the nurses who left. From that time to this the greatest harmony has prevailed.

Every ward now bears testimony to a good organiser and to careful, obedient workers. For example, each contains a table fitted up with sliding drawers full of all sorts of bandages (which are made by the nurses), and on the top various lotions and necessaries for a sick room. At the end of each room is a small laboratory, which saves time when every moment is valuable. A circular drain pipe tube is also in use down which all linen from fever patients is passed into a carbolic tank.

The order of ward work is so drawn that there can be no excuse for mistakes, the most trifling work and the time for doing it is written down; but from what I saw there appears no desire to shirk work, but a desire rather to err on the other side.

One thing with which I was struck was the very appetizing way in which the patients' food is placed before them, each having a spotless tray-cloth over locker or board, and the food as well cooked and set before them as would be expected in a good private house.

All these tray-cloths are made by the nurses out of old table house linen, sent by the Queen and by various club houses.

Go where you will, you see hearty earnest work among the nurses and sisters, and the matron evidently the friend of all. There seemed nothing little or mean about the people or their work.

It is a good hospital for training nurses, as all cases except small-pox are received. The theoretical training too is quite up to the mark. The home sister lectures three times a week, and the medical superintendent once a week.

A limited number of special probationers is received on the payment of thirteen guineas a quarter, paid in advance, for which they are trained, boarded, lodged, and provided with a very pretty uniform of Raphael green cashmere with quaint caps, aprons, white collars, and cuffs.

The work is doubtless very hard indeed, but nothing is omitted that can make it cheerful, pleasant, and healthful. The bedroom accommodation is excellent, and care is taken that the nurses get daily outdoor exercise.

I wish I could say more of this hospital, but this paper is only to deal with nurses and nursing power. Perhaps I may be allowed to say that the public, not being aware of its improved working power, have rather fallen off in their subscriptions, and the consequence is that two wards are closed; and this in a neighbourhood almost, if not quite, as poor as that which surrounds the London Hospital.

Flowers, clothing, money, are all wanted. There is a beautiful Children's Ward, and if ladies who have children would remember the wants of this ward, I shall owe them a debt of gratitude.

In conclusion, I would say that it has been my privilege to look over the diaries of some of our nurses, and to listen to the experiences of others. In this way I have become acquainted with some exciting and deeply interesting stories relating to nurses as well as patients—stories which in their pathos and interest would touch the hearts of readers to their depths.

I have been struck over and over again at the curious chain of circumstances; how the most trivial thing has brought the most unlikely people face to face, and unravelled hopeless tangles; how, too, in moments of pain or exhaustion, a tragic history has flowed from the lips which was never intended to find utterance, but which having been uttered, resulted in happiness.

Even the presence of a piece of orange-peel thrown on the pavement in the city has been known, for example, to effect wonderful changes in certain lives. Go to a hospital if you want to learn that nothing is trifling.

In the diary of one who has now been a quarter of a century actively employed in our hospitals, I learned how and why she became a nurse; how difficult she found it in the early days to forget self; how fretful it made her to be called away from her quiet cup of tea, at the only really peaceful half hour in the day; how her fretfulness affected those under her care; how she was made to feel ashamed by the pathetic look of a patient brought in with a broken limb; and how the better part of her nature was developed by her contact with patient suffering and endurance. Three or four most interesting stories I read in this diary showing that truth is stranger than fiction, but which would be out of place here.

AN INDIAN RECOLLECTION.

IT is now some quarter of a century since I found myself in a military station on the Kashmir frontier; one of a garrison keeping watch and ward over that, and the neighbouring provinces or dependencies of our great Indian Empire.

In those days troops did not often change quarters, and there was often displayed by officers a considerable knowledge of native character, for in various shooting and hunting excursions, they were necessarily thrown much with their guides; and, having once learnt their language, were glad to relieve the monotony of a solitary camp fire by hearing their stories, and remarks on things in general—which, by the way, were sometimes amusing, and displayed no lack of observation on the part of the silent, grave, undemonstrative native.

Now the province in which this military station was situated, had for some years been remarkable for the success which the Christian religion had attained among the natives. The highest officials had been bright examples of what it can accomplish in causing men to carry out the great commandment of doing unto others as we would they should do to us, whilst their faith and dependence on a Superior Being were openly proclaimed whenever there was an opportunity by their acts.

It is not fitting here, nor have I space, to go into details; it is only necessary to read the histories of the great Sepoy Revolt to see how a few brave men, supported by their faith, stemmed the torrent which threatened to overwhelm the Empire, and expel Christianity from India. As I said before, there were a good many natives who had embraced Christianity, whilst others who had not done so still looked up to their rulers as men they could trust, and so stood firm by them.

In the garrison to which I belonged, there was a remarkably good officer, belonging to a most distinguished branch of the service. When I say "good," I mean good in all military details —nothing more, for as regards his religious belief, it was "nil." To him death meant oblivion, or something like it, or, at best, the future was unknowable, so it was of no use to think about it.

One day I returned to my house and found my friend seated on a sofa waiting for me. He had a Testament in his hand; his face was quite calm, cheerful, and displaying no sign of excitement. He said to me, "Have you heard people in the station say I have gone mad?" I replied, "No; but I have heard remarks on your refusing to play cards, and on your having spoken on religious subjects with several of our friends, which, as you never did it before, but on the contrary always averred your unbelief in such matters, naturally astonishes them." He said, "Well, now, I have come over to your house to tell you what has happened to me. You occupy a position here which carries weight with people, and so I want you to hear all about it from me personally."

Then he went on to say that, a short time ago, he went on a shooting excursion, alone, except so far as he had native servants with him; that having encamped a short distance away, and gone to sleep for the night, he was awakened by the sound of a man singing. Thinking it must be dawn, and so time to be shooting, he got off his bedstead and opened the door of his tent; then he looked out and perceived a native approaching, and singing as he walked. He listened to what the man was saying; it was a native translation of a Psalm, the words being, "Whom have I in heaven but Thee, and there are none upon earth I desire beside Thee." He waited in the tent door until the native came close to him and made his "salaam." Then he said to him, "Do you know what you are singing?" The man replied, "Yes," and explained that he was a Christian. Further questioned, he said, "The missionary sahibs had talked to him for some time, and that he felt sure what they told him was true. That he had repeated their sayings to his fellow-villagers; but that they would not listen to him, and had turned him out, that he was a carpenter by trade, and was going to seek for work, and so support himself." Questioned as to whether his family also had joined in expelling him, he said, "Yes, all." Asked if he believed he should succeed in getting work, he replied "Yes;" he believed what the missionary sahibs had told him, "that his bread and water would be secure."

My friend, wishing the man success, went back to his bedstead, stricken with the thought, "Well, there must be something in this Christian religion, after all, when a man like that will do what he is doing."

In my friend's own words: "I stayed on my bed some hours. I felt I could not shoot. I could think about nothing but this native and his 'talk;' so at length gave the order, 'Strike tents and return to cantonment.'

"It seems inconceivable to me how persistently this incident kept possession of me. In almost a few hours, certainly in two or three days, I had resolved that my soldiering was over; that I must go about, first among my friends, telling them what had happened to me; and how I, who had been foremost in rejecting the Christian dogmas, now felt they must be true; how I, who had lived for self, now felt I must be 'up and doing,' proclaiming the good tidings to everybody of my acquaintance, and urging everyone to take advantage of the offer made them. I had awakened from sleep and was now only anxious to make up for lost time.

"I have done what I could, and this is why there has been talk about me, most people thinking I have gone mad."

He stayed some two hours with me. I was staggered, but not convinced, saying to him that I thought we were a particularly nice quiet little society, living a very harmless life, and so on.

"Well," said my friend, "have you ever read the third chapter of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans?" I said, "I dare say I have, often." "Well," said he, "let's read it together." We did so. "Now," he said, "if that is inspired, and I suppose you believe it is, I don't think you will say we are so very harmless after all." I argued with him verse by verse, made a strong fight for the language used not applying to us. Altogether he did not make much impression on me, and perhaps I got a little out of temper. "Well," said my friend, "I think I've done enough for to-day, but I am very anxious to bring you over."

When he had gone I walked over to the clergyman's house, and told him what had occurred. He was an amiable gentleman, who took things easily—in fact, to have done otherwise would possibly not have been within the instructions he got from his ecclesiastical superiors, for at the time of which I speak anything like attempting to convert natives was not encouraged by the Government of India. So my reverend friend talked quietly to me, and sent me away with his own impressions of the matter, which were that this sort of thing would never last, that it was too sudden, and that our brother officer would presently be seen in his usual haunts in an ordinary frame of mind.

The result was far different. Daily reports reached us that a large number of people had been visited, the story, as told to me, told to them, and that some were taking great interest in the matter, which now almost seemed to have attracted their attention for the first time—strange as it may seem.

A little later I had visits from the clergyman and one of the principal officers of the station, who told me that a most extraordinary thing was going on; that not only had at least a dozen members of our community established a meeting almost nightly to read the Scriptures, but that the missionaries who were working in the district had been communicated with, and were taking it in turns to come in and join with them; that more than this, a house had been taken, and the soldiers and civilians all invited to come that evening, and that they were taking advantage of the invitation to an extraordinary extent. My visitors wound up by saying, "They have actually been praying for our conversion!" In fact it was evident that what is generally known as a "revival" was taking place.

I now went away for about two months, and when I returned I found that my friend had never swerved, and was now more than ever in earnest, giving up all his time to the work of persuading people to take advantage of the offer made them, and that he had had great success. The evening meetings were crowded, and it was evident from the changed tone of conversation, that many people were staggered, if not convinced, and were "set a thinking."

And now, lest any sceptic should say, Were there any practical results beyond praying and preaching? let me say, that presently a famine broke out in the land, and we were all called on to contribute to the relief of the starving natives. I am bound to say our community willingly gave their "mites;" but the subject of this paper, though a man with a family, gave the collector a blank cheque, saying, "If you are disappointed in the amount you expect when you total up the collection, fill in this for what you want."

Shortly after this, having completed the necessary formalities for leaving the service, he carried out his determination of emigrating to a colony and there preaching the Gospel. In due course we heard of his safe arrival, and in notifying it to us, he related the following episode.

On board the steamship there was a company of actors, bound for one of the theatres. With these he passed much of his time, striving to rouse their curiosity or attention. The fact of his having his family on board (whom naturally he had to leave when visiting the fore cabin) he believes caused them to listen with a certain amount of deference and attention, or perhaps wonder, that he should bother himself about them. Anyhow, he said, he had every reason to think they were somewhat impressed. But in addition to this, he mentioned that the chief mate of the steamer was a man who, besides habitually using blasphemous language, did his best to thwart the efforts our friend was making to get the actors and other passengers to listen to him. It does not appear that any altercation took place or remonstrance. Ridicule was perhaps all he suffered. However, when our friend had landed his family, he left them in the railway waiting-room, and went straight back to the ship. He had the luck to find the man he wanted "off duty," and not busy; so he sat down and told him that he had felt anxious about him, that he had left his family at the railway station, and come off to make another attempt on him, before he went forth into the wilderness to the farm he had taken. The man said, "Do you mean to tell me you have done this for me—a stranger, whom you will never see again?" Then he "broke down." Tears filled his eyes, as he said, "I was not always like this; I was once taught to believe all you have said was true. God help me! My associates have ruined me; but, God helping me, I will yet have another try. Anyhow, just now, I do believe the message you have given me, and will try to sin as little as possible—certainly I will never again ridicule any one who, like you, has endeavoured to call the attention of passengers to religion."

Years rolled away, and afterwards I heard that our friend, living "up-country," where the Gospel message was rarely heard, had been doing a great work, and though giving much of his time to preaching, had been blessed with a fair competence. In fact the words used to him by the native carpenter at the beginning of this story, "His bread and his water should be sure," had been carried out, and the promise had been kept: "My word . . . shall not return unto Me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please."

E. J. F.

"I AM BUT A LITTLE CHILD."

"And now, O Lord my God, Thou hast made Thy servant king instead of David my father: and I am but a little child: I know not how to go out or come in."—1 Kings iii. 7.

SOLOMON, as you know, was perhaps the richest, wisest and greatest king that ever lived; but he was never so rich, wise or great as when he spoke to God, and said, "I am but a little child." He had just succeeded his father David on the throne of Israel, and he was deeply impressed with the solemn responsibility of his position. The chapter from which our little text is taken shows that he was rich in right thoughts and feelings; that he was wise enough to see that, in spite of all his learning, he did not know enough to rule righteously over so great a people, and that he was great enough to humbly confess the fact to God and ask for His gracious help.

Now, my dear child, if the words were appropriate and significant on the lips of the great King Solomon, how much more so must they be in yours who are in every sense of the term "but a little child." Say, please, "I am but a little child, and therefore I must be humble." Self-assurance and conceit are not lovely in any one, but they make a child very unlovely indeed. I have known some children whose bright beautiful faces drew me to them, and as long as they were silent, I felt I could love them much. As soon, however, as they began to speak, I was disappointed—bitterly disappointed. They spoke just as if they knew everything, and their parents and friends knew nothing. Is not this the reason for that saying which I dislike as much as you—"Children should be seen and not heard"? No, let children be heard, but let them speak and act as those who feel they can know but little, because they have had little time wherein to learn. Always remember this—that the men and women who have known the most have invariably been the most humble, ready even to learn from a little child. When the great astronomer Laplace lay a-dying, a friend said to him, "You have made many splendid discoveries, Marquis." "What we know is a little matter," was the splendid answer. "What we do not know is immense." Knowledge always humbles; it is only ignorance that puffs up. Then, my child, seek each day to learn something new, and learn in a humble, teachable spirit.

Then say further, "I am but a little child, therefore I must be obedient." The heavenly Father who asks obedience from all His children has given, as you know, careful and solemn injunctions to children to obey their parents. The law of the country also enforces obedience upon children in many ways, and strange as it may seem to you, looks upon all young people as infants in the management of affairs until they are twenty-one years of age. What is this but that everybody feels, that until young people have had sufficient experience of the world to allow of them being their own masters, it is best for them to be guided by their parents or friends. Sometimes to obey is very easy, because it happens you like to do what you have been told, but at other times, oh, it is so hard! Your whole nature rises up in rebellion, and you find it almost impossible to give quick and cheerful obedience to the command. Then perhaps comes the whispered temptation—"It is cruel to ask me to do this just now. Why should I do it?" Let this be your answer, while inwardly you breathe a prayer to God to help you—"I am but a little child, and it is God's wish that I obey readily and joyfully, therefore I will go at once and do it."

Yet once more say, "I am but a little child, therefore I must be loving." I do not mean, of course, that people are to cease to be loving when they grow up, but the special work of a little child, it seems to me, is to love. It can do little else, for it is a bundle of wants, and demands constant care from others; but no one can love like a little child. What a beautiful sight it is to see a child put its little arms about father's or mother's neck, and laying its chubby red cheeks upon that of the parent, say, "I do love you so." No one but a parent knows the pain of heart keener than of a poisoned dagger, when a child refuses to return its parent's love. You may not, dear child, be able to do much; you may be sickly in health, and not at all clever; but if you love, with all your heart, your parents and your God, you will do exactly what God wants you to do.

"I am but a little child" must never be used, as I have heard it, as a mere excuse for ignorance. In their loving pity parents are sometimes anxious to excuse the fault of a child, by saying, "Well, what can we expect? He is but a child." Never be so childish and cowardly as to hide under this excuse. As a little child, you do not know much; but ever say to yourself I must learn something new every day, for God has given me my childhood wherein to learn.

Neither excuse a spirit of idleness, by saying, "I am but a little child." In a home there are a thousand little things which children can do to help their parents, and how beautiful it is to see the children vieing with each other as to who shall be the first to do the little service asked. Instead of this, however, sometimes a child will be found excusing himself or herself on the ground "I am but a little child, and my elder brother or sister can do it." Parents delight to be helped by the little ones as well as the big, and it is only fair they should share with the others the little home services asked by parents.

"I am but a little child" is sometimes used as the excuse for selfishness. Happy is that family where the elder brothers and sisters are always ready to deny themselves to make the younger members glad and contented, but unhappy is that home where a selfish little tyrant is always demanding everything belonging to the others. "Give me that," he whines; "I want it," and when it is not given at once, he cries, gets angry, and says, "You must give me it. I am the youngest, and I ought to have it." Such little selfish tyrants get themselves well hated instead of loved, and what a pity that is! The little child should learn the lesson of unselfishness just as much as the big one.

Shall I tell you how you may safely and beautifully use this phrase? "I am but a little child, but I belong to God." What a solemn and yet what a comforting thought it is that God has made us all in His own likeness; that He lays loving claim to us, and that He wants us all to share His heaven for ever. Sometimes, dear child, you may be made to feel how little, insignificant, and weak you are; but surely you can look up with trustful loving eyes to God and say, "Our Father—my Father who art in heaven."

If you truly love God you will find it a precious and inspiring thought, "I am but a little child, but I am God's child." "I am but a little child," you may say again, "but the Saviour died for me." Little children I know are sometimes troubled about their sins, and wonder if they may know that they are forgiven, and that Jesus loves them. You cannot possibly forget how lovingly Jesus took the little ones to His bosom when on earth, and how tenderly He spoke about them, saying, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven." Never doubt that the blessed Saviour loves you with a tender, sympathetic, and helpful love. The great question is, Do you love Jesus? Now, do you? If, Yes, then you will rejoicingly say, "I love Him because He first loved me; I am but a little child, yet the Saviour of mankind loves me."

Then, lastly, you can say, "I am but a little child, but I mean to be just as good a man (or woman) as it is possible for me to be." You have heard the story of the little boy who when asked what he was good for, answered, "Good to make a man of, sir." A capital answer it was too. The aged German Emperor one day at Ems was attracted by a young cadet—that is, a soldier officer-apprentice, and beckoning to him to come near said, "What do you mean to be, my son?" "A field-marshal, your Majesty," he at once replied. The Emperor laughed and said, "He knows how to answer." You have your thoughts and wishes about earthly things, but whatever ambition you have let this be first and chief, to be good, to be Christlike—which is the highest good. You may not be great, you may not be rich, however much you may strive, but you cannot fail to be good and useful if you only strive and pray about it. It is not so difficult a thing to be made a knight or even a lord; money or influence can sometimes get such distinctions for those who have never merited them; but to have a good influence you must be good. Never forget that you have it in your own power entirely to be noble in character, and to do good which shall outlive you; and strive after this with a greater eagerness, and a nobler persistence than men strive for the fading honours of earth, and you will succeed.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. V.

1. He was one of three brothers, all men of renown.
2. One of them was killed in war.
3. The man in question avenged his brother's death in a very treacherous manner.
4. He was a distant relation of the king whom he served.
5. Afterwards he killed one of the king's sons.
6. Next he slew another captain of whom he was jealous.
7. He joined another of the king's sons in an attempt to secure the throne.
8. Finally he was put to death by the king's successor.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. VIII.

Strike out nine of the words in this figure, and so arrange the others to form a text from Scripture.

Shall	Have	Every	Good	Lips
Speak	My	To	Not	Nor
A	Utter	Be	For	Tongue
Deceit	Lord	Mercy	My	Wickedness

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. V.—p. 352.

1. The prediction of the flood.—Gen. vi. 17.
2. That the honour of killing Sisera should not be his.—Judges iv. 9.
3. That his two sons should die in one day.—1 Sam. ii. 34.
4. That he should rule over ten tribes.—1 Kings xi. 33, and the deaths of his children, xiv. 11 and 12.
5. That the dogs should lick Ahab's blood, and that the dogs should devour Jezebel.—1 Kings xxi. 19, 23.

5*b*. 1 Kings xxii. 38; 2 Kings ix. 35.

6. The announcement of his deliverance from the hostile kings of Israel and Syria.
7. Isa. xxxvii. 33, 34; xxxix. 6, 7.
8. The first to Nebuchadnezzar, of his madness.—Dan. iv. 25. The second to Belshazzar, of his own ruin.—Dan. v. 28.
9. To Hananiah.—Jer. xxviii. 17.
10. Jer. xxxviii. 23; xliv. 30.
11. Hazael.—2 Kings viii. 12. Peter.—Mark xiv. 31.
12. Agabus foretold the occurrence of a famine.—Acts xi. 28; also Paul's captivity.—Acts xxi. 10, 11.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

SIMON MAGUS.

A STUDY IN APOSTOLIC HISTORY.

"HE OFFERED THEM MONEY."

THERE are extant two portraits of the Samaritan sorcerer. One, drawn in outline only, with a rapid but graphic pen, by the inspired historian, Luke: the other, a highly-coloured composition, embellished with a profusion of grotesque details, and bearing unmistakable evidence of having been touched and retouched by different hands at various dates extending over two or three centuries. One represents him as a baffled and crestfallen adventurer, whose features are stamped with cunning and greed of power, and who seems to have been nothing more than a local charlatan. In the other and later portrait, he is depicted as a notorious and successful impostor, a man specially endowed by Satan with superhuman magical skill almost rivalling the miraculous power divinely bestowed upon the apostles. He is the "Father of all Heresy," the first and most daring rebel against the authority of the church, the unwearied adversary of her teachers, and the perpetrator of a foul travesty of some of her holiest and most cherished doctrines. He is represented as the Antichrist—who, with amazing impiety, claimed and received divine honour, and established a religion of which he was both prophet and deity—who, puffed up by his success in Samaria, ventured to propagate his heresy in other lands, and even in Rome; and who, although he was repeatedly forced to retreat before the apostles, and, at length, brought to bay by them in the imperial city, yet maintained to the last an attitude of uncompromising defiance, and preferred suicide to submission. Such is the portrait of Simon which tradition gives us, a curious combination of the daring and pride of Milton's Satan with the subtlety and malignity of Goethe's Mephistopheles.

Even this brief and hasty description, omitting, as it does, all those absurd details which heighten the incongruity of the legends, nevertheless shows how little there is in common between the severely simple sketch of Luke, and the fantastic patchwork of the ecclesiastical writers of the second and succeeding centuries. And yet, as we scrutinise the latter, it is possible to detect, under the thick daubs and gaudy pigments of the later legendaries, a few lines here and there which lead us to suspect that the earliest sketch did actually bear some resemblance to Simon Magus; and that, if we remove the childish and clumsy colourings of the subsequent romancers, we may discern some features which may fairly be considered developments of those drawn by Luke at an earlier date.

The limits of this paper will not admit of a discussion of the credibility of the various traditions about Simon; its object is simply to present to our readers an outline of his surroundings, and of his career and influence, from his first appearance in the Acts, until he becomes obscured, exaggerated, and distorted by the thickening mists of legend and old wives' fables.

Simon lived in an age of imposture and strong delusions, when adventurers and charlatans of various kinds seem to have thriven upon the credulity of their fellows to a degree unprecedented and even unparalleled in history. He lived also in a land where an intense yearning for, and a lively expectation of, the speedy advent of a deliverer, predisposed the people to hail with eager "Lo here! Lo there!" any upstart who, like Theudas or Judas, "boasted himself to be somebody." It is true that Simon was a Samaritan, and that these convulsions of popular fanaticism were most frequent and violent in Judæa and Galilee, but Samaria lay too near the centres of disturbance to be wholly unaffected by these constant commotions. Not only that, but the Samaritans themselves cherished Messianic expectations: "I know that Messias cometh" was a part of the creed of the woman by Jacob's well, and it was a part of her people's creed also. These expectations were, however, not identical with those entertained by the Jews. The Samaritan did not look for a political emancipator and victorious king, but for a prophet, according to the Pentateuchal promise—for one who should "tell them all things," where men ought to worship, and where the sacred vessels of the ancient tabernacle had been hidden. The weary traveller, who sat once by the ancient well, could not be this Hashabh this "Restorer," as the Samaritans called their coming Prophet. He could not tell them all things as they wished to be told, and although many believed on Him in that city where He abode two days, yet the vast majority of the people still clung to their own hopes, and looked for another who would acquiesce in their cherished programme.

Nor had they long to wait. Three years or so after Christ's visit, and not many months after His death, the country was stirred by the appearance of a false prophet, who announced that, on a certain day, and from a certain place, he would lead his followers to the spot where the long lost vessels of the tabernacle had been concealed. A promise which tallied so completely with the popular views did not fail to attract a large and eager crowd. But before the procession had well begun to move, a body of Roman legionaries charged in upon it, and the impostor and his unfortunate victims were either put to flight or slaughtered in cold blood. Thus the glowing hopes of the Samaritans were quenched for a time.

But only for a time. Before long an adventurer of a different character claimed their attention. This man was Simon of Gitto, the Magus of the Acts. Being a native of a Samaritan village, he was, no doubt, conversant from his childhood with the details of local tradition. He seems to have acquired sufficient dexterity in tricks of jugglery and legerdemain to bewilder his credulous neighbours, and a sufficient smattering of current philosophy to amaze them with > "words of learned length and thundering sound."

He may be credited also with the possession of a glib tongue, unabashed coolness and self-assertion, and with shrewdness and tact enough to take advantage of the popular hopes and prejudices, as well as of any other circumstance which promised to aggrandise his power and influence.

Such a man we may conceive Simon to have been, for such are among the essentials which go to the making of a successful charlatan in that, or in any, age or country. There is no need to have recourse to the gratuitous fictions of the Clementine Books to explain how and where he acquired these accomplishments. A true master of the art of deceiving, like a poet, nascitur non fit, he is dependent for his success upon his inventiveness, originality, and readiness of resource. He goes, therefore, through the world with eyes and ears wide open, prompt to levy blackmail upon every fact or phenomenon that comes within the scope of his observation.

Simon's sagacious caution in all probability led him to avoid the assumption of the perilous rôle of demagogue; he had no ambition to compromise himself with the authorities, or to share the fate of so many of his predecessors in imposture. He therefore made no direct declaration of a prophetic mission, but contented himself with the announcement that he was "some great one"—a statement which was at once conveniently vague and guarded, and capable of being developed, by dexterous manipulation of the popular mind, into a definite and emphatic article of their creed: "This man is that Power of God which is called 'Great.'"

That word "Power" is the only clue which the New Testament furnishes to the nature of Simon's teaching: and it has been identified with a technical expression, current among the followers of Philo, and in the Gnostic schools of Alexandria. It has, therefore, been inferred, and, we think, rightly, that the Magus had already adopted some of the doctrines, or, at any rate, some of the catch-words of that popular speculation.

Thus far, Simon's career had been a successful one; he had carved out for himself a niche in the Samaritan pantheon, and received the applause and favour of a multitude of votaries far and near. But the advent of Philip makes that position at once precarious, and at length untenable. The sorcerer finds himself foiled with weapons of a higher make and superior temper to those of his own forging. The new comer performs signs and wonders beyond the reach of his magic; and proclaims, in language "understanded of the people," tidings so good, so wondrous, so glorious, that he, and his arts, and his philosophy are alike forgotten in the "great joy," which filled "that city."

The adventurer could not but be keenly conscious of his loss of influence, and of his impotence to charm back again the crowd, which had forsaken him for his rival. There was nothing for him but to descend from his pedestal and mingle with the throng. But neither his vanity nor his professional instinct would allow him to be content with an outside place in that crowd; he must find out the secret, and acquire the art by which Philip accomplished these prodigies, and the only way to attain that object was to be initiated into the inner fellowship of Philip and his converts. So "Simon himself believed also." No conscientious scruples prevented him from making the necessary profession of faith, or from submitting to the rite of baptism, since such were the conditions of closer intimacy with the Christian teacher. We may figure him to ourselves hungrily, eagerly, noting each fresh manifestation of the evangelist's power: his astonishment increasing upon closer and more constant observation, for he can detect none of those stage tricks and accessories so indispensable to himself and his fraternity; he can discover no secret spell nor charm—save one most potent invocation—"in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth." As long as he continued with Philip, it is clear that it was not the inner doctrines, but the external marvels, not the "mystery of godliness," but of "the signs and wonders which were done," which attracted his attention, and fascinated him.

When at length Peter and John arrived to bestow upon the newly-formed church the gift of the Holy Spirit, under whose auspices the brethren in Samaria were to carry on the work commenced by Philip,—Simon then beheld with still greater amazement the manifestation of that Supreme Power, in the ecstacies and gifts of tongues which followed the imposition of apostolic hands. Was not this crowning marvel the key to the long-sought mystery? Was it not by this same power that Philip had been able to outvie him? Could he but obtain this! He did not want to be a mere passive recipient of it; he disdained to submit himself to the subtle spell; what he sought was to be able to produce the same effects upon others. It is not worth while speculating whether Simon would have received the Spirit had he held his peace. He could not wait, and his impatience was divinely instrumental in unmasking him. While the work of laying on of hands is yet in progress, with rash importunacy he interposes his request—"Give me also this power, that on whomsoever I lay hands, he may receive the Holy Ghost," and "he offered them money."

The words were hardly spoken before he saw by Peter's glance of indignant scorn that for once his "vaulting ambition" had overleaped itself, and that his speech had betrayed him. Mortified at his blunder, and overwhelmed by Peter's denunciation, and terrified by the penalties threatened, the self-convicted impostor stood abashed, and clutched with the eagerness of despair even at that dubious "if perchance" of pardon which the apostle held out to him. But even then his terror sprang from no consciousness of the heinousness of his sin, from no sense of remorse, but from sheer dread of the unknown consequences—"Pray ye to the Lord for me, that none of these things which ye have spoken may come upon me."

Here the curtain falls: when it rises again the scene is changed, and Simon Magus has disappeared. Such an abrupt, not to say tantalising, dénouement is characteristic of Scripture narrative. Simon is only one of a host whose sudden exits leave us wondering what became of them. Most of them pass away into that dim realm of tradition, where the ecclesiastical Rhadamanthus sits in judgment, executing poetical justice upon them, when all good men become bishops, and the bad are branded as thralls of Satan for evermore. Had the earliest appearances of Simon in tradition been as fantastic and sensational as his later ones, or as vague and unreal as the legendary accounts of so many other Bible characters, we should not venture to follow him further; but they are not, and we have reason to accept as fairly credible and substantial such glimpses of him as we obtain in the patristic writings of the second century; but after that, fables and myths gather thick around him, and reduce him into a phantom as mocking and delusive as the rest.

Such an emotion as Simon betrayed, before his disappearance from the Acts, was merely superficial, and from its very character could not long outlast its cause. It was not true penitence, but a mere transient terror, and we may accept it as a probable fact, that after it subsided and passed away, it happened to Simon, according to the true proverb—"The dog is turned to his own vomit again, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire." His habitual self-assertion and confidence would not be long in returning, and the speedy departure of the apostles and of Philip gave him an opportunity to recover his lost prestige. Although his connection with the Christian teachers had not, as he had hoped it would, put him in possession of the secret of their miraculous power, yet it had given him some insight into the doctrines of the new faith, and some acquaintance with the principal attributes of its Founder. Such knowledge could be easily modified and adapted to suit his own purposes.

That Simon reappeared in even greater glory after his temporary eclipse; that, once again, he obtained an ascendancy over his fellow-countrymen; that he succeeded in establishing among them a religious system, in which some of the most prominent and important of the Christian doctrines were metamorphosed or clumsily dovetailed in with certain tenets of his own invention, and with odds and ends borrowed from other sources; that, for a century, this hybrid heresy struggled hard with Christianity for the mastery in the district of Samaria;—are probabilities which may be accepted both on à priori grounds, and on the evidence of the earliest, best authenticated, and most credible traditions.

It has been already noticed that Simon's earlier teaching may have been influenced by Alexandrian Gnosticism, so that we are not unprepared for the presence of Gnostic ideas and technicalities in that heresy which the Fathers ascribe to the Magus. It was at one time the prevailing opinion, based upon the almost unanimous testimony of the patristic writers, that in Simon we have the founder of that very heresy which Paul and John combatted in their Epistles to the Churches of Proconsular Asia. But such a view appears to us to be destitute of historical foundation, and contrary to all probability.

We have only space enough to express our dissent from, and not to discuss, such a conjecture. As to the character of this strange system, it is difficult, if not impossible, to give our readers any clear or coherent conception of it, for the summaries of it given in the writings of the various Greek and Latin Fathers are extremely vague and confusing. It appears, however, that Simon taught: That there had been several emanations from the Supreme God, but that he was the highest and most perfect of all, being, in fact, the Father Himself manifested in the form of a man, though, in reality, still immortal and immaterial. He had come into the world for the purpose of seeking his lost sheep—his "first conception"—a woman named Helena. This person appears to have been his paramour, but, lest such a connection should appear too glaringly inconsistent with his assumption of a visionary and incorporeal existence, it was veiled over with this daring fiction. Helena was associated with himself in the worship of his followers, for they were taught to regard her as his "first conception," by whom he had, at first, created the angels; but they had, nevertheless, rebelled against him, had created the world in defiance of him, and had deluded mankind by means of the Jewish law and prophets; their most heinous offence, however, being that of abducting their mother, and translating her soul from one body to another through the ages, so that it was she who, in the person of Helena, had been the cause of the Trojan war; since then her fate had been sad, she had been degraded lower and lower, until he had come to seek her, and had found her in the streets of Tyre. But now, that she had been restored to him, he intended, by her instrumentality, to deliver mankind from the bondage of the angels.

Such in brief was Simon's system according to the Fathers. Its basis was clearly Gnostic; but many of its ideas are traceable to Christianity, while here and there it is possible to detect an admixture of heathen mythology. In other respects it aspired to the favour of mankind by laying no restrictions in the way of moral obligations. It demanded no self-denial, no separation from the world or from idolatrous customs, no rigid obedience to principles, which might involve scorn and persecution. It made a direct bid for Samaritan favour, for its founder was a native of the district, and it declared itself against the arrogant claims of a hated rival race which boasted itself the sole repository of the law and oracles of God. And we have reason to believe that this bid was effectual in obtaining the suffrages of Simon's fellow-countrymen, and that for a hundred years or more, this heresy was the most formidable local obstacle in the way of the Gospel. Three quarters of a century after Simon's time a Christian writer, a native of Shechem, the Apologist and Martyr, Justin—bears witness that, although he himself had "despised that wicked and deceitful doctrine," yet nearly all his compatriots believed in Simon, and worshipped him as a God.

But the false religion was only of palmchrist growth, and the elements of decay were in it from the first. It had no depth of soil, rooted only in the shallow self-indulgence of its adherents; it had no vigorous principles thrusting themselves deep down into the national life and individual heart; it offered no attraction to earnest seekers after God and truth, for it fell short even of the standard of the heathen philosophies, lacking, as it did, the stimulus of any lofty ideal. But, while it lasted, it caused no little dismay and indignation to earnest Christians, for it appears from Justin's emphatic protests, that the heathen around, in malice or ignorance, classed the followers of Christ and of Simon together, and thus the former came to be evil spoken of by reason of the false doctrines and wicked practices of the latter. In Origen's day, however, that is, in the earlier half of the third century, we learn that it would be difficult to find as many as thirty professed followers of Simon even in Palestine, while elsewhere his very name would have been unknown but for the writings of Christians. A hundred years before this, another author, Hegesippus, refers to Simon as the founder of one of the seven sects among the Jews, that is, in Palestine. But, in the interval between those independent witnesses, Justin Martyr had given prominence to his notorious compatriot, and he was followed and copied by other fathers, who made no allowance for Justin's perspective. Hence, we believe, arose those exaggerated opinions of the character and influence of the Magus which held their place until recent criticism demanded a re-examination of the case. And this re-examination, we are convinced, disentitles the Samaritan sorcerer not only to any claim to actual participation in the romantic adventures of the later legends, but even to the rank of Heresiarch, outside the narrow limits of the district in which Philip found him at work. At the same time, though we repudiate as distorted and mistaken many of the assertions of tradition in this matter, and many of the hypotheses based upon them, we believe that the earliest traditions, carefully sifted, do afford us a credible and probable clue to the sequel of the sorcerer's career, and that a study of them reveals some of the unconsidered difficulties with which the Apostles of the Christian Faith had to cope.

J. M. G. OWEN.

MARGARETA COLBERG.

A TALE OF THE REFORMATION.

CHAPTER VII.—MARGARETA'S SPINNING.

THE next day was the first of November, a great festival and holiday, when all Catholic houses of work were sure to be closed, and even Protestants felt it politic to keep themselves as much as possible in the background by conforming to the general custom. They had frequently experienced the savagery of mobs returning from religious services, inspired by a holy zeal for their church which prompted them to sack the houses of the heretics. Knowing that Simon's warehouse entrance would be closed to all comers, Bertrand made his way to a small postern door and there gained admittance. He was eager to lay before his friends all the reasons he had for their leaving Valenciennes without delay.

"Are they at home, Rosa?" asked the young man of the old servant, with whom it may be said he was a prime favourite.

"Aye, surely, always at home to true friends," answered she, preparing to conduct him through a labyrinth of passages which led from the basement to the front of the house.

The answer was somewhat vague, so that Bertrand was scarcely prepared to find Margareta by herself when he entered the sitting-room. There she was, however, quite alone. A large wood fire blazed in the ample fire-place, casting a gleaming light over the different objects in the room. She had been spinning, and her wheel with its load of snowy wool stood beside her, the slender thread still in her left hand; but the wheel was silent, Margareta had been day-dreaming. She was dressed in a dark green velvet gown, and about her waist was a silver cord, having a large housewife's pocket attached to it. She started up and looked somewhat confused at Bertrand's unexpected entrance.

"My father and mother, whom you have come to see, are both away," she said, as she gave him her hand in greeting.

Bertrand apparently did not find that the absence of Margareta's parents made his visit altogether bootless. He respectfully kissed her hand and said, "I have come to tell you that I left your reverend friend safe last night."

Margareta turned a bright glance towards him; the image of the minister thus brought to her mind set all her thoughts into a new channel. She was no longer self-conscious and embarrassed, as she was when her thoughts dwelt upon herself or Bertrand.

"And do you think," she asked, "that he is safer where he is than we could have made him?"

"Yes," answered Bertrand very decidedly, for he did not wish her again to entertain the idea that the minister might with safety to himself remain under her father's roof. "You are known to be ——" he hesitated.

"Heretics," said Margareta smiling; "it is not a term of reproach to us, but it is rather one of glorious significance.

"I hate the word," said Bertrand vehemently, "heretics are wicked people, and you—why, you are so good, so pure, you are fit to be a saint. I wish you would teach me to be good."

Margareta who had been gazing at the fire while Bertrand was speaking, now turned quickly towards him as he uttered these last words. She clasped her hands together with an eager gesture and said—"Oh, if you would, if you could but come to the Truth! It would be such a joy to me—to all who know you," she added, hastily correcting herself; but the young man had caught the pronoun, and was storing it up in his memory along with what she had said to the minister the night before.

"Will you not talk to our minister?" the young girl continued in deep earnestness. "He is so wise, so good, he could explain all to you, while I am so ignorant."

"No," replied Bertrand looking straight at her, thinking how lovely was the flushed face with the dark grave eyes. "I think I could learn better from you, if you would teach me."

"How gladly would I talk with you, if I were only wiser and knew what to say; but I am only an ignorant girl. I can only tell you I am so happy feeling myself near to the Lord. I may pray to Him, and lay open my heart to Him, I have no need to approach Him through the priests."

"Ah, yes, that is indeed a good thing," said Bertrand, "I don't think these priests are always holy men. Friar Philip is not very like Christ, he is always preaching destruction to heretics and hatred towards them; his religion has a great deal more of wrath than love in it."

"Yes, it is so," said Margareta sadly, "many are like that, they forget that they were told to love their fellow-creatures. Oh, how they have fallen away from the truth!"

Sadness seemed to take possession of her, and she remained silent. Bertrand did not interrupt her reverie, he was quite happy in being near her; it was not necessary for words to be continually passing between them, their thoughts sometimes held inaudible but yet intelligent converse together.

"Will you not come to the preaching?" she asked at last, "the minister speaks—oh, so beautifully. You will hear no denunciation or words of hatred from him, his heart overflows with love. He is a true Christian; come at least and hear—oh, come!"

There was a pleading ring of great tenderness in Margareta's voice as she uttered these words, which came from her heart; the great desire of her soul had been that Bertrand should be led to the Truth. She prayed for him often and fervently in the secrecy of her own chamber; to the young man himself her tone and manner had an irresistible attraction, so he replied—

"Yes, I will come."

Margareta rose from her seat, and held out her hand to him saying—"Let me be the first to welcome the new-comer. You will be one of us, I know you will. When once you see the Light of Truth, you will not turn away from it. You will go on and on, ever receiving new faith, new joy at each step. You have been a soldier among men, you will be a soldier of the Lord."

The young girl's beautiful eyes shone with an almost divine light, and Bertrand felt as he did when making his vows of knighthood. He seemed to himself to be entering upon a new life and swearing allegiance to a new leader. As he held Margareta's hand in his, he thought it would be easy to follow such a leader to the ends of the earth. She too felt it to be a solemn moment. Both stood silent for some moments, then a sound of steps recalled them to everyday life.

"It is my father returning," she said, as Bertrand let go her hand, and she moved to the door to open it for her parents. These latter were not a little surprised at finding Margareta and Bertrand alone in the twilight. But her mind had been filled with thoughts far too elevating to leave any room for self-consciousness as she said quite simply and naturally:

"The sieur de Swarte came some time ago to say that he had left the minister last night safe at the house of Burgher Mallart, and we have been talking together until you should come."

Now Simon liked the young knight very much, and it had been in his mind that the latter could protect and care for his daughter, were he to be taken from her, so that the thought of Bertrand's marrying her had been a very distinct one indeed to him for some time past; nevertheless, he was scarcely satisfied that they should have twilight talks together. However, he did not show any displeasure, but greeted Bertrand with his usual cordiality, and bade him stay to the evening meal with them.

Margareta put away her spinning-wheel, which, it must be confessed, had not done much work all that afternoon, and proceeded to set forth the supper according to her usual habit. When all was ready, she said: "Father, your seat is placed," which was her way of announcing a meal, and they sat down to the table.

"We have been with the brethren to-day," said Simon, "and some among them are sore alarmed. The coming of Peter Titelmann is like the breaking of a wolf into the sheep-fold."

"Ah, you say truly," replied Bertrand, who was anxious to lead the elder man's thoughts into that channel, in order to urge upon him the necessity of leaving a country where such danger threatened. "Titelmann never comes idly; he is always the herald of some deed of blood."

Dame Alice sighed deeply, and Simon looked very grave.

"We have dread cause to know that," said the mother. "His coming has ever brought sorrow and tribulation. God deliver the house 'gainst which he raises his hand. His message of wrath was to us the last time he crossed our path."

Bertrand started, and turned slightly pale.

"What say you?" cried he. "Does the fiend then know your house in that way? Has he ever laid his bloody hand upon your family?"

"Aye," said Simon, "my beloved brother was cast into the flames by him."

"Then," said Bertrand, "what I had in my mind must be spoken at once. I came here this day with the intention of urging upon you to leave Valenciennes. It is no longer a safe abode for those of the reformed faith."

That expression, slight in itself, marked an epoch in Bertrand's mental life. Hitherto he had always spoken of them as heretics or Huguenots. Now he said "the reformed faith." It showed that he had made a great step towards the new belief when he spoke of it as the "reformed" one. The phrase necessarily involved the assumption that the old faith was in need of reform. Bertrand was himself conscious of the new form of expression and dimly felt that it resulted from a new attitude of mind.

"Now that you tell me your house is already known to Titelmann," he said continuing, "it is indeed time to take thought for your safety.

Oh, fly, ere he devastate that house a second time."

Bertrand turned his eyes towards Dame Colberg as being the one most likely to be open to the influence of fear. Simon was a man, and Margareta he already knew could be swayed only by her fear for others.

"We fled from Tournay hither," replied Simon, "and we have been left in peace ever since. Are we again to be driven forth, think ye?"

"God grant it may prove an idle fear," answered Bertrand, "but I have been very uneasy these two days. There are mutterings in the air, and the Spanish soldiers have let fall many a gibe since the Inquisitor came. I have heard myself called 'Heretics' Friend' several times of late. I am proud of the title," said the young man meeting Margareta's full sweet glance, "but it sounds ominous, I fear."

"There is no peace in the land for God's people," said Colberg, looking sadly before him.

"But there are countries where a man may worship God according to his own conscience," answered Bertrand, determined to strike while the iron was hot. "There are countries where one may live in peace, where the Inquisition does not dog one's steps. England is such a country."

"England!" exclaimed Margareta, speaking for the first time. "Oh, England is very far away. We should never again see our friends, the minister or any one, if we were to go to England."

"Yes, it is far away, I know," answered Bertrand, "but it is better to go there and not see one's friends than to be snatched away from them here by a horrible death."

"Aye, daughter, the knight speaks truth. Our brother was urged to fly to England, but he stayed and then came Titelmann."

"I have heard," said Bertrand, "that the English queen holds out all possible advantages to handicraftsmen if they will settle within her kingdom, and set up their looms."

"So men say," answered Simon, and again he relapsed into a reverie.

"There is a fine career also open for young sailors, but soldiers are in less request, the Princess loves not war," remarked Bertrand.

"Are you going to England, then?" asked Margareta, thinking, perhaps, that in such case it was less distant than it seemed at first.

"It may chance that I shall," replied Bertrand. "I would give my life to my country did she need it, but I have little love for Philip of Spain, our king. There is no work here fit for a soldier. Standing guard over peaceable men and women, and then seeing them burned and strangled for religion's sake, are scarcely deeds of valour for knights who have vowed to aid the oppressed, and succour the defenceless. I am sick of such doings. We Flemings don't pull well in harness with the Spaniards. If it were to fight them now—ah! that were different."

Bertrand's eyes gleamed dangerously as he uttered these last words. If, indeed, the time ever came to fight the Spaniards, it would go hard with any who chanced to meet that blue-eyed cavalier in a fair field. There was a deadly hatred of the foreign masters lying deep down in the heart of the ordinarily gentle Fleming, which might, under provocation, flame up into daring acts of vengeance against them, should war ever break out between the two peoples.

"I must go now," said Bertrand at length when the evening meal was over, "and I pray you bear in mind what we have been talking about. To-morrow I am leaving Valenciennes for some days. I am ordered to go to the Château de Montéval to convey home some stores. When I come back I hope you will have decided upon going to England."

Simon did not answer, but turned towards the door, Bertrand moved near to Margareta and said in a low voice as he bade her farewell: "If you go away, I shall follow, so you would see a friend in England sometimes. You call me a friend, do you not?"

The young girl did not reply with her lips, but she looked up at him for an instant with a smile and a slight blush which was no doubt found satisfactory and intelligible by her questioner. Having bidden Dame Colberg adieu, Bertrand followed after Simon whom he found standing in the centre of the hall downstairs.

"'Tis a fair store," he said to Bertrand pointing to his well-filled shelves, "and I meant to leave it all to the wench; but, if we fly, I'll e'en have to leave it behind to be seized and wasted by our enemies."

"No," returned the young man, "not so. If you wait till the storm breaks, why then, of course, you must save yourself as best you may; but if you prepare beforehand you need lose but little. Take your bales into a safe place before the Inquisitors are at the door, that when they do come they may find an empty ware-room and a cold hearth."

"Young men talk lightly of going to foreign lands. Their blood moves swifter than ours. We gladly stay by the old fireside among people who understand our tongue. Would God we were safe!" exclaimed Simon as he opened the door for his guest.

"Aye, safe in England," replied the young soldier.

Simon looked after him as he moved away at a brisk pace.

"A kindly heart," he muttered, "and a stout arm. Methought the child looked often towards him this evening. He could defend her, if the mother and I were torn away."

And then as the image of his daughter left all alone forced itself painfully upon his mind he exclaimed in a broken voice:

"My child, oh, my child! Would God thou wert safe!" Deep down in his heart there came the echo of Bertrand's words saying, "Aye, safe in England!"

DAY DREAMS.

Lettice and Kate.

"I ONLY wish I was rich and grand,"
Said merry Kate as she sat by the sea,
Mending the nets with a ready hand.
"O that a fortune was left to me!
And that there was no more work to do,
But a carriage waiting for me and you!

"You know folks say 'When the ship comes home,'
Yet our ships bring us but daily bread:
I wish they went to some desert isle
And brought us rubies and pearls instead;—
That father was made a duke or lord,
Who all we wanted could well afford!"

Then answered Lettice, so still and sweet,
"I sometimes wish I was wealthy too,
For in a world of such woe and want,
There seems so much for the rich to do.
I dream of blessings my gold should win
For those I'd rescue from need or sin."

Ah me, that was thirty years ago,
And now Kate sits on the sands no more,
But lives in a city's gloom and glow,
For days of labour have long been o'er:
Kate walks in the gloaming of middle life,
A great inventor's respected wife.

Has gold brought the bliss she dreamed it would?
Her face is furrowed with fret and care;
Her spouse is kind and her home is grand,
Yet is she often repining there!
The wealth she wished for herself alone,
Lies on her life like a churchyard stone.

But Lettice still toils for daily bread,
Goes in and out 'mid the sad and lone,
And serves them with heart and hand and head,
And makes their struggles and hopes her own.
Her dreamed-of blessings her heart has won,
For what could gold do, which Love has not done?

ISABELLA FYVIE MAYO.

A DAY AT CANTON.[1]

HONGKONG is all very well as regards scenery, but necessarily lacks variety, and one gets tired of looking at the same hills and water every day, even through the wonderfully clear atmosphere of this time of the year. I am coming to the conclusion that the heat of Hongkong has been very much exaggerated, and that so far from being extreme in summer it is one of the coolest places for its latitude. The highest temperature in my room last year was 88° and that only on a few days; this year (1887) it has not been above 86°, while at Manila and other places on the mainland to the south it is often up to 90° even in winter. The drawback to this climate, for some people, is the humidity, and of course this makes a low degree of heat less tolerable than a much higher one in a dry climate; for instance, 80° with a saturated atmosphere is more oppressive than a dry heat at 100°, and the former is often experienced here in summer. The really warm weather only lasts about five months, from the middle of May to the middle of October, and during the remainder of the twelve months the climate is quite cool, and at times cold. My thermometer at present (9 P.M.) is 83°, and writing with only a thin gauze vest and white trousers on, I am quite cool, though the absence of the punkah makes a great difference.

We started at 8 A.M. on Whit Monday for a sail to Canton in cool and cloudy weather with a strong N.E. breeze. The boats are most comfortable, they are large and airy, with a capital saloon on deck, surrounded by a verandah, and having an upper deck on top. They are only suited to river traffic, and are worked by an old-fashioned beam-engine, the beam of which oscillates on the upper deck. I was much struck with the wonderful cleanliness of the boat we went up in, one could literally have eaten off the deck. The first part of the passage was through the numerous islands that stud this part of the coast on one side of the estuary of the Canton River. The rain which set in prevented us from seeing much of the scenery of this part. About noon it cleared, and we found ourselves approaching the narrow entrance to the north mouth of the river, which is separated by a large delta from the larger or west mouth. The entrance is well fortified, judging from the number of guns mounted; and there is, moreover, a little higher up, at Whampoa, a barricade thrown across, originally intended to prevent the French from coming up, but not removed, although the circumstances which rendered such precautions necessary no longer exist. However, they have been good enough to leave a passage way for vessels, which they kindly light up at night; but the trade with Canton is too small to be much inconvenienced by the obstruction.

Whampoa, about fifteen miles below Canton, was once a thriving port, and is still the residence of a vice-consul, though it has sunk to an insignificant village.

Leaving Whampoa after only a minute's stay, we steamed up the river, now pretty narrow, between flat banks extending for miles inland to the hills in the distance. These banks are given up to the cultivation of rice or "paddy" as it is called, and the beautiful green of the young crops is very refreshing to the eye. Many of the fields are surrounded by plantain hedges which have a pretty effect. We passed one or two pagodas, one especially noticeable on account of its great height, and the shrubs or rather trees growing out of its walls and on the top. These pagodas are mostly of great age, their walls are immensely thick, and they are built in storeys, between which, however, there is no means of communication. They are not temples, but merely landmarks, and are supposed to watch over and protect the land in their immediate neighbourhood.

[1] The following communication reaches us from a correspondent some years resident in Hongkong.

The first object in Canton that met our eyes some eight or ten miles off, was the French cathedral, a handsome and lofty building with two steeples, which is right in the heart of the city, and I believe was erected on a sacred spot, much to the disgust of the Chinese. Now, however, they are said to be more reconciled to it, and even connect the two towers with the ram's horns with which the origin of the city is connected (it is called the city of rams). The cathedral towers far above everything else in the place, and is in fact the only object visible until within a short distance of the city. On near approach one gradually becomes conscious of the existence of a large town, and notices several tower-like buildings scattered about the place which one at first takes for fortifications, but which turn out to be pawnshops! These buildings are quite an institution in China, they are the depositories of a Chinaman's valuables, including his best clothes which only appear on New Year's day. They are therefore built of stone and of a great height, so as to render them fireproof.

After threading our way through scores of sampans, house-boats, cargo-boats, &c., which throng the riverside, we at last arrived at the wharf and disembarked. Canton is built entirely on one side of the river (here about a mile wide); but an island in the middle of the stream is thickly populated, and is really part of the city, though called by a different name.

Let me give you a short description of the different boats that one sees in the rivers in China. There is the junk, or cargo-boat, a huge unwieldly structure with high poop and bow, closely resembling the ancient style of warship. They are propelled by large sails rigged Chinese fashion, with ribs of bamboo across them, and manage to get through the water at a very fair rate of speed. Then there is the opposite extreme: the slipper boat, so called from its shape, which is only for river traffic, and can accommodate painfully one or two passengers; these boats are propelled from the stern by oars, and can shoot along at a tremendous rate, as they, like all Chinese boats, are flat bottomed. The house-boats, something like a floating circus-van, are, I believe, very comfortable. They are principally for passenger traffic, and in them one can travel for days in comfort without any of the inconveniences and fatigue of land journeying. Rivers and canals are at present the great means of communication with the interior of China, and will probably continue so until the advent of railways which will simply revolutionise the country. The great feature of a Chinese city on a river is the vastness of the floating population which at Canton is between 50,000 and 60,000, the population of the city being one and a half millions.

On landing we were conducted to "Shameen," an island conceded by the Chinese for European settlements. It is severed from the city by a canal, while the river runs on two sides of it. The island is well laid out with avenues of trees and public gardens, and the houses are substantial, and of course thoroughly European, as no Chinese live there. The contrast between this quiet spot, with its bund facing the river, its tennis-courts, &c., and the vast Chinese city close at hand, is very striking.

In order to economise our time we paid a visit the same afternoon to the island in the middle of the river, where are the principal tea-houses, and also a large Buddhist temple and monastery. The process of preparing the tea for export could be seen from the newly-imported leaf to the roasted article packed in the next chest for export. The scenting of what is known as scented tea is done by mixing the leaves with the petals of a white flower of delicious odour which is brought down from the country in large quantities for the purpose. The fragrance of the tea-houses was a pleasant change after the various odours in the stuffy streets. The temple had little of note about it besides its extent and general cleanliness (which seems to be the exception in Chinese temples). The figures of the different presiding genii which graced the entrance, as well as the three Buddhas at the shrine, are of colossal proportions. The priests or monks, of whom there are a large number, are a middle-sized, lean-looking set of men with heads perfectly shaven, and dressed in dingy tunics, except when at worship, when they don a yellow shawl. There was a service while we were there; only the priests were present, arranged in two bodies facing each other on either side of the shrine. The worship consisted of a kind of litany monotoned by the whole body, closed by a procession three times round the chapel. The gardens belonging to the temple are very large and are devoted chiefly to kitchen produce. We saw some lovely lotus flowers in a pond in the grounds, the flowers about twice the size of one's fist, and of a delicate pink colour and delicious smell. Two other features of the place were the crematorium at one extremity of the enclosure which was simply an outhouse without a roof; and the sacred swine: these animals are well kept, and are allowed to die of old age!

That evening at Shameen was simply perfect; it was full moon and delightfully cool and clear, and the place looked lovely. I may mention that I saw fireflies for the first time on that evening; one was caught in a handkerchief and gave out quite a strong phosphorescent light from the tail. Next day was gloriously fine and cool, and we started about 9.30 to explore the city, which we managed to do pretty well. The streets or rather alleys, for they are nothing more, are all extremely narrow, about the width of a London pavement, while most of them have planks and lattice work thrown across from one roof to another to keep the sun out, so that they are pretty cool. There is no wheeled traffic in the place, everything and everybody being carried on men's shoulders, and in this respect Canton is a great contrast to Hongkong. After walking about four miles through interminable alleys and having a look at some of the silk factories, where the beautiful work they turn out is all made by rude hand looms, we came to the English Concession in the heart of the city, where the Consul has his official residence. This place is completely cut off from the surrounding population by a high wall, and is a perfect oasis in the midst of a desert of houses. It contains some fine trees, and the ruins of an ancient palace, and has a beautiful little deer park attached to it, in the middle of which is a mound with a summer-house, which gives one the idea of the most perfect seclusion from the outer world. Everything is so quiet in this charming spot that it is impossible to realise the propinquity of a large population.

After a look at a pagoda close by, which is of great age, and has a beautiful outline, we repaired to a Chinese eating-house and indulged in a native tiffin, chopsticks and all. The "chow" was very good after one had got over first prejudices, and the tea which accompanied it was delicious, though of so pale a colour, that I am afraid most people at home would condemn it at once as "wash." The chopsticks required instruction, but after a little practice we managed to convey to our mouths quite sufficient to satisfy the inner man. The "chow" consisted of dumplings containing mince-meat, roast chicken in pieces, rice, and small squares of jelly. The absence of bread is a want to which I suppose one would soon get reconciled. After the meal they brought us each a bowl of warm water and a napkin for ablutionary purposes, also pipes for those who wished for them. The Chinese pipes have a chamber in the bowl which is filled with water, through which the smoke passes up the stem, thus preventing the juice from passing as well; of course one has to be careful not to draw too vigorously, otherwise the consequences might be serious.

After tiffin we paid a visit to the city temple which is in the most crowded part, and the approaches to which are thronged by fortune-tellers, and people of all classes. In a room close by a Buddhist scholar was preaching Confucius to a large and attentive audience. Near the entrance to the temple are a series of little rooms depicting by life-size figures the "Inferno" of the Buddhist religion, and exhibiting the torments of the lost in painfully realistic "wax-works" or rather "tableaux." Before the shrine with its three figures were several women engaged in prayer. These people have a curious way of ascertaining whether their petitions have been answered or not: they take two semi-circular pieces of bamboo, and throw them up three times; if they fall both in the same way it is a favourable sign, but if not, more joss papers and incense sticks must be burnt until the desired sign is obtained, when the petitioner goes away happy. There is always a vessel containing sandal-wood burning before the altar, and quantities of incense sticks ready for the worshippers to burn.

We next visited the Emperor's temple which is only opened for worship once a year on his birthday, and which presents at all other times a most untidy appearance. We managed to get a glimpse through a hoarding of the Emperor's tablet which is suspended over the altar, and to which homage is paid every year by all the grandness of Canton; it is a piece of blackwood, about 6 or 8 feet long and 2 feet wide, covered with gold characters. We had, unfortunately, no time to see the Examination Hall, and other sights of the place which would have required another day; so these were reserved for our next visit.

We left the city that evening by the river boat, and arrived at Hongkong about eight the next morning. The steam down the river in the moonlight and the beauties of the sunrise next morning formed a delightful termination of a most enjoyable visit.

T.

NOT OUT.

"LOTS of new boys this term!" exclaimed Robert Ainsworth, in rather a loud whisper to the possessor of the desk next to his own, on the first day of his return to college after the Easter vacation, looking round the large class-room as he spoke, and curiously eyeing the new-comers.

"Lots," repeated his companion, raising his head for a moment from the paper before him.

Seated near the head-master's table, and awaiting their turn to be told off to the different classes, the arrivals in question did not appear to be much at their ease, and were evidently examining their future associates with some interest.

A little later on, when the boys were up for their mathematical lesson, utterly regardless of the problem that was being chalked upon the blackboard by the master, Robert continued to stare idly about him, until amongst the four new boys that had just been drafted into his class, one in particular attracted his notice.

Charlie Durnford was a lad of some sixteen years, Robert's own age. He had a kindly, honest face, and strong, muscular frame. Unlike Robert, however, his whole attention was fixed upon the work he had to do; his large, intelligent eyes followed eagerly every word traced before them, and he appeared to be entirely unconscious of the presence of any one near him.

To Robert such unremitting zeal was a novel study, and he set his brain to wonder how it could possibly be, that a boy should, on the very first day of his entrance, work away as if he had a slave-driver behind him. Day after day passed, however, and whatever class they happened to be in, there was Charlie still industrious as ever, and always eagerly intent upon what he was doing.

The new scholar, contrary to the habit of most of the others, joined but little in the games, generally returning to the boarding-house in which he lived as soon as school broke up, and reappearing only when work had to begin again. As time went on, his continued industry appeared to have an irritating effect upon Robert.

"He is a regular swat, and can't so much as handle a bat!" he exclaimed to a chum, as Charlie with a good-natured nod passed into the school before the two.

"That he is!"

"Can't we take a rise out of him?" suggested Robert.

The other laughed. "It would be a capital joke," he said.

An opportunity was soon afforded for the carrying out of their amiable intentions.

Two or three weeks later a cricket match was to come off between the boys in the boarding-house in which lived Robert Ainsworth, and those in the one inhabited by Charlie.

It was a half-holiday; the boys turned out in excellent spirits. Robert was captain of his eleven; his side won the toss, went in, and the contest was soon a lively one. To the surprise of many, more especially of Robert, there stood Charlie Durnford watching the game with evident interest. It had not proceeded very long before one of the boys fielding was struck by a ball and obliged to leave the ground. A bright thought suggested itself to Robert.

"Here, swat!" he shouted, addressing himself to Charlie, "here's room for you. Come and field in Harry's place; the captain will let you if you ask him." There was a contemptuous smile on his face as he said the words.

Charlie hesitated.

"Come along, don't be afraid!" continued his tormentor.

Just then the captain was in consultation with two or three of his side, as to whom to select in the place of the absentee. Charlie went up to him and offered his services.

"Can you play?" he asked in surprise.

"I can," was the unhesitating reply.

"Well, we'll try you;" and in another moment, after pulling off his coat, Charlie strode forward and took the absent lad's place.

To the no small astonishment of Robert, who was one of the best cricketers at the college, and who had a keen eye for every defect in his comrades' play, Charlie's fielding was of no mean order from the first. As the game proceeded, it could be termed nothing less than brilliant, and more than one hearty "Well fielded" and "Well caught" burst from the players and lookers-on.

When the eleven were out, Robert, who was always accustomed to be number one, feeling for the first time perhaps a little curious, called out once more—

"You fluked it this time! Why not let him have his innings?" he went on sarcastically.

No notice was at first taken of this suggestion; but three wickets having fallen rapidly for very few runs, the captain came up to Charlie.

"Can you bat?" he asked rather anxiously.

"I have batted before now," was the reply.

"Here, take my bat then," said the other, handing it to him.

Charlie took it from him, walked quietly up to the wicket, and placed himself in front of it.

Much curiosity was manifested as to the capabilitities of the new batsman; but soon curiosity was turned to admiration, when, after a steady little play, Charlie began to get his eye in, and to hit freely about him. The score rapidly rose to the no small delight of his own side, whilst cheer after cheer re-echoed through the playground.

Soon, however, Charlie's partner was cleverly caught. The remaining six batsmen were disposed of in due course, after more or less success, and Charlie triumphantly carried his bat out for a heavy score.

From that moment Charlie Durnford rose high in the estimation of Robert Ainsworth, though why so good a cricketer should be such a "swat" was a greater puzzle to the latter than ever. Feeling a little ashamed of his previous utterances about him, Robert resolved to solve the riddle if possible, and one day questioned him as to his refusal to join in future matches.

"I have no time to play," was Charlie's reply.

"No time!" echoed Robert. "I can make as much as I like."

He then learnt from Charlie that his father, a clergyman, had died only a year or two previously; that he had a widowed mother, and five sisters all younger than himself, and that his object in life was to become their support. He was studying for the Indian Civil Service, and most anxious to pass for it as quickly as possible. He did not tell him, however, that he was an ardent lover of cricket, and that he had to exercise constant self-control in the execution of what he considered a most sacred duty.

Charlie adhered firmly to his principles of self-denial. He took part in no more matches, and at the end of two years went up from college to his examination, and passed first on the list.

With Robert matters were different. He, too, was destined for the Civil Service for India, and his parents were anxiously looking forward to his passing a successful examination. Six months after Charlie had left college, it was his turn to go up; but, alas, although not wanting in ability, he was hopelessly plucked.

What was to be done? There was nothing for it but to send him at once to a clergyman in the country to be coached for some months' time. The Rev. William Clevelands was found to undertake this task, and Robert was soon on his way to Wanston Vicarage.

Although quite prepared to dislike the vicar to whose care he had been confided, Robert's animosity was soon disarmed by the kindness of the reception given to him. As he looked from the dining-room window, across the broad sweep of lawn, into the hill-girt meadows beyond, a murmur of admiration escaped him.

"Not half a bad place this, after all," he thought. "I daresay a fellow could be happy enough here."

"I will call my nephew," said the clergyman, after about a quarter of an hour's interview. "He only arrived on a visit to us about an hour ago. You must make friends." So saying, he left the room.

Robert was in no particular humour for making another new acquaintance just then; but on the return of Mr. Clevelands, he was in duty bound to come forward and greet his nephew.

What was the surprise of the former to find that the lads were no strangers to each other; his sister's son being no other than Charlie Durnford.

At the expiration of his time, Charlie who had obtained a good appointment left to complete his preliminary studies; but previous to his doing so, during his stay at Wanston, he steadily helped his friend both by example and personal aid.

Nor was cricket forgotten by the kind vicar as a wholesome recreation; yet Robert learnt to feel somehow, without a word being said on the subject, that no game ought to be a lad's first consideration when at college, and that self-denial is a great and noble virtue, a tribute of gratitude acceptable in our Heavenly Father's eyes.

After Charlie left he continuously strove to exercise the same self-control as he had done during the time of his companionship with him. In due course he passed his examination, and afterwards went out to India.

The two men are now stationed near each other. Robert, like Charlie Durnford, has become a judge, and he is never tired of telling his friends that he owes his success in life to the example and kindness of the college chum whom he once designated by the non-euphonious appellation of "swat."

MRS. HENRY CREWE.

Things New and Old.

THE FIGURATIVE LANGUAGE OF THE SOUTH SEAS.—Upon the accession of a new chief on the island of Mangaia it was customary for "the wise men" to charge him to rule well in the following terms:—

Auā ei vuu te rango="Let not the flies (=the serf population) be swept away."

Auā ei ngaae te rauika="Let not a banana leaf be split," i.e., Let not the State (symbolised by a newly-opened banana leaf[1]) be rent by a breath of discord.

Should the paramount chief hear of any trouble, he would visit in state that district and, after the usual feasting, address the under-chiefs in the following terms: "Prop up my rule, not with rotten sticks, but with ironwood. Let this palm grow tall, and not soon be felled. Therefore have I come, with your help, to make peace," &c. At the commencement of each reign the paramount chief planted cocoa-nuts as a visible token of his authority. The hope was that these young palms would be permitted to grow on and bear fruit for many a long year. By the phrase, "Let this palm grow tall," he means, "Let my rule over you long endure."

In a letter lying before me Ioane pathetically says: "My chief food as I live here day by day is tears, as I am compelled to watch the unchecked growth of evil." This is not, as some might imagine, a reference to Jeremiah ix. 1, but a very ancient proverbial expression, denoting intense grief. In their classic laments for the dead this phrase is of frequent occurrence.

At Rarotonga a dying man will say to his friends, "The reef is nearly dry,"[2] i.e., death is near. The idea is, the tide is running out, leaving the coral reef dry.

When a serious quarrel is being composed, a friend of both parties will exhort both the aggrieved "To bale out the canoe,"[3] i.e., "Out with all your grievances, so that peace may be made."

At Rarotonga a tenant-at-will is called an unga, i.e., a tiny tuber of the indigenous arrowroot, or of the "teve" plant[4]; the big tuber or corm being the chief or real owner of the soil.

In the olden times at Rarotonga, if a man were killed, an inquiry would be instituted by the elders of the tribe, the slayer being required to confess by whose authority the deed was done. The interrogator first demanded, By the loins (slapping that region), i.e., common people? The answer would probably be, No. The inquiry would next be, By the ribs (slapping his sides), i.e., lesser chiefs? The reply would again be, No. Lastly it would be demanded, By the head (touching his head), i.e., the supreme chief or king? If the reply came, "Yes, by the head," no further notice would be taken and no vengeance exacted.

Queen Makea once said to me, "Your word is medicine. Should any sickness (=evil) grow in any part of the island, go quickly and cure it. If I myself become sick, heal me" =if I err, set me right).

In preaching to Polynesians it is well to imitate the example of Him who "spake unto the multitudes in parables; and without a parable spake He not unto them." —W. Wyatt Gill.

[1] Of exquisite delicacy, split by the gentlest zephyr.
[2] Kua rikiriki te tai.
[3] Kua tata i te riu i te vaak.
[4] Amorphophallus campanulatus.

ONE CORN OF WHEAT makes many; one wee stone
Strikes countless dimpling rings upon the lake;
One act of love abideth not alone,
But love begetting love, for love's dear sake
Makes barren hearts a garden, where God's praise
Breathes perfume through earth's weary nights and days.

M. E. B.

"The Lord is thy Sun."

O LORD, Thou art not fickle,
As man is wont to be:
Who halts and doubts and changes,
And sometimes trusteth Thee.

But Thou art ever constant,
Like Thy sure sun on high,
That floods the earth with blessing,
Though clouds may hide the sky.

These clouds that rise and gather
Between ourselves and Thee,
Are but the shifting vapour
Of our inconstancie.

Though from us Thou art hidden,
With darkness—to our shame—
'Tis we ourselves have covered:
Thy Face is there the same.

As pours the sun for ever
Its gracious influence round,
Cleansing the dome of Heaven,
Drying the humid ground;

So, Lord, shine Thou upon us,
Put Thou our mists to rout;
Beam on our stagnant vapours,
Burn up our sloughs of doubt.

E. S.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. IV.—p. 368.

Then the king made Daniel a great man, and gave him many great gifts, and made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon.—Dan. ii. 48.

(1) Dan. ii. 48; (2) Ezekiel xiv. 14; Gen. v. 25–29; (3) Mark xiii. 14; (4) 2 Kings xxiv. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 15; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6; Ezra i. 7; Jer. xxxiv. 1; Ezekiel xxvi. 7; Dan. i. 1; (5) ii. 46; (6) iv. 32, 33; vi. 22; (7) No mention; (8) Dan. iv. 31; (9) ii. 12, 13; vi. 15, 16; (10) ii. 6; (11) Ruler and chief governor ii. 48; (12) Babylon Gen. x. 10, see margin; (13) Dan. ii. 48.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE anniversary meetings of these summer months cover so wide a field, and include so many diversities of action, that it becomes increasingly difficult to summarise their results. There is this year again abundant evidence of genuine and aggressive Christian life; the advance in this respect has been well maintained. There has been perhaps a more sober recognition of the difficulties yet to be overcome; in some directions grave anxieties have been expressed; but there has also been manifest a strong desire to adapt existing organisations to the fresh aspects of their work, as well as to try new methods and machinery where they may seem to be required. The sums contributed for missionary and Christian purposes were probably never so large—there are indications of the awakening of a rare spirit of generosity, but they are distributed over a larger number of objects, more than were the gifts of earlier years, and it is possibly due to this fact that some of the older societies find it difficult to sustain their funds at the necessary point. The speeches have, we think, as a whole, fallen a little below the level of some years; there has been less of valuable fact, rather more of rhetoric and platitude. On the other hand, many most touching facts have come to light, and the revelations of quiet, faithful service have been full of encouragement. Home questions have occupied a much larger place; and there is again a vigorous discussion of clearly defined evils, with a view to remedial measures.

THE Religious Tract Society met under the presidency of Lord Balfour of Burleigh. The report, which was read by the Rev. Dr. Green, stated that the receipts of the Society from all sources during the past year, including the balance at the commencement, were 211,108*l.*, of which 169,884*l.* were from sales, 10,065*l.* from part payments for grants, and 29,340*l.* from donations, subscriptions, and legacies for the Society's missionary work. These contributions show an increase over those of the previous year of 13,982*l.*, due entirely to legacies, which were exceptionally large. As there was a decrease of nearly 5,000*l.* in the sales, the net increase had been 9,098*l.* The total expenditure had been 208,662*l.*, including the investment of part of the legacies for future needs. Grants had been made during the year to the value of 41,708*l.* Setting against the total amount the part payment by recipients of grants, the net value of the Society's gifts during the year appears as 31,643*l.* 5*s.* 1*d.*, being an excess of grants over missionary receipts (deducting from the latter the amount invested for income) of 12,539*l.* 18*s.* 10*d.*, which has been furnished by the trade department, in addition to its bearing the whole expenses of the Society's missionary work. The number of new publications issued during the year amounted to 757, of which 214 were tracts and leaflets. The circulation has reached 61,061,050, including 24,590,600 tracts. To this number must be added that of the issues from foreign depots, estimated at 15,000,000; the total amount being thus 76,061,050, a slight diminution upon the whole as compared with the issues of the previous year, although the circulation of the tracts has shown an increase of 870,300. The work of the Society touches many lands. In India, increasing use is made of the printing press, as national education spreads, and the diffusion of infidel publications, both in English and in the vernacular languages, calls for increased activity in the teachers and defenders of the Christian faith. In the Punjab, a new "Aryan" and anti-Christian movement is being met by the delivery and publication of lectures on the contrast between the Vedic teaching and the Christian faith. In Amoy the assistance given in the preparation of a primer in raised characters for the blind has been very gratefully acknowledged, and as the Island of Formosa alone contains no fewer than 5,000 blind persons, it is evident that the aid thus provided will be of the greatest value. In Africa a Christian literature is springing up in regions which a generation ago were plunged in barbarism. From Basutoland the Society is asked to prepare a Concordance and Bible Dictionary. In Bechuanaland a grant has been made to aid in the publication of "Precept upon Precept" in the Bechuana language. Passing northwards, the missionaries at Freretown have been assisted in the publication of a new hymn-book in the Swahili language; and the first part of the "Pilgrim's Progress" is ready for printing in the same language. From Central Africa, a missionary writes that people in far-off Uganda, on the Victorian Nyanza, "are found going for hours over such printed matter as the Society is able to place in their hands," and he earnestly pleads that in its efforts for the spread of wholesome literature a place may be given to Uganda. Turning to the west of the Dark Continent, we have again the "Pilgrim's Progress," completed and published in the Fanti language for the natives of the Gold Coast; and, to mention but one more instance of progress, there are the beginnings of a Christian literature in the Kongo language. The "Peep of Day" is now nearly ready for the press. Much work has also been done in North and South America. The home operations of the Society have been carried on with undiminished energy. The Rev. John Piper, formerly of Japan, moved the first resolution, which was seconded by the Rev. T. Eynon Davies. The concluding address was given by Canon Fleming. A choir of children, selected from the public elementary schools of the metropolis, were on the platform, and sang a number of hymns in the course of the evening. The usual Missionary Breakfast brought together a larger number than ever before. Sir John Kennaway presided, and the meeting was addressed by representatives from various countries.

THE Bible Society held its annual meeting, at Exeter Hall, under the presidency of Lord Harrowby. The report stated that during the year the total number of Bibles and parts thereof issued had been 4,206,032—an increase over last year of 273,354. The gross total income of the year was 250,382*l.*, and the expenditure 224,823*l.*, but the receipt of several legacies left a surplus of 15,000*l.* Lord Harrowby said that as 100,000*l.* of the total income was but the price paid for the books sold, the net income was really only 147,000*l.* They spent their money on foreign agencies, on auxiliaries abroad, and on kindred societies. He took a hopeful survey of the progress of Bible distribution through many of the chief countries of Europe, and through Central Asia, and spoke of the indirect beneficial results to churches in various places from this sowing of the Scriptures. He paid a high tribute to the work of the colporteurs, men of humble origin but of singular zeal and discretion, who pushed on the distribution of the Holy Scriptures with every fresh advance of civilisation, especially instancing this by an account of the work connected with the Russian advance into Central Asia, where the frontier outposts of the Russian army had carried the agents of the Society with them. Indeed, Russia had been one of the most encouraging fields of the Society's labours, and the Muscovite soldier always proved a ready buyer of the Bible. No message of the year was brighter than that which came from Japan. The sales of colporteurs in that country had nearly quadrupled, and from a total circulation of 6,000 copies, the return had reached over 16,000. The first resolution was moved by the Lord Chancellor, who began by referring to the forces now arrayed against them, which must not fail to be watched. It was idle to ignore them, but they must comfort themselves with the thought that the Word of God had survived similar enmity in the past. Yet he must protest against the action of those who were bringing their own doubts into the Christian pulpit, and against the literature which was promulgating a religion that was curiously mixed with Buddhism. The Bishop of Auckland showed the beneficial change wrought in the South Pacific Islands by the distribution of the Scriptures, and the teaching of truths which some people thought out of date. These Maories were close students of the Scriptures. The Rev. Probendary Edmunds moved the second resolution, which pleaded for increased distribution of the Bible. It was important that native races on the eve of embracing Christianity should have the Scriptures placed in their own hands at the first opportunity, that they might not have an intermixture of error or superstition at the beginning. So thought the early church. Hence the Syriac version provided by the church in the Greek city of Antioch, and the Coptic version provided by the church in the Greek City of Alexandria, and the Gothic version provided by the church in the Greek city of Constantinople, for the populations round those cities that did not speak the Greek tongue. The speaker then referred to the further supply of versions, such as the Armenian, by the efforts of individual men, by great religious movements like the Reformation, and by the widening diffusion of common religious convictions. He said the first New Testament in Europe was printed in Spain by a cardinal and dedicated to the Pope; the moral of which was that at that time the church of Rome was at the parting of the ways and had not yet taken her fatal choice of restricting the use of Scripture. The parting of the ways came to societies as to churches, and it had, perhaps, now come to the Bible Society, if they perfected their denominational machinery so much as to be unable to work in common. The resolution was seconded by the Rev. T. Eynon Davies.

THE meetings of the Church Missionary Society were overshadowed by the news of a great calamity. There were the usual preliminary gatherings. At the morning meeting in Exeter Hall, the President, Sir J. H. Kennaway, took the chair. The report stated that the total ordinary income amounted to only 194,557*l*, the lowest in the past five years, owing to a falling off of nearly 14,000*l*. in legacies. But the receipts, apart from legacies, came to 173,765*l*. the highest in the past five years. In addition to the ordinary income there had been important gifts for special purposes, and the total receipts from all sources amounted to 221,331*l*; but the expenditure had exceeded the income by 12,000*l*. Forty-three candidates for the mission-field had been received, of whom twelve were ladies, and seventeen University men, eight being from Cambridge and two from Oxford. Cambridge had furnished no less than twenty missionary candidates in two years After giving in detail instances of successful work in various parts of the world, the report referred to the fact that the Gospel of St. Matthew had been translated for the first time into the language of Uganda and into that of the Ainu Aborigines of Yezo. The special winter mission to India had, it was believed, inaugurated a new epoch in evangelistic work in India, preaching by interpretation having proved an unexpected success. Eighteen had been added to the roll of native clergy in India, Ceylon, China, New Zealand, and Africa. In India perils beset the church, as at home, from the spread of sacerdotalism. The adoption of the report was moved by the Bishop of Rochester. The Rev. Dr. Butler, the Master of Trinity, and late Head Master of Harrow, who came next, uttered a warning word as to the danger of discords. "There is nothing which young men more cordially detest than religious quarrelling. It seems to them to be the very meanest and poorest part of the Christian life." Sir Rivers Thompson, K.C.S.I., gave interesting details respecting India. Hundreds of men of high social position and education had made great sacrifices, and accepted with all their hearts the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and had become faithful servants and workers in the missionary cause. There were also to be counted by hundreds of thousands those of whom no record existed—as of old, in the case of Joseph of Arimathea,—who were secret disciples of Jesus, but did not confess Him for fear of the people. The Rev. Dr. Bruce, from Persia, said it had been his privilege to labour for thirty years in mission work—the first ten in the Punjab, the last twenty in Mohammedan lands. When he was in the Punjab it was thought a great success if one or two converts were baptised. The other day he got a letter stating that 2,000 converts had been baptised in the last two years. Although the work in the Punjab was so new, he believed God had raised up a witness there, for the work so long carried on by natives. Referring to the controversy on Mohammedanism, Dr. Bruce said those made a great mistake who spoke of the Mohammedans as if they were exceptionally bad people. They were just as bad as Englishmen, and no worse, and they needed the Gospel for the very same reason that we did. Mohammedanism had, he thought, an elevating effect on individuals, but not on nations. In Persia, Mohammedanism had for centuries only gained converts by oppression. The Bishop of Waiapu from New Zealand, and Sir T. Fowell Buxton, Bart., also spoke. It was at the evening meeting that the news to which we have referred, came with painful force upon the audience. From the chairman's opening words it became evident that something was amiss. Amidst breathless silence Mr. Wigram, the hon. secretary, rose, and announced that a telegram had been received; that afternoon from Zanzibar. It was as follows: "Blackburn dead; ill ten days. Bishop Parker dead; same sickness; ill one day." Bishop Parker, our readers will remember, was the successor of Bishop Hannington. A little later in the evening another telegram was received, it came from the Consul-General at Zanzibar —"Mwanga, King of Uganda, is incensed and terrified by reports which have reached him of German and English proceedings on the coast, and this renders the position of the Rev. Cyril Gordon, who is in Uganda, pre-eminently perilous." This news made a profound sensation. Prayer was offered with much solemnity. The meeting was afterwards addressed by Rev. R. Lang, Bishop Crowther, Rev. J. Bambridge, of Scinde; Dr. Elliott, of Gaza; Mr. J. Roscoe, of Mamboia; and Rev. R. Baring-Gould, who has returned from the Special Winter Mission to India.

THE series of meetings held by The Baptist Missionary Society offered many points of interest. The members' meeting which came first, was held in Holborn Town Hall. Mr. Charles Townsend, of Bristol, took the chair. Mr. Baynes stated that although the balance-sheet exhibited a debt of 5,859*l*, the ordinary receipts for the past year showed an increase of 2,938*l*, the total income being 61,341*l*. The debt arises from success which brings a growing expenditure. An offer of 15,000*l*. had been made by Mr. Arthington, of Leeds, to the Society, in conjunction with two other missionary societies, for the purpose of carrying the Gospel to the tribes on the banks of the Amazon and its tributaries, but its acceptance would have involved heavy and permanent additional expenditure, and it had, therefore, been reluctantly declined. Freemason's Hall was crowded on Tuesday evening when the Missionary Soirée was held, under the presidency of Mr. Edward Rawlings. The Rev. George Cameron, from the Congo, described the work on that river. Amongst other speakers was the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes, who referring to the Moravian settlement of Herrnhut, said that of the 70,000 people it included, such was the missionary spirit, that 2000 went out to preach the gospel of God, and he asked, if so, "how many ought to go forth from this little island?"

At the Baptist Zenana Mission Breakfast Mr. J. H. Tritton took the chair. Dr. Underhill stated that the income had amounted to 6,586*l*. Mrs. Colonel Urmston said the ladies engaged in mission work were the friends, and counsellors, and spiritual guides of the oppressed women of India. "A native princess told a friend that her poor mother was growing old, and was much vexed by the thought of what would be in the future. She did not wish to be a frog, or a caterpillar, or a cat, or a mouse. Oh, that she might attain to the best thing any one could be—a cow. Her religion held out nothing more for her than that; that was her greatest hope." The Rev. G. S. Summers, of Serampore, taking a general survey, said that an attentive investigation would show that the severities and hardships of the Zenana system were concurrent with the spread of Mohammedism in India. He mentioned a remarkable case of one woman in Nepaul, who had gone forth on a religious pilgrimage, and after wandering hundreds of miles, had heard of Christ, and instead of returning home had continued her journey from village to village, telling of Him.

The ninety-sixth annual meeting of the Baptist Society was held in Exeter Hall, under the presidency of Rev. H. M. Matheson. The Rev. Francis James, of Shantung, North China, described the difficulties and successes of work in that region: "Such were the restrictions in the early part of this century on Christian labour that Protestant missionaries can hardly be said to have commenced their labours until 1842. In 1853 they had 351 converts; in 1863 they had 1,974; in 1873 they had 8,000; in 1881 they had 13,035; in 1884 they had 26,200; and at the present time they have over 30,000 Christians. Within twelve years they have more than trebled their numbers.

The greater proportion of converts in China are poor, some of them very poor. But their contributions for religious purposes average fourteen shillings per head taking the country through." The Rev. F. B. Meyer, of Regent's Park Chapel, alluded to the general quickening of interest as evidenced amongst other things by the fact that more than 2,000 students in the United States were willing to go forth as missionaries. After a reference to the exchequer, and the insufficient scale of contributions in some quarters, he said there was another side. "One whose income is 2,000*l.* lives on 200*l.*, and gives 1,800*l.* away. Another whose income is 8,000*l.* lives on 250*l.*, and gives the balance away. Another, a lady, spends her time as a governess, and out of the 100*l.* that she earns keeps 50*l.* and gives the other 50*l.* away. (Applause.) Another who earns 1,500*l.* a year lives on a 100*l.*, and gives 1,400*l.* away." These are figures that remind us of donations on the most liberal scale from servants and others, which have come to light in other associations. The Rev. R. H. Roberts, of Notting Hill, was the last speaker, and he argued that there was no upward movement among the heathen, and that nothing but the gospel of Christ would lift them into nobler life.

The Young People's Meeting had Mr. Alderman Belsey, J.P., as chairman, and was addressed by the Rev. Ossian Davies, the Rev. A. Tewson, of Commillah, the Rev. W. Cuff, and by Mr. Charters, the captain of the Peace.

The London Missionary Society celebrated its ninety-fourth anniversary, under the presidency of Lord Brassey, who bore "the personal testimony of an old sailor and a wide traveller to the good and noble work being done in distant lands." The total income of the Society for the year was 157,000*l.*, but of this 27,000*l.* was derived from legacies and uncertain sources. There, moreover, still remains a balance against the society of 7,960*l.*, and an earnest appeal was made for additional subscriptions to the amount of 16,000*l.* to enable it to maintain a steady progress. The Rev. R. Wardlaw Thomson moved the first resolution, based on the report, recognising the importance of seeking to develop a free, intelligent, and strong Christian life in the churches gathered from among the heathen, and appealing "to the leaders of Christian thought and life in Britain to exert their influence for the purification of commerce, and the maintenance of moral principles in the political relations of Britain with the races of the heathen world." Referring to his recent visit to Africa, he said he had come home more deeply convinced than before that the religious condition of the native population in the Cape Colony is such as to awaken very grave anxiety. Touching upon other parts of the mission-field, he stated that the work in Madagascar was advancing steadily, but that every year brought into more distinct operation the sifting process with which we are familiar in this part of the world, by which the true Christian is distinguished from those who only bear the name of Christ. In India evangelisation is being pushed forward with greater vigour than ever. In South India the workers have combined for itinerating journeys, and gone forth in a body. Mr. Albert Spicer followed with an interesting account of his recent visit to Samoa. One stray sentence of practical bearing, though a parenthesis, should be noted at home: "If you want to give a helping hand to any missionary, there is a way in which you can render them very great help, apart from the ordinary ministerial preparation, and that is to put them in the way of learning how to handle an oar, sail a boat, swim a stream, and ride a horse." Describing the Malua Institution, he stated that the native pastors in Samoa, to the number of 180, had been educated there, beside those who had gone to New Guinea and to other distant islands. "The population is about 35,000, while the adherents of the Society number between 26,000 and 27,000—a band of people who build their own chapels free of cost—who support their own pastors free of cost to the Society, and who give them salaries ranging from 3 dollars to 200 dollars per annum; and a people who have contributed for some years nearly 1,000*l.* a year in addition to the funds of this Society. As to the people themselves, they know and love their Bibles. I would guarantee to take the first twenty Samoans—men, women, and children—that I should meet with in Samoa, and I would back them in Bible knowledge against any twenty I should meet with in this country." The Rev. George Owen, of Pekin, spoke of China. "I hear," he said, "that some people in England talk of adopting Buddhism as their creed. China, after centuries of trial, will make you a present of it for nothing. She has found the light to be perfect darkness." The next resolution was moved by the Rev. R. F. Horton, M.A., who dwelt on the need of spiritual interest in the work of missions. "Christ," he remarked, "takes every element of truth in heathenism and gives it life, and He draws together all the elements of truth in heathenism and makes them one; and then over and above it all, He gives us what the world never knew—the Son of God laying down His life for the salvation of men." He spoke of the great enterprises of the past. The Crusaders had not the spirit of peace, nor the Dominicans that of liberty, nor the Jesuits that of truth, but the Spirit of the Lord was that of truth, gentleness, liberty, and peace. Mr. A. T. Swan, of the steamer Good News, plying on Lake Tanganyika, came next, with some strong words on the slave trade, protesting against the statement that slavery in Moslem hands is "a mild institution." The Rev. J. Jones, of Maré, was the last speaker, and he narrated the circumstances of his recent expulsion by the French, with which our readers are already familiar.

THE Wesleyan Missionary Society met at Exeter Hall, with Mr. Isaac Hoyle, M.P., as chairman. The report stated that the total income for the year was 131,800*l.*, and the total expenditure 137,967*l.*, showing an excess of the latter over the former to the extent of 6,100*l.* There had been an increase of 114 during the year in the number of chapels; also an increase of nine missionaries, of 175 paid agents, of 208 unpaid agents, of 1,037 full members, of 577 members on trial, and of 1,508 scholars. The Rev. J. Walton, President of the Conference, explained the falling short of income by the number of new doors that were being opened for work. The Rev. Silvestre Whitehead spoke of China, and urged that in spite of the essential atheism of the popular systems, gods and temples were everywhere, and idols in every house, while superstitions abounded. Mr. John Barnsley, who spoke next, was followed by the Rev. W. Burgess, who described his first entrance into Hyderabad, and the changes that had been wrought since—a story almost of romance, in which many fears had been scattered, and many hopes encouraged. At the Missionary Breakfast, Mr. S. Osborne repeated the argument in favour of not neglecting the small contributions. There was a debt of 10,000*l.*; if the 400,000 members of their communion would only contribute one penny a day each, the funds would receive an increase of not less than 1,500*l.* a day.

THE United Methodist Free Churches reported a total missionary income of 21,876*l.* Among the speakers at the annual meeting was Mr. Thomas Wakefield, who gave an account of the mission to the Gallas, in East Africa, which, in spite of serious disasters is expanding, and asking for reinforcements. The Rev. C. A. Berry, of Wolverhampton, said that having travelled much and in many places for the missionary cause, he was convinced that the missionary spirit was strengthening, and taking more resolute and intelligent form in the various churches. He objected to results being so often judged numerically. "I think that the statistician ought to be treated as dynamite—put under government control, and only allowed to come out by license—because the statistician by his counting and by his comparing eats the very soul out of endeavour. There is a place for him, but, as I said, it is under government control. Our measurement of the work we are doing must never be purely and simply the statistician's measurement."

THE China Inland Mission held its annual meeting in the Mildmay Park Conference Hall. Mr. Broomhall said that the one hundred missionaries who had been asked for in prayer in 1886 had all arrived in China in 1887; then the income for the year had been 33,717*l.* 11*s.* 3*d.*, an increase in answer to the prayer of 11,000*l.*, not a penny having been specially solicited; but better than all there had been a large ingathering of souls, no less than 551 being added to the Church during the year. A Home has been opened at Cambridge for accepted candidates anxious to have the benefits of a University training (not however supported by the missionary funds). The Rev. J. Hudson Taylor narrated many encouraging facts. He made a careful estimate, and he thought he was considerably under the mark when he said that 4,000 souls at least had been gathered into the fold by the agency of the China Inland Mission.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARGARETA COLBERG.

A TALE OF THE REFORMATION.

CHAPTER VIII.—THE PRISONERS.

"WHO IS IT?"

FOUR days later, a little before sunset, Bertrand rode into Valenciennes at the head of his convoy, returning from Montéval. The haste of the young leader to execute his commission "in all dispatch," as his commander had ordered, was a cause of no small vexation to his troopers, who saw no reason in the world for not enjoying their little outing and spending several relief to the young man to find that it was Favreau who was taken and not Margareta's father. All the same, however, he waited most impatiently for the friendly night under cover of which he might seek the dwelling in the Rue de l'Etoile, well knowing that there was grief and dismay in that household over the calamity which had befallen their dear friends. At length it was quite dark, and muffled in a cloak with a drooping Spanish hat concealing his face, Bertrand made his way by back lanes to Simon Colberg's house. He avoided frequented streets as if he had been a conspirator, and was devoutly thankful that during his passage he had encountered no one likely to recognise him or pay attention to his appearance. When the Inquisitor was in the neighbourhood every one became suspicious of his fellow men, and Bertrand knew that he was already a marked man, owing to his friendship with the Colbergs.

During his walk through the dark and silent streets the young knight's mind was busy upon one subject, that, namely, of getting Margareta out of harm's way at once. The danger that he had spoken of to Simon as being possible was now imminent. It was clear that Titelmann had come to purge Valenciennes of heretics, and his blood ran cold at the thought of Margareta, his love, his darling, being caught in the deadly clutch of the Inquisition.

"She must go, she shall be saved," he muttered to himself, and he clenched his hand and quickened his pace in his anxiety. "I will carry her off to England myself, if her father will not."

Arriving at length at the well-known door, he knocked with an eager hand. There was no answer, and his loving heart had leisure to torment itself with a new and quite unexpected terror as he again repeated his demand of admittance. What if Simon Colberg had taken the advice that he had urged upon him four days ago, and had actually gone already? Yes, gone, leaving him, Bertrand, in ignorance of their whereabouts! The night was very chill, but this thought seemed to suffocate him, for he dashed his cloak back from his face with a gasp as of one struggling for breath. There is no knowing what Bertrand might have done under the impulse of his desperation, had he not fortunately heard a rustling behind the barred door and the cautious whisper:

"Who is it?" It was the voice of Rosa, harsh and cracked enough, but to the ears of the agitated young man it sounded sweet and musical as an angel's voice. He answered eagerly: "Tis I, Bertrand de Swarte, open to me."

"Now the Lord be praised!" ejaculated the old woman as she speedily unfastened the door.

As soon as she was face to face with the young knight, with the door securely fastened behind them, she began in an agitated voice half crying, half scolding:

"Oh, sir, what a day of affliction is this! They say that Peter Titelmann has seized all those gone to the preaching at the illustrious Burgher's house. Woe is me that I should live to say it! My good master and mistress went there this afternoon. Alack a day, sir!"

The poor old creature wrung her hands in her distress.

"They are seized, I am sure of it, and they'll be burnt like the master's brother. My sweet young lady is all alone in the world. What will become of her?" Rosa went on so fast in her voluble distress, that Bertrand could not speak in reply until after the last ejaculation when she stopped perhaps designedly out of breath.

"Nay, nay," answered Bertrand, "'tis never so bad as all that. Neither thy master nor thy mistress is taken, and as long as I live thy young lady shall always command one sword sworn to defend her."

"My blessing upon you, sir, for a gallant and noble knight. But said I not so a score of times to my poor young lady this very afternoon? What was't I said when she wept so piteously and prayed me to let her out to fly to her father and mother, why surely what else but, 'Wait till the noble young gentleman comes, he will surely come when he hears of this day's work. Bide his coming and do his bidding,' said I."

Rosa looked sharply at Bertrand as if she would gladly learn what he thought of her advice. In the sad plight in which the Colbergs were now, their faithful servant was eager to cement any friendship between them and outsiders who were capable of helping them. The Sieur de Swarte was for the moment their most powerful friend, and if any word of hers could bind him to her master's interest it was assuredly the duty of a faithful servant not to leave that word unspoken. Thus to herself argued Rosa, the ancient serving-woman.

Bertrand, though glad of her partisanship, was impatient to see Margareta, and doubly so now that he heard she was alone. Those rare interviews beneath four eyes, as the Italians say, were precious to him. Therefore he said with a little perceptible haste: "Yes, yes, 'twas good advice, but commend me to the young lady, and say I would fain speak with her if she will admit me to her presence."

It was an unusual thing for him to ask to see Margareta, knowing her to be alone, therefore he was careful to miss no outward expression of humility and respect in his behaviour towards her.

Bertrand waited at the foot of the stairs and heard himself proclaimed by Rosa as—

"The noble young knight having good news."

CHAPTER IX.—MARGARETA'S TEST.

MARGARETA had spent the weary hours of that long winter's afternoon in the deepest anxiety. Ignorant of what had really taken place, but a prey to a thousand fears, she had alternated from feeble hope to the wildest despair, until Rosa, who had in the course of her long life as a heretic lived through many days of similar trouble, was much alarmed about her. No sooner had Bertrand been announced than she sprang forward to meet him, in the hope of learning some tidings of her parents.

She held out both her hands with a helpless, days in reposing themselves at the château. Many and fervent were their objurgations upon the haste of the young seigneur captain.

There was quite a stir in the streets when de Swarte entered the gates, and an evidently excited and angry crowd of people stood talking outside the drawbridge of the citadel. He paid but little heed to them, however, until the words, "dragged out of his own house" fell upon his ear, and made his heart stand still with fear.

Who was dragged out of his own house? Bertrand scarcely dared to ask the question, so much he dreaded to hear the answer. Inside the portcullis gate the guard was drawn up in unusual strength, and a group of men in blood-red garb, the most fatally appropriate livery of the Inquisition, stood on the other side of the castle-yard surrounding two dark figures. Bertrand's eyes were riveted on this centre-point of the group, but they were so far away he could not see their faces. In as careless a voice as he could command he said to an armourer who was polishing a steel helmet: "Willmen, who are the men yon red-hoods have caught?"

The armourer without raising his eyes from his work replied briefly: "A brace of heretics, caught at a preaching like rats in a hole."

Bertrand did not derive much comfort from this answer. He hardly dared to ask at whose house they were taken, fearing to hear the name of Colberg, but the gruff armourer had not heard the name of the particular rat whose hole had been cleared out, so could not say. One great dread however had been removed from Bertrand's heart: neither of the dark figures was that of a woman. The worst therefore had not happened. Determining in his own mind to see the Colbergs that very evening, he forced himself to attend to his duties, and proceeded to direct the bestowing of his forage.

In the year of which we write, namely, 1561, Philip II. of Spain was vigorously prosecuting his darling scheme of forcing the Inquisition upon his reluctant Netherlandish subjects, and thus clearing the country of heretics. In this nefarious scheme he was ably seconded by Cardinal Granvelle, a creature of his own, whom he had raised from the dust to be prime minister to his sister, the Duchess of Parma, who was Regent of the Netherlands. One of the ways in which these two conspirators against mankind hoped to effect their object, was the creation of seven new bishoprics in the United Provinces, with "right of inquiry" reserved to the bishops. To "inquire" all the more thoroughly prisons had been filled with men and women, gallows had been erected, and the unhappy beings "inquired into" had been tortured and burnt by hundreds and thousands. The right-hand man of this episcopal Inquisition was Peter Titelmann, a wretch who went raging through the land leaving a trail of blood and desolation behind him; he is one whose name deserves to be handed down to posterity as that of a demon in human shape.

In early life this man had been a monk, and was conspicuous at his monastery for wishing to force all the brothers to perform their most arduous duties to the last degree of severity. When, for instance, it was his turn to ring the bell that summoned the monks to midnight prayer, he used not to do it gently like the others, so as to let the sound sleepers dream on, but he tolled the bell with a rapid swing, making it clang out a wild alarm, loud enough to startle the laziest and make him leap up in sudden affright. As long as Brother Peter was an inmate of the monastery it was anything but an abode of peace, for if not occupied in tormenting the monks he would worry the animals belonging to the institution. Once during his novitiate he had shut the cat up in a cell until she was nearly starved to death, and when remonstrated with, had excused himself under the plea that all should fast during Lent. On the accession of Philip, Titelmann was summoned from his retirement, to exercise, as Inquisitor, his perverse ingenuity on mankind in general, and his brethren rejoiced greatly at his departure from among them. Already he had acquired a wide reputation for refined cruelty, so that his mere appearance in a town was the signal for something like a panic among the inhabitants.

At the time of this, his first professional visit to Valenciennes, Titelmann was about forty-five years of age. He was a short man with broad shoulders and arms of extraordinary length. His small bullet-shaped head, standing on a thick neck, gave him a brutal aspect which the sight of his face did not at all diminish. A low forehead with a shock of black hair, two small watery grey eyes one of which had a slight cast, a large hook nose, a mouth of huge dimensions, and a heavy under-jaw formed the facial characteristics of this energetic inquirer into the most sacred thoughts of the human heart. Titelmann's dress was a mountebank uniform of his own invention, intended to lend additional terrors to his aspect. He wore a close red hood with a black cross worked as an emblem in front, a mantle of the same fiery hue came down to his knees, while a pair of heavy leathern boots without spurs defended his extremities. His familiars were four ill-looking fellows dressed in the same bloody hued colour, and within this red and most fatal circle were the two figures, not unknown to us. The minister Faveau and Francis Mallart stood quietly there side by side, occasionally exchanging a few words with each other. The serene aspect of the minister would have made one think he was conversing in a circle of dear friends, instead of being within the grasp of his blood-thirsty foes. Mallart looked pale, and several times he cast an anxious glance about him. The terrors of his situation seemed to be keenly felt by him. For some time the two prisoners remained in the court-yard, while the November twilight gradually changed to darkness, and then at last they were taken to a tower, known as the Moon, where the iron-spiked door speedily closed on them and their red-hooded jailers.

In the meantime Bertrand had learned who the prisoners were, and how they had been taken at the house of Burgher Mallart whither many of their brethren had gone to attend an afternoon preaching. It was, it must be confessed, a great relief to the young man to find that it was Faveau who was taken and not Margareta's father. All the same, however, he waited most impatiently for the friendly night under cover of which he might seek the dwelling in the Rue de l'Etoile, well knowing that there was grief and dismay in that household over the calamity which had befallen their dear friends. At length it was quite dark, and muffled in a cloak with a drooping Spanish hat concealing his face, Bertrand made his way by back lanes to Simon Colberg's house. He avoided frequented streets as if he had been a conspirator, and was devoutly thankful that during his passage he had encountered no one likely to recognise him or pay attention to his appearance. When the Inquisitor was in the neighbourhood every one became suspicious of his fellow men, and Bertrand knew that he was already a marked man, owing to his friendship with the Colbergs.

During his walk through the dark and silent streets the young knight's mind was busy upon one subject, that, namely, of getting Margareta out of harm's way at once. The danger that he had spoken of to Simon as being possible was now imminent. It was clear that Titelmann had come to purge Valenciennes of heretics, and his blood ran cold at the thought of Margareta, his love, his darling, being caught in the deadly clutch of the Inquisition.

"She must go, she shall be saved," he muttered to himself, and he clenched his hand and quickened his pace in his anxiety. "I will carry her off to England myself, if her father will not."

Arriving at length at the well-known door, he knocked with an eager hand. There was no answer, and his loving heart had leisure to torment itself with a new and quite unexpected terror as he again repeated his demand of admittance. What if Simon Colberg had taken the advice that he had urged upon him four days ago, and had actually gone already? Yes, gone, leaving him, Bertrand, in ignorance of their whereabouts! The night was very chill, but this thought seemed to suffocate him, for he dashed his cloak back from his face with a gasp as of one struggling for breath. There is no knowing what Bertrand might have done under the impulse of his desperation, had he not fortunately heard a rustling behind the barred door and the cautious whisper:

"Who is it?" It was the voice of Rosa, harsh and cracked enough, but to the ears of the agitated young man it sounded sweet and musical as an angel's voice. He answered eagerly: "Tis I, Bertrand de Swarte, open to me."

"Now the Lord be praised!" ejaculated the old woman as she speedily unfastened the door.

As soon as she was face to face with the young knight, with the door securely fastened behind them, she began in an agitated voice half crying, half scolding:

"Oh, sir, what a day of affliction is this! They say that Peter Titelmann has seized all those gone to the preaching at the illustrious Burgher's house. Woe is me that I should live to say it! My good master and mistress went there this afternoon. Alack a day, sir!"

The poor old creature wrung her hands in her distress.

"They are seized, I am sure of it, and they'll be burnt like the master's brother. My sweet young lady is all alone in the world. What will become of her?" Rosa went on so fast in her voluble distress, that Bertrand could not speak in reply until after the last ejaculation when she stopped perhaps designedly out of breath.

"Nay, nay," answered Bertrand, "'tis never so bad as all that. Neither thy master nor thy mistress is taken, and as long as I live thy young lady shall always command one sword sworn to defend her."

"My blessing upon you, sir, for a gallant and noble knight. But said I not so a score of times to my poor young lady this very afternoon? What was't I said when she wept so piteously and prayed me to let her out to fly to her father and mother, why surely what else but, 'Wait till the noble young gentleman comes, he will surely come when he hears of this day's work. Bide his coming and do his bidding,' said I."

Rosa looked sharply at Bertrand as if she would gladly learn what he thought of her advice. In the sad plight in which the Colbergs were now, their faithful servant was eager to cement any friendship between them and outsiders who were capable of helping them. The Sieur de Swarte was for the moment their most powerful friend, and if any word of hers could bind him to her master's interest it was assuredly the duty of a faithful servant not to leave that word unspoken. Thus to herself argued Rosa, the ancient serving-woman.

Bertrand, though glad of her partisanship, was impatient to see Margareta, and doubly so now that he heard she was alone. Those rare interviews beneath four eyes, as the Italians say, were precious to him. Therefore he said with a little perceptible haste: "Yes, yes, 'twas good advice, but commend me to the young lady, and say I would fain speak with her if she will admit me to her presence."

It was an unusual thing for him to ask to see Margareta, knowing her to be alone, therefore he was careful to miss no outward expression of humility and respect in his behaviour towards her.

Bertrand waited at the foot of the stairs and heard himself proclaimed by Rosa as—

"The noble young knight having good news."

CHAPTER IX.—MARGARETA'S TEST.

MARGARETA had spent the weary hours of that long winter's afternoon in the deepest anxiety. Ignorant of what had really taken place, but a prey to a thousand fears, she had alternated from feeble hope to the wildest despair, until Rosa, who had in the course of her long life as a heretic lived through many days of similar trouble, was much alarmed about her. No sooner had Bertrand been announced than she sprang forward to meet him, in the hope of learning some tidings of her parents.

She held out both her hands with a helpless, imploring gesture towards him, saying: "What has happened? Who has been seized?"

Bertrand took one of the imploring hands between both of his, and said gently while holding it, "Your father and mother are quite safe."

Margareta drew a quick sigh of relief, and her lips quivered with the intensity of her emotion, so that she could not speak for some moments. Suddenly she seemed to awake to the fact that Bertrand was looking at her very tenderly, for she became slightly confused, and said hastily that perhaps he would be seated. No, he would not be seated. "I have yet more news, but it is bad," he added.

Margareta raised her face and looked at him, her large brown eyes shining with the tears that were ready to start.

"Peter Titelmann," continued Bertrand, "went to the house where to-day's preaching was held. He was long in obtaining admittance, so that all the brethren had time to escape—all, save two."

The troubled brown eyes swimming with ready tears looked very pitiful indeed. It went to Bertrand's heart to go on, and add: "All escaped, save Burgher Mallart and the minister, they were taken."

"Our minister—oh, our minister!" cried Margareta in a tone of pain. "O beloved pastor, who will guide us now!"

She paused for a moment, looking blankly before her, when suddenly a hideous thought flashed upon her mind. Her eyes dilated with horror, and snatching her hand from Bertrand's gentle custody, she grasped his arm with convulsive energy, saying in a loud frightened whisper: "What will they do to him? Tell me. Will they burn him? Can they do that? What will be his fate?"

Bertrand could not bear to tell her the destiny in store for her reverend friend. The white scared face was too pitiful for him to blurt out the horrid truth. He must try at least to comfort her.

"For the present, at least," he said soothingly, "nothing will be done to him. The prisoners are shut up in the castle until they shall be brought before the Court of Inquisition."

That last word, fraught with awful meaning to all Reformers, was like a spark to a powder magazine. Margareta's indignation blazed out.

"Ah!" she exclaimed bitterly, "and what a court of justice is that! Who are the judges in it? The chief is that very Titelmann who is himself also the accuser. When about to pass sentence he covers his garments of blood and fire with the white robes of outraged justice, and then coming down from the judgment-seat he is executioner as well, and lights the fire under his victim. This is the court of the Inquisition, before which holy men are dragged to have their inmost thoughts inquired into. This is the justice our countrymen may now expect from the hands of Spain. Did the men who won our privileges from the proud dukes of Burgundy leave no sons? Is the race of patriots extinct in Flanders, or have the men become cravens? Must women lead the way nowadays?"

Margareta was beautiful in her wrath, and Bertrand stood entranced looking at her flashing eyes and heaving bosom. An inspired prophetess, a most soul-stirring leader, surely. But while she spoke with such vehemence, a new fear took possession of him. Suppose that she should do something rash in her young ardour, should defy Titelmann, and avow her faith, seeking the martyr's crown! The thing was possible. Young souls in the fire of their zeal had done the same before now, offering a spectacle of useless heroism which men shudderingly admired. The thought rapidly took shape in his mind and spurred him to instant action.

"Margareta," he said—and was it something in the tone of his voice which made her stir slightly, or was it because he had called her by her own name for the first time, and she had noticed it?—"don't say that we are all unworthy of our brave free-born fathers. The time has not yet come to fight, but some there be who think it will come ere long. Then patriots will appear who are ready to die for their country. I know they will not be wanting, nor will they be few in numbers. But, Margareta," he went on more disconnectedly and hurriedly, "we are in great danger—you are, that is. I would give my heart's blood to save you. You know I would, don't you? You must have known that. But it would avail nothing. You must fly. There is no safety for you here with that human fiend prowling about. You must go—at once—to-night. I will stay by your side and shield you with my life. Don't send me away. Let me save you. I cannot live except near you."

A slight tremor passed through the maiden's frame which Bertrand was quick to notice.

"Nay, my sweet, do not shrink from me," he said entreatingly. "My heart, and my life are yours. If you ask my life, ah! it would be sweet to meet death at thy bidding in the cause of freedom and right."

Margareta stood silent. She was trembling now in every limb. Bertrand took her hand and raised it to his lips.

"Margareta, speak to me. Shall I, like the knights of olden time, ride forth with spear and sword to do battle for you?"

A moment he waited for the answer which came not, and then more timidly he continued: "But those knights fought under the protection of a token from their fair ladies. I entreat you, Margareta, can you not give me a word?"

The young girl raised her eyes for an instant, and Bertrand looked down eagerly into their dewy depths for her answer, and saw that it was there. It beamed from out the brightness of her eyes, and it fluttered about the tender curves of her mouth.

"Margareta," he said in a low tone, "what is the test you will set your own true knight that he may prove himself?"

Then Margareta, stepping back from him and raising her head proudly like a young queen, answered clearly in her rich sweet voice: "Yes, I shall test my true knight. A task shall I set before him more glorious than any battle with dragons. Free those prisoners. I cannot give one thought to myself or my own happiness until this dread calamity be averted. Save them. Be their deliverer, and then claim from Margareta whatever reward she can bestow, and it will be thine."

To win so sweet a prize what knight would not perform deeds of valour? For Bertrand nothing would henceforward be impossible. Inspired by such a hope, the very stones of the citadel must yield before his strength, and let the prisoners free.

Margareta stood motionless as he withdrew, intent on action. Then a doubt came into her mind, which had no place there as long as he had been present to fill her with heroic enthusiasm. She pressed her hands to her head with a low moan. Poor girl! The day had been one of the keenest emotions following each other with such rapidity, no wonder she felt bewildered and almost stunned.

"Oh," she exclaimed at length, "have I sent him to his doom, my friend, my hero!"

She took a hasty step towards the door. A momentary despair had swept over her soul. She would call him back: he should not go forth to danger, perhaps to death, urged on by her voice. For one instant only did she falter, her woman's love overcoming her faith.

"Ah, no," she cried, checking herself. "I may not call him back from this work. God will preserve him in this glorious task. He will succeed—I know he will—Bertrand, my knight, without fear and without reproach!"

Again she repeated softly to herself "Bertrand," as though her lips found pleasure in forming the name. Her half sweet, half painful reverie was suddenly broken in upon by Rosa who entered the room exclaiming:

"My faith upon it, mistress, but yonder sweet gentleman could hold his own with any knight in Flanders. He walked so proudly through the hall and with such a flashing eye, methought he looked like one of the grand nobles in Brussels when entering the tilting yard to joust. Ah! but I should like to see the Seigneur de Swarte ride a tilt against some good knight. He would bear himself gallantly, I trow. Think you not so?"

"I should be very sorry for him to waste his strength in an idle pastime," replied Margareta, "when there is need for brave men to fight the battle of God's truth."

"Hein!" exclaimed Rosa, looking at the young girl's flushed cheeks and dewy eyes, "is he then going to fight? There be much whispered talk of fighting nowadays. 'Tis said that the Hollanders are waxing uneasy, and I have heard of a band of gallant gentlemen under Count Brederode threatening to do great things if the Spanish king's orders be not milder towards us. But, hark ye, my heart's own, if you can command the noble gentleman, and I doubt not but what you can, let him beware of my lord count Brederode, he drinks too deep to have a clear head."

"No no," replied Margareta, "there is no present talk of going to Brussels. The Sieur de Swarte brought tidings of how the minister and Burgher Mallart have both been seized by Titelmann, and are cast into the dungeon."

"Now my curse be upon thee, Titelmann, and may'st thou one day feel the touch of thine own faggots and writhe in thine own fire!" cried Rosa with most unchristian vehemence.

"Rosa, Rosa," said Margareta, much scandalized, "Hush! Is this the way thou hast learned the dear minister's lessons of forgiveness? Thou mayest not speak so, even of Titelmann. Vengeance is the Lord's."

"Aye, I know, I know," returned Rosa, "but it is hard to wait when one is so near on to eighty for retribution one may not see. The minister taken! That is indeed a calamity. Know you, child, what they do to heretic ministers? They burn them. They chain them living to the stake and light fires under them, and burn them. Aye, burn them till there is nothing left but black cinders. Does not that make your blood boil with rage? When I think on it, I feel as if I could fight myself. Aye, faith, old and withered and weak as I am, I would like to strike one blow before I die."

RELIGION IN RUSSIA—THE PEASANTRY.

I.

ALTHOUGH we may speak of Russia as an empire under one monarchy, the vast territory embracing one-sixth part of the land of the earth, is rather a number of countries which require to have the Bible given to them in many languages. The area is between eight and nine million square miles, or more than eighty times the area of Great Britain. This is a great world in itself; but it is so sparsely peopled in parts, that its population of a little over one hundred millions is considerably less than three times the number of souls who are found in our own Islands. The mind is as incapable of forming any worthy notion of the size of such a territory as it is of calculating its resources. Then, when we consider that large portions of this wonderful region are still covered with interminable tracts of the virgin forest in which wolves and beasts of prey roam and multiply, one cannot wonder that it has remained until a comparatively recent date an unknown land even to adventurous travellers. Our sources of trustworthy information are now more plentiful however; for in addition to the revelations of English and American travellers, we have Stepniak's very original book on the "Russian Peasantry," and Tikhomirov's interesting work "Russia, Political and Social."[1] We are gradually getting at the truth about the social and religious condition of the Russian peasants who constitute the bulk of the population; and the shortcomings of the Government which has not done what it might have done for these poor illiterate tillers of the soil since their release from serfdom about a quarter of a century ago. The country is not only in a backward condition, but according to the representations of the best informed writers, the state of those on whom the Czar is largely dependent for taxes is becoming rapidly worse. The revolutionary forces, which for years have defied the authorities who have sought their suppression, ask for reforms which to ourselves are the merest common-places of freedom; and so long as crying abuses abound the forces in question will gather strength.

[1] Both of these are published by Swan Sonnenschein, Lowrey & Co., London.

The Church in Russia is an extensive organization, having nearly seventy bishops who are under the Patriarch of Constantinople. There are over forty thousand orthodox churches, besides some fourteen thousand chapels; there are thirty-seven thousand priests, seven thousand deacons; and a number of monks, nuns and aspirants of both sexes, the religious houses being foundations possessing great wealth. God's work requires men and women with enthusiastic hearts rather than money, however; and if the Church does not retain its hold upon the well-to-do, and does not command the love of the poor, it must be because the pastors have not commended their cause and their work to the public conscience. The authorities are even afraid to allow lectures and Sunday-schools; and ordinary seminaries are so scanty that comparatively few of the people are able even to read. The subject is altogether one of no common interest, so great are the possibilities of the future, when one judges of them in connection with the natural characteristics of the people. Shall we not pray that the needed reformation may come, so that in a manifold sense Russia may be free and prosperous?

In connection with the subject of the state of religion in the country, something must be said about the general condition of the peasantry, in order that other matters may be more clearly understood. In a general way, according to Stepniak, the great body of the peasants have gained nothing, so far as the betterment of their social condition is concerned, by the ukase of Alexander II., which is supposed to have delivered them from serfdom; for while nominally free under the present system, they are nevertheless the subjects of wrongs and oppressions which keep them down, but which the authorities in their own interest ought to remove, because the peasants, as the principal tax-paying class, are the main support of the Government.

The taxes appear to be collected soon after the time of harvest; and hence it is a common custom for the peasants of a community to dispose of corn which will really be wanted for household use in winter; and then, under stress of extreme poverty, money is borrowed from local usurers on painfully ruinous conditions. As the peasant can only mortgage himself, that is, his labour, he will virtually sign away his privileges as a citizen as well as his liberty, agreeing "to work at night," and admitting "I have no right to keep Sundays and holidays." The inevitable consequence is, that even in tracts of country which possess the rich black soil, that is so wonderfully fertile, the people are becoming impoverished; and cattle, which are absolutely necessary for work on the land, are fast disappearing in an alarming manner. Then, as severe poverty means an increase of the death-rate, we find that "in Russia, with its thin population and a climate as healthy as that of Norway or Sweden, the mortality is one hundred per cent. greater than in Great Britain; thirty-seven per cent. greater than in Germany; and thirty-nine per cent. greater than in France." The high mortality in the more central provinces, more especially, is confessedly caused by want of bread; it is said to have already reached an average of sixty-two per thousand per annum, while still showing a disposition to increase. There is at the same time a decrease in the birth-rate. Hence, as Stepniak remarks, "in the heart of Russia the population is being starved out"; and as this is occurring in territory where the land yields the fullest supplies, the prevailing distress is artificially, and not naturally, produced. Even while they are wanting in all ordinary modern sanitary appliances, the death-rate in the towns is far less than in the naturally healthy open country.

Then, while the poor peasant is the chief tax-payer, the State does not show him that consideration which would characterize those who understood the working of economic laws. The tax-collector in Russia goes to work in a very drastic fashion; and even if famine is in a village, the household and farming effects will be sold off, thus transforming an honest industrial community into beggars. Otherwise the labourer who is unable to pay, is flogged, and to an extent which reflects little credit on an age of enlightenment and civilization. "During the winter of 1885–6, a tax-collector of Novgorod province reported that in one district alone 1500 peasants were condemned to be flogged for non-payment of taxes," says Stepniak; and after remarking that more than a third of these had received punishment, while the remainder were awaiting their turn, he adds that it is "open to doubt whether even on the old slave-owners' estates there was ever so extensive an application of the rod as there now is in modern Russia twenty-five years after the emancipation." This appears the more barbarous when it is remembered, that the taxes demanded represent something like half that the peasant is enabled to earn; but still, no complaint would be made if sufficient land were allotted the hard-working people, to pay and live. As it is, the peasant is in the anomalous condition of the Hebrews in Old Egypt; he is required by the harshest of task-masters to make a full tale of bricks without straw. The oppression to which he is subjected means the gradual but inevitable impoverishment of the country, however; and only by introducing reforms on an wholesale scale will the Government prolong the life of the goose that is laying the golden eggs.

In such a backward country as Russia, the peasant is also subject to many other hardships, chief among which is the embezzlement of money by administrators of the laws in rural districts. It is said: "Robbery goes on unchecked, hardly concealed by even the forms of decency. It not unfrequently happens, that the money paid for taxes is embezzled, the peasant in this case being compelled to pay a second time. The sums sent by the Zemstvos for the relief of the hungry are embezzled; the funds advanced for the purchase of seed-corn are seized; the very corn which is stored in communal granaries as a provision for times of scarcity is stolen." It is hard for us to comprehend the condition of a State where things go on after this fashion; and it is still more discouraging to find what now Stepniak calls the bureaucratic despotism, also "hindering the diffusion of primary education, impeding the foundation of new schools, and blocking the wheels of the old ones." The idea of a literate peasantry does not find favour with the privileged classes. The old order of things is prolonged, dishonest police and public servants continue to thrive; while the industrial classes have been transformed into beggars by having their households broken up by hundreds of thousands, half a million a year virtually dying of starvation.

Despite the heavy drawbacks to which the Russian peasants are subjected, they are still an interesting people whose characteristics and aspirations are many of them very hopeful. The way in which education spreads among them, notwithstanding the many obstacles that hinder its progress, is in itself a healthy symptom. Thus, in 1868 only eight out of a hundred army recruits were able to read; but fourteen years later the proportion had increased to twenty. What would be accounted slow progress in other countries has to be regarded as rapid in Russia, for less than a quarter of a century ago reading was hardly customary among any save the upper classes. The ability to read is now spreading among the peasants, however; and the result is, as we are told, "popular literature of all kinds has received an unprecedented development in the last ten or fifteen years. Popular books run through dozens of editions, and are selling by scores of thousands of copies." The spread of knowledge alone may become the corrective of a crowd of abuses.

As regards temporal wealth there are different grades of Russian peasants, and all alike are interesting subjects to observers of national manners and customs. The typical household, the members of which are tolerably well-to-do, remains much the same as it was centuries ago; and even in cases where more comforts could be readily commanded, the domestic arrangements are no less primitive than squalid. The homestead may be a room some twenty feet square, and that serves the entire assembly both by day and by night. The furniture consists of one rough table, and hard benches, which are used as seats by day and beds at night, the genuine northern moujik, unlike the more effeminate Tartar, despising soft couches and delicate fare. The spacious top of the stone oven is reserved for the sleeping place of old people in severe weather; and if there are many in family a tier of shelves above the benches provides additional accommodation. For clothing the peasant prefers a home-spun woollen coat in summer, and one of sheepskin in winter; while, as Stepniak says, "the bast shoes, which were used in the Middle Ages in Europe, and have since disappeared, are in common use among the bulk of the Great Russian peasants." Their diet, whether animal or vegetable, is what they can raise on their own land. The richest of them are what we should call poor, but their charity towards one another, when in the straits of poverty, is of the most ardent kind. One reduced to want, who goes the round of the village collecting "morsels," is not regarded as a common beggar; and no one would incur the disgrace of refusing the dole.

Though it is so vast, that it may be compared to a world in itself, the Russian empire cannot possibly remain closed to outside influences; and the spread of knowledge, slow as it may seem, is stimulating a religious revolution among the peasants which will probably be more far-reaching in its consequences than the political agitation which reigns among the educated classes. The peasant is no sooner able to read than he also thinks for himself; and thus it has come to pass, that in the course of about a single decade numbers of new religious sects have come into existence, embracing, as we are assured, millions of adherents. Movements among the poor take a religious colouring; their social superiors are more political. This movement is even compared with the Reformation which agitated other parts of Europe in the sixteenth century; and it is the more remarkable in a theological sense, because it has originated among the common people. "The sources of religious enthusiasm are dried up, we think for ever, in the Russian intellectual classes, their enthusiasm and exaltation having found quite another vent," remarks Stepniak; but he thinks that, "the genuine development of earnest thoughts and feelings," to which allusion has been made, to betoken the sure progress of a mighty but slow-moving revolution, which in time will supersede by something better the effete formalism of the Greek church, old time customs and stereotyped traditions.

It seems to be a peculiarity of the Russian peasants, that they are more gregarious than those of other nations. In a territory of such vast extent there will necessarily be many who differ in social station, some being comparatively rich while others are terribly straitened: there will also be numbers of different nationalities with varying intellectual characteristics; but under all circumstances, and from one end of the empire to the other, they live in communities and are devoted to the village Mir—the peasants' local tribunal whose judgment is, or ought to be, recognised by the law. To the Russian peasant there is no conceivable council of greater authority than this—one which in cases of emergency would probably make a law for itself. Thus, as we are told, "in the olden times, as late as the sixteenth century, it was the Mir who elected the parson (as the dissenting villages are doing nowadays), the bishops only imposing hands on the Mir's nominees."

This is very significant when taken in connection with what is happening at the present time in Russia; for if something better than the deadness of the so-called orthodox church is preached, the Mir can reject or accept the new doctrines. "A dissenting preacher comes to a village and makes a few converts," it is said. "For a time they zealously preach their doctrines to their fellow villagers. Then, when they consider the harvest ripe, they bring the matter before the Mir, and often that assembly, after discussing the question, passes a resolution in favour of the acceptance of the new creed." The result is that the community becomes evangelical, "changing creeds as small states did in the times of Reformation." Thus wonderful opportunities for the circulation of the Scriptures and for the diffusion of the pure Gospel are occurring. Even the state-elected parish-priest who has to live on ecclesiastical fees, comes under the power of the Mir; for should he become too exacting, the villagers can forsake him, and under a pastor of their own choosing, set up another congregation. Thus, from his earliest days, the experiences of the Russian peasant teach him that the Mir is neither more nor less than "the personification of the living law, speaking through the collective voice of the commune." The degenerate Greek Church has so far lost its hold of the people individually and collectively, that unprejudiced observers can hardly doubt that even the peasants are already ahead of the priests in their conceptions of Christianity. The peasant, we are assured, never regards the ordinary priest as a pastor; he is merely an official and a depredator; he is something very opposite to the poor husbandman's ideal saint—"a man of the Mir, a man of practical piety, a teacher and benefactor of the people." Earnest evangelists of this type would soon become popular in modern Russia.

It is a fact striking in itself, and one that ought to be of good augury for the future, that in the main, the peasant does his best to come up to the ideal that he has formed in his own mind. Broadly speaking, he seems to be about as far removed from selfishness as it is possible for one with a family to be; for at all times, and in all places he is more solicitous for the prosperity of the Mir than for his own individual benefit. The effect of this sentiment is continually finding expression in the peasant's everyday life; and at times it will lead him to make great sacrifices. Under stress of poverty it is becoming more necessary than in former days for the people to engage in other labour than husbandry during certain months of the year. Some of the most improved goods of the best Moscow houses which trade in furniture, and linen hats, and lace, &c., are manufactured by villagers; but in this respect the hard times are becoming harder. Indeed, it is said, "the crushing competition of large factories working with machinery," and the swarms of usurious jobbers, have together by steadily cheapening the products, driven these small artisans to lengthen their hours of labour to a frightful extent. Nevertheless, in one instance, when in consequence of slackness of trade, half of the working staff were about to be dismissed from one factory, the whole of the people employed resolved that, rather than part company with any of their comrades, they would work only three days a week.

While work in moderation, that is properly remunerated, is a blessing, an excessive burden of toil, badly paid for, is a heavy drawback in any sense; and it is especially likely to be a serious impediment to anything like a religious reformation such as many are longing to see settle down upon these people. Abuses akin to the worst that were once prevalent in connection with our own factories are now rampant in Russia. Of the mat makers, who carry on their industry in hundreds of villages in more than twenty provinces, it is said: "They sleep three times in the twenty-four hours at about equal intervals: first at dark until 10 P.M., when they awaken for their night's work; then after the early breakfast at dawn, and again after the dinner-hour." Millions of persons, including women and even little children, are compelled by stress of adverse circumstances to toil during sixteen hours out of the twenty-four. Even of the labourers on the land it is said by one authority: "They get so exhausted that, if the fine weather lasts for a long time, the peasant will in his secret heart pray to God for rain, that he may have a day of rest. In fine weather, however, the peasant, however weary, will never desist from his labours. He would feel ashamed."

Thus, while the Russian peasant has many characteristics which commend him to our judgment, there are many things which remain as obstacles to his advancement and enlightenment; and it may be, that when the time comes for more active service in the evangelistic sense, the superstitions which have lingered like poisonous growth coming down from Pagan times will die as unwillingly as hardy weeds. These superstitions abound—they may be said to be universally diffused—because the people have been so ill-taught. Indifference in the priesthood, whether White or Black, has stimulated indifference in the people until those who ought to be faithful shepherds are despised by the poor and avoided by the rich and educated.

Various answers have been given to the question, Is the Russian peasantry religious? Observers have looked at the matter from various standpoints, or they have allowed pre-conceived notions to bias their judgment. It would appear to be true beyond doubt, that the peasants are so far religious that they represent a very promising field of labour for such preachers as Luther would have liked to send among them. The language of religion enters into their everyday life; and it is always promising when an intellectual awakening intensifies religious interest. Of the many sects of Christian which have sprung up among the wide-scattered villages we will speak in another paper

G. H. P.

THE FIRST SHEAF.

THE LESSON OF THE PRIDE OF LIFE.

HIGH summer lay in sunny splendour upon the land. Soft clouds floated over the azure vault, and hot rays streamed from the regal orb over sea and shore.

Passion and pride had taken possession of the country's heart; pride justified by lavish beauty on every hand; passion fainting into dreamy languor from fulness of gratification. Why exert oneself to seek the charms of nature when they are spread on every side, and one need not move to enjoy them? The garden-seat beneath the spreading tree is blissful content; one can hardly care even for the volume of melodious verse which forms an excuse for laziness. It drops from the hand; the hum of insects is more melodious to us to-day. The busy bees are buzzing in the lilycups beside us; the painted butterflies hover and toy above the crimson roses; the tiny gnats are swarming in clouds beneath the over-hanging branches, dancing out their little day in the shade of the lime-tree.

The birds do not sing, they are too busy teaching their little ones to take short flights with their newly-fledged wings; only the swallows are still feeding their broods, and flit by, hunting upon the wing, and calling to each other with short sweet shrillness.

Beyond the garden gate is a meadow where the grass is close cropped, and the daisies are dead in the heat. An old horse, turned out to pasture, stands, patiently looking over the hedge, for hours together, only switching his tail from time to time, in the hope of persuading the flies to leave him alone.

In the next field the bearded wheat is erect and still. There is not the faintest breath of air to heave its ripe heavy heads, or to cause shadows to sweep over its golden wealth.

Farther away are trees in the dense richness of summer green, deep and full. Their branches also are motionless, not even the flutter of a little bird disturbs their sleep.

Living, alone, is sufficient on such a day as this; why exert oneself when all nature is so full of enervation?

But the stillness is broken, the charm of dreaminess is fled. Girlish laughter ripples, merry young voices approach, and a pony-carriage draws up at the entrance.

"It is too hot for lawn-tennis before evening," they cry; "come with us for a drive, we are going to see a beautiful old church."

"Is it not too hot to drive?" we ask.

"You are growing lazy, actually lazy," is the reply, "it will be good for you to be stirred up. Come, put on your shadiest hat, there is no escape for you. You are wicked, and shall have no rest unless you do."

It is less trouble to comply than to resist, and the good-natured maidens have their will with me.

While necessary preparations last, they roam the garden, and rifle the rosebushes.

"See" they cry, "here are your choicest treasures stolen."

They are like roses themselves, with the flush of youth on their fair rounded cheeks; the light of life in their happy eyes, and the knots of roses adorning their cool summer dresses.

We drive through deep sandy lanes, and over stony roads; past whitewashed cottages, whose thatch is thick and brown; where larkspur and Canterbury bells bloom in the little gardens, and children stand at the wickets, and push tangled hair from their eyes with chubby arms as they gaze after us.

Over a little stone bridge, spanning a sluggish stream; by a farmhouse where the white rose blooms freely in the surrounding hedge, casting a snow of over-blown petals upon the grass beneath. Then away, away, for miles, over a level moss, where the golden iris rears its stately head in the water-courses, and the toad-flax casts its lemon-hued flowers, in a sheet, over the bank; and the forget-me-not is blue as the skies; and the meadow-sweet makes the air rich with fragrance.

Here are reapers, thrusting their sickles into the earliest ripened corn. They have already done good work; and the figure of a portly country woman—with the sleeves of her lilac bed-gown rolled up, displaying comfortably plump arms, and the fastening at the neck thrown loosely open for the heat, and her cotton sun-bonnet tilted over her eyes—is seen approaching, laden with creature comforts and cooling drinks for their refreshment. They notice her approach, and already begin to straighten their weary backs, and stray off into the welcome shade of the hedge, for their short rest.

Then come lanes, where honeysuckle and wild roses deck the roadside, and purple fox-gloves stand erect.

Here is a tiny village which has hardly owned a new cottage for a century at least. The ancient Manor House, which once sheltered its lords, is now the dwelling of the farmer who employs the people. The change is little more than in name alone, the relationship between master and labourer is practically the same.

This village is separated from the next but by a winding lane among the fields. Here the Hall of the old owners has been divided into three dwellings of humbler pretensions. The family who once dwelt there in dignity and state have died out, their place knows them no more; the name exists but as the name of the spot, and is owned no longer by knight or squire.

Great revels were once held there; wit and wassail flowed; and the great ones of the earth flourished and loved, and sinned and sorrowed for a day. Not one remains, and the county history must be an old one which contains mention of the last of the race.

The church stands close at hand, a magnificent erection of great age, on which riches had been freely lavished centuries ago. The walls are yet massive; the oaken doors thick and weighty. The carvings are rich; what endless patience was in the fingers which elaborated them;—the fragments of stained glass are gorgeous, what wealth and skill were originally employed to bring their fragile beauty from far distant lands!

Here is the crypt where the treasures of the church were concealed, but the rich plate and jewelled garments are gone. Here is the prison where the mighty incarcerated their foes;—oppressor and oppressed, judge and condemned alike are gone.

Here are winding steps of stone, worn away by the tread of many feet; here loopholes whence many eyes have gazed; here places where generations have knelt and prayed. Where are they all? Who were they all? Their very names on the tomb-stones, thick in the grass without, are obliterated from the lapse of time.

A beautiful altar-tomb represents a knight and his lady lying side by side. Shields are sculptured around the sides, but the armorial bearings are quite defaced. His feet rest upon his favourite hound; their garments were once sculptured in semblance of exquisite embroidery; they must have been people of consequence who lie below. Who were they? Their very names are forgotten.

Another altar-tomb has the figure of a bishop lying on it. A canopy is carved above him; the insignia of his office are there; his vestments are intricately adorned. When did he live? What did he do? How did he die? Was he beloved, or feared, or hated, or regretted? No one knows.

Golden coins were discovered in this cunning hiding-place. Who put them there? Why were they secreted? Whose hoard did they form? For what purpose were they amassed? Wherefore were they never employed? None can tell.

Great and powerful; wealthy and pious; priest and lord and captive; young and old; husband and wife; loving and loved:—they are all gone, nor left their histories behind them.

Their names are forgotten; few care to hear about their grandeur or their power of yore; it is nothing to those who gaze upon such relics of it as are left. But the work which they did remains.

The patience which carved that stone; the skill which tinted that glass; the honest labour expended upon the building where the mortar remains hard as iron, though the stones which it bound together are worn; the beautiful hint at allegory which is suggested by the beams and rafters of the roof being formed as those of a ship, built to conduct the souls of the faithful to the harbour where they would fain be: all this remains.

The love of the church, which expended such lavish care upon the decoration of that remote corner, which has to be sought out to be seen; the faithful completion of every task; the riches spent upon the best material and the most skilful hands to manipulate it,—these all remain in startling evidence still. The pride of life has gone;—the work of life remains.

The world knows the men no more, but the labour of their hands exists for the use and the instruction of generations; evidence, not to the honour of any individual, but to the honesty of love and labour.

There is indeed a sermon in these stones; they are silent witnesses to the fleeting character of greatness and glory; and the enduring character of thorough work. The finger of Time effaces all mortal beauty, honour, dignity, affluence and pride; while the labour of the hands resists its ravages, and bears its dumb testimony to the piety, the love, the devotion, which could leave nothing in the sacred building incomplete, or inefficiently handled.

Where is thorough, good honest work we may trust our "Tutamen Deus."

G. N.

A CORNISH STORY.

THE place I was staying at was a Cornish fishing village — far away from rail — almost unknown to tourists. In summer time it has for visitors, an artist or two; a strange little village it indeed is, no regular driving road leads to it, no shop exists there; perhaps, more wonderful still, there is no public-house or beer-shop. The nearest inn is about three miles away, there is no baker nearer than two miles, no regular butcher nearer than seven miles, though a farmer two miles away does in summer now and again kill a sheep, and then information is sent of the event. The inhabitants are all fishermen; they, their wives and families live principally on fish and puddings—a fine healthy race. The men especially are frank and handsome.

There is no church or chapel nearer than two and a half miles, and yet they are a religious God-fearing race of people, nearly all Wesleyans. While boats are launching, or fish are landing, you hear in place of music-hall songs, the strains of well-known hymns, whistled or sung. The men are, as a rule, hard-working, usually rising before sunrise, coming in about one o'clock to dinner, and then off again; they are all temperance men, going to their boats with a bottle of water or cold tea in their hands. There is little poverty, and no wealth, and, as usual with all fishermen nowaday, their only complaint is the poor price their fish realise, owing to excessive railway charges and the profits of the middleman. It does sound strange to be told that often when they get good catches of mullet that these fish are sent off to Paris, and that it pays them to trust their fish to French salesmen rather than to London agents. What will lovers of turbot say when I tell them of that grand fish being gladly sold for two shillings, and the men quite obliged to you for buying large plaice at sixpence, of herring or pilchards being quite a drug in the market? The rent of land is high, three pounds and more per acre. The few farmers about say they are all quite ruined by high rents and bad times.

At this place I love to stay, knowing everybody, and liking them too. I was sitting one day last summer, at my work close to the shore, when I saw a boat come to her moorings outside; and soon in the small punt the three men landed with the catch, an old man and two younger ones. The latter carried off the fish, and the elder walked up to have a chat with myself. He was an especial favourite of mine—a man who had seen much of the world, and the wonders of the deep, and had told me many things of great interest. So, after a few words about their catch, I said, "Well! did you, like the rest, go to Penzance to see the Jubilee Show?"

"No, sir," said he, "I told 'em I hadn't the heart or mind to go; for you see, sir, I went to mother's funeral the day before, and I couldn't go from one to tother."

Looking at his age, I was surprised at the statement, but said, "I am most sorry to hear you have lost your mother."

"Well, you see, sir, I beg your pardon, she wasn't my own real mother, but I always called her such, though she was no relation of mine. This is how it was—she lived at M——. You know M——, sir? No? Well, it's the great fishing port this side Mount's Bay. Well, sir, forty odd years ago—I was a young man then—I had been to the North Sea in lugger-fishing off the Dogger Bank, fishing for cod in winter. It was my first voyage to the North Sea, and the work is hard and it is often cold. Getting wet through, and no dry clothes to put on, I took ill and couldn't at last get out of my bunk. Well, we comes back in time, and puts into M——, and two of my mates say, 'Tom, the best thing we can do for you is to take you to mother.' So they carries me ashore, takes me to a house, 'mother' meets us on the steps. 'What's the matter with the poor lad?' says she. My mates up and tells her how ill I have been. 'Poor lad,' says she, 'bring him into the house.' They carries me to bed; she looks after me, nurses me, feeds me, prays for me, reads the Bible to me; and I had never known her or seen her afore! When I got better, she says, 'My lad, whenever you come ashore again, never you go to any other house, always come here, and while I am alive there's food and shelter for ye.' And ye see, sir, she was not what people called a 'Lady,' but only a fisherman's wife, and kept a ship chandler's shop, and her husband was captain of a lugger. But sir, the good that woman did! You see sailors often come back from the Dogger Bank ill. Then there was 'mother' to the fore with food, and nursing, praying with 'em, and reading the Bible to 'em. How we loved mother!

"Well, sir, for more than twenty years I was coming on an off to that port, and as soon as ever my boat put in there I'd see 'mother' standing on the steps of her house, a-waving a something to show me she had seen me. She said as how she knew my boat the moment it came in sight; so I always went to 'mother,' you see, sir. I never knew my own 'mother:' she died when I was a little kid.

"You suppose I loved her? I should think I did—ah, I had done anything to please her. Yes, you may well say she was a Christian: not much a talking one, but a doing one. Well, sir, she died lately, so, of course, I goes to her funeral; and there was seventy-five men and women followed that body. She was seventy-seven years. There wasn't a dry eye among us; we all had something to tell of 'mother.'

"We goes back to the house, and her husband says, 'Tom,' says he, 'you have been coming here nigh on to forty year, and if ever you are here again, I hope you will make this your home.' Kind wasn't it? But I says, No. I says, 'You see mother's gone, and I couldn't come to this house again. Mother's dead;' and then we all set a-crying, sir—ah! tough old man as I am, I am not ashamed to say, I was a-crying like a little child, and so was we all. You'd have cried if you'd a-known her, and felt what it was to lose 'mother.'

"Well, she's gone home, if ever a soul did; she did love God; and many and many's the soul has been saved through her. There isn't too many of her sort, I take it, in the world. I could yarn on for hours about her. If a poor fellow was hard up, she'd say 'Come into the store, and take what you want, and make good use of it, lad; and if you can, why pay me some day; and if you can't, why you're welcome.' So now, sir, you see why I didn't go to Jubilee—I couldn't go, says I to the others, you see I can't go from one thing to another, so I sat at home all day, sir, and had a sore heart."

Such the story; and my friend went on his way.

And years ago this very place had a bad reputation for wreckers and smugglers. Local Wesleyan preachers went to it and were much abused. They worked on and we now see the fruits of their labour. The Rev. Mark Guy Pearce sometimes visits this little village. All love him there, and speak of his sermons.

HENRY A. HARPER.

Children's Hymn.

THOU, Lord, hast made us for Thy praise,
And we belong to Thee;
Oh, help us in Thy blessed ways,
To walk obediently.

Thou gav'st for us Thine only Son
To bear our guilt and shame;
Teach us to trust in Him alone,
And glorify His name.

And Thou hast sent Thy Spirit down
To raise our hearts above;
Oh, may He make these hearts Thine own,
And fill them with Thy love.

Thus may we, while we walk below,
Fulfil Thy blest design,
And in our daily conduct show
That we, O Lord, are Thine.

S. GERALDINA STOCK.

VISIT TO A JEWISH SYNAGOGUE.

THE celebration of the Passover is one of the chief festivals in the Jewish calendar. It continues during eight days, commencing on the fifteenth of the month Nisan, or rather on the evening of the fourteenth (as all Jewish sabbaths and festivals commence at sunset of the preceding day), and ending on the twenty-second day of that month. The new moon which marks the beginning of the month Nisan, corresponds in each year to different dates in our own calendar. This year, in 1888, it fell on the 22nd of March, and "the eve of the Passover" was on the 26th, the festival ending on the 3rd of April.

By invitation of a Jewish friend, I went to one of the London Synagogues on the second day of the Passover, Saturday, March 28th. I had been told that the first two, and the last two of the eight days of the festival, are celebrated with special pomp and extraordinary services, so that it was a favourable opportunity. A brief account of the service may interest the readers of the SUNDAY AT HOME. I ought to say that it was the Reformed Synagogue, as it is called, that I attended, where the service differs in some respects, to be presently mentioned, from that of the "Orthodox" synagogues. There are several reformed synagogues, I believe, in Berlin, New York and other places, but as yet only one in London, in Berkeley Street, Portman Square; the chief minister of which is the learned and venerated Professor Marks.

The chief difference in the service of the Reformed and Orthodox Synagogue, so far as can be observed by a stranger, is that the Reformed Synagogue has finer music in the form of a grand organ and a well-trained choir of male and female voices, while in the old synagogues the whole service is chanted by male voices. The sermon in English is, I believe, common to both synagogues, on special occasions.

There are other differences, of course, as my Jewish friends tell me, especially that in the Reformed Synagogues the portions of Scripture, as appointed to be read in order, are shorter, because they are distributed over a cycle of three years, instead of being gone through in one year. This one point is an indication of the differences which justify the charge of the Orthodox that the Reformed brethren do not pay the same respect to the traditions of the fathers, and for this and other reasons their synagogues are looked upon as irregular places, or tiphlas as they call them.

But at the great festivals, as at this Passover season, there is substantially the same service, except in regard to the music.

With my friend, I went to the gallery, as is the custom for females. The body of the house was filled with male worshippers. All the men had their hats on, the conductors of the service wearing peculiarly shaped black head coverings. All of them wore tallithe, i.e. cloths with fringes, like white scarves. There was an air of solemnity and interest pervading the whole vast assembly, upon which I had to look with feelings of curiosity rather than intelligent sympathy, the whole service being in Hebrew. I had to depend on others to inform me what were the portions of holy writ that were being read or chanted. But of the magnificent effect of the music any one could judge. The sound of many voices in the responses and in the chanting, was most imposing, and the music of the organ and of the choir equal to what is heard in any place of worship.

On this day, after the usual morning service, consisting of readings from the Law and the Prophetical books, and responses by the congregation—the Hebrew scrolls having been taken from the ark and borne to the reading desk with great solemnity—the special portions for the Passover festival were chanted. These were Psalm 107, and the collection of Psalms known as "the Hallel," from Psalm 113 to Psalm 118 inclusive. The chanting and singing of all these sounded admirably, and the outburst of joyful song towards the close was magnificent—a soprano voice of great power and compass rising above the choir, and thrilling every listener in the words: "O give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good; because His mercy endureth for ever." The choir is stationed in the body of the house, behind the ark.

The congregation seemed very cheerful and complacent as they came out, with more of friendly recognition and salutation than one commonly sees after ordinary church services. The Jews are no doubt on the whole more united and sociable than Gentiles of the same class in society; it is a community where many are known to each other, for there are few poor Jews in the west compared with the east of London. I left the place greatly delighted with the whole service, although the pleasure was strangely mingled with surprise and with regret that all this joy and thanksgiving arose from the commemoration of a mere external and national deliverance, experienced by ancestors so many ages ago. Thankfulness for present mercies no doubt helps to inspire the service, and the future redemption of the people, and restoration to their own land is professedly hoped for; though it is doubtful how many of the prosperous Jews in England would regard this as a blessing. Nevertheless it is a wonderful sight to see the celebration of an ancient historical event maintained by all Jews in every land, after the lapse of three thousand years. Surely for some greater purpose than yet appears, with all the wealth and prosperity of the people, has the race been preserved by Divine Providence, scattered among all nations, yet separate and distinct from the people of the lands where they dwell. What kingdom or dynasty or institution can boast of such remote antiquity, and such continuous vitality, as is witnessed among the Jews, in their rites, and usages, and religious services?

It is a marked feature of the Jewish religion that its ceremonies are not limited to the house of worship, but that they are for the most part practised at home in the family circle. This festival of the passover is specially a home service in its beginning, and in its spirit. Great preparations are made in every Jewish dwelling, and the festival begins with the assembling of the family on the eve of the passover. In the SUNDAY AT HOME for 1877 will be found a full description of all that passes on that evening in the Jewish household. The sacred object-lessons, as we might call them, taught by the various things that are placed upon the supper-table are there clearly set forth. But it is the fulfilment of the ancient precept, as if with prophetic certainty, that is most striking. In the book of Exodus it is written "And it shall come to pass, when your children shall say unto you, What mean ye by this service? that ye shall say, It is the sacrifice of the Lord's Passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when He smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses" (Exod. xii. 26, 27.) To this day in every land, on Passover eve, the youngest male child who is present, asks "Wherefore is this night distinguished from all other nights?" And the head of the family or household explains the reason of the celebration, and the meaning of the peculiar ceremonies and objects before them. "All these several rites and ceremonies," says a learned and eminent member of the Jewish community, "have for their object to recall to the Israelite the severe bondage his ancestors endured on the one hand, and on the other to commemorate the glorious deliverance which the Lord wrought for them with a mighty and outstretched arm. One principal constituent, however, in the celebration of the festival is wanting at the present day—the paschal lamb—as since the destruction of the Temple sacrifices are no more offered. Still the Passover has lost none of its importance; its precepts are still observed with scrupulous conscientiousness by the Jewish people, even by those who otherwise do not strictly adhere to the ritual injunctions of the Mosaic faith."

It is impossible for a Christian visitor to witness these Passover services, or to remember the ceremonies connected with the season, without thinking of the greater events of which they are types and symbols. The unleavened bread, the bitter herbs, and above all the indication of the slain lamb, recall the great paschal sacrifice made once for the salvation of the world. The slavery in Egypt prefigured a more terrible bondage to sin and Satan; the exodus denoted a greater deliverance; the unleavened bread and the bitter herbs were symbols of the purity and the penitence of those who are partakers of so great salvation. It was a Hebrew of the Hebrews, Paul the pupil of Gamaliel, who wrote, "Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us: therefore let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth." (1 Cor. v. 7, 8.)

It is from the books of Moses and of the Prophets that we know how this paschal lamb prefigured the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. In these sacred books we are also taught that the promised Messiah was to come first in humiliation, and thereafter to be exalted as a Prince and a Saviour. The two lines of prophecy are not conflicting, but both meet in the person of Jesus of Nazareth.

Let Christians who owe so much to the Jewish people, who were the custodians of the Scriptures, and from whom, according to the flesh, Jesus the Messiah came, unite in the prayer that the true significance of the festival of "the Passover," and of the still more momentous "Day of Atonement," may be understood by those on whose eyes the veil still rests, so that they may see the glory of the Redeemer, who died, according to the Scriptures, and rose again, and who is to come the second time as the Judge of the quick and the dead!

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XV.

Faithful and tender—wife, widow, and daughter—
Well may we praise her for all she has been;
Blest be the trials and sorrows that brought her
In the cornfields of Bethlehem to follow and glean.

1. As the sun falls on rock, or the dew on the dust,
He sends this alike on the unjust and just.
2. A land that is wholly forgotten, save when We think 'twas his home—that, most patient of men.
3. O gentlest reproach from lips human, divine!
"Were there not these cleansed? But where are the nine?"
4. Impious, ill-fated, of cursèd renown
Art thou who rebuildest this waste-lying town!

M. E. B.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. V.—p. 384.

"And Jonathan, Saul's son, had a son that was lame of his feet. He was five years old when the tidings came of Saul and Jonathan out of Jezreel, and his nurse took him up, and fled; and it came to pass, as she made haste to flee, that he fell, and became lame. And his name was Mephibosheth."—2 Sam. iv. 4.

(1) 2 Sam. iv. 4; 1 Sam. xxxi.; (2) 1 Kings xviii. 45, 46; (3) 2 Sam. iv. 4; (4) 1 Sam. xxxi. 6; (5) 2 Sam. ix. 5, 6; xix. 25, 26; (6) 1 Sam. xiv. 49; xix. 17; (7) xix. 4, 5; (8) The nurse; (9) Saul, Jonathan and Mephibosheth; (10) Mephibosheth, five years old; (11) Lameness; (12) see 1 Sam. xxxi.; (13) 2 Sam. iv. 1, 8, 9-12; 2 Sam. i. 13-15; (14) Mephibosheth; (15) 2 Sam. iv. 4.

ANSWER TO HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. VII.—p. 400.

He that believeth on Me hath everlasting life.—John vi. 47.

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

BY EMMA LESLIE.

CHAPTER I.—BERTIE'S BIRTHDAY.

"WELL, this is a jolly birthday! I declare it isn't a bit cold, and with the sun shining like this, you could fancy it was summer;" and as the little boy spoke, he skipped along the field-path, while his brother, a year or two older, walked thoughtfully behind.

Presently the skipping and whistling were brought to an abrupt close by the elder one saying: "Tommy, we must be very poor, I think, only to get an orange and a new penny this morning."

The boys had always shared similarly on their birthdays, which had been made days of general festival, when presents were freely given. But both had been disappointed of the particular present each desired this time, although it was Bertie's birthday, and if there ever was any difference made, Bertie, as the elder, was considered to have the right to the most consideration, and the best present.

"I did think I should have had a knife to-day," grumbled Tommy, who had suddenly forgotten the brightness of the day in the disappointment concerning the knife.

"I thought I should get a big 'Robinson Crusoe,' full of pictures, to-day. I told mamma about it weeks and weeks ago, and that's what made me think we must be poor. Never mind about the knife, Tommy; I'll lend you mine—only you must take care of it, for I don't think mother could buy me another now."

"Why couldn't she? I'm going to ask her to buy me one," said Tommy. "It isn't no good having one lent to you; I want it in my pocket always."

"I'll lend it you to keep in your pocket sometimes; but you mustn't worry mother about buying one," said Bertie, "because I don't think she wants us to know we're poor—she's never told me about it, you know," he added.

"But why should we be poor?" demanded Tommy. "Father has a lot of men working for him in the factory; I've seen them, and so have you, Bertie."

But Bertie shook his head, "I don't think they're at work now," he said. "I heard Ann tell somebody the other day that the factory was closed."

"I don't believe Ann knows anything about it," said Tommy passionately. "We can't be poor—how can we? Mother is a lady, and father is a gentleman; and how can we be poor, dirty people, like the men at the factory?"

But the conversation was interrupted here by a big slouching boy rising suddenly from the ground, and shaking his fist at them in a threatening manner.

"Don't you see my trap?" he hissed, in a tone of suppressed passion. "Can't you go somewhere else with your chatter?"

Bertie was startled for a minute, but soon regained his courage, and looking round he saw three or four bricks placed so as to make a trap for any unwary bird that ventured to pick up the crumbs that were scattered inside.

"Ain't you never seed a trap before?" demanded the owner, but still in a whisper, for fear of scaring the birds.

"What right have you to set a trap to catch the poor little birds?" asked Bertie calmly, and looking in the boy's face as he spoke.

The bully was evidently taken aback by the little boy's undaunted manner.

"Well, that's a good un, that is," he said, as soon as he could recover from his astonishment; "what do I catch birds for? What did your father go shooting 'em for? Just tell me that."

"You don't know my father," said Tommy, now stepping forward.

"Oh, don't I! You just come out o' that path, and let the birds alone, and I'll tell you who your father is, and why he don't live at Beachcliff with yer too," said the boy, and as he spoke he hustled them away to the shelter of a neighbouring hedge. "There now, don't talk too loud, and we can have it out here without scaring the birds away from my trap. I 'spose you and your fine lady mother thinks nobody don't know you here in Beachcliff; but you're just mistaken. Everybody knows everybody else in less than a month, and you've been here close upon three months. You lived in a big house at Esterfield, and had a factory before you came here; ain't I right now?" suddenly demanded the boy, in a triumphant tone.

Bertie nodded.

"I don't know how you know so much about us," he said.

"Why, everybody knows it," said the other, with a short laugh. "Everybody is saying this is a pretty bad time for you, and what's more it serves you right, for none of yer ever tried to make things a bit brighter for them as you might have helped—them as was poor and hungry, when you was rolling in riches. And now your turn's come, and it serves—— Hi, hush; the trap's down, I do believe," broke off the boy, suddenly lowering his voice; and he ran across the grass, leaving the brothers looking at each other in such blank astonishment that neither could speak for a minute or two.

Bertie's eyes were full of tears, while Tommy looked angry as he clenched his fist at his retreating foe.

"He is a wicked, cruel boy," he said passionately.

"But, suppose it should be true, Tommy?" said Bertie.

"What! That we're so poor?"

"That we never tried to help anybody when we had plenty of everything for ourselves," said Bertie, sadly.

"Well, suppose we didn't. Hasn't everybody got to look out for themselves?" said his brother. "I've heard father say that a good many times," he added.

While they had been speaking, they had slowly walked towards the field-path, and there met the bird-catcher with his prize.

"It's a young thrush," he said, "and I shall soon have another too," he added, glancing back at the trap which he had again set.

"Let's look at it," said Bertie, eagerly; and Tommy pressed forward too, to peep at the poor palpitating little prisoner that was held fast in the boy's hands.

"Oh, do let it go!" said Bertie, in a voice of entreaty.

"What do yer take me for?" said the other, with a harsh laugh. "D'yo think I ketches birds to let 'em go agin? Not much! Why I've been waiting nigh upon two hours for that trap to go down, and when it goes down with a beauty like this un in it, you comes and says, 'Let it go.'"

"What are you going to do with it?" asked Tommy, who thought he should like it for himself.

"Do with it! Why sell it, to be sure. How am I to get any breakfast, let alone dinner, if I can't make a penny by the bird?"

Bertie glanced at the boy's face and saw now that he looked pale and hungry.

"Haven't you had any breakfast?" he said, and he put his hand in his pocket, and fingered his penny thoughtfully.

"Oh, it doesn't matter so much about breakfast if I can get a bite of something by-and-by! Coves like me can't afford to think much of a meal more or less, like you lucky chaps do."

Bertie looked at him pityingly.

"I wish I had known you had got no breakfast, I would have brought you half of mine," he said.

"Would you now?" said the other, with widely opened eyes.

"Yes, lad; and if you'll let the bird fly, I'll give you this," and he drew the bright new penny out of his pocket and showed it to the boy.

"Is it a good un?" he asked, taking it out of his hand to examine it.

"Oh, yes, it's quite good!" said Tommy. "It's a birthday penny."

"And you've got one, too, I s'pose?" said the boy sharply, thinking he saw the chance of getting another penny.

Tommy nodded.

"It's all we've got," said the boy sadly, thinking of the knife he had wished for.

"Well, it's more than I gets," said the bird-catcher; "nobody ever thinks of me. Here's yer penny, little un," he added; "I couldn't let a beauty like this go for a penny."

Bertie took the penny, but looked appealingly at his brother.

"Couldn't you spare yours, Tommy?" he whispered, drawing him aside.

Tommy shook his head.

"It's all I've got," he said; "and we never get pennies now like we used when father was at home."

"But the poor little bird, Tommy, it will be shut up in a cage and never be happy again."

"How do you know that?" demanded Tommy.

"Ann told me about it the other day. She said it was very cruel to shut up poor little wild birds; they were always trying to get away, and unhappy because they could not."

"He's a cruel boy to catch them, then," concluded Tommy; "but it isn't our business."

"Yes, it is, if we've got the money that would buy its freedom. Oh, Tommy, do give your penny, too! He'll let it fly for twopence, I think."

"Why can't he let it go for a penny, then?" said Tommy, slowly drawing his hand out of his pocket, and looking at the bright new coin.

"Well, he's hungry, you see; and perhaps nobody ever told him about it being cruel to catch birds. He won't get much of a dinner even for twopence," concluded Bertie; "and Ann told me she was going to make a plum pudding for us."

"I should think so," said Tommy, in a half resentful tone. "Why don't we have dessert now like we used to?"

"Ann says little boys don't want dessert when they're at the seaside; but I don't believe mother has it either, and it must be all because we have got poor somehow."

"Well, then, if we're so poor, what do you want to give our pennies away for?" demanded Tommy, discontentedly.

"To help the poor bird, and—and we might help the boy get some dinner, you know," added Bertie. "He says we never helped anybody. I'm afraid I never thought about it before; we always had what we wanted, and somebody to take care of us, but I've thought that perhaps boys might help a little bit in some little way, and I'd like to begin with that bird, if I could, only you see I can't unless you will too."

Tommy slowly turned over the penny in his hand, looking at it lingeringly; but at last he gave it to his brother.

"It's your birthday," he said; "we shall have some pudding for dinner, but he won't, I suppose." He spoke of the boy, not the bird.

Bertie ran back to where the lad stood, still holding the thrush in his hand.

"Will you let it fly for twopence," he said; "it's all the money we've got, but if you come to our house at dinner-time, I'll ask Ann to give you something to eat."

The boy looked at the twopence and then at the bird.

"Well, I dunno," he said slowly. "I've been thinking I might get fourpence for it to-morrow, even if I should not find the man to day."

"But you want some breakfast and dinner," said Bertie by way of argument.

"Didn't you say you'd give me some dinner?" insinuated the boy.

"Yes, I'll ask Ann about it, and I'm almost sure she will. But wouldn't you like to be kind to that poor bird?" added Bertie, questioningly.

"Oh, the bird won't hurt; whoever gets it will feed it well."

"But they'll shut it up in a cage to keep it from flying away," said Bertie.

"Of course they will; people don't buy birds to let 'em fly away agin."

"But I will, if you'll take my twopence and let it go," said Bertie, holding out his two bright new pennies.

"Well, you're a rum chap to part with your money for nothing like that. Look here, the bird won't hurt, I tell you; somebody's sure to buy it that's fond of 'em."

"But think of it being shut up in a little cage instead of flying about in the fields and among the trees. Why it's like putting boys into prison," added Bertie.

"What do you know about boys being put in prison?" fiercely demanded the young birdcatcher.

"I've heard about it from Ann; and I know I should not like to be shut up in a little room, and never run on the sands and climb up the cliffs again. And birds feel the same about their wings, as we do about our legs," replied Bertie calmly.

There was still a lingering gleam of suspicion in the boy's eyes as he looked keenly at Bertie; but the appeal to his love of freedom had evidently touched him.

"I shall lose tuppence by the bargain, if I lets him go for this," he said slowly, taking the money out of Bertie's outstretched hand.

"Ah, but think of being kind to the poor little bird," said Bertie joyfully, as he saw his money transferred to the boy's pocket.

"I'll make sure of that first," said the lad, with a knowing nod, "and you'd better take the bird, and then you can do as you like with it."

Bertie just took the poor frightened fluttering bird into his hand, but the next minute it was flying upwards towards the nearest tree to rest and recover from its fright, and the clumsy handling it had endured.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARGARETA COLBERG.

A TALE OF THE REFORMATION.

"WHO WANTS TO BURN THESE MEN?"

CHAPTER X.—AN ANXIOUS CHRISTMAS.

THE merry season of Christmas was just at hand, but few in Valenciennes felt joyous or inclined to mirth. There, as elsewhere in the Netherlands, men's minds were greatly perturbed. The struggle between people and king, between liberty and the Inquisition, was daily becoming more fierce, and the wise foresaw that it could only end in a death-grapple. Philip II. sat dark and gloomy in his far-away capital, like a morose spider in the middle of a gigantic web, and was fain to keep his eye upon all his millions of subjects. He had been told of the two heretics caught by his well-beloved and trusty Titelmann, and had especially commended the deed of this trusty well-beloved, exhorting him to persevere in the same path for the glory of God and the honour of the king. Philip expressing his satisfaction at the seizure of the pestilential heretics had intimated to his Regent sister his desire that they might forthwith be burnt. When the Duchess Margaret repeated to her council these gracious commands of His Majesty, Marquis Berghen, the stadtholder of Valenciennes, started up and very hotly exclaimed:

No. 1789.—AUGUST 11, 1888.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

"Madam! I do not see my way to burning two of my fellow-creatures on account of their beliefs."

It being impressed upon him that, when the king ordered, the faithful subject should hold no opinions of his own, this haughty noble declared that Philip was no king to him. His Majesty was sovereign in Spain no doubt, but he was only duke in Brabant, and count in Flanders, and if history spoke true a Berghen's name had been shouted on many a battle-field before Burgundy's standard was known. This happened at Brussels early in December, whence accounts were written to the Spanish monarch detailing the treasonable behaviour of Marquis Berghen. Philip was roused to extremest fury by the news. He sent back answers breathing fire and destruction to all heretics, or sympathizers with heretics. He even intimated that it might be a good thing to take off a noble head or two, Berghen's, by way of example; but the Duchess, better acquainted than her brother with the men she had to deal with, made haste to hide this private note in her very most secret cabinet. Before there was time however for this interchange of letters with Madrid, the Regent and her chief councillor, the Cardinal Granvelle, had determined to let the execution of the two prisoners take place in Valenciennes on New Year's Day, as a fit and fair beginning to the young year.

But what of the two prisoners about whom king, duchess, nobles and councillors were so busily writing all these weeks? Titelmann, as we have seen, lodged them in the strong tower which was known as the Moon. Having done this he left them to the care of his satellites and betook himself to Brussels. His departure relieved Bertrand from an intolerable dread, that, namely, of seeing him lay hands upon others besides the minister and Burgher Mallart. The tower occupied by the two prisoners was a semicircular edifice abutting on the street, whence the small grated window of their prison chamber could be readily seen. As soon as it became known that they were lodged in that particular cell, the low wall opposite the tower was never without a string of persons engaged in looking at their window. By-and-by friends came who exchanged greetings with them, and the minister was observed to extend his hands towards these latter in an attitude of blessing.

One evening, about ten days after their incarceration, a poor idiot boy, who had often experienced the charity of Mallart, espied his benefactor behind the barred window. He thereupon set up such a wild pantomime, expressive of his joy, that his gibbering and his antics speedily collected a large crowd in the street. This poor creature, who was popularly known as Tollchen, sprang upon a cart that stood hard by, with some confused idea perhaps of reaching the window. Foiled in this intention he began a rambling address to the crowd. In a high shrill voice he related how he had found his good master up there in a cage, pointing to the grated window, and how he had been set up there by the devil—the devil all in red with black cross-bones on his hood—a description which called forth laughter and angry shouts of Titelmann. The poor lad, excited by the noise, was becoming wilder and wilder in his gestures when Mallart coming close to the window called aloud, "Tollchen, Tollchen!"

The sound of the well-known voice made him pause in his capering, and turning around he knelt down on the top of the cart, lifting up his hands to Mallart with a pitiful gesture of supplication. Some soldiers from the guard stationed at the draw-bridge, who had come out with the intention of knocking the boy off the cart, stopped an instant to see what would happen next.

"Tollchen," said Mallart slowly and distinctly, "go home, my lad. Don't stay there, the soldiers will beat you, if you do. Go home, and Martha will give you some supper. Tell her the master sent her word to do so from behind the cage. Good night, go home."

The idiot was proceeding to get down very slowly when one of the soldiers gave him a shove with the butt-end of his lance. The lad slipped and fell to the ground, striking his head against the edge of the cart. The boy was greatly terrified and set up a dismal howl. The crowd answered by an angry murmur, and the teamster whipped up his horse so suddenly that he knocked down the lanzknecht with the shaft of his cart. For a moment a disturbance seemed imminent. The citizens hustled the soldiers about and broke one of their lances, while these latter, on the other hand, shouted loudly to their comrades at the gate to sally out and beat the Flemish dogs. Before this could be done, however, the citizens had disappeared down the side alleys much ruffled in temper.

There had been one unseen but deeply interested spectator of this little street drama. Bertrand, inwardly pondering over the task set before him by Margareta, had looked out at the first intimation of a disturbance and had therefore seen all that had passed. His room was situated exactly beneath that occupied by the two prisoners, so that he had ample opportunity for viewing the incident which was very significant to him. Ever since his last memorable visit to Margareta, his mind was constantly at work upon the one theme of how to liberate the prisoners. He had not seen her since that day, as he deemed it safer for them all that their names should not be associated in men's minds. Nevertheless he was not entirely without news from her. The day before, for example, he had received from her a little silken purse or case, worked daintily with a white marguerite. This was in return for a little Bible, which he had sent her, with the message, "I daily read one like this." Rosa had brought him the little packet in return, and had put it into his hand, with many a smile and nod, indicative of good-will and pleasure. He hurried to his room, and when he saw the sweet little emblem he kissed it rapturously for the sake of the dear fingers which had wrought it.

The day before Christmas the commander of the fortress, Louis von Brera, deputed his command to Bertrand, while he proceeded to Montéval to pass the day in suitable feasting with his friend the Baron of that name. The following morning a courier arrived from Brussels, with a Royal packet containing urgent and most important despatches for Louis von Brera, and also for the magistrates of Valenciennes. The commander summoned from his Christmas feast in all haste arrived in a fine rage, after his long ride in the driving snow. The packet contained orders from the Regent to have the two prisoners burnt on New Year's Day. Louis von Brera, was commanded to see that it was "duly and well accomplished to the enlightenment of the poor people, much led astray by those viperish perverters of the truth." All of which was greatly to add to the glory of God, the honour of the King, and the advancement of Louis von Brera. Orders were likewise given to the magistrates to command that the executions should take place, intimating that with the governor of the citadel would rest the responsibility of seeing them neatly and decorously accomplished without let or hindrance.

"How now!" exclaimed the dinnerless and thoroughly angry commandant, "Madam Regent thinks I can quell a furious mob as easily as she quiets her Italian pup by a kick of her royal foot. I would have her know if she wants men to be burnt she must send Spaniards to do it."

He was striding hastily up and down the apartment, while Bertrand sat at the table reading and re-reading the fatal orders in a dazed kind of way.

"Who wants to burn these men?" pursued the elder knight. I don't, nor does any honest Fleming. It is all the doing of these Spaniards. I hate them! Sneaking dogs! Why don't they bide in their own country, instead of coming here to suck our blood and filch our gold? My curse upon them! I would liefer burn a score of them than hurt a hair of honest Mallart's head."

Thus stormed the old man while Bertrand remained speechless. After another tramp down the room he returned to the table once more.

"What say you, Bertrand de Swarte? How will the people relish this New Year's show which our gracious Regent has ordered for their amusement?"

"Your excellency," said Bertrand rising, "will find it impossible to execute these orders without troops enough to overawe the city and protect the castle. The people will be beyond all control."

"I'll do none of it!" said the commandant stamping his foot. "I am a soldier, not an executioner. I'll to the Council House to speak with the magistrates, and you, De Swarte, do you attend me to do aught that may chance with the quill. I'm an old soldier, and write my letters with the sword. Good sooth! it writes a clear hand still," continued the veteran as he buckled his heavy belt around his ample waist. The two men proceeded through the snowy and deserted streets to the Council House where they found the magistrates already assembled and in great trepidation. The disagreeable walk had in nowise soothed the ruffled temper of the commander who began at once on entering the room:

"How now, good sirs? This is a fine Christmas greeting to us all from the Regent! What is the opinion of your worships? Can these men be burnt this day sennight without a riot?"

The magistrates were unanimous that it could not be safely attempted, and the result of their deliberation was a very humble remonstrance, which was signed by all and duly forwarded to the Regent, praying her to bear in mind their loyalty and devotion to herself and the King and at the same time begging her to reconsider her decision in the matter of the executions.

It soon became noised abroad what was the purport of the orders that the magistrates had received from Brussels. Then the citizens of Valenciennes swarmed into the streets in spite of the snowstorm and thronged about the castle. One would imagine the city had become Protestant to a man, the crowds were so large and appeared so angry and excited. In answer to their repeated calls, the minister came to his prison window and said something to them in a loud voice, but the trampling of feet and the driving storm prevented him from being understood by any, except those directly underneath. However, the sound of his voice and the sight of his face seemed to have a quieting effect upon the minds of the crowd, as shortly afterwards they began to disperse. By nightfall all were gone but five men who remained behind. They were clad in warm fur cloaks, and carried upon their shoulders long staves somewhat after the manner of lancers on guard. These men placed themselves in certain positions in the street whence they could command the best views of the grated window, and began pacing up and down after the manner of soldiers. At last it dawned upon the castle guard that this was a volunteer patrol sent by the citizens to keep watch over the prisoners and to give notice if they were secretly removed or if aught unusual happened at the prison.

And so Christmas night passed away in Valenciennes. The faithful guard was twice relieved during the night with perfect regularity, and the prisoners were each time challenged to know if "All was well?"

CHAPTER XI.—THE KING COMMANDS.

THE long weary winter had at length given place to spring, and still the two dear faces, very pale and worn now, looked from the small window down upon the anxious crowds below. Each day the minister had addressed some words of advice or encouragement to his open-air congregation. Never had words of his so stirred the hearts of his hearers as those which he uttered from his iron-bound pulpit. At first but a few score came to the window; later on they thronged thither in hundreds, and as the kind-hearted commandant, Louis von Brera, refused to hear or see anything amiss in all this, the preaching continued without interruption. The people's guard had watched all through the dark nights of the winter, and by day women, children, and old men, the weak and the aged, all crowded to listen to the minister's words of love and wisdom. They had watched and prayed through the snows of winter, through a stormy, blustering March, and now it was the first week of April, and the face of Nature began to smile and look bright.

To the casual observer everything seemed as usual. Men worked at their trades, women went and came about their business, little children played in the streets. All the town was quiet, but it was the quiet of a fierce watch-dog lying still with eyes intent upon some suspicious object. Let the thing but move one inch and the dog will spring.

Suddenly, without any warning, the gates of the city were opened one Sunday afternoon and a small body of troops entered. Fifty swarthy halberdiers came marching in with the steady tramp of the famous Spanish infantry, and the sound of their footsteps echoed painfully in the hearts of the citizens. The advent of these Spaniards boded no good to the imprisoned men. Like ill-omened birds of prey they were known to gather wherever there was bloody work to be done.

The people in great alarm hurried to the citadel. Soon the newly-arrived soldiers began to show their dark faces at the castle gate. They jeered at the citizens and bade them guard their friends close and straight, and see if they could keep their breath in their heretic bodies in spite of gentle Peter Titelmann: bade them bring water—turn in the river—and see if it would quench the fires deserved by such accursed ones. Taunts such as these did not tend to allay the fears of the people. Add to this the fact, which soon became known, that the commandant, Louis von Brera, had received an express from the Regent, and after reading the same had refused to eat his dinner—a most portentous omen—and it may be imagined how uneasy was Valenciennes on that Sunday afternoon in April.

Next morning a placard was displayed on the door of the Council House. This document, emblazoned and sealed with all possible splendour of royal arms and wax, set forth how closely the happiness of the people of Valenciennes lay to the heart of their king and master, and how it had grieved that kingly heart to learn of their having been led astray by some accursed and most pestilential heretics, sons of the devil, chief among whom were Francis Mallart and one Faveau, mis-called minister; and how considering all these circumstances, his Benign Majesty had of his goodness ordered these men to be burned in the market-place of his good city of Valenciennes on the twenty-seventh day of that month of April, which would be Saturday. All of which was especially ordained for the good and well-being of his dearly-beloved subjects. The paper was duly signed by a large sprawling "Margaret, Regent." The magistrates having refused to sanction the execution, the order had come from the central government at Brussels.

Side by side with this proclamation was another intimating that the command of Valenciennes would be taken by Don Pedro da Silla, captain of the Aragon halberdiers, for the space of one week, to enable the trusty and well-beloved Louis von Brera to seek a little rest and refreshing of his health, much impaired by the rigours of the winter. So, cried the people, the governor was to be replaced by the blood-thirsty Spaniard because he was not favourable to the executions. The noble and gallant chevalier Bertrand de Swarte was likewise to recruit his health for the space of one week, so that none, said the people, might be left to interfere with Don Pedro and his burnings.

The news of these placards spread like wild-fire through the city, carrying terror and dismay to many hearts, but only serving to deepen in some the determination to defeat so detestable a project.

The moment Bertrand heard of his leave he proceeded to take advantage of it in his own way. The honest old commander wished Bertrand to accompany him to Montéval to forget it all in a week's merry feasting, but, much to his disgust, the young man said he was quite unable to go to Montéval. He did not say where he was going, and no one knew, for he disappeared from the castle that same evening and was not seen again by any of his comrades in arms.

The morning of the 27th of April broke dark and lowering over Valenciennes. Heavy black clouds seemed to try to hide from the face of the sun the direful deed which was to be done that day. At earliest dawn men were seen in the Market Place, some working, some idling about. The workers were fitting up stages, driving in low palisades, and erecting two rather high piles of light dry wood around a couple of posts. The posts were young green trees full of sap with the bark just stripped—young green trees full of sap burn slowly, and were calculated to stand firm in the flames long after the throbbing quivering bodies of those bound to them had been burnt to black cinders.

The idlers in the square were mostly young men of sturdy limb who walked listlessly about, apparently taking little note of the proceedings of the workers, save when two or three of them happened to meet out of earshot of every one else. Then these listless idlers exchanged rapid eager words, with flashing eyes, and orders seemed to be issued by one among them, a miller with a large flapping hat, of very dusty exterior, and who was more listless if possible than all the rest. After a while, before it was fully daylight, these young men sauntered away, and the crowd began to collect.

This awful day found Margareta in an agony of despair. She had hoped desperately from day to day during the week to hear of an escape. But the days passed by and the suffering faces of the beloved prisoners were still seen behind the prison-bars. The minister was more prayerful, more gentle, more loving than ever now that his life seemed on the point of passing away. What time was not spent beneath the prison window Margareta passed in a mute agony of prayer in her chamber. She remained hours upon her knees with clasped hands, but no audible sound escaped her pale compressed lips. Those who saw the bright merry girl at the Michaelmas Fair only a few months ago would never have recognised her in the pale stricken woman with those large pitiful eyes who moved about Simon Colberg's house without speaking.

Beta van Oost had been with the poor girl several times during this terrible week in the hope of comforting her and perhaps of rousing her from the despairing state into which she seemed to have fallen. That vehement little woman found no small relief to her own feelings in pouring out a torrent of wrath against all the Spaniards, both at home and when in Margareta's presence.

"Those miserable wretches!" she exclaimed the day before that appointed for the execution, "I saw them arrive looking so fierce with their black eyebrows and beards as if they would like to kill and eat us all. And that oily Don Pedro! He is to be left in command instead of good honest Flemish knights. Ugh! I hate the man! He tried to get brother Johann into trouble at Cambray. Tried to make him talk treason in order that he might then betray the poor lad. He is a viper, is Don Pedro. He said my friend would miss her cavalier now. I don't know what he meant. I wonder who he meant, do you know, Margareta?"

"No," answered she whom Beta addressed, looking vaguely about like one scarce awakening from a horrible dream. "I did not hear what friend you said."

"Ah, you poor darling," cried Beta throwing her arms around her friend's neck and kissing her white cold cheeks, "you are breaking your heart over this. I wish that you had never been a Protestant, for then you would have been only very enraged to-day like me, which is quite healthful, whereas you look as if your heart was broken."

"I think it is," said Margareta looking away.

She remained silent a long time, while Beta looked longingly at her, cudgelling her small brains for some means whereby to console her dear, sweet Margareta.

At length the latter spoke again, in the same dreary lifeless hopeless voice as if her life were going out of her and leaving nothing but a soulless frame to do duty as a woman.

"Beta, I want you to do something for me—to-morrow," the last word came with a gasp.

"Yes, dear, tell me what it is. I will do anything, everything you want," replied Beta.

"I want to go to your house and see the——; see it, and I want you to stay with me."

"Daughter," said Dame Colberg with tender solicitude, "is it well for thee to go?"

"Mother," said the poor girl going to her and throwing herself on her knees before her mother, "I must go. I shall die if I stay here through that dreadful day. Oh, I can't bear it."

"Do as seems to thee best, my daughter," said the mother infinitely sorrowful, yet powerless to soothe or comfort her child.

A TALK WITH COUSIN MABEL ABOUT PERFECTION.

BY E. J. WHATELY, AUTHOR OF "COUSIN MABEL'S SKETCHES OF CHARACTER."

I.

"I AM so glad they are all gone!" said my young friend Katie Wynyard, when the last straggler of a little missionary working party, who had lingered with more "last words" after the rest had departed, had finally gathered up her various belongings and closed the door of my sitting-room, leaving the speaker and myself the only inmates. "I thought that good Mrs. Long would never take herself off, and I was so wanting to have a little talk with you, dear Miss Selwyn."

"Well, my dear, I am quite free and at your service, if you like to stay and have a 'crack,' as our old Scotch friend used to say. I knew you had something on your mind; you have not looked your old self to-day. I hope there is nothing wrong at home?"

Katie, I should say, has a rather anxious home-life; having an invalid and rather incapable mother, a busy, hard-worked father, and being the only daughter beyond the age of childhood, all the family burdens have come on her young shoulders, and I must say she carries them in a brave, cheerful, unselfish spirit; and if occasionally flashes of a naturally impetuous temper may show themselves, it is not often. She is a useful and also a happy person, who gets more real enjoyment out of her busy, self-denying life, than many girls who have far more of what is called pleasure. To-day, however, the usually bright, happy face was clouded, and its expression told of some real care.

"Oh, no; all is quite as well as usual at home; it is only my own trouble. There is a question I should like to ask."

"Well, dear, what is it?"

"Did you ever know, dear Miss Selwyn, of any one who prayed constantly again and again for something quite certain to be according to God's will, and yet never got an answer?"

"I have seen plenty of cases where it seemed so for a time," said I.

"And why was it, do you think?"

"Generally, I believe, from one of two causes: either we ask for a right thing in the wrong way, or we expect the answer to come in our way instead of God's, and so fancy it withheld because we look in the wrong direction."

"I wonder which is my case?"

"If you could tell me a little more, perhaps I could help you."

"I will. Mine—I mean my subject of prayer—was wishing to overcome sin and live more becoming a Christian. I have been feeling, lately especially, that it is such a disgrace for those who do believe and look to Christ for daily strength to resist their sins, to be so continually beaten as we—at least—I am. And I was sure that there was a mistake somewhere—at least I heard something which I thought would set it right, but I seem more puzzled than ever now."

"On that very point?"

"Yes; I will explain. You know what a friend of mine Eleanor Fordyce is? I don't think you know her well, for she lives far from you, and is often away and always busy, but you have heard of her?"

"I have, very often, as a very useful, active Christian worker."

"Yes, that is just what she is. Whenever I have time for work of that kind, you know, outside home, it has always been with her I have gone, and she has been a great help and comfort and adviser to me; she is much older than I. Well, she had been a long time at N——, where she always stays a good deal, and the Sunday after she came back I was going to the Sunday school and morning service as usual at the —— street church (Mr. Benson's), where I and so many of our friends on that side of the bridge go, and where she was always to be found. To my great surprise, I met Eleanor coming the opposite way. I could hardly believe my eyes; but she told me she had given up —— street church and Sunday school because she did not agree with Mr. Benson's views on some points, and she now meant always to go to a chapel of ease a little way off where Mr. Lowndes preached."

"I have heard of him; I believe he is a very powerful preacher."

"She said no one was like him, she thought; she wanted me to accompany her there, but, of course, I could not leave my school; however, I went in the evening, and Mr. Lowndes did preach a beautiful sermon on Christian holiness, and said many things which struck me very much. He said that Christ was as able and willing to free us from the power as from the guilt of sin, and that we often quite forget that. Don't you think that is true?"

"Indeed I do; we cannot keep it too much in mind, that all must be His work, in us as well as for us."

"I began to think this was just the key to my difficulties; but then he went on to say some more things I did not understand, and then he announced a sermon on the Monday evening, at a kind of meeting he holds at his house, when he said he would follow up the subject. It was a free evening with me, fortunately, and I went with Eleanor; but I was very much puzzled by his sermon. I wonder what you would have thought of it?"

"Tell me what he said."

"He told us, not only that God would overcome sin in us, but that we ought, if we had faith to believe it, to be ever really dead to sin, so that what would once have tempted us would actually lose completely all its power, and we should have no fight at all to carry on, just, he said, 'as I can pass by those glittering, gay shops in the High Street, and never think of wishing for the contents; they are as if they did not exist for me—so it would be with sin.'"

"I believe," I said, "that as we overcome our besetting sin day by day, the temptation to sin will become less and less. Just as it was said of David and his enemies that year by year he 'waxed stronger,' and his enemies weaker, so it should be with Christians."

"Yes; but Mr. Lowndes meant more than that, as I said. He said we should come to a state in which we could feel that sin is absolutely dead within us altogether, and our hearts be altogether free from it; and he urged us to seek this blessing and never be content if we fell short of it. We were to pray and wait on God, and consecrate ourselves wholly to Him, and give up anything which might be a hindrance, even though innocent in itself, and the blessing would come. He mentioned several persons, and he seemed to mean himself too, who, after such full consecration of themselves to God, and waiting on Him, felt a most wonderful peace and joy come upon them, and felt then and afterwards, quite raised above all temptation.

"I was very much stirred up. I asked Eleanor, as we went home, and she said she had found it so, and there was no reason why I should not have the blessing that very night. So I determined I would seek for it and try, and I did pray very long and earnestly, and try to give myself to God, and asked if there were anything I ought to give up or change in my way of life, that I might do it at once. I could not think of anything except trying to keep my temper when I get provoked, and that was just what I wanted strength to enable me to do. But no change came; I waited and hoped I should feel something; but no, it was just the same; I felt no difference. I thought if I went to sleep on it, as it were, I might wake next morning, as some had done I was told of, with a feeling of calm and rest and new power; but no! I only woke feeling very tired with having been up so late, and very much afraid I had overslept myself, and so I had. I was late downstairs for breakfast; papa was annoyed, and everything went wrong; he had to go to his office in a hurry, and it was altogether what we used to call 'a day of misfortunes.'"

"No very uncommon case, dear, with us all."

"It was no real excuse, I know; I don't think I actually broke down, but I felt cross, and I am afraid I spoke impatiently both to the cook and the little ones, and had to bite my lips not to say more. The whole day I felt wrong, and I was very much humbled and determined to try again, and ever since I have been praying for the change to come, but it doesn't; all seems just the same. I have not got the blessing!"

"Did you ask your friend about it?"

"Yes; she asked me if there was anything that I ought to give up that hindered me. I could not remember anything. Then, she said it must be my want of faith; if God was able and willing to help us, and we were willing to be helped, what should prevent His doing it? I said, I knew my faith was weak, but I thought I truly believed all this. She said I ought to be sure I should get the blessing, and it must come; the fault must be in me. I can say I am willing and longing for the blessing; but"—and the tears choked her voice—"there seems none for me."

"Don't be discouraged, dear, you have not yet found the right way out of your troubles; but you will yet, I am sure. Have you seen Mr. Lowndes since? Were you able to speak to him?"

"I went with Eleanor to some meetings last week which he and one or two friends had been holding. I had no opportunity of speaking or being introduced to him, so many were round him; but I heard a great deal, some of which was, I am sure, very true and good, but other things which not only puzzled me but seemed, I hope it is not wrong to say so, rather presumptuous. One person said, his mind was always the same as the Lord's mind. I could not think how any one could venture to say that, but when I asked Eleanor, she said I quite misunderstood him, and perhaps I did, I don't know. I told her Mr. Benson, who always seemed to me the best and holiest man I ever knew, always spoke so humbly about himself. She said he took very low views of the sanctifying power of grace, and that he chose to be 'left out in the cold,' and would not seek the blessing others had received, so it was no use asking him. It puzzled me more than ever, and when I tried to defend Mr. Benson, Eleanor seemed quite annoyed, and I think she thinks I am not really in earnest. Oh, Miss Selwyn, could you tell me what there is wrong which keeps me back? Is it that I am not really consecrated, as Eleanor says?"

"I think, dear child, that a good deal of misapprehension exists about that very word. Some people speak of consecrating themselves to God as if they were free to do it or not as they chose, just as the Israelites might bring their gold and jewels and purple, etc., for the tabernacle in the wilderness, as a free offering, or not, as they would. But nothing we have is really our own; we have been 'bought with a price,' the price of the blood of our Saviour; we can only give Him what is His already. What these persons mean, I think, is consciously and willingly offering our bodies and souls as a 'living sacrifice' to Him."

"Yes, and I mean and wish to do that; but I am constantly told I must be keeping back something. But, indeed, I do ask to be shown if I am."

"And such an honest prayer cannot fail to be answered, dear Katie. 'Cleanse me from secret faults,' is the prayer of the inspired Psalmist, and it should be our daily prayer too. Only we must not be content with making it once for all, and thinking the work is done. That is the mistake some make about self-consecration. They think it is one act, instead of which it needs to be renewed day by day. David surely consecrated himself when he made that prayer in Psalm xix. and yet he suffered himself to be off his guard and fell into grievous sin when he forgot to renew that petition."

"Only it is so difficult to know whether one is carrying it out really, when one has prayed and made resolutions. Some people say one ought to put away all one's ornaments, or leave off singing songs that are not sacred, or playing games, or such things, and that then one is really consecrated and has full peace—but you see, with me there does not seem to be anything of this kind I ought to do. I have no ornaments that would fetch five shillings if I sold them, except the locket with father's and mother's hair, which I could not part with without vexing them seriously; then, if I did not sing and play to father in the evening, and play tennis and chess with the boys, and so on, it would make home disagreeable to them and do harm instead of doing good. Then we have no gaieties, at least what would be called so here; our going out is only to visits and 'afternoon teas,' and such things which for me come under the head of social duties, as I have to replace mother and take her part amongst our acquaintance; and my time is so filled I could not go in for much of mere amusement, if I wished. And yet, Eleanor keeps saying, I must have something to give up."

"I will tell you, dear Katie. There is something, it is true. I believe what you and your friend, and a great many of us, have to give up is, not our lockets, or songs, or games, or visits, but something a great deal more difficult and less easily perceived—our own will. What we want, is to be willing to get the blessing we seek in God's way, not our own. I speak from experience, both of my own and that of others. We are very often just like the Jews who were always calling for a sign from heaven, and would not be satisfied with the proofs Christ gave them."

"But what sort of sign could I have been seeking?"

"Just what you were speaking of—a feeling of peace and calm coming over you, or some other kind of sense of a great change being wrought in you—something which you could define at the moment, as a distinct and sensible answer to your prayer."

"And so many have had that answer!" sighed Katie.

"Granted; but it does not follow, even so, that the same kind of answer is given to all, or would be fit and desirable for all. Some of God's prophets, and even some who were not themselves prophets, were allowed to see such a heavenly sign as the Jews wished for—like Elisha and his servant with the chariots of fire; but the fault of the Jews in our Lord's time was in insisting on this kind of sign being given to them when they had already what ought to have convinced them."

"But they had the miracles of healing, and the feeding the multitudes, and many such wonders. But we do not live in the age of miracles. What have we?"

"Not signs of that kind, I allow. But is it no sign, dear, that you are wishing and longing for the power of God to conquer sin in you? Could that desire come from your natural heart? When we are led perseveringly and earnestly to seek such blessings as these from the Lord, it must be because He implanted the desire in us, and is leading us to Himself in this very way. And after all, this is a much surer sign than any frames of mind or feelings could be; for the feelings might come from mere excitement, and the calm felt might be reaction from long mental struggles; but the desire after holiness must come from God."

"Yes, but the desire is not enough, unless it is carried into practice, and sin overcome."

"No, it is only a pledge of 'more to follow.' But has God ever promised that sin would be conquered in a moment; and is it like His dealings in other things? If you have been ill and take a tonic to restore your strength, do you feel strong again the moment you have swallowed it? Sometimes for days there is no perceptible effect, till after a while you look back and find you are able to do now what you could not do some time before; but it is only in this way the progress can generally be perceived."

"Yes, that is quite true; but I have not even this comfort, for I can't look back and say I am able to stand temptations I could not bear last week or the week before."

"Perhaps not, at first; but you may be making progress for all that, without its being recognised by you. Remember it is much easier to measure our increase of physical than of moral strength; and again, it is much easier to judge in cases where outward sins have to be put down at once, as with those who are tempted to drink, or steal, or gamble, than with the inward difficulties most of us have to contend with, such as movements of pride, or temper, or self-seeking. It must take much longer before any one can judge of these sins being in the way to become subdued; and in our own case, we may probably be the last to find it out. Perhaps it would make us self-confident and careless if we could do so sooner."

"But, then, Eleanor says, that is putting a limit to God's will and power to overcome sin in us. It cannot be His will that any sin should remain unsubdued, even for a moment. There can be no need that we should fall, even to keep us humble."

"No; certainly. It is our fault for not bringing the power of grace sufficiently to bear on the evil, which prevents our conquering. We must never lose sight of that. But we cannot judge of the way in which God may be pleased to cure us of our sin-sickness. In the case of pardon for sin and reconciliation with Him, the only condition required is our acceptance of His mercy, the hand of faith stretched out to receive the blessing, and this may be done in a moment. But the overcoming sin in ourselves, which is equally a part of His work of salvation—for He sent His Son to save us from sin in both ways—requires not only acceptance, but co-operation on our part, a willingness to follow His commandments and consciously to yield our members as instruments of righteousness to Him. We are to work under Him, and with Him, because He works in us to will and to do of His good pleasure."

"But could not God do the work in us at once, without our bearing any part?"

"Yes; but the question is, what His will is, and not what we should think desirable or likely beforehand."

"But Eleanor says, a will should be utterly and completely lost in His—passive, so that it does not exist at all."

"The question is, does the Scripture say so? I do not see how the putting on the armour of God is consistent with a paralysed, annihilated will. It seems more like the allegory of Bunyan's 'Holy War,' where the will is represented as the former enemy enlisted in the king's service and becoming an active soldier under him instead of against him. But I think our time is up now; you and I have both engagements, I know; but come to me, if you are free, this time to-morrow, and we will finish our talk."

THE CONGO AND ITS MISSIONS.

BY THE REV. W. HOLMAN BENTLEY, AUTHOR OF "THE DICTIONARY AND GRAMMAR OF THE CONGO LANGUAGE."

I.

TWO years have passed since our last chapters on the Congo were penned, meanwhile the exploration and development of the whole region has been going on apace. The mission steamer the Peace has traversed most of the available waterways of importance, and the Rev. G. Grenfell with rare ability has prepared, in elaborate charts, the results of his careful and constant observation. So well has the work been done, and so valuable is the information collected over the vast area, that the Royal Geographical Society awarded their gold medal for the year 1887 to Mr. Grenfell. But these journeys were not undertaken in the interests of pure geography; we have now the information he went to get, we possess a good idea of the field to be evangelized, the strategic points to be occupied, the direction and value of the waterways, the distribution of the peoples.

Here then is the sum of his report: "What we know of the Congo and its tributaries proves it to be one of the most wonderful systems of natural canals on the face of the globe. If we take a quarter of a million of square miles occupying the central portion of the basin of the Congo we can find no place within that area more than fifty miles away from one of the navigable arteries. If we extend that area to half a million square miles we cannot reach any point more than one hundred miles away from one of the navigable channels in communication with Stanley Pool." "Six thousand miles of waterway."

But death has been busy in the ranks of the are very favourably impressed with the quiet white men who have come to tell them about Diyanza.

Bishop Taylor's Congo Missionaries arrived in 1886, a much smaller band than that which is working in Angola. Their base is now at the old station of the International Association at Vivi. A large steamer for them is out, and it is expected that it will take some two years to mission, and the founding of stations has made but slow progress in consequence. The Livingstone Mission which has been handed over to the American Baptist Missionary Union has one station above Stanley Pool at the Equator, where a good knowledge of the language has been acquired. The Baptist Missionary Society of England has also one station beyond the Pool, at Lokoele (Lukolela). There in the dense forest which lines the banks, near to the native towns, the study of Kibangi is progressing and the people transport it and the necessary stores. The field that they have chosen as their sphere of labour is the Kasai; they have a station on Stanley Pool at Kimpoko, but nothing beyond. Theirs is regarded as a self-supporting mission or rather as an attempt at Christian colonization. At Kimpoko the missionaries have partly supported themselves by hunting the fast disappearing hippopotamus, and selling the carcases to the natives; with the proceeds they have assisted their stores, buying their food with the brass rods thus obtained. They have not passed yet into the self-supporting stage, whether they will ever be able to be independent is still a great question. It is difficult to understand how a white man can earn his living and raise his food with his own hands in Central Africa and be able at the same time to do much missionary work. Those of us who have every assistance from home feel that we have far too little time and energy to devote directly to the great work to which we are called.

KINGUNGI REEF, KWANGO RIVER.

The other band of the Bishop's folk in Angola have mastered some of the difficulties of the early days, and have established themselves in several places. Where there are many white men, as in that Portuguese colony, it is possible for a handy man to get on who can mend watches, sole boots, do some carpentry, use a soldering iron, or the like, and so they manage there. From Benguela the American Mission is working its way into the interior, and slow but sure progress is being made. At Gaboon the troubles of the American Mission have resulted in the transfer of the mission to the Missionary Society of the Reformed Church of France, the same society which supports M. Coillard on the Upper Zambeze.

The American missionaries had conducted excellent schools, and many of their scholars could use English well, but altogether the influence of the mission was too "English" to please the officials of that French colony. They saw the French influence making little, if any progress; and while English, German, and American houses flourished, somehow or other the French houses did not achieve such good success. The American Mission, with its English speaking, was regarded as the root and source of the evil, and it was persistently harassed until work was effectually brought to a standstill. Now the French Protestant Mission has undertaken the work, and the officials regard with favour the potent French influence thus introduced. It is a repetition of the difficulties of the Baptist Mission at the Cameroons which has resulted in the work there being transferred to a German mission.

It is a very open question as to whether it is advisable for a mission to teach largely and thoroughly the English language to the natives of a colony of another European power. Why should English be taught at all out of British colonies? Would our officials, at the Cape, where the Boer element gives so much trouble, view with pleasure the activities of a powerful Dutch mission teaching widely to the natives of the Colony the Dutch language? This is the real cause of this hounding out of English and American missions from the Gaboon and Cameroons. True, no German colony had pre-existed at the Cameroons, it was a new annexation, but the same principle underlay the action of the officials.

This helps us to understand these arbitrary and relentless expulsions, although in no way to excuse them.

May we not learn a lesson from these things? Instead of teaching English to a few to enable them to read (?) our English Christian literature, should we not make it our business as missionaries to give a Christian literature in the native language? Would not that after all be a surer, more effective, assistant in the elevation of the people? It would avoid such complications in the future. Teaching a foreign language is certainly a work of supererogation. Half the energy spent in teaching English would supply the needed literature in the vernacular.

May the French Mission be abundantly blessed, and may its directors and missionaries have the grace and energy given them to push into the interior, and take up the work of the evangelization of the French-Congo districts.

The pioneer of another mission has lately reached Stanley Pool, Mr. G. Wilmot-Brooke, who is seeking to reach the Central Soudan by way of the Mobangi or one of the northern affluents; he is accompanied by Selim Wilson, a Christian Dinka, who has received training at Harley House College. If Mr. Brooke is able to penetrate those regions viâ the Congo, a regular mission is to be established and the work of evangelizing the Mohammedan States of the Southern Soudan pushed on, before contact with "Christian" traders or "Christian" powers has produced an impression unfavourable to Christianity. It is a great enterprise which will be followed with lively interest.

The Roman Catholic missions at San Salvador, Mboma and Linzolo (near Stanley Pool) are maintained. A new station is to be built at Brazzaville on a large scale. The station at Kiva mouth is likely to be transferred to French soil. Cardinal Lavigerie sent a band of his Algerian missionaries to the Upper River. They settled at Kiva mouth, twenty minutes distant from the French Catholic Mission there, and much bitterness of feeling existed between them. At the end of 1886, orders came from Rome for their return, so the Algerian Frères have left the Congo. A great college is to be erected in Belgium for the instruction and preparation of Belgian Catholic missionaries who will be coming out in a year or two to work in the Congo Free State. Politically there has been considerable development.

The Congo Free State (État Indépendant du Congo) has now this long time been recognised by the European Powers, and King Leopold has become its sovereign, although there is no connection between the State and Belgium, everything being entirely distinct.

Governor-General Camille Janssen is assisted by a small council on the Congo, but the seat of government is at Brussels. The seat of administration is at Mboma. The organisation of the State, creation of departments, appointments of officials, promulgation of laws, decrees and regulations are well advanced.

The State has entered the International Postal Union, and a parcel post delivers as far as Mboma and Matadi.

A currency is being struck, the copper coins having a hole pierced in the centre to allow of their being kept by the natives on a string. There exists a small standing army, trained Bangalas and Hausas.

Above Stanley Pool, the State has a fine station at Bangala (Iboko), another at Luebo on the Upper Kasai. The other small ports of the old International Association have been abandoned as unnecessary. The natives are quiet and well disposed, and the necessity for watching the movements of the French officials has ceased since the recognition of the State by the French Government.

The State established a post of vigilance at Stanley Falls, in the hope of checking the slave hunting on the Upper Congo by Tipu Tib and other Arab marauders.

The post was all too weak to withstand the force which the Arabs could bring to bear upon it.

A dispute arose over a woman who, fleeing for her life from her cruel Arab master, sought the protection of the State. After sharp fighting which lasted several days, the ammunition was exhausted, and the State force retired under cover of night; one Belgian officer was drowned, and an Englishman was picked up by a State steamer sent to his relief in a most destitute condition, some days later.

The Arabs are now strongly established as far as the mouth of the Lomami (Lubila-Loomi) River. The State thus has its Arab question, and a very grave one too. Tipu Tib was away at Zanzibar when the fight occurred. As soon as the news of the loss of the "Falls Station" reached Europe Mr. Stanley was telegraphed for by King Leopold, the sovereign of the Free State.

At the same time Junker brought tidings of Emin Bey, governor of the Egyptian province of Wadelai, who had long been shut off from the outer world. He was holding on amid many difficulties, and badly needed supplies; he had with him some sixty or seventy tons of ivory.

Seeing that the English Government was for the time managing the affairs of Egypt, it was felt that in some measure it was a national duty to attempt the relief of Emin and his garrison. No military expedition could be sent, but a committee of gentlemen induced Mr. Stanley to take the command of a relief expedition. Accordingly he started early in 1887 on a twofold errand; viz., to relieve Emin, now Emin Pacha, and to treat with full powers with Tipu Tib for the recovery of the Falls Station.

He found him at Zanzibar, and as the best way to check the Arabs, gave their leader a State appointment. It was arranged that Tipu Tib should be commissioner for the Stanley Falls division, the State flag should be respected, the Arabs hindered from raiding on the River, and that a European official should be appointed to the Falls as resident. For these services Tipu Tib was to receive an allowance of £30 per month.

Tipu professes to be anxious to stop the raids and to see a legitimate trade established; he says that he has been wicked and cruel in his past days, but he is getting old now and must become a good Moslem. "If a man did not become religious by the time he is forty he is never likely to." It remains to be seen how far Tipu Tib will carry out all these good promises and resolutions, and whether he will even be able, if he wishes it, to turn back the flood of Arab slavers. Apart from the establishment of a sufficient force of European soldiers it is the most promising scheme yet suggested, desperate as it is.

Mr. Stanley decided finally on the Congo route to Wadelai, where Emin Pacha was living.

Leaving Zanzibar February 23 the expedition reached Banana March 18. On April 20 Mr. Stanley arrived at Stanley Pool with some 750 men, including Tipu Tib and his retinue. Food was very scarce in the country, and the influx of such a number of people completely exhausted the supply and famine became imminent. Some hippopotami were shot and helped to victual the expedition.

Only one of the State steamers was available to transport this great crowd of men. The English Baptist Mission, at Mr. Stanley's urgent request, and seeing the desperate condition of things, granted the use of their steamer the Peace. She was in dock under repair after several months' running; but the repairs were pushed on with the utmost despatch and in ten days she was ready. The steamer of the American Mission could not be placed at Mr. Stanley's disposition, as the missionary in charge was then starting down country, neither had he any authority to charter her; Mr. Stanley's request was therefore refused. Under the trying circumstances in which he found himself placed, Mr. Stanley seized the steamer and compelled a charter. The missionaries yielded to superior force, and thus Mr. Stanley was in possession of a fleet large enough to transport his great expedition.

I recall these facts, long since familiar to English readers, in order to preserve the continuity of my narrative. Mr. Stanley started from Stanley Pool May 1, and reached the Yambuya Falls of the Aruwimi River June 19, sending on the Henry Reed under command of Major Barttelot to Stanley Falls with Tipu Tib. Tipu was well received by his friends, but there was a large raiding force under Said-bin-Habub, on the point of starting. The steamer did not remain at the Falls, so we do not yet know how Tipu gets over his first difficulties, or how far he means to keep his word. He did not send his promised gang of men to aid Mr. Stanley, but this may be due to his need of all his available force rather than to bad faith.

The Henry Reed returned to Mr. Stanley's entrenched camp on the Aruwimi, and a few days later the expedition started inland, leaving a sufficient force to protect the camp and its stores. Mr. Stanley was heard of after ten days progressing favourably, but in great straits for food; for the next news we wait with anxious interest.

HENRI LASSERRE.

M. LASSERRE is known to most English readers as the author of a French version of the Four Gospels which received the Pope's malediction twelve months and fifteen days after it had received his benediction.[1] Many readers will be pleased, I think, to learn something more than has yet been made public in England regarding this Frenchman who seems to have started so suddenly into fame.

The full name is Paul Joseph Henri de Monzie-Lasserre, but the author is simply known as "Henri Lasserre." He was born at Carlux (Dordogne) on the 25th of February, 1828, and is therefore now a little over sixty years of age. He is descended from an ancient family of Bourgogne, a branch of which established itself at Perigord some time during the 15th century. The Lasserre family seem to have been endowed with qualities of head and heart that have secured for them an abiding place in the affections of their neighbours.

Henri's father was a distinguished physician and professor in the medical college at the port of Toulon. His mother's name was Christine Regnaud. She had been early left an orphan, but in the home of her guardian, the Comte de Fermes, she became acquainted with the most distinguished persons at the close of the earlier empire. By her accomplishments and transparent simplicity she lent a charm to the brilliant society in which she moved. Like a sunbeam shedding light around her, she moved unsullied among the social exigences of her station.

Dr. Lasserre found Christine Regnaud the sweet and artless flower among her gorgeous surroundings. Their tastes were similar, their hearts were one, and in the year 1818 they were married. They resolved that they would devote themselves to helping others. He gave up his professorship at Toulon, and transplanted his young and happy wife to a little farm at Coux, on the banks of the Dordogne.

Dr. Lasserre and his bride, on their retirement from the conspicuous positions which they were so well qualified to adorn, did not settle down into sentimental seclusion or luxurious indolence. They resolved that they would support themselves by the produce of their farm, and for thirty years they lived in frugal comfort by the result of their own industry.

The famous physician of Toulon did not sink into a mere agriculturist. For thirty years he placed his healing skill at the service of rich and poor in his neighbourhood without other recompense than the consciousness of doing good. Whenever calamity darkened a home, Dr. Lasserre arrived intent on beating back the darkness.

The bruised and mangled, the fever-stricken and dying, looked up with trust and love into the face of the eminent physician who bent over them and did his best to alleviate their pain. In his offices of mercy he was generally accompanied by his high-born French wife, whose indefinable charm of manner, backed up by an inexhaustible grace of pity and a deliberate sweetness of mercy, won for her the respectful reverence and lasting devotion of all who came within the sphere of her influence.

Living by their own practical industry and supplying the daily bread of their rustic home by the labour of their own hands, they had hearts and leisure from themselves to soothe and sympathize.

One who has a right to speak on the subject says:—

"This excellent couple have gone to their rest, but their memory is still as fresh as if it were only yesterday that they had been snatched from the love and veneration of their fellow-creatures. The people in whose society they lived and moved still recall with benedictions their deeds, their counsels, their words, still commemorate their innumerable benefits; and the youth of the land glory in being the descendants of those who were the objects of the tender affectionate regard of the Lasserre family."

Henri Lasserre spent his childhood and youth in this home of loving deeds, and now, when his fame has gone forth beyond the horizon of France, he has retired to the green fields and rustic home by the banks of the Dordogne consecrated by the lowly services of his ancestors.

On the authority of the Paris correspondent of the "Gazette de Bruxelle," who professed familiar acquaintanceship with Henri Lasserre, he has come to be spoken of incorrectly as a colonel of artillery. He completed his law studies in 1851, and in the year of the coup d'état he was called to the bar in Paris.

Ten years later he was the brilliant and chivalrous champion of the cause of Poland. What Henri Lasserre did he did with all his might, and he not only wrote with great force in favour of the downtrodden nation, but he undertook a mission to Rome, and was influential in inducing the Pope to look with favour on the people struggling to be free. His views at the time are embodied in a book entitled "La Pologne et la Catholicité."

He was for a time editor of the "Réveil" and "Pays," but he ceased to edit the "Pays" when the Imperial Government ceased to act in harmony with his views.

On his return from Rome he published "The Gospel according to Rénan," a successful reply to the "Vie de Jésus." The little book ran through twenty-eight editions in one year. About a dozen other books flowed from the same sparkling pen.

In the year 1862 M. Lasserre felt with dismay that his sight, which had been remarkably good, was beginning to fail him. During the two previous years he had brought out five important books: "L'Esprit et la Chair," &c., 1859. "L'Aveugle et sa Campagne," 1860; "La Prusse et les Traités de Vienne," 1860; "La Pologne et la Catholicité," 1861; "Les Serpens," 1861–62.

These books must have cost the writer infinite pains. It pleases dull and slovenly writers to speak with contempt of books written in picturesque and glowing style, it is enough for them to say "flowery," ignorant, as they are, that such a style is only reached and maintained by the most laborious and constant effort. Under the incessant strain M. Lasserre's eyes gave way. It was a sad blow to a man who had always a cause to serve to be obliged to stand aside with idle hands. He retired by the advice of his oculists from the arena in Paris to the companionship of his widowed mother in the old home at Coux.

[1] See "The Power Behind the Pope." Nisbet & Co.

The intimate friendship of Henri Lasserre and Charles de Freycinet, the present French minister of war, has passed into history, but the history has taken many liberties with facts. The two students met at college when young, and a very happy friendship was formed. It was the meeting of David and Jonathan—"First love, first friendship, equal terms." They were inseparable companions, and they used to discuss the problems that perplex students "until the broad light of day caused their lamp to grow pale." Their friendship was enduring. Writing of that friendship in 1883 M. Lasserre declares: "Neither differences of opinion, nor change of country, nor long voyages, nor long absence, nor marriage, nor any of the crises to which ordinary friendships succumb, could alter ours. He was a Protestant and I was a Catholic. He had known me at college when I had lost my faith, and he had seen me regain my faith at the age of twenty. I was then a bachelor, and he was married. Like himself, his wife was a Protestant. A distinguished engineer and mathematician, he published volumes bristling with figures, while I was invincibly drawn towards religious and literary studies. But neither time nor space, nor differences, nor opposition could touch our friendship, and whether far apart or in each other's society we were still the friends of other days."

From his country retreat M. Lasserre wrote to his old friend by the hand of his secretary. M. de Freycinet was distressed on account of his friend's failing sight. He had passed through Lourdes a few days previously, and had heard many local stories about wonderful healing, and he replied as follows: "If I were a Catholic, believing as you do, and if I were ill, I should not hesitate to have recourse to Lourdes. If it be true that the sick are suddenly healed, you may hope to swell the number; if it is not true, what do you risk by making the attempt?"

A short time after the receipt of this letter, Freycinet and Lasserre met in Paris. Freycinet urged Lasserre to put the water of Lourdes to the test, and Freycinet's sister, an ardent Catholic, joined her entreaties to those of her brother. The result was, that Lasserre dictated and Freycinet wrote a letter to Mgr. Peyramale of Lourdes, asking for a bottle of the water. I have a facsimile of the letter before me. It is dated October 2nd, 1862. The letter gives a simple account of Lasserre's condition. It declares that he had consulted in vain the two most distinguished specialists in Paris, Messrs. Desmares and Giraud-Teulon. Lasserre signed the letter with difficulty. M. de Freycinet, as a man of science, and wishing the experiment to have fair play, urged Lasserre to put himself, by acts of devotion known to his Church, in a condition favourable for the exercise of faith. This science, which makes no distinction in its advices between credulity and true faith, will not commend itself to English Protestants. M. Lasserre, however, complied. The bottle of water duly arrived. Lasserre, in great trepidation, opened the bottle, applied the water to his eyes while praying most fervently to God, and he believes that his eyes became better from that hour.

The story of "Our Lady of Lourdes" is now thirty years old. It is familiar in this country as one of credulity and delusion, by no means creditable to the nineteenth century. But Protestantism gains nothing by closing its eyes, and at Lourdes, as elsewhere, if a cure is reported, it should ask a full explanation of the facts as viewed in the light of science, which includes many marvellous transformations within its knowledge. M. Lasserre tells his own story with the simplicity of a child. He is an intensely earnest man. His eyes had been overworked, and he was taking rest, that best of all medicines for weak eyes. He was anxious that his eyes should be healed not only on his own account, but that his Protestant friend might be saved through the miracle. Owing to his previous simple life he had sound health. All the conditions were favourable—rest after labour, a sound constitution, and a temperament of childlike enthusiasm—when M. Lasserre knelt at his bedside and prayed straight into the ears of the Merciful Father, "My God, I am a miserable sinner, unworthy to lift up my voice to Thee, or to touch an object that Thou hast blessed. Let the greatness of my misery stir Thy compassion. . . from the deep pit I raise my cries to Thee. Pardon me, O Lord, and heal me!"

There does not seem to be anything here that would come under the definition of a miracle. There was no "suspension of the laws of nature," nor was there necessarily anything "above the laws of nature." There was nothing even beyond the range of common occurrences, and certainly nothing on which to found the unlimited pretensions of Lourdes. The whole matter is reduced to the simplest dimensions. The Great Healer, without whose permission a sparrow cannot fall, seems to have acted in the restoration of M. Lasserre's sight along the lines of the most natural causes. Nor is M. Lasserre's experience very different from our own common experience, when in response to our call God lifts us out of the depths.

If the incidents of his personal history do not follow the ordinary course of biography, this peculiarity, it must be remembered, is a feature in times of transition, which often strangely blend contradictory elements in the same career. No Protestant will alter his general judgment as to Lourdes and its fables because of this statement of M. Lasserre. All will rejoice that his restored sight has been dedicated to the translation of the Gospels, which have been read by hundreds of thousands, and which will, we trust, open the hearts of many Frenchmen to receive the love of God.

WILLIAM WRIGHT, D.D.

ANECDOTES OF JOHN WELSH, OF IRONGRAY.

SOON after the Restoration of Charles II. the persecution of the Covenanters, which had ceased during the time of the Commonwealth, was recommenced with greater cruelty than under Charles I. In 1661 the Marquis of Argyll was executed, the first martyr since the days of Popery in Scotland. James Guthrie, son of the laird of Guthrie, a man of great learning and deep piety, was the next victim. In the following year prelacy was restored at the mere will of the king, acting with the same counsellors who advised the Bartholomew Act in England. All Scottish ministers who would not submit to re-ordination were ejected from their parishes. Four hundred churches were shut up on one day. Among those ejected was John Welsh, of Irongray, one of the most devoted and popular of the Scottish clergy. He was grandson of the still more famous John Welsh, of Ayr, who married the daughter of John Knox. Josias, the father of Welsh, of Irongray, had gone to Ireland, among those who settled in Ulster in the reign of James I. and was minister of Temple-Patrick. He was an eloquent preacher, and was called the "The Cock of the North."

Messengers had been sent to Irongray to arrest the minister. The whole parish was stirred, and the people gathered at the manse, but the minister prevented any resistance. They clung to him on all sides and refused to part. When he left, after they had accompanied him some way, he knelt with them in prayer, and, mounting his horse, rode quickly away. Although thus compelled to leave the scene of his regular labours in the ministry, he did not remain idle, for he was constantly employed in preaching at field-meetings or on the hillsides, often to vast audiences. Notwithstanding the edicts passed against him, he frequently returned to his old parish, preaching, and baptising all the children. Many a narrow escape from arrest he had on these occasions. He was present at all the risings, in the time of persecution,—at Pentland, Drumclog, and Bothwell Bridge. Kirkton, the Scottish Church historian, says of him, "He was a godly, meek, humble man, and a good, popular preacher, but the boldest undertaker (adventurer) that ever I knew as minister in Christ's church, in olden or later times; for notwithstanding all the threatenings of the State, the great price of £500 being set upon his head, he maintained the difficult task of preaching upon the mountains of Scotland for nearly twenty years, yet was always kept out of his enemies' hands. It is well known that 'the bloody Claverhouse,' upon intelligence that he was lurking in some secret place, would ride forty miles on a winter night; yet when he came to the place he always missed his prey. I have known Mr. Welsh ride three days and two nights without sleep, and preach upon a hillside at midnight on one of the nights." After all his perils, he died peaceably in his bed, in London, in January, 1681.

That he often, under Providence, owed his freedom to his own intrepidity and self-possession the following anecdote shows. On one occasion being closely pressed, and at a loss where to conceal himself, he went boldly to the house of a laird, well known for his bitter hostility to field-preachers in general, and to himself in particular, as he knew from violent threats he had heard of. As a stranger and traveller he asked shelter at the house, depending upon Scottish hospitality. He was kindly received, and his genial sociable manners delighted his host. In the course of conversasion Welsh was mentioned, and the difficulty of getting hold of him. "I am sent," said Welsh, "to apprehend rebels; I know where he is to preach to-morrow, and will give him into your hand." The gentleman, overjoyed at this news, agreed to accompany his guest the next morning. When they arrived at the place of meeting, the congregation made way for the minister and his companion. He asked the laird to sit down on the chair, whilst he stood to commence the service to the amazement of his host of the previous night. During the sermon the laird was very attentive, and seemed much affected. At the close, when Mr. Welsh, according to his promise, gave him his hand, he said: "You said you were sent to apprehend rebels, and I, a rebellious sinner, have been apprehended this day."

One instance is recorded, in which a remark of John Welsh was afterwards regarded as almost spoken in prophetic spirit. When preaching at St. Andrews, some of the students behaved in a rude manner, and one of them in mockery threw something which struck him. Mr. Welsh paused, and before the large multitude who heard him, said: "I know not who has put this public affront on a servant of Jesus Christ; but be he who he may, I am persuaded there will be more people present at his death than are hearing me this day!"

It turned out to be a son of Sir James Stanfield of Newmilns, near Haddington; and, strange to say, some years later, the unhappy youth was executed for the murder of his own father!

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

BY EMMA LESLIE.

CHAPTER II.—THE BIRD-CATCHER.

AS the boys were returning from their walk an hour later, the bird-catcher ran to meet them. "I'm in luck to-day," he cried before he reached them; "those bright pennies have been a fust-rate hansell, and yet I have not got a single bird."

"Haven't you caught any more?" asked Bertie.

"Oh, yes, caught another soon after you went, but there was an old cove the other side of the hedge as had heard all about our bargain, and when he sees me come back with the bird he pops his head over, and, says he, 'You'll let me buy that one for twopence like you did the little boy awhile ago.' But, you see, I couldn't let another go for twopence; and, besides, he seemed a real gent as could well afford fourpence; but, seeing as he wanted to let the bird go, and I begin to have a kind of feeling that maybe they don't like being shut up in a cage, I said he should have it for threepence, and threepence it was. Then he asked a lot of questions about you, and how long you'd been here, and what sort of chaps you was."

"You did not tell him we were poor, did you?" said Bertie quickly.

"Why shouldn't I? You are poor—poor as church mice, as folks say," exclaimed the bird-catcher, without the remotest notion that he could be paining the little fellows, for whom he had conceived a great admiration.

"You're a rude boy," exclaimed Tommy angrily.

"Am I?" laughed the bird-catcher. "Well, never mind. But I ain't told you all yet," he exclaimed, as the boys attempted to pass him. "The old gent I told yer about offered to give me sixpence if I'd go and kick the trap down, and not catch any more birds to-day."

"And did you do it?" asked Bertie eagerly.

The other nodded. "I dunno as it was much of a bargain," he said, "but I ain't done so badly to-day, between you and the old gent, so I could afford to let the birds alone for a bit."

"I'm so glad," said Bertie. "They can come down and pick up the crumbs, and those nasty bricks won't fall down and shut them in. What are you going to do now?" he added, as the boy walked on beside them.

"Ain't I going wi' you to get some dinner—didn't you say so?"

"I—I said I'd ask Ann about it," said Bertie in an embarrassed tone.

"Is Ann your mother?" asked the other coolly.

Tommy looked at his brother horrified at the question, and drawing himself up as high as he could, he said, "My mother is a lady."

But Bertie said quickly. "Ann has been nearly as good as a mother. She was our nurse when we kept a lot of servants, and she was my mother's nurse when she was a little girl, and she takes care of all of us now."

"And she gives you your dinner?" asked the elder boy, to whom the question of dinner was of more importance than anything else just now.

"Oh, yes, she just does everything for us," said Bertie, "and I think she'll give you some dinner too when I tell her how you let the birds go. I'll run on first," he added as they drew near home, and he and Tommy ran on at the top of their speed.

Ann did not look altogether pleased when she heard the story of the morning's doings.

"He was a greedy boy to take your two bright pennies, and I don't think your mother would be pleased to hear that you talked to such a lad," she said rather severely.

"But he came and talked to us," said Tommy, "he said we were frightening the birds away, and I would have made a noise if I could only——"

"He was so hungry, Ann, that's why he caught the birds," put in Bertie. "Couldn't you give him a little bit of dinner," he pleaded, "I'd like him to have half of mine if you haven't got enough."

Ann looked as though she did not understand. "Haven't got enough, what do you mean?" she asked sharply.

"The boy says we're very poor now, and everybody knows it."

For answer Ann dropped into a chair, and threw her apron over her head. They were in the kitchen, whither the boys frequently followed her, and she was able to indulge in her emotion for a minute; but it was only for a minute that the genial old face was hidden, and then snatching the apron down she said: "Boys, boys, you must not talk about this, not to your mother."

"But is it true, Ann?" asked Tommy, feeling strongly inclined to cry himself.

Ann nodded. "We hope it won't last long," she said, "or it will kill your poor dear mother." In truth Ann looked upon her mistress as being quite as much a child as these children, and to shield and shelter her from every care and trouble, she was willing to endure any privation herself, and had taught the boys to do the same. So they received Ann's warnings to keep this matter a secret and promised not to say a word at dinner time to make their mother think they knew of the trouble that had brought them to Beachcliff.

Just at this moment there came a knock at the back door, and on opening it Ann was startled to see a sharp hungry-looking lad. "What do you want?" she said quickly.

"I've come to dinner; my name's Jack Bond, and the youngsters told me to come."

"Oh, yes, Ann, he is to have half of mine," said Bertie, pushing forward. "It's quite fair, you know; he let us have the birds to let loose for less than he would have got in the town."

The boy looked at Ann and then at Bertie. "Yer don't mean to give me half of his do yer?" he said.

"Well, I don't know. What do you think about it?" she said, feeling somewhat amused now.

"Well, I know I ain't going to take nothing off that little chap," said the boy; "and so, if yer can't spare it without, I'll just get a pen'orth o' bread and cheese somewheres, only I thought I'd like something better, if I could get it."

"Well, well, come in," said Ann, "I don't like to turn you away, although we are not very rich just now."

The boy nodded. "Rich," he muttered half aloud, "nobody ever thought of coming to yer when you was rich."

"Now, Bertie, run and wash your hands ready for dinner," said Ann, turning him out of the kitchen; then facing round upon the bird-catcher she said fiercely, "What have you been telling those children?"

"Just what everybody else knows," said the boy, coolly; "I knowed you Danbys before you came to Beachcliffs; my father worked in the factory—worked himself to death, I've heard my poor mother say," said the boy, hastily drawing his sleeve across his eyes.

"But—but what did you want to tell these children about such things—about being poor, I mean," added Ann.

"Why shouldn't they know it," demanded the boy, "didn't I know it when father died; didn't my little brothers and sisters know it, till they died too; didn't I know that mother came to ask the master to help her a bit over her troubles, and didn't he tell her everybody had to look out for themselves?"

"Well, well," said Ann, who did not want to hear any more, "come to the table and I'll give you some dinner," and she gave him the remains of a cold joint, that she had reserved for herself, and promised him a slice of plum-pudding when she had her own.

Meanwhile Mrs. Danby was listening to little Tommy's account of their walk, and was not a little disturbed to hear they had been talking to a "rude boy," as she called the bird-catcher. The lady was in weak health, and the present trouble was making her peevish and fretful, and when Ann brought in the dinner, she seemed ready to burst into tears as she said, "These naughty boys are going to give us fresh trouble, Ann."

"Oh no, no," said Ann cheerfully, "Bertie has told me all about the birds. You will be careful, won't you, my dear?" she said, as she placed a chair for the little boy, who had just come in to the room.

He gazed up into her face with a look of intelligence. "I'll take care of mother and Tommy too," he whispered.

Presently there was a loud outcry from Tommy: "Only boiled mutton," he exclaimed.

"But it's good for mother," said Bertie quickly, "and you know we always like what is good for mamma."

"But I don't like boiled mutton on your birthday," whimpered Tommy. He was only eight years old, and a little spoiled, and Bertie, from his manly age of ten, looked upon him as a baby.

"He can't help it, mamma," he said; "he forgets we are at the seaside," which was the excuse always presented to them as a reason for the difference in their style of living.

With the pudding came another outburst of grumbling from Tommy. It was a plum-pudding, certainly, but the merest pretence of a birthday pudding, and Tommy declared it was "too rich with flour," which brought a smile to his mother's lips, but made Bertie wonder what he could do to stop this grumbling.

"Never mind," he said at last, "we are going to have dessert to-day; Ann told me so." But, alas, the dessert proved a worse failure than the dinner, for although Ann had exerted all her skill to make the few apples and oranges she had been able to get look as nice as possible, nothing would change them into hot-house grapes, and rich crystallized fruits, which had formed the staple of birthday dessert in the old days. Even Bertie could not help feeling disappointed, when he saw the poor little plates of apples and oranges placed on the table after dinner; but he restrained his tears, and proposed to Tommy, that they should roast their apples, and ask Ann for some sugar afterwards to make a feast with them.

It was their first birthday at Beachcliffs, and, boy-like, they hoped it might be the last, knowing nothing of the gloomy forebodings that filled the minds of their mother and her faithful servant, who feared that all too soon this shelter, and the few comforts they now had, would have to be given up. Neither of them knew much of business matters, but they heard now and then, from the gentleman who had the winding-up of Mr. Danby's affairs in his hands, that things were going from bad to worse every week, and so it was little wonder that the lady felt anxious and dispirited, often fretful and complaining, for, alas! she knew nothing of that Friend who sticketh closer than a brother, and is ready to help in every time of need.

But while the dinner and dessert was grumbled over in the dining-room, it gave immense satisfaction to the visitor in the kitchen.

As he was walking down the street after this feast, he met the old gentleman with whom he had made such a good bargain in the morning, and touching his cap, and pointing backwards with his thumb, he said, "They're awfully poor."

"Who?" asked the gentleman.

"The Danbys—the youngsters that bought the birds of me this morning. I've been there to dinner; it was part of the bargain you know."

The old gentleman seemed interested, and somewhat touched by this recital. "And the lady—did you hear how she was?" he asked.

"Well enough, I expect."

"Do you know," said the gentleman, "where Mr. Danby is—does he live here too?"

"Oh, no; he's gone off to foreign parts, to look after business there. Serve him right, I say, if he never comes back any more. I used to hate the very name of Danby, but, somehow, what that little one said about the birds, makes me feel like forgiving her after all, or else I wouldn't have gone there to dinner, hungry as I was."

The gentleman laughed. "Then your eating their dinner was a sort of outward and visible sign of your forgiveness?" he said.

"That's just it, sir. I'd took a sort of oath that I'd never forgive the Danbys, and never accept no sort of kindness from 'em, and when they came to live here, and I heard they was come down in the world, I took to watching these boys as they walked about the beach together, though I never spoke to 'em till this morning."

"But why should you feel so bitter against these people?" asked the gentleman.

"Wouldn't you feel bitter, if somebody had ground down your father and mother, and brothers and sisters, till you were left all alone in the world? Well, that's just what the Danbys have done for me, and I am not the only one neither," said the lad fiercely.

"But—but I thought you told me you had forgiven them?" said the gentleman, noting the angry gleam in the boy's eyes.

"So I have, sir; but you asked me what I had to forgive, and it ain't good for me I 'spose to rake over the old trouble. But I've forgiven her now for the little un's sake, and 'cos I think if he ever has a factory, he won't grind out the life of the poor."

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. VI.

1. He was a captain in the army.
2. He was remarkable for his furious driving.
3. He was anointed king by command of a prophet.
4. His fellow-captains supported him readily.
5. He was very prompt in acting against the reigning king.
6. He was anointed king for the purpose of executing vengeance on some guilty persons.
7. He was very zealous in putting down idolatry.
8. Nevertheless he did not serve God with all his heart.
9. A certain reward was promised to him for his services.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARGARETA COLBERG.

A TALE OF THE REFORMATION.

CHAPTER XII.—THE STAKE.

BLESSED UNCONSCIOUSNESS HAD COME TO CLOSE HER EYES TO THE HIDEOUS SIGHT.

THE kind-hearted Beta herself came to fetch her friend in the forenoon of the dreadful day, and led her to their house in the Market Place by roundabout and unfrequented routes, in order that she might not be distressed at the sight of the multitudes who were thronging towards the square. Margareta, enveloped in a large black cloak, looked like a nun. In her hands she clasped Bertrand's little Bible. She, poor girl, clung to that as to a pledge which he must redeem, though hopeless despair had well-nigh taken possession of her heart.

In the house of her friend, Margareta encountered no one. Beta had so ordered everything that her sorrow should not be intruded upon. She felt that it was not out of curiosity that Margareta had come to view the awful spectacle. The room which they entered was that fronting the square, from the gay windows of which the two young women had been the joyous spectators of Marquis Berghen's entry, six months before. The windows, then so highly decorated, were now all closed, with the exception of one whose shutter was half thrown back. To this window Margareta at once proceeded, and looked out into the Market Place.

There lay the two horrid piles surmounted by the cruel stakes, there stood the raised platform for the clergy and magistrates, with the red-draped seat for the Inquisitor, and there was the palisade enclosing this erection of horror. With aching, tearless eyes, Margareta noted all this, and she noted, too, the yellow-jerkined Spanish soldiers with their gleaming lances. She looked at the crowd surging round the stockade. Was there no help? Where was the deliverer? Was Bertrand not there? She looked wearily at the crowd while these fateful questions continually racked her brain, and even in all her anguish she observed how many old men there were in the square.

"Ah! but the old are feeble," she murmured, "and the young are afraid."

Indeed, the number of aged men present in the Market Place was quite surprising. They seemed, too, very feeble, for they all supported their tottering steps with stout staves. Some of these venerables were, doubtless, hard of hearing and dim of sight, for they had placed themselves in the crowd close to the palisade, apparently in order that they might lose nothing of the edifying spectacle.

One octogenarian, accompanied by an aged woman, huddled in a scarlet cloak of most remarkable brilliancy, took his stand on the topmost step leading to the Council House, exactly opposite the window whence Margareta was looking out. This personage was so bent with the weight of his years that it was impossible to see his face under the large hat which he wore, but his long white hair and flowing beard impressed beholders with a sense of respect. He and his scarlet dame stood there isolated, quite conspicuous all over the square. More than once poor Margareta's eyes had rested upon this pair, as, hoping against hope, they had wandered over the crowded square, vainly searching for the well-known form of Bertrand.

At length there was a stir and a murmur, which announced the approach of the procession.

First came a few soldiers to open the way, then little children in white stoles. Immediately behind them, side by side, marched the two prisoners. Both were dressed in yellow, sleeveless robes, embroidered all over with the figures of devils, and on their heads were conical mitres made of paper. Their hands were bound behind their backs with cruel cords, and they walked barefooted. The minister's face, though wan and pale after his long imprisonment, looked calm and serene. His eyes rested mildly upon the little children in front of him, and those near by heard him murmuring words of prayer and calling down blessings upon their infant heads.

As they came in sight of the stakes he said to Mallart: "Brother, the way is short; the goal is almost attained. Look not upon yonder posts as the stakes of torture. They are the portals of our Father's house in the skies. They are bright and shining as of gold, and the glory of heaven beams upon them. We are going home—home at last."

Here a crouching figure, which had kept pace with them, raised a frightened, tear-stained face, and called in low, piteous accents: "Take me home with you, my master. Let me go through the shining gates to heaven, and go home, too. I'm aweary, I'm aweary!"

It was poor Tollchen, the idiot boy, who had joined the procession as it left the castle-gate, and upon whose wandering mind the great spectacle had a terrifying effect. Mallart smiled sadly at him, and the poor child, with the devotion of a spaniel, kept as close as possible to his master as the procession entered the palisade.

All passed in, the little children, the pale victims, the priests, the Bishop of Arras in all his pomp, the Inquisitor Titelmann with a sneer on his face, and the black Dominicans with their torches burning. When the last was inside the guards placed themselves across the entrance, and the ceremony began amid the awful stillness of the multitude.

The bishop rose, delivered a short address lauding the Holy Inquisition and the clemency of his Majesty, and reviling the condemned. Finally he delivered them over to the executioner hypocritically praying that they might be dealt with "tenderly and without shedding of blood."

A hollow sound as of distant thunder resounded through the square as the bishop sat down.

Then Titelmann got up. He looked for an instant searchingly over the Market Place. He did not quite like that muttering sound, but as the crowd was wonderfully quiet he concluded that they were completely overawed by his Spaniards and dared only to express their anger by that deep murmur. He proceeded therefore to read the sentences individually to each prisoner in a loud defiant voice.

Margareta stood at the window with white face and dilated horror-struck eyes, gazing on the beloved form of the minister, but she uttered no sound. Once or twice Beta, frightened at that dreadful rigid look in her face, had begged her to come away, but she did not move, doubtless she did not even know that she had been spoken to.

The doomed men mounted the piles and were bound to the stakes by chains, one about the neck and one about the waist.

Then the black-hooded Dominicans advanced with their burning torches.

At this sight Margareta sank on her knees with clasped hands and cried out in a loud voice, "Oh, merciful God!"

The convulsed fingers slowly unclenched, the wild eyes looked up once more, and with a gasp of "Bertrand!" on her lips the unhappy girl fell backwards upon the floor. Blessed unconsciousness had come to close her eyes to the hideous sight.

Beta, usually so solicitous about her friend, never even turned her head now to offer her a word of sympathy. She was leaning far out of the window looking with all her eyes at the strange things that were at this very moment happening in the square.

When the two monks, torch in hand, bent forward to light the pile, the little scarlet woman on the Council House steps suddenly threw her wooden shoe high into the air, exclaiming as it fell with a clatter: "A rescue! a rescue"

The venerable greybeard by her side no sooner heard the cry than he leapt to the bottom step with one bound, brandishing the oaken-staff over his head, and shouting in the clear ringing tones of two-and-twenty; "Down with the Spaniards! Brabant for ever!"

At the sound of their leader's voice all those elderly men who leaned against the stockade sprang into life and youth, and seizing the woodwork with one united mighty swing they threw it down. In an instant the surging crowd poured over the fallen structure in a perfectly irresistible flood, and swarmed about the raised platform, but he of the Council House steps was the first to reach the burning pile.

At the cry of a rescue Titelmann had called upon the guards to secure the prisoners, but being taken completely by surprise and being isolated at different points near the palisade they were instantly surrounded, and each halberdier had all he could do to defend himself. Their weapons were snatched from their hands even before they knew they needed to use them. It was in vain that Titelmann caught and tried to hold that white-haired man who leaped upon the platform, and dashed at the burning pile.

The Inquisitor was famed for the strength of his arms, as many a poor struggling victim had ere this learned to his cost, but he was no match for the man he now endeavoured to hold. Wrenching himself free, this latter seized a burning piece of wood and flung it into Titelmann's eyes with such force that he ever afterwards bore a red black scar aslant his eyebrows in honour of it. Furthermore, that burning faggot set the fiery red cloak into actual flames, and as the terrified Inquisitor darted shrieking among the priests who were huddled about their bishop, he caused those solemn ecclesiastics to fly in all directions.

Such was the rapidity with which this extraordinary scene was enacted that in a very few minutes the two prisoners were unbound from the stakes, and spirited away, the palisades, platforms and piles of wood were entirely demolished and scattered about the Square, the guards were soundly beaten and driven off, and the Market Place of Valenciennes was in possession of an excited roaring crowd that surged hither and thither, bearing aloft the unburnt faggots as trophies of their victory.

The fugitive guards and priests quickly carried the news of the riot to the Castle, whereupon Don Pedro da Silla summoning all his remaining Spaniards, instantly set out to take vengeance upon the people. Before he was able to reach the square, however, the crowd, in anticipation of his coming, had melted away into bye-streets and down lanes with magical rapidity, so that on his arrival he found himself in bare possession of the field strewn with broken boards and faggots.

Many heads were broken by the old men's walking staves, and no doubt the memory of their defeat by those Flemish dogs, never died in the hearts of the enraged Spaniards. Perhaps it would have been less galling to their pride could they have known that their famous halberdiers were not routed by a mere riotous mob, but that the whole thing was the result of a carefully planned and brilliantly-executed military manœuvre—planned and executed, too, by one who, even in those warlike times, had few who could surpass him in keenness of forethought or recklessness of daring.

One life alone paid for this great victory. One of the huge stakes falling in the crush when the wood was hurled from around it, had struck poor Tollchen as it fell. His wish had been granted. He passed the door to heaven and was at rest, poor boy; he would never again be "aweary."

When Beta had seen this wonderful tumult, and beheld the rescue of the prisoners, she turned towards Margareta and then for the first time became aware that her friend was lying insensible on the floor. Kneeling down beside the inanimate form, she raised Margareta up, at the same time calling out loudly and excitedly; "Margareta, Margareta! Open your eyes! A rescue! A rescue! Margareta look up. They are saved, they are saved!"

The sudden change of position together with Beta's voice recalled her somewhat to her senses. She opened her eyes slowly and stared at the excited face beside her.

"A rescue I tell you," exclamed Beta. "Do you hear what I say? They are saved!"

The words at last took effect upon the girl's numbed brain. "Thank God for this mercy!" she cried brokenly as the tears which had been denied her during all this week of anguish rushed to her eyes and she wept in Beta's arms. When her excitement was somewhat calmed, she said amidst her sobs: "He did it. Oh, that I should have doubted him! I might have rested secure. It was he, was it not Beta?"

"He?" asked Beta puzzled. "Who do you mean? Why, it was that old man on the steps opposite. You saw him, did you not, along with the woman in the red cloak? He led it all. Such a marvellous old man! How he leaped, when the old woman gave the signal!" Then she described the scene to her eager listener.

"Oh, no!" said Margareta incoherently, "it was not the old man, it was he. It was my hero. I knew he would. Why did I doubt? Is he not true as steel?"

"Doubted who? Your hero! Ah! I see," exclaimed Beta with an indescribably knowing intonation. The truth began to break in upon her, for she was a shrewd little body and Bertrand was not unknown to her.

CHAPTER XIII.—THE PRIZE.

After the joyful ending of the tragedy begun under her eyes nothing could exceed Margareta's impatience to be gone. It seemed that she was selfish every moment she delayed in sharing this glorious news with her mother. And then, too, there was Rosa. She would enter into the joy of the rescue as eagerly as any of them, and she would not fail to give the honour of it to whom it belonged.

Escorted by two stout serving men, she had reached in safety her father's door when a halting step behind her caused her to look around. Could it be possible that this was Rosa, the respectable old serving woman! This dishevelled tattered creature limping along with a wooden shoe protecting one foot while the other was bare. Was this Rosa waving a torn scarlet cloak over her streaming grey hair as she said excitedly: "It was I gave the signal! I with my sabot! I did it. I sounded the assault! Oh, it has been a glorious day!"

Yes, it was a fact. She had been the red-cloaked woman on the Council House steps, whose shrill old voice had called, "A rescue! a rescue!" when the torches were laid to the piles.

Margareta clasped her mother in her arms crying almost deliriously: "Oh, mother, mother, they are saved! He saved them. He did it! Saved them from out of the burning flames!"

"Yes," cried Rosa, still hopping wildly about them, flourishing her banner of a cloak in a frenzy of excitement, "yes, he did it all; but I gave the signal with my wooden shoe. I'm not too old to do something to save a friend yet. I wanted to strike a blow before I died, and I have done it. Oh!" she paused from very exhaustion.

Ere long, Simon Colberg himself returned, bringing news of how the beloved friends had gone to a house to change their death-robe for riding-coats, and of how they had proceeded to the house of Robert Ogier on the road to Cambray. Here they were to find swift horses and sure guides which would soon put them beyond the reach of all pursuers.

The joyfully re-united family were still eagerly talking over the great events of the day and had remained in the hall, so much were they excited that they could not separate yet awhile. Suddenly a quick knock was heard at the door.

Simon from the inside demanded: "Friend what seekest thou?"

A voice which thrilled Margareta to the very soul, in clear distinct tones answered: "My bride."

With an intensity of emotion which almost amounted to pain, she awaited the entrance of the new comer. It was a relief to her feelings when the utter grotesqueness of the person who presented himself, made them all laugh. It was a tall erect figure, clothed in an old man's long gabardine, much torn and blackened. One sleeve completely gone, exposed a powerful, muscular sword arm to view. On his hat-less head was a grey wig pulled awry, while his mouth was concealed by a white beard, partly turned on one side, and very much blackened on the other, and in his hand he carried a big oaken staff.

This absurd individual, looking at Margareta with loving tender eyes, held out his hands to her and said: "Margareta, I have fought my fight. I come now for my prize."

She laid her head on the old gabardine, and the singed hair mingled with her own golden tresses as she murmured: "Bertrand, my Bertrand!"

He plucked the singed beard from his face as he kissed her lips, and uttered soft words into her willing ear, but Simon made such a noise over the bolts as he fastened the door, that not a sentence was heard, save by that noble girl who had taught him that even Love must yield precedence to Duty.

* * * * *

Towards the end of May that same year, a little group of persons stood on the quay at Berghen-op-Zoom. A boat was waiting for them. and a ship, already preparing to sail, lay in the harbour.

We know them all. The minister, looking far sadder than when we saw him walking to the stake at Valenciennes, was speaking to a young girl, who with tears in her eyes bowed her head to receive his parting blessing.

"Margareta, my child, may God bless thee! May thy life be happy and prosperous, and mayst thou long live to be the light of thy husband's home! And thou, Bertrand, God reward thee in His own good time. Love her always, and cherish her, my little perlchen, the wife I have given thee this day."

And then turning to the elder couple he said: "Simon and sister Alice, farewell. Come what may, my work lies in this land, beside my brother Mallart who now is minister, too. Pray I may be worthy of it. Your duty lies elsewhere. Go to England, that land of the free, and be happy as you deserve. Farewell."

He then turned to Rosa, and extending his hand to her, bade her God-speed.

"Yes," she replied, "I go with them in mine old age, following them as a true and faithful servant should do, but my heart is in the old country. Ah! we have seen great days here, even if we shall be safer over there."

And so they sailed across the sea, sailed away into a happy life of love and usefulness in the new land where peace and security awaited them.

ADELA E. ORPEN.

ST. JOHN:

APOSTLE, EVANGELIST, AND SEER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

IV.—THE APOSTLES IN JERUSALEM: THEIR DEPARTURE.

"THE Acts of the Apostles" is one of those titles that are apt to disappoint expectation. Very probably, although of high antiquity, it was not given by St. Luke himself to his second "treatise;" and in the earliest form in which we find the title, its true rendering is simply "Acts of Apostles": some Acts of some of the Twelve, as well as of the Apostle Paul, to whom the largest space is devoted. Very few, yet very significant are the scenes in which the apostle John appears by name, as one in that goodly fellowship.

The first occasion is in "an upper room": perhaps, although we cannot affirm this with certainty, the upper room[1] in which Jesus had met with His disciples for the Last Supper, and where they had once and again seen Him after His resurrection. "Here abode both Peter and James and John"—still mentioned at the head of the apostolic list. And there they held their daily assemblies for prayer and supplication until, in common with their brethren, they received the Pentecostal gift.

Two facts of great significance now appear. The one is that among the Eleven Peter and John are specially associated, as if by the power of some deep sympathy. It had been so from the day of the resurrection of the Lord. Peter and John had evidently sought each other's society. Mary Magdalene had united them in her quest on the morning of that first day of the week. The disciple whom Jesus loved would regard with a peculiar tenderness the disciple who had sinned and been forgiven; and the intenseness of St. John's nature would find a congenial response in the fervour and energy of his brother disciple. Thus it was, no doubt, but one instance among many, when we read that "Peter and John were going up together into the Temple at the hour of prayer." Together they wrought the miracle upon the lame man; together they stood before the council; "the boldness of Peter and John" moved the wonder of the elders and scribes, who "perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men," and "took knowledge of them" both, that they had been with Jesus.

The second fact to be noted is that in these records of their association it is Peter who is always in the front. It is he who speaks the word of power to the lame man; he who declares to the council that the miracle was wrought in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth. John stands silently by, or but confirms what Peter had said. Once the words are recorded as the words of both: "Peter and John answered and said unto them, Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you than unto God, judge ye." Not a word is given, from first to last, as uttered by John alone; there is the impress of his mighty personality, but it is still through another voice that this finds utterance.

In the next scene in which we find the beloved disciple, it was in similar association with St. Peter. A great day was dawning upon the Church of Christ, the day of extension beyond the limits of its early home in Jerusalem. The impulse was given by the hand of persecution. "They were all scattered abroad throughout the regions of Judæa and Samaria, except the apostles." The Twelve, like the officers of a ship in peril, must abide at their post while others escaped. But the refugees became evangelists; and among the rest Philip, one of "the seven," visited Samaria[1] and proclaimed the Christ with power and success. The wonderful tidings reached Jerusalem—perhaps exciting some uneasiness, for the ancient prejudice was hard to overcome; and it was thought best by the apostles to send a deputation to Samaria to ascertain the facts of the case, and to confirm the work, if it should prove to be truly of God. Who so fitted to be the representatives of the rest as the two comrades, Peter and John? They visited the scene of Philip's labours, and with glad hearts, by the laying on of hands, communicated the gift of the Holy Ghost. But when Simon the magician interposes with his unhallowed request, it is Peter again who speaks—"Thy money perish with thee!" The sad appeal of Simon, however, is addressed to both: "Pray ye to the Lord for me." Then they unitedly pursue the work, and "preach the Gospel to many villages of the Samaritans"—John no doubt remembering, as noticed in a former paper, how once he had been fain to call down fire from heaven on some to whom he now declares the glad tidings of eternal love.

"They, therefore, when they had testified and spoken the word of the Lord, returned to Jerusalem." Such is the last mention of John in the apostolic history. There is not another word to tell how his great soul influenced the thoughts

[1] Acts i. 13: εἰς τὸ ὑπερῷον. The literal rendering is of course "into the upper room," defining the place. But it is possible that the definition may simply be that given in the words following:—"the upper room where they were abiding," wherever that may have been. On every ground of sentiment, however, we should be led to the view above suggested, which in fact is that held by ancient interpreters.

[1] Samaria had been rebuilt by Herod, and renamed Sebaste; but the old appellation was not yet entirely superseded. Some critics, however, read "a city of Samaria" in Acts viii. 5, and regard Sychar or some other place as intended.

and actions of his brethren, how in happy companionship he soothed the last days of the mother of Jesus in his own home, or how he testified to all men, who would hear, the truth which he was afterwards to write in immortal words. That he remained for a long time in Jerusalem, is fairly certain, as we shall see; for the rest, we must be content to be assured that, in comparative silence, and with a reserve of the forces within, the future seer and evangelist was long awaiting his highest call.

One great trial now befel him and the Church together, in the death of his brother by Herod's sword. James was the first to go: who would be the next?—

> Two brothers freely cast their lot
> With David's royal Son;
> The cost of conquest counting not,
> They deem the battle won.
>
> Brothers in heart, they hope to gain
> An undivided joy,
> That man may one with man remain,
> As boy was one with boy.
>
> Christ heard; and willed that James should fall
> First prey of Satan's rage;
> John linger out his fellows all,
> And die in bloodless age.
>
> Now they join hands once more above
> Before the Conqueror's throne.
> Thus God grants prayer, but in His love
> Makes times and ways His own.[1]

But great events in the Church's history were happening in distant Antioch. The Gospel had there been for the first time broadly proclaimed to unbelieving Gentiles; and the earliest church gathered from the realms of heathendom had become the first fruits of that innumerable company whom John was afterwards to behold in vision, "out of every nation, and of all tribes and peoples and tongues." The ardent convert Saul of Tarsus was now ministering to that infant church. He had visited Jerusalem already, in the early days of his new life, and had been brought by Barnabas to the apostles, Peter and James the Lord's brother.[2] John had probably been absent from the city at the time: it was fourteen years before he and Paul were to meet. During these years, many things had happened: the Apostle of the Gentiles had accomplished his first great missionary journey; and John the beloved had calmly tarried in Jerusalem.

The great controversy of the early Church had now taken a definite form. Practically, indeed, Paul and his associates had settled it; but sometimes a theory is obstinate and defies facts: the theory in the present case was that Judaism must be the true preparation for the Gospel, in the individual as well as in the world. We may find it difficult to apprehend the position which the Judaizing party assumed: but their convictions were very real. Theirs were the Covenants; and although, as their own Scriptures taught, the Gentiles might find an accepted place therein, must it not be through submitting to the old conditions? To be in Christ, was not the appointed way through Zion? So the theory took the form of a definite declaration, "Except ye be circumcised after the custom of Moses, ye cannot be saved!" On the decision of this point rested the whole future of Christianity. Was it to remain for ever fettered to Judaic ceremonial, or was it to become a world-wide Gospel? It was time to look the question in the face, and to decide it definitely and for ever. Such was the purpose with which Paul and Barnabas, with Titus and others, were despatched from Antioch to Jerusalem, about the year 50 A.D. How their errand sped we all know; the occasion is noted here, as it brought St. Paul for the first time into the company of St. John.

The discussion, as recorded in the fifteenth chapter of the Acts, was carried on by the apostles and elders "with much questioning." No doubt the beloved disciple took his part in it. But only the words of Peter and of James are recorded; and the decision, which the latter announced as that of the Holy Spirit and of the Church, authoritatively and happily declared for ever the principle of Christian freedom. This, however, was not all. Besides the great gathering of the Church—the "first Council" as it has been called—there was a most important conference between Paul and Barnabas on the one side, and the three apostles "who were reputed to be pillars" of the Church on the other. These three were James the brother of Jesus, Cephas, and John, and here they definitely appeared as representatives of the Jewish wing of the Christian community. So much was this the case, that they decided to restrict their labours, comparatively speaking, to the Circumcision. Here was undoubtedly another peril. If the preachers of Christ should become definitely divided into two classes—the one for Jews, the other for Gentiles—must not the too probable result be a schism in the Church itself? The peril was escaped, partly perhaps through the Jewish sympathies of St. Paul, who was only too ready to welcome his brethren according to the flesh into the circle of Christian fellowship, partly through the course of Divine Providence, which brought St. John also out of his own chosen circle, and directed his steps to Gentile lands. On both sides, therefore, the wall of partition was broken down.

But now a question arises, to which perhaps a disproportionate attention has been given in our own times. Was there any lasting breach between these respective schools of thought? Some modern critics, following the Tübingen school of expositors, imagine that they have discovered a veiled antagonism between Paul and the Three. Thus when the former writes to the Corinthians, "I reckon that I am not a whit behind the very chiefest apostles," does he not imply that they had disparaged him? And, more especially, when St. John writes to the church at Ephesus, "Thou didst try them which call themselves apostles and are not, and didst find them false," had he not St. Paul in his mind? To many of our readers the very question will seem revolting; yet it is no less a fact that such interpretations have been proposed, and that even the mention of Balaam in the Epistle to Pergamum, as having led Israel "to eat things sacrificed to idols," has been regarded as a veiled reference to the Apostle of the Gentiles! Such, according to the disciples of Baur, was "the tragic conflict of these two followers of Christ!"

[1] J. H. Newman, Lyra Apostolica, 1836.
[2] Galatians i. 18, 19, and Lightfoot's note.

The criticism, in its very audacity, will be useful to us, if it only leads to a deeper discernment of the unity, in teaching and spirit, between St. Paul and the other apostles. The former, as has been well shown by Bishop Lightfoot,[1] does in fact recognise this unity in the most hearty and explicit manner possible.

"St. Paul speaks of Cephas and the Lord's brethren as exercising an apostolic privilege which belonged also to himself and Barnabas (1 Cor. ix. 5), of Cephas and James as witnesses of the Lord's resurrection like himself (1 Cor. xv. 5, 7). In the last passage he calls himself (with evident reference to the elder Apostles who are mentioned immediately before) 'the least of the Apostles, who is not worthy to be called an Apostle.' In rebuking the dissensions at Corinth, he treats the name of Cephas with a delicate courtesy and respect which has almost escaped notice. When he comes to argue the question, he at once drops the name of St. Peter. 'While one saith, I am of Paul, and another, I am of Apollos, are ye not carnal? What then is Apollos, and what is Paul?' Apollos was so closely connected with him (see xvi. 12) that he could use his name without fear of misapprehension. But in speaking of Cephas he had to observe more caution: certain persons persisted in regarding St. Peter as the head of a rival party, and therefore he is careful to avoid any seeming depreciation of his brother Apostle."

That John, on the other hand, could not have intended to depreciate the great Apostle of the Gentiles, is abundantly clear. To us, indeed, who believe that the message to the church in Ephesus was the message of CHRIST Himself through His servant, the very question is foreclosed. He who had called Paul to be an apostle could never have thus disparaged him! But taking the ground of the critics themselves, it seems clear, first, that Ephesus of all places was the most unlikely to have esteemed Paul as a false apostle. The church in that city was founded by him; it had been the scene of his long-continued and successful ministry; by the Christians of Ephesus he was so beloved that his parting with the elders of the church is one of the most pathetic incidents in the apostolic story; the incongruity of addressing such a depreciation of St. Paul to the Ephesian church would be monstrous. No; when St. John applauds them for having tried "them which call themselves apostles, and they are not," and for having found them "false," he did but recognise that they had already taken heed to St. Paul's own warning: "After my departing, grievous wolves shall enter in among you, not sparing the flock; and from among your own selves shall men arise speaking perverse things, to draw away the disciples after them." The two apostles thus agree in one.

Then, secondly, there is a yet deeper unity between them. Hardly any topic of New Testament study yields more interesting and beautiful results than that of the harmony of apostolic doctrine, as set forth by these two champions of the faith. The very differences in intellect and temperament between St. Paul and St. John make their essential oneness the more significant. Bishop Lightfoot has well compared the brief letter to the Laodicean church with the Epistle to the neighbouring church of the Colossians. "The message communicated by St. John to Loadicea prolongs the note which was struck by St. Paul in the letter to Colossæ. An interval of a very few years has not materially altered the character of these churches. Obviously the same temper prevails, the same errors are rife, the same correction must be applied."[1] The august title given to Jesus Christ, the BEGINNING,[2] is found in both Epistles, and if St. Paul speaks to the Colossians of being raised with Christ and bids them seek the things that are above where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God, St. John writes to the Laodiceans in the name of his Lord, that they who overcome shall sit with Him upon His throne. Such coincidences can hardly be accidental. The whole subject would repay study; and the more fully it is pursued the more manifest would be the accordance between what have been sometimes invidiously called the "Pauline" and the "Johannine" theologies.[3] The figment of an antagonism between the two Apostles, although it could be hardly otherwise than noticed in any account of St. John's life and work, is already falling into deserved discredit, with other extravagances of the Tübingen school.

When and for what reason the Apostle John finally quitted Jerusalem is unknown. Mary, the mother of Jesus, had passed away; the Twelve had mostly departed to their various missionary fields. Only James, the brother of the Lord, remained as bishop of the mother-church. When Paul paid his last visit to Jerusalem, about A.D. 60, John was undoubtedly absent. A uniform and trustworthy tradition of the church asserts that he took up his abode in Ephesus, exercising pastoral oversight over the churches of Proconsular Asia. This must have been after St. Paul's departure, as St. John would certainly otherwise have been mentioned in the farewell address to the elders at Miletus, if not in the "Epistle to the Ephesians." The probability is that after the death of St. Peter and St. Paul, St. John took up their work, especially that of the latter apostle, in this important centre of the Eastern world. All the other apostles have now vanished from the history; and the beloved John, in his own great personality, remains alone.

[1] See Commentary on Galatians. Supplementary Dissertation, p. 326.

[1] Lightfoot. Epistle to the Colossians, p. 41.

[2] ἀρχή. See Col. i. 15–18; Rev. iii. 14.

[3] See, especially, an elaborate note in the Speaker's Commentary, on Rev. iii. 19: "The alleged opposition between St. John and St. Paul."

THE CONGO AND ITS MISSIONS.

BY THE REV. W. HOLMAN BENTLEY.

II.

THE spiritual work on the Congo has already begun to bear fruit. First a few lads in the mission schools gave their hearts to the Saviour; beside these isolated cases, we were cheered by the readiness with which some listened to the story of God's love; but the mass of the people were but little moved. Mr. Richards, of the American Mission at Mbanza Manteka, had been settled there quietly since 1879, and was much discouraged at the apathy of the people. As often happens the darkest time is that which precedes the dawn, and when he was feeling most depressed, the blessing came. A new and sudden influence came over the people, and just as the first two or three rains after the long dry season make the black earth green with shooting grass, so the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit suddenly brought about a general awakening. The seed so long sown began to spring up. The apathy gave place to a widespread interest in divine things. People brought their charms and "medicine," abandoning them; and a large number have since given good evidence of a change of heart. Some seventy have been baptized and a church has been formed. The best proof of the genuineness of the work of grace is the Christian activity which it has called forth among them; the gladness with which the native converts and evangelists start out, of their own accord, and at their own charges, to preach and teach in the country round, in their earnest desire to lead others to the Saviour. The influence spread to the station at Mukimbungu, then to Lukunga, and Mpalabala, where also good work is going on.

The blessing also came upon the work of the English Baptist Mission at San Salvador, breaking out with the same suddenness as elsewhere, and originating in a week of special services.

The Rev. Thomas Comber hastened from Wathen to assist in the good work, but died a few months later.

Mr. Weeks, who after some years at San Salvador was on a visit to England, returned soon after the awakening commenced, but was obliged to go back to England in a few months, shattered in health and exhausted with continued fevers. Happily he has been restored to health, and is again on the Congo. The missionaries now at San Salvador have none of them been out a year and can only work through interpreters, and in consequence things progress more slowly; indeed death has been so busy that only Mr. Grenfell, Mr. Moolenaar, Mr. Weeks and the writer have been out in the country more than three years.

Where God's work is prospering there are often many adversaries. At San Salvador the staff of priests in the Romish mission has been increased, and they have brought fresh pressure to bear upon the king, urging him to insist on the people dividing themselves into two equal sections, and half at least to follow the priests. They demanded also that half the king's wives should follow their faith, but those ladies have opinions of their own and will not be dictated to in such matters. The poor king finds himself in a most difficult position, for the senior priest acts also as Portuguese resident. Oppose and seek to obstruct as they may, God's work goes on.

At Wathen station one or two of the mission lads are Christian. One of these recently baptized, was entitled to be the chief of his native town. During his stay in England his uncle had died and his body was dried and preserved that his nephew might give it honourable burial. As, however, he did not return so soon as expected, the funeral ceremony was performed. When the lad returned and the visit was paid to his mother's home, he was asked to be the chief. He was willing on one condition: that his chieftainship should be conducted on Christian principles. The test came. Another uncle died, and the lad was asked to call the witch doctor. This he refused to do. A second death occurred, and he was again entreated to fulfil the country customs. A second time he refused. Then it was whispered that perhaps he was the witch and so would not call the palaver. His mother entreated him with tears to comply with the wishes of his people; but as they would not consent to his condition he firmly refused, and told them he would return to the missionary, and be engaged in mission-work. If he might live as a Christian, he would do as he had done, play his cornet and then tell the people about God. This they did not want, and he left them and settled at Wathen. Here he was baptized and on the occasion gave a most suitable address showing the influence the missionaries had had upon him; detailing his home experiences, and avowing thorough determination to be the Lord's servant. The trial had ripened his character. He went away a boy and returned, after twenty months, a man. He has since married a native Christian girl, and is devoted to the work of his choice. His conduct bears testimony to the profession he has made, and he has become a fellow-helper to the truth.

At Arthington, only a few of the boys and girls have given evidence of a change of heart, and in consequence of the death of the two last missionaries in charge, the study of Kiteke must be commenced again by new missionaries.

So with much to hinder and try us, the work goes on. The results have been far greater than we could have hoped, and were regarded even with suspicion by some of us, so surprising and rich was the blessing. It is too soon to mention numbers in these early days, but of the genuineness of the religious awakening there is no room for doubt. If all this has resulted from our early imperfect endeavours, what great hopes we may entertain for the future.

The Kishikongo language has been thoroughly reduced. Translations of the Scriptures are in progress. Some vocabularies of the principal languages spoken between the mouth of the River Everything inspires faith and hope. Our great Master is with us, He will plan and arrange. Led by Him, and strengthened by His might, we will go on fearlessly and gladly in our blessed work of winning Africa for Christ.

The illustrations which accompany this paper are from photographs which are the property of the Young Men's Baptist Mission Association.

NTAMO BAY—STANLEY POOL.

and the Stanley Falls have been taken down, and the study is still going on.

At Lokoele and the Equator the seed is being sown; and we are hoping to see several new stations established before long upon the Upper River. With such a waterway to give us access to the people, how great are the possibilities.

The blessing already vouchsafed, the great difficulties already surmounted, should certainly encourage us to work on in spite of death and present difficulty, assured by past experience that in due season we shall reap if we faint not.

The engraving with which we close represents a corner of Stanley Pool where is a spot called Ntamo-Bay which much resembles our county of Kent. The hills and the outer edge were called "Dover Cliffs," that they might the better remind our men of the dear old country they had left. The English settlement is situated on the edge of the little bay, and here the surgical and medical skill of the missionaries has been extensively employed, and made the means of blessing, both of body and of soul, to large numbers who live within their reach.

MRS. HEMANS.

I.

IT is an oft-repeated fact that poets whose works cannot win due appreciation at the time of their production, find, in the long run, justice from the public. Milton may sell his manuscript of "Paradise Lost" for five pounds; Keats may be crushed by a harsh article in the "Quarterly"; Wordsworth's "Excursion" may be greeted by the celebrated Edinburgh Reviewer, Lord Jeffrey, with the cry, "This will never do!" but, in the end, the unfavourable verdict is reversed by that great Court of Appeal, the English reading public, and posterity awards to the poet his rightful fame. This doctrine of the ultimate justice of literary opinion has truth in it; but it is not all true. For, whereas a full amount of praise comes in the end to poets who cannot obtain it immediately, the case is altered when they have received too much of it in life. Then posterity has not even bare justice to offer them! The pendulum of public opinion, having swung too far in the direction of praise, proceeds to swing just as far in the opposite direction of neglect. An author spoiled, flattered and caressed during lifetime, does not win the attention he really deserves when the revulsion has set in; and it seems as though there lurked a spell in this undue popularity, to bring about an undue oblivion by-and-by.

Something of this is true with regard to Felicia Hemans. In her day there can be little doubt that she was over-estimated. In glancing over the criticisms of her poetry which appeared during her lifetime and upon her death, such expressions as the following meet the eye:

"Her pre-eminence has been acknowledged not only in her own land, but wherever the English tongue is spoken, whether on the banks of the eastern Ganges or the western Mississippi."—Blackwood's Magazine.

"Magnificent bursts of poetry."—Athenæum.

"The imperishable gifts of Mrs. Hemans' genius . . . . Glorious course on earth . . . . Unclouded fame."—Professor Norton.

"Delightful genius. . . . The star that shines most brightly in the hemisphere."—Professor Wilson in Blackwood's Magazine.

Even the severe and accomplished critic Lord Jeffrey, though not led astray into this extravagant praise, wrote a most eulogistic article upon her poems in the Edinburgh Review.

Contrast these criticisms, written little more than half a century ago, some of them by men whose judgment in other matters still carries weight, with the modern tone respecting Mrs. Hemans! Her name, rarely mentioned, is received with a pitying smile. There is a vague impression in the minds of people who have scarcely read a line she wrote, to the effect that she is the exponent of an effete, bygone sentimentalism—the "sweetly pretty" school of poetry—in vogue when Books of Beauty and drawing-room albums were popular as the expression of culture! The man or woman who should, in modern literary society, announce a taste for Mrs. Hemans would at once be set down as an impostor, or slightly crazy. Young people never dream of studying poems that were the heart's delight of their ancestors a generation ago. The admirable primer of Macmillan's series, on English Literature, thus dismisses her:

"There was no longer now in England, any large wave of public thought or feeling such as could awaken poetry. We have then . . . a number of pretty little poems, having no inward fire, no idea, no marked character. They might be written by any versifier at any time, and express pleasant indifferent thought in pleasant verse. Such were Mrs. Hemans's poems."

There is a certain pitifulness in this "falling from her high estate," of the gentle singer who delighted English readers in the early decades of the present century, especially when it is remembered that the claims of popular poetry to long life are of no slight importance. Mrs. Hemans was undoubtedly placed too high by her contemporaries. But a literary idol, if once dethroned, is often not set up again even in the modest niche that may be its rightful position. It is worth while to spend a little time in studying the work this author did; and perhaps the result of coming face to face with her half-forgotten poems, may be to induce a higher estimate of their value. It is not necessary to talk about "imperishable genius," and the like, in order to have a very real and genuine appreciation of the work done by one who was almost the first of English poetesses, and to whom, for what she achieved in her day and generation, every English reader owes gratitude.

The life of Mrs. Hemans explains to a large extent the character of her poetry. The child of an Irish father—a Liverpool merchant, George Browne by name—and a mother of united German and Italian descent, she was gifted with an ardent, romantic nature, and with unusual personal beauty. When Felicia was seven years old her father failed in business, and retired with his wife and family to a quaint old house near Abergele. Here, with the sea and the mountains as her constant companions, the little Felicia passed a childhood most fitted to develope her imagination.

Of regular education she had little, but she roved at will among a store of books, feeding her fancy upon poetry and old romance. She was a very precocious child, and when she was only fourteen, a quarto volume of her "Juvenile Poems" was published by subscription. These poems, though clever for her age, were certainly not worth printing, and were criticised with outspoken freedom in a periodical called The Monthly Review.

This natural consequence of rushing prematurely into print, is characterised by her biographer in a tone that bears witness to the atmosphere of flattery in which the poetess was reared. Some praise as well as censure is awarded by The Monthly Review critic to the little girl, and he wisely says, "If the youthful author were to content herself for some years with reading instead of writing, we should open any future work from her pen with an expectation of pleasure." Surely this is fair enough; yet the reviewer is called "Some self-constituted arbiter of public taste," his remarks are "ungenerous and quite uncalled-for," and we are assured for our consolation, "this was at once the first and last time she was destined to meet with anything like harshness or mortification."

When a little girl of fourteen who publishes a quarto volume, cannot bear to be told to wait awhile—when her friends and contemporaries are indignant at such "harshness," and we are assured that never again was unfavourable criticism met with—we can understand what Wordsworth meant when, many years later, he called Mrs. Hemans a "spoilt child of the world." Yet this lavish popularity was in no way to be laid to her own fault. She did but sing as Nature taught her, and if she was too much extolled, that is no blame to her. This over-esteem is only emphasized to bring out one reason, unjust and absurd as that reason may be, for modern neglect. Wordsworth, in spite of his remark, says tenderly in the elegiac poem to which his just criticism is prefixed:

Believe me ever faithfully Yours
Felicia Hemans

> Mourn rather for that holy Spirit,
> Sweet as the spring, as ocean deep,
> For Her who, ere her summer faded,
> Has sunk into a breathless sleep.

Felicia Browne married Captain Hemans at the age of nineteen. After seven years of married life —years spent by Mrs. Hemans in literary activity as well as the cares of a family—Captain Hemans took up his residence in Italy, ostensibly on account of his health, and his wife with her five sons remained in Wales, sharing the home of her mother and sister.

Nothing was openly stated as to disagreement between the husband and wife, and Wordsworth says she was never heard to speak an unkind word of him; but they met no more. This separation cast a sadness over her life, which breathes in the poetry she continued rapidly to pour forth. Her mother's death was a second shock; her own health became uncertain; and after brief periods, spent in two homes, the one near Liverpool, and the other in Dublin, Mrs. Hemans passed away, aged only forty-one. Up to the last she was engaged in composing verse, and her "Sabbath Sonnet," dictated from her sick-bed only a few days before she died, is very touching.

Mrs. Hemans won in her personal character warm affection and admiration from her contemporaries. She visited Scott and Wordsworth in their respective homes.

The former said to her on parting: "There are some whom we meet and should like ever after to claim as kith and kin; and you are one of those."

After her visit to Rydal Mount, she took up her abode for a time at Dove's Nest in the neighbourhood. Here she was literally besieged, and was made to cry out in despair at the penalties of fame! Her personal attractiveness, the interest attaching to her pathetic history, and the fact that a poetess was a novelty in those days, all combined with the real sweetness of her verse in winning popularity.

Miss Mitford writes warmly of her as "a charming woman." It is interesting, by the way, to note in another letter of Miss Mitford's dated only a month later, the description of a certain Elizabeth Barrett who has "written most exquisite poems," and is "so sweet and gentle and so pretty, that one looks at her as if she were some bright flower." In the appearance of this Miss Barrett, afterwards Mrs. Browning, was involved a foreshadowing of the rapid decrease in popularity of Mrs. Hemans. But comparisons are unfair; and although Mrs. Hemans cannot pretend to the depth, the passion, the music of Mrs. Browning, each poetess may be valued in her own sphere without entrenching on that of the other.

In looking through her collected poems, one cannot but be struck by their number. She was cut off in the flower of her age, yet she produced an unusually large amount of work. And there was a lack of effort in her writing, which in its spontaneousness as well as its music reminds one of the singing of a bird. She seemed to express herself in verse as readily as in prose, and the tuneful ease of her strains has a soothing effect on the tired mind, contrasting as it does with the intense strenuousness of much good modern poetry.

Mrs. Hemans, like all true poets, had a passionate love of nature, closely observing her varying moods, and delineating with skill and sympathy what she saw.

Take as an illustration the "Voice of Spring," the well-known lyric beginning

> I come, I come! ye have called me long—
> I come o'er the mountains with light and song!
> Ye may trace my step o'er the wakening earth
> By the winds which tell of the violet's birth,
> By the primrose-stars in the shadowy grass,
> By the green leaves opening as I pass.

The vivid picture of the New England shores on the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers is familiar, perhaps too familiar to quote. And in all her descriptive passages Mrs. Hemans shows that she has the power both of seizing the outward aspects of nature, and embodying them in picturesque language. One very beautiful and less-known lyric is "The Palm-tree."

> It waved not through an eastern sky
> Beside a fount of Araby,
> It was not fanned by southern breeze,
> In some green isle of Indian seas,
> Nor did its graceful shadow sleep
> O'er stream of Afric, lone and deep.
>
> But fair the exiled palm-tree grew
> Midst foliage of no kindred hue,
> Through the laburnum's dropping gold
> Rose the light shaft of orient mould,
> And Europe's violets, faintly sweet,
> Purpled the moss beds at its feet.

Her childhood on the rugged coast of Wales had given Mrs. Hemans a passionate love for the hills. It is very striking to find how constantly the expression recurs of intense and ardent love for the mountains, partly for their own sake, and partly because they have often been the home of the persecuted seeking freedom.

> Those savage cliffs and solitudes might seem
> The chosen haunts where Freedom's foot would roam.
> She loves to dwell by glen and torrent-stream,
> And make the rocky fastnesses her home.
> And in the rushing of the mountain flood,
> In the wild eagle's solitary cry,
> In sweeping winds that peal through cave and wood,
> There is a voice of stern sublimity
> That swells her spirit to a loftier mood
> Of solemn joy severe, of power, of fortitude.

The revolt of the Swiss against Austrian tyranny is a constant theme of Mrs. Hemans. Over and over again the meadow of Grütli, by the banks of the Forest Sea of the Four Cantons, reappears in her stanzas, and the struggle against oppression and cruelty finds the most ardent sympathy in her words. But indeed it is so with every form of persecution, more particularly with that of religious persecution. Her very soul abhorred bigotry and tyranny, and intensely did she sympathise with the man who consented to be an exile and an outlaw rather than deny his father's God. The "Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers," already mentioned, is perhaps the best known of her lyrics on this theme, and the "Forest Sanctuary," the finest of her long poems, is entirely taken up with describing the mental conflicts and outward sufferings of a Spaniard, who, flying from the religious persecutions of his own country, takes refuge with his child in a primeval forest of North America.

And we have won a bower of refuge now
In this fresh waste, the breath of whose repose
Hath cooled, like dew, the fever of my brow,
And whose green oaks and cedars round me close
As temple walls and pillars that exclude
Earth's haunted dreams from their free solitude,
All save the image and the thought of those
Before us gone—our loved of early years,
Gone where affection's cup hath lost the taste of tears.

* * * * *

I look forth on the stars—the shadowy sleep
Of forests—and the lake whose gloomy deep
Sends up red sparkles to the fireflies' light.
A lonely world!—even fearful to man's thought,
But for His presence felt, whom here my soul hath sought.

The poetess's love for the mountains as God's refuge for the oppressed and her sympathies on behalf of freedom of conscience are finely blended in the "Hymn of the Vaudois Mountaineers in Times of Persecution."

For the strength of the hills we bless Thee
Our God, our fathers' God!
Thou hast made Thy children mighty
By the touch of the mountain sod.
Thou hast fixed our ark of refuge
Where the spoiler's foot ne'er trod.
For the strength of the hills we bless Thee
Our God, our fathers' God.

* * * * *

For the dark resounding caverns
Where Thy still small voice is heard;
For the strong pines of the forest
That by Thy breath are stirred;
For the storms on whose free pinions
Thy Spirit walks abroad;
For the strength of the hills we bless Thee
Our God, our fathers' God.

These beautiful words ring out a tone that has been steadily growing more distinct in England during the last fifty years. The struggles of the Vaudois are indeed long past; but there are other shapes and ways in which religious intolerance can find expression. The spirit of persecution and bigotry is not yet dead; but it is dying. Mrs. Hemans, in her day, struck many a blow at that enemy of true Christianity. Fervently religious to her heart's core, she never ceased to pour forth pure and ardent protests for the liberty that is in Christ Jesus.

When it is remembered that the words of Mrs. Hemans were read throughout the length and breadth of Great Britain—that the youth of the time were brought up and nourished upon them—can it be denied that her influence has been of special value? It is easy now to throw her teaching aside as a matter of course; we are learning the lesson, or have learned it, that the truth of God is stronger than the ordinances of man, and that the human heart is responsible alone to its Maker for its faith and trust.

But who can say how large a share this author has taken in the modern tone of public opinion regarding religious liberty? She helped to make the thought of her time; and we are now reaping the results.

It is often alleged that her poetry is "not strong:" yet there is that in it which can help to strengthen men.

For the influence of a popular writer who is ever pointing to Freedom as the inalienable right of man, and religious freedom from human restraint as his duty and privilege, is not easily to be over-estimated: and surely it is too often forgotten that in this direction Mrs. Hemans did much for her day and generation. Of her devotional utterances, strictly so-called, more will be said in another article; but it is worth the while of any one to take the complete edition of her poems, and turn over the pages, noting the numerous instances in which this idea recurs. Liberty, not license, was the watchword of this pure and noble spirit, of whom it may be said that she was one of the souls who help to lead their fellows onward in the path of progress—nearer to God.

LILY WATSON.

Things New and Old.

LEGH RICHMOND AND THE DUKE OF KENT.—The Rev. Legh Richmond was chaplain to H.R.H. the Duke of Kent, father of Queen Victoria, an appointment received in 1816. In the previous year, Mr. Richmond, then Rector of Turvey, became one of the honorary secretaries of the Religious Tract Society, which had already published "The Dairyman's Daughter," "The Young Cottager," and other interesting narratives from his pen. In June, 1816, Mr. Richmond requested the Duke's acceptance of a series of the Society's publications from the Committee. The following reply was sent from the Duke, dated, Kensington Palace, June 7, 1816:

"The Duke of Kent does himself the pleasure of acknowledging the Rev. Legh Richmond's favour of the 3rd inst., and begs to offer his best thanks, through Mr. Richmond, to the Committee of the Religious Tract Society for the set of their publications which accompanied it, and the receipt of which he was led to expect from a conversation he had some time since, at a public meeting, with his respected colleague, the Rev. Joseph Hughes.

"Mr. Richmond will oblige the Duke, when next he meets the Committee, by expressing the satisfaction he derives from being possessed of such valuable works, rendered doubly so by the manner in which they have been presented, and the channel through which they have reached him."

A similar gift to the Duchess of Kent, in 1818, was responded to in a letter written by her to the Rev. Dr. Steinkopff, the foreign secretary of the Society, adding a warm joint acknowledgment from the Duke and Duchess, of the Committee's "kind allusion to their recent union."

Mr. Richmond enjoyed the friendship of the Duke of Kent for the many years during which he was his chaplain.

He followed him to the grave, and he paid a warm tribute to his memory, in which he said, "Charity in him has lost its patron; the cause of God its firm and unshaken supporter; and illustrious rank its ornament and example. Testimonies like these are instructive to the living, while they are honourable to the departed. They prove that in this country, whenever exalted station is adorned with corresponding virtues, and consecrated to high and noble ends, it never fails to obtain the best of all kinds of homage, the homage of the heart."

Among the treasured recollections of her loved and honoured father, few could be more gratifying to our gracious Queen than those associated with Legh Richmond.

HOSPITAL CHILDREN.—Will you let me appeal to your readers for help for those invalid children who sorely need a change to country air, and are yet too young and too helpless to gain admittance to any Convalescent Homes? Last year the liberality of a few friends enabled us to board out some twenty little children in country cottages. Their ages varied between one and six years, and they were of all degrees of helplessness. One baby, a victim to many abscesses, could not walk nor even sit up without support when she was taken away, and she returned from a month's visit to a cottage on a breezy common with rosy cheeks and firm limbs, able to run across the floor to greet the grandmother, who exclaimed admiringly, "Surely this ain't never our little 'un!" In all cases the children are sent to places where we have personal knowledge of the mothers to whom we entrust them. We have sent invalids on crutches and invalids with wounds, and the wounds have healed and the cripples have gained health and strength in the sweet fresh air. The partings from the kind caretakers are often sorrowful affairs, and the children are frequently dismissed with tears as well as with useful little gifts from those who have also bestowed upon them such attention and tenderness as money can neither ensure nor repay. For years to come, those who are old enough to remember, will speak proudly of the great event of their lives—viz., the happy time "when I was at the country," that mysterious fairyland of all children; but, alas! to small East-enders an almost unknown world. If your readers will only think of the white-faced, sickly creatures for whom we plead, those who must have individual and motherly care (needing, as they do, constant attention), surely they will help us to carry out our plans. Instead of twenty, let us this year give to fifty children a chance of returning to their dreary East-end homes in good health, and thereby fit them better to face the days and lives into which so little brightness ever comes. Again let us repeat that it is for sick children that we plead, not the sound ones, who have other champions. The little invalids too young for any cottage homes or convalescent establishments are too little regarded. The smallest contributions will be welcomed and acknowledged by Miss V. H. Morten, The Larches, Banstead, or by Sister Queen, London Hospital, Whitechapel.

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

BY EMMA LESLIE.

CHAPTER III.—ONE AUTUMN EVENING.

ANN had just put the two boys to bed, and was on her way downstairs that evening, when she was startled by a double knock at the front door, and on opening it, she was confronted by an old gentleman, who was leaning against the wall at the side, and appeared to be in great pain.

"I have slipped and sprained my ankle, I am afraid," he said, "can you let me rest here for a few minutes, or better still, could you let me have a bed for the night?"

"I'll fetch you a chair," said Ann, in reply to the first part of his request, and as she went to the kitchen, she took care to see that the parlour-door was closely shut, lest her mistress should be disturbed by this untimely visitor.

"Now, if I could get my boot off," groaned the gentleman, as he sank down in the chair, which Ann placed on the door-mat.

"I can't ask you to come in and take it off," said Ann timidly, "for my mistress is——is not quite well; she is delicate."

"But if you could let me have a bed for the night," pleaded the sufferer, who seemed to be in great pain.

"We don't let lodgings," said Ann a little stiffly.

"But your family is small—you do not occupy the whole of this house. You see I have heard of Mrs. Danby, and I think I could make it worth your while to take me in for a little time."

But Ann shook her head. In truth she was half offended at the mere suggestion of taking a lodger, but the old gentleman was persistent, and would not take No for an answer.

"Go and ask your mistress about it," he said, "tell her I am an old friend of her uncle Joseph, and am willing to pay anything for the accommodation," and, at last, much against her inclination, Ann was perforce obliged to go and consult her mistress.

But Mrs. Danby had been standing near the door of the parlour, and had heard every word. "No, no, Ann," she said in a whisper, as Ann appeared in the doorway, "my uncle Joseph was always a scrapegrace, and I'll have nothing to do with his friends. We've got trouble enough now, without taking any more upon our shoulders."

"But if he could stay this one night," pleaded Ann, whose heart was touched, in spite of her pride.

"No, no; I won't have it," said Mrs. Danby impatiently, "I don't want to see anybody, and I won't have anybody here," and with this message somewhat modified in the delivery, Ann went back to the door.

"If you'll let me help you along, sir, I think you might manage to get home," she added by way of conclusion.

The old gentleman heaved a deep sigh.

"Obstinate—obstinate as ever," he muttered, under his breath. Then turning to Ann he said rather ungraciously, "Well, you may try and help me to the 'Albion,' that is where I am staying, if your mistress will let you, that is," he added by way of comment.

"Oh, yes, sir, she will let me do that, and I am sorry we cannot accommodate you, but you will be served better at the hotel, I'm sure."

"But I'm not so sure," grumbled the old gentleman. "I don't want a gadding chambermaid about me with a foot like this—ugh"—and the poor old man almost fainted with the agony of his injured foot and had to lean against the wall for support.

"Oh, dear, what shall I do?" murmured Ann. "Will you stay here a minute, sir, while I run across the road for the doctor. Dr. Bennet lives just opposite."

"Ah, fetch him," groaned the sufferer, and he leaned his arms on the railing and bowed his head upon them in the extremity of his pain. When the doctor came and saw him, he sent for a chair and a couple of men to carry him the rest of the way to the hotel, and then on examining the foot he found that the ankle was badly dislocated, and of course the attempt to walk upon it had greatly aggravated it.

In spite of what her mistress might think about her long continued absence, Ann stopped until the doctor had set the limb and placed the patient comfortably in bed, for she was used to sickness, and when she saw the finely-dressed chambermaid she could understand the old gentleman's shrinking from having her as a nurse, and so she did all she could for him before leaving. Her heart reproached her now for not making some effort to take the poor old man in and nursing him for a while. They could have done it very well, for they had a spare bed-room that no one occupied just now, and her mistress would doubtless have yielded the point if she had pressed her to do so. Ann persuaded herself that she was wholly to blame in the matter, and made herself very miserable when she got home, which was not improved by finding her mistress cross, tired, and alarmed at her long absence.

But she was greatly surprised at Bertie's first question the next morning.

"Ann, was the poor old gentleman very bad?" he said, when she went into his room to tell him to get up.

"Why? what do you know about it," she said in some amazement.

"You left our door open when you went downstairs last night, and when I heard the knock, I thought it might be papa, for I've been praying to God, Ann, to send papa back to take care of us, and I thought he'd come, and I got out of bed to run downstairs, and then I heard somebody say he had hurt his foot, but I knew it wasn't papa."

"And you heard all about it, I suppose?" said Ann.

Bertie nodded. "I wish you and mamma had let him stop," he said, "he could have had my bed, for his foot was bad, I think."

"Yes, it was," said Ann, with a certain snappishness in her tone; "but I begin to think we have all been very selfish, and cared nothing for other people, so that now it is next to impossible for us to do a kind action, or even what we ought to do for others."

"You think we ought to have let him stop when he asked us," said Bertie thoughtfully.

"Yes, I do. The poor fellow was in awful pain, I know, and to turn him out like that was dreadful," and Ann put her apron to her eyes for a minute or two, in a manner that made the two little boys feel very solemn.

"Do you think he will die, Ann?" asked Tommy with a rueful face.

"No, no, dear, I don't suppose he will die," said Ann with something between a smile and a sob; "but he is down here all alone, with nobody to take care of him, and we might have done something for him, and it's a great mistake that we didn't, I think," concluded Ann as she helped Tommy with his knickerbockers.

"Where does he live?" asked Bertie.

"At the 'Albion'—that great dull hotel near the beach."

"I know, we go to the pavilion sometimes—they let us go now there are not many people there—so, perhaps, we shall see him there some day, and then I'll tell him how sorry we are," said Bertie. He secretly hoped that he might find the old gentleman sitting in one of the alcoves that very morning, and went out after breakfast to try and find him. But the pavilion was deserted to-day, and not even Jack Bond was to be seen on the beach, and so after wandering about in an aimless fashion for an hour or two, the children went home again.

But Bertie could not feel easy. "Don't you think you ought to go and see how that old gentleman is, Ann?" he asked, as he stood watching her sweep up the kitchen hearth after dinner.

"He don't want me now, of course the doctor was going for a nurse last night," said Ann. "There it's no good worrying over spilt milk, my dear; we made a mistake, and there's no mending it now," she concluded.

"But if he's all alone, Ann, don't you think he would like to have somebody go and see him?" persisted the boy.

"Perhaps he would, and perhaps he wouldn't," said Ann.

"Don't you think he would like to see my book that papa gave me last Christmas? It's full of pictures, you know, I feel sure he would like to see that. It made me forget my toothache—don't you remember, Ann, how we laughed at some of the funny pictures?"

"Oh, yes, I remember," said the old woman with a sigh, as she recalled the cosy nursery, and the ease and plenty that reigned there.

"Well, won't you take it to him after you have washed yourself? Do, Ann, go and tell him how sorry we are that we didn't let him stop here; but that I've sent him the best picture-book I've got."

Ann laughed at the idea of being sent on such an errand, but the boy's earnest face, made her half-inclined to yield, and so after a little more coaxing from Bertie, she agreed to put on her bonnet and "run round to the 'Albion,'" before tea.

"My dear, Mr. Robinson—that is the old gentleman's name—is very much obliged to you for the book," said Ann when Bertie came into the kitchen, just before tea time, to know the result of her errand.

"How is his foot?" asked Bertie.

"Oh, easier, of course; but he can't get out of bed, and he says if he has to lie there more than a day or two, he hopes you will go and see him, and take him another book."

"Would mamma let me go, do you think?" asked Bertie; "I could read to him, you know, sometimes, if he would like it."

"Well, I'll talk to mamma about it this evening, after you have gone to bed. Go back to Tommy now, and keep him quiet for poor mamma's head is bad to-day."

"Yes, Ann, I wish the postman would not bring those big blue letters, they always make mother's head ache, and I see the tears come into her eyes when she reads them."

Ann sighed. "Yes, yes, dear, I know," she said; "and what the end is to be I cannot tell."

"But don't you think God knows all about it, Ann?" asked Bertie.

"Oh, yes, dear, of course but—but I don't see how He can help us, until your papa comes home, and even then things may be no better," and Ann put her apron to her eyes again. "Now, my dear, you go and play; little boys have only got to play and amuse themselves," said Ann seeing Bertie was watching her.

But the boy shook his head.

"I'm not such a little boy now, Ann; I'm ten, and I've been asking God to let me help mamma, and I would, if I only knew how."

Ann smiled.

"My dear, you could not understand what is troubling us all just now—I do not rightly make it out somehow; I only know your papa has had to go away, and the factory is shut up, because he had not money enough to carry it on, so you see a little boy like you cannot do anything."

"But, Ann, you said if we prayed to God and tried to do anything——"

"Yes, yes, dear," interrupted Ann; "but I can hear Tommy calling you now, run to him—that is the only way you can help us."

Bertie returned to the parlour, and resumed the task of teaching his brother to play at draughts; but his mind was busy over what he had heard from Ann just now, comparing it also with what he had heard on a previous occasion, that God was ready and willing to help in everything; and he resolved to pray again and again that God would teach him how to help his mother in her great trouble. Of course he expected that his prayers would be answered by the speedy return of his father, and day after day he watched for his coming, but only to be disappointed.

Meanwhile, however, he took care to do what Ann assured him would be a help and comfort to his mother—he refrained from any grumbling or complaining about the very plain food, which was all they could afford to buy now; and he did all he could to keep his little brother happy and content, often yielding his own rights, or giving up his own toys, that his mother might not be worried. Neither did he forget the old gentleman at the "Albion." His mother gave him permission to take another book, and go to enquire after Mr. Robinson; but beyond this she did not show much interest in him, and soon forgot his existence in the anxiety caused by her own misfortunes. Even her boys, so long as they did not worry her, seemed to be forgotten just now, so overwhelmed was she with the present trouble and gloomy forebodings of the future.

So Bertie was left to go his own way unquestioned, and it soon became a daily habit for him to spend an hour in the morning, reading, or talking to Mr. Robinson, who was still confined to his room, though not to his bed. At first these visits were not very agreeable to the little boy, for, although the old gentleman always seemed pleased to welcome him, he was often querulous, and spoke shortly and sharply sometimes, so that Bertie had to remind himself that he had not come there to please himself, but to help his old friend bear the pain of his foot.

By degrees, however, as the ankle improved, these visits grew more pleasant, and when at last Mr. Robinson was able to be taken out in a wheeled chair to the pavilion, Bertie began to discover that the day was very long and dull if he could not go and see his friend. All sorts of things did they talk about—the books they had read, the foreign countries the old gentleman had seen, the habits of animals, birds, and insects—nothing came amiss to Bertie, and Mr. Robinson seemed to have an inexhaustible store of information upon every subject.

When, however, they met in the wind-sheltered pavilion, and Tommy made one of the party, the subjects of conversation gradually changed. He, like Bertie, was very soon won by the old gentleman's genial manner, and as soon as they were upon sufficiently intimate terms, the grumbling that was restrained at home found vent in the pavilion. One day he told Mr. Robinson how stingy Ann was with the sugar, and how seldom they had meat for dinner now, and never any jam for tea with their bread and butter.

"But we have plenty of bread-and-butter, and mother says that is better for us while we are at the seaside," said Bertie quickly, anxious to stop this grumbling.

"I don't believe it's just that," said Tommy; "it's because papa does not come home, and we can't have the factory. I heard mamma tell Ann yesterday the money was almost gone; and I know she hasn't got much in her purse."

"Hush, hush, Tommy, mother wouldn't like us to talk about these things if she knew it," said Bertie, feeling very uncomfortable; and Mr. Robinson tried to lead the talk into another channel; but Tommy was full of his latest grievance, and never could be made to remember a promise in time to keep it; and so Mr. Robinson gradually learned that the little household who had refused to help him in his hour of need, were in the sorest straits now, on the verge of actual starvation if what the child said was true.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

ON THE HEROINES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

NO. XVI.

There, on the bank of the river it found her,
The great gospel message from lips that were true.
And mingling its tones with the sweet sounds around her,
The story came home to her heart, fresh and new.
Ah! Blessed the souls who can simply receive
The glad tidings of good, and as children believe!

1. Like an army ye come, O invincible horde!
The scourge of the land; by its dwellers abhorred.
2. The first little word of an answer so sweet,
That Christ granted the boon as she fell at His feet.
3. So senseless thou art! A mere block, or a clod!
Dost thou then bow down, 'fore the symbol of God?
4. Rich compound of sweet things both costly and rare;
Fit emblem it is of the saints' earnest prayer.
5. The wife of a king whose perverseness and pride
God's commands disobeyed, and His power defied.

M. E. B.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. IV.—p. 432.—LUKE

1. 2 Tim. iv. 11.
2. Colossians iv. 14.
3. The Gospel of Luke; and the Acts of the Apostles.
4. For Theophilus, Luke i. 3; Acts i. 1.
5. Luke i. 46–55; 68–79; ii. 29–32.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMAS.

NO. XIII.—p. 414.—MARY, SISTER OF MARTHA.

1. M-oses . . . . . Ex. ii. 1-9.
2. A-xe . . . . . 2 Kings vi. 1-5.
3. R-ahab . . . . . Josh. ii. 1-19.
4. Y-ear . . . . . Gen. xvii. 21.

NO. XIV.—p. 432.

(1) 1 Sam. xxv. 43; (2) 2 Kings viii. 29; (3) 1 Kings xxi. 3, 13; (4) 2 Kings ix. 1, 10; (5) ix. 17; 1 Sam. xxix. i.; (6) 1 Kings xviii. 45, 46; 2 Kings ix. 17, 20; (7) 2 Kings viii. 29; ix. 24, 27; 2 Chron. xxii. 7; (8) 2 Kings ix. 30–35; x. 8; (9) 1 Kings xxi. 1; (10) xviii. 45, 46; xxi. 17, 18; (11) Joshua xvii. 16; 1 Kings xxi. 23, 24; 2 Kings ix. 16–21, 24, 27, 28, 33, 36; x. 2; (12) ix. 22; (13) 1 Kings xxi. 12; (14) 2 Kings x. 11; (15) ix. 24; 1 Kings xxi. 13; 2 Kings ix. 27, 33; (16) 2 Sam. ii. 8, 9; (17) 1 Kings xxi. 11; 2 Kings x. 1, 7; (18) Joshua xvii. 16; Judges i. 19; iv. 3.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

"HEAVEN IS AS NEAR BY SEA AS BY LAND."—Sir Humphrey Gilbert.

No. 1791.—AUGUST 25, 1888.

MISSION WORK IN THE DOWNS.[1]

THE vessels which come to anchor in the Downs represent many nations and come from and are bound to many ports. From London alone we find ships bound to India, Australia, America and the Cape; to Nova Scotia with half a cargo on board, or round to Cardiff in ballast. As they lie in the Downs waiting till the west winds cease, the crews are comparatively at leisure. The bustle of London docks and London river is over. The tug-boat no longer lies alongside whistling and blowing off steam. There is at any rate quiet. The men too are all on board the vessels, while in the London docks the vessels are empty of men, the sailors being then in the boarding-houses, and not to be found in the ships until the very last hour of bustle and departure.

Beside the vessels from London there are to be found in the long heaving line of shipping in the Downs stately clippers from Dundee and the North of England, outward bound to Calcutta or Kurrachee, or Chittagong, or Yokohama; German barques, Norwegian timber ships, Italian, Greek, French, and Spanish merchantmen; besides numbers of our own colliers whose gallant crews in all seasons and weathers follow their perilous course along the east coast of England—a voyage which in a winter's gale is for those poor ill-found vessels of the direst peril.

Barges too in numbers are found here; French chasse-marées, pilot-boats, English tug-boats, and sometimes men-of-war, and torpedo vessels or cruising gun-boats swell the total; while far away on the horizon gleam the dull red hulls of the nearer lightships round the Goodwin Sands, the more distant ones being out of sight.

Sometimes in stormy weather 300 or 400 vessels, most of which are English, are anchored in the Downs. The crews are found in loneliness and leisure, and their hearts are prepared for a kindly word by the sense of the coming voyage, still shrouded in the obscurity of the future, and by the thought of their approaching departure from the dear old land.

To reach the vessels which lie from one to three miles distant from the land the Mission boat is launched. The tide runs hard, and often a strong wind is blowing, and a passing squall blows the crests of the waves into smoke.

The crew of the Mission boat consist of the chaplain, who steers; the coxswain, who has been for twenty-four years in the Mission boat; and the bowman, who makes his boat-hook fast on many a stormy day to the lofty sides and chains of many a vessel.

The starting-point of the Mission boat is the boatmen's rooms which have been recently built, by the kind support of the ladies of Deal and Walmer, particularly by the liberal donation of Miss Lucy Hill, and by the energy and influence of the Countess Sydney, to whose generous interest in all that concerns the welfare of the Deal boatmen they must be for ever indebted.

They contain a large reading-room, where papers and books are provided for seafaring men, where services are held and a coffee bar provided. They contain, also, the chaplain's office, where books for sailors are stored, and Bibles kept in twenty-one languages for sale in the Downs.

The crew of the Mission boat usually assemble for prayer before the launch, and having commended their work and themselves to God, put on oilskins and sou'westers. The boat lies in front near the capstan, by which she is daily heaved up a distance of fifty or sixty yards when she returns from sea. Twenty willing pair of hands stand by to rush the good boat into the water; the long-expected "smooth" comes, and she is quickly afloat.

A regular church service, with the decent formalities usual on board ship, is not always possible in the Downs. Setting up the rigging, trimming a shifted cargo, bending a new topsail, getting an anchor and chain on board are sometimes imperative necessities; and a formal assemblage of the crew is therefore impracticable on such occasions. But even then much can be done with the watch below or with all hands at dinner hour.

Hymns are sung in the forecastle. The temperance pledge book is brought out and signed, the opportunity of signing being often welcomed by some weak and despairing slave as a heaven-sent chance, big with wondrous possibilities for him of a new and better life. Many a time, after such a scene, has the whole forecastle "crowd" joined in prayer to God, and in blessing the messenger of His mercy. Many chances are also thus afforded of saying a word to individuals, which sinks deeper than anything that can be said to men collectively.

When a regular service is held in which all hands, from the captain to the cabin boy, take part, it is a sight singularly impressive. The British red ensign covers the capstan. Hymn-books and the customary forms of prayer, are handed round to the captain, mates, passengers and crew, for all are assembled, and all come willingly. On one particular occasion the glory of sea and sky was remarkable. The blue and gold of the sun and the majestical firmament shone and shimmered in the waves of the sea. The towering masts seemed to reach the sky, and the wind hummed through the rigging of the noble ship. We began with "Rock of Ages," and then the Litany was read; then came another hymn, and an address; then a final hymn and the blessing. Deep emotion, many hand-grasps, with farewells waved from the deck and aloft, are the usual accompaniments of such services.

On Nov. 28, in a previous year we were on board the Kedron, a north-country barque, homeward bound after a voyage of two years and three months' duration. She had been trading in the East Indies, and was bound to Riga with a cargo of damaged cocoa-nuts, if that port were free from ice. We had a gathering on deck—not a formal service—and solemn words were said. A hymn was sung, "I need Thee, precious Jesus." Much interest was shown by all on board—indeed, it was with difficulty we avoided accepting presents from the mate as we got over the side; and to this day a keen remembrance of the manly cordiality and gratitude of the crew lives in our memory. The mate and steward impressed us as godly men who knew and loved the Saviour. The recollection had a new import when in "The Standard" of December 11th following, we read the mournful telegram: "The British barque Kedron has gone on shore off Dome Ness. All hands were lost."

[1] The Downs is the great roadstead between the Goodwin Sands and the coast of Kent. This work is carried on by The Missions to Seamen, of 11 Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W.C.

The Bible is sold here in twenty-one languages. The sales are, as might be expected, most frequent on board English vessels, and almost invariably lead to interesting conversation, and very often to a service at which all hands muster. Many copies are also sold on board foreign vessels, Russians purchase, and of course Germans and Norwegians. Recently an Italian Bible was sold to an Italian captain, who then first in his life-time opened a Bible. On board this same ship the chaplain read the story of the Philippian jailer to a Greek sailor in his own tongue, the man then heard it for the first time, and for him the same Italian captain purchased a Greek Testament.

On the 12th of May, 1887, we boarded a large French barque lying in the Downs, homeward bound from Chili with a crew of twenty "tous compris." We were most kindly received by the mate, who gladly took tracts and books, and who asked the chaplain if he wished to speak with the men. This was a remarkable incident, as all on board were Roman Catholics. The chaplain assenting, the men were called, and aft they tramped and clattered, some in sabots, some in sea-boots, and were introduced by the mate to the chaplain in these words: "M. le ministre Protestant desire vous voir."

All caps came off, and great was the eagerness for books, of which they had absolutely none.

An album made by ladies, adorned with cards and pictures, combined with texts and tracts in French, was most gratefully received—tracts were welcomed—portions of the gospel were received. The story of the penitent thief was read by the chaplain. Afterwards the mate purchased his first French Bible for which he paid his franc. Had the crew possessed money, not merely one but half-a-dozen Bibles would have been sold.

In all cases, however, where men wish for the Holy Scriptures, and have no money to buy a new Bible or Testament, it is a rule to present them with a portion of the Scriptures or a disused Bible or New Testament in their mother tongue.

A very important branch of the work is the Temperance department. In the last nine years, 69,879 men have been enrolled in the Missions to Seamen branch of the Church of England Temperance Society, of which number 1198 were obtained in the Downs. On board a barque bound to Valparaiso, on January 18th, 1887, nine men joined; on the 27th of the same month, when beating down channel in cold and wet, the captain of the vessel, either not knowing or forgetting their pledge, offered them each a glass of grog; and the pilot, who was on board at the time, told me on his return home that the nine men refused the offer, and remained steadfast.

The temperance pledges are sometimes taken in the cabin after a service permitted by the captain, and sometimes forward in the forecastles.

In one forecastle I have known perhaps twenty men, representing six or seven nationalities.

The chain cables of the vessel often run through the forecastle into the hawse holes, which therefore cannot be stopped up till the anchor is weighed. The wind blows freely through them. The fabric of the ship rises and falls with the waves, and the chain creaks and vibrates at each strain. Strongly-made chests, holding the sailors' worldly all, are the seats, and very often the only tables for food—food which is not at all unusually served out in a wooden tub or skid. The aforesaid chests contain their best clothes, some cherished photograph, and, too often far down at the bottom, a Bible which mother or sister or wife has put in. In many old ships nimble cockroaches crawl plentifully about unnoticed, while the sides of the apartment are covered with the men's painted clothes and sou'westers.

Eagerly a bag of books and tracts is accepted and hung up, while the bag, the handiwork of ladies ashore, is admired and gratefully criticized.

The Missions to Seamen Almanac replaces the chalked calendar which necessity has taught the men to extemporize. Then the temperance question is introduced, "Are there any total abstainers amongst you here?" I have known the reply, "Yes—all of us in spite of ourselves just now."

Let me add, in passing, that on the 27th of last January, in reply to my question, I received the following answer: "Yes! I'm a total abstainer, but I'm better than that, I belong to Jesus."

And then the men get interested in the subject and mournfully recount their errors. A hymn is sung, all having been presented with hymn-books—it may be "When I survey the wondrous cross," or "Ho! my comrades, see the signal." Then perhaps one man says he will sign provided his mate does too. This is done; then two more follow, and so on.

On the 25th April, 1887, every man in a large forecastle signed and then we all knelt in prayer—that God would keep His frail and feeble children from falling. Suddenly came the call, "Turn out, men! Away aloft!" The men, shaking hands as they rushed out, swarmed up the rigging, and we got over the side of the ship and shoved off the Mission boat. On this occasion every cap aloft was waved by the crew in farewell; and as we returned the salute to the men laying out on the yards, the freshening breeze carried us to another vessel.

There is a great demand among sailors for reading matter which is at once agreeable and useful. A good book—a book which is essentially and positively good and true and makes for righteousness—is always appreciated, and is a mighty engine for the moral elevation of the men.

A selection of twenty or thirty valuable books in one of the splendidly made bags which have come to us from ladies of Tunbridge Wells or London, or Croydon or Canterbury, or Walmer or Deal, are most gratefully received, and the bag itself always comes in for its share of admiration.

Hymn-books also are greatly appreciated, and within the last three years over three thousand have been given to seamen.

Tracts in about twenty-one languages are also given, and no instance has come before us in the Downs where a tract has been refused.

Having given some tracts in Bengali, Arabic and Parsee to a crowd of Asiatics, the titles of which were "Atonement for sin," "The punishment of sin," "Judgment to come," "Resurrection of the dead," the mate of the vessel called out to the serang or leader of the Asiatics, "Don't light your pipe with those tracts," and the memorable reply made by that swarthy serang was, "If I were to light my pipe with so good a book the smoke would choke me."

French, Italians, Russians, Greeks, Spaniards, Portuguese, Chilians, Asiatics, have never within the last nine years refused a tract, but on the contrary have always received them gratefully.

The boatmen of Deal, Walmer, and Kingsdown, with the fishermen, number from about 1,000 to 1,100 men. Their life is a hard and perilous one. They are afloat in their luggers in the wildest winter gales, and even in their smaller boats go through great dangers in launching through the surf.

I once asked a Deal boatman, lying sick of inflammation of the lungs from exposure, about the voyage on which he contracted his chill. "How did you do?" "Wery ornary, sir," he said; "we were out three days and three nights in the boat and didn't earn a penny." "Where did you sleep?" "In the boat under the sail, and the third night we were perished."

These are the men who cruise round the Goodwins and in the Downs in gale and snowstorm, "hovelling," or looking out for a job to help a vessel in distress, for which help they are, as is only just, paid either by agreement or as a Board of Arbitration decides.

When the winter's blast makes our houses vibrate to their foundation, and when the rockets from the distant lightships thrown up to the heavens tell of a ship in distress on the Goodwins, while we are sleeping comfortably, these gallant boatmen man the lifeboats.

The rescue of the crew of the s.s. Sorrento, forty-seven souls, by the Kingsdown lifeboat, can never be forgotten. And to come to the present year: on the 23rd March, 1887, the Walmer coxswain, J. Mackins, with lifeboat and crew, started at four o'clock A.M. in response to rockets from the lightships to the rescue of a ship on the Goodwin Sands. The wreck was eight miles from land, and it was blowing a heavy gale from the S.S.W. with a fearful sea. They crossed the Goodwins in about eight or nine feet of water in one smother of foam. The boat was filled thirty times, and had scarcely time to free herself before the next mountain of water came on her. In thick rain she reached the wreck, only to find that the crew had just been taken out by the Ramsgate lifeboat.

Again, on the morning of May the 15th, about 2 A.M., a flare burned from some vessel on the Goodwins and rockets from the lightships indicated a ship in distress on the sands. The coxswain, R. Roberts, and the crew of the North Deal lifeboat were afloat about 2.30, and in the teeth of the gale crossed the Goodwins in the shallow water. There both they and the Ramsgate lifeboat met terrific seas, which nearly buried both boats underneath them. The furious tide running carried the Ramsgate boat away from the wreck, to which the captain and six men were clinging, while the sea broke heavily over the foretop of the doomed vessel. Carefully steering and sweeping along under storm foresail before the wind, the Deal lifeboat anchored in proper position, sheering close to the wreck with a bit of their sail. Closer they came, and then hurled their cane with lead attached, thus getting a line on board the wreck. Now bite, good anchor, and cable hold fast—if either fail all are lost! A mighty sea came on board the lifeboat, carrying the coxswain off his feet, but he saved his life by clinging with his arms round the foremast. One by one, dragged through the boiling water, came the crew, and last the captain, whose little son had been thrown first into the sea, with rope attached, and drawn into the lifeboat. All were saved! And so having slipped their cable and lost their anchor and sprung their foremast, the Deal boatmen set their foresail, and with the British ensign flying in token of "Rescued Crew," once more sailed through the breakers on the Goodwins, and landed the saved and wondering sailors on Deal Beach.

These brave boatmen are visited by the Missions to Seamen's Chaplain and Scripture Reader on the beach and in their look-out houses. Their luggers, when going to sea, are supplied with books. Services exclusively for boatmen and fishermen are maintained twice a week in Deal and Walmer by the Chaplain.

Lightships are now to be found on the edge of every dangerous sand. Picturesque as their red hulls are in fine weather, it should be realized that their crews face in their exposed and solitary vessels the full fury of the winter hurricanes.

The four Goodwin Lights are:

(a) The Gull, 3½ miles from Deal. White light, revolving every twenty seconds.

(b) The North Sand Head. White flash three times in twenty-four seconds, thirty-six seconds' darkness; ten miles from Deal.

(c) East Goodwin, ten miles from land and ten miles from Deal. Green light, revolving every fifteen seconds.

(d) South Sand Head. Double flash, short and long every half minute. 5½ miles from Deal.

Beside these, the Tongue Lightship, eighteen miles from Deal, and the Varne Lightship off Folkestone, twenty miles from Deal, are visited periodically; and the distant Galloper and Long-sand Lightships, both fifty miles from Deal, and thirty miles from the nearest point of land; and also the Royal Sovereign Lightship, sixty miles off,—have been visited.

There are seven men always on board each of these lightships, and by reason of their distance from land, from friends, news, home, and the public services of religion, the visits made to them are always warmly welcomed. Through long intercourse in all weathers and seasons, relations of genuine friendship are established between these lonely men and the Missions to Seamen Chaplains.

Very few realize the position of the crews of these solitary and stationary vessels. In the wildest winter gales, in the thickest fogs, in snow-storms, they ride at anchor,—nothing between them and destruction but the strength of their moorings; and while they are beaten and almost smothered by the tempestuous seas which sometimes break over them, the men still must guard and tend their lights, they still must watch the machinery which regulates the times in which their lights revolve. The slightest irregularity of their flash might lead the passing vessels to destruction.

The crowd of outward and homeward-bound vessels are told their position and their proximity to the dreaded sands, by the particular flash which identifies each vessel.

My visits to the East Goodwin Lightship have always an element of risk, in them. On the last occasion we crossed the Goodwins, the water was shallow in spots, and under full sail we struck the sand at least a dozen times. The roar of breaking water on each side of us, the exceeding loneliness and even "eerieness" of the place eight miles from land, and the melancholy and dangerous projecting stumps of engulphed ships, formed a scene hard to transfer to paper. When with thankful hearts we were once again borne along by our good mainsail into deep water outside the Goodwins, and felt the long roll of the North Sea under our keel, and saw the dull red hull of the lightship, and her crew, while we were yet a great way off, crowding her side, as they cheered our approach, we were rewarded indeed.

A very short time ago we visited the lightship placed near the wreck of the ill-fated s.s. Scholten, with which vessel it will be remembered about 150 of the passengers found a watery grave. The Scholten lies in seventeen fathoms of water, about five miles from land off Dover, and in a very rough spot. We reached the lightship in a rather heavy sea, which made it difficult to lie alongside, so that having got on board, we veered the Mission boat a long way astern, where she rode safely. Hard by, one moment ten feet above the sea, and the next overwhelmed by the advancing billow, there was visible the mast of the Scholten. Entombed in her hull, probably 100 bodies lay, and no preacher or moralist could have pointed a more solemn lesson than did that grim and lonely wave-washed mast.

The men on the lightship were all old friends, and welcomed us most warmly. They had been a fortnight on board, and had nothing to read excepting a torn and very ancient piece of newspaper. We brought them abundance of books and held service on board.

The coast-guard stations in Deal, Walmer, and Kingsdown, with those more remote, are also regularly visited. They include, with the families, some three hundred souls. Thus in many directions and by various channels the useful "Missions to Seamen" pursues the work of making known the Gospel of Christ.

THOMAS STANLEY TREANOR, M.A.

THE ARMADA THANKSGIVING.

IT was Friday, the 19th of July, 1588 when the watch-fires on the headlands and hills told of the approach of the Spanish Armada, "speeding the message on," not always in a direct line from cape to cape, as the ballad would have us suppose, but zigzagging inland, sometimes for many miles, so as to show the glare clear of intervening obstacles, and spread the news far and wide. "Such night in England ne'er had been" as this of the Friday, and surely two such Sundays as those that followed have not been seen since.

While the sailors were fighting the Spaniards the landsmen were at public prayer. In every church the clergy were urging their people to fasting and almsgiving, and leading the petition for mercy for the church militant, then deemed to be in the crisis of its fate, with due regard to a national application:—"And especially, O Lord, let Thine enemies know and make them confess, that Thou hast received England (which they most of all for thy Gospel's sake do malign) into Thine own protection. Set we pray Thee, O Lord, a wall about it, and evermore mightily defend it. Let it be a comfort to the afflicted, a help to the oppressed, a defence to Thy church and people, persecuted abroad."

And following this prayer of Whitgift, came, in many instances, the Queen's "private meditation," said to have been written by Elizabeth herself, and sent first to the force at Plymouth: "Most Omnipotent, and Guider of all our world's mass, that only searchest and fathomest the bottom of all hearts' conceits, and in them seest the true original of all actions intended, how no malice of revenge or quittance of injury, nor desire of bloodshed, nor greediness of lucre, hath been the resolution of our now set-out army; but a needful care and wary watch, that no neglect of foes nor over surety of harm might breed either danger to us or glory to them:—these being grounds, Thou that didst inspire the mind, we humbly beseech with bended knees, prosper the work, and with the best forewinds guide the journey, speed the victory, and make the return the advancement of Thy glory, the triumph of Thy fame, and surety to the realm with the least loss of English blood. To these devout petitions, Lord, give Thou Thy blessed grant—Amen."

And after these prayers, as on the Wednesdays and Fridays when the special week-day penitential services were held, the people joined in some one of the sacred songs written for the occasion, such as:

From our base invaders,
From wicked men's device,
O God! arise and aid us,
And crush our enemies!
Sink deep their potent navies!
Their strengthened spirit break!
O God! arise and help us,
For Jesus Christ, His sake!

Even the troops on the march into Kent from the depôt at Tilbury were halted for prayer and praise, for Tilbury was not so much a fixed camp as a head-quarter from which detachments were sent to the threatened points of invasion, it being the best strategical position in the home counties for the defence of the capital. And all the week during the long Channel fight men and women kept to the churches; and "there was much prayer in secret and openly that the Spaniard might be subdued."

On Sunday, 28th of July, the excitement reached its climax. The preliminary skirmishes had driven the Spaniard nearer his goal. The Armada lay in Calais Roads in diminished but still unbroken array. To many it must have seemed as though England's last hour had come. No wonder that the churches were full as they had never been before.

But e'er the morrow's dawn the darkness was overpast. Soon after the Sunday midnight, the fireships under the gallant Young and Prowse glided among the Spanish vessels, and to the cry of "the Fire of Antwerp!" the cables were cut and the mighty Armada fled to sea in confusion, to blunder into battle off Gravelines and receive its decisive defeat. All the week the broken Armada fled to the north, and on the following Sunday came the terrific gale from the south-west, in which the ships that had escaped destruction from the English threw overboard the guns and waggons and carriages and horses and mules that had been brought for land operations, and thereby made the final confession of failure.

After Gravelines the news of the Spanish disasters was sent through the land. Night and day the horsemen rode to tell of the fireships, the battle, and the dispersal.

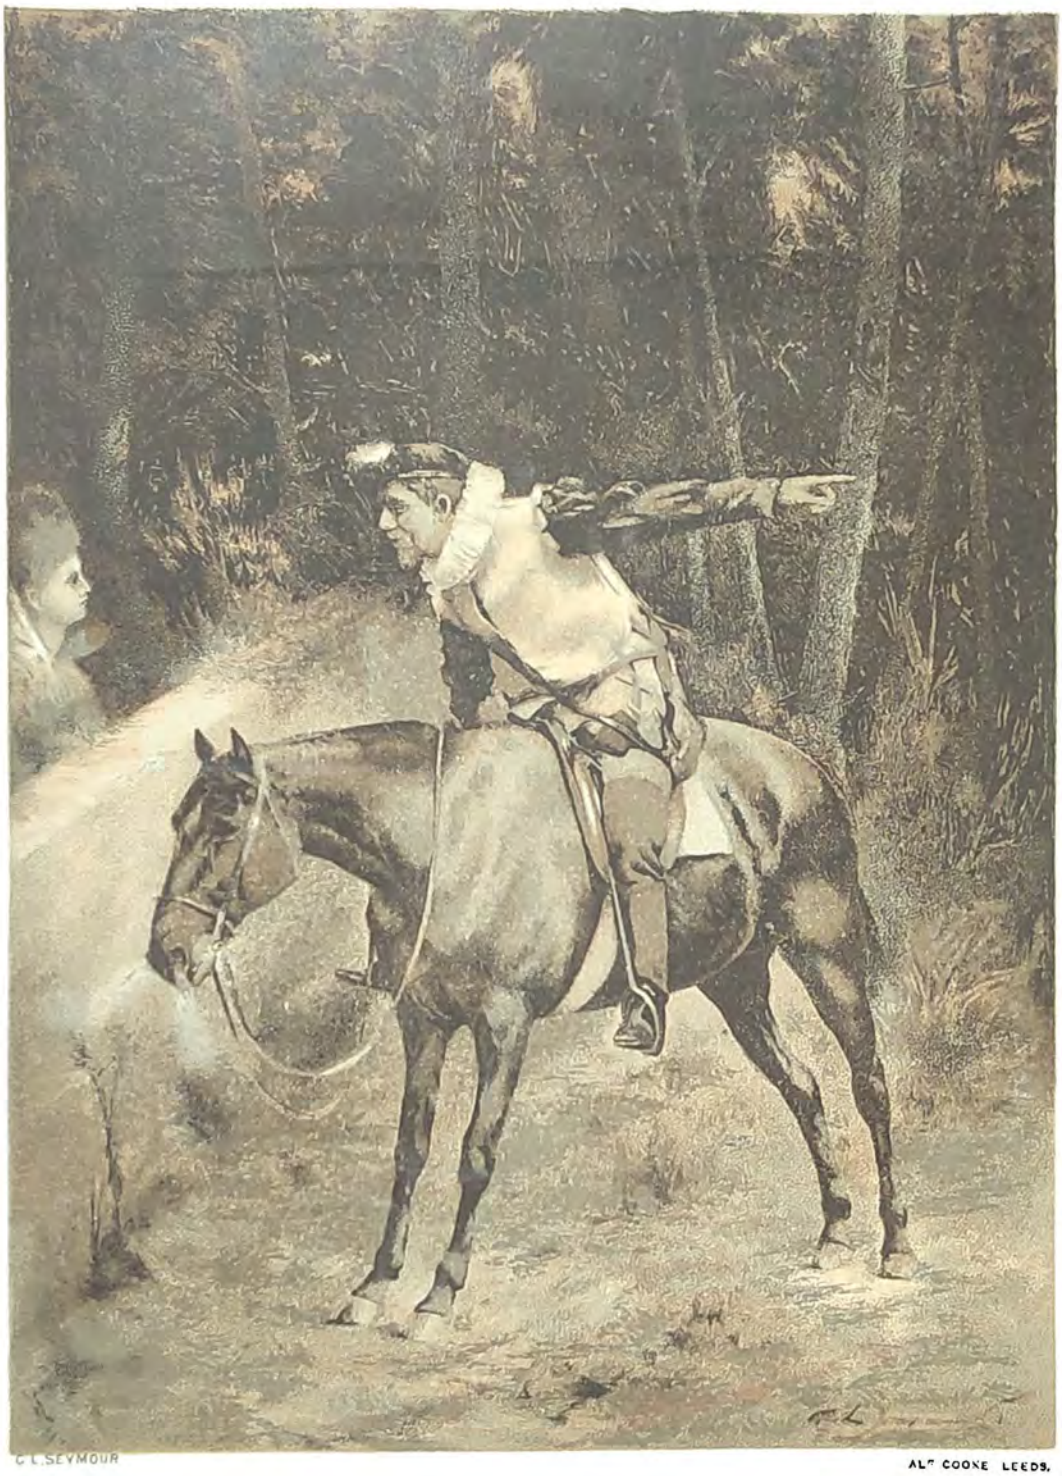
But the English were loath to shout till they were well out of the wood, and it was not till the 20th of August that the song of victory was first raised from St. Paul's in Dean Nowell's sermon to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen. Then came such bell-ringing and bonfire blazing and verse manufacturing, chiefly blank, all over the country as astonished even Elizabeth, so much did the people go beyond the official programme. It was the swing of the pendulum, the reaction intensified by the knowledge that the country had been specially favoured, and that "even the winds and the waves had been caused to fight for our land."

The Invincible Armada had become the "Vincible Armada," and the men began to talk of reprisal, so that "the voice went current for speeding into Spaine." But first it was ordered that as the penitence had been general the thanksgiving should be general; and every church had its service of praise for the great deliverance. Owing, however, to Leicester's death, three months went by before the ceremonies were over.

As Speed says, "the land thus delivered by the Arms of the Omnipotent, and the Bore put back that sought to lay England's faire vineyard waste, Queen Elizabeth (who ever held ingratitude a capital sin, but especially towards her Almighty Protector) commanded solemn thanksgiving to be celebrated unto the Lord God of Hosts at the Cathedral Church of Saint Paul's in her chief city of London, which accordingly was done upon Sunday, the 8th of September, where eleven of the Spanish ensigns were hung upon the lower battlements of that church as palmes of praise for England's deliverance; a show no doubt more acceptable to God, than when their spred colours did set out the pride of their ships, threatening the blood of so many innocent and faithful Christians. The next day, the Faire being kept in Southwarke, these faire flags were spred upon London Bridge to the great joy of the beholders, and eternal memory of Spanish purposes as irreligious as unprosperous. But the solemne day arranged to be kept holy thorowout the land was the nineteenth day of November, being Tuesday, which accordingly was then done."

And on the Sunday following, that is Sunday 24th of November, 1588, the Queen w nt in great state to "Pawles." Great were the preparations. The Lord Mayor wrote to the City Livery Companies that they should all be ready "with theire liverye hoodes, attyred in their best apparel," to attend her Highness's coming. "Your standinges to be strong and well-rayled; the fore-rayle to be covered with a faire blewe clothe; your standers and streamers to be set up as shall beseeme the place," in fact to make the very best show you can. And, with due care as to expense the companies did their best. It cannot be said, for instance, that the Stationers were extravagant. "Item. Paid for preparacions of standinge, and for flags and other necessaryes perteyninge to the companyes attandance at Her Majesties repair to Pawles, to give God thanks for her victory over the Spanyards, and for twooe several dinners for the companye at the same tyme on two days xxiil. iis. iiid."

The Sunday pageant was a gorgeous one. The procession in which all were on horseback was



C. L. SEYMOUR

ALF COOKE LEEDS.

NEWS OF THE ARMADA.
1588.

the grandest sight seen in England up to then. It included all that was dignified in state or church. After the Barons of Parliament and the Bishops, and the younger sons of nobles, came in single file, Burleigh, Lord High Treasurer, Hatton, Lord Chancellor, and Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury. Then followed the French Ambassador. The sword of state preceded the Queen in her chariot. The chariot was a sort of throne, with four pillars and a canopy on which was a crown imperial, and in front of it were two dwarf pillars on which stood a lion and a dragon the then supporters of the Royal Arms. The chariot was drawn by a pair of milk-white horses, and was guarded, and helped along in difficult places by "Gentlemen Pensioners, Esquires, for the stable footmen." The Yeomen of the Guard brought up the long array of rich and dazzling bravery, which extended almost all the way to St. Paul's from "Somersett Place," whence it set out.

Before the Queen reached Temple Bar she stopped to receive from Edward Schets Corvinus, "an officer of her Privie Chamber," a jewel containing a "crapon or toade-stone" set in gold, which she, graciously accepting, said it was the first gift she had received that day. Soon another stoppage was made to receive a book "with the author's compliments," it being "The Light of Britain," by "Henry Lite, of Litescarie, gentleman," after which specimen of light literature, Temple Bar had to be duly knocked at and opened.

Over the gates of the bar were placed "the waites of the cittie," tunefully discoursing. Below stood the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, all in scarlet cloaks to receive and welcome with proper ceremony. The sceptre was delivered to the Queen and returned with high-flown compliments, and again the procession started, this time with the Lord Mayor, sceptre in hand, on the right of Garter King-at-arms.

Fleet Street, with its overhanging top stories, and flags, and banners, was in its glory in the sunshine; and as the bells clanged out in their mad music, each steeple striving to outring the rest, and drown all uproar in its struggle for supremacy, the human voices gained the mastery and roared their cheers from the open doors and windows, gaining in power and volume from the hollow chambers and resounding wood. The City Companies in their liveries stood within their blue-covered rails of timber, all of them saluting as her Highness passed. Down Fleet Street hill, across the Fleet valley, and up Ludgate Hill, then much steeper and narrower than now. Elizabeth was cheered all the way to the Cathedral. At the great West door she dismounted about half-past twelve, and was received by about fifty of the clergy "all in rich coapes," and there on her knees she made her "heartie prayers unto God, with great devotion, audibly praising Him, acknowledging Him her only Defender who had thus delivered the land from the rage of the enemy." Then under a rich canopy she was led through the long west aisle "to her travers in the quire, the clergy singing the Letanie: which being ended, she was brought to a closet of purpose made out of the north wall of the church, towards the pulpit cross, where she heard a sermon made by Doctor Pierce, Bishop of Salisbury," and joined audibly in the thanksgiving: "Thou, O Lord God, who knowest all things, knowing that our enemies came not of justice to punish us for our sins committed against Thy Divine Majesty, but that they came with most cruel intent and purpose to destroy us, our cities, towns, countries, and people; and utterly to root out the memory of our nation from off the earth for ever; and withal wholly to suppress Thy Holy Word and blessed Gospel of Thy dear Son our Saviour Jesus Christ; wherefore it hath pleased Thee, O heavenly Father, in Thy justice to remember Thy mercy towards us, turning our enemies from us, and that dreadful execution which they intended towards us into a fatherly and most merciful admonition of us, to the amendment of our lives, and to execute justice upon our cruel enemies, turning the destruction that they intended against us upon their own heads." And then at the conclusion of the service, the Queen returned through the church to the bishop's palace, where she dined.

After the sermon, "wherein none other argument was handled, but only of praise and glory to be rendered to God," Elizabeth herself, probably at the dinner, "exhorted all the people to their due performances of those religious services of thankfulness unto God, like unto another Joshua, David, and Josias." Before dinner was over, the short November day had closed in, and by the light of great flaming torches the procession came back like a long gleaming river of gold and steel, and jewels and flame.

Many were the medals that were struck here and in Holland, most of them having the green bay-tree unhurt amid the lightning, as the symbol of security threatened in vain. One medal had a nest of young birds threatened by a hawk as its chief device. The mottoes were all admirable. "For at length the good cause has triumphed," "Bellum necess." (Necessary war) "Si non viribus at causa potiores" (If not in strength in our cause more powerful). The Zealanders struck a new silver coin in honour of the victory. On one side was "Glory to God above," on the other was the Spanish Fleet with the motto "It came, it went, and it was." In every Protestant home in Europe there was joy at the Spanish defeat, and praise of the English queen. Even Theodore de Beza, of Testament fame, could not refrain from bursting into song in his commentary on the Book of Job, where still appear the verses to Elizabeth, beginning—

> Straverat innumeris Hispanus classibus æquor, > Regnis juncturus sceptra Britanna suis,

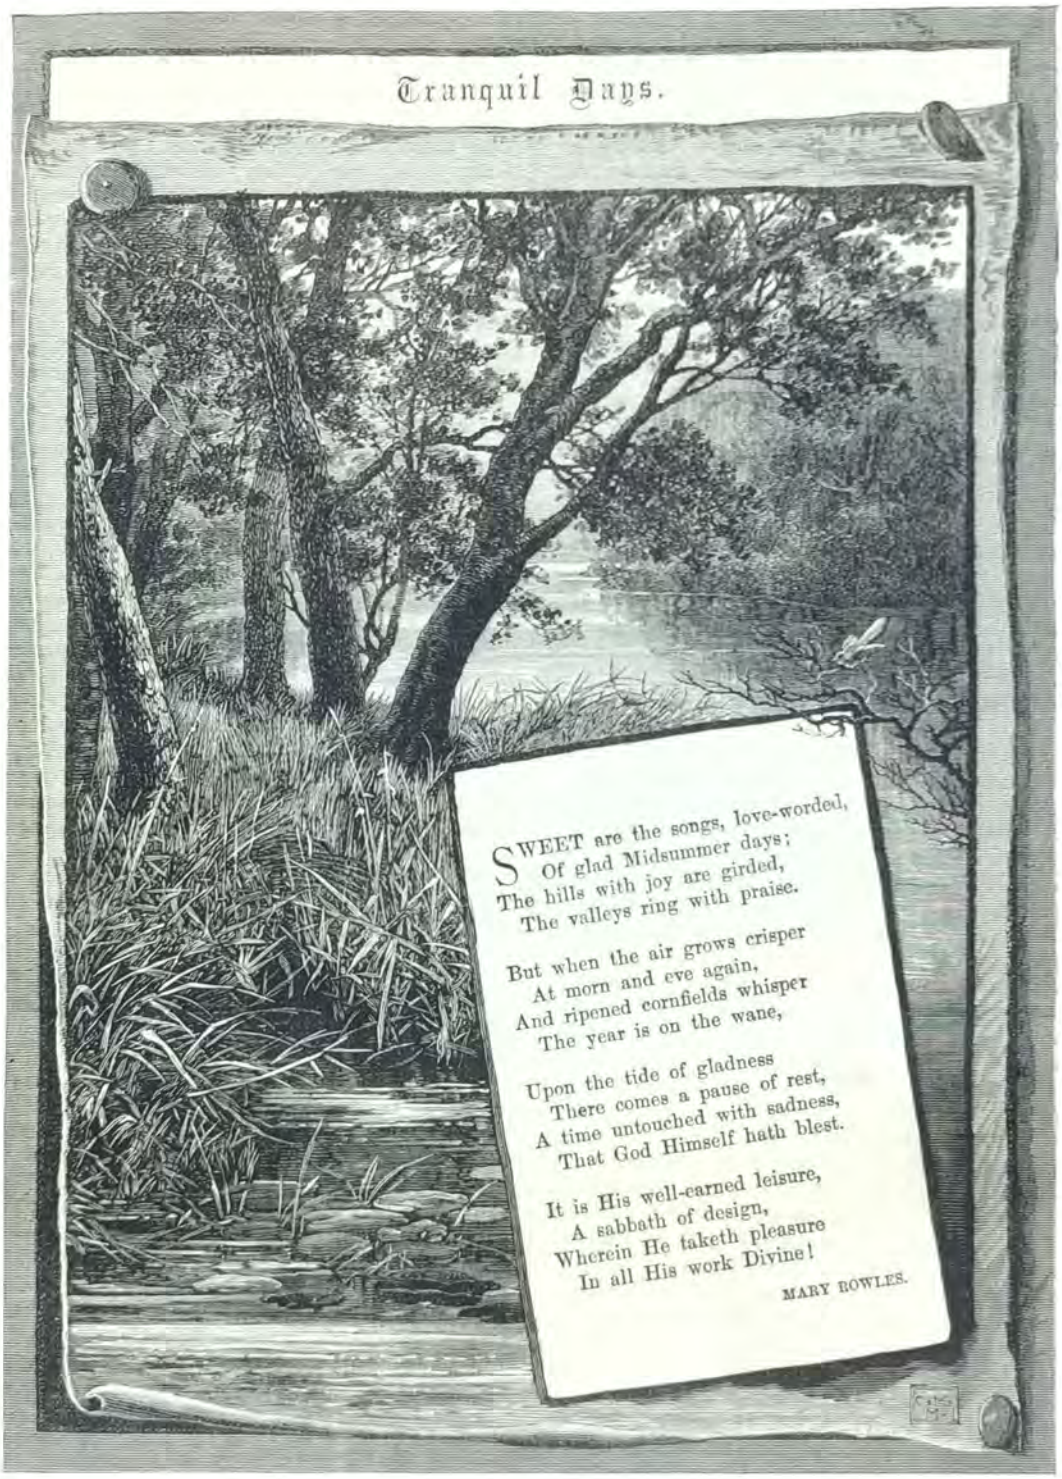
and ending

> Ut te longum, longum Anglis ipsa fruaris,
> Quam dilecta Bonis, tam metuenda Malis.

W. J. GORDON.

Tranquil Days.



SWEET are the songs, love-worded,
Of glad Midsummer days;
The hills with joy are girded,
The valleys ring with praise.

But when the air grows crisper
At morn and eve again,
And ripened cornfields whisper
The year is on the wane,

Upon the tide of gladness
There comes a pause of rest,
A time untouched with sadness,
That God Himself hath blest.

It is His well-earned leisure,
A sabbath of design,
Wherein He taketh pleasure
In all His work Divine!

MARY BOWLES.

SOME NOTABLE PULPITS.

BUNYAN PULPITS.

I THOUGHT I should find many relics of the Great Dreamer at Bedford, but came upon very few. I was especially curious about the old pulpit he occupied there. The Rev. Dr. Brown, who is so great an authority on everything connected with Bunyan, assures me, however, that no pulpit remains in Bedford concerning which it can safely be said that it was Bunyan's.

To find relics, I wander, first to the gaol where he was so long incarcerated, or rather to its site, for it has long been destroyed and a new one erected about half a mile off. In the new one is no relic of Bunyan.

I easily found my way along the quaint streets to the place where is treasured the chair on which he is said to have sat while writing the "Pilgrim's Progress." It is kept in the vestry of the Independent chapel. The door of the chapel was locked, but, after some enquiries of passers-by, I learned the whereabouts of the old lady who has charge of the relics. She trudged back with me, and, on entering the chapel, stopped to point first to a tablet, on which were inscribed the names of the various ministers, eight in all, who had presided over the church. Bunyan's name stood second, but was cut in larger letters than the rest. Below this was a facsimile of the last portrait taken of him. Underneath were words copied from a letter by Dr. Cuyler, in which he speaks highly of the portrait as "conveying a better impression" of Bunyan than any other he had seen. The old lady led the way into the large, modernized meeting-house, and showed me half of the long oaken table round which the communicants had sat when commemorating the Supper of the Lord. The other half of the table is in the schoolroom. She also pointed out the baptistry, in which those who wished to be immersed could submit to the ceremony. Dr. Brown, whom I met sometime afterwards, told me that he thought that Bunyan held rather lightly immersion views, and that he had evidently been under the influence of his friend Dell, who believed that Christian baptism is only spiritual, and that the water baptism belonged to the old dispensation. Any how it is remarkable that Bunyan,—as appears by the register of the parish church of St. Cuthbert,—should have had his own son there baptized by sprinkling.

The chapel is plain, commodious, and convenient. I go into the vestry. There, in a corner, on a sort of pedestal, with a green velvet cushion, stands that renowned chair—I could easily believe it to be the identical chair—in which the wonderful old Puritan sat while producing his celebrated work. It is all worm-eaten, and only held together by irons; but I looked on it with great reverence, and felt in accord with one who said, "No relic in all Britain has been to me so sacred." I resolved to have a facsimile of it, and had one of oak made in the town. Seated in that copy chair, I am now writing this article.

The pulpit in the church, alas! it is not the one from which Bunyan preached, I must go farther afield to find that.

Leaving the vestry, I stroll over the town bridge. The old bridge is gone, and a modern one now spans the Ouse. I tried to picture to myself the former bridge, with buildings on either hand, and the projecting part of which a lock-up dank, dark, moss-grown, and grated, formed the basement. Looking over the parapet, I could immediately discern in the clear, shallow waters, the outline of the base of that prison remaining. The old brickwork is easily distinguished, with its bank of long water reeds rising nearer to the surface of the water than anywhere else. Here Bunyan may have been for a brief time incarcerated, but that is uncertain. It was for a long time a tradition that he had here suffered, and yet dreamed such dreams as no mortal save John the Divine ever dreamed or described; but that idea has been dissipated by Dr. Brown. He is known to have preached at one time in the place where he was shut up to as many as sixty fellow prisoners.

BEACHWOOD GREEN PULPIT.

Now away to Elstow, scarcely a mile and a half from the bridge. I walked along the road so oft traversed by Bunyan. I thought, as I looked at some rough peasants ahead, I could see him walking there. All was so calm and beautiful. The lofty elms threw a grateful shadow, and the well-tilled fields and hedgerows sent forth a sweet country smell. The road is in a different state from that in which it was when Bunyan, wondering whether he had real faith, was tempted to test it on the puddles on the horse-pad.

THE LAMBETH PULPIT.

Bunyan's early home stands near to the entrance to the village. The occupant, who was seated at the doorway making pillow-lace, saw me—as she had doubtless seen many others—standing opposite, gazing with mingled reverent feelings at the cottage. She kindly asked me if I would like to step in. I did so, and had the pleasure of sitting down in the place where Bunyan had worked and wept, slept and prayed. It has been renovated and fitted with a modern stove, is very clean and proper. I would, however, rather have seen it with its former old-fashioned fire-place, with seats in the chimney-corner, large irons, a rusty old match-box over the shelf, and great joists crossing the ceiling.

On the village green still stands the old market-hall, a red-bricked, timber-crossed, tumble-down place, with the most peculiar arrangement of chimney-stacks I ever saw. Here the Great Pilgrim caroused with the rough country lads of his day. Farther on is the church tower where he spent so much of his time in bell-ringing, and where he had such fear strike him, lest the bell which he pulled should one day fall and crush him.

That bell has come down with a crash. It was on the occasion of the coming of age, of the Duke of Bedford's son, Lord Tavistock. "No one was hurt, but it is a singular thing," said my Elstow informant, "that that identical bell should have been the only one that had ever fallen."

The pulpit in Elstow church is of interest as the one on which as a lad he often gazed, although from it he had never preached. I must still seek farther afield for Bunyan's pulpit.

At an out-of-the-way place, several miles from Hitchin, I found more traditions of Bunyan. At Preston I am shown the dell called "Bunyan's dell." It is in the midst of a wood and very deep. About two thousand people might in this place easily hear the preaching. A stump was pointed out from which at midnight he is said to have spoken to persecuted believers. A good and intelligent woman told me that four women were accustomed to hold an apron over his bare head to keep off sun and rain when he preached. The dell is not easily found without a guide. At the edge of a wood is a little old-fashioned cottage in the kitchen of which he for some time lodged. The quaint chimney across the corner with the circular copper close by, is a picture.

On past the mansion of the Hales family, I think of Bunyan's wife going there to plead with the old Sir Matthew Hale for her husband's liberty. Farther on I come to Bendish, where Bunyan laboured for a considerable time, and left, as the Baptist minister informed me, deep spiritual influence which lasts to this day.

The old pulpit in which he preached is at Beachwood Green. Over fields and up a steep hill I go to the spot where it is treasured. Here it is, but hidden in the little school-room. I wonder it is not in the chapel. What an inspiration it would be to any minister to preach from it instead of from that lofty, ugly, out-of-proportion modern rostrum adapted to present peripatetic oratorical effort. What, if the cast-aside pulpit be plain as an old chest of drawers—it is solid, good, and made to last to doomsday. The oak is hard as purple-wood, and the ornamentation of a single knob and strong wrought-iron fastening as rough as the old dreamer himself. Alas! for modern lack of reverence, that this dear old relic of the dreamer should be left here in the cold! But let us be thankful the pulpit is preserved, and that there is little doubt but that it is the veritable one once occupied by him.

THE JEWIN STREET PULPIT.

Farther on is a farm, called "Mob's Hole," where Bunyan was mobbed and pelted with garbage and rotten eggs. Still farther is Tinker's Hall, in front of which is a great tree beneath which the pious Baptist tinker was accustomed to do a great part of his repairing work. The name is distasteful, it seems, and is to be changed. We are sorry to leave a locality where there is so much that is traditionally connected with the Grand Old Pilgrim. We will go on farther, and see if we can find other pulpit relics.

In London, hard by the Lambeth Palace, an old wooden erection still stands. It is very dilapidated, and was last a coffee tavern and temperance hall, but is now closed. I tried to gain entrance, but could find no one who could admit me or tell me where I could find the key. Here I knew, from an old volume, that Bunyan was accustomed to preach. An old pulpit from which he had so often spoken was long preserved and known as Bunyan's pulpit. When the place was sold to a retired tradesman, he, not knowing or caring much about Bunyan, gave away, or sold the pulpit, and I cannot trace it. A woman living near who had known the place for thirty years, told me that "all the neighbours round cried Shame when the dear old pulpit was taken away."

There was another quaint pulpit connected with Bunyan, one from which he preached his last sermon in London, before Sir John Shorter, the Lord Mayor. It was of such a form that we think it is well to present a semblance thereof. It was originally in the chapel in Jewin-street, a place that afterwards was used as a school-room by the Falcon-square church. The old school-room is gone, and the pulpit has disappeared. I saw one of the men most likely to give information as to where it might now be found, but he spoke regretfully of his ignorance of its present whereabouts. Pulpits may disappear, be broken up or not, but a man's works, thoughts, and influence live.

FREDERICK HASTINGS.

THE STORY OF A HYMN.

"NUN DANKET ALLE GOTT."

(From the German Illustrirte Zeitung.)

MARTIN RINCKART, the author of this hymn ("Now thank we all our God"), was born on April 23, 1586, at Eilenburg, in Saxony. After receiving the necessary preparation he entered the University of Leipsic, as a student of theology, and after passing the examinations returned to his native town where, from 1617 till his death in 1649, he laboured as archdeacon in St. Nicholas Church with much blessing. It was a period of heavy trouble, for Rinckart's ministry embraced the whole period of the thirty years' war. The poet's home itself suffered from the fearful calamities caused by it. Eilenburg was frequently visited at one time by the Swedish, and at another by the Imperial armies. Its unoffending inhabitants were robbed and plundered, and the plunderers ended by setting fire to the town. When the war began, there were 894 houses in it; at its close there were only 276, all the rest had fallen a prey to the flames, which had been kindled twice by the Swedes and once by the Austrians. The plague attacked the inhabitants who had escaped the soldiers. Four times during the course of the war it raged in the town, and when at last peace was restored, Eilenburg was well-nigh depopulated and little better than a heap of ruins.

On the brave clergyman of the sorely-tried town devolved the hard task of alleviating the distress, as far as he was able, and even when he had been robbed of everything, of administering consolation and inspiring hope. But when no end appeared to the troubles by which they were visited—and the anxiously longed-for peace refused to come—even strong hearts began to fail and Rinckart himself knew not where to find topics of consolation strong enough to encourage the faint-hearted. Famine was now added to their other sufferings, and the inhabitants of Eilenburg looked round on all sides for help and deliverence—but looked in vain.

Early in November, in the year 1648, Master Rinckart was sitting at his study-window and looking thoughtfully on the desolate space before the house. Winter had already notified its approach by a light covering of snow which lay in the streets and on the roofs of the houses, and the old man thought sorrowfully of the severity of the coming season which would increase to overflowing the misery of his flock.

Suddenly the sound of a trumpet struck his ear. "Just God," sighed the clergyman, "more foreign soldiers, what will become of us? We have not enough to satisfy our own hunger, and now these foreigners will take from our mouths our last morsel of bread."

Again the trumpet sounded, and now much nearer than before. At the same moment Rinckart's faithful consort entered the room, and in spite of her advanced age, came up to him with unwonted speed. "You are sitting here, Martin, meditating, while out there—out in the street—all the people are hurrying and crowding round the horseman. Go and see what news the man brings. It must be something extraordinary, for the people are all rejoicing."

The old man now rose and placed his little satin cap on his head: "what will it be," he replied with a mournful shake of the head. "The news of some victory, of some fresh bloodshed. When will the scourge be ended? When will men leave off murdering one another? The poor victims are equally to be pitied whether the trumpeter wears the Imperial or the Swedish uniform."

"You are wrong, Martin. It is a Saxon soldier probably sent by our gracious Elector from his palace at Torgau."

Rinckart hastened to the door. He found the street all in a state of joyful excitement, the people fell weeping into his arms. For the trumpeter had brought the news that peace had been concluded on October 24, at Munster in Westphalia. He had been commissioned by the Elector to convey the joyful tidings to the Council and the University of Leipsic and then to proceed to all the principal towns, to make known the great news everywhere.

While the trumpeter followed by the people, moved on, Rinckart returned to his study and offered up a silent prayer of thanksgiving to Heaven. Then he opened his Bible, and his eye fell on the 22nd verse of the 50th chapter of the apocryphal book of Ecclesiasticus, "Nun danket alle Gott, der grosse Dingen thut an allen Enden." "Now, therefore, bless ye the God of all, which only doeth wondrous things everywhere, which exalteth our days from the womb, and dealeth with us according to His mercies. He grant us joyfulness of heart and that peace may be in our days in Israel for ever."

Urged on as it were by an invisible power, he sat down at his writing table, and as though the angel of peace who had at last overcome the demon of war were whispering in his ear, verse by verse the hymn of thanksgiving rose from the very depth of his heart.

Nun danket alle Gott
Mit Herzen, Mund und Händen,

Now thank we all our God,
With heart and hands and voices,
Who wondrous things hath done,
In Whom His world rejoices;
Who from our mother's arms
Hath blessed us on our way
With countless gifts of love,
And still is ours to-day.

O may this bounteous God
Through all our life be near us,
With ever joyful hearts
And blessèd peace to cheer us;
And keep us in His grace,
And guide us when perplexed,
And free us from all ills
In this world and the next.

All praise and thanks to God
The Father now be given,
The Son, and Him who reigns
With Them in highest heaven,
The One eternal God,
Whom earth and heaven adore,
For thus it was, is now,
And shall be evermore.

And as he wrote the last line, a soft melody seemed to strike his ear. Again he took up his pen, and in a few minutes, he had committed to paper, the air so simple and so wonderfully inspiriting.

The horsemen had meanwhile dismounted, but the inhabitants of the town full of joyful emotion gathered in front of the Pfarrhaus and waited for their minister. He came out to them in his clerical robes, and in earnest words the venerable man praised Providence for their deliverance; then with all his flock he knelt down, and drawing from his pocket the hymn he had just composed, he began to sing it. For the first time, the new-born tune sounded from the lips of the old man, and when he ended, those present deeply moved and grateful surrounded their faithful minister and grasped his hand.

But the long years of suffering, sorrow, anxiety had prematurely broken his strength. A year later, on December 8, 1649, he fell asleep in the sixty-seventh year of his age. All Eilenburg followed him to the grave, and when the mortal remains of the faithful and devoted pastor were lowered into the tomb no eye was dry. His hymn has become the common property of the whole evangelical church, and is found in every hymn-book. The town of Eilenburg, on the three hundredth anniversary of Martin Rinckhart's birth, in grateful remembrance, caused a memorial tablet, with suitable inscription to be fixed on the house in which he lived—which was solemnly uncovered on Easter Monday, April 26, 1886.

L. B. WHITE, D.D.

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

CHAPTER IV.

AT THE PAVILION.

WHEN Tommy ceased grumbling, the old gentleman seemed to fall into a reverie so deep as to make him almost forget the boys, and after several questions had been asked and left unanswered, Bertie thought his old friend would prefer to be alone, and so taking Tommy's hand, and whispering a word in his ear, he quietly withdrew from the pavilion, and was making his way across the beach, when Mr. Robinson called him back.

"My boy, I shall be going away soon—to-night perhaps, so I may not see you again, but I want to tell you something before I go; you are only a little boy, and I am an old man, but you have helped me to do what is right, I believe—do you hear, Bertie?—you have helped me to do right; mind you do the same yourself whenever the chance may come."

The little boy looked puzzled, for the old gentleman had taken both his hands as he spoke and was looking very earnestly into his upturned face. "God bless you, my boy," he concluded, and then he kissed him very tenderly as Tommy ran into the pavilion to claim his share of the caresses.

"I am so sorry," said Bertie, dashing the tears out of his eyes as he walked across the beach again.

"Didn't you know Mr. Robinson was going away to-day?" asked his brother.

Bertie shook his head. "I don't believe he knew it himself yesterday, for he said he would take me to see the ruins of the old castle next week;" and poor Bertie's tears could no longer be restrained at the thought of this disappointment.

Tommy, who was very fond of his brother, instantly ran back to the pavilion. "Oh, Mr. Robinson, can't you take Bertie to see the ruins next week?" he panted, almost throwing himself into the old gentleman's arms in his eagerness.

"The ruins! what do you mean, child?" said the gentleman with a frown, for he was still deep in thought and the interruption disturbed him. Then he suddenly remembered his promise, but still looked puzzled.

"I cannot stay here any longer," Tommy heard him murmur to himself; but after a pause he said, speaking aloud—

"Tell Bertie he shall see the ruins by-and-bye. I shall come back, I hope, in a few weeks."

The boys missed their old friend and his cheery talk very much, for they spent a good deal of time out of doors just now. Mrs. Danby was ill and could not bear the least noise in the house, and so Ann sent them out as soon as breakfast was over in the morning, telling them to go and play in the pavilion until dinner-time.

But they found the pavilion a dull place without their old friend, for the sea moaned drearily, and there were no ships to be seen scudding along under their white sails, and even Jack Bond seemed to have deserted the beach, where they often saw him before; so that the days grew very long to the two little boys wandering aimlessly about in search of amusement.

About a week after the old gentleman's departure, however, they found Jack in the pavilion one morning poring over an old spelling-book, his dirty clumsy fingers slowly travelling across the page, and his brows bent and puckered as he stared at each word.

As soon as he caught sight of the boys he hastily shut the book and leaned his elbows on it. "What do you youngsters want down here?" he said in a gruff tone, "you just be off and play on the beach, this place belongs to us."

"It doesn't belong to you,' said Tommy, whose temper had not improved lately.

"It belongs to the hotel people," said Bertie, "and they have always let us come here to play."

"Because they didn't know it," promptly responded Jack, who was trying to shuffle the book out of sight; "I'm at the hotel now," he concluded.

"You?" uttered both boys in a breath.

"Yes; didn't you know it, I'm the boots. Mr. Robinson got me the place before he went away."

"Oh, I'm so glad; you get dinner every day now, don't you?" said Bertie.

"Rather. Giving up the bird business wasn't a bad stroke for me; you little ones brought me luck that day; but I wish the old gent had stopped at making me boots at the hotel, and not got my promise to learn to read," he concluded with a sigh, glancing at the half-hidden book.

"Can't you read?" uttered Tommy in amazement, "a great big boy like you!"

Bertie saw the angry colour spread over Jack's face, but before he could reply he said: "There's nothing wonderful in that, Tommy, some men can't read, I've heard Ann say so; there's plenty of time for Jack yet."

The big boy cast a grateful look at Bertie, and half withdrew the book he was trying to hide. "If I only knowed how to begin," he said with a sigh, "I'd soon manage to get along a bit."

"Let me see, perhaps I can shew you," said Bertie; and Jack allowed him to draw the book from under his arm.

He had been trying at various places through the book, and at last had settled on a page near the end, where the words were almost too difficult for Bertie himself."

"Whatever made you try at this? I don't believe I could read this, the words are so long," said Bertie; and he turned to one of the first reading lessons.

"That's just as bad," said Jack, but at the same time he felt a certain gratification in knowing that his book contained something that puzzled Bertie, for it proved that he was not so far ahead of him after all.

"Let's begin here," said Bertie, and he pointed to a little word of three letters.

"What's that?" asked Jack.

Bertie laughed. "You must tell me—spell it," he said.

But Jack only stared the harder at the page, twisting his face into such a comical expression of utter bewilderment that Tommy burst into a hearty laugh, and then ran out of the pavilion, fearing Jack might throw the book at him next.

"Oh, never mind him, he's only a baby," said Bertie, by way of soothing his big scholar's wounded pride; "begin here."

"You call that thing D," exclaimed Jack, setting his own grimy finger underneath it, and staring at it with all his eyes.

Then Bertie understood that his task would be much more difficult than he had imagined, for Jack did not even know his letters, and was almost too proud to learn; but the little boy would not allow himself to be discouraged, or Jack either.

"We'll begin at the very beginning," he said, turning over the other leaves of the book.

Jack made a wry face as he saw the alphabet page. "Oh, what's the good of looking at them?" he said testily.

"They're the letters, and everybody has to begin with the letters," said Bertie; "the words are made up of these, and so they must be learned first."

"Well, I don't see why they should," said Jack sulkily, "it's only little kids that ever learn their letters;" and he turned the pages over to the reading lesson again.

Bertie looked puzzled. How was he to help such a refractory scholar? and he was about to say that they must begin at the alphabet when Jack exclaimed in a tone of triumph, "There's that D."

"All right, now find another," said Bertie, suddenly comprehending that the boy might learn the names and forms of the letters by picking them out of this reading-lesson, and thus be saved the mortification of going back to the alphabet. Jack entered into the search for a D with as much zest as he had engaged in bird-catching, and large and small D's, the difference in their shape and size, were eagerly discussed.

C was the next letter undertaken, and Jack soon mastered that; but G was an intricate puzzle for some time, and he at length announced that he must be off or somebody would be calling, "Boots, boots," and he not there to answer, which Bertie was inclined to regard as a mere excuse, for the hotel was nearly empty of visitors, and so he was not likely to be wanted just now.

But he took his book and ran off, and Bertie joined his brother in building a castle of sand and shingle, the material for which Tommy had begun to bring in the shelter of the pavilion. Bertie helped him in this task now, and before night they had collected a good heap of stones and sand, without thinking of what Jack would say when he saw it the next day, for they had learned that it was part of his work to keep the pavilion clean and tidy.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE General Conference on Foreign Missions has been quickly followed by two other great gatherings—the Pan-Anglican and Pan-Presbyterian Conferences, both also meeting in London. The bishops attending the Lambeth Conference received formal welcome at Canterbury, the Archbishop delivering his brief allocution from the historical marble throne called St. Augustine's Chair. "Lastly," were his concluding words, "may God inspire and bless the work of all believers, be they churchmen or no, who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth." On the next Monday a service was held in Westminster Abbey, at which the Archbishop preached from the text, "All the body fitly framed and knit together through that which every joint supplieth." The discussions of the Conference, which sat during the following week, dealt with a wide range of topics, but were conducted in private. As many as one hundred and forty-one bishops, "owing some sort of allegiance to Canterbury," assembled, coming from almost every part of the world.

THE Pan-Presbyterian Council, which met during the same week in London, included delegates from twenty countries and colonies. The preliminary sermon was preached by Dr. Oswald Dykes, the Moderator of the Presbyterian Church of England. The general report, presented by Dr. Mathews, said that the Presbyterians now numbered about 4,000,000 communicants and had an estimated total of 20,000,000 adherents. About 6,000,000*l.* was contributed annually in free-will offerings for the support of the churches. There were more than 60,000 communicants who had been gathered from among the heathen; and about 500 brethren were engaged in the mission field. The newly-organised Women's Associations had been the means, during the year, of contributing nearly 100,000*l.* to the cause of missions. Presbyterian papers were printed in Chinese, Hindustanee, and Zulu, among other languages.

PROFESSOR BALOGH, of Debreczin, Hungary, in presenting the statistical report of the first General Council of the Evangelical Reformed Churches of Hungary, said that after three centuries of separation the different branches of the Reformed Church in his country had at last met together in a happy unity.

THE Missionary Conference included representatives of one hundred and thirty societies, namely: fifty-two American, six Canadian, eighteen Continental, and fifty-four British associations, in all about thirteen hundred delegates. Its meetings were held in Exeter Hall, and the large rooms adjacent. Every day began with a prayer meeting; then followed meetings for private discussion, or for open conference; and every evening there was a public meeting, with selected speakers, in the large hall. Thus during the ten days there were more than fifty meetings, of varying character and importance. The programme, which was developed with logical precision, covered the whole field, and the mere enumeration of subjects brought under review would do more than fill the space at our disposal. It would be useless here to attempt even the briefest consecutive narrative of its proceedings. Many speeches that may be ranked among the best, dealt with topics that were already in a measure familiar; comparatively few broke quite new ground. Some points were raised on which there proved to be great diversity of opinion and practice; and others on which there was really no divergence. The results of the conference must be looked for rather in the future than in its debates,—they will appear in the impulse given to missionary interests, in the promotion of brotherly feeling, in the more thoughtful comparison of facts and methods. The actual impress made by missionary labour upon the modern world has never been brought out with such distinctness, after due survey of all that can be alleged against it; nor has any more thoughtful estimate of the systems and forces hostile to Christianity ever been presented, to awaken the churches to fresh efforts. It was perhaps scarcely possible in such a miscellaneous assemblage to reach definite conclusions on points of practice; and even had opinion been formulated, it does not follow that it would always have commended itself to the outer circle of Christian workers. Many things said were open to sharper criticism than they received; but when all deductions have been made, great good will appear in the ensuing years from these deliberations. It now remains for societies and individuals to digest the facts, to note deficiencies, to compare methods; and to give practical effect in their several spheres to the conclusions thus reached. Nor will words like those of Dr. Pierson, of Philadelphia, remain without their influence: "A hundred societies," he pleaded to the church at large, "did not absolve them from their personal duty, nor could the world be brought to Christ by an ordained set of ministers. They must do what the primitive Christians did. The reason why within the first century the forces of heathenism began to tremble was, because the message was taken by Christians of all classes flying from the lip to the ear, descending from the ear to the heart, and, again, coming up from the heart to the lip." The suggestion, too, with which he pointed this plea, while it harmonises with much already being done, is indicative of the emphasis likely to be given to "new departures" in the times before us. "They wanted men in the foreign missionary field of great qualification, but he believed in colonising heathen countries with Christian workers, Christian blacksmiths, carpenters, sempstresses, and others, who would live Christianity among the people." One impulse given by the Conference was certainly in the direction of more definite aggressive action on the part of all who bear the name of Christ.

MEDICAL missions had a place of due honour. Professor Macallster, F.R.S., gave some effective illustrations of disasters that might have been avoided with a little medical knowledge. Dr. Lowe recalled the experience of Dr. Valentine in Jeypore. Having settled first of all elsewhere, and being out of health, he was recommended to go to the Himalayas in hope of restoration. He had to pass through Jeypore, and in the way of courtesy called upon the Maharajah. In conversation this ruler told him that his wife was ill, and that the doctors had given her up. Dr. Valentine said he would like to see her; the Maharajah was pleased, and made every effort, at length with success, to get him an interview with the Maharanee. Under his treatment she was restored to health, and the Rajah said, "What can I do to thank you?" Dr. Valentine answered, "Let me preach the Gospel in Jeypore." The other answered, "Yes, if you will settle here and be my private physician." "But," said Dr. Valentine, "I am a missionary. (No missionary had ever been allowed to settle here before.) I will stay if you will allow me to preach the Gospel from one end of the province to the other without let or hindrance." To this the Maharajah consented; Dr. Valentine remained for fourteen years, and now the United Presbyterian Church had a large and very prosperous mission there.

THE places of Education and of Literature in missionary work were discussed with much animation, and so also were the modes of training. The sphere and action of Woman occupied other meetings, to which lady delegates brought their experience. One interesting debate related to the training of native teachers, as to whether an English education should be given them; and another bore upon the retention of native usages, the feeling being general that too much had been attempted in the way of Europeanizing the converts, and that Christianity should be left to adapt itself to the soil in which it is planted. The thorny subject of Polygamy was discussed from different points of view, some considerable divergences of practice coming to light. The bearing of Commerce upon religion was also brought under review, painful testimony being borne to the mischief caused by reckless traders. After the Conference had closed, another meeting was held, at which a vigorous protest was made against the opium trade in China, the liquor trade in Africa, and the licensing of sin in India.

MANY opportunities for practical discourse were also afforded by the social gatherings of the week, amongst which may be mentioned the breakfast given to the foreign delegates by Mr. Edward Rawlings, on behalf of the Religious Tract Society.

FROM the great miscellany of facts presented we can but refer to one or two statements. In the course of the discussion on Islam, Dr. Schreiber, of the Barmen Missionary Society, working in the Dutch Indies, gave some remarkable statistics as to the increase of Islam and Christianity in Java, Sumatra, Borneo, Celebes, and the neighbouring islands. The Mohammedans were gaining ground rapidly in some parts, and increasing in enmity against Christianity and the Dutch Government. In 1886 48,000 pilgrims had set out for Mecca from these islands, and although the large number was partly to be accounted for by steam navigation, yet these hadjis were better instructed in the distinctive tenets of Islam than formerly. Aggressive sects appeared among the Mohammedans, and schools increased in numbers. The Dutch Government had taken the alarm, and was doing all it could for missions. As to results, they had about doubled the number of converts in seven years in some parts. In the whole of the Dutch Indies they now had 250,000 Christians, an increase of 66 per cent. in seven years.

AT another meeting the Rev. John Ross, of the United Presbyterian Church of Scotland, who has been labouring with signal success in Manchooria, having translated the New Testament into the Corean language, said that when they first broke ground in Mookden, a band of about twenty students came to "prove them with hard questions," and contrived to break up their meetings day after day. They denounced the "foreigner," abused the doctrines he taught, and generally contrived to empty the room. So long as they lived, they said there should never be a single convert to Christianity. There are now 500 baptized Christians in that city, and some of these very firebrands are among the most zealous advocates of Christianity. The people in that region had thought Jesus to be the King of Westerndom, who sent missionaries as ambassadors to prepare the way for His armies. But now in Manchooria there were 7,000 Christians, besides 3,000 more who have given over the worship of idols, and Christianity in every direction obtained general respect. This result had been obtained in fifteen years; what might not be done in fifteen years more?

From Japan, the Rev. C. F. Warren said there was a great leaning towards Christianity everywhere, as evidenced by the fact that the public press openly recommended the adoption of Christianity as the national religion. And though some recommend this for political reasons, yet many advise it from the highest and best motives. The hearers were numerous in Japanese cities, and as many as 600 or 700 were sometimes assembled. At the close of 1871, after twelve years' work, only twelve Japanese received Christian baptism. Now they numbered 19,829, and that was an encouraging success. 5,530 persons were baptized in Japan last year. There was a remarkable vigour and unity amongst the converts.

WHILE so much has been done in West Africa, on the Congo, and in the region of the great lakes, North Africa has been left almost untouched. Seven years ago there was no missionary, now there are nearly sixty, and opportunities for Christian work multiplying in all directions.

SIR WILLIAM HUNTER, whose Indian experience qualifies him to speak on some points with authority, reviews the general questions of the Conference in the "Nineteenth Century." He points out that whereas Protestant apologists are accustomed to add up the numbers of the Protestant nations and confessions in the world, and to display the total as the strength of the Protestant Church, more careful statists say that the actual number even of professing Protestants does not exceed 30,000,000; and that as compared with this estimate, the increase of 3,000,000 converts from non-Christian religions assumes a new significance. We may add, do we not make a similar error when we speak of the inhabitants of Mohammedan or Buddhist countries, or even of heathen nations generally, as if every member of the populace were representative of the dominant religion? As regards the East, Sir William assumes that "the missionaries do really represent the spiritual side of the new civilisation, and of the new life which we are introducing in India." He bears testimony to their improved methods, but does not "expect" any large accessions from orthodox Hinduism or Islam; they are rather to be looked for from the low castes, and so-called aboriginal peoples. Yet both in Islam and in Hinduism there are signs of movement, and men are labouring to bring their hereditary faith into accord with the requirements of the times. "It is certain that the leader of the new Mohammedan school in the south, and the chief Hindoo reformers in the North, are men who have been in close contact with missionaries, and who, both as to the methods employed and the results obtained are powerful, even where unwilling, witnesses to missionary influence." A new feature of later years is to be seen in the Christian brotherhoods; small "ascetic fraternities living in common, and realising the Indian ideal of the religious life." In Bombay, in Calcutta, in Delhi, certain houses of Christian celibate brethren are becoming recognised centres of influence among the Indian university youth. "They consist of English gentlemen of the highest culture, who have deliberately made up their minds to give their lives without payment to the work. They are indifferent to hardships, fearless of disease, extraordinarily patient of labour, and in no hurry to produce results. The Cambridge mission at Delhi has got into its hands the chief share in the university teaching in the ancient Mogul capital. Six hundred students in its college, and a well-filled hostel, attest the confidence which has gained with the upper and educated classes, notwithstanding its public training of a constant supply of Christian native youth as masters for the provincial schools. The Oxford brethren in Calcutta, while conducting a purely Christian seminary, exert their special influence by discussions and personal interviews with the graduates and undergraduates of the university. Every afternoon a brother sits waiting to see any young man who cares to call, and to talk with him on any question which he chooses to start."

"A HANDBOOK to Foreign Missions" was prepared for this occasion by the Religious Tract Society, and will be found of permanent value in the work of comparison. One passage we may quote here, as bearing on the general issue. "The number of converts to Christianity in all our missionary fields put together is a little under three millions, of whom about three-quarters of a million are communicants. In India alone, the number of adherents may be set down at half a million, and of communicants as about 140,000. But this is only a very small part of the case. The power of missions is seen in many indirect ways—in the growth of new conceptions, modes of thought, in silent influences that mould the life of nations. The heathenism of the Roman Empire was never apparently so strong as in the days of Diocletian, when Christianity—everywhere proscribed and persecuted—seemed on the verge of extinction. Five and twenty years later, the whole fabric came down as with a mighty crash, and although the Empire was by no means converted to the faith, the tremendous subversion prepared the way for modern Christendom."

A NOTICEABLE comment on educational agencies is afforded by an incident which has recently taken place at Madras. There is an unsectarian Christian College there, which has been one of the most popular and successful institutions in the Southern Presidency. Originally founded by the Free Church of Scotland, its constitution was modified a few years since, but it has been under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Miller, and the majority of its staff are ordained missionaries. It is still "a distinctly Christian institution, where the systematic teaching of the Bible, as the embodiment of the highest moral and spiritual truth, is carried on side by side with secular instruction. This subject of study is compulsory on the part of all the students, who are also required to attend and to stand up at morning prayers. Conscience clauses it has none, so that all who enter the college do so on a full understanding of the conditions to which they must submit, and of the obligations and risks that they incur. As an educational agency its success has been remarkable; as an evangelising agency, in the usual sense of the term, it may have had little fruit to show beyond the general leavening influence of Christian thought and sentiment, and the elevation of the standard of life and morals in the circles thus impressed." Recently, however, one of the students, a Brahman, having been convinced of the truth of the Christian religion, came forward and requested baptism. Great excitement followed. His fellow students sent a deputation, asking for the postponement of the ceremony till the arrival of the convert's parents—a request that was readily complied with. Meanwhile, the students, some four hundred of them, absenting themselves from their classes, held a public meeting at the entrance of one of their temples, and passed a number of resolutions in which they complained that their religious doctrines and customs had been on several occasions rudely criticised, and begged to be assured that none of the professors would in future take undue advantage of their position. In a memorial addressed to the College Council, the students plead that "though the aim of the college is Christian they never for a moment thought that its immediate object was conversion. The renown and popularity which the college has so deservedly won," they affirm to be "the result mostly, if not entirely, of the policy which carefully avoided the use of any active means of conversion. As a principle, therefore," they say, "we demand that the professors shall not use their influence, in or out of college, to baptizing any student. The object of the mission is, we believe, directly and primarily educational, and but indirectly and remotely evangelistic." The college authorities, however, have remained firm, and have succeeded in restoring order; nor have they shrunk from exercising discipline: seven students have been expelled, and one hundred and fifty who absented themselves from the college examinations without leave, have been fined. The student, whose proposed baptism was the cause of this mutiny, has been persuaded by his relatives to return home, though he left avowing his unshaken confidence in Christianity. The incident has attracted attention, and there is now talk of establishing a National Hindu college, where students shall receive secular instruction, if that be possible, without the admixture of Christian ideas. It is said that a more bitter feeling against Christianity begins to show itself in Southern India.

At the General Assembly of the Free Church of Inverness, Professor Lindsay, in presenting the report of Foreign Missions, said he wished to correct a misapprehension which seemed to prevail with reference to the mission in Africa. The Arabs had not attacked the Scotch mission stations, but a station belonging to a Glasgow trading company, and the last news they received was to the effect that their mission had not lost a cent of property. At the missionary meeting, Dr. Miller, who was present from Madras, referred to the desire amongst the Hindoo population to have a national Hindoo college, in which the ancient religion should be taught as an inseparable portion of the curriculum, and said he believed the setting up of such a college would do much to shake the fabric of Hindooism.

At the General Assembly of the Established Church, the report presented on Foreign Missions stated that there had been 827 baptisms during the past year in India, and that there were about 3,000 baptized Christians connected with the mission. The African mission showed strong vitality. Mr. M'Murtrie said that their foreign missions were now attracting some of the best men in the Church, and that the weekly and monthly contributions from Sunday-schools were increasing at a rate which put to shame some of their congregations. The Rev. Henry Rice, of Arkonan, said that a new difficulty in the way of Indian mission work was caused by the fact that the Hindoos believed that Christian missionaries were preaching an antiquated form of religion which the educated classes in Europe were forsaking.

In addition to the extraordinary gatherings of the season, there have been the usual annual conferences and conventions of Christian friends in different places. Prominent amongst them must be mentioned the Mildmay Conference, where the successive addresses were mainly on Progress, the law of the kingdom—in life, in labour; on Hindrances to Progress—in walk, in work; and the Helps to Progress—in sanctification, in service. Other speeches took a wide survey of Christian work in various fields. There were also special prayer-meetings, and at the close of the Conference a united Communion service. In relation to the Bible and Prayer Union, it was stated by the Rev. T. Richardson, founder of the Union, that its members now numbered 273,000. Commencing in East London, it had extended to all quarters of the earth, even to Pitcairn Island, where every adult was a member. There were also branches quite distinct, and having the card in the following languages: Swedish, German, Italian, Armenian, Greek, Hebrew-Arabic, Singhalese, Bengali, Chinese, Tamil, French, Polynesian, Spanish, Danish, and Finnish, also in Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, and the United States.

Signor Sonzogno, the proprietor and editor of the Secolo, a daily newspaper published in Milan, announces that he is about to issue a popular edition of the Bible in halfpenny numbers, so as to bring the book within the reach of all. "There is one book," he says, "which gathers up the poetry and the science of humanity, and that book is the Bible, and with this book no other work in any literature can be compared. It is a book that Newton read continually, that Cromwell carried at his saddle, and that Voltaire kept always on his study table. It is a book that believers and unbelievers should alike study, and that ought to be found in every house. The text will be that of Martini, translated from the Vulgate, and care will be taken to insure accuracy." This venture has the greater interest when we remember the recent attempt of the Pope to suppress in France the sale of M. Lasserre's translation of the Gospels by placing it on the list of forbidden books.

An amazing illustration of the credulity which still lingers among the people is to be found in the history of Esther Jezreel, the head of the sect of the "New and Latter House of Israel," whose death was recently announced. Her followers hold the doctrine that they are an elect people to be preserved from the grave and corruption—a remnant to live for a thousand years with Christ upon earth. A large temple for the "144,000 of the Apocalypse" had been for some time in course of erection on Chatham Hill. One lady alone is understood to have contributed 30,000*l.* towards the building, and many people are said to have broken up their homes, sold their possessions, and given their money to the same object. "Queen Esther," who was the daughter of poor parents, was accustomed to ride about in a handsome carriage, with a couple of horses, and liveried groom, and sometimes showed herself on horseback. Her husband, the founder of the sect, was known as the "Prophet Jezreel." He had been a private in a foot regiment, and when he died, about three years ago, his followers persuaded themselves that he had some imperfection they did not know of, and was not good enough to be one of "the remnant" who shall escape death. It remains to be seen whether they will pass a like judgment on Queen Esther.

The death of the Emperor Frederick was an event which awoke the profoundest sympathy in every quarter. His last hours, as he lay speechless yet conscious, were worthy of his heroic reign. It was but one of many touching incidents, when his third daughter, the Princess Sophia, on her eighteenth birthday, approached his bedside, concealing her tears lest he should ask why she wept. The Emperor was fully aware of the day, and gave her a slip of paper on which he had written with faint characters: "Remain as noble and good as you have been in the past. This is the last wish of your dying father." In the funeral prayer of Dr. Koëgel, we catch a glimpse of the secret source of this strength: "Above all, we thank Thee that Thou hast caused the clear light of Thy Gospel of Jesus the Lamb that bears our sin to shine before the departed so that he has been able to lay down his cross at the foot of the Cross of Golgotha with the prayer in Jesus' name, 'Nothing can befall me but what Thou hast seen Thyself, and what makes for my salvation.'" In the Deutsche Evangelische Kirchenzeitung, the organ of the well-known Court Preacher Stöcker, this testimony is borne:—"When he came to the throne, he had many new thoughts ready for practical application. The untiring labour of a reign which lasted not quite a hundred days has proved how much there was in his heart. . . . He was a thoroughly Godfearing man. Some years ago, when on his well-known visit to Jerusalem he partook of the Holy Supper, he told the Deaconesses how much peace he felt in celebrating our Redemption in the spot where it was obtained for us; and added, they would meet again, if not in the earthly, yet in the heavenly Jerusalem."

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

RALPH ELLISON'S OPPORTUNITY.

BY LESLIE KEITH.

CHAPTER I.

MR. CULPEPPER REMONSTRATES.

SANDBURY-ON-SEA, which in these days is a brisk little watering-place, taken by assault in summer-time by a growing army of bathers, was quite unknown and undiscovered when Ralph Ellison went to it, and had scarce a recognition outside the pages of a geographical dictionary.

It has everything now that a self-respecting seaside place should have; an imposing hotel, rows of villas and terraces ready to welcome the stranger, a pier, a brass band, a daily paper and a punctual train-service connecting it with London.

Ralph Ellison has seen these things spring up around him as if by magic, and he feels himself sometimes to be an alien in the midst of them, a lagger behind the times; now and then he passingly entertains the prompting of a recluse to escape and to seek some still forgotten corner of the world to hide in, but the impulse to remain is stronger than the craving to go, for here all his deepest experiences of life-anguish, pain, release and hope came to him; in this village by the sea he was loosed from bonds that chained him; here he was delivered from a great fear and healed of a grievous wound; here he was allowed to attain a lasting victory over himself. Here, too, there are little children who cling to him and gather round his knees, sweetly linking the freshness of their morning with his evening, and informing life with interest and delight; here there are some sick and sorrowful and tempted people who look to him and lean on him as on one who has gone through the same initiation. How could he forsake them? So here he stays and is at peace, waiting for the summons to that life in which there shall neither be a past to regret nor a future to dread, but in which old things shall be made new in a never-ending present.

Sandbury, half a century ago, had scarce an excuse for existing, except as a more or less uncomfortable centre for people of narrow means. Perhaps its chief attraction to possessors of shallow purses was the knowledge that you could not easily spend money in it. It lay remote from highways of traffic, and in those days when railway travelling was in its infancy, it was practically abandoned to solitude.

Twice or thrice a week a lumbering coach took its leisurely way to a busier centre where, if you were very enterprising, you could embark in a second coach and in due time reach London; but the Sandbury mail was content for the most part to carry parcels which the more adventurous ordered from town, and now and then but more rarely a stray visitor, whom it deposited at the Nag's Head. Hedged as its approach was by difficulties such as these, London was a terra incognita to most of the seaside population, and a week's sightseeing of shopping there, was an epoch to be remembered when events of larger importance were forgotten.

In Sandbury, life went at a much slower pace than in the capital, and the little community seemed as if by common consent to have formed itself into a society for the preservation of old traditions; as their fathers had left the sea nook so they maintained it; perhaps Sandbury was the last stronghold in England in which the oil-lamp flickered malodorously; it was certainly innocent of sanitation till within the shortest memory, and the fashions of its gowns and bonnets and the shape of its trousers were archaic years before the wearers made the discovery.

The latter circumstance mattered the less since nobody was rich enough to gratify every passing freak of the hour and so put his neighbour to shame. There was, as has been said, very little money in Sandbury; those who had any to spare naturally taking it to places where a more varied life might be tasted, and indeed the only "carriage people," properly speaking, were the rector, who suffered from gout and took mild exercise behind a pair of lazy grays, and the doctor, whose gig was a familiar sight within a wide radius of the little town.

In so narrow a world—a world from which a robust realism appeared to have been banished, and which the fiercer passions and emotions did not trouble—one might surely look for harmony of thought and action, yet though everybody bought his groceries of Mr. Culpepper, and his meat of Mr. Fry, and called in Dr. Rose to correct his ailments, when it came to be a question of spiritual food, the camp was divided in two, one section setting towards the parish church presided over by the rector, and the other making its way towards Sion Chapel where Ralph Ellison ministered.

This difference of opinion was very comfortably borne, however; it was not a period of great spiritual activity; indeed in the matter of its religion, Sandbury was as far behind the times as it was in the style of its hair-dressing and the cut of its garments. In other towns in England the sleeping depths were being stirred, and men were asking themselves whether Christianity were not something more than an excellent moral system; but Sandbury still slumbered tranquilly, only conscious of uneasiness at a moment of serious sickness or family bereavement.

Nobody, we are sorry to say, in those too indifferent days, thought the worse of the rector because his gout was self-induced by over indulgence in eating and drinking, and because he held himself to have fulfilled his duty when he had mumbled over his morning's sermon; and nobody censured the congregation of Sion Chapel for falling asleep under old Mr. Null's dull periods. There was not even enough of interest to awaken strong partisanship; dissenter and orthodox believer met and mingled quite peaceably at the dinner and tea-parties, and gossiped with each other in the streets. Ralph Ellison might even have counted on the offer of two fingers from the rector, who was good-natured in spite of the gout, had they met at Dr. Roso's or lawyer Ballard's hospitable tables, but as Ralph Ellison never went anywhere he missed this gratification. His manifest, and what one might almost call obtrusive reticence, was the first thing that struck the good people of Sandbury when they came to study and classify the new minister.

Life in the little town was conducted more or less on the communistic principle, in so far, at least, as all shared a common straitness of means, and a healthy curiosity over a neighbour's affairs was considered to be nothing short of a Christian duty. In this world of ours, man must have some interest outside of himself; politics, art, literature, bric-a-brac, blue china, alduses and elzevirs, it may be, but since it could not be any of these in Sandbury, it was brother man. When Mrs. Brown's sailor son came home unexpectedly from foreign parts, the other houses in the crescent had the news almost before he had crossed his mother's threshold; the rare event of a marriage engagement kept the tea-tables and the dinner-tables too, for the matter of that, lively for many weeks of expectation, surmise and conjecture; sickness or death woke a sympathy that you do not find in a large town, where number 29 knows no more of number 28 than if he lived in Patagonia.

Let us not speak with too scornful an irony of this minute interest in a neighbour's concerns—this tendency to gossip which one finds in little places. Gossip is only hurtful when, like wit, it hides in secret places to wound and stab; it may be kindly and wholesome as humour is, where the laughter never leaves a sting.

Into this chatty circle of male and female Pepyses the young minister might, if he would, have had ready entrance, and perhaps have found himself none the worse for the tattle that taught him the needs and desires of his people, but from all invitations to join it, he held himself resolutely aloof. He had come to Sandbury from a large town in the north, with a reputation that would have ensured him a welcome, but the mere fact that he was a stranger, was enough of itself to do that. New blood was too rare to be slighted or overlooked, and when it was a matter of common report that the new minister was young, good-looking, and a brilliant preacher, his success might be considered a foregone conclusion. Accordingly, on the Sunday when he preached his first sermon in Sion Chapel after his induction as its pastor, he found a large audience gathered to hear him, its ranks swelled by an accession from the parish church. It had been difficult to stimulate even a moderate interest in the sermons of old Mr. Null, Ralph's predecessor in the pastorate, but great things were expected of the new minister.

When he stood up in the pulpit, all eyes were eagerly fixed on him. Those who saw him for the first time, were a little surprised at his appearance. They saw a man who might be twenty-eight, but who looked ten years older, and if he were handsome, it was in a style that scarce fitted in with the Sandbury standard. The features were good and well-cut, but the eyes were sombre, and their dark depths had no light or kindness in them. Those who had skill to read the mind's construction in a face, would have told you that here was a man whose life had been poisoned at the sources, and lastingly embittered by some sudden calamity from which he had not had the strength and grace to rally. When he spoke, the same impression prevailed; his voice was clear and cold, it had not the magic charm that catches the ear, and forces it to listen; his tones were unemotional and level, and they gave a curious edge of hardness to his eloquence.

The sermon was one of those that had won him some notice in Manchester; it was a scholarly and even a brilliant argument, but it touched and moved no heart in his audience, because it had kindled no spark in his own. A supreme belief in your cause—that is the secret of influence; without it no man can hope to prevail.

The congregation dispersed, puzzled and mystified, scarce knowing what to think.

"He's a very personable man," cried a feminine voice, "he's what I would call distinguished—"

"Maybe it's the way in the north, but I don't hold with that 'I'm-better-than-you' style; he holds his head too high for me," said one captious critic.

"He wants to put more go into it, that's what he wants," said Mr. Culpepper, shaking his head with mild dissatisfaction; "I wouldn't mind a little banging on the cushion myself; looks as if he meant what he was sayin' and keeps folk awake, but he'll come to it in time," he added more cheerfully, "he'll warm up a bit when he gets used to us."

But, on the whole, the comments were kindly; the ladies found the pale, stern young man interesting; some of them were convinced he was delicate, and were already meditating nourishing little dishes.

He might have shared the mid-day dinner in half-a-dozen houses if he had willed, but he curtly refused all overtures and went off alone to his solitary lodging outside the town. He walked quickly with no observation for the outer world, the summer world when even Sandbury looked fair.

"They ask bread of me," he said, "and I give them a stone."

And yet there was not one heart in all that big congregation so empty and starved as his own.

CHAPTER II.

SANDBURY busied itself for a long time over the young minister with a diligence that was worthy of greater success.

Perhaps the very meagreness and slenderness of the details it was able to gather kept curiosity alive; a hint of mystery is always very stimulating to the popular imagination, and in Sandbury, which was barren of surprises and ambushes as the desert of Sahara, it had the added charm of novelty. There was nobody else in the little town who was in the least mysterious; on the contrary, the traditions and history of its inhabitants were public property. Why should one who was young, good-looking, clever, shun the world, and shut himself from its pleasures as if he were a second St. Anthony? Surely the strictest observance of Sunday which was perfectly proper in a minister, need not deter a man from taking a sociable cup of tea with a neighbour on Monday? Sandbury did not understand a religion that frowned severely on the innocent indulgences of hot buttered toast and cakes, and a friendly chat, and it was inclined to take affront at the too curt refusal of the young man to share in these mild dissipations.

There was old Mr. Null who would as soon have thought of missing out the sermon as of being absent from one of the social gatherings with which the little seaside town kept up its reputation for hospitality; and there was the rector, who as everybody knew, would, in spite of the gout, go any distance for the sake of a good dinner and a hand at whist; was Mr. Ellison to set himself up as better than these?

Yet it might have been plain even to the simplest understanding that it was no instinctive desire for a higher life that drew the young man apart from his fellows. It was not that longing for purity, for holiness, for a contemplative calm, that has in all ages impelled men as in obedience to a heavenly call to seek solitude and to practise self-abnegation, in the hope that by withdrawal from the world they may see God face to face. It was faith and charity from which he had cut himself off; it was his trust in man and God alike that had been cruelly bruised; his love turned to bitterness.

"It is not that I am better than you that I do not come to see you; it is because I am worse," he said once to a poor woman whom he had been summoned to visit in her extremity. He had spoken out of a sudden hot impulse, but she looked at him in dazed bewilderment. Perhaps she took his words for the sign of that Christian humility which ministers who preach this virtue to others ought themselves to wear—more likely she did not understand him any better than did her fellow-townsmen. That he lay under the bondage of some dark dispensation was apparent, and it was only natural that the feminine members of his flock should ascribe his gloom to the trouble they best understood, being themselves so often the cause of it.

Kind, foolish women's hearts that beat perhaps a little more flutteringly for the clergyman, whether he be the pastor of Sion or Salem, or the curate of St. Mary's, than for any other man—with that inward need they have of looking up to some one who can lead them towards goodness, who shall blame them for the fond weakness? The women of Sandbury would have adored Ralph Ellison if he had permitted it; they would have flattered him by finding none of their neighbours' daughters or sisters good enough for him; they would have consoled him with slippers, and ministered to him with good things to eat and drink; have come to him for advice, and in general burned that incense before him which it is whispered many clergymen find agreeable.

Ralph Ellison was not one of these, however; perhaps being of an independent nature he would at no time have appreciated the fussing cares and gentle adulations the ladies of Sion Chapel were so ready to bestow, but now that the milk of his human kindness was turned to gall, he read in these attempts nothing but insincerity and affectation, and he held himself aloof from their beguilements with a persistency that baffled them at last.

When Mr. Culpepper remonstrated with him, he had but one answer—

"I have made up my mind to go nowhere. If I were to visit at one house, I should be expected to go to all, and my time, which I have pledged myself to give you, would be all frittered away."

"That's all very well," said Culpepper, looking round with the respect of the unlearned on the well-filled bookshelves; "and we're proud of your cleverness, sir, that we are; there never was such a scholar in Sion—never before. But," cried the honest grocer, "it stands to reason as you can't be studying all day and night, as I hear your candles is seen when there's no other light in the town; and an hour's chat and a friendly cup of tea won't do you no hurt, sir. Me and Mrs. Culpepper will be proud to see you any night you like to name; and if you'll drop a hint as to the members you would like to meet——"

"I can't do it," interrupted the minister, frowning suddenly. "I have left all that behind me. Please understand, once for all, that I shall accept no invitations. I shall not serve you the worse because I spend my evenings apart from you and in the company of my books."

Mr. Culpepper looked as he felt, sadly vexed.

"It would have pleased the ladies," he said; "and it's a great thing to stand well with them, as old Mr. Null used to say. But there, if you won't, you won't; I'm not the man to insist; Abel Culpepper knows when he's got a 'No.'"

"I am sorry," said Ralph more gently, "that I cannot meet you in this matter, but the ladies lose nothing by my absence. I am ill-fitted for society; I should be no acquisition to their parties."

Thereafter there went the round of the little town a whisper that the new minister was a woman hater.

"Then depend on it, if he is," said Miss Lavinia Saxby with unexpected shrewdness, "it is one of our sex that is to blame for it."

But for the truth of this statement no one could vouch. In those days when railway travel was still little more than a dream of enthusiasts, and when men sometimes lived and died without journeying twenty miles from home, "that jade" Rumour did not fly with the lightning speed of our busier age, and the private history of Mr. Ellison before his advent in Sandbury remained unrevealed.

From himself, nothing was to be gathered. A reserved man's reticences about himself are usually respected, and he would have been bold indeed who undertook to cross-examine the stern young minister. The courage of Sandbury, at least, was not equal to the task.

A source of disappointment that nearly rivalled his refusal to join the social gatherings of his people was his choice of a lodging.

More than one leading member would have gladly welcomed him as an inmate, and one or two matrons and single ladies, who were more socially obscure, had even gone the length of secretly preparing the guest chamber in the hope that he might honour it; perhaps there was some private heartburning and jealousy in anticipation of his choice, but if that were so, he put a quick end to it by selecting two rooms in a modest house that held itself aloof from the town, and stood not far from the beach, as if the attraction of the sea had drawn it away from its neighbours.

"It's inconvenient, isn't it, sir?" said Culpepper, upon whom the ungracious task of remonstrance was always thrust.

"I don't find it so."

"But you will in winter—with not so much as a road to your feet. You will excuse the liberty, sir, but the Sion people would be better pleased if you was a bit more amongst us like, where we could see you going out and in. There's Mrs. Boulby and Mrs. Skinner, both of them ready to jump at the chance of waitin' on you, and there's Miss Saxby; but a single woman, for all she's lived as long as most of us, never understands a man's wants like a married one does. She ain't 'ad no experience, you see, of a man's taste in victuals. Now Mrs. Skinner, who has buried two husbands, she's the one to make you real downright comfortable."

"Mrs. Lamb does that, thank you," said the minister; "she gives me every care."

"Well," said Culpepper, "far be it from me to say a word against a respectable widow woman, as everybody in Sandbury knows; but she's not a member of Sion, nor even a sitter."

"I scarcely see what that has to do with it," said Ralph, with quiet irony. "Is it your habit, Mr. Culpepper, to refuse to sell soap or candles to a man if he happens not to be a seat-holder in the chapel?"

If Mr. Culpepper failed to perceive the logical sequence of this remark, he yet found himself unequal to the task of combating it, and he could only retreat with the faintly expressed hope that Mrs. Lamb might be "brought in" through the influence of the minister's presence in her house.

This was the last serious assault that was made on his position; he retained his quiet rooms, and as he went as seldom as possible to the town, there were days together when his people did not see him, and even forgot him. In course of time they accepted his interpretation of himself; a reserved, strangely silent man, with a coldness of manner that could scarcely offend, since it relaxed to none—and a great scholar.

They grew at last to be proud of his scholarliness, and of the chill, unimpassioned brilliance of his sermons. Strangers were taken to hear him, and went away puzzled, but impressed, and certain that they had been listening to a masterpiece of oratory. And while he gave and would give them nothing more, his hearers were content with this. The cleverer among them looked forward to the sermon as to an intellectual treat that gave a fillip to the day, and helped away the tedium of its hours, and the less clever were satisfied to take his ability for granted, without understanding its evidences.

Sion had never had such a pastor. Under Mr. Null's prosing it had been possible to sleep with the comfortable security that you had heard everything he had got to say years before, and would miss nothing; but that was at an end.

"You can't tell where he'll hit, or whose toes he'll be treadin' on next," said Culpepper, exultingly, content to waive the tea-parties since the minister's seclusion produced stuff like this. It was a pleasant stimulus to be thundered at on Sunday, especially when you were allowed to relapse into comfortable apathy on Monday.

And it was true that he hit hard, with a strange, bitter insight into the meaner side of life, the baser motives of man: the envy, hatred, malice and uncharitableness which we all like to hear denounced while we think of Brown, Jones or Smith, and hope that his conscience is troubling him.

But of love and truth, of personal righteousness, of a faith that lifts a man above this life and gives him even here a glimpse of heavenly places—of "the very court and household of God," what had he to tell of these?

What could he say, what could he know? Can a blind man lead others to the light?

BUNYAN CHARACTERISTICS.

WHEN Dante paced the streets of Florence, the people regarded him with silent awe; and the very children whispered as they pointed, "See! the man that has been in Hell!" As terrible as Dante's were the visions of the great Englishman who died two hundred years ago; but in the streets of Bedford his had been a genial, attractive presence to the last. "Neighbour Bunyan," "Friend Bunyan," "Bishop Bunyan"—such were the titles of fond familiarity, which yet did not impair the reverence due to a man of his commanding genius and solemn experiences. Here is the picture of him as drawn by a contemporary:—"Tall of stature, strong-boned though not corpulent, somewhat of a ruddy face, with sparkling eyes, wearing his hair on his upper lip; his hair reddish, but in his later days time had sprinkled it with gray; his nose well set, not declining or bending; his mouth moderate large; his forehead something high, and his habit always plain and modest." Again:—"He appeareth to be of a stern and rough temper, but in his conversation mild and affable; not given to loquacity or to much discourse in company, unless some urgent occasion required it; observing never to boast of himself or his parts, but rather to seem low in his own eyes, and to submit himself to the judgment of others; abhorring lying and swearing; being just, in all that lay in his power, to his word; not seeming to revenge injuries; loving to reconcile differences and make friendship with all. He had a sharp quick eye, with an excellent discerning of persons, being of good judgment and quick wit." Such was Bunyan, when the storms of his life were well-nigh over; a great-hearted, genial Englishman.

M. Taine, the great French critic, in his History of English Literature, seems a little perplexed by the great Dreamer's fame, but accounts for it by the clearness with which he has expressed the favourite Protestant doctrine of Salvation by Grace. The criticism is a half truth. Bunyan's power is not only in clear exposition, but in the actual realization of the Evangelical doctrines. They lie before him in concrete form: he sees, hears, and cannot but tell what is so vividly present to his own consciousness. Then, he had that wonderful gift of language—indescribable, inconceivable to those who have it not. Every thought and image as it arises clothes itself in instant speech; and what is still more surprising —indeed almost unique in literature—a homely limited vocabulary proves equal to the highest demands made upon it by an imperial imagination. That which he says of the Pilgrim's Progress is almost as true of all that he wrote—

> Thus I set pen to paper with delight,
> And quickly had my thoughts in black and white.
> For having now my method by the end,
> Still as I pulled, it came; and so I penned
> It down; until it came at last to be
> For length and breadth, the bigness which you see.

Here is the secret which cannot be taught or learned—that which we call "gift," "genius." Still as I pulled, it came. "How many of us," it has been mournfully said, "pull and pull; and yet it does not come!"

Was Bunyan then a poet? Yes; in prose. Whether from the limitation of vocabulary to which we have referred, or from the vivacity and impatience of his imagination, it is certain that he moves but uneasily in rhyme. His Prison Thoughts, Emblems, and other works in verse, though their lines may be counted by thousands, scarcely ever utter the poetry that was in his soul. Now and then, indeed, we have an exquisite touch, as in the Prison Thoughts—

> For though men keep my outward man
> Within their locks and bars,
> Yet, by the faith of Christ, I can
> Mount higher than the stars.

Here again, in the Emblems, is a verse worthy of George Herbert, both in sense and in expression—

THE SWALLOW.

> This pretty bird, O how she flies and sings!
> But could she do so if she had not wings?
> Her wings bespeak my faith, her songs my peace;
> When I believe and sing, my doubtings cease.

But such felicities are rare. In straightforward prose he reached not only his highest flights of thought, but his sweetest and purest rhythm. Let us quote one brief passage, not only for its simplicity, truth, and tenderness, but for its perfect music. The burden of the Pilgrim has fallen off before the Cross—

> "Then was Christian glad and lightsome, and said with a merry heart, 'He hath given me rest by His sorrow, and life by His death.' Then he stood still awhile to look and wonder; for it was very surprising to him that the sight of the Cross should thus ease him of his burden. He looked therefore, and looked again, even till the springs that were in his head sent the waters down his cheeks. Now, as he stood looking and weeping, behold three Shining Ones came to him and saluted him, with 'Peace be to thee'; so the first said to him, 'Thy sins be forgiven'; the second stripped him of his rags, and clothed him with change of raiment; the third also set a mark on his forehead, and gave him a roll, with a seal upon it, which he bid him look on as he ran, and that he should give it in at the Celestial Gate; so they went their way. Then Christian gave three leaps for joy, and went on singing."

To quote the actual song that follows would hardly add grace to the description. The lines are neither better nor worse than the many metrical snatches scattered throughout the book. Many of these were doubtless inserted partly as an aid to memory in a day when readers were few. Illiterate listeners to the Pilgrim's tale, as read aloud, would easily catch the rhymes, and by their aid would retain the thread of the story.

But there are occasional inspirations, as for instance the shepherd boy's song in the Valley of Humiliation, and the Shakespearean stanzas on the adventures of Valiant-for-truth—

> Who would true valour see,
> Let him come hither;
> One here will constant be,
> Come wind, come weather;
> There's no discouragement
> Shall make him once relent
> His first avowed intent
> To be a Pilgrim.[1]

The sermons of Bunyan contain, buried among divisions and subdivisions, "uses" and applications, some of his finest and most truly poetic utterances, instinct sometimes with lyrical beauty, sometimes with dramatic passion. Few readers have leisure now to hunt for these beauties, but it must be remembered that preaching was Bunyan's favourite employment. This was his vocation. Of his writing, he himself says—

> Neither did I but vacant seasons spend
> In this my scribble.

Let us listen to a part—a comparatively small part—of one of his discourses.

In the Holy War, Captain Boanerges preaches a sermon: "The text was this: 'Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground?' And a very smart sermon he made upon the place. First, he showed what was the occasion of the words, namely, because the fig-tree was barren; then he showed what was contained in the sentence, namely, repentance or utter desolation. He then showed also by whose authority this sentence was pronounced, and that was by SHADDAI Himself. And lastly, he showed the reasons of the point, and then concluded his sermon. But he was very pertinent in the application, insomuch that he made poor Mansoul tremble."

The sermon was one of Bunyan's own; and, in truth, when we read the words at the distance of two centuries, we tremble too! What more vivid picture was ever drawn of the sinner often warned, yet to the last unchanged? The whole application is too long to extract, but the

[1] With this first stanza of Bunyan's compare the first of the foresters' song in As You Like it—

> Under the greenwood tree
> Who loves to lie with me,
> And tune his merry note
> Unto the sweet bird's throat,
> Come hither, come hither, come hither:
> Here shall he see
> No enemy
> But winter and rough weather.

Was Bunyan, then, a reader of Shakespeare? Possibly he might have heard the song without having read the play.

specimens we can give well exhibit its terrible power.

"God says, 'Come, Death, smite Me this barren fig-tree.' At this, Death comes into the chamber with grim looks, and Hell follows him to the bedside. Both stare this fruitless professor in the face; yea, begin to lay hands upon him, one smiting him with headache, heartache, backache, shortness of breath, fainting qualms, trembling of joints, stoppage at the chest, and almost all the symptoms of one past recovery; the other casting sparks of fire into the mind and conscience. Now he begins to cry, 'Lord, spare me, spare me!' 'Nay,' saith God, 'you have been a provocation to Me these three years. Take him, Death!' 'O, good Lord,' saith the sinner, 'spare me but this one time, and I will be better.' 'Away, away, you are nought! If I should recover you again, you would be as bad as you were before.' 'Good Lord, try me this once; let me up again this once, and see if I do not mend.' (All this talk is while Death is by.) 'But will you promise Me to mend?' 'Yes, indeed Lord, and vow it too!' 'Well,' saith God, 'Death, let this professor alone for this time. He hath vowed to amend his ways; and vows are solemn things! It may be he will be afraid to break his vows.—Arise off thy bed!'

"And now God lays down His axe. At this the poor creature is very thankful, and calls on others to thank God. One would now think him a new creature indeed. But when he comes down from his bed, and ventures into the shop or yard, and there sees how all things are gone to sixes and sevens, he begins to have second thoughts; and says to his folks, 'What have you all been doing? How are all things out of order? I am behindhand—I cannot tell what! One may see that you have neither wisdom nor prudence to order things, if a man be but a little aside!' And now he doubleth his diligence after the world! 'Alas!' he saith, 'but all must not be lost. We must have provident care.' And thus he forgetteth the sorrows of death and the vows he made to be better."

Bunyan now describes further judgments, the loss of cattle, the death of a wife and child—

"On this the poor creature, like Ahab, walks softly awhile. Now, he renews his promises: 'Lord, try me this one time more. They go far that never turn. Take off Thy hand and see!' Well, God sets down His axe again. The man begins to read and pray. He goes to meetings, and seems to be serious a pretty while. He even seeks out a heart-searching ministry. But still, there is no fruit. Now, then, the axe begins to be heaved higher! Yet, before He strike the stroke, He will try one more way at least; and if that fail, down goes the fig-tree!

"This last way is, to tug and strive with this professor by His Spirit. But now, the mischief is, there is tugging and striving on both sides. The Spirit convinceth; but the man turns a deaf ear. 'Receive My instruction, and live,' He says; but the man pulls away his shoulder. The Spirit parlieth again, and urgeth new reasons. 'No,' saith the sinner, 'I have loved strangers, and after them I will go!' At this, God's fury cometh up into His face! Now, He comes out of His holy place, and is terrible. Now, He sweareth in His wrath that they shall not enter into His rest. 'Cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground?'"

At the root of the pathos and the terror of which this passage is but a specimen, and, we may add, as of much that is as wise and tender as it is heart-searching, lay an intimate and wonderful knowledge of human nature. Bunyan had studied metaphysics, not in the schools, but in his own spiritual being; and there was not a street or alley or secret place in "Mansoul" which he had not explored. Illustrations crowd upon us from the two great allegories. Nothing could be more profoundly true than Greatheart's description of Mr. Fearing, so full of apprehensions about himself, yet so daring in the cause of his Lord. "When he was come at Vanity Fair," says Greatheart, "I thought he would have fought with all the men in the fair; I feared then we should both have been knocked o' the head, so hot was he against their fooleries; upon the Enchanted Ground he was also very wakeful."

How expressively, again, does he point out the shifts and devices by which the evil in human nature attempts to disguise itself! "These Diabolonians love to counterfeit their names. Mr. Covetousness covers himself with the name of Good Husbandry, or the like; Mr. Pride can, when need is, call himself Mr. Neat, Mr. Handsome, or the like, and so of all the rest of them." Several times does Bunyan recur to this point. Certain of the Diabolonians sought to enter into the service of the people of Mansoul: "the Lord Covetousness, the Lord Lasciviousness, and the Lord Anger. The Lord Covetousness called himself by the name of Prudent-Thrifty; the Lord Lasciviousness called himself by the name of Harmless-Mirth; and the Lord Anger called himself by the name of Good-Zeal. So upon a market-day they came into the market-place; three lusty fellows they were to look on, and they were clothed in sheep's-russet, which was also now in a manner as white as were the white robes of the men of Mansoul. Now, the men could speak the language of Mansoul well." Here in the margin Bunyan interjects, Take heed, Mansoul! But for a time the stratagem succeeds. How true, and wittily wise, is what follows! "Mr. Mind hired Prudent-Thrifty, and Mr. Godly-Fear hired Good-Zeal. True, this fellow Harmless-Mirth did hang a little in hand, and could not so soon get him a master as the others did, because the town of Mansoul was now in Lent; but after a while, because Lent was almost out, the Lord Will-be-will hired Harmless-Mirth to be both his waiting-man and his lackey; and thus they got their masters." Further on we are told that Godly-Fear soon found out that his new servant "was but a counterfeit rascal"; and the sham Good-Zeal thereupon ran away; but the other two remained and wrought much mischief for a time.

Equally subtle, and yet more trenchant in its severity, is Bunyan's treatment of the Doubters; in his view also a set of Diabolonians. There is a curious applicability in his words to much that we hear in the present day. Old Questioning, the receiver, entertainer, and comforter of the Doubters, is placed at the bar, indicted by the name of Evil-Questioning. "My lord," quoth he, "I know not the meaning of this indictment, forasmuch as I am not the man concerned in it; the man that standeth by this charge, accused before this bench, is called by the name of Evil-Questioning, which name I deny to be mine, mine being Honest-Inquiry. The one indeed sounds like the other; but, I trow, your lordship knows that between the two there is a wide difference; for I hope that a man, even in the worst of times, and that too amongst the worst of men, may make an honest inquiry after things without running the danger of death." But the finest touch of all perhaps is in the evidence of Lord Will-be-will: "I know him to be the man concerned, and that his proper name is Evil-Questioning. I have known him, my lord, above these thirty years, for he and I were great acquaintances when Diabolus had the government of Mansoul; and I testify that he is a Diabolonian by nature. He has, in times of rebellion, been at and lain in my house, my lord, not so little as twenty nights together. True I have not seen him many a day. I suppose that the coming of Emmanuel to Mansoul has made him change his lodgings."

What could more exquisitely indicate Bunyan's belief in the connexion of scepticism with a corrupt will?

Yet Bunyan, though pitiless to wilful scepticism, knows how to discriminate. Of the Doubters, he says: "One sort of them came out of Blind-man-shire, and they are such as did ignorantly what they did. Another sort came out of Blind-zeal-shire, and they did superstitiously what they did. The third sort of them came out of the town of Malice in the county of Envy, and they did what they did out of spite and implacableness.

"For the first of these," adds Bunyan, "namely, they that came out of Blind-man-shire, when they saw where they were, and against whom they had fought, they trembled and cried as they stood before Him; and as many of them as asked Him mercy, He touched their lips with His golden sceptre." Very few of the second class, those who came out of Blind-zeal-shire, "could be brought to see their evil; but those that did and asked mercy, they also obtained freedom." The third class "neither wept, nor disputed, nor repented."

The philosophy of religious scepticism, viewed from the standpoint of an assured evangelical belief, has never had a more vigorous elucidation than in the whole account of these Doubters; and, as we have said, there is light in it also for the age in which we live.

With all the high qualities that we have noted, there was in the great Dreamer an inexhaustible vivacity and mother-wit. Those readers of the Allegories miss much who have not the marginalia in which the author by times gives the sense or points the lesson of the paragraph, sometimes with a humorous, shrewd, sarcastic comment of his own. Often, too, the notes are of true theological value. Should any reader of the Pilgrim's Progress have overlooked them, our advice would be to read the book again in some accurate edition with careful attention to the margin. New light will thus, if we mistake not, be found on every page.

What sympathy too our author had with the lighter aspects of a serious life! Much as it had cost him in his younger days to give up dancing, with what zest he describes the dance after the demolition of Doubting Castle, when Mr. Feeblemind "could not dance without one crutch in his hand, but I promise you he footed it well; also the girl Much-afraid was to be commended, for she answered the music handsomely."

Probably, among the amusements permitted to the sober circle at Bedford, the asking of riddles was among the chief. Scattered through almost all Bunyan's writings are quips and conundrums, gay and grave, often leading up to serious meanings. So, in the house of Gaius, "the Pilgrims were very merry, and sat at the table a long time, talking of many things. Then said the old gentleman (Mr. Honesty), 'My good landlord, while ye are here cracking your nuts, if you please, do you open this riddle.'"

Mr. Offor has given a list of such riddles, culled from Bunyan's different writings—a quaint and charming anthology, from which we cannot stay to quote. Once, at least, the recreation rises to the sublime, as at Emmanuel's feast in Mansoul. "After the feast was over, Emmanuel was for entertaining the town of Mansoul with some curious riddles of secrets drawn up by His Father's Secretary." There was the riddle of the Lamb, of the Sacrifice, the Rock, the Door, with many others. And as each was proposed, the people of Mansoul looked in the face of the Prince and said, "It is HE."

The two hundredth anniversary of Bunyan's death[1] appears a fitting time to call attention to those characteristics of the great Englishman which must ever commend his voluminous works and his own great personality to the reverence and love of Christian hearts. Many of the books may now perhaps remain unread, save by the enthusiastic few. But the man may well be studied, with an appreciation which will only increase with every access of knowledge respecting himself and his times. The recent biography by Dr. John Brown has done noble service in this respect. We understand better than ever the secret of those literary qualities which have won the warm admiration of men so diverse as Swift, Johnson, and Cowper, of Southey, Macaulay, Dr. Arnold, Dean Stanley, and Mr. Froude; and have a deeper insight into that single-minded heroic life which was consecrated to the one great purpose of leading sinners to the Saviour. The Grace Abounding, with its simple passionate story of a renewed life, the Pilgrim's Progress, which turns the soul's conflicts and triumphs into an immortal epic, and the Come and Welcome, which applies the whole to the allurement, the comfort, and the strengthening of other souls, form a trilogy on one great theme, which never can become obsolete so long as human life remains a pilgrimage, and weary spirits need to be guided—> up, beyond

> The Valley of Death and the Slough of Despond,
> And Doubting Castle, and Giant Despair,
> To those Delectable Mountains fair,
> And over the River, and in at the Gate
> Where for weary pilgrims the Angels wait.

S. G. G.

[1] August 31, 1688, at the house of his friend Mr. Strudwick, grocer, in Snow Hill, London. Bunyan was in the sixtieth year of his age.

THE SHEPHERD'S WIDOW.

RELIGION IN RUSSIA—THE PEASANTRY.

II.

WHEN Christianity was substituted for the old paganism, it was with Russia, as it was with other countries, the deities of the past long retained their hold of the popular imagination, despite the pastorals of mediæval bishops, and the ukaz of Peter the Great. Indeed the hard-handed illiterate members of the Russian Mir still people their forests, shady river-sides, and yawning caverns with the demons and sprites in which they believe as fervently as did their ancestors. This is to be regretted; but nevertheless, is it not wonderful, that while freethought is spreading among the educated, and while the clergy are to a large extent so indifferent, the awakening of the peasants should show what Stepniak calls a "remarkable tendency to run into religious channels"? Only just beginning to emerge from the darkness of ignorance themselves, these peasants in the past have frequently been shepherded by priests who themselves could not even read.

Only the faintest echoes of the thunderings and commotions of the Reformation were heard in Russia; but in the century which followed that upheaval there occurred in the country a religious revolution which in a sense was unique in its effects. This is now generally spoken of as the Raskol, that is splitting or schism. It is thus a comprehensive name for seceders from the Greek Church. The Raskolniks now number from twelve to fifteen millions of the population. Of course this great multitude includes a number of sects which greatly differ from one another in their theological standards; some incline towards what we should call rationalism, while others are more disposed towards evangelical Protestantism.

Perhaps this movement is the more significant when we remember, that in other days the Russians were so conservative in the matter of religion, that they suffered persecution rather than accept what the authorities regarded as reforms. Under the Czar Alexis, in the seventeenth century, a commission was appointed to revise the Scriptures and the Church Service Book, and the alterations introduced into the latter produced that wide-spread revolt which originated the Raskol. The persecution which quickly followed was worthy of the days of Nero or of Philip II. The alterations introduced by Patriarch Nicon had little or nothing to do with doctrine; they were generally of minor importance; and yet, as Stepniak shows, "It was for these trifles—a letter less in a name; a finger more in a cross; the doubling instead of the tripling of a word—that thousands of people, both men and women, encountered death on the scaffold or at the stake. It was for these things that other scores of thousands underwent the horrible tortures of the knout, the strappado, the rack, or had their bodies mutilated, their tongues cut out, their hands chopped off." Such was the tragedy which first signified to the world that the Russian peasants were on the move; and yet how paradoxical does it seem, that uncompromising adherents of ancient traditions should have laid the foundation of the Raskol which in its development many regard as now representing the pioneers of modern progress.

While the Government was furious at having its ukaz disobeyed, and while people were found who were content to become martyrs for an idea, the general religious indifference was complete. Churches were empty, or services were omitted altogether for long periods; and the clergy, whose lives were anything but a good example, discontinued preaching, which was not revived until the days of Peter the Great. The Sabbath was broken by persons following their ordinary callings; but although Alexis was accounted a model Czar, and Patriarch Nicon was one of the ablest men who had occupied the ecclesiastical throne of Moscow, the Raskolniks rejected his "Romish popery."

The persecution of the seceders did not gather full force until the latter part of the seventeenth century; and then the Raskolniks were hunted down and punished with relentless severity even in remote provinces of the empire; but as was inevitable, persecution stimulated the growth of what it was designed to suppress. As Stepniak remarks: "The masses began to stir: the unprecedented persecution of men and women of unquestioned morality, who met their trials with such fortitude, began to tell even on the wooden nerves of their contemporaries. The two fingers—the emblem of the Raskolnik's cross and creed—shown to the awe-struck crowd from amidst the flames of the stakes, produced a stronger effect than the preaching or arguing of any number of Raskolniks could have done." In addition to those who thus perished at the hands of their enemies three thousand perished in the fires of their own kindling, such autos-de-fe being preferred to capture by the authorities. Ten thousand altogether are said to have thus perished; while a greater number died in prison or at the stake. Of course in a country like Russia, numbers were able to hide in the unknown recesses of the interior; and there, according to some accounts, their descendants remain until the present day, unknown and independent, never being troubled by tax-collectors or army agents, at the same time affording a safe refuge from the outside world to various kinds of refugees. Peter the Great persecuted these people in the earlier part of his reign; and as a consequence he was regarded by them as the personification of Antichrist. Eventually Peter let them alone, being content with making them pay more taxes; but even now, by being merely tolerated, the Raskolniks are virtually persecuted to some extent, and they have really less liberty than foreign sects who may freely follow their own inclinations. Their sanctuaries may not have bells; they must not resemble "orthodox" churches; and they may not have processions.

[1] "The Russian Peasantry: their Agrarian Condition, Social Life and Religion." By Stepniak, author of "The Russian Storm Cloud," &c. Swan Sonnenschein, Lowrey & Co., London.

The sects which constitute the Raskol have been so numerous, that at least two hundred were taken account of by the authorities in the last century, many of these being of course very short-lived. Though gregarious in their every-day habits, the peasants show a strong disposition to think for themselves when once awakened to think at all; and this is supposed with some reason to be a symptom of earnestness. Thus, the founder of the Chlists, who first arose in the seventeenth century, was a peasant enthusiast named Filipovitch. He passed years in a cave, on the banks of the Volga praying and studying the missals both in their old and new form; and when he finished up by throwing all of the books into the majestic stream he imparted his strange, wild notions to his followers until they probably exceeded their leader in extravagance. He taught that "revelation came from God alone," and that he himself was inspired by God dwelling within him. The Chlistic sects degenerated into many gross customs and beliefs; but being from the first shunned by the main body of the people, they are of no account in history.

Speaking generally, the Raskol early divided into two main sections, the Sacerdotal and the Priestless. The former lost, before another was elected, the only bishop who sided with them, and in consequence it was sought to attract priests away from the Established Church, though one party thought it to be a better arrangement to appoint "old men well read in the Scriptures and of good morals," as substitutes. The "Priestless" section favoured no compromise with the "orthodox" church; and regarding its baptism and other ministrations as mere worthless forms, they preferred to go on without any priest at all. This is the larger body of the two, and is described as the most active in an intellectual sense. Otherwise, the sacerdotal section is an interesting body. "Their organization," it is said, "embracing several millions of people, with a permanent administrative council, a number of vast benevolent institutions, and an exchequer containing upwards of ten millions of roubles (confiscated or simply robbed by the Emperor Nicholas I.), presents the most extensive example on record among similar popular organizations." Intellectually, however, they are less progressive, or more backward, than their Priestless compeers.

The Priestless section has become subdivided into several minor sects. Those who are named after the northern seashore are put down as clear-headed and better educated. The Fedoseevzy, founded in the early part of the last century, retain some of the more extreme and antique views; and, as Stepniak puts it, they "have preserved more of the wooden formalism of the old Raskol." Still more extreme are the Filipovzy, who in their early days, some one hundred and thirty years ago, were in favour of self-sacrifice by fire. Still younger are the Wanderers, smaller in number but of wider influence; the sect, as a whole, exemplifying "the boldest and most passionate elements of dissent." There were many sub-divisions; but all of the Priestless have been distinguished by one leading idea, which, however, has been modified by time—that the Czar is Antichrist, and that, accordingly, his government is evil.

The Wanderers, especially, were long ago regarded by the authorities as being peculiarly dangerous. Their habits have given them a name. "They never remain for long together in the same locality, always living concealed in the houses of their hosts without the knowledge of the authorities," it is said. "They pay no taxes, apply for no passports, give no bribes, and avoid all contact with the agents of Antichrist." Those who have houses have them specially designed for the concealment of those who wander; and as there is supposed to be virtue in this mode of life, nearly all become Wanderers in their last days. There are several sects; and among these the Sopelky, while regarding Peter the Great as the embodiment of Antichrist, now think that Antichrist reigns spiritually, and they obey all orders that are not unchristian. In general, none are so extreme as their predecessors; and founders of new sects are usually fresh seceders to the Raskol from the Established Church. They are still amenable to the law, and thus enjoy liberty only by sufferance; and cases are mentioned of several who in our own day have suffered severe imprisonment on account of their beliefs.

Though they were originally such uncompromising conservatives, the Raskolniks have given an impetus to progress and education such as will be very far-reaching in its effects. While other peasants were content to remain in their hereditary ignorance, these people showed strong desires to advance in Scriptural knowledge; and when they were at last permitted to form settlements of their own in the far north, proper schools for the young were always provided. While members of the sects were scattered over the vast area of the empire, these settlements were centres of influence, and that on the river Wyg, founded in 1696, was representative of many others. At first the fraternity were much straitened for food; but under the shrewd abbot or overseer Audrey Denisov, they supplemented their husbandry by trading and mining until they were the richest joint-stock company in Russia, as well as a bond of union for those in the distance. They maintained two great schools, one for adults, and one for boys and girls. This zeal in the cause of education seems to have been characteristic of all the sects of the Raskol; and what further told in their favour was the women's recovery of their birthright. "The women, so completely subjugated and so often ill-treated amongst the Great Russian peasantry of the orthodox creed, recovered their dignity in the Raskol," says Stepniak: and he adds: "They studied the Scriptures and preached the Gospel as well as the men. Sometimes they founded new sects." Unmarried women became itinerant school-teachers, or resided at permanent stations which served as boarding-schools.

With the Bible in its ancient version, and a few old ecclesiastical treatises as their only reading books, the various sects were much given to discussions after the manner of mediæval schoolmen; and some of their manuscript pamphlets, the productions of self-taught peasants, are said to be extremely able. The peasants thus had a culture of their own, which was quite independent of that of the educated classes. They were still conservative as well as progressive at the same time. Because the secular alphabet introduced by Peter the Great was to them heretical, they taught children the Slavonic or Scriptural alphabet alone. Thus was presented the striking phenomenon of millions of people, sufficing to make a nation of themselves, living "isolated by their religious prejudice, as completely apart from the world outside as if they were surrounded by impassable deserts." The chief stumbling-block of the Priestless section has been that of marriage; all their adherents of both sexes being required to be celebates, according to old traditions of the sect; but more rational notions have long since gained ground; and marriages taking place in Raskolnik chapels are even recognised as legal by the authorities.

The Russian seceders from the "orthodox" Church who are more or less affected by what we should call rationalism make up some small sects. The Strigolniks, who appeared at Pskov and Novgorod in the fourteenth century, were rigid ascetics, who were soon destroyed. The Judaisers, founded about a century later, by a Jewish scholar, found some favour from the Czar, John III., but ultimately disappeared. A very different teacher, however, was Maxim the Greek, a contemporary of Savonarola, and probably his disciple. He did not so much want to oppose the church as to quicken its life. "In his numerous writings and speeches," we are told, "he merely tried to persuade the Russians to give a little thought to their religion—which was a very dangerous service in that benighted epoch." Then there was a nobleman named Bashkin, who is thought to have been burned at the stake for heresy at or about the time that the gloomy fanatic Philip of Spain was endeavouring to extirpate believers in England. Bashkin did not arrive at clear views of truth, but the Scriptures taught him how to treat his serfs. "Those who live on my estates do so of their own free will, and not because of my rights as a certificated slave-owner," he said. "If they are satisfied with me they remain, if not they are free to go whenever they like." In some other things he was also before his age: in other directions he needed evangelical enlightenment. A similar enthusiast of about the same time was Fedosy the squint-eyed, a peasant preacher and great Bible-reader, who left his commune to take to a wandering life. After being arrested he escaped from prison, and, despite the authorities, carried on a very successful propaganda in Lithuania.

Other sects, whose theology is very erroneous, and who have been more or less persecuted, are the Dukhoborzy, who regarded the reigning government as "an abomination before God;" and the Molokane, or milk-eaters, divided into Sabbatarians and non-Sabbatarians. They disregard all orders which they disapprove; they take no oaths of any kind, and on all occasions they refuse to fight. "The government has been compelled to put up with these insuperable aversions," it is said; and thus, both sects, "are enrolled without being sworn, and are told off to non-fighting departments of the army."

In many respects, however, the modern sects which, conventionally speaking, are but of yesterday, are the most remarkable of all; for although comparatively little is known about them out of the country, they seem to represent a religious revolution as sweeping as a second Reformation. There are sects of which hardly anything is known save the name; but the Stunda, not yet twenty years old, is described as a spontaneous outbreak of evangelical religion among the peasantry of the south which is said already to muster several millions strong. No sect in Russia has ever before spread with half the rapidity. The founder was a peasant named Ratushny, whose employer, a German Protestant, first spoke to him about Bible teaching; though the man was greatly impressed, and talked about the subject to his fellow villagers, without any thought of founding a new sect, the way was opened in a wonderful manner, as his own explanation shows:—"One day, at a village meeting, the people began to discuss spiritual matters, and the priest who was present could not explain anything to the people's satisfaction. Thereupon I felt within myself a burning desire to understand God's words with my own mind, and to explain them to others. There were many people desirous of hearing me, and I went on teaching the Gospel as I understood it myself, to all of them." Though some divisions hold views respecting the sacraments which, it may be hoped, will be corrected, their doctrines in general are evangelical. Their converts are not only drawn from the old "orthodox" or Greek Church, but from the sects of the Raskol itself. As was to be expected, the authorities have aided the propaganda by persecuting it; although the sanguinary mode of repression characteristic of a past age would now of course be impossible. "When I was cast into prison all knew that I was locked up because I had read the Gospel," said Ratushny. "When I was locked up for the second time people wondered again, and began to search after the Gospel with greater zeal, and to read it. That is how our doctrines have spread, and not, as some people think, through my having propagated it." The reading of the New Testament by the people explains the whole movement. The Stundists, as a rule, can read. To master this art is one of the first things a convert will do, and even the wholly illiterate commit entire chapters to memory. The general outlook is thus in all respects promising. "The awakening of the popular intelligence has created a spontaneous demand for spiritual food," says Stepniak. "Up to the present time religion has been the chief means of satisfying this new demand, and hence the enormous popularity of the Russian version of the Gospels."

The Shalaput sect, which is somewhat older than the Stunda, is also more rationalistic in its tendencies, which in some quarters also incline towards community of goods. The majority contribute a tenth of their substance for the relief of the poor.

Among the more striking religious leaders who are still living is Vasily Suteev, a peasant who married at twenty soon after the emancipation of the serfs. He learned to read and subsequently worked as a stone-cutter at St. Petersburg, where he set up a shop of his own. He there employed his leisure time in reading the New Testament with his son. Discovering, as they thought, that the way of commerce was condemned by the book, the shop was abandoned, the 1500 roubles he had saved were given to the poor, and certain bills as good as money were destroyed. He then returned to his village to work as a labourer, and there he sought to benefit his fellows. "I saw there was no love amongst the people," he said. "All ran after money: and I began to reason with myself as to wherefore it should be thus. Why this thing? Why that?" He spoke to some with strong heads, and also to the priest, but got no satisfaction. Ultimately, instead of going to church, he set up a meeting at his own house, where the New Testament was read. A sect was founded, and spread rapidly into the surrounding villages.

These things show the possibilities of the future, and at least demonstrate that the Reformation has entered Russia. At the same time, as education makes way among them, the peasants read the works of native and English philosophic sceptics, and many of them are turning socialists and freethinkers. Altogether, the phenomena, whether religious or merely intellectual, are among the most striking manifestations of the nineteenth century.

The difficulty of obtaining trustworthy information from Russia, due in part to vastness of territory, and in part to the suspicious policy which prevails within it, makes these volumes of especial value, and we commend them to the earnest attention of our readers. Allowing for political prepossessions and for these difficulties, the state of things described is of profound interest. G. H. P.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR.

THE HOUSE OF REFUGE.

IN the march of civilization, comfort marches away from the needy, and leaves them the dilapidated dwellings of the wealthy who once kept them in repair. As in London, so in Edinburgh. The picturesque houses of the old town were once the residences of the favoured of the land, but now they swarm like bees with workers and drones, some of them being inhabited by a poorer class with every generation. Here and there one is taken and cleansed, and put to charitable uses, and forms a nucleus of moral and social well-doing. Queensberry House, at the bottom of the Canongate, is one of these deserted and transformed palaces. Once it was the gayest house in Edinburgh society, now it is a House of Refuge for the Destitute, and a Reformatory for Drunkards.

It is supported by a grant from the Town Council, by the annual contributions of the public, by the board paid by certain of the inmates or their friends, and by the proceeds of work done in the house. It is first a general refuge for persons in a state of complete temporary destitution whose cases are not met by the existing Poor Law. This class consists chiefly of female servants and laundry-women out of place, of needlewomen and outdoor workers who cannot find employment, of young women in search of situations with neither means nor friends to assist them, and of individuals fallen into evil habits and desirous of returning to sobriety and virtue. Care is taken that only the destitute are admitted, and all are put to work suited to their ability; the men being employed in the work of the establishment, the women working in the Sewing Hall, acting as nurses to the boarders and the aged, and fulfilling the necessary duties of the kitchen and laundry.

Another of its branches is the Night Refuge. Here the homeless poor are received on simple application. On admission in the evening they are given a meal before they retire to the wards provided for them, and in the morning before they leave they are again fed. Those entering on Saturday night are kept over the Sunday, and supplied with the same rations as the ordinary inmates. To prevent the same people making a home of the Refuge, their stay is restricted to three nights in the month. Last year, the number received into this Refuge, in the court-yard of the institution, was 12,617, or a nightly average of thirty-four of the houseless. As the space is limited, preference is always given to women with children. Many applicants have to be refused, owing to the wards being full; and the same sad story is to be told of the Night Asylum in Old Fishmarket Close farther up in the High Street.

Connected with the Refuge is a soup kitchen, open daily between the hours of eight and nine in the morning, one and three in the afternoon, and five and six in the evening, when a bowl of broth and a roll, or a bowl of porridge and milk can always be had for a penny, and in the majority of cases is given away for nothing. And many of the poor living in the neighbourhood send their children daily with a pitcher in order that the broth and bread which they obtain in exchange for a ticket supplied by some one knowing their need, may serve as the family dinner in their miserable homes.

For the last nine years the School Board Committee on Neglected and Destitute Children have regularly as the winter begins, applied to the directors for help; and an interesting sight is presented daily in the large room where over a hundred school children receive breakfast and dinner. Nearly 23,000 breakfasts and dinners have thus been provided in a year. A list of the children so helped is forwarded daily to the School Attendance Committee so that enquiry can be made, and only the deserving assisted. The meals are not for truants; the children fed must attend school and behave themselves. The system may "make hypocrites and paupers," but it has not been found to do so as yet. There seems to be too much emotion in man for the comfort of political economy!

Of the drunkards, lady and otherwise, in course of reformation we need say little; they do not come within the scope of these sketches. Destitute and wealthy are alike deprived of intoxicating liquors, and the general idea of the treatment is that the taste, or passion, if that is the correct term, dies away—starved out. Many cures are reported in the case of those who have been in restraint for periods exceeding four months. Most of the boarders are annuitants, and, like all annuitants, they live long, the average age of such as die in the home being sixty-nine. The Lodge in which the superior lady patients live is a pleasant place specially built, with a separate entrance close to Holyrood and a fine outlook on to Arthur's Seat and the Queen's Park. The general census of the different departments of House and Lodge gives a strange mixture, ranging from the daughter of a peer of the realm, a first-class patient at a hundred a year, with every luxury save liquor, down to a hundred and more of the destitute who have drunk themselves out of house and home and now do the scrubbing and housework. Of victims of skill in squandering there are many, and of these some striking stories could be told; but we need not minister to the vanity of man by recording the amounts run through. The space is better filled by a notice of another branch of the Queensberry House scheme as a home for pensioners without friends or relatives. Many of these have been wounded in the service of their country, and pensioned off on so small an allowance that they could not anywhere else procure board and lodging in their old age. Now that out-door pensioners are the rule "in order to enable the recipient to live at home amongst his friends," it is pleasant to find a well-managed institution offering a home for the old women whose friends have died away from them.

A notable feature of the Queensberry House programme is the attention given to religious services. Worship is conducted by the chaplain in various parts of the premises five times a day, besides the ordinary services on the Sunday. Services are also conducted in the wards from time to time, especially in the hospital wards, and where the aged and infirm are unable to attend the regular meetings. Weekly readings are given in the Sewing Hall while the women are at work, and in addition to the Lady Visitors, agents from the Carrubber's Close Mission conduct two religious services a week. Of this mission, one of the most active and enterprising in the country, we shall have something to say in the next article.

W. J. GORDON.

Widowhood.

OH, Thou who hearest from Thy throne,
Each orphaned sigh, and widowed moan,
Of souls left stricken and alone!

Thou who hast known all human pain,
When love is naught and hope is vain,
Draw nigh, as to the gate of Nain.

For anguish give Thy peace instead,
With Thine own hand uplift the head
Low bowed in weeping for the dead.

Reft as the ivy from the bough,
The inmost sorrow Thou dost know,
A husband of the widow, Thou!

Thou knowest, Lord, how dark appears
The onward-reaching tract of years,
Without the love that soothes and cheers;

How tremblingly, at first, must stand
The mourner in a pilgrim land,
Bereaved of guiding heart and hand.

So dark the shadow falls between
The empty Now and what hath been,
Alike for peasant and for Queen.

All outward difference here is dross,
Each shares, beneath life's saddest cross,
The common dignity of loss.

Speak comfort, Lord, though death appal!
No heart can break, no tear can fall
Beyond Thy reach; Thou knowest all.

And grant that we, thine own, who bear
The widow's need to Thee in prayer,
This grace of comforting may share;

Teach us, we pray, the healing touch,
The tender reverence, due to such As Thou, O Lord, hast chastened much!

So shall Thy love our love refine,
And through our words and ways shall shine
A sympathy akin to Thine!

MARY ROWLES.

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

BY EMMA LESLIE.

CHAPTER V.—BERTIE'S PERPLEXITIES.

EARLY the next morning the boys went off to their work of castle building, Bertie wondering whether Jack had got tired of learning to read, and Tommy hoping that he had; but to their surprise Jack was there with his book before them.

"I know this new fellow now," he shouted when he saw the boys.

Bertie ran forward. "What is it?" he said.

"Why this other thing;" Jack would not own even to himself that he was learning his letters, and so he would not call it a letter, but he pointed to the puzzle of the day before, the G; and Bertie found that he had remembered the name and could find several others like it on the same page. Now he explained how they were put together and made one word, D O G—dog, and his big scholar was as proud of this accomplishment as of anything he had ever done. J was the next letter attacked, for Bertie thought the letters forming his own name would have an irresistible charm for him. He did not tell him what J A C K spelt until all the letters had been thoroughly mastered; but the boy had an idea, while hunting over the page after A's and C's, that some wonderful revelation awaited him when he could well recognise these four "new fellows," and when Bertie told him he could now spell his own name his delight was unbounded. He threw up his cap and shouted, "Hurrah, Jack for ever!" and then helped Tommy carry more stones in, without regard to consequences.

"But I say, don't you think we've got enough?" said Bertie, who was not quite so excited as Jack, and looked with a little alarm at the quantity he was hauling in.

"Oh, it's all right," said the new "boots," "I'm the hotel now, and I can make a mess, I suppose, if I clear it up again. There's nobody down here now, I'll have it all square before anybody comes, I tell you; but the little 'un must have something to play with while you're helping me with the reading. Jack, Jack!—I wonder what the old gent 'ud say if he knowed I could spell my own name a'ready," said the boy, scratching his head with intense satisfaction.

Bertie too was pleased. "I wonder when Mr. Robinson will come back," he said.

"I wonder why he went away; he didn't want to go, I know, and he said the sea air was doing him a world of good," said Jack, who was now devoting himself to the improvement of Tommy's castle with as much zest as he had given to the search for a new letter on the page of his spelling-book.

Bertie stood looking down at the labours of the two castle builders; he was not thinking of them, but of a letter that the postman had brought that morning just as they were coming out. It was a large blue letter, the coming of which he had learned to dread, for such missives always presaged a bad headache for his mother and a little less sugar and butter at tea-time. He had a shrewd suspicion that Ann had that day shed a good many tears over it when nobody was looking at her. So, while he stood looking down at the castle Tommy was building, he was inwardly wondering whether it would not be possible to stay out until tea-time, by which dinner would be saved, and Ann would not have to worry so much about the cost of meat and potatoes. His thoughts were broken into at last by Jack suddenly exclaiming—

"I say, it must be nearly dinner-time, I must be off, and you little uns had better run home."

"We're going to stay and finish the castle," said Bertie, who had made up his mind to amuse his brother and make him forget his dinner for once if he could.

"Are not you going home to dinner?" asked Jack in a tone of surprise, for the keen air had made him very hungry. He looked at Bertie as he spoke, and the boy coloured under his steadfast gaze, for he was afraid of Jack guessing his secret.

"Oh, Tommy wants to finish the castle first," he said evasively, stooping down to take Jack's place.

The elder boy nodded. "Oh, all right," he said; and he picked up his book and ran off.

Tommy was so eager to see his building completed that he was quite willing to ignore dinner-time for a little while; but he grumbled at Bertie's clumsiness, when, finding the completion would come too soon for his plan, he contrived to throw a little of it down.

"We shall never get it done," grumbled Tommy, "and I'm sure it must be dinner-time, for I'm quite hungry."

"Oh, there's plenty of time," said Bertie, "I'll mend it all up again."

By-and-bye Jack came back carrying something in a basket.

"Look here, little uns," he called, holding it up. Bertie recognised it at once.

"Where have you been?" he exclaimed.

"Oh! I just went round to your place to tell Ann you wasn't coming home till tea-time, and they needn't be afraid, and then nothing would do but I must bring your dinner, though I'd got it for you in my pocket."

The truth was, Jack had put his dinner in his pocket, instead of eating it, and then had run to tell Ann the boys would not be home, but she had met him with a request that he would take the boys' dinner to them, and had packed a hot meat pie in the basket, with plates and knives and forks, before he could recover from his astonishment. He had intended to share his own with them, but he was not sorry, although greatly surprised, when Ann gave him such a substantial meal to carry to them, for he had made sure from what he saw and knew of Bertie that there was no dinner for them that day.

Bertie was even more astonished than Jack had been, when the lid of the basket was lifted, and he saw the pie. "Where did it come from?" he exclaimed.

"Oh, let me see, let me see," said Tommy, forgetting his castle and pulling at the basket.

"All right, you shall see and taste too," said Jack, who suspected that such a dinner as he had brought, did not often find its way to Mrs. Danby's table now. He lifted the pie carefully out of the basket, and put it on the seat fixed round the pavilion. "There you are, a dinner fit for a king," while at the same time he pulled out from his pockets bread and meat and cold pudding, that he had thought to regale the boys upon.

Tommy danced and capered and clapped his hands, while his brother gravely cut the pie, for he could not help wondering whether his mother and Ann had got a nice dinner, and half wished he had gone home now. Jack had a piece of the pie, and Tommy condescended to have some of the cold plum pudding, and the boys had a most enjoyable meal; but not until it was nearly over did Jack tell the reason for its being sent.

"Your mother isn't well the old woman said," he remarked, with his mouth full of pudding; "she did not go to sleep all night, but she's asleep now, and she mustn't be woke up, so don't you little uns go home till tea-time."

"I think I'll take the basket home," said Bertie, who was anxious to solve the mystery of the pie.

"No! no! you just let it stay here, while you get on with the castle. I must be off again directly, and if you go he'll go," said Jack, nodding towards Tommy.

Bertie hesitated for a moment. It was hard to give up his own way; he did so want to know what could have happened at home since the morning; but if he went, Tommy would undoubtedly insist upon going too, and he would rush in and make a noise as he always did. The remembrance of this, and his mother's headache, decided the matter; but after Jack had gone back, and they were busy with the stones again, his thoughts wandered from the castle-building to the graver question of their home life. Surely his father must have come home. God had heard his prayers at last, and brought him back to take care of them again. Ann always said they would have nice dinners, when he came back, and he had come while they had been out.

A sweet gladness stole into the little boy's heart, when he thought of this, not only because his father had come home once more, but because God had heard his prayers. So sure did he feel about this at last, that he said to his brother: "Tommy, I think papa has come home."

"Papa come home!" exclaimed the boy, dropping his spade, and jumping up to look round. "Where—where, where did you see him, Bertie?"

"I haven't seen him yet, but I think we shall when we go home at tea-time," replied his brother confidently.

"Did Ann tell you? How did she know? When did he come? Oh, let us go home now," said Tommy, brushing the sand off his coat and preparing to run off.

"No, no, we mustn't go yet; Ann said we were to stay here until tea-time," said Bertie, holding his brother back.

"But I want to go if papa has come," protested Tommy.

"So do I, but Ann says she wants the house very quiet, and so we must stay here," said Bertie. "Suppose we go for a run, as far as the cove, and get some of those pink shells for the top of the castle?"

"I don't want any shells, nor the castle either," said Tommy, giving the edifice an angry kick, that sent it all down. "I want to see papa, and I shall go home now."

Bertie soon found he had raised a storm it was not easy to quell. To hear that his father had come back was to awaken recollections in Tommy's mind of the old life in the grand home at Esterfield, and he clamoured to go back at once. "I won't stop at this nasty place now papa has come back. I don't like Beachcliff and the seaside, I like Esterfield, where we had a big nursery and a lot of toys, and nice dinners every day; come home, Bertie, come home before papa goes away again;" and Tommy tried to drag his elder brother along, but Bertie shook his head.

"Look here, Tommy, we'll go home presently, but if papa has come, he'll want to be quiet with mamma for a little while—that's why Ann sent our dinner here you know."

"I don't care, I'll go home and see papa; I won't stop here," protested Tommy, to whom the vision of the old life, when he was indulged and petted, instead of being crossed and restrained, appealed so strongly. Bertie coaxed and reasoned, but all in vain, and at last, after making every effort he could think of to delay their return, he was obliged to yield the point, and the two set off home.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XVII.

Who of a wicked king was sore afraid,
And yet, in faith, a prophet's voice obeyed?
Who, though he longed to win the heathen's gold,
Dared only speak the word that he was told?
Whose wicked, disobedient sons were slain,
Their father had rebuked their sins in vain?
Who dared a heathen king to disobey,
And kneeled upon his knees three times a day?
A father stretched his hand and took the knife—
What gentle son prepared to yield his life?
The spot where Saul a witch's help implored,
And broke a strict commandment of the Lord?
Who first, in wrath, refused a prophet's aid,
And then came back repenting, and obeyed?
What pious Roman once an angel heard,
And, that same day, obeyed the angel's word?
The spot where disobedience first began
And wrought a lasting misery for man?

The virtue which these nine initials name,
God loveth more than sacrificial flame;
This did the Saviour learn, although a Son,
Many are righteous through this Holy One. L. T.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. VII.

1. She was the daughter of an eastern chief.
2. A stranger met her when drawing water from a well.
3. He won her favour by a present of jewels.
4. He had come a long way and wanted to take her back with him.
5. She went, and became his master's wife.
6. Her two sons disagreed, and she took the side of the younger.
7. She helped him to deceive his father.
8. The last thing we hear of her is that she arranged to get her younger son out of his brother's way.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. VI.—p. 448.

1. 2 Sam. vii.: He spoke to Nathan of dwelling in a house of cedar, while the ark of God was within curtains.
2. Psa. cxxxii. 1–7.
3. Because he had shed much blood in war, whereas Solomon's reign was to be one of peace (1 Chron. xxii. 8).
4. 1 Chron. xxii. 14.
5. That Hiram's servants should cut timber, and bring it by sea to Joppa, and that Solomon should give in exchange a quantity of wheat and oil (1 Kings v.).
6. The strangers that were left in the land. 2 Chron. ii. 17; 1 Kings ix. 21.
7. A man named Hiram, whose mother was an Israelite, but his father a man of Tyre (1 Kings vii. 14).
8. At Tartham, near the Jordan, called Taretan in Joshua iii. 16.
9. Joash, 2 Kings xii.; Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxix.; Isaiah, 2 Chron. xxxiv.
10. Zerubbabel (Ezra i.) and afterwards (Ezra vii.).
11. Haggai and Zechariah.
12. In Haggai ii. 9 it is said that the glory of the latter house should be greater than that of the former.
13. To the work done by Herod the Great, in repairing and beautifying the temple.
14. From the court of the Gentiles.
15. Solomon's Porch (John x. 23; Acts iii. 11).

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

RALPH ELLISON'S OPPORTUNITY.

CHAPTER III.

HE USED WHAT CLUMSY BACHELOR ARTS HE KNEW TO REASSURE HER.

IN this fashion seven years passed. During the first two or three of them Sandbury had suffered more than one tremor of fear, lest its brilliant young pastor might be lured away to some scene where his eloquence should command a wider hearing; but when it was stated, on Mr. Culpepper's authority, that he had refused an invitation to a pastorate in London itself, Sandbury recovered its tranquillity, and considered the minister of Sion Chapel its own inalienable property.

He himself exhibited no wish for change, no desire for a more varied life; no new longing to be in touch with his neighbours, and to share the bond of a common fellowship in their joys and sorrows. He lived more and more the life of an ascetic, except that, while he had bitterly cut himself adrift from his past, he had no consoling assurance of a future that should assuage him for its pain. In his lonely life he had grown to have a great love of the sea.

It was not so easily reached in those days as in these, when the town has spread itself and gone forth to meet it. He who would taste the tonic breath of the ocean in the days of which I write, had to brave a wide stretch of loose sand that gave no hold to the feet; but this difficulty overcome, he reached a firm basis, where for miles he might walk with a free tread in undisputed possession of the world.

This chalk-cliffed corner of the south-eastern coast fails perhaps in the sublime, but it has the mystic charm, the undefined sadness that always exist where there is an infinity of space. The ripples that came up and expired at Ralph Ellison's feet had travelled from a vaguely seen and remotely distant horizon, where the earth and all remembrance of it were blotted out, and the sky itself bent down to meet the waters. In its profound and calm tranquillity, or in its inhuman, savage, and merciless rage, the ocean has always had a message for those who can hear it; perhaps the very first man who stood upon its lonely shore, saw in it an image of life, and formed his earliest dim conception of a harbour beyond, where the storms are overpassed and the voyage ceases.

> Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore,
> So do our minutes hasten to their end;
> Each changing place with that which went before,
> In sequent toil all forward do contend.

To all of us it speaks of a nature vaster, greater than we, wholly incomprehensible, except on the hypothesis that there is a God who is greater than nature. This, after all, is the first and last message of the sea; its dark mystery finds no solution except in God.

To Ralph Ellison, too, it spoke; but it was of a God who avenges and punishes, not of a Father who is merciful and loves. It was a sea full of dead men, a great grave of wrecked hopes. He loved it most in its angry moods, when the waves sobbed on the beach, and the salt spray flew in his face, and the roar of tempest was in the air. For the most part, he had undisputed possession of the shore, and wandered there a lonely man.

In those unregenerate days, no one dreamed of taking exercise unless with some definite object in view. To walk merely for the sake of walking was looked upon as an idle and reprehensible habit to be discouraged in the young. Neither did Sandbury encourage the practice of bathing, considering baths in any form, indeed, too rash an experiment for every-day use. The small fishing community that trafficked with the deep, lay hidden behind a projecting spur of land a mile or two to the eastward, and, for greater freedom and security, Ralph made a habit of turning his back on it, and walking in the opposite direction.

It was while on one of those solitary rambles that a strange thing happened.

He was standing facing the sea, looking at it perhaps with eyes that took little note of its brilliance under the vivid light of early spring, when he was startled from his gloomy reverie by a cry that sounded loud in the silence. He knew the note of every sea-bird; but this was neither the scream of gull nor curlew. He listened keenly. It came again, and he instinctively recognised it now. It was the wail of a child who suddenly awakes to a sense of loneliness and finds itself afraid.

He looked round him quickly with a strange feeling of wonder at this invasion of his solitude. The shore was uneven, dotted here and there with little hillocks of drifted sand, held in shape by a coarse and scrubby growth. He walked a little distance to one of these, a dim impulse towards helpfulness stirring in him.

The frightened cry guided his steps securely, and there behind the largest of the mounds he found the child whose voice had summoned him. In his bewilderment, suddenly shaken out of his gloomy thoughts, Ralph stooped down and stared at the little one, who in turn looked up at him with a fascinated gaze, the unshed tears trembling in the big grey eyes.

It was a little girl of some three or four years; a pretty child. Her hat had fallen backwards, dangling by a ribbon, and showed a head covered with bright curls. She had evidently just wakened from sleep, for her cheeks were flushed and rosy. In one little fist some shells and other treasures were tightly clasped. He noticed, moreover, that she was dressed neatly, and even with some modest attempt at prettiness.

"Where have you come from, little one?" Ralph asked; and then, seeing that his deep voice frightened her, he tried to soften it. "What is your name?" he asked.

"Josie," said the child, in a timid whisper; and then the tears brimmed over. "Josie wants mother," she wailed, and her cries became louder.

"Hush, don't cry!" said Ralph, in his deep embarrassment not knowing what to do, and trying to explain to himself the mystery of the child's presence here in this vast silence, where there was no sign of human life.

"We shall find mother," he said, with more confidence than he felt.

He sat down on the shingle, and put out his hand. The fountains of tenderness had so long been sealed in him that even this little action came to him uneasily; but the little one, realising her loneliness now, and seeing no other refuge, let fall her treasures to grasp him with both chubby hands.

Then very awkwardly, and, with both shyness and shrinking, he stole an arm round her, and drew her towards him. Presently he took courage, and lifted her on his knee, and held her close, so as to hush her sobbing, on his breast.

With that little brown head nestling close to him, those baby hands clinging to him, the sobs dying away under the comforting assurance of protection, there awoke in Ralph Ellison a strange conflict of feelings, as if something that had been long dead were reviving in him, unfolding, struggling back to life.

When she had stopped crying, he used what clumsy bachelor arts he knew to amuse and reassure her. He took out his watch, and held it to her ear that she might listen to its ticking; he blew on the case and made it fly mysteriously open. When the red lips pursed themselves up, and sent out a breath with the same magical result, she looked up at him with big wondering eyes, and then burst into a delighted peal of laughter. Ralph laughed too—a spontaneous laugh that startled him, as if it were the echo from a far-off life.

Presently he was aware that the air had taken on a keener edge, and he noticed that the early spring night was drawing close.

"We must go home, little one," he said, and he embarrassedly set about making her ready for the journey, tying the hat over her curls. But in what quarter lay the home from which this little waif had strayed? He rose and set her down, hoping she would guide him by indicating the direction; but she slid a hand into his, and waited confidently to be led.

He looked all round him, scanning the landscape, narrowed everywhere by the cliffs except towards the sea; but he saw no sign of human habitation. He shouted, but no answer came back to him, except the echo of his own voice, and the little one's treble laugh. Then suddenly he had an inspiration. He noticed how the child's feet sank in the loose sand, and he searched narrowly round him. Yes, there before him were impressions that might have been made by the tiny boots. He traced them for a yard or two till he reached a firmer belt, where he unmistakably recognised the print of the little feet.

"So this is the way," he said; and he lifted the child, who made very slow progress over the shifting ground, and followed as best he could that uncertain clue, losing it altogether in open places where the wind had drifted the sand, but still pressing on in hopes that he might soon light on some clearer evidence.

The little one prattled as they went, now and then making him stop to pick up a shell or stone that pleased her fancy, and he obeyed with again that odd feeling that he was reacting some scene out of a former life. Surely in that dim time he, too, had had a tenderness for little children, and had found pleasure in yielding to the sweet tyranny of affection; but how long ago it was since anyone had leaned on him, had looked to him for kindness, had counted on him for service! Even with this baby's little fist pounding his shoulder, her curls brushing his cheek, her sweet inconsequent prattle in his ear, he could scarce revive the memory of it; it was gone, vanished like a dream in the morning, which one strives fruitlessly to recall.

He was becoming vaguely anxious now. He had walked a long way, and this portion of the coast was less familiar to him. The light was growing fainter, the tide had turned, and after that first leisurely half hour in which it seems to be gathering its forces, he knew that it would flow with relentless swiftness over all the ground under his feet. As he thought of the fate that might have befallen the child but for his timely arrival, his heart contracted, and he unconsciously held her closer.

Even if he forsook the sand for the rough bent and scrub that made a narrow margin between him and the chalky cliffs, he scarcely saw how that would help, since so far as his knowledge lay, there was no house for miles around from which the little one could have wandered. He now and then climbed on to the higher ground, scanning the near and further distance as if he would compel it to help him, but it made no sign. He was growing with every breath more perplexed, when suddenly after one of these excursions, light came from an unexpected quarter.

"Mammy, mammy," shouted Josie, and struggled to her feet, running forward a step or two. Ralph looked about him in amazement, and then he faintly perceived a whiter thread of smoke standing out against the thickly gathering dusk.

"Take me to mother, Josie," he said, and the child pulled him confidently forward.

As his eyes grew more accustomed to the darkness, he made out a little cottage that nestled under the cliff at a spot where for a moment it trended inwards, leaving a platform between it and the sea. But for the betraying smoke, he might easily have passed it by; it was so like to the surrounding chalk, and so cunningly and artfully contrived to evade notice, that he quickly guessed it to have been used as a place of concealment by the smugglers who once flourished on this coast.

It was unlit, but as they neared it, a voice called out "Josie, Josie!" It penetrated the dusk with a curious thrill as of relief, after long anguish and suspense.

"Mammy," cried the child, with a gay laugh, all innocent of offence.

Ralph still kept hold of her hand. He paused on the threshold; by the light of a decaying fire on the hearth, he could but dimly see the form of a woman, but the child sprang from him and caught at her dress.

"I found the little girl on the shore a mile or two from here," he said. "She had fallen asleep and it was her cry on awakening that led me to her. She could not tell me where her home was, but happily we have found it."

"I thank you from the bottom of my heart," said the woman, and he noticed that her voice trembled; "I missed her hours ago, but I have been ill, and my strength failed me when I tried to follow her."

"Are you quite alone?"

"My sister-in-law lives with me, but she went to Blackford early this morning, where we have a friend. I have been terribly anxious."

"I am glad your suspense is over; she had wandered a long way for such a little one."

"You will come in and rest, sir?"

Ralph hesitated a moment, but she hastily struck a light. He looked round him curiously. The cottage or hut which seemed in part to have been hollowed out of the soft cliff, consisted of but two rooms, and the outer one, at least, was very meagrely furnished. It seemed a very lonely place for the woman to choose as a retreat. When his glance came back to Josie's mother he was shocked and startled by the pallor of her face.

"You look very ill," he said.

She smiled, she had a very gentle and patient smile.

"I shall be quite well soon," she said.

"Have you had advice? You are far from help here."

"Medicine can do me little good now," she said, "but I am not without aid."

She had laboriously lifted the child to the table, and was busying herself with tender little cares; Ralph looked on with a kind of wonder for the deftness of her thin white fingers as she drew off the little boots, shook the sand from the socks, and unravelled the strings his clumsy hands had knotted. She stroked the brown curls gently.

"Josie, Josie," she murmured, "what would mammy have done if you had gone away, and not come back any more?"

"Look, mammy, look," said the little one, pulling her mother's gentle face into the proper position, "look what a 'ittle, 'ittle shell Josie found her own self."

Ralph turned away abruptly; he had no place here, as he felt with a sudden inrush of bitterness—here where love and tenderest sympathy found room to live, what part or lot had he with these?

"I must go," he said, and he was conscious that his voice sounded harsh and cold; "it grows dark, and I am a long way from home."

"You take my heart's deepest gratitude with you, sir," said the woman; "I could not have lived to-night if you had not given her back to me. Josie, you will thank the kind gentleman who brought you home to mammy?"

The child, who had been chattering all the while of the wonders she had seen in her travels through an unknown world, looked at him with a smile, and held up her innocent, rosy mouth for his kiss.

Ralph felt a spasm at his heart, and his own lips trembled as they met hers. Then, without another word, he went out alone into the night.

CHAPTER IV.

He went again to the cottage on the following afternoon.

He had combated the question of going or not going with himself all the morning, during those hours he had been wont to give to sharpening the arrows that were to pierce his hearers in the chapel on Sunday.

For seven years he had preached a stern and hard morality; he had thrown a bitter, searching light on the meaner possibilities of human nature; he had left no dark recess of the heart unrevealed. But for once his argument failed him; for once he suffered a curious sense of insufficiency, a something lacking.

His mind went back again and again to yesterday's event, and hovered about it persistently. It seems a little thing to have moved him, the finding of a child and the restoration of this little one to love and tender care; surely in a seven years' ministry, he must have shared many experiences more fitted to move him than these?

That he had not, sufficiently expresses the magnitude of his own loss. His people were proud of his eloquence, but when trouble overtook them, when prosperity failed, when death came with its summons it was some kind neighbour for whom they sent to console them, to bear them company in that outsetting loneliness, and not the brilliant pulpit orator, the severe moral essayist. He had refused to share in their joys and innocent pleasures, and in grief they could not open their hearts to him.

After vainly trying to concentrate his attention he gave up the conflict and went out. No one meeting him, darker, sterner of look than ever, would have guessed that the remembrance of a child's caress, a child's beckoning hand was leading him on—drawing him half against his will. He was sternest of all over what he called his own folly and weakness, and yet while he trod the shore, he felt again the clinging arms about his neck, and heard the childish voice in his ear.

Does this seem a too improbable stretch of sentiment? It was seven barren years that were avenging themselves, seven years of leanness, of a deliberately joyless and loveless life that called him to account.

When he reached the cottage, it was a little while before he could overcome the shyness that had become second nature sufficiently to allow him to enter. When he had received permission to do so, he found the mother sitting near the fire and Josie playing with some rags of bright-coloured stuffs at her feet. The child was distant with him for a moment, peeping at him exploringly from under her dark lashes, but presently she crept nearer and made demure overtures towards friendship, by placing her doll on his knee.

"You are worse to-day," said Ralph, taking a chair by the sick woman, and reaching out a hand to Josie. "Yesterday's suspense, perhaps."

"I shall not be better until I am quite well," she said again with a smile.

"Do you not find it very dull, so far from everyone?"

"We are three lonely people," she said, "and the quiet is very restful after the noises of a great town. On most days I can do all that we require, and we have help. We have a friend at Blackford, who gives my sister a day's work now and then, and who helps us in many ways. My sister has gone there again to-day; there is a path by the cliff that makes the way shorter for her."

"I do not know your face," said the minister, "you are a stranger here?"

"We come from the north," she said; "and you too, sir, do you not? I seem to hear it in your speech."

"Yes," said Ralph, turning abruptly aside, "I lived there once—a long time ago."

"And we have but come, a week ago or less. Times were bad in my old home," she gave a little sigh, "and we came to Blackford to our friend who had settled there. It was he who told us of this place which we could have for the taking, and I thought perhaps that the salt sea air might help me to live a little longer—for the child's sake—but God's will is best."

Ralph did not remain long on that day, but he went again before the week was at an end, led by an attraction for which he could scarcely account. On the next occasion, the sister-in-law—a rather common-place and uninteresting woman who struck him as markedly inferior in intelligence and refinement to the other—was present.

"Hannah," said the sick woman gently, "this is Mr. Ellison who brought Josie back to us."

Hannah wiped a hand upon her apron, and gave it to him to shake.

"There never was such a wean for straying," she said, with a good-humoured smile; "the moment your back's turned she's off; I tell her I'll tie her to the table leg next time I go up the hill."

Josie, to whom this threat was not in the least alarming, looked up with a merry laugh. Evidently she and her aunt were on excellent terms, and it somehow made the minister more comfortable to find this homely, capable woman in charge of the household; it lifted the whole affair out of the region of the romantic and mysterious where he had uneasily placed it; it left it very easily explained, as he thought, not without a grim edge of humour, when he reflected on the curiosity Sandbury would presently display over the strangers.

He early learned the few particulars of the sick woman's uneventful history.

Mary Hughes had been widowed after a short married life, and her story thenceforward had nothing which made it differ from the experience of hundreds of educated women who struggle on in solitude for daily bread. Her face bore the stamp of those years of trial; it was sharpened and paled by sickness, but it had a strange peace and subdued happiness as if she carried about with her some private joy from which she could take deep satisfying draughts.

The minister was himself the first to enlighten Sandbury about the strangers.

He would willingly have kept the knowledge to himself if he could, for he loved as little as ever to give curiosity and food for speculation concerning his affairs, but he had felt it to be his duty to persuade Mary Hughes to have medical advice. He could not accept the responsibility of her illness and possible death unshared by anyone except the humble friend in Blackford.

"There is a good doctor in Sandbury," he said, "will you let me ask him to visit you? I think you ought to see him for your sister's and the child's sake."

She consented at once.

"You are right," she said, with her calm sense, "it may make things easier for them afterwards. One has no business to make one's dying a greater trouble than it need be to the survivors."

"Don't talk of dying; Dr. Rose is said to be very clever, he may very likely give you a long lease of life yet."

"The cleverest doctor could not do that," she said with a smile, "but I shall be grateful to him if he will come and see me."

To tell Dr. Rose was, as Ralph very well knew, to tell all Sandbury. It is the fashion to consider gossip as pre-eminently a feminine weakness, but history does not wholly bear out the truth of this statement. Have we not our Pepys, and, for the matter of that, our Boswell to contradict it? There is no one in the world who has better opportunities of disseminating interesting items of news than the family doctor, and the excellent practitioner of Sandbury made very discreet use of his chances, and a visit from him was as eagerly looked forward to by his lady patients as was the rare London newspaper by their lords and masters.

Ralph made his request through the worthy Culpepper, who waited on him in the vestry after morning service.

"There's a poor woman living in the cottage under the cliff at Blackford," he said, "I think she is very ill; I wish you would get Rose to see her."

He was aware that he preferred his request very awkwardly, and Culpepper looked sufficiently astonished over it.

"The cottage by the shore what the smugglers was said to use?" he said incredulously. "I haven't seed it since I was a lad, but it's a lonesome place for a woman——"

"Yes," said the minister, anxious to cut the conversation short, "and that is why I should like Rose to see her; she is out of reach of help. If you could mention it to him——"

"Dear me, yes, sir, there ain't nothing easier. I'll look in as I go by, for every child in Sandbury knows as Dr. Rose won't budge from his own dinner table on Sabbath day let the king himself be dying." It scarcely seemed likely that the doctor's services would be required in this contingency, but that was not to the point. "It's the only day he gets what you may call a meal of meat over his throat; it's a snack most days standing, and thankful if he gets it. I'll go now, sir,—the cottage you say, and a woman—a single woman?—"

"No," said the minister rather impatiently, "a widow with a sister-in-law and child."

He was aware that Culpepper was eyeing him curiously and he disliked the scrutiny. Not even a man who had shown such a rooted aversion from matrimony and had scarcely seemed to know that there was a woman among his flock, could escape ever-watchful suspicion.

The chapel was filled in every corner in the evening, and a whole battery of glances with a new wonder in them was directed to the preacher. Dr. Rose's report was eagerly waited for next day, and if the cottage had not been so inaccessible, more than one volunteer might have gone with him. Ralph guessed as much, and said to himself, "I must change my hours. I shall go in the evening." He did not undervalue the kindness of his neighbours or doubt its sincerity. That Sandbury would have rushed to the aid of the widow and little one and transplanted them into plenty, he could not question, but as he pictured Mary Hughes in that atmosphere of gossip and of fussing, good-natured zeal, he felt himself inwardly rebelling. Better surely the lonely sea hut with the soothing rhythm of the waves, nature's voice at its sweetest, for one's lullaby.

Mrs. Rose had quite a number of visitors on Monday, and the talk was animated.

"Culpepper says he never saw him so taken up about anyone before, never, and its true enough that we might all be lying corpses before he came near us——"

"When a man shuts himself up like that, you can never tell what foolishness he'll take to; nothing would surprise me," said another.

"It may be an old friend," said Miss Lavinia Saxby, who cherished a middle-aged sentimentality, and had pastured largely on old-fashioned romances; "perhaps it is some long-lost one restored to him——"

"Fiddlesticks!" said the little doctor, briskly scattering all these airy imaginations as he walked into his own dining-room. "A sick woman old enough to be his grandmother."

"His grandmother!"

"Well, his mother, then, or his aunt, anything you like. Two of 'em, if it comes to that, and neither of 'em fit to hold the candle in looks to the present company if you want my opinion," he ended gallantly.

Dr. Rose's report stilled the fluttered dovecots, and when it was known how very ill the stranger was, and that she had a child, the doctor and the minister were entrusted with many little delicacies and offers of service; but curiosity was no longer vital enough to enable Sandbury to brave the long lonely miles that separated them from the cottages, and only one woman, and she a poor one who had nothing to give, found her way to the distant hut. "Nothing but time," she said when she presented herself there, "but I can work or watch; I've watched by a good many of my own, and I'm a lone woman too."

Mary Hughes was greatly touched and moved by these evidences of kindness.

"It is a good world," she said, "what a great deal of love there is in it!"

"I have not found it so," said the minister sombrely, but he suffered a pang over the admission. He could talk to the sick woman now with unreserve as to a friend, for in the long days of her illness he was much with her. Hannah now relinquished those errands to Blackford and devoted herself to the work of the little household, but her bustling presence was no restraint upon the others' intercourse.

It was a very epoch-making time in the minister's life, this watch which he shared with his new-found friend. Perhaps his sermons suffered in that fine polish it had yielded him a bitter pleasure to give them, with the fastidiousness of a man who has made literature take the place of larger interests in life; perhaps they were less carefully composed, less incisive and biting, but the gain to his own soul in the quiet hours while he waited for death was incalculable.

In Mary's presence he was soothed and tranquillised. She was dying in poverty and obscurity; she was leaving the little one in a friendless world, and yet she could tell him with a smile on her lips that God's will was best.

"You have suffered," he said once. "You have known little but care and trouble and sorrow; you have been defeated in the battle, and now you are going away without a chance of redeeming the past, of seeing so much as a gleam of prosperity before you die—yet you can tell me this?"

"Yes," she said with a heavenly light on her face, "it is my joy to tell it you."

"I have suffered too," he said, "suffered cruelly." He groaned and hid his face in his hands, "but I have found God's will bitter, relentless, cruel——"

"Ah, no," she said, "you must not say that. There is suffering for all of us, and there is much in every one of our lives that we cannot understand here, and while we rebel and cry out we suffer fiercely; it is only when we take all in our lot which we cannot change or explain to Him that we grow calm, for to will what God wills brings peace."

"My wound is too grievous," he said, "there is no healing of it."

"There is no healing of it except in Him. You have tried other physicians, will you not trust the Great Healer to make you whole?" Mary Hughes looked at him with eyes that were full of yearning love. She was older than he, and it was with something of a mother's or a sister's tenderness that she longed to help him. She understood him far better than any of his own people, and she knew that under his seeming sternness there lay a very weak nature. He had suffered, but he had not been brave, he had allowed himself to be beaten, he had yielded in the fight. She yearned over him as over some young brother, and would fain see him restored to moral healthfulness.

"It is your mission to comfort others," she said, "will you go without this consolation yourself? With the breath that is left me, I will pray that Jesus Christ may visit you, dear brother, and teach you that in all his dealings with us there is infinite love. We are wayward children; if He seems to withdraw Himself awhile, it is but that we may miss Him and turn to Him again as to our dearest friend." The soft voice had great persuasion in it; in the solemnity of her dying hours conventionality was stripped off; she did not think of him as the minister of Sion to whom his people looked up in some awe and constraint, but as a storm-tossed soul needing help and comfort.

Ralph bowed his head under her pleading words. Of this sustaining love of which she spoke what did he know? He had cried aloud of God's wrath against sinners—His relentless punishment of guilt, His war against evil, but of Jesus Christ the healer, what had there been for him to tell?

That divine love on which she leaned had never touched his own heart; he had rebelled against its invitation; he had refused to listen to its persuasions.

He had been wounded, as he said, cruelly, yet he had not learned the lesson from which Christianity draws its vital force—the great lesson we must all learn, that in pain and sorrow there is purifying and that in suffering with Christ we live with Him.

He had borne His cross for years with unquenched bitterness; for succeeding years he had summoned a cold philosophy with which he had hoped to guard himself from further pain; and yet at the end of them all he found himself envying this poor dying stranger, who in her hour of deepest need found the love of which she had spoken all-sufficing.

STORIES FROM BUDDHIST SERMONS.

ABOUT fifty years since, a famous preacher made his appearance in Kiyoto and at once so captivated the hearts of his hearers that the Japanese have to this day held him in highest repute and made the book in which his sermons are published, a text-book of moral instruction.

Okuda Juta the preacher, a native of Hiroshima, was a young man of about thirty years of age when he arrived in Kiyoto, the sacred capital of Japan, accompanied by his friend, Togawa Akira, in the spring of 1839. Akira was much impressed with the discourses of his friend who preached extempore. To preserve them he took notes and in 1843 published them under the name of "Discourses on Morality."[1] He says of them, "The doctrine comes into the heart like the reflection of the moon in the water;" and we may well believe that this effect was largely owing to the graphic stories which form the bulk of the discourses. In introducing the first of these it is only necessary to say that the Shojo are generally represented as women with long red hair hanging loosely about their shoulders, clad in flowing robes, and are invariably associated with a gigantic wine jar, a cup and dipper.

THE SHOJO; OR, BEWARE OF WINE.

HERE let me tell you a capital story. You know the red woollen cloth called Shojo. It is said that the genuine Shojo cloth is dyed in the blood of some animals which live in the Chinese Sea. These creatures are called Shojo, and are much like human beings, they can talk and are so wise that it is very difficult to catch them. Knowing their danger from the former experience of their fellows they remain at the bottom of the sea in deep seclusion, so that I have heard they are never at hand when men want them. Nevertheless, man's wisdom is a very different thing. For men well know that the Shojo are exceedingly fond of wine, so that wherever they get a whiff of the odour of wine, up they will come from the bottom of the sea. Accordingly men choose a grassy place by the seashore and arrange some wine jars in a row, putting in them some wine and leaving a ladle handy; then close round these, they tie the tufts of long grass together to look like straw shoes; having prepared several pairs of these, the men retire to a distance and hiding themselves keep watch. Now the scent of the wine soon reaches the bottom of the sea, and the Shojo perceiving it begin sniffing about with their noses. Soon says one: "Hi! Sansuke Shojo, is not that a lovely perfume? It must be wine! Had we not better ascend and see" "No, no!" says an old Shojo, "you had better stay where you are. You will get drinking until you are intoxicated, and then you will be knocked over and killed. It is all a horrible trick!" Then one of the young ones exclaimed, "Why, if we only go up and do not drink any it will be all right! It is better to go there and inhale the perfume of the wine, than to stay here and smell the vile odour of the sea!" The others all responded, "Very true, so it is, there is nothing to make a fuss about in smelling; let us all come!" Then softly and gently cleaving the waves they arrive at the side of the wine jars and look round. Now this again was something far better than they had experienced at the bottom of the sea, so they all said: "This is indeed a lovely odour; it is quite too delightful!" And soon all were circling in a giddy way round the wine jars sniffing again and again. At last one of the Shojo said, "It is really intolerable to go on merely smelling the wine, suppose we each just take a ladleful, eh?" "No, no!" replied another; "all the Shojo who have been captured up to the present time, every one of them hurriedly seized the ladle and drank greedily. Then getting intoxicated they were all killed. Do not let us stretch out a careless hand." "Yes, yes!" they all cried; "it will be a bad job if we drink from the ladle; but if we just dip in a finger each for a taste—a thimbleful all round will do us no harm! Shall we not all try it?" And at once a finger was stretched out from every hand and each took just a taste. This too they found was much better than merely smelling, as one and another went backwards and forwards, circling round the jars, tasting and smacking their lips. At last one of them said, "Why are we only sipping it in this way? Just one drink is not enough to harm us, let us take the ladle and each of us have a draught. If we take care not to drink our fill there's no fear of our being intoxicated. It will do us good to drink a little each all round quite in a temperate way." Again they all cried, "Yes, yes, that is so!" and taking the ladle in hand, they went on drinking a little each. As this was going on, one of their number said, "It is no use drinking wine of any kind unless you take a good lot of it and get merry; moreover those Shojos who up to this time have been killed and had their life blood squeezed out, were not slain simply through drinking too much; look there, under your feet, how many shoes there are, made of the growing grass—it was owing to putting on those boots and dancing useless dances that they at last fell down and were slain. But it is not such a terrible thing just once in a way to take a drop too much." The rest of the company rejoined, "Ah, ah! that is so, indeed! If we get merry—but do not put on shoes, there's no fear of our being killed." So at it they went, drinking till they were merry; and as they kept on drinking, cup after cup went gurgling down until they began to get quite queer and to long to put on those grass shoes, until at last they felt they must do so. Then all said, "Shall we not put on these shoes just for a little while? If we only put them on, but do not attempt to dance in them, there is no fear of our falling down. But it will be capital if we join in singing a song." Each one immediately slipped his feet into the shoes, and kept time with the song by clapping his hands. Whilst doing this they said, "Do we not also want to keep time with our feet? we must, indeed!" Therefore one of them exclaimed, "How will it be if without falling down we just keep time with one step?" and all together cried, "That will be capital! Now then, all together, without falling, let us give one!" And raising their feet all fell down, and were soon killed, and their life blood carried off for the dyer—at least so the story goes.

[1] Shin Gaku michi no Hanashi.

Still this is an old tale from China of ancient things which may or may not have really taken place—this I cannot say, but this I do know that there are in this land of ours a good many people of the Shojo class.

Both lust and drink, greed and pride are all terrible things. But who is there who abstains from these because he discerns plainly the truth of such frightful evils. It is well, if any does so! But people generally go on carelessly until, their souls being taken, they perish. You young people, please give attention to these important truths. Those silly people who are led astray like horses or oxen whenever they give way to evil are "putting on the shoes." How many there are like this! Be sure that all who are of the Chinese Shojo class will come at last to a like end. Horrible indeed it is. On this account I have addressed to you this interesting discourse.

A. B. HUTCHINSON.

MORTALITY FROM FEAR.

AN Eastern legend tells that one day the Plague Spirit appeared to the Sultan, and said to him, "I am going to pass through your country, and I must have then ten thousand victims."

"Take them, monster," said the Sultan in indignant horror, "take them and be gone."

At the end of three months the Plague returned to the Sultan, and said, "I am going—it is done."

"Liar," said the Sultan, "you asked ten thousand victims, and you have taken thirty thousand!"

The Plague Spirit replied, "I took only my number, ten thousand; it was fear that took the rest."

Napoleon once said that the soldier who has no fear of death makes this fear pass into the ranks of the enemy. In time of epidemic as on the field of battle, often he who has no fear of death is most likely to escape.

This is certain, that the absence of fear is a powerful preservative against disease; quite as much so as temperance, good nourishment, and other conditions of precaution always commended by physicians.

How then can this freedom from the fear of death be obtained and preserved? There are some who, by natural temperament and physical frame, are fearless. But it is possible for others, of timid nature and feeble nerve, to show an intrepidity and heroism wonderful to those who know not the secret of their courage.

It is the faith of the Gospel, the presence of Christ in the soul, that is the power in such cases. Faith in Christ brings to the believers the strength drawn from One who has conquered death, and opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

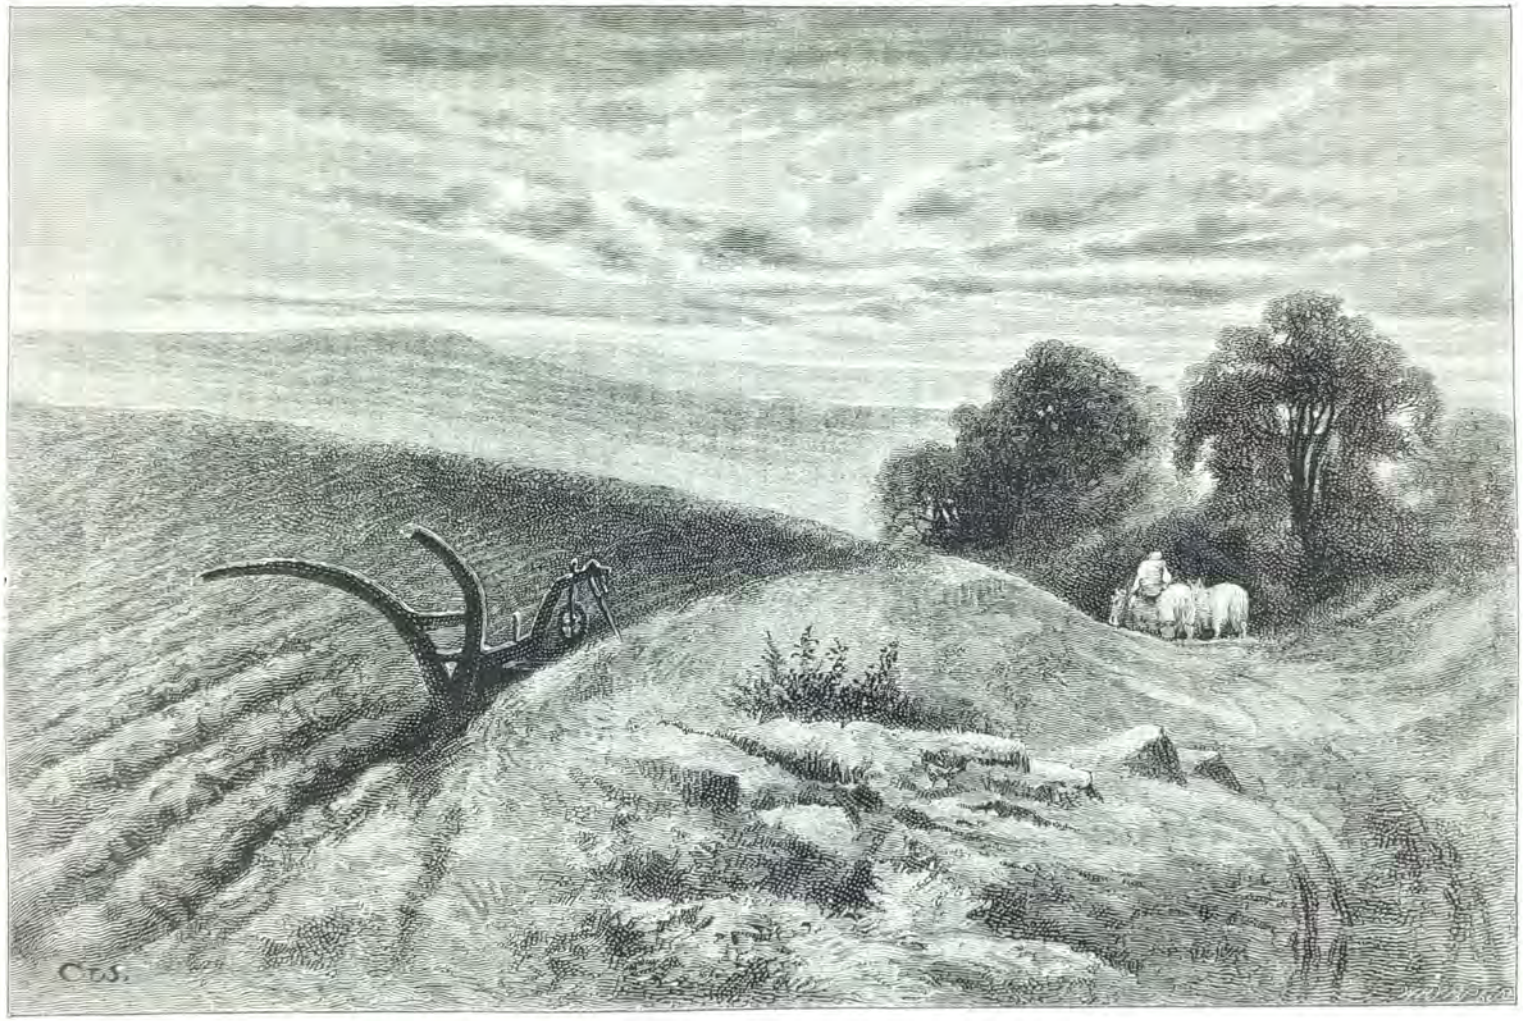
There is a striking statement about the fearless spirit caused by this consciousness of the soul's safety, in the famous book by an old divine, Dr. Sibbes, 'The Bruised Reed.' This book it was which was the means of the conversion of Richard Baxter, and it has brought spiritual knowledge and comfort to many, even to our own times. It is dedicated to Lord Vere of Tilbury, General of the English Forces in the Netherlands. The dedication thus begins: "Soldiers that carry their lives in their hands, had need above all others to carry grace in their hearts, that so, having made peace with God, they may be fit to encounter with men. And having by faith in Christ disarmed death before they die, they may sacrifice their lives with the more courage and comfort; which to neglect, being a matter of eternity, is not valour but desperate madness. In evils above the strength of man to prevail and his patience to endure, there God hath planted the affection of fear, which might stir us up to avoid the danger by flying to him in Christ, who being our friend, it is no matter who is our enemy. We may be killed, but cannot be hurt; so safe is it to be under His command that hath command over death, hell, judgment, and all that we most fear."

Then follows an honourable testimony to the well-known character of this Christian soldier, who "showed that piety can enter into tents and follow after camps; and that God hath His Joshuas and his Corneliuses in all ages." More to the same effect is written, but the main lesson is that the peace of God is the one great shield and shelter amidst the changes and dangers of life. He that hath the true fear of God need have fear of nothing in this world.

It is told how the King of France, Henry III., once went to see Bernard Palissy, the artist, when he was confined in the Bastille, to persuade him to abjure the Reformed faith. "Without that," added the king, "not I, myself, can save you."

"Sire," replied the artist calmly, "I know how to die."

To know how to die, because of possessing in the soul the peace of God, and the seed of life everlasting, this then is oftentimes the secret of prolonging life; or when death does come, as it must come to all, of meeting it with the pious confidence of the aged Simeon, when he said, "Now, Lord, let Thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation!"



"Now all the woods are sleeping,
And night and stillness creeping
O'er field and city, man and beast;
But thou, my heart, awake thee,
To prayer awhile betake thee,
And praise thy Maker ere thou rest."

—PAUL GERHARDT. (Lyra Germanica.)

ST. JOHN:

APOSTLE, EVANGELIST, AND SEER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

V.—EPHESUS; RECORDS AND LEGENDS.

GREAT and striking was the transition in the life of the beloved apostle when he passed from Judæan associations and prepossessions into the heart of Gentilism at Ephesus. So marked indeed is the contrast, that a recent critic[1] has boldly maintained that the tradition of St. John's Ephesian residence is altogether a mistake. It is inconceivable, argues this critic, that the Palestinian Jew, whose avowed mission was to the house of Israel, should not only have made his home among a Gentile race, but have evinced a knowledge of some of the subtlest forms of Gentile philosophy, and have entered with full sympathy into the broadest conception of a world-wide Gospel. To this we have only to reply, that the restriction of St. John's earlier labours, like that of St. Peter's, betokened not narrowness, but speciality; that the thoughts of God-instructed men, as were these apostles, widened with their work; and that from the first there was a real sympathy with the largest conception of the apostolic mission, as shown in the hearty hand-shake[2] with which John and his two brethren bade Paul and Barnabas God-speed in their work. No reasoning from the imagined likelihood of the case can break down the explicit testimony of those who must have well known the facts. In the present instance the testimony is more than usually explicit.

Polycarp, the martyr, was in his youth an associate and disciple of St. John, by whom, according to the church records in Smyrna, he was ordained to the episcopate in that city.[3] The martyr must have been at least thirty years old at the date of the apostle's death. Irenæus, bishop of the church in Lyons, in his early life was acquainted with Polycarp, and relates on the martyr's authority certain incidents in the life of St. John; adding that "the church in Ephesus, founded by Paul, and having John remaining among them permanently until the times of Trajan, is a true witness of the tradition of the apostles."[4]

To this direct witness may be added several narratives collected by Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian, in which the life and work of St. John in Ephesus are not so much formally asserted as taken for granted. The fact was undoubted, and needed no direct attestation. Thus Eusebius quotes from Clement of Alexandria (died about A.D. 220) that "after the tyrant[1] was dead, John, coming from the isle of Patmos to Ephesus, went also, when called, to the neighbouring regions of the Gentiles; in some to appoint bishops, in some to institute entire new churches, in others to appoint to the ministry some one of those that were pointed out by the Holy Ghost." The historian also quotes Polycrates, the aged bishop of Ephesus towards the close of the second century: "In Asia great lights have fallen asleep, which shall rise again in the day of the Lord's appearing, in which He will come with glory from heaven, and will raise up all the saints; Philip, one of the twelve apostles, who sleeps in Hierapolis, and his two aged virgin-daughters. His other daughter, also, who, having lived under the influence of the Holy Ghost, now likewise rests in Ephesus. Moreover, John, who rested upon the bosom of our Lord, who also was a priest, and bore the sacerdotal plate,[2] both a martyr and a teacher. He is buried in Ephesus; also Polycarp of Smyrna, both bishop and martyr." A yet earlier testimony is that of Papias, bishop of Hierapolis, said by Irenæus to have been "a hearer of John and a companion of Polycarp."[3] This Papias wrote a work in five books, entitled Interpretation of our Lord's Oracles, of which some fragments are preserved by Eusebius.[4] They are chiefly noticeable here, as indicating the presence of another John at Ephesus, called John the Presbyter; from which latter Papias seems to have derived much of his information. Possibly Irenæus confounded the two when he spoke of the bishop of Hierapolis as "a hearer of John." Nothing, in fact, in the language or thought of Papias, shows any true intimacy with the apostle; he does but incidentally confirm the fact of St. John's abode in Ephesus. Of John the Presbyter we shall hear again.

It is remarkable that Eusebius speaks of Polycarp as having been an intimate disciple of the apostles, and having been ordained at Smyrna by eye-witnesses and servants of the Lord. Bishop Lightfoot remarks that these plurals must not be pressed too strictly: and yet they may most naturally be interpreted on the supposition that St. John in his eastern residence had still some comrades from among the twelve. Of this a striking incidental confirmation reaches us in the Muratorian fragment on the Canon, which is probably a transcript of the very earliest enumera-

[1] Dr. Theodor Keim, Jesus of Nazara, vol. i.

[2] Galatians ii. 9.

[3] This we learn on the authority of Tertullian's Prescription against Heretics, c. xxxii. (Eng. Trans. vol. ii. p. 37.) The youth of Polycarp at the time of his ordination is noted and discussed by Bishop Lightfoot in his great edition of the Letters, vol. i.

[4] Irenæus Against Heresies, iii. 3, 4. (Eng. Trans. vol. i. pp. 263 and 264.)

[1] Clement does not mention the name of this "tyrant."

[2] πέταλον. See Exodus xxxix. 30. (LXX.) The meaning of the statement is discussed in another part of the present paper.

[3] See Irenæus Against Heresies, v. 33, 4 (vol. ii. p. 116).

[4] Eusebius. Eccl. Hist. iii. 39.

tion of the recognised New Testament books.[1] An account is there given of the origin of St. John's Gospel, to which we may hereafter refer; the point to be now noted being that Andrew is indicated as forward in the group of John's presbyters and friends assembled with him at Ephesus. There is no improbability in the supposition that the two old friends were reunited in the decline of life, as in their early Bethsaida days. They had been the first disciples called to Jesus, and their happy fellowship in Him remained to the last. If again, Philip, as in a quotation just given,[2] had become the bishop of the Phrygian Hiérapolis, his episcopate also would have belonged to the great Asiatic circuit; and the three apostles, holding fast their friendship to the end, would often recall the hours of their simpler far-off life when the words Come and ye shall see, and Follow Me, had opened to their young hearts the great possibilities of a new and nobler career.

Beyond these probabilities, the legendary lore that gathers around the name of St. John is but fragmentary. Anecdotes, once passed from lip to lip and cherished as fond memorials of the disciple beloved by Jesus, are found here and there, preserved in ecclesiastical records; and we may take them for what they are worth, without any blind belief, but not with utter scepticism.

At any rate, these early legends speak expressively of the impression which the great apostle made upon the age that knew him, and, whether literally true or not, are valuable as a reflection of his life and spirit. We have spoken of the petalon, the high-priestly plate or frontlet which Polycrates, his successor, reports him to have worn. This perhaps was spoken figuratively, just as if Polycrates had said that St. John had put on the breastplate of righteousness or the helmet of salvation. No one could have supposed that the Apostle of Ephesus was in any literal sense a Jewish priest, much less the high priest. His words carry back the reader to the Old Testament description: "a plate of pure gold, graven upon it, like the engraving of a signet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD." Before all men, it was as if the servant of Christ carried this same inscription on his front; and the sanctity of the apostle's character and life was well expressed by the golden emblem.

Another story, given by Irenæus on the authority of Polycarp, is that St. John, when at Ephesus, on going to the public bath observed Cerinthus within. This Cerinthus was a Gnostic teacher from Egypt, originally a Jew, and was one of those whom the apostle afterwards described as teaching the doctrine of Antichrist, that the Son of God came not in the flesh. Seeing him, the apostle rushed from the bath, exclaiming in the old spirit of Boanerges, "Let us flee, lest even the bath-house fall down, because Cerinthus, the enemy of the truth, is within"![1] Such an anecdote would never have been invented of one who was not known for his stern opposition to anti-christian heresy. Still, as in the journey through Samaria long ago, he was possessed by the spirit and power of Elijah, when he looked upon the enemies of his Lord.

A singular fact connected with this characteristic story shows how the later legendary lore of the church reflects the spirit of its framers. It is worth studying in this aspect also, not so much for any light it sheds upon the apostle's career, as for the insight it gives into the successive stages and developments of Christian thought. Thus, Epiphanius of Salamis, in the fourth century, a writer against heresy of great fame in his day, relates the incident, at the same time insinuating a doubt.[2] But why? Because, forsooth, St. John was much too holy a man to have gone to the bath at all! The height of piety was esteemed by such as Epiphanius to lie in the disregard of the comforts, even what we should call the decencies of life, and the good man could not bear the thought that St. John should not have conformed to that ascetic ideal. Other austerities are attributed to the apostle, which we need not stay to enumerate: they are of the usual kind. A deeper wisdom reveals to us the true disciple of Jesus as taking his part in all innocent earthly enjoyments, maintaining his own high saintliness in genial unpretentious intercourse with his fellow-men.

There is another story which throws a still more interesting side-light upon his reputed character. The incident is trivial enough; yet one may gladly believe it. He kept, it was said, a tame partridge, which he was one day fondling and stroking in his hand. A young huntsman who saw him, was much astonished. "Art thou that John," he said, "whose glorious renown had inspired in me a wish to know thee: how, then, occupy thyself with pleasures so humble?" The apostle smiled and said, "What hast thou in thy hand?" "A bow," replied the huntsman. "And why dost thou not always carry it strung?" "Because," was the answer, "it would soon lose its strength, and would fail in the time of need from too continuous a strain." "Then, young man," the apostle rejoined, "let not this brief and slight relaxation of my mind be to thee a stumbling-block. I too must unbend, or my spirit, like thy bow, would fail also beneath the strain."[3] The man of whom such a story was handed down must have been very human and [1] See an account of this priceless fragment in Smith's Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Biography, vol. iii. p. 1000.

[2] It has been suggested that Philip the apostle is confounded with Philip "the evangelist, one of the Seven," Acts xxi. 8. But the supposition is unnecessary. True, they both had "virgin daughters," but this does not prove identity.

[1] See Irenæus, Against Heresies, iii. 3, 4 (vol. i. p. 263). A much later version of the anecdote adds that the bath-house did fall down, and crushed Cerinthus in its ruins!

[2] It is Ebion, not Cerinthus, to whom Epiphanius refers the story. But there was no such person as Ebion: the name arose from a misconception as to the meaning of the name Ebionite as applied to doctrine. It had nothing to do with the name of any founder, but was derived from the Hebrew word for poor.

[3] The story is told by Johannes Cassianus, a monk of the Eastern Church, A.D. 420, and is repeated in the Abbé Fleury's Ecclesiastical History. Dean Stanley remarks that a similar story is told by Herodotus of an Egyptian king.—Essays on the Apostolical Age, p. 273.

lovable, not above condescending to simple enjoyments—a man altogether without pretension, no mere mystic, but abounding in homely common-sense.

A yet nobler view of his character is given in the famous story of the robber-chief, as related by Clement of Alexandria, "not as a fiction but a veritable history, handed down and carefully preserved." The apostle, in one of his journeys of visitation to the churches, was struck by the appearance of a noble-looking lad in the assembly. Turning to the presbyter of the church in that place, he said, "I commend this youth to you with all earnestness, in the presence of the church and of Christ." Readily and gladly the presbyter accepted the charge, took the youth to his own home, instructed and baptized him. Then by degrees his pastoral vigilance was relaxed; the youth was regarded as safe in the bosom of the church, and was too much left to himself. The consequence was that he fell into bad company; the idle and dissolute young fellows of the place strove to make him one of themselves; by degrees he went from bad to worse, and at length became their ringleader, forming them into a robber band, and taking them up into the mountains, where they became noted for deeds of violence and cruelty. Time elapsed, and St. John again visited the neighbourhood. After transacting other matters: "Come," he said to the pastor, "restore now to me the deposit which Christ and I committed to thee." The presbyter was at first confounded, and asked for an explanation. "The deposit," said the apostle, "is the soul of a brother." "Alas," replied the other, "he is dead!" "Dead!" "Yes, dead to God,"—telling him of the young man's present position and career. The apostle on hearing the story exclaimed with tears, "A fine keeper, indeed, have I left of a brother's soul! But now, saddle me a horse, and get me a guide." This being done, the apostle rode from the city towards the mountains. He was soon taken prisoner by some outpost of the banditti. He made no resistance, but exclaimed, "For this I came: now take me to your captain." The robber-chief stood armed to receive his prisoner: but recognising the features of St. John, he turned to flee. The aged apostle pursued him as fast as his trembling limbs would permit, crying aloud, "My son! my son! why fly from me, thy father? Have compassion on me, fear not. There is still life for thee. I will intercede with Christ. Nay, should it be needful, I will give my life for thine. Stay! believe that Christ hath sent me!" The words reached the young man's heart, he flung aside his weapons, then fell in an ecstasy of grief upon the apostle's neck, and suffered himself to be conducted back to the city. Here John continued with him, resting not in his prayers and entreaties until he had become assured of the young man's genuine repentance, and could leave him restored to the church as one alive from the dead.

Many an incident, indeed, of romantic beauty and pathos must have chequered such a life. His reported miraculous achievements are but few, a surprising fact, considering the proneness of ecclesiastical chroniclers to the invention of marvels.[1] One such tradition is, that the apostle, returning from his exile in Patmos, and drawing near to the gate of the city where the disciples were joyfully awaiting him, met a funeral procession. On enquiring who was dead, he was told "It is Drusiana," a former hostess of his, abounding like Dorcas in good works. The apostle bade the bearers of the bier to set it down; in answer to his prayer Drusiana was restored to life, and St. John became again an inmate of her house. The historian Eusebius also quotes Apollonius of Ephesus (A.D. about 210) as relating a similar miracle wrought upon a dead man in that city. But such records are few: until, at least, we reach a later age, where the marvellous abounds, and we need not stay to examine the manifest fables.

The incidents of the apostle's outward life, even so far as accurately known, elude all attempts to place them in due order; and here again they are mixed up with fabulous or doubtful stories. His successor Polycrates, as we have seen, terms him "a martyr;" and he was so at least in will, while he could not have lived through that century without often having been called to suffer for the truth's sake. That at one period of his career he was in the Isle of Patmos "for the word of God and for the testimony of Jesus Christ" is certain; and the general opinion that these words imply persecution and banishment appears to rest on solid grounds.[2] It is not so easy to decide under which emperor, and at what time, this banishment took place. We shall have to consider this question when we come to speak of the Apocalypse. Tradition affirms the exile; and adds that before being sent to Patmos, the apostle was taken to Rome and condemned by Domitian to be cast into a cauldron of boiling oil, from which however he emerged unhurt. For this statement the only very ancient authority is Tertullian, who was born about sixty years after the apostle's death. Jerome, more than a century and a half afterwards, repeats the story; only he substitutes Nero for Domitian. The uncertainty that besets the account so given sends us back to the Scripture passage, and enables us, as we shall see, the more confidently to discuss the Apocalyptic question on internal grounds.

Sooner or later the apostle returned to Ephesus; and there he spent his last days in peace. There, by inspiration of the Holy Ghost, he committed to writing his remembrances of the Word made Flesh: and thence also he despatched his letters to the churches that had shared his supervision. Of this Gospel, and of these Epistles, we shall have to speak hereafter. They were the last work of his life. According to concurrent ecclesiastical tradition, which there is no reason to doubt, he outlived all the other apostles, and survived to the reign of Trajan, who became Emperor A.D. 98. At this time St. John must have been nearly or quite a hundred years of age. Jerome shall tell the rest. He is the only authority for the story;[1] and although two centuries had elapsed since the death of the apostle, the stamp of truth is upon the record. How Jerome learned the fact we cannot tell; but we cannot doubt that he preserved a tradition of the church, as authentic as it was dear, when he tells of the apostle, infirm with age, being borne in the arms of his disciples into the Ephesian assembly, there stretching out his trembling hand, and saying over and over again, "Little children, love one another." "Why," it was asked, "do you say this, and nothing else?" "Because," it was replied—and these are the last words of the beloved disciple—"this is the command of our Lord, and if you fulfil this, nothing else is needed."

[1] Those that are related are given by Lampe in the Prolegomena to his Commentary on St. John.

[2] It is however possible to interpret Rev. i. 9, of an evangelistic visit paid by St. John to this portion of his "diocese" or district: and some expositors have taken this view, as it appears to us for insufficient reasons.

Augustine tells us—but again we know not his authority—that when the apostle felt his end was near, he gave orders for the construction of his own sepulchre, and when he heard that it was ready, calmly laid himself down and died. As we have observed in a previous paper, the fond affection of his disciples clung to the belief that even in the grave he lived. They were wiser than they knew. In the light and power of his teachings, he has lived through all the Christian ages; and the inspired words in which his presence and influence have become immortal, we must next pass briefly under review.

[1] Jerome, Commentary on Galatians, ch. vi.

THE SPANISH CAPTAIN AND THE SCOTCH MINISTER.

THE feelings with which the Spanish Armada was regarded by Scotch Protestants are well described by James Melville, Minister of East Anstruther, a seaport on the coast of Fife, who was well known in his day as a famous preacher, and nephew of the still more famous Reformer, Andrew Melville. His account of the arrival of a distressed Spanish Commander and his men, is full of interest, as showing the straits to which the relics of that proud host were reduced after their defeat and dispersion, and the story is best told in the narrator's own quaint language. It is to a valuable work on the history of the "Eastneuk of Fife," by the late Rev. W. Wood, that we owe the following graphic extract from Melville's writings.

"Terrible was the fear, piercing were the preachings, earnest, zealous and fervent were the prayers, sounding were the sighs and sobs, and abounding were the tears at that Fast and General Assembly keepit in Edinburgh, when the news were credibly told, sometimes of their landing at Dunbar, sometimes at St. Andrews and in Tay, and now and then at Aberdeen and Cromarty Firth. And in very deed as we knew certainly soon after, the Lord of armies, who rides upon the wings of the winds, the Keeper of his own Israel, was in the meantime conveying that monstrous navy about our coast, and directing their hulks and galliots to the islands, rocks, and sands whereupon he had destined their wreck and destruction. For within two or three months thereafter, early in the morning by break of day, one of our bailies came to my bedside, saying to me (but not with fray), 'I have to tell you news, sir. There is arrivit within our harbourie this morning a ship full of Spaniards, but not to give mercy but to ask.' And so shows to me that the commanders had landed and he had commanded them to their ships again till the magistrates of the town had advised, and the Spaniards had humbly obeyed; therefore desired me to rise and hear their petition with them. Up I got with diligence, and assembling the honest men of the town, came to the tolbooth, and after consultation taken to hear them and what answer to make, there presents us a very reverend man of big stature, and grave and stout countenance, grey-haired and very humble like, wha, after mickle and very low courtesy, bowing down with his face nigh the ground, and touching my shoe with his hand, began his harangue in the Spanish tongue, whereof I understood the substance, and being about to answer in Latin, he having only a young man with him to be his interpreter, began and told over again to us in good English. The sum was that King Philip his master had rigged out a navy and army to land in England, for just causes to be avenged of many intolerable wrongs whilk he had received of that nation; but God for their sins had been against them, and by storm of weather had driven the navy bye the coast of England, and him with a certain number of captains, being the general of twenty hulks, upon an island of Scotland called the Fair Isle, where they made shipwreck; and where so many as had escaped the merciless seas and rock, had mair nor sax or seven weeks suffered great hunger and cauld, till conducing that bark out of Orkney they were come hither as to the special friends and confederates, to kiss the King's Majesty's hands of Scotland (and therewith[1] bekkt even to the yeard) and to find relief and comfort thereby to himself, these gentlemen captains, and the poor soldiers, whose condition was for the present most miserable and pitiful."

The reply of James Melville, the substance of which is given in Dr. M'Crie's Life of his Uncle, Andrew Melville, is too characteristic to be omitted.

"On the score of friendship, or of the cause in which they were embarked, the Spaniards," he said, "had no claims on them; the King of Spain was a sworn vassal to the Bishop of Rome, and on that ground they and their king defied him; and with respect to England, the Scots were indissolubly leagued with that kingdom, and regarded an attack upon it as the same with an attack on themselves; but although this was the case, they looked upon them in their present situation as men and fellow creatures, labouring under privations and sufferings to which they themselves were liable; and they rejoiced at an opportunity of testifying how superior their religion was to that of their enemies. Many Scotsmen who had resorted to Spain for the purpose of trade and commerce had been thrown into prison as heretics, their property confiscated and their bodies committed to the flames; but so far from retaliating such cruelties on them, they would give them every kind of relief and comfort which was in their power, leaving it to God to work such a change on their hearts respecting religion as He pleased."

[1] Bowed even to the earth.

Melville then told the Spaniard that "the bailies granted him licence with the captains to go to their lodging for refreshment, but to nane of their man to land till the overlord of the town were advertised, and understood the King's mind anent them."

"That night the Laird (of Anstruther) being advertised, came, and on the morn (morrow) accompanied with a good number of the gentlemen of the country round about, gave the said general and the captains presence, and after the same speeches in effect as before, received them in his house, and entertained them humanely, and suffered the soldiers to come a-land and lie altogether to the number of thirteen score, for the maist part young beardless men,[1] silly, trauchled and hungered, to the whilk a day or twa kail pottage and fish was given, for my advice was conform to the prophet Eliseus' to the King of Israel in Samaria, give them bread and water, &c. The names of the commanders were Jan Gomez de Medina, general of twenty hulks; Captain Patricio, Captain de Logoretto, Captain de Luffera, Captain Mauritio and Signor Gerrano."

So slow was the progress of news in those days, that though it was now the middle of October, no tidings had yet been received of the destruction of the rest of the Armada. But one day Melville brought in a news-letter from St. Andrews "with the names of the principal men and how they were used in Ireland and our Highlands, in Wales and other parts of England; the whilk (which) when I recorded to Jan Gomez by particular and special names,—Oh, then he cried out for grief, bursted and grat (sobbed and wept)."

The graphic narrative of Melville concludes with a pleasing incident, which he thus relates.

"This Jan Gomez showed great kindness to a ship of our town whilk he found arrested at Calais at his home coming, rade (rode) to Court for her, and made great ruse (praise) of Scotland to his King; took the honest men to his house, and inquired for the Laird of Anstruther, for the minister and his host, and sent home many commendations. But we thanked God in our hearts that we had seen them among us in that form."

The worthy minister had good cause to be thankful, for recent researches show that the Roman Catholics of Scotland were not like those of England, opposed to the invaders, but, on the contrary, were making every effort to assist them, and were only kept in check by active measures on the part of the Government.

M. A. S. M.

[1] "Silly, trauchled and hungered,"—weak, worn out and famished.

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

BY EMMA LESLIE.

CHAPTER VI.—NEW HOPES.

BURSTING in upon Ann, who was toasting a piece of bread by the kitchen fire, Tommy exclaimed: "Where's papa? take me to papa; I want to see papa." He threw off his hat, and was rushing through the kitchen, when Ann caught him and shut the door. Of course Tommy kicked and screamed in the usual fashion, and it was useless to appeal to him, so Ann turned to Bertie. "What does he mean?" she asked in a frightened tone. "Have you seen your papa?"

"Not yet," answered Bertie, "we've come home to see him."

"Come home to see him! What do you mean, child? Your father isn't here."

"Not here!" uttered Bertie, and the tears welled up into his eyes, and brimmed over as he sat down. It was such a bitter disappointment to hear that his father had not come—that God had not answered his prayer after all, and that he had been waiting and hoping in vain.

"Whatever could have put such an idea into your head, and to tell him of it?" said Ann reproachfully, giving the refractory Tommy a shake.

"But the dinner, Ann—where did you get it?" asked Bertie, still clinging to his idea.

"The pie? I made it, to be sure. I tell you, Tommy, your papa is not here," protested Ann, who was still holding the screaming child in her arms.

"I want papa, I want papa," panted Tommy.

"You'll make your mamma ill, that's what you'll do, and its your fault, Bertie," said Ann, turning to him again.

"But I thought he was here, I really did, Ann," said Bertie through his tears.

"Then you should have kept your thoughts to yourself, and not told Tommy. Boys ought to learn to think twice before they speak once," said Ann sternly. "Now, Tommy, listen to me. All this fuss and crying won't bring your father home, but it will make poor mamma very ill. Now leave off, and let me make this piece of toast, and then you shall go with me to carry it to mamma." And as she spoke she smoothed the little boy's hair, and contrived to soothe him into quietness.

"Bertie tells stories; he said papa was at home," grumbled the child through his sobs.

"I said I thought papa was at home, and so I did; and I'm as sorry as can be that he isn't," said Bertie, beginning to whimper.

"Now don't you begin to make a noise, for you ought to know better," said Ann, who had resumed her toasting. She was not in a humour to give way to Bertie, but made him feel that he was in disgrace for having set Tommy crying.

Poor Bertie! Life was very hard for him just now; it was all such a puzzle and tangle, and there seemed no way out of it. He sat by the kitchen table, swinging his legs, and thinking, while Ann and Tommy went to take the tea and toast upstairs. When she came back, he still sat there, and something in his forlorn look touched her.

"What is the matter?" she asked.

He sighed as he raised his eyes, full of unshed tears to her face. "Ann, won't you tell me all about everything?" he said.

"All about everything? What do you mean?" she said.

"You—you said God would bring papa back, if I prayed to Him, and I did, Ann. I've asked God every day, and I've been expecting papa ever since, and when Jack brought the dinner to-day, I made sure he had come at last."

"But why should you think the dinner had anything to do with it?" said Ann, glad to lay hold of the one part of the question that she could understand.

"Because I heard mamma say one day, that things would never be any better until papa came home again, and you said papa would come and give us all we wanted, and take care of us again, and so I thought when I saw that nice pie, papa must have come home at last; are you quite sure he hasn't come, Ann?" said Bertie pleadingly.

Ann had turned her back to the little boy, and was looking down into the fire. Similar questions had been troubling her of late, and she had found no answer to them, so that she could do little to soothe him. "No, dear, I am quite sure your father has not come home yet," she said shaking her head solemnly.

"Then, where did you get the pie?" said Bertie.

Ann smiled now. "We had a letter this morning," she said.

"Oh, yes! I saw it in the postman's hand—one of those big ugly letters, that always make mamma cry," interrupted Bertie.

"Ah! but it wasn't such an ugly letter this time," said Ann with a nod; "it upset us a bit, to hear that things were not going on so badly at Esterfield as we thought. Somebody is going to open the factory again, I believe. At all events, there will be some sort of an income for us to live upon, and a better one than we have had lately, the letter says, and so I got a good dinner for you at once."

Bertie looked relieved, but still he could not feel so unconcerned about the matter as Ann. "Who could set the factory working again, unless papa had come home?" he asked.

"What a question, boy! What do I know about the factory business? I only know that your mamma told me we could have good dinners again every day, and that we need not be afraid of the money coming to an end very soon, as we have been lately. I know nothing about business, and don't you go teasing your mamma about it to-night. She'll be better to-morrow, and then you can talk to her if you like, though why you can't be satisfied with knowing that the money will come somehow, is a puzzle to me," concluded Ann, who was perfectly satisfied, now that her beloved mistress was delivered from all fear of want.

Bertie did not attempt to question his mother that night, for he saw that she looked very ill—the sudden news, though so good, had upset her very much—but the next morning at breakfast-time he said: "Mamma, how is it people can open the factory again, if papa has not come home?"

The question startled Mrs. Danby. She had been quite content to take the lawyer's statement unquestioned, and had not thought of this, or anything else, in the relief she experienced, when she knew that she was not so poor as she had feared. Like Ann, she knew very little of business matters, and did not care to trouble herself about them either, but Bertie's question roused her to some thought upon the matter now, and she said, "My dear, I don't understand it myself yet, but I'll write to the lawyers to-day, and ask them all about it."

"But, mamma, don't you think papa must have come home to do this for us?" said Bertie.

Mrs. Danby put her pocket-handkerchief to her eyes, and burst into tears. "No, no, dear! papa has not come home, I am sure of that, or he would not leave us here, he would fetch us home to Esterfield at once."

"Don't you wish we could go back to our nice big house, mamma," said Tommy, who came into the room while Mrs. Danby was speaking.

The lady dried her tears, and looked down at her boys. "We shall go back if the factory is at work, I dare say," she said; "I will ask about it when I write."

"What is that you have been teasing about?" asked Ann, who came in, just as Mrs. Danby was leaving the room.

"We're going back to Esterfield soon," said Tommy, skipping round the table in an ecstasy of delight; "papa is coming home again, and we ——"

"Now don't get that notion into your head, Tommy, we had trouble enough over that last night," said Ann quickly; "just be content, if you can stay here, and don't worry after what you can't have."

"But mamma says," began Bertie, when Ann interrupted him by exclaiming: "Now Bertie, I will not have your mamma worried; you may as well know first as last, that you cannot go back to the other grand home, for it isn't there now. All the tables and chairs, and carpets, were sold a long time ago, and somebody else lives in the house now; but it's much better for you to live here, for you are growing stronger every day, and better boys too, I believe, so you need not wish to go back, I'm sure."

These plain and rather unpalatable truths were spoken to the children, but were really intended for Mrs. Danby herself; for Ann feared that the lady, once delivered from the fear of poverty, would begin fretting to go back to the old life, which the sensible servant saw now had been anything but good either for her mistress or the children. Despite the many hardships they had had to endure, the boys were growing stronger, healthier, and happier every day; and better even than this, they had begun to have a little thought and care for others, which no one had time for when they had nothing to do but please and amuse themselves. So sensible Ann had long since come to the conclusion that this change in their circumstances was not such an unmixed evil as she had supposed at first, and she had endeavoured to reconcile her mistress to the change.

"If there's only somebody to look after the factory, and send us enough to live upon here in peace and comfort, I shall be satisfied," concluded Ann; "and I'm sure your mamma will," she added, with a sidelong look at her mistress.

Playhouses.

THEY were neighbours' children at play—
Building playhouses, they said;
I, beguiled by their prattling, lay
Near the wide-open window o'erhead.

I'd been out of sorts, nervous, depressed—
Overworked—so the doctor declared;
But 'twas worry had robbed life of zest,
And my energies sapped and impaired.

I'd had no great losses to bear,
But life's burden seemed daily to grow;
No rebound comes from everyday care,
As sometimes from a good heavy blow.

Trade was bad, and my business declined,
Ill-luck in my path seemed to lurk:
And, as deepened the gloom of my mind,
The closer I kept to my work—

Till, at last, what I dreaded had come,
I was forced to lie by for awhile,
And I moodily lounged in my room
Till the children's talk roused me to smile.

The masons were building a wall,
Their materials were strewn all around:
One child set the task, and they all
Were soon placing the bricks on the ground.

They built kitchens, and parlours, and yards,
And a hall, with some make-believe stairs,—
And such quaint cunning spaces they left
For the doors and the windows in pairs.

And one child, with bright auburn hair,
And a restful content in her face,
Said, "We've built quite enough and to spare,
Let's begin now to play in the place."

But whenever she made the request,
One or other would instantly say:
"Let us make a nice study—that's best,"—
Or, "Let's build a new house right away."

Till at last they were summoned to tea,
And they crept all reluctant away;
"Oh! mamma, it's too bad!" was their plea,
"We were just getting ready to play!"

"Ah," thought I, "like the children, we men,
Ambitious, dissatisfied, vain,
Are ever beginning again
Some new scheme of ambition or gain.

"And the present is crowded with care,
For a future that never may be;
And the joys of to-day we forswear
To gain others we never may see.

"How much wiser, our best having tried,
To enjoy what God gives us to-day;
Ere we gain all we wish in our pride,
We may find ourselves summoned away."

So this lesson of wisdom I learned
From the dear little urchins at play—
"Leave the future some part of your care—
Live wisely—but still live to-day!"

TOM BROWN.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. VIII.

The initials of the characters described form the names of three sons of one king; and with his life most of the incidents are connected.

Of the three sons two aspired to the throne and one succeeded to it.

1. He was the counsellor of a great king, and yet he followed after a usurper. The advice he gave to both the king and rebel was wise; but he was too proud to bear that counsel being rejected. He died by his own hand.

2. A very beautiful woman whose husband was sacrificed for her sake. She became the mother of one whose reign was the time of his nation's greatest prosperity.

3. A man who changed his behaviour with shifting fortunes. At one time he reviled the king, to whom at another time he professed allegiance. He met his death by infringing conditions to which he had himself agreed.

4. He was the relative of the king, and head of the army. He loved power and could not bear reproof. On one occasion a remonstrance turned him from a friend into a traitor. He was deceitfully slain by one whose brother he had killed.

5. He chose a fair and fertile land to live in, but his choice brought him into trouble. He remained godly though living among the wicked, and was delivered from the fate that overtook the latter.

6. One of whom we only know that his house was the abode of the Ark, and that he was blessed in consequence.

7. He was the grandson of a king, and was afterwards a dependent in the house of his successor. He had a physical defect, the result of a fall when he was a child.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. IX.

Write out these texts and then mark one word in each to find a proverb of Solomon's.

1. A man's wisdom maketh his face to shine.—Eccl. viii. 1.
2. The wise in heart shall be called prudent.—Prov. xvi. 21.
3. My son, keep thy father's commandments.—Prov. vi. 20.
4. The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want; He maketh me to lie down in green pastures.—Psa. xxiii. 1, 2.
5. A good name is better than precious ointment.—Eccl. vii. 1.
6. I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the Lord.—Psa. cxxii. 1.
7. I was a father to the poor.—Job xx. 16.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. V.—p. 464.—JOAB.

(1) Joab, Abishai, Asahel; (2) 2 Sam. ii. 24; (3) iii. 27; (4) 1 Chron. ii. 16; (5) 2 Sam. xviii. 14; (6) xx. 10; (7) 1 Kings i. 7; (8) ii. 28–34.

ANSWER TO HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. VIII.—p. 464.

My lips shall not speak wickedness, nor my tongue utter deceit.—Job xxvii. 4.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

WAITING FOR THE FERRY.

"You can help the worn and weary."

No. 1794.—SEPTEMBER 15, 1888.

By the Way.

PILGRIM-COMRADES, pressing onward
To the guerdon and the crown,
All your aspirations sunward,
All the hope of heaven your own,
By your presence, brave and cheery,
By your courage in the strife,
You can help the worn and weary
To a nobler grasp of life;
You can give to souls appealing,
Who have faltered in the fray,
Wine of hope and oil of healing
By the way.

Love that only costs the giver
Just a moment's thought and care,
Some poor captive may deliver
From the thraldom of despair;
Starveling-souls whose spirit blindness
Few have patience to beguile,
You can reach with present kindness
And the magic of a smile;
You can ease some chafing fetter,
Change some weary task to play,
Make some little heart feel better
By the way.

Think of Him, the high and holy,
At whose feet archangels fall,
How no service seemed too lowly,
No kind act for Him too small:
Perfect in such wayside giving,
Well He knew, though King of kings,
That the sum of happy living
Is made up of trivial things;
Love that found its best in losing,
Succour earth could ne'er repay,
All He gave—no plea refusing
By the way.

Moments spent in ministration
None shall ever live to need;
Never yet did aspiration
Suffer for unselfish deed;
By thy Christ-like care for others
Somewhat of His love reveal,
Till, as in a world of brothers,
All the sacred kinship feel;
So shall He with gladness own thee,
So shall angels every day
With unseen approval crown thee
By the way!

MARY HOWLES.

RALPH ELLISON'S OPPORTUNITY.

CHAPTER V

THE full glory of the summer days had come, days when the smiling sea imaged life at its gayest, and held in its song no whisper of overshadowing storms. The flash of the waves on the beach was the music to which Mary set her last uneasy heart-beats; in winter the note might change to a sullen roar of fury, and the waves, held now in a smiling bondage, seize the hut under the cliff in a rough embrace; but long before winter Mary would have passed beyond the reach of chance or change.

Even in the long days of June, Ralph hurried his visits with a chill dread lest death might have set out before him, and been quicker than he. Josie and he were fast friends now, she would dart out to meet him like a white sea-bird from the nest under the cliff, and she made him her partner in all her possessions and sharer in all her secrets. The little hand had learned to slip confidently into his, and the rosy lips were held up spontaneously for his kiss.

One evening when he entered the cottage with the child in his arms, he met Mary's glance passing from one to the other with a new wistful eagerness in it; he responded to it impulsively.

"Will you give her to me when you go?" he asked. "I will try to prove worthy."

"God bless you for the wish!" said Mary with tears in her eyes; "I could go very happily leaving her with you, and I think Hannah, because she loves her, would be willing."

"She shall come to see her as often as she will."

"Ah, but we must not settle it all in a breath." Mary smiled at his impetuosity. "Have you ever seriously thought what such a charge would mean?"

"I have thought of it from the first. I am a lonely man without ties, she would be a blessing to me."

"You are young as years go; you may form other ties—you may marry."

"Never," said the minister with suppressed fierceness; "Josie shall have my undivided love and care, if you will trust her to me."

"There is something you must hear before you decide. Lift me up that I may tell it now, for the time is short."

"No," said Ralph, with something between authority and entreaty in his voice, "listen to my story first. Perhaps when you have heard it you will not think me fitted for so great a responsibility."

"Go to Aunt Hannah, dearest," said Mary to the child who was playing near them; "she is sewing on the beach."

Josie, who had a passion for the outer world, darted joyfully away.

Ralph paused for the space of a moment or two, looking moodily before him; then he said—

"My early home was in the north of England, as you know, in a country town where my father practised successfully as a lawyer. I was an only child, and I had indulgent parents who spared in nothing that could give me pleasure, so that when they both died within a few months of each other, I suffered a keener sense of loneliness than falls to others who have been less well sheltered and cared for. I was then between seventeen and eighteen, and had no fixed plans for the future. I had money, more than was needful for my wants; but a life of inaction was never to my taste, and I turned about in search of some definite aim in life.

"My father's profession had no attraction for me, for medicine I had still less inclination; there remained trade or the ministry. I chose the latter, not in answer to any imperious call such as some men experience, but because I had a natural gift for eloquence, or so I believed, and it seemed to me that in that sect to which we as a family had always adhered, a man had a chance of making his voice heard.

"I pass over the years of study and preparation; I found I had not misjudged my own powers, and they were, on the whole, busy and contented years. My first charge was in Manchester, where a vacancy had occurred in one of the chapels, and I held it a piece of singular good fortune when I heard that the people's choice had fallen on me."

He paused again, seeming to be lost in thought; but presently he roused himself.

"That was the happiest time of my life," he said. "I liked the work, I took an artistic pleasure in the composition of my sermons; life seemed a glorious possession, and the message I had to deliver was a comfortable evangel with no harsh undernote in it. I came and went among my people and found everywhere a welcome, making, too, some friendships that I fondly believed would outlast life. Of these new ties the closest was that which I formed with Henry Vane, a young man of my own age, but many years my senior in experience of life. He was handsome, brilliant, rich, and he had a fascination of manner, when he chose to exercise it, that I have not found in any other; and his stories of adventure in a world of which I knew nothing used to fill me with wonder and longing to see those marvels for myself. I was flattered by his notice, and grateful for his friendship; and, God knows, I loved him well and faithfully,"—Ralph's head sank on his breast—"and never had a thought that was not true to him. He was my dearest friend, and he kept his place in my heart even when it began to entertain another kind of love.

"Among the families whom I visited as a familiar guest, was one where there was a large group of sons and daughters; they were bright young people, full of life and gaiety, and their home had a peculiar charm for one who had had a solitary childhood and youth. There was one of the daughters—her name was Alice——"

Mary Hughes looked up at him when he paused abruptly, with an earnest gaze, but she did not speak.

"She was gentler than her sisters and quieter, and, to me, far more beautiful. I loved her. She listened to me. I think she loved me then," —he spoke in sharp curt sentences—"in short, we became pledged to each other, with her parents' full consent. There was no one in all that city who had a lighter heart than I; no one so blessed in his friend and his betrothed. Henry Vane was a visitor in that home too; he was the first to share my secret, and the first to wish me joy. He congratulated me—he—the man who was all the while plotting against my peace—he wished me joy."

The veins on Ralph's forehead were knotted, his voice husky with his sudden passion. Mary Hughes put out her hand and laid it on his in silent sympathy.

He lifted his head presently and went on, speaking in restrained tones, but he did not again break down.

"You can no doubt guess the rest. Our wedding day drew near, I was counting the hours till I could claim Alice as my own, when the blow fell. Alice had left me; she had gone with Henry Vane. I had a message from her—two or three lines only, in that dear hand that had never written anything but words of love—how could I guess it was to stab me to death now?

"'Do not follow me,' she wrote, 'or seek me out. Let me be blotted from your memory and your life. I am not worthy ever to look in your face again.'

"Perhaps if Henry Vane had married her, and shielded and cherished her—my love whom he had stolen from me—I might have come in time to forgive him, and to recognise his far greater claims—for he was a man whom a woman could scarce help admiring, or loving if he chose to have it so—but he lured her away, my beautiful, refined Alice, to a life of dishonour and shame. I cursed him in my heart; I sought him far and wide; I resigned my charge at last that I might never rest in seeking him. If I had met him I should have killed him—there was murder in my heart. But I could not find him; he had laid his plans too well. He has escaped me yet, but it is borne in on me that we shall meet again.

"By-and-by I came here and took up the threads of life once more. I had still a gospel to preach, the gospel of God's vengeance against sin. If I have had no message of love and mercy to give my people, it is Henry Vane who shall answer for the lack. What I am, he has made me. But I am waiting, and I know that my hour of revenge will come."

He ceased, and his head sank forward; all the bitter past was rolling back on him, the unforgotten, unforgiven past.

Mary Hughes looked at him with deep compassion in her sunken eyes, then struggling into a sitting posture, she began to speak.

"Listen," she said. "You have told me your story so far as you knew it; there is a sequel to it which is left to me to tell. God has willed that we should meet so that you should hear it from my lips. Will you rouse yourself to listen?"

He had scarcely heard her, for what could she say that could wipe out the bitterness of his memories? But when she began slowly—"Josephine is not my child," he looked up, and his glance steadied itself on her face. His attention was caught.

"Josephine is not my child," she repeated, "as you have no doubt already guessed, though my own dead baby was scarcely dearer to me. This is what I had meant to tell you before you gave her a home. I was living near Manchester in the year 18—, I had taken a little cottage in the village; I had but little money, and my husband's early death had left me lonely. One evening, towards dusk—it was summer—as I sat at the window living again in that happy past when my husband and child were with me, I noticed a woman lingering at the gate of my little garden. She carried a baby in her arms, and I could see that she was weary. She seemed to me to look wistfully at the flowers, and going out to her, I asked her to come in and rest. She was young, and I think she must have been beautiful once, but it was the saddest face I have ever seen. She thanked me and was grateful, as she said, for a kind word.

"She came again about a week later and once more I bade her come in. Her sorrowful young face had often been in my thoughts.

"'I am going away,' she said, 'across the sea, where I cannot take my little one,'—her face was wild and white and sadder even than before. 'You are a good woman,' she said, 'I read your compassion for me in your face. It is a great thing to ask of a stranger, but will you take care of my child? I have money, and yet it will not buy for me the companionship of my baby; I must go, and leave her behind.'

"Her heart seemed breaking with sorrow, and yet when I would have questioned her further, she shook her head.

"'Don't ask me anything more,' she implored. 'But if you can pity me, will you take my child?'

"I hesitated at first; it was a heavy responsibility, and I knew nothing of her, but my arms were empty, and my heart yearned towards the little one who seemed almost like my own, lost years before, given back to me. I took some days to think over the matter, but in the end I yielded to her pleading and consented.

"'I have called her Josephine,' she said, 'I could not give her my own unhappy name. It is a long name for such a little one,' she smiled faintly, 'but a good woman whom I once knew bore it. She is dead and it will not dishonour her.'

"I will not tell you of the parting between the mother and her unconscious infant; I have loved my Josie dearly, but if my tenderness had been lacking, it must have been stirred into life by the remembrance of her mother's anguish when she left her in my arms and went away desolate.

"For about a year I heard from her regularly; her letters bore foreign post-marks, but they were without addresses, and I had directions to answer them under cover to a gentleman in London. She sent money and gifts for the child, piteously entreating for news of her. In her later letters she spoke of her declining health and expressed a fear that she should not see her little one again. In the last of all she told me she was sending me a packet which she begged me to keep for Josie. You will find it in a box with all the letters I ever had from her. 'The trifles it contains are of no value,' 'she wrote, 'but they are all that is left me out of a past when I was happy and good.'

"From that time the letters ceased, and there was silence. Then, in another writing, there came news of her death in a distant country, and I and my Josie were left alone. I made no effort to trace the friends who had abandoned her; she was dear to me then as my own, and I could not give her up. That was three years ago. I have nothing more to tell you."

Ralph's eyes had never left her face. His own was drawn and lined, and when he spoke his voice was hoarse.

"Her name," he panted; "you have not told me her name."

"I never knew her but by the name she received in baptism. It was Alice."

"And the name of the man—it was a man—who wrote to tell you of her death?"

She put out her hand and laid it on his that grasped the arm of his chair, but he did not see or feel it.

"Henry Vane."

CHAPTER VI.

He lay for hours upon the beach, scorched once more by that early fire of passion, when he had first learned the bitter lesson of distrust. He relived the tragedy of his life in those silent hours when the moon rose and lit a sleeping world; all the discipline, the coldly imposed control of seven years were swept away in the hot rush of his emotions; he suffered an anguish whose phases continually varied; now he was plunged in that desolate abyss the soul reaches with the loss of faith, and reverence, and clinging human belief in another's goodness; now he was torn with pity and longing for the Alice whom he had loved. The bitter tears rose at the memory of that lost happiness that had left his life bare of any motive but revenge, and with the thought of Vane there leaped out that murderous desire for retribution that in all these years had only been smothered, and now sprang once more into active force. Let any one who has passed through such a conflict tell what it is.

When at last exhausted and worn with the struggle he woke to a consciousness of his surroundings, he found himself alone upon the shore, still faintly lit with the setting moon. The air was warm and balmy, and there was that peculiar tranquil and profound hush that one notices on a summer night by the sea, and which the dreamy ripple of the waves seems only to accentuate.

He had suffered all that mortal soul can suffer of pain and passion and life weariness, and now this great mysterious nature seemed to take him to her breast and hush him to rest. He slept out of very incapacity for further feeling for an hour or two, but when the dawn came up he rose and went back to the cottage.

Hannah slept by the dying fire, and Josie lay in warm slumber, her bright curls tangled on the pillow, but Mary Hughes had kept watch with him through the silent hours, and the anxious, loving eyes met his with a strange look of yearning.

"I have been waiting for you, Ralph my brother," she said; it was the first time she had called him by that name. "I could not die without seeing you once more."

"You see a very miserable man," he said, and his haggard face confirmed his words.

"Not miserable always," she said; "you will find peace, for you will walk in the way that leads to it. There is only one way, but you will not miss it. God has not tried you with fire but to make you nobler and better, a finer instrument for his use. And see, he has not forgotten you," she smiled faintly as she glanced at the crib where Josie lay, "the little one will fill the empty place in your heart. Do not be afraid to love her, we cannot love too much, for in loving our neighbour whom we have seen we most truly learn to love God whom we have not seen. The higher love will come to you too, and it will make you strong to endure.

"And, Ralph,"—she spoke in broken whispers, mindful of the sleepers, but her voice took on a deeper earnestness, a solemnity, touched with the shadow of death—"if it should be decreed in God's purpose that you meet again with the man who has wronged you—what will you do? Will you take his punishment into your own hands, or will you leave him to God's infinite mercy? He may have sought and found it already; you may never see him in this world, but if you do the moment that sees you face to face will be your opportunity. Before I die—before I leave you, my friend and brother, will you give me a pledge that, Jesus Christ helping you, you will forgive as you would be forgiven?"

She spoke with increasing difficulty, and with pauses when she laboured for breath, but there was an urgency in her faint words he could not resist. It was the last time she would plead with him.

His face worked convulsively, but he restrained himself with a great effort, and stooping down, kissed her on the lips. That was his pledge.

Towards sunset Mary Hughes died. The good woman who had come to share Hannah's watch, remained with her, but Ralph took Josie in his arms as on that other night when he had found her, and carried her home.

His landlady could scarcely recover her surprise, when he came back from one of the long absences to which he had accustomed her, carrying the little girl safe wrapped up and asleep on his breast. Not being an adherent of Sion, she had missed much of the recent gossip and had no clue to guide her to this strange behaviour.

"It gave her a turn so that you could have knocked her down with a feather," as she afterwards expressed it, to see him coming in pale and haggard and worn as if by long sickness, with the child in his arms, "as if, for all the world, he was used to babies, and had eleven of 'em to answer for like old Mr. Null."

"'Mrs. Lamb,' says he, quite quiet and meek-like, 'this little girl has been left to my care by a dear friend who is dead, will you prepare a room for her to sleep in?'—me that has been a widow and unused to children these forty years, and never over fond of them at the best, but there—a man never knows when he's unreasonable."

Mrs. Lamb, however, was better than her own representation of herself, and found the instinctive love most woman have for children not wholly sapped, but ready to flow again with this new claim on it.

It was she who washed Josie and fed her, and tucked her warm in the improvised crib; indeed her superiority over the minister in the management of her diet and her toilet, and even of those tangled curls, was so soon and so convincingly proved that she began to take an interest in its display and even to claim a partnership in the little maid. But the minister was jealous of any influence that threatened to divert the child's love; he wanted it for himself, he needed it all; he clung to her with a pathetic devotion and strove to learn to do little things for her that would make him independent of help.

On the first night, when Josie, startled out of her sleep and made uneasy by the unfamiliar surroundings, cried out that she wanted her mammy, he was sitting by her bed and ready to soothe her as best he could; he tried, in the simplest and gentlest words he knew, to tell her of the quiet rest to which Mary had been called; the peace into which she had entered. Josie's simple conception of heaven helped him in the task; it was a happy home to which mammy had gone, to which Josie would one day go too, if she were good, and where all her little world of love would gather round her. He could but envy the faith that saw in death nothing but a going home to God.

He followed Mary Hughes to her grave in Blackford, whence she had come to the sea. He and Hannah, the friend she had spoken of, and Ralph's staunch supporter, Culpepper, were the only mourners at that humble funeral. Scarce one person in Sandbury knew more of her than that she had lived and died; it was left to Ralph to keep her memory green.

Hannah with many honest lamentations over her parting with Josie, went back to the north, where she could get work among her own kindred.

"You won't let the wean forget me," she said, "you'll bring her to see me?"

The minister gave the promise readily. "You may see us sooner than you think," he said, "and Josie will never be allowed to forget her best friends."

Sandbury of course had soon got news of Josie's adoption, and hailed its mystery gratefully, as a perfectly fresh subject of discussion, since all the summer-time it had been as a Tadmor in the Wilderness for news. Before the excitement and the head-shaking had died away, the minister still further startled his flock by expressing a wish for leave of absence to extend over several months.

"I have not left Sandbury since I came to be your minister," he said to the worthy grocer who was still the people's interpreter. "I have served you seven years."

"That's just it, Mr. Ellison, sir," said Culpepper, ruffling his hair for inspiration, "you've spoilt us for any other man—in the pulpit."

"You will miss me nowhere else," said Ralph, with a melancholy smile.

"And the young female child, sir," said Culpepper, adroitly changing the subject, "if so be you would like some responsible woman to look after her."

"I shall take her with me," said Ralph with decision.

Mr. Culpepper acquiesced in a bewildered silence, but not so the womenkind of his acquaintance. There arose a clamour among the ladies of Sion Chapel such as had not been heard since the day of Ralph's advent; the idea was preposterous, outrageous, not to be entertained for a moment, that a man who was a confirmed hater of woman—it was thus that in their heat they styled the admired preacher—should propose to be sole guardian and care-taker of a little baby girl, while he went wandering over the face of the earth. Matronhood and maidenhood was alike affronted before the proposal.

"How will he tie her strings and hook her frocks?" cried Miss Lavinia Saxby, adding to the chorus of dismay.

"He'll let her eat what she likes, you may depend, and never know to give her a drop of cooling physic when she's fractious," said the experienced mother of a family, "and when there's anything catching in the air, you mark my words, she'll be the first to take it."

To save little Josie from these and other afflictive contingencies, a little band at last summoned courage to invade the minister's retreat, but Ralph, who would once on a day have fled before the first rustle of feminine draperies, had the courage of a lion where Josie was concerned.

He went downstairs to front the ladies, who had fluttered into Mrs. Lamb's best parlour, with trousers suspiciously white at the knees, for if the truth were known, he had been disturbed at play with the child. What would Sandbury have said, if it could have discovered its grave, dignified pastor kneeling awkwardly on the carpet, and laboriously arranging a procession of animals emerging from the ark?

"I thank you," he said with the cold courtesy he always wore, "for your many kind offers of help, but I shall take the little girl with me."

"But, Mr. Ellison, a baby like that to travel up and down the world!"

"The nursery is the place for her now, with my little ones."

"My good man, you don't know what you are undertaking"—this from a member who cultivated plainness of speech—"it isn't even as if she was your own, though I don't find, for my part, that because a man is a father, he is handier with his children."

How Ralph might have stemmed this torrent of words is not known, for at that moment the door was slowly pushed open, and Josie stood revealed on the threshold.

She had lost a shoe on the journey downstairs, and she stood shyly biting the sock that had come off with it, the rosy bare foot half tucked under her little frock. She looked at the assembled group coyly from under her long lashes, but her presence made an immediate diversion, and the minister was forgotten. There were murmurs of praise and admiration, and more than one kind heart would have taken the little one to its warmth. Her pretty locks, her black frock with its sad suggestion of loss, woke the motherhood in them all; hands were stretched out, and voices were softened for her, but Josie declined all their overtures. She stood a moment in grave contemplation of the smiling faces, and then with a quick dart she had reached Ralph's side, and was safe in the haven of his arms.

His face, which had been anxious, cleared, and a smile crossed its sternness.

"She has decided for herself, you see," he said, "she does not object to go with me."

The ladies were forced to acknowledge defeat, and there was nothing left but to saturate the bewildered minister with advice, none of which he was likely to retain, and then to abandon him to his rash enterprise.

"I believe," said Miss Lavinia impressively, when they had trooped back to Sandbury to tell of their defeat, "I believe he's fond of the child; it was quite pretty to see him with it."

"Fond of her!" cried Mrs. Horner. "She'll make a slave of him before you can turn round; it's all he'll get by his folly in rearing a stranger's brat instead of marrying like any sensible Christian; there's single women enough in Sandbury to choose from."

"And no fault of theirs that he's a bachelor still," laughed one with a sly glance at the pensive Miss Lavinia.

Ralph and Josie were absent till Christmas, and in those months he learned all that he was ever likely to know of Alice's history during the last sad years of her life. Of the four years before Josie's birth he could learn nothing, nor of the motive that brought her back to a village so near her old home.

She had died abroad, and he could not stand by her grave, where it might have been easier for him to blot out the past. Of Henry Vane, though he made searching and careful enquiries, he heard no particulars. It might be that he, too, was dead, and would never come to claim that mercy to which the man he had wronged had pledged himself.

In the end of the year, when the snow was on the ground, they came back to Sandbury, and, for one of them at least, life from that date took a new departure.

HUGUENOT FAMILY-LIFE.

CALVIN'S wife had been previously married, and had children. On her deathbed the Reformer said to her that he would protect them. "I have recommended them to God," she replied. "But that will not prevent me also from caring for them." "I know well," she rejoined, "that thou wilt not abandon those that thou knowest I have committed into God's keeping."

Such was the Huguenot family, its root was in God. The reformers would not admit that marriage was a sacrament in the sense that Baptism and the Lord's Supper were sacraments; but they claimed marriage as a religious state, more agreeable to the mind and will of God than that of celibacy. "This kind of life," said Luther in his strong way, "is the first which has pleased God; it is the one which He has perpetually maintained, and it is the one He will finally glorify over every other." In this belief they nearly all of them made a duty of entering into the married state, and there is hardly any feature more characteristic of Protestantism than the honour it puts on the home and domestic life.

This comes out in Huguenot history. The pastor was supreme in public worship, there his words were listened to as a divine message, but in the home the father was prophet, priest, and king. The pastor's visits were welcomed, his instruction received with respect, but it was the honour paid to an ambassador rather than to the natural lord.

The Reformed Churches of France were careful to maintain pastoral visitation. In 1744, when the Church was forced to meet in the desert, the map of the province of Languedoc was carefully studied, and to each pastor was assigned a particular district in which he was to exercise his ministry, visiting the people from house to house, instructing them and their children, administering baptism and solemnising marriages.

In more regular times, the duty of instructing the children was the occupation of young men preparing for ordination, and who were called proposants. In a neighbourhood where the people were concentrated, this would be done at the school, but where, as was so often the case, the members of the church were isolated and scattered, it had to be done from house to house. However, the persecutions the Reformed Churches of France suffered were so frequent and so continuous that this excellent system could only be very partially and occasionally in operation. The local church histories and pastoral biographies give various illustrations of the extreme difficulty that beset this work in nearly every period of Huguenot history, excepting the short time of comparative repose during the reign of Henry IV. After that, the insecurity recommenced, and went on increasing until the later half of Louis XIV.'s reign, so that at last every act of church life became penal. For some time after the Revocation, pastoral visitation necessarily ceased, as every pastor was an exile, all return being prevented by a subsequent decree making it a capital offence. Some of the more heroic of the servants of Jesus Christ appeared in the south of France, where the wild fastnesses of the Vivarais and the Cevennes offered places of refuge and a means of eluding the pursuer. Various were the disguises adopted, for the police of the intendant and the perhaps still more watchful religious police under the bishop were on the alert to catch and bring them to justice so-called. We have an example in a document given in the history of the church at Montpellier, being the memorandum addressed by the Bishop of Rodez to the Comte de Saint-Florentin, one of the Ministers at Versailles. The memoir states that at Milhau, a town in which the greater part of the inhabitants are religionnaires (Protestants), a minister in disguise had appeared, that he had remained there three days, holding no assembly, but passing his time in going from house to house. He had refused to baptize a child brought to him, or to solemnize a marriage, though requested by the betrothed. The memorandum goes on to give his real name, place of birth, nom de guerre, and says "he resides at Zurich, making every year, in February, a journey to France, and returning in October to Switzerland. He is about forty years, well made and well got up, tall and stout, but not disproportionately so, with a good presence, travelling with his man, who, like himself, is well mounted. He arrived at Milhau in an embroidered hat, a peruke knotted behind with a black ribbon, and a sword at his side, which he always carries. At Milhau he wore a duck-coloured coat with gold buttons, and a vest of the same colour trimmed with lace; but as he has some other suits in his portmanteau he might very well appear elsewhere differently dressed. His valet is a big fellow, bold and athletic. He is clad in a cloth coat, inclining to be reddish without being exactly red. He wears a pigtail and his hair properly curled and tied up. His hat is smooth and without a rim. The master has a proud and grave air, and takes on the manners of an officer. Both carry pistols when travelling. It is asserted that every year, at the same season or thereabouts, several other ministers come into the district, and that each has his particular district, composed of a certain number of parishes."

Under such difficulties, we cannot attribute more than a secondary influence to pastoral visitation in promoting the vigorous domestic religion so characteristic of Huguenotism, and which had its root in the honour put on marriage by the teaching and action of the early reformers.

The entirely opposite genius of Catholicism is seen in the importance it attached to baptism. Just before the Revocation, when everything was being done to cripple the Protestant religion and prepare the way for its final destruction, the Pharisees at Versailles were in dread lest meanwhile some of the Protestant children should die without baptism. Consequently the intendant of the province of Languedoc was commanded to select a certain number of ministers to perform this rite in the presence of the consuls. They were to read the liturgy, but to make no prayers, exhortations, or other exercises, and the baptism was to take place within twenty-four hours after the birth of the child under a penalty to the father of 400 francs. After the Revocation the same rigours pursued the "newly converted," as the vast bulk of the terrorised Protestants were called; non-appearance before the curé with the child for baptism entailed fine or imprisonment.

On the other hand, the authorities put such difficulties in the way of the solemnisation of marriage by Protestant pastors that it was simply impossible for those who wished to maintain consistency to be married by any religious rite whatever. Almost down to the Revolution it was a penal offence. The grand-parents of some friends of the writer were imprisoned for three months for having their marriage solemnised by a pastor. In an earlier part of the last century, Huguenots betrothed were driven to content themselves with a mutual recognition, and that of their friends. Baptisms being regarded with a less severe eye by the authorities, pastors of the desert, in giving a certificate of baptism, took some pains to render therein a testimony to the sacred character of the tie between the parents. But in the eyes of the law the parents were not married.

And yet this grievance occupies but a small place in the horrible agitations which throughout the whole of its history the Protestant family suffered, living in fear of every kind of peril. In the biography of Pierre Dumoulin, a celebrated pastor of the early part of the seventeenth century, we see how nervous Huguenots became, of assassination, for example. One time, he says, poisoned boots were sent him; another, that two men in long black cloaks appeared at his house; one mounted to his study and pursued him round the table; the pastor's man luckily came in and drove the suspicious visitor away. Then Dumoulin has a third fright; he imagines two men have got into his room, and he is found in a swoon on the door-sill. If this was the state of a Huguenot's mind in days of comparative calm, what must it have been in the far more numerous days of turmoil and persecution?

The family-life that has stood all these trials must surely be a powerful one. Its root was in God, its standard was the Bible.

From early times religious people used their most sacred books as the place to record family events. Louise de Montmorency, the mother of the Colignys, noted in her Book of Hours a number of facts relating to family history, chiefly the births of her children, recording the exact moment they came into the world. After a cessation of twenty-four years the record is continued by her illustrious son, Gaspard Coligny. He notes the date of his own marriage and the birth of each of his children, down to the death of his first wife, the noble-hearted Jeanne de Laval, and his second marriage with Jacqueline d'Entremont. It is she who adds the record of his murder, "Le xxiv. d'août, 1572," and the birth of a posthumous child, Beatrix de Coligny, the 30th of the following December, at ten o'clock in the morning.

This Book of Hours evidently had a sacred character for Coligny, as his mother's manual of prayer; but later Huguenots always use the Bible or a special family book for this purpose.

The "Adventures of a Bible" is the title an imaginative writer could give the history of a magnificently bound copy of the Scriptures which Philippe du Plessis Mornay gave his daughter Anne de Noukes, Sept. 20, 1620. Nearly a hundred and fifty years after it was picked up by a descendant of the family, then Governor of St. Cloud, at a sale of the library of the Provincial of the Jesuits in the Rue Pot de Fer in Paris. It is an edition printed at La Rochelle, and besides the Scriptures, contained the liturgy of the Reformed Church, the psalms, hymns, and prayers. Du Plessis has written in a fine, trembling hand: "Ps. 27. L'Eternel est ma bannière et ma déliverance, de qui aurai-je peur? L'Eternel est la force de ma vie, de qui aurai-je foieur?"

His daughter adds below that this Bible has been given her by her very honoured father, and that she desires it may be for her eldest son, Philippe de Noukes, and that he may read it carefully to learn how to serve God in the Holy Trinity, and that he may encourage himself in the example of his grandfather, and remember the vows his mother has made on his behalf. Nine years after she writes: "The year 1629, Saturday the 4th of August, about noon, God has crowned with true and solid glory our son, Philippe de Noukes, having taken him to Himself in an assault during the siege of Bolduc in the Low Countries." And then she dedicates the precious Bible to her remaining son François. The names of all her family appear, with the dates of their birth. The name of the eldest daughter, as sponsor to the youngest, closes the register. She was married to the Marquis de Dangrou; and her two grandsons became Catholics, the fate of the descendants of nearly all the famous noble Huguenot families.

Among the prayers bound up with this Bible, is one entitled: "L'exercise du père de famille et tous ses domestiques pour prier au matin devant que du diner. In the SUNDAY AT HOME, June 14, 1882, in an article on marriage among the Huguenots, some details were given of the way this family worship was conducted at Chatillon, the residence of Coligny. We may conclude it was a common practice in Huguenot families to gather at morning and evening round the family altar.

Out of this daily reading of the Scriptures in the family arose a certain "biblical character," which has stamped itself on Huguenot history. The Huguenot father recalls the Old Testament patriarch. A sublime faith, an earnest horror of religious corruption, a determination to hand on his sacred trust to his children, whom he exhorts by mingled threats and promises to maintain the true religion in the world, these were the characteristics of the typical Huguenot, who was akin to the Maccabees in spirit. In a Livre de Famille a Huguenot father writes thus under date August 13, 1753:

THE PASTOR'S VISITATION.

"Exhortation that I, Pierre de Daunant, address to Paul William my son on the occasion of his baptism.

"Considering all that which is occurring at the time of your baptism, my dear son Paul William, I seize the occasion to exhort you, my dear child, and those whom it shall please God to give me, to make profession during your whole life of the Reformed religion in which this great God has been so gracious as to cause you to be born, that your ancestors have also professed, notwithstanding the persecutions to which they were in consequence exposed, that I myself have always followed, and to which I shall be constantly attached unto my last sigh, conformably to the Holy Gospel, which ought to be the rule of our faith, and from which one ought never to turn away. I pray God to inspire you with their good sentiments, that He may give you grace to live in His high and divine protection, and thus preserve you from His eternal malediction, which will be sure to fall on your head if you wander much or little from the salutary counsel of God, which He gives you from my mouth."

Such teaching was to the last degree energising. It realised its own doctrine and developed in those who came under it the worst or the best that was in them. How striking and how numerous are the instances of declension in the Huguenot families. Where this occurs some reason is doubtless to be found in the family history.

The bane of early Huguenotism was the turbulent nobility who for their own ends took up its cause; the bane of its later days was the plutocracy its peculiarities tended to evolve. All the ordinary avenues closed, its energies centred in the home; for this sacred spot it laboured until virtue became vice, and domestic religion, idolatry and worldliness. The annals of the church of Montpellier tell us that in the middle of the last century the intendant of Languedoc complained that five Protestants in the diocese of Montpellier alone had carried off 480,000 livres. In 1742, the Sieur Félines, a retired cloth-merchant, had sent out of the kingdom with his wife and daughter 400,000 livres; and later on it is recorded that a certain Madame Vernède, of the wealthy family of Farel, had died worth at least 400,000 livres.

But what was this to the fortunes of bankers like Huguetan and Samuel Bernard, who were the pecuniary support of the Ludovican despotism. To the Protestant Huguetan and the Jew Sacerdoti, Louis XIV. looked for the support of his court and army. But the climax of this disease of Huguenot domestic religion was reached by Thellusson, an English descendant of the Huguenots, who, in order to found three families to spring from his three sons, tied up his property during the lifetime of all his descendants living at the time of his decease, expecting that it would thereby reach the enormous sum of nineteen millions sterling when it came to be divided.

But the main stream of Huguenot family history is very different, and it is among the poor, or at least the suffering and oppressed, that its better genius appears. And this last phrase is elastic, because it includes among the suffering and oppressed those whose just and loving hearts compelled them to sympathise with suffering and oppression. Such was Jeanne de Coligny, surely one of the noblest types of wifehood the history of the world presents; and she does not stand alone, for in her own family and among the women of the French nobility were several most heroic figures. Such an one was the old Duchess de Rohan, who at the siege of La Rochelle displayed much courage and fortitude.

And if we come to humbler positions in society and to younger and more inexperienced people, we meet with a type of character which is akin to that of Deborah and Judith and Jael. When this appears in very young girls, we see, as in the names just mentioned, expressions of the great thoughts of a people rather than the special results of the teaching of a particular home.

In less than a month after the Revocation, Suzanne Bodet, being the daughter of a new convert and having attained the age of seventeen years, was called before the magistrates to say to what faith she adhered, that of her father or her ancestors. "I shall live and die in the Reformed religion in which I was born," was her courageous reply. And shortly after there came a time when the cause of Protestantism in France was almost sustained by young girls and boys. I refer to the little prophets of the Cevennes, which extraordinary manifestation, one of the great events of the history of France, commenced with the prophesyings of a young girl aged fifteen years, named Isabeau Vincent.

Imagine every home a temple and the preacher a little boy or girl from eight to fourteen years of age; imagine crowds coming nightly to listen to these little preachers, who held forth, sometimes in a field under the stars, sometimes in a barn! And what their subject? Very little that was different to what an ordinary pastor would have said. And yet during the whole of the lives of these children the pastor's voice had been suppressed. None had made their way into these districts, save a few who had soon been caught and hanged, as Fulcran Rey and Claude Brousson. However we explain the outburst, the actual doctrine was hereditary and must have come through the parents. Each of these little cabins of the Vivarais, the Dauphiny and the Cevennes was a living fire, burning with that glowing zeal for God which Farel and Calvin and other Reformers had lit up nearly two centuries earlier.

The indomitable spirit which led these young people to tell their hearers that they must obey God rather than the king, and to denounce apostacy as the worst of sins, comes out in some children brought up in quite a different sphere of society and in the north of France. Some time after the Revocation, while Bossuet was Bishop of Meaux, two little Huguenot girls, left orphans, were disputed over by the Catholic and Protestant members of the family. Taken away by the procureur of Meaux from the Protestant relative in whose care they were, they refused to enter the coach which was to convey them to Catholic keeping. Compelled to do so and surrounded by archers, they broke the windows of the coach. At their new domicile they rejected all the new clothes offered them, and obstinately refused to give the slightest sign of softening towards the Catholic religion. A Capuchin told them that their aunts had been converted and had sent him to urge them to follow their example. "If our aunts choose to be damned, we have souls to be saved," say these dauntless children. They finally escaped, hid themselves in a barn, and at night, shoeless and almost barefooted, made their way through the woods to their relative's house at La Ferté. He, afraid to keep them, took them to Paris to try and see the king, and to represent to him the extreme hardship of their case. He could not do so, but instead had to take them to the principal judge, who, under pretence of examining them, shut them up in a convent. Here every kind of punishment was practised to tame their rebellious spirits, but without avail. One day they found themselves alone in the garden of the convent. They climbed a tree, got on to the wall and sprung over. Alone in Paris, they found the father of a child who had been carried off to the same convent, and by his aid and that of other Protestants in Paris they were rapidly and frequently moved from house to house, and after a time were conveyed out of the kingdom. Michelet calls them "the little lions of Meaux."

A more beautiful story is that of Jean Fabre, whose filial piety so touched the Parisians, before whose notice it was brought in a drama entitled L'honnête criminel. Fabre was a youth who went with his old father to an assembly in the desert. Surprised by the soldiers, all but the most feeble escaped up the rocks. Jean Fabre was one, but turning round, he beheld his father in the hands of the soldiers. In a moment he ran back and offered himself in his place. A contest ensued; but Jean, who was more vigorous than the old man, insisted on the soldiers taking him and leaving his father. He was sentenced to the galleys for life. After passing seven years in this intolerable servitude, a Parisian play-writer brought his case before the public. Men's hearts were beginning to soften, and the authorities at Versailles permitted Jean Fabre to go free. John Howard was in a French prison at the same time as this Huguenot youth.

There has never existed a family-life more intense than that of the Huguenots, and it existed under the cross for 250 years. Nor were they an obscure body of religionists who asked only to be permitted to serve their God according to their own consciences; they were, up to the fall of La Rochelle, the defenders of civil as well as religious liberty. Around them, in fact, French politics centred; and after trying every means to suppress them, their enemies at last gave way, but only really in our day and under the present Republic. Now their descendants fill the highest offices in the state and occupy the most honourable position in the country. No one can doubt that this oppressed people have had immense influence in the making of modern France, and it may equally be seen in the domestic interior as in the form of the state.

R. HEATH.

A TALK WITH COUSIN MABEL ABOUT PERFECTION.

BY E. J. WHATELY, AUTHOR OF "COUSIN MABEL'S SKETCHES OF CHARACTER."

II.

THE next day when Katie joined me, she looked a little blank on finding I was not alone.

"Do not be alarmed," I said; "I think you know my friend Mrs. Lumley; she has just been at a meeting where some of Mr. Lowndes' friends and associates have been speaking, so she will be able to give us her impressions, and perhaps help to throw more light on the subject."

Mrs. Lumley, a gentle, thoughtful, young wife and mother, was at first a little reluctant to give what might seem like a criticism of what she had heard; but I knew she was well able really to form a judgment: she had studied her Bible well and reflected much on what she read and heard.

"I thought the first part of the discourse I heard—it was a friend of Mr. Lowndes' whose name I did not catch—was exceedingly good," she said: "but as he went on, he startled me by saying that a true Christian who acts up to his privileges is really and actually dead to sin—and he quoted Colossians ii. 2. Now I had been reading the passage in the Revised Version, and I see the word there is not 'ye are dead,' but 'ye died.' Now if that is correct it alters the whole case."

"It certainly is, as all the best scholars agree. The word describes not a state, but a transaction. We are regarded as having suffered the punishment of death with Christ. And the apostle goes on to bid us 'mortify,' or put to death, our 'members on earth' (our sinful propensities). This proves sufficiently that he had not been speaking of a state, for how could a dead man need to put anything in himself to death?"

"That is quite clear," said Mrs. Lumley, "and shows the sense given by the 'Revised' must be the right one."

"But was that all that passed?" I asked.

"No: Mr. Lowndes had to leave as soon as his lecture was over, but the meeting then became more of a conversational one, and several present gave their own experiences and told of the blessing they had received. Now I do see that when one once can lay hold of the truth that God is doing the work in us as well as for us, it is a wonderful help. I know, when I heard Mr. Benson preach on, 'As we have received Christ, even so walk in Him,' showing that our being made holy must be taken from His hands like our pardon, it was a new light and strength to me."

"And yet Eleanor says Mr. Benson does not believe in that blessing!" said Katie.

"I think she means," resumed Mrs. Lumley, "that he does not see—and no more can I, I own—that this puts one at once out of reach of all temptation."

"Now several who were at that meeting declared that they or their friends had been absolutely kept for weeks and months from ever sinning. I could not see how they could know that, even if it had been true. But Miss Fordyce mentioned the case of a lady who had just recovered from a very painful illness, and who was asked if she had never been impatient or cross all the time? She replied she had felt dreadfully irritable, but that God had enabled her to refrain from speaking."

"Well, and that was a great point gained," said I; "the bridling of the tongue is a most important step on the way to victory."

"Indeed it is!" sighed Katie.

"Yes," said Mrs. Lumley; "but I thought it was strange to speak as if all was gained, if no words were spoken. I did not like to make any remark myself, but Mrs. Cameron, that cousin of my husband's I was telling you about, who has just come to us from Scotland, was present, and she said at once, in her slow, soft voice, 'That was a very blessed experience, but still, as long as any irritable feeling was in the heart, sin was not conquered, for an evil thought is sin.'"

"Did Miss Fordyce assent to this?"

"No; she looked rather amazed, and said, 'If the Tempter puts bad thoughts in our mind it is not our fault.' Mrs. Cameron answered, 'But we may harbour such thoughts; if we do not cast them out at once it is sin, and which of us could be sure we have put them away the moment they were suggested? Besides, they could not enter unless the heart was prepared to receive them. That was the substance of what she said. Miss Fordyce made no direct answer, but she made some remark later about those who wished to enter on a higher life being always misunderstood by others; and afterwards she told me that she saw poor Mrs. Cameron was content to remain on a very low level."

"I should have thought, on the contrary," I observed, "that her standard was higher than that of those she was answering, if they were content with ruling the tongue, and she aimed at ruling the spirit also."

"I do not think they would quite say that," said Mrs. Lumley; "but the subject is very puzzling to me. I agree with Mrs. Cameron in theory; but many who talk of this new experience are persons whose truthfulness and sincerity I cannot doubt for a moment, and when they assure me of the blessing they have received, what can I think?"

"I would not doubt it for a moment," I said. "When once we see that the power lies with God, and that He is able and willing to give it, we cannot doubt that the honest seeker will find. But not always in the same way."

"But when they tell one," said Katie, "that they have been so completely freed from irritability, for instance, that all temptation to it was removed, can I refuse to believe it?"

"No, I would never say that. I think sometimes they leave out of the question attendant circumstances, which may help to bring about the result: I mean, sometimes God in His mercy gives improvement in health, or the situation is changed, and the surroundings which tried us severely are removed: all these things are helps from God's providence, and must be thankfully received, though they are not direct effects of grace."

"But do you not believe that grace alone works the deliverance sometimes?" said Katie.

"Certainly I do. I would never deny that, without any outward helps, God's grace sometimes works a conscious, speedy deliverance from some besetting temptation. In some cases He sends this as a confirmation to the faith, just as the palsied man's recovering the use of his limbs would enable him to believe more firmly in the greater blessing of having his sins forgiven. But we may turn this blessing of sudden deliverance into a snare if we allow ourselves to think it will place us out of reach of future returns of temptation."

"But Eleanor says, that to expect that the temptation will recur, is to doubt God's power to save," said Katie.

"There is the mistake. God might, doubtless, if it were His will, make us impervious, once for all, to all temptations; but He has not chosen to do this."

"But He surely wills us to be holy," said Mrs. Lumley.

"He does; but we are to be made holy in His way, not in our own way. We should like to have the work done in a way to save us all trouble: but He has distinctly attached conditions to His gifts. With pardon and justification, the only condition is trustful acceptance: but with holiness wrought in us, we have not only to accept, but also to work with God and under Him; just as a doctor may be able to declare he can undertake the cure of his patient, but on the condition of his directions being followed implicitly.

"Our Lord did this, even in some of His miracles. The lepers were to show themselves to the priests; the blind man was to wash in the pool of Siloam; the man with the withered hand was to stand up in the middle of the congregation and stretch forth his hand. If they had refused to comply with these commands, we may be sure they would not have been healed, for the command given was plainly the condition.

Thy sun shall no more go down; neither shall thy moon withdraw itself: for the Lord shall be thine everlasting light, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended.

ISAIAH LX.20.

"Now the condition attached to our being made holy by God, is, as we see in every page of the Epistles, that we should watch, pray, and strive. All the comparisons given are drawn from the wrestler or runner in the arena, and the soldier in battle. The one has to be 'temperate in all things,' 'laying aside every weight, or hindrance,' the other must 'endure hardness'—refusing to be 'entangled with the ordinary business of life.' The images seem to have been all chosen to point to intense and continuous effort.

"Look through the whole New Testament, and you will see the same spirit everywhere. Paul himself counted not himself to 'have apprehended,' he had no doubt of his safety in Christ, but he did not attempt to judge of his attainments in holy living—his work was to press forward, looking onwards, and not backwards."

"But I am sure many who speak in the way we are alluding to do lead holy lives," said Mrs. Lumley.

"I don't doubt it. The instincts of many Christians are much sounder than their reason. But we must remember there is always a temptation to cut down God's requirements to meet our standard, instead of raising our standard to meet His requirements."

"How do you mean?" asked Katie.

"Just this; some have laid down the principle, that sin is actually and entirely overcome, after a certain experience has been passed through. Then if some failure be apparent, the temptation is to allege, that this is not really sin: the thoughts, as you were told to-day, Edith,—are what we are not responsible for, so we may escape self-reproach; then again, some condone sins of ignorance."

"I heard some one say, the other day," said Katie, "that God would not punish sins of ignorance, any more than we should punish a babe of a year or two old if it breaks or spoils something in childish play, not knowing it is doing harm."

"I think," said Mrs. Lumley, smiling, "if these good people knew as much of little children as mothers like myself do, they would speak rather differently. One can make a very young child understand that such and such a thing must not be done, and if they are not taught early to keep from spoiling everything that comes in their way, one's children may be made absolute nuisances. I am sure I can speak from experience."

"And experience which has been well acted on, dear Edith," I said, "as any one who sees your happy, well-trained little ones can bear witness. But I own I think many of what we call sins of ignorance are not the unconscious mischief done by a babe so much as the careless escapades of older children who fancy they did not know they were transgressing, when in fact it was that they gave no heed to what they were told."

"But some things could not be known beforehand," said Katie.

"Yes; the Apostle Paul honestly thought he was doing right when he persecuted the Church of God, but he says himself that he 'obtained mercy because he did it ignorantly in unbelief.'

"He saw that pardon was required even for sins of ignorance. So our Lord's own words were, 'Forgive them, for they know not what they do.' And look at the Levitical Law. The sins of ignorance required sacrifices with bloodshedding; there are distinct provisions for the sins of rulers, priests, and people.

"Surely all this shows the way such sins are regarded by God."

"But what do you think has led to this idea of conscious 'perfection,' as it is called, being attained by Christians?" said Mrs. Lumley.

"I think it is a reaction from an opposite mistake made some years ago. I remember the time when justification by faith and free pardon of sin were often preached quite without regard to the necessity of holiness of life. The Redemption was spoken of as if it were only an escape from punishment. I am sure many good people who did this did not perceive the evil to which it led. They were so anxious to dwell on the freeness of salvation, that deliverance from guilt was dwelt on and deliverance from the power of sin virtually ignored."

"I remember reading some tracts and books to that effect," said Edith Lumley; "and my mother has told me she observed a good deal of it in her earlier days."

"Well, this led to a two-fold evil. One set of people accepted free grace almost as a Romanist might an indulgence, and thought it hardly signified how we lived; another class, really anxious about holiness, tried to win it by their own efforts, or acquiesced in besetting sins with a kind of sorrowful resignation, as if they were incurable diseases."

"I have heard people talk in that way," said Katie, "as if their tempers were like a fierce dog they were compelled to keep!"

"Just so: then, when the eyes of some Christians were opened to the fact, that salvation from sin took in deliverance from its power as well as its guilt and punishment, they rushed into the contrary extreme, and this is the result."

"But you would not say they are all wrong?" said Katie.

"No; in as far as they declare the work of holiness to be God's and not ours, and that we must go to Him as simply to receive it as we did to receive pardon, they are quite right: the mistake is, first, making it essential to go through some special experience once for all, and then, looking on it as putting you out of reach of future temptation and beyond the need of vigilance."

"And do not you think," said Mrs. Lumley, "that it is a mistake to look on such an awakening as necessarily a separate experience from receiving pardon and justification?"

"I do. If these persons had fully understood that holiness was a part of God's work of salvation, as truly as pardon, they would have taken the whole together, and have seen that in giving their hearts to God they were entitled to all the privileges of a believer. But having apprehended one part of the truth before the other, they looked on the part which came latest to them, as a new experience, and even sometimes called it a 'second conversion.'"

"I see that," said Mrs. Lumley, "and I understand how the first joyful surprise of getting hold of the new thought, would seem like an era in the lives of such Christians. But might not the same things be felt with other truths, when they were understood for the first time?"

"I am sure it might. A friend told me once that when she became first aware of the power of prayer and the promises attached to it, it was quite like a new spiritual awakening. God can revive His servants in this way again and again. But the danger is, the insisting, as we said before, on our experience being a model for every one else: whereas what may have come as a sudden flash to one, may be gradually apprehended by another."

"And if it is really apprehended," said Edith Lumley, "the manner of apprehending it matters little."

"As long as we see the need of watchful efforts on our part, we shall not go far wrong."

"But how can we hope to overcome sin, if we are always to be failing and always imperfect?" said Katie, in a desponding tone.

"We are not to be always failing, dear Katie; we must never allow ourselves to think the enemy will prevail. God can and will overcome sin in us if we follow His directions; but we must never make sure of having attained perfection in this life. We must leave Him to judge of the progress of holiness in us. Our surest test of progress is, increased sense of sin, and increasing moral and spiritual sensitiveness."

"But that would make us more and more discouraged," said Katie.

"No, it need not, and should not. It should rather encourage us. You know you are progressing in music when you can discern a false note where you did not perceive it before. No, dear Katie, you need not lose heart. God is working in you: your very doubts and fears show it, go on and be of good courage. Watch and pray, and never for a moment be off your guard. But you are to watch, not in doubt or anxious fear, but cheerfully knowing your Captain is beside you. You are to seek, not to have your will paralyzed, but actively turned to work with God and for Him; you are to run, not as uncertainly, but in joyful confidence that He who works in you is faithful and wills your sanctification. His object is to 'purify to Himself a peculiar people zealous of good works,' and He can and will 'present you faultless before Him' at the Great Day."

Things New and Old.

BOOKS FOR THE BLIND.—A correspondent writes: In the SUNDAY AT HOME for June, I have read an article entitled, "A Library for the Blind." In it, the writer speaks of the great difficulty of learning Braille in a way likely to deter some people, who might be thinking of learning it, from making the attempt. As volunteers to write out books for the blind, in Braille, are urgently required, I write to give my experience of the work. About a year ago, my daughter and I were shown the blind writing, by a lady living next door to us. We both took to it, and in three weeks were able to send our sheets to Dr. Armitage, moderately well-written, and from him we received every help and encouragement. On Saturday, 2nd June, I took some young ladies to the garden party at the College for the Blind at Norwood. We were much interested in what we saw there, and my daughter and I were pleased to find that the pupils could read Braille books, like those we write, quite readily. On Monday, the 4th June, one of my nieces told me she would like to learn Braille, so I handed over my frame to her and set her to work at once. A fortnight passed and she could write it well, and had eight sheets written ready for us to take to Dr. Armitage. During the fortnight she had been going about a great deal, so had not devoted much of her time to the blind writing. I can assure any one who may wish to give some of their time to help in supplying books to the blind that the difficulty of learning Braille may easily be overcome by the exercise of a moderate amount of intelligence and application. In the article I have alluded to, it is said that some of the books in the Library for the Blind are wearing out, and that money cannot replace them. I would suggest that the books, having been written in Braille, could be copied by blind copyists, and the money paid to them for their work would be well spent, as it would help them to earn their own livelihood. Blind copyists can be heard of from the Secretary of the British and Foreign Blind Association, 33, Cambridge Square, Hyde Park, London, W.

AN ARAB TALE FROM ZANZIBAR.—The prophet was walking one day with one of his disciples, and he bought three loaves of bread. They each ate one, and then the prophet said, "Put the other away, when we come to some water we will eat it." After a time they came to a well, the prophet turned to his follower and said, "Where is the loaf?" He said, "It is stolen." "Who stole it?" "I do not know," said the follower. So they went on to a place where there was some sand, so the prophet sat down and made three heaps of sand, and, invoking the name of God, the three heaps of sand became three heaps of gold. The follower said, "For whom are these?" The prophet said, "One is thine, one is mine, and the other is for him who stole the loaf." "I am he who stole the loaf," said the follower. "Ah," said the prophet, "you would not confess the truth, when I charged you to do so in the name of God, but for the sake of a heap of gold you can speak what is true. Now I do not want the gold, you may take my share, but none of all these three heaps will profit you." So saying the prophet went on, but his follower could not rise from the ground, he was compelled to sit there watching the gold. Presently there came by three horsemen. They saw him sitting by his three heaps of gold, and they slew him for his money. Then they talked of dividing the money, but finding they were hungry, they sent one of their number back to the town to buy food; he bought some meal, and thinking in his heart that he would like to possess all the gold, he got some poison, and put it into the meal, thinking that when his companions were dead, he would get their share of the gold. Meanwhile his two companions said to each other, "Let us kill this fellow when he comes back with the food, and then we can divide the gold." So when he drew near, they fired upon him, and killed him, and they made the meal into bread, and devoured it, and died beside the gold. After this the prophet came back with a band of followers, and they asked him the meaning of the four dead bodies, and the three heaps of gold, and he told them what had happened, and ended with saying, "After all, it is not gold, but three heaps of sand. Shall I cause it to go back to its original form?" They said "Do so;" and he did.

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

BY EMMA LESLIE.

CHAPTER VII.—MR. ROBINSON.

"COME, little one, give us a helping hand to twist in a bit more learning," exclaimed Jack one morning, running into the pavilion where Bertie was playing with his brother.

"Why, where have you been all this time?" said Bertie, who had not seen Jack for nearly a fortnight, and thought he had grown tired of the reading-lessons. But he shook his head when he was asked this question.

"No, no, I've been pegging away at the book when I could, but we're busy now, getting ready for the summer, and it's Jack here, and Boots there, all day long, so that it's only been now and again of an evening that I've had a chance at the reading, and it isn't much I can do without you either, he said, with a grateful look at Bertie.

While he had been speaking, he had turned over the leaves of the book, which looked considerably the worse for wear now, so that the words in some places could scarcely be deciphered.

"We had better try on another leaf," said Bertie, looking at the soiled torn book with some disgust, for Jack had used his dirty fingers as industriously as his eyes, and so in places it was plentifully adorned with blacking stains.

"I say, the old gent will see I've used his book," said Jack with some satisfaction. "Did you know he was coming back?" he suddenly asked.

"No! Is he coming soon?"

"Next week, and I should say he was going to bring a lady with him, for he's ordered one of the best private sitting-rooms to be got ready, and a carriage is to be ordered for his use while he is here," and Jack rubbed his hands with satisfaction over the importance of his patron.

"I know what he's going to have a carriage for," said Tommy; "he's going to take me and Bertie to see the ruins."

Jack laughed. "Why, I dare say he's forgotten all about you little uns," he said.

"He's forgotten you," retorted Tommy angrily.

"He'll soon remember me again, and I won't let him forget you," he said, speaking to Bertie in a lower tone; "I mean to tell him how you've helped me with the reading."

"I'd rather you did not say anything about it," replied Bertie with some dignity; "I like helping you, and I don't want anybody to be told."

"All right, all right!" said Jack, but with a private determination in his own mind, to tell who had helped him master the difficulties of the alphabet at the earliest opportunity.

Then he set himself to the task of learning more letters, and to spell familiar words under his little teacher's guidance. Bertie at last ventured to suggest that fingers were not necessary to learn letters, and that if the eyes were used steadily and carefully, fingers might be dispensed with, and the leaves of the book saved from dirt and damage.

Jack was willing to take any suggestion from Bertie now, whom he had learned to look up to with some respect, in spite of his being a little boy only about two-thirds of his own age, and "as poor as a church mouse into the bargain," as he sometimes said to himself; and so, as he had learned nearly all the letters now, and was quick to distinguish the one from the other, he found his fingers were not so needful as he had supposed.

"Look here, Jack, if you can once manage to do without your fingers, you can fix your book open somewhere, and learn to spell words while you are brushing the boots," said Bertie by way of encouraging the boy to use his eyes alone.

"Ah! so I can," said his big scholar, and down went his hands, while his eyes were fixed more intently than ever on his book, as he picked out letter after letter, and then learned to put them together into simple easy words.

"I say, the old gent 'll be pleased, I know, when I tell him how I'm getting on," said Jack, after a spell of steady application to his book. He was supremely delighted with his own progress, and proportionately grateful to Bertie for helping him. "He'll be sure to ask after you too, and I shall tell him you came to play in the pavilion still."

"Oh, yes, do!" said Tommy; "and he'll come here, and tell us some stories again, about monkeys and bears."

"But you'll have to clear all this rubbish out before he comes—he's a particular old gent, I can tell you," said Jack, surveying the litter spread all round the pavilion.

"I shan't clear it out," said Tommy; "I don't have to do such things."

"But we brought the sand and stones and seaweed in, and we must take it out again," said Bertie quickly, seeing how angry Jack looked all at once.

"But why should we?" demanded his brother; "let Jack clear it up. We are ——"

What Tommy was going to add Bertie did not wait to hear, for he hastily interrupted him by saying, "Yes, we are quite as well able to carry the things out as Jack himself;" and he gathered up a handful of seaweed at once, and carried it down to the beach.

"You'll never be half such a gentleman as your brother," said Jack, turning angrily to Tommy.

"That's not gentleman's work," said Tommy, disdainfully.

"Oh, it's not the work you do, but the way you do it, Ann says, makes the difference," answered Bertie, coming back for another heap of seaweed.

"Never mind, little un, I'll clear it all up," said Jack, when he saw that the greater part of the work was likely to fall upon Bertie.

But the little boy shook his head. "No; that wouldn't be fair," he said; "if the people at the hotel let us come here to play, we ought not to make the place dirty, or if we do, we must clear it up. Come, Tommy, shovel up some of that sand and throw it out here."

But Tommy shook himself. "I don't want to," he said sullenly.

"Ah! he's a Danby all over," said Jack; "never thinks of anything but pleasing himself. There, get out of the way," he said, giving him an unceremonious push, and taking the little spade himself, for he had suddenly woke up to the notion, that if the master of the hotel should walk down here one day, and see the place so untidy, he would forbid the little boys coming to the pavilion in future, which would deprive him of all further help with his reading, and rob the children of a pleasant play place on cold or stormy days. So he hastened to clear out the collection of litter. Bertie assisted, and was just carrying the last of the stones out, when to his amazement he saw Mr. Robinson coming down the winding path from the hotel garden.

The little boy almost dropped his load, when he saw his old friend; and big clumsy Jack looked still more awkward and confused as he stood pulling his forelock, and wishing himself anywhere but in the pavilion just now.

"You're very busy, I see," said the old gentleman, holding out his hand to Bertie, and looking at the boy's flushed face.

Bertie thought he had better explain matters at once. "We have been making this place in a mess, sir, and so I thought we had better clear it up, and Jack has been helping us," he said.

"That's right. And what have you been doing?" he said, turning to Tommy.

"Nothing," said the child crossly.

"Oh, he's a true Danby, sir, and never does anything but what pleases him," put in Jack.

"Oh, Jack!" exclaimed Bertie reproachfully.

"I didn't mean you was a Danby, for ——"

"There, there, we won't discuss the Danbys. Jack, you run back to your work now," said the old gentleman, seating himself in the pavilion, and drawing Tommy towards him.

"Now, my little man, tell me how you have been getting on since I have been away," he said.

But Tommy was too cross to answer, and so Bertie stepped forward. "I think the factory is working again, and things are more pleasant," he said.

"And your mamma—is she better now?"

"Yes, and she hopes we shall go back to Esterfield soon."

"Ann says we had better stay here," put in Tommy, who was recovering from his sulky fit.

"Ah! and what do you think about it, my boy?" said the gentleman.

"I want to go back; I don't like this nasty place now," said Tommy.

"And you?" said the gentleman, turning to Bertie.

"I think I should like to go back, only Ann says it is better for us to stay—we are getting stronger every day."

"Mamma said yesterday you ought to go to school, Bertie," put in his brother, who was by no means disposed to be forgotten in the talk.

"Yes, yes! school is necessary for little people," said the gentleman, and then he grew silent and thoughtful, until Tommy roused him by asking for a "bear story."

"I don't think I can remember one to-day," said his friend with a smile. "I came down here to be quiet, and think over some plans."

"Tommy, we had better go home now," said Bertie, at once divining that Mr. Robinson would rather be left alone. But Tommy was not at all willing to do this, and shook himself sullenly as he said, "I don't want to go home, I want a story."

"You shall have a story another day, my boy. Run away now."

But Tommy still shook himself, and at last burst into a storm of tears. Bertie coaxed, and threatened to tell Ann, and at last Mr. Robinson said, "I shall think that what that rude boy Jack said is true—the Danbys only think of pleasing themselves."

Bertie's face flushed at this. "Tommy is only a little boy, sir. I have begun to learn——"

"A different lesson," interrupted the gentleman. "Yes, yes, I can see you have, and are striving to practise it too, and Tommy must learn the same, if ever he is to become a useful man. He must have his bear story another day. Go home now, for it is nearly tea-time, and Ann will be wondering where you are."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XVIII.

1. A city ruined—"Cursed be he
   Who doth its stones re-lay.
   His first-born and his youngest shall
   With life the forfeit pay."

2. A man who came to comfort one
   Who lay in anguish sore;
   But less of comfort, than reproach,
   He on his head did pour.

3. A mountain prophesied against
   By mandate from the Lord,
   To utter desolation doomed,
   Till it shall hear His Word.

4. The place whence Abraham came out,
   Brought by a guiding Hand;
   The Hand of Him who promise made,
   "Thou shalt possess this land."

5. A woman who made answer thus:
   "I with mine own do dwell."
   And in her hour of bitter grief
   Could still say "It is well."

6. A place that near Arabia lay,
   Ezekiel gives its name;
   In Tyre's proud days rich merchandise
   Forth from its confines came.

7. He fighting fell in foremost rank,
   Yet won nor praise nor fame.
   He served there by a king's command.
   What was his nation's name?

8. A mighty city in whose walls
   A mighty saint did dwell;
   In whose immortal words we learn
   The road to heaven or hell.

9. The place to which that mighty saint
   And his companion came,
   When driven forth from Antioch
   By Jews who feared his fame.

10. A woman who, when our dear Lord
    Gave up His precious life,
    Stood looking from afar upon
    That scene of mortal strife.

11. The mount to which a prophetess
    Commanded to draw near,
    A captain with ten thousand men,
    Without a thought of fear.

Initials give the name of Him
Who died upon the cross of shame.
The finals what He, by that act
To us, lost souls, became.

E. E. G.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert

"MAN GOETH FORTH UNTO HIS WORK AND TO HIS LABOUR UNTIL THE EVENING."
—Psalm civ. 23.

No. 1795.—SEPTEMBER 22, 1888.

RALPH ELLISON'S OPPORTUNITY.

CHAPTER VII.

IF the minister had hoped to resume his life of seclusion, he very soon made discovery that the days when he had found it possible to barricade himself from his fellows were over. He had taken a small tyrant to his bosom who did with him what she would.

They returned to the lonely house near the shore, indeed; but it was no longer an uninvaded solitude. When Sandbury discovered that the minister was not to be shaken out of his resolution to adopt the child, it resolved heroically that he should not proceed on his foolish venture without help. He must be supported in his indiscretion, if it were only for the sake of setting an example of loyalty to the church folks.

The help took a rather oppressive form, it is true, and one that tried the minister's feelings, and perhaps his temper; but he made an effort to accept it at least with outward grace.

On the very evening of their return, tokens that the travellers had not been forgotten lay strewn upon the table in his little study. Ralph lifted the odd-shaped parcels helplessly, one after another.

"What are these?" he questioned Mrs. Lamb, who stood in the doorway secretly enjoying his dismay. "Two, three, four bottles, and this," —he held a long woollen garment in his outstretched hand, as if he were afraid of making a closer investigation into its nature.

"The bottles, sir, is for the little miss," said the landlady, glib of explanation; "Mrs. Skinner, she sent the cough mixture, to be taken twice a day, morning and evening, as you'll see wrote on the label. The liniment is to rub in when Miss Josie has a cold on her chest, Mrs. Smith sent it, and she ought to know the meaning of a chest if anybody does, with two of hers taken off with galloping consumption. The black bottle, let me see, that's 'Mrs. Cheadle's Safe Specific for Croup.' That you've got in your hand, sir? That's a flannel night-gown, what every child ought to wear, as we all know, without needing a single woman to tell us. That one is made by Miss Lavinia Saxby, sir, and you can see as it is the work of a woman as has never had children of her own, by the way the sleeves is set in; they're safe to be tore out the very first wash. The stockings now, you've not looked at them, sir, is useful, and they'll keep her little feet warm against the cold days, bless her!"

Mr. Ellison received all this flood of enlightenment in a silence that was expressive. Forewarned is forearmed, to be sure, but was it quite necessary that a child should take all the diseases which the bottles of physic professed to cure?

When the ladies next day followed up their gifts by a personal visit, they did not leave him with so much as an unrouted doubt on this point. They assured him that every self-respecting child took scarlet fever, whooping-cough, measles, chicken-pox, and since vaccination was not a law of the land in those days, they cheerfully threw in small-pox to swell the gruesome list.

"But she'll pull through them all," cried one optimist. "I've had seven laid down with the fever at once, and there isn't an empty bed in my nursery, thank God. You send for me, sir, when the little one begins to sicken, or for Mrs. Luke here, who has brought fourteen into the world and has never lost one."

Ralph thanked them, but his eyes had a new trouble in them when he looked at Josie, who had been washed and clean-pinafored and sent down by Mrs. Lamb to see the ladies. Was some hideous disease lurking already under his roof to claim his little one? Those others had so many, they could spare a child and never miss it—but his one ewe lamb?

Josie, however, carried a most comfortable reassurance in her rosy cheeks and bright eyes; she looked the very embodiment of health, as she stood mutinous in the doorway, rebelling against Mrs. Lamb's whispered promptings to "go round pretty, and shake hands with the ladies."

"What a colour she has, she's as blooming as a rose," said good-natured Mrs. Skinner.

"I wouldn't set too much store by it,"—a pessimist shook her head. "I don't hold with that colour myself; I've never known it but go along with consumption." It was a well-known fact, however, that Mrs. Horner's well-filled nursery hadn't a complexion in it.

"You haven't told us her name yet." The speaker this time was the member who was tolerated on most deputations because she asked those inconvenient questions which every one wished answered but lacked courage to ask.

"Josephine—she calls herself Josie."

"But I mean her surname. She's got one, I suppose, like the rest of us?"

"Her surname," said the minister, reddening under this thrust, "is Hughes." Mary was the only mother she had ever known, and he had decided that the little girl should bear her name.

"And I suppose," the same speaker went on, "you've seen that she's baptized like a Christian child?"

"She has been christened," said Ralph, this time with a hint of sternness that silenced his questioner.

The minister was learning many things in those days that come to most men in the sweet natural way of fatherhood. He had secured himself a treasure, but the guarding of it cost him many an anxious hour.

He liked to have Josie with him even in the morning, but it is not to be denied that she wholly diverted the uses of the study and turned it into something between a playroom and a nursery, into anything rather than the serious workshop of a student. She had no respect for books except as useful material for house-building, and the stories which she never wearied of hearing had no connection in her mind with the big volumes her little hands dragged out of the shelves to the detriment of their bindings.

He could no longer work with an undistracted mind, and he gradually fell into the habit of doing all his graver work at night, when Josie's restless feet were stilled, and her prattle hushed in sleep. Even when she sat on the rug at his feet, playing with her doll, he found himself watching her with a passing wonder for that instinct of motherhood that little girls develop so early, but Josie was seldom long still; presently she would jump up and demand to be amused.

Generally it was her imperious will to be taken to the shore. She shared his deep love of the sea, and as if she were indeed the sea-bird of his early fancy, she escaped more than once, and was found by him as on that first day sitting on the sand with a lapful of treasures.

This propensity to wander, and an unconquerable love of going without socks and shoes, and so contracting colds, were among the minor troubles of the minister's life. As she grew older he clung to her the more with a passionate love in which he could not rest for the fear that he might lose her.

Often in those early days he watched her face in sleep, and when she was awake, with a sickening dread lest he might see some look of Vane creeping into it; if the moral taint were there, he had almost prayed that death might take her while she was still young and innocent. But Josie had no look that spoke to him either of Alice or her father, though she inherited the beauty of both.

As she grew older she developed social tendencies that at first a little alarmed him. She showed an alacrity in accepting invitations to nursery tea-parties that surprised him. For in the long years of his ministry at Sion Chapel he had so accustomed himself to the life of a recluse as to have half forgotten the habits of his youth.

Josie manifested a decided interest in her white frock and pink sash, and was reconciled to shoes that had rosettes on them, coming back with stories of other little girls and boys with whom she had played, and generally so well amused herself as to be quite ready to renew the pleasure. So it came to be quite a familiar sight to see the minister carrying the little woman well wrapped in a shawl to the scene of dissipation, and coming for her again at bedtime, "for all the world as if he were a nurse," cried the scornful.

But Sandbury was wiser now and let him alone. It knew that the day was coming when the minister would be one with his flock in their joys and sorrows. An irresistible force was drawing him every day nearer them, for I defy any man whose sleeping tenderness has been awakened for a little child or even for the dumb brute creation to shut his fellow men and women long from his love.

Already secretly, half ashamedly, as if by stealth, he had held out a hand to some brother or sister in extremity; he began with the sorrowful, the sick, and the sad, always with the remembrance of Mary Hughes deep in his heart, and her dying words to him ringing in his ears. When he sat by Josie's little bed at night, listening to her chatter of the day's doings; when he joined her in her simple petitions to the Divine Father of us all, he could no longer turn aside coldly denying his obligations to those others, children too of the same Father. As for his sermons, if they lost something in brilliance they gained in a subtle quality which may be called heart. Hitherto his pulpit utterances had been polished till they shone with the cold glitter of diamonds; now they began to glow as if with a hidden spark of fire, for the love that had warmed and cheered him was beginning to find an outward channel. But it was left to Josie to develop his long-dormant social qualities.

When she grew out of childhood into maidenhood, she did not go to school, as other girls in Sandbury did; the middle classes sending their children out of time-honoured tradition to "The Misses Smellie's Educational Establishment for the daughters of gentry," where they learned the smattering of useful and useless knowledge and the few tinkling accomplishments that were considered in those comfortable days to constitute a liberal education. She learned all she knew at the minister's side. It was not very much, as he sometimes acknowledged ruefully, for she showed no inborn love of study.

He would have liked his Josie to be clever and brilliant, but he was content to find her winsome and loving. She was quite as charming a companion as if she had been a blue-stocking, and there was never a cleverer little housekeeper, a better nurse, never a kinder comforter when he was sad.

She herself knew little of illness, but in the more trifling infantile complaints which she did not wholly escape, she was cared for by one or two motherly women with a zeal and tenderness that went far to break down the frosty reserve behind which Ralph had so long intrenched himself; kindness to Josie was the surest passport to his gratitude. But the little woman did not make many claims on the skill or patience of her nurses; she astonished Sandbury by taking none of the diseases that had seemed to hover round her crib like the released contents of a Pandora's box, and the prophets of evil were forced to acknowledge their errors.

Josie was an exception in other respects as well. She was the prettiest girl in Sandbury or out of it, so said some far-travelled natives who were held to speak with authority; that she was the most winsome was ceded by universal consent. She grew in beauty, and Ralph humbly hoped in grace and goodness; that she was dear to him no one who saw them together could question; dear as a daughter, though he never taught her to call him father.

When she grew up she invented pretty names for him; guardian, master, friend, it matters little what name love chooses. He had trembled for the moment when she should ask him about her real father, and had been thankful for the childish unconsciousness that taught her to accept her world as she found it, without question; but Josie was waking out of childhood, and he knew that with her dawning womanhood she would begin to reason and wonder about herself.

He had tenderly fostered her recollections of Mary Hughes, and when, in their long summer rambles, they passed the hut, she would make him tell over again how he had found her and carried her home in his arms. Of Mary's happy death and the beautiful lesson of her life he often spoke, but of Alice and of Henry Vane never.

The moment of Josie's awakening came one day, however, as he had feared. It was on the day when she wore her first long dress, and she seemed to grow at once into a woman before his eyes. There was to be a feast given by Mr. and Mrs. Culpepper in honour of Josie's birthday, and with many persuasions she had won his consent to be present at it.

"I am your daughter," she said, when she came downstairs to show herself to him in her new gown, "and now that I'm grown up you must go into the world to take care of me."

She had often before called herself his daughter, but to-day he heard her without a smile and almost with a look of trouble on his face. This going into the world, as she called it, cost the shy recluse something more of an effort than she was likely to guess.

She went up to him and put her hands on his shoulders.

"Guardian," she said, "you are the only father I ever knew, and the dearest and best a girl ever had, but perhaps once there was another father whom I cannot remember. Will you tell me about him now that I am older and can understand?"

"You had a father, my child," he answered, controlling himself to speak quietly, "of whom you shall be told, but not to-day. This is your birthday."

"And my mother?" she asked a little timidly, for his voice was so grave, "she died, I suppose, a long time ago?"

"She died a long time ago, dear one. She was beautiful as you are, Josie. In this white dress you remind me of her as I saw her last."

He paused abruptly and she asked no more. She divined, perhaps, with a woman's quickness that she had unwittingly touched on an unhealed wound that had yet power to ache, and her love for him was a great deal stronger than her desire to be satisfied. After all, no father dead or living, could be dearer than he.

"Do you care to go with me to-night, or must I let you be lazy as usual?" she asked lightly, anxious to atone for the pain her words had given him.

"No, dear, no," he said, smiling as he laid his hand on her curls, "I must be your guardian in more than name now that you are growing so fast."

But when they reached the Culpeppers' cheerful rooms above the shop, lit with a radiance that streamed out into the street and hinted of an expectant company within, she noticed that he trembled. When she had thrown off her shawl and the smart maid was flutteringly ready to announce them, she drew his arm within her own, with an artless gesture of tenderness that moved him strangely.

And so, with this young thing to lean on and with her protecting love to guard him, Ralph Ellison took up the long-broken threads of the past and began the world again.

HOSPITAL NURSES

IN LONDON AND ON THE CONTINENT.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER III.—ABROAD.

THE subject of Hospitals and Hospital Nursing is one of engrossing interest in all countries and among all classes from the rulers on their thrones to the poorest of their subjects. For example, the late Emperor Wilhelm of Germany always showed the deepest interest and sympathy in hospital work, whether it was in his own empire or in far-away places. There is at Beyrout, in Syria, a hospital founded and carried on by German nurses from Neuwied on the Rhine. It is the greatest possible blessing to Syria, and the Emperor of Germany helped the sisters most liberally every year out of his own private purse.

A friend who has just returned from Syria states that this hospital contains forty beds. Everything is scrupulously clean. There is a splendid garden attached. The sister's dress is dark blue with a little white cap. A sister presides over the drugs and makes up as many as 25,000 prescriptions in the course of the year.

All nationalities are taken in, and such a high repute has this hospital among the Easterns, and such faith have they in it, that if any one of them is taken ill, even at a long distance off, he begs to be carried there, many even being taken on board a steamer for that purpose. The efficiency and the success of this hospital the sisters declare could never have been attained but for the steady liberal help of the dear Emperor William.

The Empress Augusta has done even more than help with her purse in the movement at home; she has taken an active part in the work itself, and her example and deep interest in the Red Cross nurses have helped to make them the strong and efficient body they are.

Then too the Queen of Saxony has thoroughly associated herself with hospitals and nursing the sick. She gives her private means, her time, her sympathy to the work. It is pleasant to hear the terms of affection in which the nurses and the poor patients whom she visits and cheers speak of her. Let me tell my readers what she did only this last Christmas, and they will understand something of her influence.

There is at Christmas-time a fair in Dresden, not what we understand as a fair, but rather an annual market, to which merchants from various countries send goods, and whither the work-people from outlying districts of Saxony bring their wares, toys of every description, home-made lace, wool, warm clothing, cakes, Christmas-trees, cloth, linen, furs, in fact everything useful and ornamental. The better off of those who bring their wares here hire rooms in which to display them, the poorer salesmen have to content themselves with tables in the narrow streets, alleys, or in the market-place. It happened to be very wet and dirty two days before Christmas, but, notwithstanding, the queen might have been seen threading her way through streets and alleys and market-place, holding up her dress, and followed by two men-servants carrying large baskets. She bought dolls here, soldiers there, a piece of cloth at another stall, linen at another, and so on till her baskets were full. No one followed or jostled her, but every face grew brighter as she moved up and down saying kind words to her country subjects. Everybody knew where all these articles would go on the morrow, and true enough, on Christmas Eve, the queen herself took them to the children's hospital and the "Carola House," as the large hospital is called, and bestowed upon each sick person just what he or she liked best and wanted most. She gave to each with her own hand and with her own smile and kind words.

The Queen of Bavaria also has been active in the work until now that sorrow has crushed her energy, but her sympathy and interest are still very great, and her friends and court ladies carry out the work for her with great devotion.

The Grand Duke and Duchess of Baden have never ceased in sympathy and active participation; and the aristocracy throughout Germany have made common cause with all who are willing to identify themselves with the duties of hospital nursing, whether in cities, on the battle-fields, or in the homes of the poor.

It cannot be said in these days that the great ones of the earth stand by and touch not the burdens with one of their fingers, for they are prominent in their desire to remove or alleviate sickness, sorrow, and poverty, and for this object they spare neither heads, hearts, hands, nor purses. It is noteworthy, how they sacrifice their home comforts and luxurious habits that they may set the example of caring for the sick, holding up the life of a nurse as one of the most noble a woman can embrace.

The first thing to be recognised in going to hospitals on the Continent is that they are not, like ours, supported mainly by voluntary contributions. They are in a great measure self-supporting, every patient, as a rule, being compelled to pay or be paid for, except in the case of abject poverty.

The next thing to be noticed is that the majority of the nursing is performed by Albertinerins, Red Cross sisters, deaconesses, sisters of mercy, little sisters of St. Vincent de Paul, brothers of mercy, and, alas, as I shall have to show, in one of the largest hospitals, by women taken haphazard from the streets.

Of their work and its results we shall have many opportunities of judging. I shall speak only of that which I have seen.

We left England at the beginning of the new year and made our way to Dresden.

Few who go to this lovely city, and enjoy its brightness and its hospitality, know of the good work carried on unceasingly and without ostentation by the queen and a large body of her subjects whom she has bound together with her in the work of nursing the sick. They are known by the name of the Albertinerins, and in time of war would work under the direction of the Red Cross banner.

The Albert Verein was founded under the presidency of the Crown Princess, now Queen Carola of Saxony, on the 14th of September, 1867. It came into life just when the horrors of war were fresh in the memory. In the first year of its existence it numbered 1243 members, and at this present time, under the wise and active presidency of the queen, the number has reached 4200.

The enormous loss of life during the wars of 1859 and 1866, and the conviction that many thousands might have been saved had there been timely help and good nursing, made not only the women of high and low degree desirous of educating themselves in the art of nursing, but the queens and princesses were also anxious to join in the good work.

The zeal of the women was awakened, and they lost no time in binding themselves together for the purpose of helping in time of need. There is now a perfect network of institutions all over Germany for the purpose of educating nurses for the sick and wounded, whose object it is to work in active love and obedience under medical direction, to heal the wounded, to relieve pain, and sympathise with and comfort the sick. This fact stands side by side with the military preparations of which Europe has heard so much. These bands of nurses were, it is true, called into existence to mitigate the horrors of war, which is such an extravagant and lavish waster of life, but in time of peace they give themselves up to hospital nursing and nursing in the homes of the sick, both poor and rich. Thus their talents are in constant use, and their preparations so complete that in fourteen days from the announcement of war the whole bodies of nurses with all the appliances requisite could be on the battle-fields ready for their work of mercy.

I had the privilege of an audience of this good Queen of Saxony who has done so much for hospitals and hospital nursing. She not only spoke to me of the work of the Albertinerins, and the hospitals in which they labour, but asked me many questions about our hospitals and nurses in England. She was particularly interested in the Brompton Hospital for Consumption, and our Convalescent Homes, and expressed her great wish that they could have similar institutions in Saxony. She had read the papers in the SUNDAY AT HOME, and so liked the idea of ladies taking flowers to the hospitals that she said she should certainly try and introduce the practice into Saxony.

She wished me to see as much of the hospitals in Dresden as I could, and I visited minutely for the second time the Carola House, the Convalescent House, and the Hospital for Little chilren, all of which are under the care of the Albertinerins.

First, then, to the Carola House, which is a stately and imposing building in a healthy and open suburb of Dresden. It is formed of a number of pavilions, each one separate from the other, and standing, as it were, in its own garden, but all connected by a long corridor running through the garden.

Thirty sisters of the Albert Verein are occupied in this hospital; their uniform is a dress and cape of some soft grey stuff, a white linen cap of peculiar shape, and black or blue striped apron.

Probationers, of whom there are sixteen, or, as they are called here, Little Sisters, wear flat small caps, otherwise their dress is the same.

Among these last we saw a young English girl, the daughter of a physician, who had already served as nurse in a provincial hospital in England. Being desirous of increasing her knowledge and securing efficiency, she had entered herself as probationer under the Albertinerins.

Every sister must watch one month in the year from nine at night until six the next morning. Those on night duty sleep all the morning and wake for refreshments and a walk in the afternoon.

Shortly before going to rest the matron, or "Oberin," as she is called, goes through the wards and corridors to make sure that all is safe and every one at her post for the night.

Every servant in Germany has to pay a tax of ninepence a quarter towards the hospitals, and when they are ill, they are received free of other payment. It is curious to note how the sick poor in Saxony always prefer to be taken to those hospitals where the Albertinerins are the nurses, feeling sure, as they say, that they will be well and skilfully watched over.

As much as possible in this hospital they keep children and adults apart in the wards, as the former often learn bad things from the unguarded talk of the latter. The adults too find the children restless, and prefer the quiet. The queen herself told me that she believed this a right course, and would never have them put together if it could be avoided.

On passing through the clean fresh wards we had our attention drawn to several things, viz.: that the ventilation was in the roof, and by working a certain handle in the wall, a sort of blind can be drawn across, so as to increase or diminish it, as required. We noticed, too, that the windows were provided with the deep sashes which so many of our London hospitals have adopted, and that they are opened by machinery sufficiently to admit air, but not so wide that any patient in delirium could throw himself out.

The stove next attracted our attention. It is large and square, and stands in the middle of the ward, with a seat running round it, on which the patients sit, enjoying the warmth. The heat comes out of a grating at the top, and the ugly chimney crossing to the wall has been done away with, the smoke passing underneath the floor.

At the entrance of each ward is a bath-room, and at the other end of the ward the sisters' little sanctum on one side, and on the other a tiny spotless scullery, occupied, when we saw it, by two convalescents who were zealously polishing cups and plates. The convalescents delight to be made useful in this way and to feel that they help the sisters, ever so little.

The ophthalmic wards are darkened and cool, and I noticed that the predominating colour was dark blue and not green. This is the only hospital which heals diseases of the eye in Dresden, except the Deaconesses' Institute, which sends very bad cases here. For children one shilling a day, and for adults one shilling and threepence three farthings must be paid.

And last, not least, before leaving the wards, the "Heber" apparatus must be noticed. It is the contrivance for lifting sick people out of their beds. It consists of a fixed framework of one horizontal pole between two upright ones. Along the horizontal pole, straps of various lengths and thicknesses are arranged to suit the different parts of the body, which can all be unbuckled and placed under the patient, making a kind of cradle; then, by the simple process of buckling them again on to the horizontal pole, the patient can easily be raised, as the weight is equally divided. This is a wonderful comfort to the sick person and a great assistance to the nurse.

Besides the wards, there are many private rooms, daintily furnished, pretty and clean, set aside for first and second class patients, who pay certain fixed sums daily, for which they have the best service of doctors, nurses, and kitchen which the hospital affords. These rooms are always full, being very much appreciated; the sick people in them being as much apart as though in their own homes.

The dispensary is attended entirely by the sisters, who make up the prescriptions and dispense the drugs.

The kitchens, sculleries, and pantries are excellent, and presided over by Albertinerins who have servants under them. Everything is scrupulously clean and bright. Slates hang on the walls, on which is clearly seen how many patients are to have such and such rations, and how many to have extra food.

The cooking is done partly by steam and partly by fire; the huge copper boilers are filled with tempting concoctions, while the long narrow dresser under the window is devoted to the washing and preparing of the vegetables. The larder, opening out of the kitchen, contains drawers of different articles of food, whose names are printed on china plates fixed outside them, while in the centre is a row of bins, each containing a different kind of meal or flour, and having its special number, so that the sister in charge knows at once which bin to go to by its number.

The scullery joins the larder, and is fitted up with large sinks. The linen of the hospital is washed on the premises.

I have noted down the quantities and expense of the various classes of food required for daily use, and can give them to any one interested in the subject. I would here say only that the average cost of each person in the hospital may be calculated at 1*s.* 11½*d.* a day.

It often happens that thank-offerings are made to the sisters for their great and unwearied attentions. They are not allowed to touch these, but they are given to the authorities, who place them in what we call a money-box, and at the end of the year they are divided, by order of the queen, among all the sisters in the hospital.

Our next visit was to Löschwitz, a suburb of Dresden, and an hour's drive from it. It is a beautiful spot, and in the most charming and romantic part of it is the Heilstädter or Convalescent Home, which has a history attached to it interesting to all women.

Mrs. Marie Simon was the wife of a wholesale haberdasher in Dresden, and when the war broke out in 1866 between Austria and Prussia, she felt an overwhelming conviction that her vocation was to do what she could for the wounded and dying on the battle-field.

She did such good service there that the Queen of Saxony sought her advice in all sanitary and hospital arrangements.

When the war of 1870–71 broke out Mrs. Simon again went out with the troops, to France, and was of great service to them there, and the name by which they all addressed her was Mother Simon.

When the war was ended, she bought with her own money a country house and vineyards, which were for sale in Löschwitz for the purpose of a home wherein she could nurse wounded soldiers, and such persons as were without friends, and take good care of them.

She had so many applications for beds, of which there were but forty, that it was impossible to supply them all, but to those who were fortunate enough to be received, she was a devoted nurse and friend. Unhappily she died some six or seven years after the home was started, and her work would have come to an end, but for the good queen who came forward, and out of her own private purse bought the estate, so that now under her presidency the work goes on as in the time of the founder.

The house is in such a lovely, peaceful, and healthful spot, that it has been thought well to use part of it as a convalescent home for consumptive and weak people; and now and then a patient who only wants rest and good country air to complete her recovery is sent from the Carola House with which this home is in combination.

There is a small endowment, but though some patients are received without payments, the majority of them pay. These last have private rooms; those of the first-class are extremely home-like and comfortable, with couch, easy-chair, bed, and table, and a delightful view from the window. This costs ten shillings a day, which includes everything, doctor, medicine, nursing, and food.

The second-class rooms differ a little in the class of furniture, but not enough to touch the comfort of the patients—these cost a little more than five shillings a day, including everything.

The small wards of six and eight beds had an air of comfort and cheeriness about them which the patients seemed to recognise and reflect.

The home is in the care of Albertinerins, and therefore the nursery and arrangements are all good—the only want we observed was that it had not enough sisters for the work.

All the sisters must serve here for six months out of the three years, and learn to cook.

There is a beautiful garden surrounded by woods and running brooks, where the patients spend much of their time in summer. It would be difficult to find a spot better calculated to revive and strengthen the weak.

Our next visit was to the Children's Hospital, quite a small one, and one which receives no infectious case. Poor children pay forty pfennings, or 5*d.* a day, but if very ill and too poor to pay an exception is made, and they are taken in freely.

This little hospital is also under the care of the Albertinerins, but the work is certainly too hard and incessant for the very few who can be spared to attend to it.

Small as it is for in-patients, eleven beds only, a good work is carried on for out-patients, who attend on certain days in the week, two being set aside for medical cases and two for surgical. Although small, both operating-room and dispensary are good.

They are very short of hands in this hospital—the day we were there the servant had been taken ill, and the poor sister looked almost bewildered with work and anxiety. It is of real service to the new part of Dresden, but money is wanted for renovating and enlarging the building.

"We praise Thee, we bless Thee."

HARVEST THANKSGIVING.

Words by EMILY H. HICKEY.

Music by MYLES B. FOSTER.

high of all
all things low and high, Of all things, all things, low and high. . . .
high of all
f ff
Solo Bass (or all the Basses).
mf
2. We praise Thee, we bless Thee, O dim.
molto cres.
Joy of all our joys! We come be-fore Thy pre-sence, And make a joy-ful noise. We f
cres.
bless Thee in our glad-ness, We lift our hearts to Thee, O good and lov-ing Giv-er, O mf
cres.
cres.
good and lov-ing Giv-er Of all pros-per-i-ty. We praise Thee, we bless Thee!
f cres. molto.

3. We praise Thee, we bless Thee, For kind - ly fruits of earth, Thy own right hand's be- stow - ing, Which kind - ly fruits of earth,
knows nor stint nor dearth, knows no stint, Which knows nor stint nor dearth: We bless Thee for the knows nor stint nor dearth, harvest Whereby we shall be fed, Who live by Thee, our Fa-ther, And not a- lone by bread, And not a -
Where - by we shall be fed, bread, And
- lone a - lone by bread.
not

Soprano Solo (or all the Sopranos).
4. We praise Thee, we bless Thee, That now we come to meet In fel - low-ship as breth - ren Be - fore Thy mer - cy - seat, Our heart - y thanks to ren - der For all Thou giv - est here, And most for gift most pre - cious—Thy Christ, our Sa - viour dear. Thy Christ! our Sa - viour!
5. We praise Thee, we bless Thee, With grateful hearts a - glow; We fain would love Thee great-ly, Who We fain would love, would love Thee great-ly, Who lov'dst Thy children so,

lov'dst Thy chil - dren, Who lov'dst Thy children so.
We thank Thee for the
lov'dst Thy chil-dren so,
har - vest Now safe in - gath - er - èd, But more for Him Thou gav - est To Now safe in - gath - er - èd,
Bread, To be
be our Liv - ing Bread, To be, to be our Liv - ing Bread. A - men.
Bread To be
R.H.

THE LESSON OF THE HARVEST.

HARVEST does not fall at the close of the year, when it has grown old and faded and drear. The fulness of fruition arrives while summer still flushes the land with joy and beauty; while the glow of sunshine and colour and bloom are rich; and the lusty vigour of vegetation is a thing of glory.

The purple heather and yellow gorse are magnificent upon the moor; the poppy and starry marguerite in the field; the honeysuckle masses itself upon the hedges, and flings long, embracing arms around the trees; the pink bramble has begun to throw out crimson and orange flames upon its leaves, and to change to deep violet its bunches of green and red berries.

In the gardens, the white and pink roses have cast their petals, but the deeper crimson ones and the creamy Gloire de Dijons are exquisite in contrast; the magnolia's ivory cups scent the air from among its dark green leaves: the dahlia, the hollyhock, and the sunflower raise their stateliness on high; and the ground is carpeted with the richly-blended and many-varied tints of scarlet and crimson, orange and gold, purple and lilac, pale rose colour, blue and white.

The hop wreathes its tendrils aloft; the vine lets its tempting clusters droop; the mulberry sheds its luscious fruit till the grass beneath is deeply covered with it; the fig and the pear put forth their swelling drops of fruit; the peach is velvety, the apricot golden, the plum radiant with the hues of the carbuncle and the topaz.

The fields are white with harvest; the sickle is put in, and the labourers rear the ripened grain, in long lines of amber stooks, upon the shaven ground of paly green.

Yes, the year is at its fullest, and richest, and best when the harvest is ripe, and the husbandman garners it in. "A neck! A neck! A neck!" he cries, with musical intonation of triumph, according to old customs, when he cuts the last handful of wheat. He binds it up with the choicest flowers, and carries it home, to be the ornament and pride of the cottage house-place. The harvest home is one sound of rejoicing, and song, and feasting, and laughter; no one dreams of lamenting over it. The rich grain has been a thing of beauty from the first. When the patient oxen and horses traced the long furrow, glistening with moisture in the bright February morning, while the larks sang madly overhead; when the springing blade cast an emerald hue over the fields, and the hedgerows budded, and primroses starred them; when gentle summer breezes wafted the heavy heads dreamily, this way and that, in the languor of heat, and the poppy and cornbottle and ox-eyed daisy gave an undertone of brilliancy to the shifting waves of amber overhead; when the graceful sheaves dotted the stubble, and, with their hour-glass shape, spoke in silence their message that "Time was, time is" —from first to last it has been a beautiful thing.

And now its form is changed; it becomes bread for the use and sustenance of man, and gladdens his home.

But this beauty, this richness, this valuable food, is only raised by much toil and labour. In the sweat of his brow does the ploughman trace the furrow; with weary steps the sower casts in his seed; the reaper and the binder, the labourer who garners it, the thresher, the miller, the handmaid, all work with much drudgery and weariness of the flesh before the end is gained.

Like the wheat was the heart of the man who stood leaning upon the gate of the field, looking upon it. There were weeds in it, certainly, but the golden and full ear rose above them, concealing all but their innocent loveliness, for they had never been permitted to overgrow or crowd out the corn.

This man's soul had matured through much sorrow and pain. Boyhood had been orphaned by a terrible tragedy; growth had been marked by illness and loneliness, by lack of sympathy with and appreciation of his gifts. Indeed, he was ever but dimly conscious of those himself, nor ever plumed himself upon them. But in early life he read, and mused, and worked hard at whatever his hand found to do; and so he laid the foundation for the superstructure which was to come, without ever casting a thought as to what that superstructure should be.

Wordsworth might have known this man when he wrote of those—> glad hearts, without reproach or blot,

> Who do God's work, and know it not.

He possessed a fine person beyond the ordinary, yet valued not his beauty, though it caused him to be admired by all. He possessed a kindly smile, a cheery voice, a genial manner, all of which won him favour; yet his retiring nature caused him to make few friends, for it was seldom that he found any who possessed the answering chord to his inner thoughts, and he could not lay them bare without that.

Had he not owned a home, a wife and children to whom alone he was perfectly known, in his weakness and in his strength, he would have been indeed a lonely man. As it was, they satisfied him, and he rarely sought companionship beyond.

His tastes were so simple that it was hard to think that loss and ruin of worldly means should have fallen upon him to such extent as to take from him all power of gratifying them for the chief part of his life. Mortification upon mortification, deprivation upon deprivation, succeeded; he had to take a low place in the social scale; to toil for long weary hours at ignoble work; without recognition of his services, with no scope for his talents, labouring hard for daily bread. He was slighted, and despised, and overlooked by men richer than he, but far inferior in every quality which makes a man worth knowing; yet bravely and meekly he accepted his lot, and patiently performed his task; his fine intellect discovering interest and scope for thought in many directions; raising his work to himself, never sinking himself in the paucity of the daily life which he led.

Was it said that this man made few friends? Perhaps yes, among the prosperous and the great; but his friends' name was Legion among the poor, the suffering, the erring, the needy. He had little or no money to give, but he gave his time, his thoughts, his energies, his talents in their service, and none fell under his influence without being better men. They loved him dearly.

"He is the father of us all," said one day a hoary old sinner, a grandfather himself, when the object of his praise was still a fine, handsome young man.

But, alas! young, and handsome, and gifted, and worthy of love as he was, a sad accident ruined his health; and for years he needed to contend with weakness, and pain, and suffering, in addition to poverty. Time after time did he struggle with illness of the direst description; time after time did he face death; time after time was he raised from his bed, pale, emaciated, exhausted with the battle, yet undaunted, and ever ready to take up his work once more.

Fifty years of life were thus spent, when he drifted into a quiet, peaceful haven, where friends gathered round him; where his talents found a scope; where the knowledge gained by such painful experience gave him a voice; where he was known, and appreciated, and valued, in a manner which gave him the greatest surprise, and the most innocent pleasure.

For a few short years, the sense of security and peace, the beauties of Nature, the comfort in his children, the kindliness of his neighbours, the sense of usefulness, were all separate and keenly-enjoyed pleasures; and then came his Harvest.

In the prime of life, at the close of an honourable day's work, in the midst of cheerful talk with pleasant friends, on his way to his happy home, his Lord said, "Come," and he went—at a moment's notice.

"Home he went, and took his wages," leaving behind him a widespread circle, who sorrowed most of all to think that they should see his face no more in this world, which to them must ever be emptier without it.

The seed was sown in sorrow, and cultured with tears and pain; but the harvest was plentiful—its name was peace. Shall we weep and mourn over it? Or shall we not rather deem it a blessed privilege when such a life is lived among us so full of quiet beauty, and we have seen it end, like the close of the husbandman's day, when he goes home rejoicing, and bearing sheaves with him. G. N.

On a Foxglove growing in a chink of a House-Wall.

HIGH and stately—high and stately,
From a crevice in the wall,
Grew erect, in queenly beauty,
Pure and fair, a foxglove tall.

With its white bells chastely drooping,
In that narrow cleft it stood,
Far from all the wild surroundings
Of its sisters in the wood.

Ah, how came it there, I whispered,
Far away from cooling stream,
Far away from upland copses,
Where the lights and shadows gleam?

Did a winged fairy, passing,
Cast unseen the tiny seed?
Did the goldfinch or the linnet
Drop it, giving little heed?

This I wot not, but it standeth
As a messenger from Heaven;
And I caught its voiceless teaching,
This the lesson it hath given:

"Drop thy seed in spots forbidding,
On the hard heart let it fall,
It shall rise in grace and beauty,
Like the foxglove on the wall."

M. E. BECK.

Sabbath Thoughts.

LOVE TO GOD.

"I love Thee, O Lord, my strength."—Psa. xviii. 1, R.V.

THIS is a stronger, fuller utterance than that of the A.V. "I will love thee." It is like the apostle's answer to the question of his Lord, "Lovest thou Me? Yea, Lord Thou knowest that I love Thee." John xxi. 15. What was it that opened the flood-gates of David's heart and caused this gush of love? It was the thought of all that the Lord was to him; "herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us." Filled with gratitude, David tells over the story of mercies manifold, in image after image; expressing his sense of the security he found in God by recalling his former days of perilous wanderings when he hid himself from his enemies in the dens and caves of the mountains. Even thus he now found safety from the more formidable enemies of his soul, in the Lord his strength, his rock, fortress, deliverer, shield, horn of salvation, high tower; and he ends with the firm resolve, "In Him will I trust." Well might he sing, "I love thee, O Lord, my strength!"

There is a rock in which the Christian may hide and find safety. There is One who says "Come unto Me," and those who obey that Voice of love may say,

Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee!

And yet how slow are our hearts to respond to the question asked of Simon Peter!

Lord, it is my chief complaint
That my love is cold and faint;
Yet I love Thee and adore,
Oh for grace to love Thee more!

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

CHAPTER VIII.—A FAITHFUL FRIEND.

THE next morning Mrs. Danby was standing in the kitchen, talking to Ann about dinner, when there came a knock at the back door. In another moment it was opened, and a rough unkempt head thrust inside, with a dirty hand holding out a letter.

The lady was too much astonished to speak, but Ann had recognized the rough messenger. "What is it you want?" she said, a little sharply.

"I've brought this from the old gent, and I'm to wait for answer," said Jack, who had rushed off in the midst of blacking his boots, without waiting to make himself tidy.

"For me?" uttered Mrs. Danby, when Ann handed her the letter, and without attempting to touch it, she looked again at Jack, and his blacking-besmeared face. He had no intention of giving offence, or showing any sort of disrespect by the way he had run out—it was rather an excess of zeal to serve his patron promptly that had induced him to rush off with the note the moment it was handed to him, instead of laying it aside until his work was finished.

But Mrs. Danby was not to know this, and she was not the sort of woman to make any allowance for a breach of decorum, and so it was with a feeling of indignant surprise that she took the letter, and carried it out of the kitchen.

"I say! the old gent's come back, that was here last autumn," said Jack when Mrs. Danby was out of sight; "He's a real good un, he is, and that letter comes from him."

"Does it?" said Ann, who was scarcely less astonished than her mistress had been. Then the parlour bell rang, and she went to see what was wanted.

She found her mistress standing by the table, looking very flushed and angry. "Tell that boy to say to his master, that I never receive visitors," she exclaimed as Ann opened the door.

"It's the gentleman who was here in the autumn," remarked Ann.

"Yes, he's come prying here again, to find out my business," replied the lady, in the same indignant tone.

"Wouldn't you write the answer?" suggested Ann, who exercised the privilege of an old servant with her mistress.

"No, I will not. To send such a messenger to me!" she exclaimed indignantly; "tell him what I say, and send him off at once."

So Ann went back with the message, but feeling very reluctant to deliver it. It would only have been courteous to send back a written reply she thought, but when Mrs. Danby took offence at anything, it was useless to argue with her, so Ann vented her annoyance upon the innocent cause of it when she saw him.

"You're paid to black your face, I suppose, instead of the boots," she said. "Couldn't the hotel afford to send a decent messenger to a lady's house, and not a blackamoor like you?"

Jack looked astonished. "I was good enough to carry the letter. I held it in a bit of paper, so I shouldn't dirty it, and who'd ha' thought of seeing a lady in the kitchen? I come this way a purpose people shouldn't see me," remonstrated Jack, as though he was injured by the lady being in her own kitchen.

"Well, I can't stay talking to you. Tell the gentleman Mrs. Danby never receives visitors."

"Where's the note? The chambermaid said I was to bring a note back."

"There's none to take," said Ann in a snappish tone; "mind the message now, Mrs. Danby never receives visitors."

"Is that all?" uttered Jack in a tone of surprise. "Well, if you Danbys aren't the——"

"Just be off with your impudence, now," snapped Ann; "what do you know about the Danbys?"

"A deal too much," said saucy Jack, as he turned on his heel and went off whistling in a meditative fashion.

For the rest of the day Mrs. Danby kept the boys at home, for she felt too angry to let them go where they were likely to meet their old friend, although they would not have seen him then, for he did not go to the pavilion, having a good many letters to write, and feeling more than a little hurt at the unceremonious way in which his advances had been repelled.

"And so there has been no news from your father lately?" The speaker was Mr. Robinson, and he sat in a sheltered nook of the "ruins," with Bertie Danby beside him, while Tommy was searching for the early buttercups in a grassy dell below.

It was a lovely day—one of those summer-like days that sometimes find their way into the midst of changeful May—and after some little difficulty, and a good deal of persuasion on Ann's part, Mrs. Danby had consented to the boys going with their unknown friend for the promised drive.

They were a merry party along the road, each enjoying themselves to the full, but after the basket of sandwiches and cake they had brought with them had been eaten at the ruins, Bertie had grown thoughtful, and the first question about his father brought back the grave look to his face that had so often been there of late.

"I can't understand things at all," said the little boy with a look of perplexity; "Ann said if I prayed, God would send papa home to take care of us. But he hasn't come, and—and yet," and Bertie hesitated and stammered, until his friend helped him out by saying, "And yet you are being cared for by somebody. Is that what you mean, my boy?"

"Yes, that's it. I heard mamma tell Ann she need not worry any longer, everything was going on comfortable now; and yet papa has not come home," said the little boy with a sigh.

"Then God has heard, and is answering your prayers, my boy," said the gentleman in a gentle tone.

But Bertie shook his head. "I've been thinking about it lately, sir, and I don't think He can."

"But why not, my boy?"

"Well, what Jack said the other day about us is true, and I don't think the Danbys have ever cared about God, or anybody else, and so——"

"And so you think He cannot care for you?"

"Yes, that's it," said Bertie, relieved to find that his difficulties were understood.

"But, my boy, God loves us with a higher, better love than we love each other."

"But we've got to love Him too," said Bertie; "and we Danbys only care to please ourselves. Jack said it, and I thought he was very rude, but it's true enough, and so I don't see how it can be that God has answered my prayers."

"Because you do not think God loves you. But suppose you heard of some man doing this."

"Doing what?"

"Trying to help those who would have nothing to do with him."

Bertie shook his head. "He would soon give up helping them," he said; "I would, I know."

"Ah! but suppose you loved the people," said the gentleman with a smile.

"But I shouldn't love them," protested Bertie; "if they wouldn't speak to me, and were so disagreeable, I shouldn't try to help them; they would not deserve it."

"Well, now let me tell you a story about a man I know. He'd been away in foreign countries a good many years, and all his friends had forgotten him, and when he came home, instead of finding them rich and comfortable as he expected, he found them very poor, and was told that they had wasted their time and their money."

"Then they deserved to be poor," interrupted Bertie.

"Well, perhaps some of them did deserve it; I think they did myself, for they had been selfish, and thoughtless about other people, as well as themselves; but their little children could not prevent their parents doing these things, and my friend thought of this, and devised a plan to help them. They were very poor now, but he did not want to hurt their feelings, so, without telling them a word of what he meant to do, he asked them to do something for him; it wasn't a very great service, only what most people would have done, but these people had got so selfish that they refused to do it."

"And then he gave them up," said Bertie, quickly; he had grown deeply interested in the story.

"He was going to do it, I believe," said Mr. Robinson with a smile, "but he learned a lesson from a little boy about that time—the child taught him that he ought to try again."

"He must have been a very clever boy," remarked Bertie.

"Well, he was a boy who had begun to try to do right himself, and that taught my friend that he ought to do the same, whatever came of it; and so he set himself to think of another plan by which he might be able to help these people."

"What! the people who wouldn't be kind, or do anything for him, to give him a chance of helping them!" exclaimed Bertie.

"Yes, the very same," replied the gentleman; "God sent a message to him by the little boy first—two messages in fact, for the first had been given some time before, which was to tell him to try and help these people; and then the second was, that he should try again, as he had failed the first time; and then God spoke Himself, and said that He wanted him to do for these just what had been done for himself; for my friend had learned to know that God was caring for him years and years before he had ever thought about it; for he had been just as thoughtless and careless as his relations were at one time."

"And did he go on helping them?" asked Bertie with breathless interest.

"Yes; he found out a way after some little time, but it was not easy, and there was a good deal of trouble and money to be spent, before anything could be done by which their distress could be relieved, so that they had weeks of anxiety and worry and poverty that might have been prevented if he could have got about the business as he had at first devised."

"I wonder he took so much trouble," remarked Bertie. "I suppose they were glad enough to see him after he had helped them?"

"Well, no. I believe there was some little misunderstanding about the messenger he sent the letter by; I know he asked to be allowed to call and see these relations, but I don't think he told them who he was, or that he had helped them, only that he had called before, and that he was an old friend, and wanted to be a friend still."

"And these people wouldn't see the man who had done so much for them?" exclaimed Bertie indignantly.

"No, they wouldn't, but then they did not know that it was he who had been helping them all this time. Now don't you see what I have been telling you this story for? God told this man that he was to be to these relations of his just what God had been to him for years and years—their friend, whether they cared for him or not."

"Did God speak very loud to the man?" asked Tommy, who had come to show his flowers, but forgot to do so in the interest of listening.

"Not that time. My friend had learned to listen to the 'still small voice' that speaks in the hearts of little boys and girls, as well as men and women—the voice that never grows loud, if they listen and obey it when they are young."

"But why don't God listen to us?" asked Tommy. "Bertie prayed to God to bring papa back a long time ago—the time we first met you."

The gentleman looked into the little boy's face and smiled as he said, "Ah! I know God was listening to you little boys that night, and the answer came to the street door, but then you shut it out, instead of letting it in." He laughed at the puzzled faces of the boys as he said this, but he thought he had already gone far enough, and so, rising from his seat, he proposed that they should climb once more to the top of the ivy-covered tower, while the horses were being put into the carriage.

The bright sunshine for a time dispelled all the serious thoughts and questionings that arose in Bertie's mind, which was just what his friend intended, and he told them a most wonderful bear story while they were sitting at the top of the tower, that made the boys laugh until the echoes of the old ruins rang with the merry sounds.

Then they drove back by a different route to Beachcliff, and fresh sights and new wonders were constantly arising to excite and interest them.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMAS.

NO. XV.—p. 494.—RUTH.

1. R-ain.	Matt. v. 45.
2. U-z	Job i. 1.
3 T-en	Luke xvii. 17.
4. H-iel	Josh. vi. 26; 1 Kings xvi. 34.

NO. XVI.—p. 528.—LYDIA.

1. L-ocusts	Ex. x. 13-15.
2. Y-ea	Mark vii. 25.
3. D-agon	1 Sam. v. 1-4.
4. I-ncense (marg. trans.).	Rev. v. 8, 3.
5. A-hinoam	1 Sam. xi.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

RALPH ELLISON'S OPPORTUNITY.

CHAPTER VIII.

HE HAD EVIDENTLY FAINTED.

JOSIE was nineteen—it was Christmas time, and once more there was a feast spread in Sandbury, to which she and the minister were bidden. Ralph was no longer an unfamiliar guest at the tea and dinner tables of his people, and though to the last of his days a certain habit of reserve clung to him uneasily, forbidding him to shine in the social world, he was everywhere received with honour and respect.

The passage of the years had made their mark on him; he was no more than fifty-seven but already he was an old man; the lines on his face deep-cut and his hair white. For seven years he had nourished his wrongs with the promise of revenge, and though for twice seven more he had been at peace, he still bore about with him the scars of that old struggle. The conditions of his life remained otherwise unchanged; he lived on in the house to which he had come long ago, and though the march of progress had wrought changes on the face of England, so slow was her foot in this quiet corner that it still remained in its early isolation, a house apart, a straggler between town and sea. When Mrs. Lamb died, he became its tenant, Josie taking the reins of government into her own capable little hands, and managing the minister and the menage with a zeal that was held to be a shining example to other maidens.

The years that had made Ralph old had crowned Josie. At nineteen she had bloomed into a very charming young woman and was still without a rival in Sandbury, where, by a certain candour, ingenious simplicity, and spontaneous sympathy, she had conquered her little world.

No easy feat, for even to be beautiful, young, and good is not always to win love.

Between her and Ralph the tie was deeper with the passing months and years; a fine and close relation that escapes analysis; she was daughter, companion, friend, to Ralph, and more than these, for she had led him back from death to life.

On the night in question she wore a dress of pale, prim lavender with a big white collar that fell over her shoulders with quaint effect; her face was lit up with a deep smile of happiness, as she busied herself counting a number of small parcels which she dropped one by one into a basket at her side.

"Twenty-five," she said, letting her hands fall with a gesture of satisfaction. She looked across the table and asked Ralph doubtfully—

"Shall we have time to deliver them as we go, do you think?"

He was watching her—idle himself—with a grave smile, and reading the wistfulness in her eyes he answered decidedly—

"We'll make time."

She came round the table as if to thank him.

"It wouldn't seem quite like Christmas-eve unless they had the tea and things to-night," she said. "And it would seem only half Christmas-eve if you weren't there to give them."

He shook his head.

"They would like them better coming from you, my child."

It was Josie's turn to shake her curls in denial and smile unbelievingly. She knew him better than he knew himself.

The old and the sick and the sorrowful sent for him now, with an instinct that he who had taken "that deepened gaze into life," which trouble means, could help them in their need. The cross of Christ had now for him a new significance; it had become a source of consolation and strength, by which he was enabled to minister to others. After all, it mattered little that he had no ready coin of small talk to barter at the tea-tables, when his harsh voice could grow gentle and his strenuous face soften at sight of a brother's sufferings.

"Any fool can smile and chatter," cried old Mrs. Sturtle, who was now his firmest ally and friend, "but when you're in the grip of pain with death comin' for you round the corner, you want somebody as can do more than grin and pass you on the last gossip. It ain't a neighbour's doin's that concerns you then."

"Then I must brush you and make you smart," said Josie, in answer to Ralph's suggestion, "and we must set out. It is three o'clock and Mrs. Brown's dinner is fixed for five, such a dissipated hour for Sandbury that it won't do for us to keep them waiting, and you must give each of the old people five minutes at the very least, or they will grumble."

She had finished her little preparations and had tied her bright face into a tunnel-like poke bonnet, where, though it was difficult of access, it lost none of its charms. She was about to wrap the splendours of her new gown in a big cloak, when both she and the minister—who was doing his masculine part of idle on-looking—were startled by a sudden loud, single knock at the door. It was a peculiar knock; if one were superstitious one might call it the summons of some unpropitious fate; if one were unimaginative one would prefer to refer it to the last effort of some one who was either not tall enough to reach the knocker, or who had exhausted his strength in that one appeal.

They looked at each other.

"If it should be some sick person who has sent for me, I must go," said Ralph, hazarding a guess.

Josie's face fell. She did not want any one to be ill to-night. Then it occurred to her that the simplest solution was to open the door.

"Sarah is out," she said. "Stay here, guardian, I will come at once and tell you."

She ran downstairs already considering how she should readjust her plans if he should be called away. The afternoon was thick and dark already with the presage of storm in it, and as she opened the door a blast of chill air swept in from the sea. Her eyes, dazzled with the sudden change from the light within, could make out nothing certain at first. Then, as they grew accustomed to the outer gloom, she noticed a dark heap huddled on the step, half fallen, half reclining against the lintel. Her heart gave a great throb, but she had the courage of good health and unshaken nerves. She stooped down.

"Who are you?" she asked. "Can you tell me what you want?—are you ill?"

No answer came to her out of the darkness, and rising she fetched the lamp that stood on a little bracket and held it close to the outlined figure. Then she saw that it was a man—an old man, she would have said; she noticed in her quick glance that he was well and even carefully dressed, but he looked very ill; he had evidently fainted, perhaps from exposure to the cold wintry air. She loosed the cravat about his throat and tried to drag him into the house, but her strength was not equal to the task. Then she heard Ralph's step on the stair.

"It is some one—a gentleman, I think, who seems to be ill, we must lift him in out of the cold."

Ralph took the lamp from her and turned it on the stranger. He bent down over him.

"He has been drinking," he said to himself, and he hesitated a moment, not unnaturally, for one's charity is apt to cool before this form of misfortune.

Josie looked up at him and her voice had a faint edge of reproach.

"We can't leave him here," she said, "and there is no one else to whom we can send him."

That was true, and it ended his indecision. Ralph was a tall man and strong still. He lifted the stranger with something of an effort, but still without supreme difficulty, and carried him into a little room on the right hand of the door, Josie running before to light the way. Here on the broad and ample horse-hair sofa, which had been the chief pride of Mrs. Lamb's room, they laid him.

"There's an end to the parties and the tea-giving, and Mrs. Brown's dinner," he said dryly.

Josie looked up at him with momentary dismay, not having considered this consequence of her charitable impulse, but she immediately rallied.

"We couldn't have enjoyed the party if we had left him on our door-step," she said cheerfully; "perhaps he will get better soon and we may be able to go after all. Shall I light the fire?"

"Yes, dear, I think you must, or bring some sticks and I will do it; he is wet through—as wet as if he had been in the sea."

"Poor man," said Josie, her young compassion stirred; "what a good thing it was he found his way here before we had left the house."

She lit two candles that stood on the mantelpiece, and ran away to make her preparations. She was not absent many minutes, though she had taken time to lay aside her bravery and put on a plain gown before she returned with the sticks in her apron, but those few moments had sufficed to work a great change in Ralph.

He knelt by the table, he had buried his head in his hands, the candle he had held overturned at his side.

"My enemy," he was saying to himself in a strange hoarse voice, "my enemy—after all these years you have found me out!"

Josie let fall her sticks in her sudden agitation. She forgot the stranger, she only thought of Ralph. She put her arms round him. "Dear," she cried, "are you ill too? you speak so strangely, oh, tell me what is it? what has happened?"

At the sound of her voice Ralph looked up; he was shaking all over, and his face was haggard.

"It is the dead come to life again," he groaned; "come back to torment me, to tempt me. It is my enemy whom I have sheltered under my roof; I should know him among a million."

Josie glanced fearfully at the figure on the sofa. His enemy? She was too bewildered to think clearly, but she suddenly noticed that the stranger was no longer unconscious. He moved from side to side and muttered incoherently.

"He looks very ill," she said; and then at the prompting of that divine compassion that makes of a woman an angel in the sick-room, she conquered her fears, her nameless dread.

"If he has ever hurt you, he cannot hurt you now," she said firmly. "He is ill and helpless, we took him in not knowing who he was, and we must do our best to make him well. He is going to have a fever, I think, you must go for the doctor and I will watch."

She had spoken slowly and with decision, as if to a child; for the moment she was the calmer and the stronger of the two, his adviser and protector, and he listened in silence till she spoke of keeping watch alone.

"No, no," he said, with sudden fierceness, "not you, I will not leave you with him, he is your enemy too."

"Then," said Josie after a moment's pause, "I will go for the doctor and you will remain. Here are the sticks for the fire, you must light it at once and get him into dry clothes. I will bring you some."

Her firmness so far controlled him that he obeyed her, and she waited to see him begin his task before she set out.

The old hate which he had thought dead had leaped into sudden life at the sight of Henry Vane, but the years of control, of gentler judgment had not lost all their force. The remembrance of Mary Hughes's dying words came to him as he knelt by the fire—"The moment of your meeting will be your opportunity."

He looked up as Josie still faltered at his side, fearing to leave him. His face still worked strangely, but he summoned a wan smile. "Kiss me, Josie, and then go, you need not fear for me, my child."

She was naturally brave, and even if she had been timid the strange excitement of the moment would have sustained her and helped her to overcome her fears. The wild black night and the lonely road had no terrors for her; the boom of the sea on the beach was a familiar sound, and even with the enveloping veil of storm to wrap the well-known landmarks she did not falter or lose her way on the sandy track that led to the town.

If any ghost went with her, knocking with its terrors at her heart, it was summoned by those strange words her guardian had spoken.

His enemy—and hers—this stranger whom they had sheltered? She cowered before the image they conjured up; they spoke of a past of which she knew nothing, had never so much as touched on in her imagination; a dark abyss on which the light had been suddenly turned. That he had had sorrows, disappointments, she knew, for he bore their marks on his face; that he had been weak and morbid, perhaps she knew too, though she had never made the admission even in her inmost thoughts, but here were the elements of an unguessed tragedy from which she shrank in dread.

But it was not in her to be disloyal to him even passingly, and presently her emotions resolved themselves into a profound compassion for him and a great tenderness for all his silently borne pain.

She ran on the faster spurred by her love, and soon she reached the fog-bedimmed lights that skirted the streets of the little town.

She drew her hood and cloak closer about her, it was still early in the evening, though it was so dark, but the streets were deserted and no one hindered or questioned her. All Sandbury was making merry, shut in snugly from the gloom; sometimes a brighter radiance would glance across the wet streets, and through uncurtained windows she had glimpses of family life; a laugh would ring out to her or the tinkle of a piano briskly touched would make its way to her ear. Then she thought of the lonely man in the lonely house by the sea, and she urged her hurrying feet to a yet quicker pace. By good chance she remembered that Dr. Rose was one of the invited guests whom she and the minister were asked to meet at Mrs. Brown's, and she caught him in the act of leaving his own doorstep.

After his first astonishment at seeing her he resignedly yielded himself, as one accustomed to have his pleasures snatched from him in the moment of their arrival. He put on his professional manner with his great coat; and asking her a few quick questions and leaving a message on his slate, he prepared to go home with her.

"Why the night is as dark as ink," he said when they stood together on the pavement. "There's no safety except on one's feet, and not too much anywhere. And you mean to tell me, Miss Josie, you came up here alone?"

"Oh yes," said Josie simply, "I know the way very well, and I'm not afraid."

The wind which had helped her in going, coming as it did from the sea, was now dead against them. She took his arm and they struggled on in the teeth of it, but she was inwardly glad that neither of them had breath left for words. She shrank, she scarcely knew why, from his questions.

They found Ralph sitting near his patient, apparently calm and collected, but Josie was struck by his pallor and the look of rigid control which his face wore. He rose and shook hands silently with the doctor, who at once gave all his attention to the sick man. He had been undressed, the large old sofa having been made into a temporary bed. Josie noticed that the minister must have ransacked the house to provide sheets and blankets; he had done what he could for his enemy. She would have slipped away when she had ushered the doctor in, but Ralph held out a hand to her. She took it in both her own, and sank down on the rug beside him. She was beginning now to feel her weariness.

When the doctor had made his examination he turned round to the fire and seemed to have leisure to be curious.

"Do you know anything of this fellow?" he asked.

"I knew him many years ago," said Ralph, speaking steadily, but with an evident effort. "His name is Vane—Henry Vane." He paused as if he wished to impress this on himself, then he added—

"I believed him to have died years since."

"H'm," said the doctor, looking with a sharp sidelong glance at Ralph.

"It isn't his fault that he's alive. Wouldn't have been by this time if you and Miss Josie hadn't taken pity on him."

"Is he seriously ill?"

"Yes, and no; he may be all right after a good sleep, or there may be further complications. When a man has played fast and loose with his constitution, you may be prepared for anything. He's quiet enough now, but he must be watched. I might send you a man or woman in the morning—not a son of Adam would budge from his fireside and his glass to-night for love or money."

"I will watch by him," said Ralph quietly, but Josie felt the fingers in her own tremble. "Tell me what to do."

"H'm," said the doctor again, "here's one thing you must not do; I thought as much." He had quietly picked up the sick man's coat and searched the pockets. He now drew out a large flask nearly full of brandy.

"Not a drop of this if he should murder you for it. He'll keep in his present state, most likely, but if he turns restless, you can give him this—by good luck I brought it with me,"—he laid a little phial on the table—"that will quiet him, and I'll look round in the morning and see how you are getting on."

"Miss Josie," he turned suddenly to the girl, "I don't want to have two patients on my hands—on Christmas day too, so I am going to prescribe for you before you send for me. You go off to bed and sleep till the church bells wake you."

"Let me stay with you, guardian," whispered Josie entreatingly, but he faintly shook his head.

When the doctor had gone he stooped and gathered her with a passionate gesture to his heart. He had never been so tender in all the happy years of his fatherhood, and her daughterhood; he had never seemed to love her as he loved her now. He would not let her linger, he carried her as if she were the little Josie of long ago, in his arms to her room, and there in its white silence, with the hateful presence of the stranger shut out, he knelt with her, still holding her by the hand, and poured out his whole soul in prayer.

Never before had she heard such passionate pleading; the very life of him seemed to go out in the anguished cry—"Forgive us as we forgive—lead us not into temptation!"

She never forgot the awing solemnity of that moment when he wrestled, as if with the unseen powers of darkness and prevailed. Yes, she knew that he had conquered by the kiss he gave her when he left her; but what untold depths of pain must he not have fathomed to be moved after all these years like this?

The tears fell thick on her pillow that night, and she only checked her sobbing to sit up in the darkness and listen with strained ear if all were still below.

The first dark shadow had fallen across her life's sunshine, but as yet her grief was all for him.

MISSION WORK AMONGST THE MOHAMMEDANS IN INDIA.

"AB hostibus disce." We may perhaps be able to obtain information on the vexed question, as to whether missions to Mohammedans are a success or a failure, from those who are our avowed foes.

The Indian Magazine recently had a most instructive article on "Mohammedan Societies in the Punjab," written by one who is evidently a member of the most prominent of these societies. The paper throws a strong side-light on the social and religious condition of the Mussulman community in that province which, with the North-West Province, has had the reputation of being the chief stronghold of Islam in India.

Within the last twenty years, we are told, Mohammedan India has undergone a remarkable change. The dread of Western education is gradually passing away; and the middle classes of the Moslem community are awaking to the fact that they have been left far behind by all their fellow-subjects in the race for knowledge, for political and social advance. The author of the article speaks in the most significant manner "of the limbs (of the Moslem community) which have through long disuse grown feeble and incapable of work, and which have, to some extent only, been restored to their former vigour and vitality by the infusion of fresh blood." One of the chief reasons of the ignorance and poverty of the lower classes, the author sees in "the stoic indifference with which the aristocratic classes regard the misery which surrounds them on all sides." Far different from the wealthy Hindus, they, the raises of Lahore, are "the slaves of indolence and luxury." It is not, however, with the condition of the Mohammedans of the Punjab, described as it is by one of them, but with the strange revival that has come over them and with its causes, "the powerful influences ceaselessly at work beneath the calm unruffled surface of society," that we are now concerned. That revival has given birth to a number of societies (anjumans) in Lahore, some of an aristocratic, others of a more general character, some secular, others of a strictly religious nature. The leading moulvies, the Moslem clergy, have been enrolled in one or the other of these anjumans; they themselves have changed under the powerful influence of the current by which they are driven; they have ceased to be the ignorant, fanatical, stiff-necked mullahs they were; they have been advancing with the times. The author leaves no doubt as to what "these secret powerful influences" are, which have at least, if not converted the heart, changed the face of the Mohammedan world.

The most popular of the societies, the Anjuman-i-Himayat-i-Islam, was established primarily with the object of defending the faith of Islam against the attacks of hostile critics, especially the Christian missionaries in the Punjab, whose encroachments on the religion of the Prophet had become unbearable to the mass of the true believers at Lahore. With this object in view, the distinguished founder of the Anjuman, Moulvi Hameed ud Din, the head Qázi of Lahore, and perhaps the most liberal-minded Moulvi in the Punjab, appealed to the religious instincts and deep-seated convictions of educated Mussulmans of all sects and persuasions, to rally round one standard, and swell the war-cry of "Union for the defence of Islam." The stirring appeal met with a generous and hearty response. The Sunni and the Shiá, the Wahábee and the Naturee—men of all shades of religious opinion merged their petty sectarian differences in the one common desire to advance the cause of Islam, and to promote the religious and temporal interests of the whole Mohammedan community.

The objects of this Society may be described as twofold: first, the adoption of measures calculated to spread religious education among the Mohammedans, so as to counteract the influence of anti-Islamic instruction; and secondly, the improvement of the social and intellectual condition of the Mohammedan community.

For the attainment of the first object, the Society has opened a school for children up to the middle standard. The books, the principles of instruction, the standard attained by the pupils, are the same as in the Government schools; but peculiar and characteristic to this establishment is the introduction of text-books for religious instruction, in which "the first principles of Islam are embodied in short sentences."

The strongest testimony, however, to the impression which the labours of missionaries have made, is shown by the attention which Mohammedans are beginning to give to female education. They have opened up, in Lahore alone, as many as ten girls' schools, with altogether 300 pupils; in these schools especial care is bestowed on religious instruction. The reason which the Mohammedan author assigns is characteristic and deserves to be quoted in full. He says:—

"In this movement for female education, as in most other things, the motive principle that has impelled Mohammedans to shake off their apathy has been their instinctive love of religion. They cannot tolerate the slightest disturbance of their settled religious convictions by Christian missionaries in India: they look with grave suspicion on the proselytising efforts of English zenana missions in the Punjab, and have at last determined to repel the inroads of Christianity on the jealously-guarded kingdom of Islam. With a similar object in view the Anjuman has recently inaugurated a sort of missionary movement, and appointed three preachers to diffuse religious knowledge among the masses. These preachers also collect contributions from different parts of the Punjab in aid of female education and similar objects, and are thus a source of pecuniary help to the Anjuman. The funds of the Anjuman at present amount to something like Rs. 10,000, the gross monthly income being about Rs. 300. For the better attainment of its objects, as also for carrying on now and then a religious controversy with the Christian missionaries in the Punjab, the Anjuman issues a monthly magazine, which, from its soft and moderate tone, seems to be very well conducted, and has now attained a circulation of 1,600 copies. An orphanage has also recently been established for sheltering unprotected youth, and affording every assistance to helpless humanity."

Preachers and catechists, zenana missions and orphanages are things which have been hitherto associated with the Christian religion. The tone and temper with which Islam, in past ages, has carried on its propaganda has neither been "soft nor moderate." We cannot pay a higher tribute to missions than quote the testimony which a Mohammedan writer has thus unconsciously given of their efficiency. C. MERK.

MRS. HEMANS.

II.

IT would be vain in the present day to point to the longer and more ambitious works of Mrs. Hemans as her title-deeds to remembrance. Even in the height of her popularity these were but dubious successes. Two of them, "Wallace's Invocation to Bruce," and "Dartmoor," won prizes; but who reads prize poems? Few people do now, few did then. It would be difficult to discover any modern student who is well acquainted with these or others of her longer productions. One exception may perhaps be made in the case of the "Forest Sanctuary," already quoted, of which no less a literary authority than George Eliot says, in writing to her friend Miss Lewis:—

"I am reading eclectically Mrs. Hemans's poems, and venture to recommend to your perusal, if unknown to you, one of the longer ones, 'The Forest Sanctuary;' I can give it my pet adjective, —Exquisite."

George Eliot was in sympathy with the religious teaching of Mrs. Hemans when she wrote these lines. But even the critical modern reader may enjoy the poem, which abounds in fine passages of description, and breathes a free and ardent spirit.

The shorter poems and lyrics of Mrs. Hemans are, as a rule, those which best portray her genius. They are musical, tender, and sweet, and deserve a better fate than the partial oblivion into which they have fallen.

Sir Walter Scott complained that the poetry of Mrs. Hemans contained "too many flowers and too little fruit." In other words, it contained too much of the imaginative and emotional. Yet it is this excess of feeling that gives to her poetry one special charm. She was naturally of enthusiastic temperament and lively imagination; her life, in its romantic but somewhat circumscribed surroundings, shadowed by domestic trouble, did not offer much opportunity for enlarging her acquaintance with men and women, or with the world in which she lived. We find no record of foreign travel in her life. Her education too had been far from systematic, and it is wonderful, considering how little outside help she could command, how scanty were her opportunities of instruction, that she contrived to learn French, Italian, Spanish, Portuguese and German;—to learn these languages not only in the smattering style then in vogue, but so as to read them with ease and pleasure, and to translate them fluently into English verse. Translations from Latin also are found in her pages. To use her own words, she "loved to repose under the shadow of mighty names," and there is a long list of poets whose works she has rendered into English.

She was ever ready to identify herself with national life other than her own, as may be seen in her "Lays of Many Lands"; and most of her long poems deal with alien surroundings. When it is remembered how necessary personal acquaintance with scenery is to the right rendering of local colour, it is wonderful that Mrs. Hemans should have succeeded so well in this particular. The primeval forests of North America, the burning plains of Africa, the seas and islands of the sunny South, the ravines of ancient Greece, the lakes and mountains of Switzerland, are all graphically sketched by her untiring pen, in such a way that the reader never is struck by incongruity. A vivid, powerful imagination must have been hers, that could transport her at will far from the world of sense.

Yet, although she could revel in fancy amid the wildest regions of nature, her love lingers round the homelike, peaceful scenes of her own land. She says of Grasmere, for instance:—

> O vale and lake, within your mountain urn,
> Smiling so tranquilly, and set so deep!
> Oft doth your dreamy loveliness return,
> Colouring the tender shadows of my sleep
> With light Elysian.

And again, the same loving tenderness for English homestead scenery is shown in a sonnet called "Orchard Blossoms":—

> Doth thy heart stir within thee at the sight
> Of orchard blooms upon the mossy bough?
> Doth their sweet household-smile waft back the glow
> Of childhood's morn—the wondering, fresh delight
> In earth's new colouring, then all strangely bright,
> A joy of fairyland? Doth some old nook,
> Haunted by visions of thy first-loved book,
> Rise on thy soul, with faint-streaked blossoms white,
> Showered o'er the turf, and the lone primrose knot,
> And robin's nest still faithful to the spot,

And the bee's dreary chime? O gentle friend!
The world's cold breath, not Time's, this life bereaves
Of vernal gifts: Time hallows what he leaves,
And will for us endear spring memories to the end.

The sea, although it had been the companion of her early years, had terror rather than charm for her because of its associations with storm and shipwreck:—

My earliest memories to thy shores are bound,
Thy solemn shores, thou ever-chanting main!
Thy first rich sunsets, kindling thought profound
In my lone being, made thy restless plain
As the vast shining floor of some dread fane
All paved with glass and fire. Yet, O blue deep!
Thou that no trace of human hearts dost keep,
Never to thee did love with silvery chain
Draw my soul's dream!

Her preference is for the tender, the homelike in Nature, and though her imagination roves at will among stupendous and majestic scenes, it flits home to sink with content into the warm enfolding of an English nest.

The lyric "The Homes of England" is too well known to quote, but it breathes that tenderness for her fatherland which undoubtedly added much to her popularity.

She dealt much with the simpler duties and affections of life. The love for home, parents, children, appears on every page of her works, and what might be deemed the commonplaces of existence were revealed in their real beauty and sanctity by her touch. For this she deserves all honour; and the old-fashioned title to a section of her writings, "Poems of the Affections," should not be scoffed at. We are too apt, in the worry and work of every day, to fail in recognising the ideal sweetness of these domestic ties, until they are broken for ever on earth; and Mrs. Hemans lifts "the daily round, the common task," into a higher plane by her influence.

At the same time she had the power to sympathise with all that was best in national life. Her imagination was fired at once by any tale of valour or deed of patriotism. The poem of "Casabianca," for instance, again too well known to quote, tells in stirring words the story of the heroic boy who perished at his post in the battle of the Nile. It seems sometimes as if all that would be left of Mrs. Hemans in a future generation would be such lyrics as "The Homes of England" and "Casabianca," learnt by children at school.

Upon the young heart and mind her poetry has a peculiarly strong influence. The present writer, so long as life shall last, will never forget the effect of the poem "The Better Land." There was a mystic charm about it that rapt the child-heart into thoughts unutterable:—

"Is it far away in some region old,
Where the rivers wander o'er sands of gold,
Where the burning rays of the ruby shine,
And the diamond lights up the secret mine,
And the pearl gleams forth from the coral strand,
Is it there, sweet mother! that better land?"
"Not there, not there, my child!"

The music to which many of Mrs. Hemans's poems were set by her sister, did much in their day to enhance their success. The "Messenger Bird" was one of the sweetest of these, both in words, and melody of soprano and alto strains combined. Few perhaps will now remember this musical embodiment of the Brazilian legend, that a certain bird, which sings mournfully in the night-time, is a messenger from deceased friends:—

Thou art come from the spirits' land, thou bird!
Thou art come from the spirits' land:
Through the dark pine grove let thy voice be heard,
And tell of the shadowy band!

We know that the bowers are green and fair
In the light of their summer shore;
And we know that the friends we have lost are there,
They are there—and they weep no more!

We call them far through the silent night,
And they speak not from cave or hill;
We know, thou bird! that their land is bright,
But say, do they love there still?

In their time, these words with their plaintive music drew tears from many an eye; nor was there anything foolish or idly sentimental in the emotion so caused, though the modern tone of pathos has altered with the changing of the years.

The chief point, however, to be noted with regard to Mrs. Hemans's poetry is its spirituality of tone. She was not one of the Light half-believers in our casual creeds

Who never deeply felt nor clearly willed, of whom the modern poet speaks. Her faith was clear and earnest.

"I look for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come." These words, carelessly uttered by too many, were the very inspiration of her genius. She indulged, indeed, in no puerile prettinesses of description regarding the heaven in which she fervently believed. There are no attempts at sketching the Land "beyond the river," "beside the fountain," in which some modern hymn-writers delight.

Contrast the tone of the "Better Land" with much of the present style of hymnology:—

Dreams cannot picture a world so fair,
Sorrow and death may not enter there,
Time doth not breathe on its fadeless bloom.

And although she could paint the energy of heroic deeds, the loves of home, the beauty of earth, in vivid language, she lived much in the unseen world, never ceasing to speak with unfaltering certainty of its happiness and its reunion. This is illustrated by such words as the following, taken from "The Siege of Valencia":—

Calm on the bosom of thy God,
Fair spirit, rest thee now!
E'en while with ours thy footsteps trod
His seal was on thy brow.

Dust to its narrow house beneath!
Soul, to its place on high!
They that have seen thy look in death
No more may fear to die.

The "Sabbath Sonnet," written by Mrs. Hemans a few days before her death is sufficient witness to the sincerity of her faith. Belief and acceptance of mystery were blended in her nature, and are expressed in the fine "Invocation" beginning

> Answer me, burning stars of night,
> Where is the spirit gone?

The peculiar mystic beauty of her religious poems cannot be exactly described or analysed, but it can be felt; and although it may have less influence in the present day than at the time she wrote, it cannot fail to produce an effect on the reader, like that of church bells heard across a summer landscape at evening time. Who can define the charm of these? yet who is altogether insensible to it? As an instance may be quoted "The Hour of Prayer":—

> Child, amidst the flowers at play,
> While the red light fades away;
> Mother, with thine earnest eye
> Ever following silently;
> Father, by the breeze of eve
> Called thy harvest work to leave,—
> Pray! ere yet the dark hours be,
> Lift the heart and bend the knee.

The "Tyrolese Evening Hymn" and "Evening Prayer at a Girls' School" are similar instances of devotional poetry touched with imagination. Indeed one has but to turn over the leaves of Mrs. Hemans's work to encounter numerous such utterances—pure, dreamy, poetic, religious—and by no means feebly sentimental or mawkishly effeminate.

But her genius shines at its best in the direct utterances of the soul to its Creator. It is a little remarkable that her two finest hymns are introduced casually, as it were, into longer poems. The first is embodied in the "Funeral Day of Sir Walter Scott," and appears as the chant sung over his tomb.

> Lowly and solemn be > Thy children's cry to Thee,
> Father Divine!
> A hymn of suppliant breath
> Owning that life and death
> Alike are Thine.
>
> * * * * *
>
> O Father! in that hour
> When earth all succouring power
> Shall disavow;
> When spear and shield and crown
> In faintness are cast down—
> Sustain us, Thou!
>
> By Him who bowed to take
> The death cup for our sake,
> The thorn, the rod;
> From whom the last dismay
> Was not to pass away,
> Aid us, O God!

The second occurs in a little known but interesting dramatic fragment entitled "The English Martyrs," a scene of the days of Queen Mary. A Protestant maiden and her lover are imprisoned on account of their faith; offers of freedom on recantation are firmly refused; they are allowed a last interview; and at its close, when the anguish of human love strains their hearts well nigh to breaking, the cry to the Infinite Pity is embodied in the following lines:

> He knelt—the Saviour knelt and prayed—
> When but His Father's eye
> Looked through the lonely garden's shade
> On that dread agony.
> The Lord of all above, beneath,
> Was bowed with sorrow unto death.
>
> The sun set in a fearful hour,
> The stars might well grow dim,
> When this mortality had power
> So to o'ershadow HIM!
> That He who gave man's breath, might know
> The very depths of human woe.
>
> He proved them all!—the doubt, the strife,
> The faint perplexing dread,
> The mists that hang o'er parting life,
> All gathered round His head;
> And the Deliverer knelt to pray—
> Yet passed it not, that cup, away!
>
> It passed not—though the stormy wave
> Had sunk beneath His tread;
> It passed not—though to Him the grave
> Had yielded up its dead.
> But there was sent Him from on high
> A gift of strength for man to die.
>
> And was the Sinless thus beset
> With anguish and dismay?
> How may we meet our conflict yet
> In the dark, narrow way?
> Through Him—through Him that path who trod.
> —Save, or we perish, Son of God!

Words in praise of this hymn seem almost impertinent. But the poetess who could so write surely deserves a better fate than to be neglected and well-nigh forgotten. We plead therefore that the works of Mrs. Hemans should not be allowed merely to furnish two or three pieces for the schoolroom répertoire. They are not outside the pale of suitable reading for the intelligent even now, and in many a quiet hour of life, on the Day of Rest, among the green fields, in the retirement of home, they will bring help and refreshment. She does not profess to supply an answer to all the deeper problems of existence—to portray human nature in its intricacies of thought and action—to compete with such poets as Mrs. Browning:—

> Boldest of hearts that ever braved the sun,
> Took sanctuary within the holier blue,
> And sang a kindred soul out to his face!

Yet Felicia Hemans too can seek comparison with the skylark in her song; for without exaggerated praise she may fitly be described in the poet's words,

> Type of the wise, who soar, but never roam,
> True to the kindred points of Heaven and Home.

LILY WATSON.

The Writing on the Ground.

"JESUS stooped down and wrote upon the ground";
Lost are the words traced by His finger there;
But still His characters divinely fair
About our feet, in lines of light, are found.
He stoops, and snowdrops start to life all round;
His finger wakes the violets everywhere;
The lilies of the field His message bear,
And primrose banks with thoughts of peace are crowned.
O Lord, stoop lower still, and on the floor
Of my dim wayworn heart Thy blessing write:
The Spirit is Thy finger evermore,
Oh, may I feel its touch, like rays of light,
Awaking me to trust Thee and adore,
And bud and blossom always in Thy sight!

RICHARD WILTON.

LETTERS TO MY CHILDREN FROM THE EAST.

BY HENRY HARPER, AUTHOR OF "LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LANDS," ETC.

INTRODUCTION.

THE aim of the author in this series of "Letters from the East" was first to teach his own little ones some of the wonders of that land of which the Bible is the best record, and to endeavour to show them how wonderfully an examination of it, however slight, would the better enable them to understand the Sacred Book. The stories have interested his own little ones, and he trusts they will now interest a larger circle of children. We must ever bear in mind that though, through the mercy of God, the Bible is so written that all of every age and every clime can find in it the way of salvation, yet it is essentially an Eastern Book, written by men who lived in that land; and that to arrive at a complete understanding of its pages, we need to be familiar with the customs and the character of that land itself. Then, too, it cannot be without interest and gain to see how so many of the prophecies have been fulfilled. Written when the East was composed of powerful kingdoms and mighty nations, these prophetic writings foretold a time when all the power and glory should be taken away from these, because the people either forsook the Lord God or served idols and false gods. The warnings were neglected, and the awful judgments we see were fulfilled.

There may be no particular order in which the Bible passages noted in these letters are taken. Some event in daily life usually suggested the passage. To show all the prophecies and the fulfilments would take large volumes. These papers only touch the fringe of this very important subject. None the less, does the author hope that "little ones" will find that these simple illustrations will add an interest to that Book, which is ever new, fresh and living because it is the Word of the Living God; revealing Him, His Will, His Way.

I.—DESERT PATHS.

IN Proverbs viii. 2, "wisdom" is represented thus: "She standeth in the places of the paths." In the new Revised Version it reads thus: "In the top of the high places by the way where the paths meet she standeth." In Psalm xvii. 5 (Revised Version), David says: "My steps have held fast to Thy paths; my feet have not slipped." The Old Version says: "Hold up my goings in Thy paths." Again in Psalm xxiii. 3, we read: "He guideth me in the paths of righteousness." Our Lord calls Himself "the Way," "the Truth." He also says "broad' is the way that leadeth to destruction"; and He says that, "Narrow is the way that leadeth to life." Why these many allusions to "paths" and "ways?" I think it was because Eastern roads as a rule were not "made" as with us. We are told by Josephus that the great King Solomon laid down a road of large blocks of stone from Jerusalem to his gardens near Bethlehem; and traces of old roads well made are still found in Moab; but, as a rule, no roads were made until the time of the Romans. They were the great road makers of the world. Even in our own country they were the first to make roads; and you know that in our little village I have taken you to an old Roman road or "way" which is still the most direct route from one county to another; but Easterns as a rule did not "make" roads. They let the camels, mules, or asses, wander as much as they liked on the level ground, and therefore in the East you have many, many, pathways or trackways running into and mixing with each other. A few years ago the best road in Palestine—that from Jaffa to Jerusalem—was like a cart track over a ploughed field. Now, many of these trackways run one into the other, so you have a "broad" way. Start on your journey and you would think that all the tracks led the same way, and you might say, "It does not matter which I take." Ah! but in a little time you would find some turning off to the left and others to the right and you would be lost. How necessary then, that you should have a skilful guide, who would guide you into the right path. How necessary that "wisdom" should stand where these "paths" meet!

This little picture will show you what desert "paths" are like. See how they cross and mix. How confusing they are. Without a guide who knew the way, you can see how easily you might take the wrong "way." In the daytime you might have more chance, but how would it be when the day was dark and stormy? and how when the night was closing in? And yet you had still to push on. Why every unskilled traveller would be sure to wander from the right "way," and wandering on would tire out, and most likely lie down to die. Some parts of the desert track are really marked by the bones of men and animals, who, tired out, have died on the way; and the horrid vultures have picked their bones. Many a time have I seen this, and felt very anxious, and then taken courage, for I remembered I had with me a very skilful guide—a man who knew the "way."

David says, "His feet did not slip" when led by God. Unmade roads in the desert become very slippery after rain or night mist, and your camels slip about in a dangerous manner, and so you do yourself if you are walking, so soft and sticky is the track till the sun gets up and dries the "way" again. Sometimes the "way" leads over rocks, and the rock is so smooth and polished by the weather and by the feet of the countless number of passengers in the long past ages, that the rock is very dangerous too. Again your path will be over stones, like the dry bed of a rocky river and you wind in and about these stones, till you quite lose all idea of where you are going. Or again, your path would be on the very edge of a deep ravine, and the path so narrow, you felt if your foot slipped, down you must go and be lost. More than once I have had to take off my boots and walk without them, for the road was so slippery, so narrow and dangerous.

How striking then to an Eastern traveller are these texts which speak of "wisdom" and of God's guiding hand. Here there are "guide posts" set up at the cross roads to tell of the "way" to town or village; but though in England we may have "guide books" on our earthly roads, we need the Heavenly Guide to show us our way to the Father's home above. You have in your Bibles the full record of Him who said "Follow Me." If you do so follow, you will find that you must leave the "broad track," the way of the world. You must exercise self-denial; you must not seek your own pleasure or your own will, nor trust in your own skill or knowledge; but, taking Jesus as your guide, seek to follow in His steps. You may find the "way" often hard, steep, slippery; but He "leads"; He "upholds." No good thing will He withhold from those who walk uprightly in "His paths." That same Jesus, who loved little children when He was on earth, loves them still; and He said of children that they "see the face" of the Almighty Father. May we all be led in the "paths of righteousness!"

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

"P." writes from Brighton: "Will you kindly give an explanation of Psalm xc. 11, which has often puzzled me? 'But who regardeth the power of Thy wrath: for even thereafter as a man feareth, so is Thy displeasure.'"

OUR correspondent gives the passage as found in the Prayer-book. The Authorised Version reads: "Who knoweth the power of Thine anger? even according to Thy fear, so is Thy wrath." It will be observed that the words so is are in italics, showing that they are not in the original text. The Revised Version is more literally exact:—

> Who knoweth the power of Thine anger,
> And Thy wrath according to the fear that is due unto Thee?

In this it may be remarked (1) that the word knoweth, for the Prayer-book regardeth, is certainly correct. The Psalmist does not ask who gives heed to the Divine anger, but who can estimate, understand it, in its terribleness! (2) that the words of the question, Who knoweth, belong to the latter part of the verse as well as to the former. The even of the A. V. is more correctly and; (3) that the fear of God, spoken of in the second clause, means the holy reverence that is due to Him; (4) that the question, therefore, implies that, according to the measure of this holy reverence, we shall be able to estimate His "wrath." "Who has so deep and true a fear of Thee as to be able to understand how terrible Thou art in Thy judgment against sin?"

Dr. Barry, Bishop of Sydney, in his brief and useful Commentary on the Prayer-book version of the Psalter,[1] observes on the translation of Psalm xc. 11, "This is an error; it should be—

> Who knoweth the power of Thine anger
> And Thy wrath, according to (due) fear?

"The Psalmist complains that though men see before them every day the signs of God's judgment, they do not so regard them as to fear Him with a godly fear."

Keble, in the Oxford Psalter, a fine metrical translation from the original Hebrew, too little known, renders the verse:—

> But who Thine ire discerns,
> How dread, how deep Thy fear should be,
> Deep as Thine anger burns?

[1] "The Teacher's Prayer Book," p. 225, a.

"A. B." seeks an explanation of what is meant by the "gifts" mentioned in connection with the "sacrifices" in Hebrews v. 1; viii. 3; ix. 9. Are the "unbloody sacrifices" referred to?

In the first of these passages the "sacrifices for sins," i.e. the expiatory offerings, appear to be distinguished from "the gifts," i.e. the offerings of consecration and of gratitude. The words for sins are not added to sacrifices in the other two texts, but the sense is undoubtedly the same. In the Old Testament, the "gift" (minchah) is in general distinguished from the "sacrifice" (zebhach). The former word, for instance, is never applied in the Law of Moses to the sin-offering. Its most general rendering is "meat-offering" (R.V. meal-offering): although it is used (but not in the Pentateuch) of the "evening sacrifice," 1 Kings xviii. 29, 36; Ezra ix. 4, 5; Psa. cxli. 2; Dan. ix. 11. In Genesis iv. 3, 4, it is applied to Abel's offering. All that can be said is that gift (minchah, δῶρον) mostly denotes unbloody offering, while sacrifice (zebhach, θυσία) always implies the taking of life, excepting where figuratively used, as in Psa. li. 17; Romans xii. 1; Hebrews xiii. 15, 16. In these passages also the surrender of life to God, although in another way, is the leading thought. Where the two words are found together, as in the three texts from the Epistle to the Hebrews, no doubt each is to be understood in its general significance:—the two great classes of sacrifice, of which the meat-offering and the sin-offering were respectively the most expressive illustrations. A broad line of distinction, however, can scarcely be drawn between the two, as the gifts had also an expiatory element, and might be of slain animals, as in the case of Abel, while, on the other hand, the animal brought for sacrifice might be regarded as the worshipper's gift.

It should be added that some expositors, as Alford, connect both words gifts and sacrifices, with the following phrase for sins, the two classes of offerings being thus declared to be expiatory. It seems, however, better to regard the words for sins as belonging to sacrifices alone. See Schaff's New Test. on Heb. v. 1; note by Dr. Angus.

"C. M. B.," Seaford, writes: "In Acts xiii. 20, St. Paul says, 'And after that He gave unto them judges, about the space of 450 years.' Please explain how this is to be reconciled with the much shorter time allowed to them (according to the dates in the Bible) in the Book of Judges."

This is one of those cases in which the Revised Version comes to our help by restoring the ancient text. The passage as it stands in our ordinary Bible is, as our correspondent intimates, absolutely irreconcilable with the Old Testament chronology. (See especially 1 Kings vi. 1.) The Revisers, however, read, on the authority of the best MSS., "He gave them (not divided, as A.V.) their land for an inheritance, about 450 years; and after these things He gave them judges." That is, the period of four hundred and fifty years intervened between the gift of the land as an inheritance and the era of the judges. Some of the ablest expositors regard this period as extending from the birth of Isaac, the epoch of the "gift" to Abraham, to the final conquest of Canaan—say from B.C. 1896 to B.C. 1444 (Ussher) or 452 years.

"M. E.," Canonbury, writes: "I should be very glad if you could throw any light on the fact that the two genealogies given in Matthew and Luke as shewing the descent of our Lord, are both traced to Joseph; when we are distinctly told in Matthew i. 18, that Jesus was not his son. The first verse of the same chapter and the eighteenth seem to positively contradict each other, when we read in verse sixteen that Joseph's genealogy has been traced and not Mary's."

The genealogies were no doubt taken from the public records; and Jesus was the reputed son of Joseph (Luke iii. 23). In reference to Matt. i. 1, it may be remarked that, as legally the son of Joseph, Christ was "David's son" and heir; the genealogy in this chapter giving the line of royal succession, that in Luke the line of natural descent. It may be added that the best authorities hold that Mary also was of the House of David; so that our Lord's legal claim coincided with His earthly sonship.

Some expositors regard the genealogy in St. Luke as that of Mary, the daughter of Heli; but this is very doubtful. The subject is a difficult one; one important fact, however, should be noted. There is no evidence that the Jews, who were most punctilious in preserving their family records, ever advanced any objection to the genealogies as given in the Gospels. Had there been any ground for attacking them, either as inconsistent with each other, or as falsely connecting our Lord with the House of David, that attack would undoubtedly have been made. From the silence of the opponents of the Gospel, therefore, we are entitled to argue that these genealogies are unassailable, and that the difficulties connected with them arise entirely from our not knowing all the facts of the case.

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

CHAPTER IX.

EVER was a happier boy than Bertie Danby that day; for the lesson Mr. Robinson had sought to convey, by means of his story, was slowly finding its way to his heart, even while he was so joyous and merry; and it made his joy deeper, and his merriment more contagious to think, as he did every now and then, that God had been loving and caring for him all the time, and had sent him such a good friend to give him this bright holiday.

When they reached the hotel, they found that "high tea" had been prepared for them, in Mr. Robinson's own sitting room, where the three could talk and laugh in the intervals of eating and drinking. It was a most enjoyable meal. Tommy forgot to be cross about anything, and Mr. Robinson seemed almost as much a boy as Bertie himself. He told them more stories after tea, in which the animals all seemed to be as merry as themselves, and at last, when they were going home, he gave them a basket of grapes and pears to carry with them.

"They are for your mamma, but Ann is to have a share of them, for her kindness to me when I had that fall, tell her," said Mr. Robinson as he delivered them into Bertie's hand on the hotel steps. It was growing dusk now, and so Jack was despatched to watch the two boys, that no one interfered with them, but not himself to speak or be seen by them, if he could help it.

"When you get back, come to my room and let me know how they get on," said the gentleman, as Jack left him.

Jack had been a source of some anxiety to his benefactor since the letter had been carried by him to Mrs. Danby. The lady might well object to such a messenger, for Jack as the hotel boots was a sight to behold, as Mr. Robinson knew; and if she heard that Bertie was in the habit of meeting this same lad in the pavilion, and helping him with his reading lessons, she would probably be very angry, both with the boys and himself; and so, to remove this cause of fresh annoyance to the lady, he had decided to take Jack away from Beachcliff, if the lad himself was willing to go. So when he appeared at the door pulling his forelock, and saying, "They're all right, sir," Mr. Robinson told him to come in, and asked him if he was quite comfortable in his situation.

"Yes, sir. I hope there isn't no fault," said Jack, a little anxiously.

"No. Your master gives you a very good character, and I'm very pleased to find how well you have got on with your book—so pleased, that I think of giving you a better chance still. How would you like to go back to Esterfield, and learn your father's trade in the old factory?"

The boy's face flushed for a minute, but the next he shook his head and said, "No chance of that, sir."

"But, suppose I made the chance for you, my boy?" said the gentleman; "you would have to work hard you know—go to evening school after being in the factory all day."

"Would it be Danby's factory, sir?" asked Jack in a meditative tone.

"Well, Danby's or mine, what does it matter?" said Mr. Robinson.

"Well, I dunno, sir, Danby's killed father."

"And Bertie Danby has saved you, and I'm willing to help you still further for Bertie's sake," replied the gentleman.

"Then I'll go, sir, just to show I got no more spite agin 'em—jist for the little chap's sake," said Jack.

"Very well, I will speak to your master about it by-and-by, but I don't suppose there will be any difficulty there, for he told me he should want a man in your place, when the busy time begins here."

"Ah! that's just like 'em all, they think a man can do ever so much better than a boy," said Jack in an aggrieved tone, "but I'll let you see, sir, if it's your factory, that I can do as much as a man, any day."

"Well, well, we shall see," said Mr. Robinson smiling, "but you must not forget you have to learn to work first, and you may not find it so easy as learning to read, with Bertie Danby for a teacher. You will have to be patient and persevering and steady, for you have a lot of time to make up, my man."

"Yes, sir; but to be a man with a trade at my finger ends is something worth working for," said Jack, holding up his head in anticipation of the prospective dignity.

"Very well, I hope you will make good use of your opportunities. But there is one thing I want to say to you. If you should see the young Danbys before we go away, do not mention the factory to them. You can say I have got a place for you at Esterfield if you like, but nothing beyond that."

"Do you belong to Danbys, sir," asked bold Jack.

"Yes, I do!" said the gentleman, thinking frankness would serve best now; "I not only belong to the Danbys, but I am Danby for the present, and I shall see how you keep this secret—for I do want it kept a secret for the present—and judge how far you are to be trusted in future."

"Thank you, sir, for trusting me; I will keep it to myself, never fear," said Jack, and he went downstairs feeling two inches taller than when he walked up.

All the hotel servants very soon knew that Jack was going to leave, and were sorry for it, for he had proved himself a willing, obliging lad; but where he was going, or what he was going to do, beyond the fact that Mr. Robinson, who had been responsible for him here, was going to get him a better place at Esterfield, they could not learn. Jack kept his patron's confidence most loyally, although he was sorely tempted to break it when he bade Bertie good-bye, and the little boy asked him what he was going to do at Esterfield when he got there.

The boys went home with their basket of fruit in high glee, their eager shouts scarcely restrained by Ann's upraised finger, when she opened the door, with the warning "hush" that greeted them.

"Oh, it was so jolly," said Tommy, "and all these grapes and pears are for you and mamma. Is mamma ill again?" he asked in a matter-of-course tone, as he pulled off his hat. Everybody had got used to Mrs. Danby's frequent illnesses, and so it was not surprising, that the two boys should think little of it, beyond the disappointment they felt, at not being able to shew her the basket of fruit at once.

"Don't the grapes look beautiful?" said Bertie admiringly; "we won't touch them, will we? until mamma has seen them. Put them on the breakfast-table to-morrow morning, Ann," he added as he gave the basket into her care, for fear Tommy should be tempted to touch the fruit.

They did not see their mother that night, she was too ill, Ann said, and the next morning she was worse, which made Bertie look very grave, as he stood in the desolate looking breakfast-room, and surveyed the roughly laid breakfast-table, their basins of bread and milk forming the whole of the equipage.

Ann had been up nearly all night with the invalid, and now looked worn and anxious. "If only your papa would come home," she ejaculated with a sigh, as she looked at Bertie.

"Didn't he come to the door that night?" asked the boy.

"What next, child!—what put that idea into your head?" exclaimed Ann in astonishment.

"We were talking to Mr. Robinson yesterday, and Tommy said, God did not listen to our prayers, because we had asked him to bring papa home again to take care of us, and then he said, God had sent the answer, but when it came to the door, we shut it out."

"Oh! did he say that?" exclaimed Ann; "I shouldn't wonder but what he was right too," she added.

"Did papa come then?" asked Bertie.

"No! no! not your papa, dear, but somebody that might have helped us, and that was what we were all praying for, I fancy—that was what we wanted papa to come for, because we were in such dreadful distress and trouble, and God sent us help at once, and we shut the door upon it."

"That's what Mr. Robinson says."

"Yes? and it's true. Eat your breakfast, Bertie, and then I will send you with a note to the gentleman."

A sudden thought had come to Ann in her perplexity. It had been slowly growing in her mind for some time, only she was scarcely aware of it until now. The surmise, that the old gentleman who had come to beg their help some time since, was really a friend or relation come to help them, had grown to be a certainty all at once; and she now determined to put it to the test.

It was not often that Ann attempted to write even a letter to a friend, and so her stiff fingers felt clumsy, and her writing looked awkward, but she was too anxious about her dear mistress to think of what her note looked like, she only thought of the help it might bring.

A Song of the Mountains.

THE God who made the mountains
  And piled their masses high,
Who fixed their firm foundations
  And bade them climb the sky,
Looks down on little children
  For whom He gave His Son,
Protects, provides, embraces,
  And loves them every one.

Voices of mountains praise Him,
  Torrents and tinkling rills,
The thunder of the snow-fall,
  The echoes of the hills;
But songs of little children,
  Their feeblest praise and prayer,
Are sweeter to the Father
  Than all the music there.

A child upon the mountains,
  A speck so small and mean,
To heart of God is greater
  And more distinctly seen:
He lifts an infant higher
  Than loftiest mountain peak,
For He came down from heaven
  These little ones to seek.

The highest of the mountains
  Shall some day be brought low,
But children of the Father
  To Him in heaven shall go;
And then, still rising higher
  In blessedness and love,
On Zion's hill for ever
  Shall dwell with God above.

NEWMAN HALL, LL.B.

SCRIPTURE VERSES.

NO. VI.

Find the verse here described.

The verse is a charge of one friend to another, concerning a command of God, after an important business transaction.

In it is mentioned a necessary article of household use and one so cheap, that it might have been found in the poorest family. Two written documents are also mentioned in the verse, bearing the same contents, and differing from one another in one particular.

The verse following contains a grand promise of God.

In the chapter are mentioned—

(a) Eight parts of the human body.
(b) A barbarous sinful custom.
(c) A prayer, nine verses long, reminding God of wonderful things He had done.

The chapter ends with a beautiful promise of God, also nine verses long, containing an especial pledge that many like business transactions should take place in future years.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XIX.

The name of one who did his tomb prepare,
But, ere he died, he laid another there?
An old man's peaceful home of which we read,
That shepherds came there, bringing flocks to feed?
A girl who brought some unexpected news
Of one delivered from the cruel Jews.
Who judged in Israel after Jephthah died,
Had thirty sons, and found for each a bride?
Near to what city on the Sabbath-day,
Did Paul find pious women met to pray?
Over what kingdom did that monarch reign,
Who urged the Jews to build God's house again?
One not ashamed to take a learner's place,
He "helped them much who had believed through grace."

The final letters now provide a name,
Borne by three men, and always spelt the same;
One, sent by God, stood at a blind man's side;
One was a priest, and one by judgment died;
And all are in one book, and that alone:
Initials mention one who filled a throne;
Still in that book search out this monarch's name,
To Cæsarea to see a friend he came.

L. T.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. VI.—p. 512.—JEHU.

(1) 2 Kings ix. 5; (2) 20; (3) 1; (4) 13; (5) 15, 16; (6) 7-10; (7) x. 18-28; (8) 29; (9) 30.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE Lambeth Conference was brought to a close by a valedictory service at St. Paul's. The procession of bishops and other representatives, as it moved forward to enter the choir, reached nearly the length of the south aisle. The whole ceremonial was unusually dignified and impressive. The Archbishop of Canterbury at once commenced the service for the Holy Communion. The sermon was afterwards preached by the Archbishop of York, from the text: "For the earnest expectation of the creature waiteth for the manifestation of the sons of God." (Rom. vii. 19.) It dealt hopefully with the facts of to-day. Strife and struggle, pain and death, said the Archbishop, are inscribed upon the world's foundation stones; but only in the way of hope can we understand the great story of the creation. We have waited nearly two thousand years, and the language held by those who have lost faith is that they can wait no more—that the power of Christ is no more seen. But, "apply what test you will: the test of numbers; of holy works; of saintly souls; Christian progress is advancing, not receding; missions have done more in this century than ever before." After a reference to physical progress, the preacher continued: "When we are twitted with the languid life of the Christian churches, as compared with the splendid activity and performance of science, the inference is not that there is no longer any guidance; for there is much; but that men who profess to be Christian show a languid and intermittent life, a hypothetical belief instead of the apostle's categorical conviction; a perpetual compromise with modern views; an eyesight made false and double by the endeavour to work for double ends. The spiritual progress has never preserved in past centuries a steady and equal pace. No period of twenty years has ever equalled the grand outpouring of life of the first twenty years after the Resurrection. But the law has always been the same. Churches have prospered when peopled by faithful men; they have languished or died when faith has languished and sin has paralysed the will." Touching social questions, the Archbishop argued that the sins and miseries which remain cannot be solved by mere civilisation.

THE Society for the Propagation of the Gospel held its annual meetings while the Conference was sitting, and the occasion was signalised by a series of addresses from the foreign bishops, as many as thirteen of them taking part either in the morning or evening. The report stated that the number of ordained missionaries, including nine bishops, on the Society's lists at the present time was 596. There were also in its various missions about 2000 catechists and lay teachers, mostly natives, and more than 400 students in its colleges. The Bishop of Japan said the attitude of the educated classes towards Christianity there perhaps might best be described as an attitude of respectful hesitation. Bishop Smythies said that from his experience in Africa he was more than convinced that missionaries must in every possible way keep away from every set of circumstances which would invest them with the character of civil officers.

THE new Board of Missions, which met at Sion College, under the presidency of the Archbishop of Canterbury, also invited the attendance of a large number of the prelates. This Board, as the President explained to its visitors, is not a new missionary society, neither does it collect money, its aim is simply to communicate information and stimulate effort. Among the speakers was the Bishop of Calcutta, who said that it was very necessary to bring home individual responsibility in the matter of missions, for there were thousands of persons in England whose wealth had been entirely derived from districts where missions needed support. That had been done with respect to the East Indian Railway, and no less than 20,000*l.* had been extracted from the shareholders. The money had been invested, and the interest supported four or five missionaries. A similar course had been taken with respect to the tea plantations of Assam, where they had also two or three clergymen entirely supported by the managers and shareholders. The Bishop of Jamaica, criticising some of Mr. Froude's recent statements, to the effect that the Church existed there simply for the English residents, said that the Europeans, including Jews, numbered only 13,000, while there were 30,000 church communicants, the total population being 600,000, and that eighty-five clergymen were supported by the contributions chiefly of the black people.

AT a Conference held under the auspices of the Anglo-Continental Society, at Farnham Castle, the residence of the Bishop of Winchester, various addresses were delivered on the condition of those bodies of religionists on the continent who have established reformed churches, and consequently been excommunicated by the church of Rome. The Bishop of Western New York, who has recently visited the Old Catholics, said they were making real progress, although it might not be very apparent. He complained that the Christian churches of England and America had not done enough for the Old Catholics. Bishop Herzog gave an account of the Old Catholics in Switzerland, who, whatever might be said, had not ceased to belong to the Catholic church. The Archbishop of Dublin, speaking of the Reform movements in England and Spain, said they were real works of self-reform, and not the result of mere transient enthusiasm. The people needed something more in the way of spiritual food than the church of Rome could supply them with. Senor Cabrera said those in Spain who were associated with him believed that the Bible and the conscience were greater than all canons, councils, and synods. What they wanted were bishops to confirm their children and ordain their priests. The speech of Count di Campello, who spoke in Italian, was interpreted by Canon Meyrick. He said that the church of Rome was the cause of a thousand schisms. He had himself given up a lucrative appointment as canon of St. Peter's, and was now devoting himself to the spread of the Gospel. He had unfurled the flag of reform, and if they only had a church with bishops and priests, the movement would be a great success. He appealed to the English church for help and sympathy in this great work of religious reformation in Italy.

CARDINAL LAVIGERIE, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Algiers and Carthage, has undertaken a crusade against slavery, and to that end proposes to visit the capitals of Europe, in hope of awakening an agitation sufficiently strong to secure the suppression of the slave-trade. Speaking in London, under the auspices of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, he said that England, after having destroyed colonial slavery, owed it to herself to support by her sympathies those who wish to destroy African slavery, a hundred times more horrible. Slavery in the proportions that it had now assumed meant, in effect, the approaching destruction of the black population of the interior, with the impossibility of penetrating and civilising the heart of the country. "My missionaries"—we quote his phrase and words—"are established in the Sahara and upon the high table-lands of Central Africa, from the north of Nyanza to the south of Tanganyika. Eleven of them have suffered martyrdom, while more than fifty others have died from fatigue and hardships. Such men have the right to be heard and to be believed. Your Cameron affirms with truth that half a million slaves at the least are sold every year in the interior of Africa, and the testimony of our missionaries not only confirms but raises this estimate for those regions where they are established. They have seen with their own eyes in the course of ten years whole provinces absolutely depopulated by the massacres of the slave-hunters . . . Islam is exterminating the population at this moment by means of her slave-hunters, and by virtue of her doctrine that the blacks are an inferior and cursed race, whom they are at liberty to treat worse than we treat our animals." A resolution urging the Governments of Europe to bring the pressure of public opinion to bear upon the rulers of all countries where slavery exists was carried, being proposed by Cardinal Manning, and seconded by Bishop Smythies.

THE readjustment of the colonial relations of the Great Powers has not been accomplished, even on the small scale attempted, without inconvenience to English missions. The process, not yet completed in the South Seas, has been the occasion of much hardship and wrong. In East Africa the serious difficulties which have arisen can only be surmounted by much prudence. Portugal may surrender her claim to control the Zambesi, but there are other dangers ahead. We learn, for example, that the line of German influence has been drawn to include the stations of the Universities' Mission, and there are rumours that it may be deemed necessary to buy out the mission or compel it to teach German in its schools. On the western coast not long since, the Baptist missions were disturbed by the German annexations. Now the attempts of the French to establish a protectorate over Abeokuta and to command the River Ogun, the great highway from Lagos to the interior, threaten one of the most hopeful fields of the Church Missionary Society. Meanwhile we wait with anxiety for definite news of Stanley and Emin Pasha, but, whatever the issue, we may be sure that expeditions in which white men figure as victorious leaders, will bring some temporary risk to the emissaries of peace. The distrust of the tribes is spreading, and mission work is less secure than in the days when Livingstone and Piaggia, and others of like spirit, wandered forth alone and unprotected.

"BY their fruits ye shall know them." Professor Drummond, in his recent volume on "Tropical Africa," describes one of the negroes of the Livingstonian mission: "'Mission blacks,' in Natal and the Cape, are a byword among the unsympathetic; but I never saw Moolu do an inconsistent thing. He could neither read nor write; he knew only some dozen words of English; until seven years ago he had never seen a white man; but I could trust him with everything I had. He was not 'pious'; he was neither bright nor clever; he was a commonplace black; but he did his duty and never told a lie. The first night of our camp, after all had gone to rest, I remember being roused by a low talking. I looked out of my tent; a flood of moonlight lit up the forest, and there, kneeling upon the ground, was a little group of natives, and Moolu in the centre conducting evening prayers. Every night afterwards this service was repeated, no matter how long the march was, nor how tired the men. I make no comment. But this I will say, Moolu's life gave him the right to do it. Mission reports are often said to be valueless; they are less so than anti-mission reports. I believe in missions, for one thing, because I believe in Moolu."

FROM the Congo, Mr. Bentley writes of progress. The dress question had come up in connection with one of the native agents, Nlemvo, who was two and a half years in England. "If," writes Mr. Bentley, "a native wears trousers he is considered to be a black white man (mundele andombe), and loses at once any influence he may have as being one of the people. If he does not follow country customs and beliefs it is because he is mundele andombe, and that is no reason why they, the people of the country, should pay attention to the gospel." Nlemvo found that the people suspected him, so now when he goes out preaching, wears a cloth à la mode. "It is by no means a scanty or improper dress; when nicely arranged and good material, I prefer it much to semi-European style. It is a question concerning which there are many opinions out here. Personally, I hope that our converts will be Christian Kongos, and not endeavour to efface their nationality, lest they thereby lose their influence over their fellow countrymen. We are most anxious to see the natives get to work upon their own people." Mr. Bentley is advancing in the translation of the Gospels.

THE Church Missionary Society early this year adopted resolutions recommending the employment of European Lay Evangelists in India, and drawing attention to "the hundreds of thousands of villages" there lying absolutely "outside the range of existing missionary agencies." The Cambridge men, working under the society in Bengal, have now sent home a letter to the Cambridge Church Missionary Union, appealing for lay help, and detailing the preparations they have made. The society has already approved the appointment of two European evangelists for rural work in the Nuddea district. Funds for the support of a third man are also forthcoming. What is wanted is the men themselves. "One of us," proceeds the letter, "is just beginning work at a place called Shikarpur. A simple lodging for the missionary has already been erected, and sufficient accommodation for two or three companions will be ready before long. The Santhal Pergunnahs is another district where we think that the scheme might be set on foot with every prospect of success. At a conference of the Santhal missionaries it was decided to apply to the society to send out three evangelists, the support of one of them being guaranteed for two years by one of the missionaries. We think we should add a few words as to the working of the scheme, should it be tried in Nuddea. The men would live together. In their preaching-tours they would go out four together, or by two and two. House, tents, and boats, and whatever else is necessary for the carrying on of the work, would be provided by the society. A missionary in priest's orders would be at the head, and the other members of the mission would be in much the same relation to him as curates at home are to their rectors. As to subsistence, all would be on equal terms. One of us has lived the sort of life contemplated (and in this district of Nuddea) for some years, and found that all his personal wants were sufficiently supplied by an income of Rs. 60 per mensem. No promise of continued bachelorhood is sought, but it would be understood that if one of the men wished to marry he would ask that some other status should be given him." The Calcutta Corresponding Committee have formally adopted and sent home a valuable memorandum upon the scheme as a whole. One paragraph runs as follows: "It should be clearly understood that this scheme for European evangelists is not to be a substitute for the employment of native evangelists, but is intended to serve as an incentive to our native helpers to a life of greater hardness, activity, and devotion."

THE "Church Missionary Intelligencer," draws attention to a curious illustration of how the East and West are reacting on each other. Mr. Hackett, at Allahabad, lately gave a lecture on "The Aryan-Vedic Religion." It was mostly taken up with an account of a catechism put forth by Pundit Raghunath Rao, the Dewan of Indore, as a short catechism of the Aryan-Vedic religion. "Our friends in Scotland will be perhaps flattered, but certainly astonished, to learn that it is taken word for word from the Shorter Catechism so familiar to all dwellers north of the Tweed! Only it consists of some 20,000 questions and answers, those relating to our Lord Jesus Christ being omitted. On this being pointed out to the Dewan, he defended his compilation on the ground that the truths were common to both, and he wished to use a formulary that might, as far as possible, commend itself to both Christians and Hindus. It may perhaps be considered one of the most remarkable plagiarisms on record."

THE death of Dean Burgon removes one whose strong individuality had made him widely known. The son of a merchant, he was trained for a mercantile career, and had already entered upon it, when a desire to write a life of Sir Thomas Gresham, led him to the State Paper Office. He became so interested in his subject that he threw aside his mercantile studies for those of English literature, and resolved to enter himself at Oxford. There he remained to become a conspicuous figure to several generations of students. His literary tastes found first satisfaction in the Newdigate Prize Poem, which he won in 1845, the subject being Petra. At a later date he became a Fellow at Oriel, in succession to Newman. From 1863 to 1873, he held the living of St. Mary's, the university church, which he quitted for the Deanery of Chichester. He was the author of an attack on the Revised Version in the "Quarterly Review." His views were those of a genuine Anglican, of the older type, but their expression was coloured by a unique personality.

THIS is an age of commemorations. The nine hundredth anniversary of the introduction of Christianity into Russia, under Vladimir the Great, has been celebrated in that country. At a meeting of the bishops at Kieff, an address was read from the Archbishop of Canterbury. In St. Petersburg, the chief interest centred in the procession of priests from St. Vladimir's Church across the Neva, and the blessing of the river by the metropolitans and bishops in presence of the Czar.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THIS WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

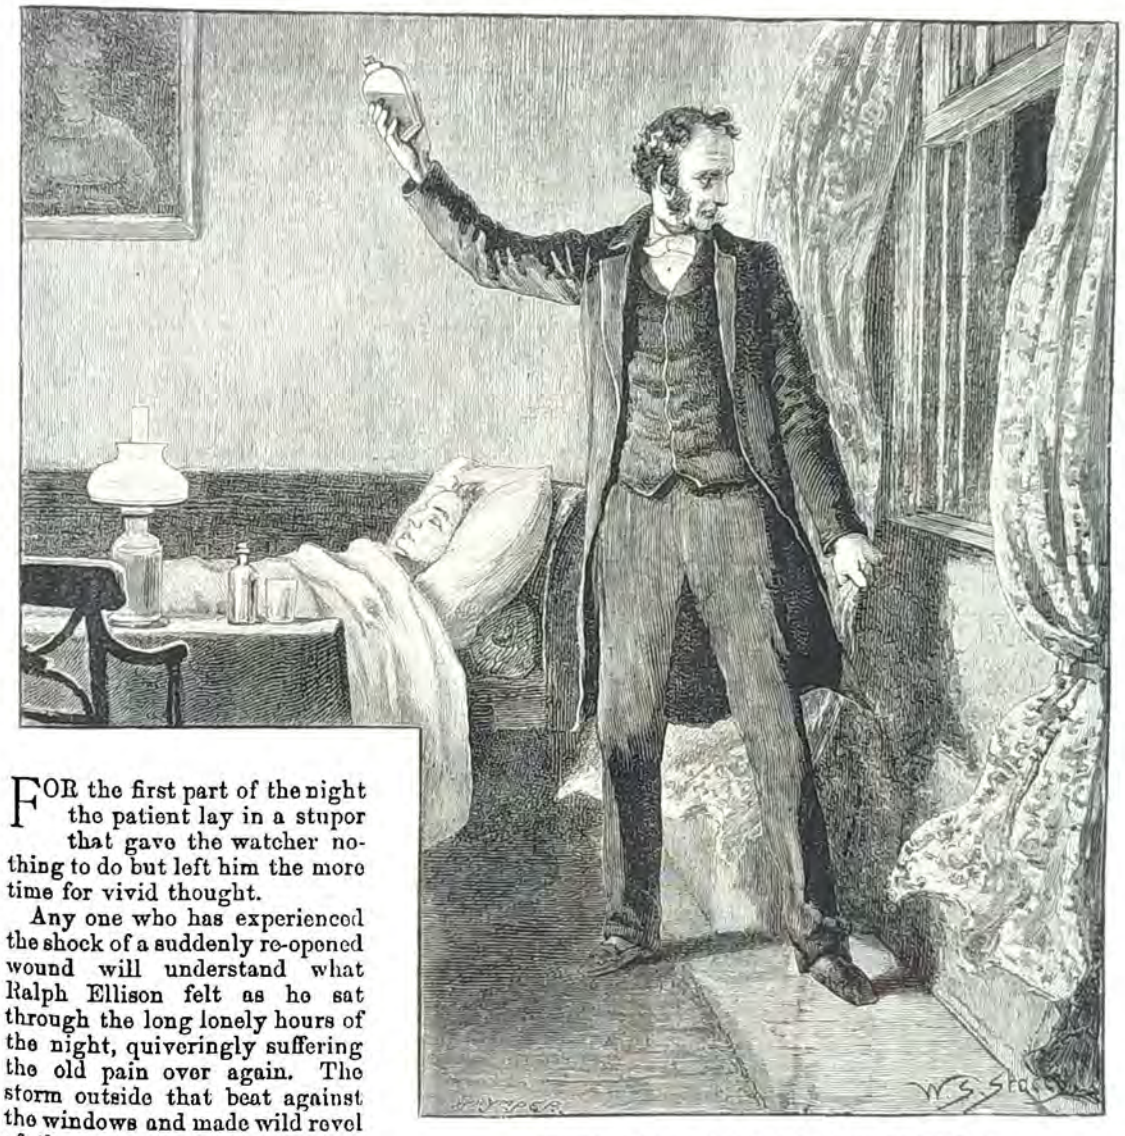
RALPH ELLISON'S OPPORTUNITY.

BY LESLIE KEITH.

CHAPTER IX.



HE FLUNG THE FLASK FAR OUT UPON THE BEACH.

FOR the first part of the night the patient lay in a stupor that gave the watcher nothing to do but left him the more time for vivid thought.

Any one who has experienced the shock of a suddenly re-opened wound will understand what Ralph Ellison felt as he sat through the long lonely hours of the night, quiveringly suffering the old pain over again. The storm outside that beat against the windows and made wild revel of the waves was all unheeded by him, lost, swept away before the force of his mental struggle. As he glanced at the bed all his slow-recovered peace seemed to be slipping from him, all his painfully conquered impulses towards revenge starting up into renewed vigour and vitality. He was held in the clutch of a great dread lest he should lose that hardly won control, and find himself urged to gratify the old promptings towards hatred.

Henry Vane was in his power; he lay helpless and unconscious in the hands of the man he had so deeply wronged. Ralph had but to sit still and neglect him; he had but to substitute the bottle of brandy for the sleeping-draught the doctor had left with him, and the enemy of his peace would trouble him no more.

Already he was growing more restless and feverish as the night wore away, and in his half-coherent mutterings Ralph could make out an appeal for the stimulant on which he had learned to lean, and without the support of which he felt himself sinking into death.

A temptation such as this has a terrible vitality; Ralph had conquered, as he supposed, when he knelt in the little white room above with Josie's hand in his, and yet once again the old vindictive fire was burning in him, the old irresistible tide of passion was rising. Were all his strong cryings and prayers for delivery to go for nothing?

In that moment when he felt himself hovering on a perilous margin, when any breath might plung him into irretrievable guilt, the face of Mary Hughes suddenly rose before him.

He saw it again—the gentle, worn face with the loving, yearning eyes; the impression was so strong that he almost felt as if she were present in the room with him. He heard her voice above the storm with its note of pleading, anxious love; he remembered the pledge he had given her—could he be unfaithful now to the promise that had brought her comfort and ease in dying? But, more than all, could he now, after for years tasting the goodness and tenderness of God, turn his back on Him and refuse to follow the way of life?

He covered his face with his hands in shuddering recoil from the abysses in his own heart that had been so plainly revealed to him, and with his inward cry for help there came back some of the old strength to resist.

He rose stiffly, and taking up the flask walked to the window, and, opening it, flung the bottle far out upon the beach. In a lull of the wind he heard the shiver of the glass upon a stone; but now that he had once more conquered he felt himself shaking all over, as in that first moment when in the helpless stranger whom he had sheltered he discovered Henry Vane.

He leaned out of the window, letting the cold air revive him; the wind was falling before the slow-coming dawn, and the sea was heaving less tempestuously; nature seemed to be weary of the conflict, and Ralph, too, felt worn and spent. Yet, when he shut the window and went back to the sofa, he had no return of the temptation.

For an hour or so before the sleeping-draught which he had with difficulty administered took effect, the fever ran high, and in combating Henry Vane's wild ravings and struggles all his resources were taxed. By and by, however, the patient sank into a heavy sleep, and Ralph lay back in his chair exhausted with his many emotions. When he had time in the disentanglement of his thoughts to ponder over the probable events of Vane's life, he could not withhold a sudden movement of pity. Vane had snatched away Ralph's joy and had made his youth a bitterness to him, but he had not secured happiness for his own portion. The record of a misspent life was written on his face for all men to see; its old beauty and charm were blotted out; the strength, agility, and grace that had made the pride of his young manhood, had been wasted in years of riot and dissipation, and even in sleep, when something of youth and innocence often comes back to a face, he looked a worn and wicked old man. God had taken the revenge out of Ralph's hands and punished this poor wanderer already.

When Josie came creeping downstairs, looking like a ghost in the thick white morning wrapper which she wore, Ralph met her with a smile and the whispered assurance—

"He is better."

"You have had a dreadful night," said Josie, putting her cool hands on his hot head; "you must go and lie down now, and let me take your place. But first I will get you some breakfast."

Ralph said nothing, but he was inwardly resolved that Josie should not share his watch; if it were necessary, he would arrange with the doctor to get some outside help; at all hazards he was determined to spare Josie the shock of a sudden revelation of her relationship to this man. He had no trust in Vane: he could not take refuge in the certainty that his presence was the result of an accident, and a heavy foreboding of evil lay like a weight on his spirit.

Vane had not sought him out to make by his repentance a late amends; more surely, urged by that hatred the wrong-doer feels for the man he has wronged, he had come to do him further injury. Ralph shuddered at the thought, and could only sustain himself with the faint hope that some glimmering of better feeling might yet linger in Vane's breast, and that he might reach and work upon it in persuading him to go without making himself known to his daughter.

After breakfast, which he took with Josie in the kitchen, feigning an appetite, to cheat her loving anxiety, the doctor and the maid-servant —who had been storm-stayed—arrived almost simultaneously; and with the setting in of a cold, clear day, some of the night's terrors began to take on the look of a dream.

The doctor evidently thought so, for his examination of the patient was satisfactorily brief.

"He'll do," he said; "you've given him another chance."

"Do you mean," said Ralph, speaking painfully, "that I—that we—have saved his life?"

The doctor nodded.

"There wouldn't have been any life in him to save, if he had been exposed for another hour or two to last night's storm." He looked at Ralph curiously, wondering what tie connected the men; but though he did not despise gossip, he had the discretion of his profession, and he asked no questions.

"You may have a day or two of nursing yet," he said, "though it is likely enough he'll waken up all right. If you can make up your mind to keep him for a week at the outside, you may turn him out patched-up at the end of it."

Then he turned his attention to Josie, and rallied her on the blank her absence had made at the dinner of the previous evening.

"I got back to find them all in a flurry," he said; "it's as well you had me to make excuses for you, Miss Josie, but you are not to be allowed to escape. Mrs. Brown is coming herself to carry you off to-day; she says Christmas-day must be respected, whoever chooses to fall sick, so you may make up your mind to eat your plum-pudding there this very afternoon."

"She can't carry me off if I refuse to go," said Josie, trying to speak with the old, defiant lightness.

"Yes, she can. She has my authority that you want a little change and amusement, and here is the minister who will back me up."

"Yes," said Ralph eagerly; "certainly she must go."

"There, you see, Miss Josie, you haven't a chance of rebelling."

Ralph had listened in a maze. Christmas-day, was it? The doctor's jests and Mrs. Brown's threatened visit made it wear the air of many other days in Sandbury, and yet it was a day apart to him, for he had gone back twenty-three years in his life.

He spent it mostly in the sick room and alone, firm in his purpose to exclude Josie.

"Why won't you let me help you?" she asked distressfully. "If he is your—your enemy, as you said last night, then he is mine too; let me do my share of caring for him."

"He once did me a great wrong," Ralph spoke with difficulty—there was a dim anguish in his eyes; "I trust God has helped me to forgive him, but I have a reason for refusing to let you wait on him. Some day you shall know it, but meantime you must trust me, my child."

She looked at him sadly. This hint of mystery involving his life and hers was painful to her ingenuous nature, but her love, as always, rose to the surface. She obeyed him, and even at his wish went to eat yesterday's dinner with the Brown family party, bravely trying to smile, though she carried a heavy heart with her.

Mrs. Brown sent the gig for her, and Ralph went to the door to see her set out, wrapping her up carefully from the cold.

"Try to be happy, my Josie," he said; "do not let my old cares rest too heavily upon your young life."

"Oh, how can you ask that of me?" she said reproachfully; "we have shared everything, do not shut me out from your sorrows. Promise me one thing," she said urgently: "when I come home this evening, you will let me come to you at once. I will not stay in the room since you do not wish it, but you will let me come to the door?"

"Yes, surely," he said, glad to buy her absence for the afternoon at that price, and thinking that he could go to her at once when she knocked. "I shall be thinking of you all the while, and hoping you are happy."

But for himself there was no gleam of comfort. The hours were a slow agony, for they brought abatement of the fever to Henry Vane, and with returning consciousness he was not slow to proclaim the object of his visit.

No sense of shame, of the degradation the downward years had wrought in him, seemed to visit him; his position in Ralph's house as an invalid under his care seemed scarcely to affect him, and the changed, stern face of his once friend and admirer only moved him to a kind of mocking mirth.

"So you know me?" he said; "no need to introduce myself, is there? I fancy the years have not been so rough on me as they have on you—you always took things hard—and yet I should have recognised you anywhere. You didn't expect me, of course? I wanted it to be a surprise; Christmas is the time for family reunions, for the return of long-lost relations—of prodigal sons, no doubt you would say."

"I have done what I could for you," said Ralph sternly; "if you have any sense of decency left, you will hold your peace while you are under this roof."

"Always the preacher!" said Vane, with a sneer. "I will leave you, never fear, my friend; I will leave you when I have done that which I came to this forsaken corner of the earth to do. It was not wholly for the pleasure of renewing our friendship that I sought you out."

It gave him a fiendish delight thus to hint at his purpose. No remorse for the past, no gleam of pity for the man whose life he had desolated, moved him; the torture he saw he was inflicting seemed but a fresh incentive to him.

"I've come to relieve you of my girl," he said at last; "I've let you keep her a good many years, but it's my turn now. How did I know where to find you, perhaps you would ask? Oh, I've had my eye on you. I'm cleverer at that game than you were when you set about enquiring for me. Besides," he sneered, "the famous minister of Sion Chapel cannot hide his light under a bushel. You thought I was dead and safely disposed of, I dare say; well, here I am, you see, ready to settle down and play the indulgent father. I have seen my girl; I took care to have a look at her before making myself known," he laughed; "she's a handsome young woman, but I dare say she's a bit of a puritan; safe to be under your care, and she won't be the worse for a glimpse of the world from my point of view."

"Shame, shame!" said Ralph with unrestrained passion; "you took her mother from me, would you rob me of her too?"

Henry Vane laughed once more.

"You can scarcely call it robbery for a man to claim his own. I married her mother before she died; that is a little bit of information I would not have gratified you with, but that you seem to dispute my right over my own child. I am not acquainted with any law that can step in to deprive a father of his rights."

"You have forfeited your claim," said Ralph bitterly; "you have left her to the charity of strangers; it was not by your seeking that she was shielded in her babyhood by the tenderest love; that she found a home here which she has blessed. In all these years you have never cared to enquire whether she lived or were dead,—dead, perhaps, of neglect and cruelty, like her mother before her;—and now—now, when she is happy, now when she is dearer to me than any daughter, you would take her from me——"

He paused abruptly, and hid his face in his hands. He felt how worse than futile were the reproaches that glided off this man as if he never felt them. Then he stooped to kneel and pray for mercy—he a suppliant to Henry Vane, whom he had thought to spurn from his own feet.

"Spare her," he cried; "it will be the one good act of your life—an act for which you will be glad when you come to leave this world. She will die as Alice died, if you force her to go with you. Leave her in peace; let her think as she thinks now, that her father died long ago. Would you not rather be dead in her thoughts, and so hold your sacred place in her imagination, than live to show her your shame?"

Henry Vane smiled mockingly.

"No wonder that they like your sermons if you give them this sort of thing," he said; "it must be as good as a play in this dull hole; but spare me, I haven't heard a sermon since the days when your eloquence shook all the old women in Manchester; and you only convince me that I am right to take my girl away before she becomes too saintly for my society. She will scarcely thank you for proposing to shut her up in your nunnery; if Josie is the young woman I take her to be, she will jump at the idea of a new father who is prepared to be a little less straitlaced than her adopted one."

What wild ideas Ralph may have entertained of rushing out to seek Josie—to carry her off, to hide her where Vane could never find her—were all swept away almost before his bewildered thoughts had formed themselves in order, by an accident which, had he been more collected, he might have foreseen and prevented.

Sent home early by her uneasiness on his account, Josie had entered the house without his being aware of her return, and indeed in the heat and passion of his argument he might easily have failed to hear her light footfall. Remembering his permission, she had gone at once to the sickroom, hurried by a new dread when she heard the sound of passion-stirred voices coming from the half-open door.

It was Vane who saw her first as she leaned against the doorpost, white to the lips.

"Here she is," he said easily; "come to answer for herself; come in, don't be frightened, my dear: I am your long-lost father, as they say in the plays."

Ralph looked up and saw by her face that she had heard and understood everything. Her eyes met his, which were sunken and dim; and reading the dreary anguish in them, she stepped swiftly up to him.

"Is this true—this that he says—" she spoke in a hoarse whisper, "that he is—that he is my father—and that he is going to take me away from you——"

Ralph's eyes looked into hers despairingly, but his lips could not frame a sound. It was the voice of the stranger that replied:

"It is quite true, my dear; he doesn't deny it, you perceive. I have come, like the benevolent fathers in fairy tales, to carry you off to new delights."

Josie never so much as looked at him. It seemed as though she did not hear him.

"It is not true—say it is not true." Her burning eyes were fixed on Ralph, and her voice rose into a wail of passionate pleading. "You are my father, the only father I have ever known. I want no other."

Ralph could bear no more. His head sank forward on his breast. His silence was her answer, but it cost him an anguish bitter as death.

IRON IN THE SOUL.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E.

"He was laid in iron."—Psalm cv. 18.

THE marginal reference tells us that a more literal rendering of these singular words would be "his soul came into iron." This is a peculiar Hebrew expression, and is equivalent to a well-known poetical phrase which we often use when we speak of a man who is sorely tried, "The iron hath entered his soul." The composer of the Psalm in which this remarkable metaphor occurs, lived, we have reason to believe, in the days of Nehemiah. He was an exiled Jew, mourning the sore evils that had come upon his people by reason of their long-continued captivity in Babylon. There were stirrings of reviving national life among the exiles; and the thought was ever recurring in the mind of the Psalmist that the God who had so often interfered at critical moments in the history of their country would manifest Himself once more, and turn again their captivity as the streams in the south. He was led to compare the captivity in Babylon with the bondage in Egypt; and he felt sure that as God had shown by signs and wonders on the banks of the Nile that He had not forsaken His people, so He would show by the marvels of His providence on the banks of the Euphrates that His merciful presence still continued to dwell with them. The story of the imprisonment of Joseph by the law of association was thus forcibly recalled to his mind; and he dwelt upon it as furnishing a striking parallel, in the sufferings which he endured and in the glory that crowned them, to the sufferings which the children of Israel were enduring in Babylon, which he had no doubt would result in an equally triumphant consummation.

The iron entered, said the Psalmist, into the soul of Joseph. This does not, indeed, appear on the surface of the narrative. We read the account of his imprisonment, but it does not leave upon our minds the impression that it was such a dreadful calamity after all. We are told that the Lord was with him and prospered all that he did, and the jailer committed the care of the prisoners and the oversight of the prison into his hands, as Potiphar had previously made him ruler over his house. This position of responsibility would imply, one would suppose, a large measure of personal freedom and consideration from others. And so prominently is this favour shown to him by God and man set forth, that we are apt to think that this was the whole of his prison life, and that it had no other side.

But the Psalmist's forcible words lead us to look beneath the surface, and find out what was the true nature of his imprisonment. "Whose feet they hurt with fetters; he was laid in iron." These are not words that could be used of a man who was allowed to roam at large through the prison-house, and whose bondage was but a name. Rather do they bring before us the picture of a man who was close confined, who was chained to the wall of his dungeon; whose movements were cramped by the sharpness and weight of the fetters upon his hands and feet. What a criminal prison must have been in Egypt under the despotic government of the Pharaohs, it is not difficult to imagine. It was far worse than anything we have ever known in our country. Dry cesspools were not unfrequently used as prisons. And that the place in which Joseph was confined must have been somewhat of this nature, we gather from the very term which he himself applied to it: "Here, also, I have done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon." Think of Joseph—like the African monarch Jugurtha, confined in the Mamertine prison at Rome—accustomed to roam without restriction over the hills and plains of his native place, chained to the wall of a prison whose filth and gloom were indescribable! Imprisonment in such circumstances, to such a man, meant far more than it would do to the dwellers in the confined streets of the city. Joseph, too, was at that period of life when the world offers so many ideal allurements, and the ardent passions long to realise them. Full of health and hope and intellect, it must indeed have been an intolerable bondage that shut him out from all possibility of tasting the full cup which youth presented to his lips.

But worse than his physical pains and restraints was the torture of his mind. The iron entered his soul. It would not have been in human nature not to brood bitterly and resentfully upon the great wrong that had been done to him. He felt that he had been degraded without a cause. The consciousness of his innocence of the sin imputed to him might in one sense have been a consolation, but in another sense it must have greatly aggravated his sufferings. He felt that he had washed his hands in innocency in vain; that he was fated to suffer as cruel a punishment as if he had been actually guilty. When he looked back upon the long weary months that had passed since the memorable day when his father in distant Canaan sent him out to visit his brethren as they tended their flocks on the hills of Shechem, and they first entombed him in a pit and then took him up and sold him to the Ishmaelites, he seemed to himself to have gained nothing by his goodness but the hatred of his brethren and the malicious revenge of his mistress and the cruel wrath of his master; nothing but the doom of the exile and the slave and the prisoner. If John the Baptist in after-years in his lonely prison at Macherus got into a despondent mood, and lost for a time his faith in the Messiah, having sent to enquire of Christ, "Art thou He that should come, or look we for another?" why should there not have crept over the mind of Joseph similar painful doubts begotten of his cruel treatment and his bitter wrongs? His life in that dreary dungeon must have been a stern fight of faith to preserve his trust in human goodness and in Divine mercy; and the chain that daily grew tighter upon him was a foe not to be shaken off, with whose doubts and fears he had continually to do battle. When we take all these things into consideration, we cannot wonder at the earnestness with which he besought the butler to effect his release. And when even this last hope failed him, and the ungrateful butler left him to his fate and forgot all about him, and the slow weary days passed on until he had completed two years of imprisonment; and he felt as if he were now bereft of all, even of his faith, as if God, if there were a God, had forsaken him as man had betrayed and deserted him, and all the bright dreams of his life vanished in the darkness of despair,—we can understand that the Psalmist used no words of exaggeration when he said that "the iron had entered his soul."

But those things that seemed to be against Joseph were in reality working together for his good. There are persons who are born in favourable circumstances, with every advantage that wealth and influence can give them; and these easily attain to high positions without having undergone any training through the trials and drudgeries of a struggling life. But such favourites of fortune, basking in the sunshine of the world, have no intrinsic superiority, whatever may be the adventitious greatness thrust upon them. They are not the most important actors in the drama of Divine providence. On the contrary, they are often the mere cyphers, or lay figures on which to exhibit the splendid properties of the stage; while the real heroes, the offspring of the loftiest conceptions of the poet, are personated by those who are unjustly charged with crimes, upon whose defenceless heads all manner of wrongs and injuries are heaped, and who bear with magnanimity "the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune." Joseph was destined to be the ruler of Egypt, and for this great position the dreary prison was to be the strait and narrow way. Chaste as he had proved himself to be in his contact with foul temptation, there were yet indwelling sins in his soul whose outbreak would have been ruinous to his career, from which he needed to be purified. There were selfish pride, imprudence, vanity, obstinacy, from which he required to be delivered, if he was to be a truly great and righteous administrator. Those who have to rule others must be taught to rule themselves by noble self-denial and brave endurance of hardship. The man who is destined to teach is compelled himself to learn bitter lessons; must learn the immortal consolations by probing all suffering himself. The Psalmist tells us in forcible terms of the wretchedness of the prison; but we can see for ourselves in the after-life of Joseph the calmness and nobleness that were born of the miserable experience. Two years of wrongful imprisonment seemed a long time taken out of the life of a young man impatient to realize his glowing dreams, and to be up and doing in the struggle of the world; but they were not assuredly wasted years. The plough of sorrow had drawn wide and deep furrows in his soul, and the season of ploughing was a bare and miserable season; but in these furrows were cast the seeds of many a noble resolution from which a glorious harvest was afterwards to be reaped in joy. The iron indeed entered his soul. Outwardly it degraded and impoverished him, but inwardly it ennobled and enriched him.

Joseph suffered much in his disposition by the injudicious treatment which he had received in his Hebrew home. He was the child of the dearly-loved Rachel, and therefore his father's favourite son, sheltered from the rough winds of life and surrounded by the experienced tenderness of old age; a tenderness doubly tender on account of the great shock it had suffered by the ever-lamented death of his mother. A coat of many colours was made for him; by which is meant a long loose robe, worn only by the rich and noble, who were exempt from all labour. While his brethren were sent with short rough garments, girded close about the loins, to do the toilsome work of shepherds among the hills, Joseph as the favourite child was kept at home in idleness, living pleasantly and softly in his pretentious robe. This partiality of Jacob wrought the same mischief in his own home which the partiality of Isaac and Rebecca wrought in his father's home; the same mischief which partiality in families works everywhere. It filled the hearts of Joseph's brethren with bitter envy and jealousy and an intolerable sense of wrong; and it spoiled the subject of it and made him selfish and unfit for the hard work of life. The wearing of the coat of many colours filled him with pride. He presumed upon his father's favour and lorded it over his brethren. He told them with a most imprudent frankness about his dreams of the future, in which he was destined to rule not only over them but even over his father's house. He told tales upon them, brought an evil report against them to his father. His whole conduct shows that in his early years he was just what we might have expected him to be considering his foolish upbringing, destitute of manly vigour, tact, and prudence.

But God was kinder to him than his own father; and the thirteen years that he was forced to spend away from that father's mischievous love, as a slave in the house of Potiphar and as a prisoner in the dungeon of Egypt—years of hardship and misery untold—had wrought a marvellous transformation in him. He emerged from his prison-life entirely cured of his faults, his pride, his vanity, his childishness. And no sooner was he clothed with the robe of royal power and invested with Pharaoh's signet ring and gold chain, than he acted with a consummate wisdom and prudence which seemed never to be at fault. During his long occupancy of the highest position in Egypt next to the king—possessed of almost irresponsible power—he proved himself to be the wisest and most conciliatory of administrators, regarded by all classes with the utmost esteem and confidence. Though cruelly wronged, he manifested the most noble generosity and forgivingness, and became the saviour of his people in their time of great distress. Not in vain therefore was he "laid in iron," since he had thus learned "to suffer and be strong."

Iron enters largely into the composition of our earth. It gives stability to its rocks and fertility to its soils. It helps to form the pillars on which the whole vast superstructure rests, whose massive strength resists alike the weathering of the storms and the battering of the waves. It is apparently also the substance that is most prevalent in other worlds, judging from the evidence of the aërolites that fall upon our earth, which are composed almost entirely of iron. It is the material by the aid of which more than all others man has been able to subdue the earth to his own uses, and to raise on it those wonderful works which have made him what he is, only a little lower than the angels. Iron is also the source of much of the beauty of the world. It is with the strongest of her substances that nature adorns her fairest. It gives their rich and varied colouring to the rocks and the jewels. The amethyst and the ruby gleam with its magic hues. Marble owes to it not only the lovely coloured veins that pervade it, but even its own formation; for it is the presence of magnetic iron that starts the crystalline process which changes the rude limestone into the brilliant marble. Iron paints the flowers of the field with their crimson dyes, gives the scarlet colour to the human lips and the vivid blush to the cheeks. Iron also is the best of all tonics and medicines, restoring to the pale and flaccid body the ruddy vigour of health it has lost. As great as are the use and importance of iron in the field of nature, so great are the use and importance of its spiritual counterpart in the sphere of human life. Gold is but a medium of exchange for goods that perish in the using and touches us only superficially; but iron that enters into the soul is a rich experience, a saving health, and becomes a part of our vitality. Gold is outward wealth; iron is inward. The attraction of gold is partial; the magnetic attraction of the iron of sorrow that subdues and ennobles the soul is universal, and draws all hearts together—the one touch of nature that makes the whole world kin. Not by a golden but by an iron chain are the members of humanity linked to each other; and just as in the world of art gold is sparingly employed and iron largely and constantly, so the characters that are most useful and that attract most attention everywhere are those which have been formed, not by the gold of success, but by the iron of trial; for—

"Life is not as idle ore,
But iron dug from central gloom,
And heated hot with burning fears,
And dipped in baths of hissing tears,
And battered with the shocks of doom
To shape and use."

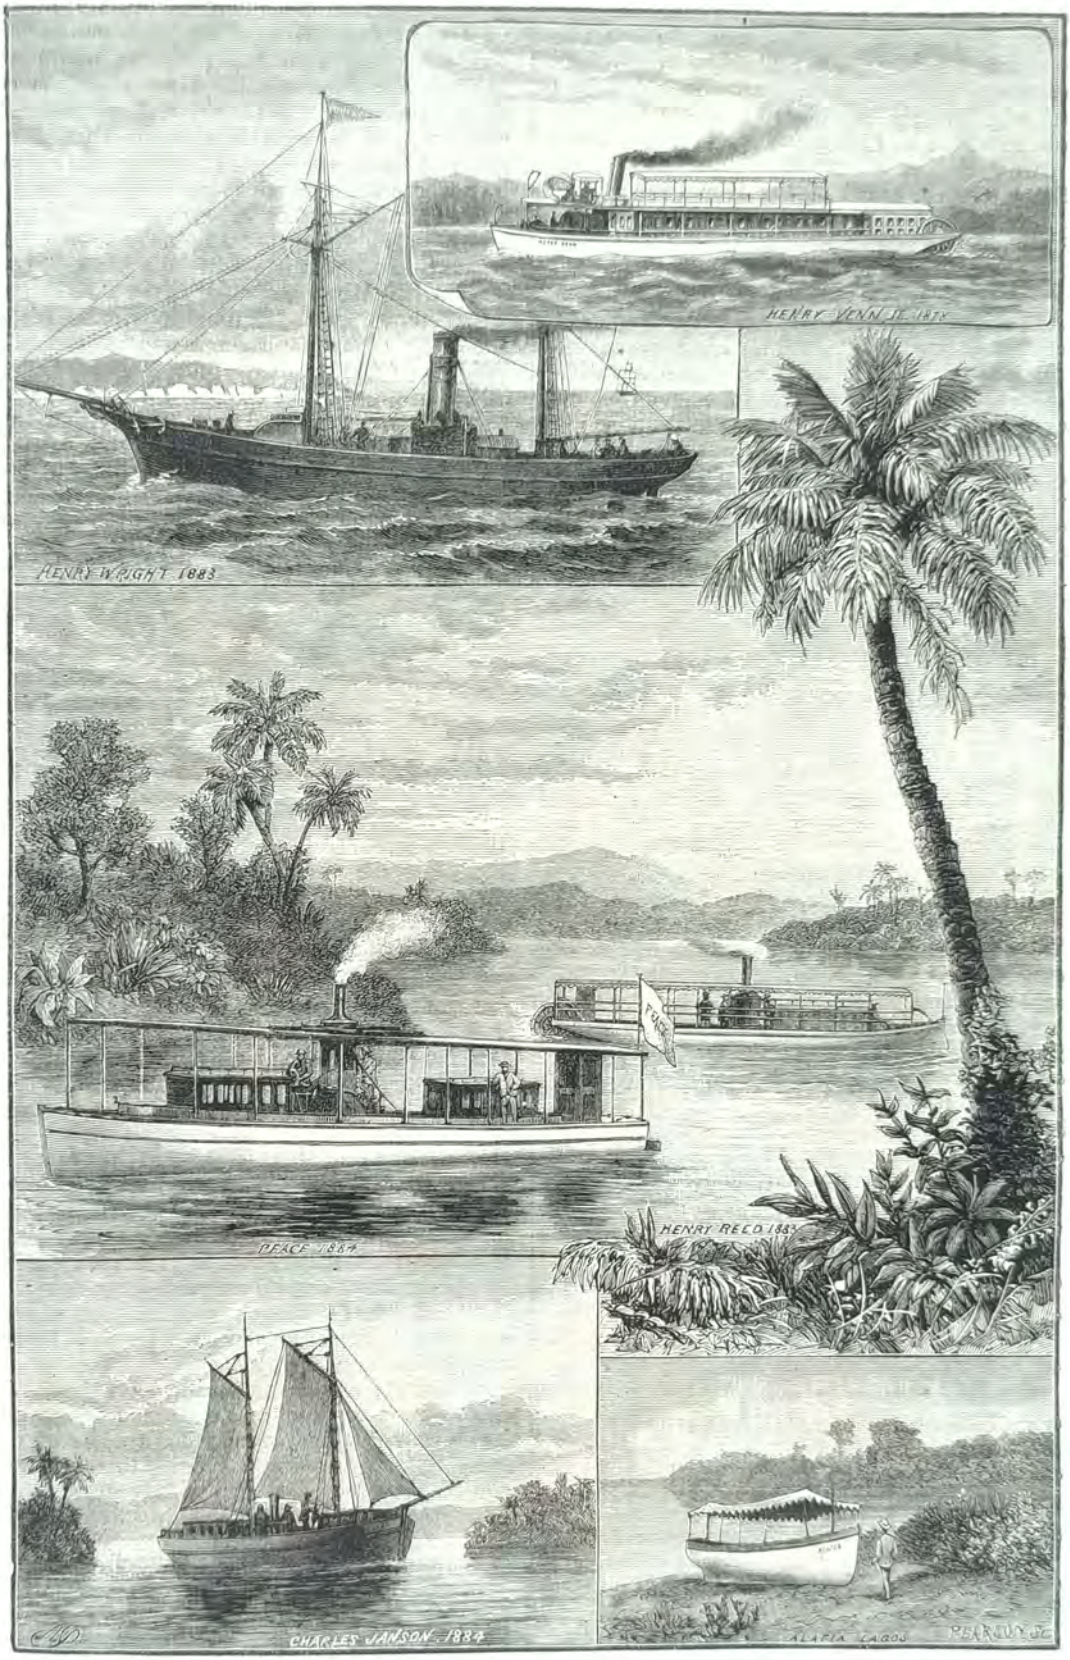
The men that have done the greatest things in the world, and that have been themselves the greatest characters, have been the men who were laid in iron, and who have learned patience and sweetness by the things which they suffered. Pain is the deepest thing that we have in our nature; and it brings out the noblest thing that is in us. Pale, etiolated, sickly is the man or woman whose blood has lost its red particles through a deficiency of iron. Weak and worthless is the anæmic soul into which the iron of some great trial or sorrow has not entered some time or other. Paul lifting up his manacled hand before the trembling, conscience-stricken Agrippa, so weak, so wretched though a king, said, "I would to God that thou wert altogether such as I am except this chain." But he needed not to have excepted the chain; for it would have been better for Agrippa, brought up in sinful luxury and ease, if a chain like that which bound the Apostle had bound him too; for in that case his nature might have been enlarged in distress, and if a sadder he had been a wiser man.

More precious than gold is the sympathy of the soul into which the iron of adversity has entered. And the wonderful enlargement of human sympathy Joseph got by having his life narrowed within the straits of human suffering. God had set him free through imprisonment. The door of the prison-house was the door of a larger liberty. And so was it with St. Paul, who, when he received his call to be an apostle, was shown "how great things he must suffer for Christ's sake." At the close of life, he was immured in one of Rome's most terrible dungeons, aged, worn-out, forsaken by his friends. He was laid in iron, and the iron entered deeper into his soul than into that of any of the disciples; but what a strength, what a touching beauty did it give his character! The iron in his case had qualities superadded to it in the furnace which advanced it to the condition of steel, the most worthy and important of all the forms of iron. And not without cause is the man who has undergone this process called "true as steel;" for it gives him an elasticity of soul and a keenness of spiritual perception which pass sword-like through all the evils of the world. While he bore in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, he bore in his soul still grander marks of Him. His fulness of trust in his Saviour, his gentleness and consideration for others, were most remarkable. And through his prison-bars he obtained a grander outlook into the eternal world. That fettered hand of his wielded a sceptre infinitely more powerful than that of the Roman Emperor; for it wrote in the gloom of the dungeon epistles whose mighty words have helped to build up a kingdom that has endured, while the empire of the Cæsars has vanished like a shadow.

Consider above all others the Captain of our salvation, who was made perfect through sufferings. He was laid in iron as never human being was. The iron entered deeper into His soul than into any human soul. He was the "man of sorrows," as if there were no other. He was alone in the awful supremacy of His woe, crowned with the crown of thorns as the Prince of sufferers. Was it not when nailed to the cross —when the iron pierced through and through both soul and body—that He poured out to man His tenderest words of love, and to God His mightiest cry of intercession? His cross became a throne, and the symbol of His weakness and degradation the mightiest power in the world—the glory before which all other glory pales.

The Gospel came to Europe, as it first came into the world, through the sufferings of the cross. It was in the inner prison of Philippi that it was first proclaimed. The feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace were made fast in the stocks; and the men sent to preach deliverance to the captives, themselves were bound. But from this imprisonment came forth the message of salvation which set all Europe free; which changed tyrants into constitutional kings, serfs into subjects, slaves into freedmen, and nobles into guardians of the poor. This is ever the Divine way. None can lift the iron load of others if the iron has not first entered into their own soul, and thus made them strong to bear and magnetic to feel the sufferings of humanity. Each human heart knows its own imprisonment. We may be shut out from the freedom and enjoyment of life by some hidden disease, some galling poverty, some bitter frustration of our hopes, some cruel wrong done to us when we had striven to be generous and to do the right—or by our own heart becoming the grave of a dead sorrow or of a living sorrow worse than death. But surely if we know that the iron enters our soul in order to give us a tender magnetism towards the kindred points of heaven and home; that we are thus laid in iron in order that we may be trained by all our defeats and failures for the task we have to do for God and for the world; we shall trust in the loving-kindness and tender mercy of Him who in all our afflictions is Himself afflicted, and who has given to us in that fact the assurance that we shall not be tried above what we are able to bear, but with every trial shall have the way of escape provided for us. The chain may indeed bind us for years, and may be taken off only when we have forgotten what it is to be free, and feel like the poor prisoner who was so long in captivity that he preferred when released the prison, where he had become at home by habit, to the strange terrifying world upon which he was launched; but all the time if the chain has bound us closer to Christ, we have gained more than we have lost.

MISSIONARY SHIPS.



MISSIONARY SHIPS.

Every one has heard of the Iron Crown with which in ancient times the Lombard kings were crowned, and in later times the German emperors when they wished to manifest their claims as kings of Lombardy. Charlemagne was crowned with it eleven hundred years ago; and Napoleon Buonaparte put it upon his head when he conquered Italy. It is a golden crown, set with precious stones; but it derives its name from an iron circle fixed inside, concealed from view, which, according to the legend, was made out of a nail of Christ's cross. In connection with this crown, "the Order of the Iron Crown" was founded; and it now ranks amongst the noblest orders of the Austrian Empire.

Christian sufferers, you belong to the spiritual order of the Iron Crown! You are not Companions of the Thistle or the Bath or the Garter, but companions in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. It is His cross that you carry. It is His sufferings that you have the fellowship of. It is with His crown that you are crowned; a crown of gold that fadeth not away, but whose most precious part is the inner iron circle that clasps your brow, made of the nails of His cross, showing that you have been crucified with Him. For it is a faithful saying, "if we be dead with Him, we shall live with Him; if we suffer, we shall reign with Him." Listen to the song of triumph from one of the noblest knights of the Iron Crown, as he was chained in a Roman prison, "in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron," his vision in the awful darkness piercing beyond the battle and the struggling faith—"Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me on that day; and not to me only, but unto all them also that love His appearing."

THE MISSIONARY SHIPS.

BY ROBERT CUST, LL.D.

PART I.

I FOLLOW the example, and make use of the labours, of our German Brethren in the "Mission Zeitschrift," and chronicle the history of the successive mission-ships. No small interest attaches to them, for they have carried the good tidings, the merchandise of great price into many regions, and their weapons, though not carnal, have won great victories. Moreover, they have been the homes of good and holy men, both British and Native, who have devoted their lives and not been afraid to die for the great cause of the extension of their Master's kingdom.

A poetess has anticipated me in the description of this charming subject. I give Mrs. Hemans' beautiful lines, suggested by the sailing of one of the earlier vessels:

Oft shall the shadow of the palm-tree lie
O'er glassy bay, wherein thy sails are furled,
And its leaves whisper, as the winds sweep by,
Tales of the older world.

Oft shall the burning stars of southern skies
On the mid-ocean see thee charmed in sleep,
A lonely home for human thoughts, and ties,
Between the heavens and deep.

Blue seas, that roll on gorgeous coasts renowned,
By night shall sparkle, where thy prow makes way;
Strange creatures of th' abyss, that none may sound,
In thy broad wake shall play.

From hills unknown, in mingled joy and fear,
Free dusky tribes shall pour thy flag to mark;
Blessings go with thee on thy lone career!
Hush, and farewell, thou bark!

A long farewell! Thou wilt not bring us back
All, whom thou bearest far from home and hearth;
Many are thine, whose steps no more shall track
Their own sweet native earth.

Among the first, though after the Moravians, was the Duff, which in 1796 was chartered by the London Missionary Society to convey the Gospel to the mysterious islands of the South Seas. The grandeur and novelty of the enterprise can scarcely now be appreciated. It is characteristic of that age, that the Duff was chartered to call at a South American port to take up supplies of good wine for the use of the missionaries; what would the present generation say to that? The Duff returned safely to England, but on its second voyage it was captured by the French cruisers, and the missionaries were confined in a French prison, and the good ship disappears.

In 1821, the great missionary hero, John Williams, purchased at Sydney a ship which he named the Endeavour, with a view of evangelising and creating a legitimate commerce in the Harvey Islands. He was ordered by the Home Committee to sell the ship. John Williams then undertook, though ignorant of shipbuilding, to build himself a ship, which he named the Messenger of Peace, which for many years did him good service. In 1838, on his return to England, by his own personal exertions he got together enough money to purchase a larger vessel, the Camden, on board which he safely returned to the field of his labour, and which he left only to be murdered and devoured at Eromanga in the New Hebrides, in 1839. The Camden, till 1843, did good service in carrying the Gospel from island to island. In 1844 it was replaced by a larger and more convenient vessel, John Williams I., which sailed yearly backwards and forwards from England to the South Seas, until, in 1864, it was wrecked on Danger Island. The new ship, John Williams II., suffered the same fate in 1867 at Savage Island. John Williams III. then took its place, no longer to proceed to England, but destined to keep up the communication among the islands, and supplied with auxiliary steam-power. It is notable that the connected islands subscribed largely to the expenses of these last two ships, and, moreover, the mission-ship proved itself to be a necessity for carrying on the work of a mission spread over scores of islands scattered over a large area. On the side of the vessel is inscribed in gold letters on a blue ground, Peace on Earth and Good-will towards Men.

The London Missionary Society had another steamer in the Torres Straits, the Ellengowan I., the generous gift of Miss Baxter, for the service of the New Guinea Mission. In 1881 the same lady presented a two-masted steamer, Ellengowan II. The work of evangelisation would be impossible without the assistance and the additional help of smaller craft, given by kind friends for the same purpose.

When Marsden had prevailed upon the Church Missionary Society to send a mission to New Zealand in 1817, he purchased at his own expense a brig, the Active, to despatch the missionaries, and he followed them himself. This ship was of a great use, and made the missionaries independent of the precarious and uncertain accommodation afforded by merchant vessels and whalers. The necessity has long since passed away.

At their Jubilee in 1838, a subscription was collected by the Methodist Church to send out a vessel to the South Seas, and in 1839 the Triton accomplished the voyage. Since 1848, the good ship, the John Wesley I., has kept up the communication of the scattered Wesleyan Missions, assisted by smaller craft. In 1865 the John Wesley I. was wrecked, and was replaced by a John Wesley II. (this also suffered so much that it had to be sold) and two smaller vessels, the Jubilee and John Hunt; and with the aid of cutters all the needs of the missionaries are supplied.

The American Mission Board of Boston, U.S., and its daughter, the Hawaii Missionary Society, kept up its intercourse with its mission in Mikronesia, in the Caroline, Marshall, and Gilbert Islands, by the aid of a small vessel, the Caroline, but this proving too small was replaced in 1851 by Morning Star I., which, with the aid of smaller craft, did good service till 1867, when, being no longer seaworthy, it was sold, and replaced by Morning Star II., which was wrecked in 1869. Its successor, Morning Star III., was also wrecked in 1884. The school-children in America and Asia Minor contributed so large a sum, that Morning Star IV. came into existence, a large three-masted vessel with steam auxiliary power, three times bigger than its predecessor, No. I., twice as big as No. II. and No. III., a proof of the greatly increased work of the mission.

When Bishop Selwyn, of New Zealand, first conceived the idea of evangelising the New Hebrides in 1847, he purchased a small ship of twenty-two tons, the Undine, and in 1849 in this nut-shell the bold skipper-bishop navigated the sea with a crew of four men, and brought lads from the Loyalty Islands and New Caledonia to be educated in New Zealand. For his second trip he was supplied by the Church of Australia with a larger vessel of seventy tons, the Border Maid, and penetrated as far as the Solomon Islands. The returning lads were welcomed with joy, and the ship thus became a preacher of the Gospel. In 1856 a friend presented the mission with a larger schooner, Southern Cross I., which, in 1860, was wrecked. In 1863, Bishop Selwyn's successor, Bishop Patteson, was enabled by the help of generous friends to send out Southern Cross II., larger in size and with auxiliary steam-power. As this was barely sufficient for the wide-spread work of the Melanesian Mission, the gift of a small additional steamer by a lady was gladly welcomed.

The same necessities produced the same results for the United Presbyterian Missions of the Free Church of Scotland, Australia, and Canada in the New Hebrides. The little Columba was superseded in 1857 by the John Knox, which did not prove equal to the work, and gave way in 1864 to Day Spring I., a two-masted brigantine, but after having done excellent service it was wrecked in 1873. It was succeeded by Day Spring II., a three-masted vessel of 160 tons; after excellent service this is to be replaced by a large sailing vessel, with a steam launch for the discharge of the internal service of the mission stations.

In Sumatra the Rhine Mission supplied itself in 1882 with a small steamer, the Denninger, to communicate with its stations in the Island of Nias.

The Hermansburg Missionary Society launched the first German mission-ship, the Kandace, in 1853, to take the missionaries to the mission-field in South Africa. In 1874 it was declared to be no longer seaworthy, was got rid of, and the place not supplied, as it was found less expensive to send out missionaries by the numerous commercial steamers.

The Norwegian Missionaries launched a mission-ship, named Elieser, in 1865, a three-masted sailing vessel, which conveyed their agents to the coast of Zululand and Madagascar. After twenty years' good and profitable service it gave way to a new sailing vessel, named Paulus, and it appears to make money by trading, which is very objectionable.

The Swedish Missionary Association was not so fortunate with their ship Ausgarius, named after a Swedish Apostle. It was built in 1873, a sailing vessel with auxiliary steam-power. It went to Massava in the Red Sea, and made expeditions along the coast of South Africa: soon after it was recalled to Gothenburg, and, after a very short service, sold in 1879, for it was obvious that the commercial steamers could convey missionaries at much less cost.

On the River Zambési Livingstone first appeared with an iron steamer, the Ma Robert, called after his wife, which went to the bottom, and was succeeded by the Pioneer, made of wood, with paddle, and was sold soon after, as the draught proved unsuitable to the navigation of the River Shiré. Lady Nyassa I. succeeded, an iron screw, but which was sold at Bombay. In 1876, Cotterill appeared on the Nyassa with the steamer Herga on a commercial enterprise, and presented it to the Mission of the Scotch Free Church, in whose service it sank to the bottom. In 1875 Young appeared with the Ilála, named after the place where Livingstone died; it was the first steamer which circumnavigated Lake Nyassa, and now belongs to the African Commercial Lake Company, who in 1878 placed on the waters of the River Shiré Lady Nyassa II., a paddle-steamer. It was sunk by the hostile natives. The company built at Greenwich a new steamer, the James Stevenson. The Ilála passed from the possession of the Free Church Mission into the hands of the commercial company, which is on friendly terms with the mission. In 1884 the Universities' Mission in East Africa placed the steamer Charles Janson on the Nyassa Lake, to be, as it were, the headquarters of that branch of the mission.

In 1876 the Church Missionary Society sent out the Highland Lassie to run from Zanzibár to Mombása, on the East Coast of Africa, but it was not equal to the navigation at all seasons of the year. In 1883 the steamer Henry Wright supplied its place: at that time there was no line of commercial steamers running betwixt Mombása and Zanzibár; as there is such convenience now, it may be questioned whether a mission-steamer is required. In 1875 the Church Missionary Society sent out to Zanzibár, and thence conveyed by a land journey, the little vessel The Daisy to the waters of the Victoria Nyanza, which it reached in 1877. It navigated the lake to Rubága, the capital of U-Ganda in the north-west corner, but was wrecked in 1879. A sailing boat was then constructed by the missionaries on the lake, named the Eleanor, from the materials brought from England. It is a very serious matter indeed placing a vessel upon an inland sea many hundred miles from the ocean, as the expense of porterage is enormous, and the hostile tribes on the shore may at any moment capture or destroy the vessel. A new boat adapted to machinery is now being constructed on the lake.

The London Missionary Society sent a boat in many hundred portions from Zanzibár to Ujiji, on Lake Tanganyika, in 1883, which was called the Morning Star. Soon after, they sent a steamer, the Good News, built in London, which was conveyed to Kilimáni on the east coast of Africa, thence up the Zambési River; it was then conveyed on board the steamer Ilála across the whole length of Lake Nyassa, and thence by porters along the new road, constructed at the expense of James Stevenson, to the southern shore of the Lake Tanganyika, where it was put together and launched in 1884.

On the east coast of Africa the Livingstone Kongo Mission in 1881 launched their small steamer the Livingstone, at Stanley Pool, on the Upper Kongo; it experienced great disasters, and after the bursting of its boilers is used as a sailing boat. It was succeeded by a second boat, the Moffat in 1882, and by a third, the Henry Reed, in 1883, which has accomplished a great deal of navigation of the Kongo waters, and is now transferred with the whole mission to the North American Baptist Union.

The English Baptist Missionary Society, in 1882, sent out the steel boat, Plymouth, to Stanley Pool. To this followed in the same year the steamer Peace, which has accomplished marvellous voyages of discovery; it was launched at Stanley Pool in 1884.

Bishop William Taylor, of the Self-Supporting American Mission to the Portuguese Colony of Angóla in West Africa, collected enough money in America to send out a steamer to navigate the River Coan and Kongo, which he named Annie Taylor, after his wife.

The American missionaries in the French Colony of the Gabún on West Africa have a schooner, the Albert Bushnell, which serves the mission on the Island of Corisco.

The Baptist Missionary Society, during its occupation of the Kamerún country, in West Africa, as a mission-field, in 1861 sent out a small schooner, the Wanderer, which sunk. In 1871 they had a small steamer to keep up the communication between their stations; this was succeeded by another steamer. The mission is now abandoned.

The United Presbyterian Missionary Society on the Old Calabar River has a small steamer to navigate the river named the David Williamson, to communicate with the out-stations.

OLD NANNIE.

WE want to carry our readers to-day for a few minutes into a very old-world spot indeed, though this is the latter half of the nineteenth century—to ask them to visit with us a very old-world individual. There is a deal said and written about the things and ways and habits of the present time among us, so much that we are almost tired of it; it may therefore be refreshing to some people to get for a little while into a region where, in many points, they will find themselves suddenly in the midst of the last century.

There is a corner of West Somersetshire which lies between the Bristol Channel and North Devon, and which is very little known to even the most enterprising tourists, where old customs, and old beliefs, and old manners exist to an extent that would be hardly credited by the dwellers in large cities, or in thickly-populated country districts. It is a beautiful tract of country, now spreading out into broad, purple moorland, now narrowing into lovely green valleys among the hills; a land of tricksy, sparkling, winding streams, and deep lanes, the tall hedges of which are hung with a wondrous tapestry woven of delicate ferns, and soft velvet-like mosses, and rare wild-flowers, and sweetbriar, and woods where the red deer harbour; and it is into the middle of this land that we want to lead the way to Old Nannie's cottage.

If your feet are used to tread only pavements, or trim walks in city parks and boulevards, walk carefully down this steep path through the woodland: if you do not, you may very likely slip on these broad flat stones that form unexpected steps here and there, or stumble over the roots of trees that stretch across the way. Do not linger either, for if you once begin to pause, to look into all the strange and beautiful things around you, the many flowers laughing up at you at the path-side, and the squirrels bounding from branch to branch over your head, and the woodpecker at work yonder, making a noise exactly like a fairy carpenter busy with his hammer, we shall never arrive at Nannie's cottage to-day. Tread yet more circumspectly down this field, which is more like the side of a house than anything else, and a house built of glass, moreover, it is so slippery. Beware how you cross the narrow bridge over the stream, though Nannie with her eighty years crosses it like a swallow on the wing; it is nothing but the trunk of a tree thrown in airy, careless fashion from bank to bank. Now all dangers and difficulties are surmounted, and we are at Nannie's cottage at last.

There she stands to welcome us, in her little close-fitting bonnet, and her large handkerchief pinned so trimly across her breast, and her shawl with the curious branching flower pattern on its border, which was, she will tell you, worn by her mother at her wedding. A quaint little figure she is; she might well be made of china just taken out of an old closet. When we look however into Nannie's face, we find something more than china there; we find such a deal of shrewdness and kindliness and fun mixed altogether in it in spite of wrinkles and furrows, that a painter might make it his study, and use all his skill without arriving at a satisfactory likeness.

Let us glance around first at Nannie's cottage; she will be well pleased to tell us about everything that is in it, and it will repay us for the trouble of inspection. Look at those cups and saucers: these strange shapes upon them, supposed to represent beasts and flowers, must surely have belonged to pre-Adamite times. They were among Nannie's wedding-presents, and were her chief pride on her bridal morning. On that shelf is the huge bowl which was an heirloom in the old yeoman's family with which Nannie lived as a girl; its last descendant died a single woman, and, as she had no relations, she bequeathed the bowl to Nannie. It is made of curious, very thick ware, with a raised pattern upon it; it used to be the glory of the supper-table in the old farmhouse, when it was filled with pile upon pile of solid clotted cream that formed the summit of a splendid junket. In that corner stands a spinning-wheel which belonged to Nannie's great aunt, who sat every week in the yarn market, whither she had gone with bales of yarn upon her head, in the little country town, and thus with her own hands had earned enough to clothe herself and all her ten children in their Sunday best. On that little table lies, most precious treasure of all in Nannie's eyes, the large Bible, on the first leaf of which there is chronicled quite a whole parish register concerning Nannie's family; and which is Nannie's highest earthly joy, when, all the work for the day being done, she puts on her glasses, and opens it reverently, and sits down to read by the winter fireside, or in her doorway with the summer evening breeze playing round her.

When the tour of the little room, which serves as kitchen and parlour, is over, and we have admired the brightness of everything, from the huge warming-pan hanging behind the door, which was Nannie's baptismal present from her godmother, to the pewter mug on the chimney-piece which belonged to Nannie's little son,—who was carried by the angels to the Master's arms, she will tell you, "fifty years ago, come next Michaelmas,"—we sit down and begin to have some talk with Nannie on various subjects. A strange, almost unreal feeling steals over us as we listen, for we feel as if we must surely have been suddenly carried back some two or three hundred years, and be conversing with one who lived in the reign of Queen Bess. Nannie has such quaint recipes for the cure of all sorts of diseases, recipes that it would defy the whole College of Physicians to comprehend or explain; she has such full belief in certain superstitions for the truth of which she will relate stories enough to fill several volumes. She is fenced in on so many sides of her mind by such a number of quaint, simple prejudices. All these things are so firmly rooted in her head, that you might as well try to remove one of her native hills as to get one of them out of it.

Not the least remarkable part of Nannie's discourse is the language in which she expresses herself. How rich it is in curious phrases that fit exactly on to the subjects in hand, though the most original writer that ever took up a pen could never have invented them. There are words, too, used by her which sometimes entirely baffle us; strive as we may to find out their meaning, we can only look wise and seem to understand them: we must be very careful that no smile at these remarkable curiosities of expression rests upon our lips, for should Nannie for a moment get the idea that we are laughing at her, she will leave us with a toss and a flounce. There is nothing which irritates the inhabitants of these regions so much as the notion that a visitor is come among them just in order to make fun of them. They are courteous themselves, with an old-fashioned courtesy of their own, and they expect courtesy from others.

Nannie has had singular experiences herself in her time, and how graphically she describes them! When she and her husband inhabited once, long ago, a little cottage that stood in what is called a "combe," namely a very small upland valley or basin among the hills, the house was one winter buried completely beneath the snow. The storm came on on a Saturday night. No one passed near the cottage on Sunday; yet the old woman tells how they could hear the Sabbath bells ringing merrily from the church tower of a neighbouring upland village, and how she could praise the King, letting her heart send forth a hymn to suit the music of the chimes, as freely and sweetly in those hours of darkness and danger as if she had been standing in God's house in the summer sunshine. She can recollect as a girl being lost in a fog on Exmoor, and wandering about in extreme dread of getting into a bog, or of being benighted, till a sudden lifting of the mist showed her that she was, in reality, close to her home all the while that she had believed she had strayed far from it. She draws a spiritual lesson out of this story in her simple, straightforward way, and shows how like it is to the manner in which some Christians go groping about after salvation, wrapped in mists of their own self-righteousness, when all at once they find that the blessed thing they seek is close to them if they will but grasp it with faith and thanksgiving.

Nannie also tells of many quaint, peculiar customs, which, to her, do not appear quaint and peculiar at all; she has been so used to them all her life through. There is the custom of all the lads in the village, when a wedding-party return from church, chaining the road in front of the bride and bridegroom, and not letting them pass till money has been given them. There is the custom at funerals of all the mourners, on the following Sunday in church, remaining seated through the whole service with their heads bowed down on the front of the pew. There is the custom of making the sheep-shearing in each farm-house a grand, important yearly festival. There is the custom of singing to the apple-trees on a certain day in winter, in order to insure next year their bearing a plentiful crop. These and many more old-world practices Nannie narrates with simple gravity, and as a matter of course, as if they were the most ordinary things in the world; she is evidently astonished that we should want to ask questions about what seem to her such common-place subjects; but she is too innately well-bred to express her surprise.

And what a wonderful and beautiful thing is Nannie's Christian faith! She has never read any other religious book besides the big Bible, and even in that there are many long words that she spells through with difficulty; but how entire, how triumphant, how bright is her trust in her heavenly Father's love and care, in the work of salvation done for her by her Saviour, in the power of the life-giving Spirit! Her religion permeates her whole life down to the smallest thing and matter in it, and makes its way into her talk in the simplest yet most earnest and reverent way. "The dear Lord, praised be His holy name!" "His blessed will be done!" Such expressions are constantly upon her lips, resting there like sweet things that she loves; she is like one who has indeed a pearl of price and is never tired of showing it.

Such is Old Nannie; such is a visit to her; who can return from a glimpse of her without feeling wiser and better?

ALICE KING.

Under Mara's Ripples.

INTO the pool they looked with wistful eyes—
"That cannot be the thing our father meant?
A crooked useless stick! see, how it lies;
Not worth the lifting up, shaking and bent."
Then one—the younger—drew it from the pool,
Seeking to please his father. Oh, the shout
Of boyish glee! His wondering heart was full—
"See what a splendid staff, Tom! when it's out!"

So we oft gaze with clouding, doubting eyes
At what seems crooked in our Mara pools!
A bending reed, a bitter cross, it lies
Beneath the trembling wavelets. Oh, poor fools!
Lift it, and lay it in the glorious light of God!
It is a "splendid staff" to lean on all the road,
Supple and straight and strong;
The way home may be long!

M. B.

Things New and Old.

LETTERS FROM GENERAL GORDON.—The following extracts are from letters to Captain Murray of the P. & O. S.S. Paramatta.

"At Sea, July 17th, 1880.

"You will not forget my words; they will comfort you. You will read those everlasting promises of peace, promises charged with no conditions, promises irrespective of merit and irrevocable.—C. G. GORDON."

"November 14th, 1881.

"You are never forgotten by me. You are in my thoughts every day, in the morning. You and I are drifting on our pilgrimage; and it little matters where we are. We have to learn that God is most merciful and kind, and that irrespective of our salvation, which is assured. I wonder whether you have realized the great truth of God dwelling in you; that is the key which opens all locks. Whether you write or not, you may rely till life ends that you will be remembered by me to your Friend Jesus daily. Believe me, yours sincerely, C. G. GORDON."

EARLY TRACTS.—For very many years after the establishment of the Religious Tract Society, its tracts were all issued anonymously. The following list of names has interest now as including the principal writers of its earlier tracts: Legh Richmond, E. Bickersteth, Dr. Bogue, Joseph Hughes, G. Burder, Dr. Marsh, A. Fuller, Simeon, Dr. Bennett, Hugh Stowell, Thomas Scott, Robert Hall, J. A. James, T. H. Horne, Bishop Wilson, J. J. Gurney, Rowland Hill, J. H. Stewart, A. Bonar, Chas. Bridges, Dr. Redford, Basil Woodd, Dr. Malan, Felix Neff, Dr. Keith, Dr. Wardlaw, Pike, Richard Knill, Charlotte Elizabeth, Hannah More, Mrs. Sherwood, Caroline Fry. Many of the first tracts, it should also be noted, were abridgments from the writings of such men as Baxter, Serle, Bunyan, Flavel, Howe, Owen, Luther, Doddridge, Leighton, and Cecil.

BERTIE DANBY'S TRAINING.

BY EMMA LESLIE.

CHAPTER X.

MR. ROBINSON was busy reading his letters that had come by the post, when another was brought in by the waiter, also addressed to him.

"The little boy is waiting for an answer, sir," said the man, as he handed it to him.

"Wait a minute," said the gentleman, and he cut open the envelope, and read: "Honoured Sir, I think you are a friend of the family. Mrs. Danby is very ill, and I don't know what to do. The doctor came yesterday, and said I ought to send for her friends, so I send for you. Your humble servant, Ann."

"Sensible woman!" remarked the gentleman, as he refolded the letter. Then, turning to the waiter standing near, he said, "Send the little boy to me."

"Well, Bertie, so there's trouble at your house, I hear," said Mr. Robinson, holding out his hand, and drawing the little boy to his side.

"Yes, sir, mamma is very ill—very ill indeed, Ann says."

"And Ann wants to see me?"

"Does she, sir?" said Bertie in some surprise, for he knew nothing of the contents of the note he had brought.

"Ann is a very sensible woman—the most sensible perhaps of any of us. Sit down a minute, while I change my coat, and then we will walk back together."

Ann was a little surprised when she saw her visitor, for she did not expect he would come so soon.

"I hope you will excuse me, if I am wrong, sir," she said as soon as she saw him.

"But you are not wrong, and I feel very much obliged to you for sending for me," said the gentleman, as he stepped into the little drawing-room.

"You keep Tommy quiet," whispered Ann to Bertie, as he passed her in the passage, while she followed the gentleman into the room.

"Now tell me the trouble—what has caused Mrs. Danby's illness? I may as well tell you at once, that I have taken over the factory, and therefore I know all about your affairs."

"Have you, sir?" gasped Ann in her astonishment.

"You need not tell your mistress of this. The business will be Master Bertie's when he is old enough, as it was his father's and grandfather's before him. But that we need not discuss just now. What has happened to make Mrs. Danby ill?" asked the gentleman.

"Nothing, sir, only the letters haven't come very regular from master lately, and she's taken up the notion that she shall never see him again—that she's going to die."

"But you could not expect to hear from Mr. Danby very often, from a distant and partly settled district of Australia."

"That's just what I told my mistress, but it made no difference, and now she's asking me to send for somebody to talk to her—she says she's lived a selfish worldly life, and God will never forgive her. Oh, sir, whatever shall I do?" And poor Ann put her apron to her eyes, and burst into tears.

"Suppose you tell Mrs. Danby a friend has come to talk to her, upon the subject she desires to discuss—a friend whom Christ has found, and redeemed from the worldliness and evil of his life," said Mr. Robinson after a pause.

"Oh, sir, if you could talk to her, and set her mind at rest, I feel sure she would soon get better," said poor Ann.

"Very likely. Go and ask her whether she feels able to see me now, or whether I shall call again. I will come at any time, tell her."

"Thank you, sir," said Ann, wiping her eyes, and trying to look cheerful, as she left the room.

She came back in a minute or two. Her mistress would be glad to see him.

"I haven't told her, sir, who you are," said Ann.

"I don't think you know yourself," said the gentleman, smiling; "but I understand what you mean—she is not to know yet that I have ever been here before."

"Yes, that's it, sir," said Ann, as she led the way upstairs.

Mr. Robinson was startled to see the alteration in Mrs. Danby, since he had last met her, and he wondered whether he was as much changed—whether she would fail to recognise him.

"I am very sorry to hear you are so ill," he said, in a tender sympathetic voice, taking her thin hand in his, and looking at her worn anxious face.

"It is the mind rather than the body," said the lady with a sigh; "I have had a great deal of trouble lately—trouble I have richly deserved, for I have been a wicked, selfish woman, and God can never forgive me, for I do not deserve forgiveness."

"My dear lady, we none of us deserve forgiveness, but while we were yet sinners, Christ died for the ungodly. That is the class I think you said you belonged to, of those who have been content to live without God in the world."

The lady nodded. "He will have nothing to do with me now," she said with a sob.

"Ah! there you make a mistake, for God so loved you—loved the ungodly, remember, who would have nothing to do with Him, that He sent His Son to declare His love to the world, and to die for those who had neglected Him. He knew a time would come in their lives when they would want to 'arise and go to their Father,' but would be afraid to venture, because of the sin that lay between, and so He sent His Son to be the Way, by which poor guilt-laden souls might come to Him and find rest and peace. The Lord Jesus said to His disciples, 'I am the Way,' and coming to the Father by Him, this living Way, we shall be welcomed and rejoiced over, as the prodigal son in the parable, for He is our Father, not hard to be persuaded to forgive, as you suppose, but waiting to receive us, waiting to be gracious, waiting to show us more and more of His love, although He has already given the greatest proof of it, in giving His Son to die for us—the sinners, the ungodly, the forgetters of God."

"You believe this yourself, I know," said the lady with a sigh.

"I do, indeed. I am trying to live it too," said the gentleman earnestly.

"What do you mean? If God—if Christ has redeemed us, is it not enough?"

"Enough? I do not understand. Christ died to redeem us from sin, and when we come to believe this, the fight against sin begins, but is not ended. Christ's power—Christ's life in us, will constantly struggle against it, until it is conquered, and we are wholly saved by it; but you must not think this is done all at once. The blood of Christ—the life of Christ in us, cleanses us from all sin, but this has to be done day by day, and we must live in constant communion with Him, if we would be victors at last."

"And this is the new life I have been reading about lately," said the lady faintly.

"A new and blessed life it is. I can speak from experience, I assure you. But I will not talk longer now, you are tired, I can see; I will come again to-morrow, if you will allow me."

"Yes, yes, come again," said the invalid.

After a few words of prayer Mr. Robinson went downstairs, but beckoned Ann into the drawing-room, on his way to the street-door. "I should like to see Mrs. Danby's doctor," he said.

"What do you think of her, sir?" asked Ann eagerly.

"She seems very weak and ill, and I should like to have the opinion of a physician. Will you tell the doctor this, and ask him to call upon me at the hotel? I shall call again in the evening. Send the boys out," he added, as Ann escorted him to the street door.

When Ann went up to her mistress, she was met by the eager question, "Who is that gentleman you brought to me?"

Ann coloured and felt half afraid to answer, for fear her mistress should be offended, and refuse to see him again. "He's staying at the Royal," she said evasively.

"I could almost have fancied it was my uncle Charles, if he had not been so religious," said the invalid. "I do hope he will come again soon, for he seems to understand just how I feel, and knows just what to say to help me."

Mr. Robinson called in the evening, but he did not see Mrs. Danby. He came to say that he had telegraphed for an eminent physician from London, and he would be down about two o'clock the next day.

"But you will come in the morning to see my mistress, sir?" said Ann. "I think you have done her good already; she says you have taught her to hope."

"To hope in God. That is well. Yes, I will come and see her before the doctor arrives. Good-night," and Mr. Robinson was gone. Ann stood gazing after him, thinking of Christmas night, and how they had refused him the shelter of a roof there, and what pain and sorrow and anxiety they had suffered since, which might have been avoided if they had but known that this was a friend come to help them out of their trouble.

He came again the next morning, and had a long talk with Mrs. Danby.

Just as he was about to leave, the lady said, "You remind me so much of a relative of mine—an uncle who left England years ago."

"Your uncle, Charles Robins," said the gentleman in a shaking voice.

"Yes, yes; it is uncle Charles!" almost shrieked the lady.

"Hush, hush! my dear," said the gentleman, tenderly bending over and kissing her pale face, while Ann rushed in from the adjoining room, on hearing her mistress's voice.

"Oh! uncle, why didn't you come before? why didn't you tell us?" said the lady, when she had somewhat recovered from her agitation.

"My dear, I came last Christmas—traced you here, after a good deal of trouble, and saw your boys in the fields. Do you not remember I said I was a friend of your uncle Joseph's? I must confess I wanted to find out whether I should be welcomed for myself, as well as what I could do for you," he added with a smile.

"Oh, uncle! and we drove you away?"

"Yes, and I might have gone away too and been a miserable old man for ever after if it had not been for your boy. He taught me my duty when I was forgetting it."

"To think that the Mr. Robinson Bertie talked about, should be uncle Charles," said Mrs. Danby; "but why did you call yourself 'Robinson'?" she asked.

"Did I not tell you I had a fancy for finding out whether you would receive me for myself at first, and whether you would remember me, too? Robins and Robinson are not so unlike, it only needed the addition of a couple of letters. Now you must rest, my dear," said the gentleman; "make yourself quite easy, and try to go to sleep for an hour before the doctor comes."

The physician's opinion encouraged them to hope that Mrs. Danby's illness was not so serious as she had herself imagined. There was great weakness, but no positive disease, he said, and the spring would bring about an improvement, he thought.

But the improvement commenced before the spring could be fairly said to have arrived. The talks with "uncle Charles," as everybody called him now, were very helpful and cheering to the lady, and gradually her heart was opened that the love of God in Christ Jesus might flow in and make her life a happy and a useful one for the future. About the same time, too, came cheering news from Mr. Danby. The business that had taken him out was progressing more favourably than had been anticipated, and he spoke of coming home shortly, and gathering what he could of the wreck of his old business, and starting again in a small way as a manufacturer.

Uncle Charles smiled when he heard it. "I am glad of it," he said; "he can work for Tommy and you, my dear, but Danby's must be Danby's still, and earn a new name for itself under my Bertie. I have put all I possess into it for the little lad who helped me to see the right way when I was bent upon going wrong. Yes, yes; you make haste and get well, my dear, and be ready to welcome and help your husband in his new venture when he comes home. The old factory has got a bad name and must earn a new one, and that can only be done under one who has been specially trained for it; and that I believe God has taken in hand Himself, and has been carrying on through all this trouble, which is but another name for 'Bertie Danby's training.'"

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XX.

Not wholly false, nor wholly faithful, thou:
Believing, doubting—richly blest of God!
Of most surpassing beauty, thy fair brow
Wears yet a jealous frown. Thy feet are shod
With more than justice—well-nigh cruelty—
That bids the slaves depart, nor heeds their cry.

1. Our Lord by this endearing name is known;
May we be of His flock—His very own!

2. O priest of God! thou servest Him but half;
Or else why sufferest thou that golden calf?

3. Woman, such wisdom comes not from above,
Sad that deceit should mar thy mother-love!

4. Thy husband's churlishness hath touched not thee,
And wise of heart art thou, and fair to see.

5. O deathless word that infant voices sang!
A song that's ringing now, as then it rang.

M. E. R.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

JANET MACFARLANE'S PRAYER.

BY MRS. AMELIA E. BARR.

CHAPTER I.

Hark, the music loud and sweet
Thrills our heart and stirs our feet:
Brethren, hands upon our swords.
Let us shout, "We are the Lord's!"
Rise! He calleth thee, arise!

IN SIGHT OF HOME.

MORE than thirty years ago, there was in one of the green clefts of the headlands of Jura a little stone house. It was partly cut out of the rocks, and partly built of granite, and it contained only the "but and the ben" of ordinary Scotch cottages. But it had about it the sublimity of the rocks and the hills, and it was made beautiful by the gold of lichen, and the green of moss, by the grey of granite, and the deep browns and purples of the peat stacks at either end. The shadow of a rowan-tree was over it, the ocean before it, and the great Highland Bens rose above and above it, until their heads, huge and pale with mists, were lost in mystery and distance.

The owner of this little home was John MacFarlane, and here he lived with his wife, Janet, and his son Malachi. On the September night on which my story opens, John stood in the door of his house, looking seaward and heavenward. "The vision and faculty divine" is not the exclusive possession of the maker of rhymes; and John had a poet's soul. The earth—the work of his Father's hands—was all consecrated ground to him:

> And he dwelt in his house of the rock,
> Like a bird in its breezy nest;
> With an ocean of beauty around,
> And a fountain of song in his breast.

As he gazed in serenest joy upon the glory above and before him, he heard a clear, strong call, and, smiling, he passed round the house and looked up the hill. Out of its mists, with a swinging rapid step, came a young Highlander with a fawn across his shoulders.

He leaped the little corries and burns with a grace and strength and fearlessness that showed he was on his native heath. His father went a little way towards him, and it was noticed that as they met the young man lifted his bonnet to the elder, saying:

"My father!"

"Malachi, my dear lad, where got thou the fawn?"

"I was with The MacFarlane on the hills. It is my share of the sport. It will be a grand parting gift to my mother."

They were close by a large boulder, and John MacFarlane sat down upon it.

"Wait a wee, Malachi. You ken weel that your mother is of a stiff disposition, seeking to hae a' things her ain way; and she is wonderfu' down-hearted anent your decision. Canna you venture into a pulpit, my lad?"

"I canna do my life-work at a venture, father. When you were fighting in the Cameronian regiment, you wanted a clear order frae your captain. I hae had nae call to the pulpit. If the Captain o' Israel's host wanted me, He wad let me ken it. I'll no slip into the place o' honour without request; and you'll no be wanting a 'sticket minister' among the MacFarlanes, I'm sure."

"That would be a sair trial."

"Then I canna go until I be sent." And he added in a mournful voice, "He hasna called me. Ye ken how many nights at the lambing and hunting seasons I hae been alone wi' Him amang the mountains. I hae watched for Him on the vera tops o' the hills, where there was nae thing between me and heaven, thinking, perhaps, He might call me, as He called the lad Samuel, but He has na' done it. Father, dear father, I'll no go unless He send me."

"Maybe you'll get the call yet, Malachi."

"Then I'll answer it, father—wherever I be, I'll answer it. You ken that o' me, I'm sure."

"Aye, aye! but I wonder where you got such like thoughts."

"We don't make our thoughts, father; they grow in us, as grain grows i' the soil; and if they be na' wrong thoughts, the growth dootless will be from the skies."

"Weel, weel, His will be done; but it's vera strange that you tak' neither to the kirk nor the army, and you a MacFarlane on baith sides." Then he rose and they went into the house.

Janet was standing on the hearth, scattering the meal into the evening porridge pot. Though near sixty, she was still brisk and handsome; a woman of strong feelings, but upright and generous. Her son was to leave the next morning for Edinburgh University. It was an event for which she had been working and saving ever since the boy had been given them; an event of the most supreme importance to her. There were a dozen white linen shirts lying on the table; she had just ironed them. But when Malachi first began to walk, she had begun to spin the flax for those shirts. As she found time she had woven and bleached the linen, and made the garments, one by one; and put them away until he should be ready to go to the University. What hopes and prayers and blessings she had wrought into them! She had thought no needlework too fine to put upon them; for they were for one who was to be a Christian minister, and lift up his voice to the people from the pulpit!

And then, almost at the very last, Malachi had decided to enter the medical classes; had declared that he could not go into the ministry. Both his choice and his refusal angered his mother. It pained her also very deeply.

"I gave you to the Lord at your birth," she said, with bitter tears of disappointment; "you hae nae right to tak' back the gift." The argument which his father felt bound to respect, Janet would not listen to.

"Such presumption!" she answered. "Do you really think you are a Moses or a Saul o' Tarsus? What for should He send an angel or speak a word to you frae the heavens? Gae your ways and gie yoursel' willingly to His work; gie yoursel' o'er and o'er, until He choose to tak' what you hae to offer Him; and dinna be sae fu' o' conceit wi' yoursel'."

"But, mother, the Saviour was just as busy healing as He was teaching."

"He didna gae round the country wi' pill-boxes and lancing-knives, and charge for every visit. You havena the gifts o' healing, any mair than the gift o' teaching, my lad. Either one o' them you'll hae to seek. I think little o' doctors, Malachi." And with this assertion she generally closed the argument.

But she loved her son tenderly; and when he and his father stood in the open door, she had to put her apron to her eyes for a moment before she could speak to them. She had been praying as her hand scattered the meal, praying that even yet God would accept her son for His service, and not refuse what she had given Him. And just as Malachi said, "Hame, at last, mother!" a great peace and resignation had come into her heart. It was as if all her disappointment had never been; and she answered with a smile, "Aye, aye, my lad, night brings us a' home."

Then he kissed her, and the porridge was dished, and they ate their supper with a calm cheerfulness. After it, they drew closer around the table, and the fire was stirred and the lamp brightened, and the Bible laid before John.

He chose a few hopeful, comforting promises, and then on his knees carried them to his God. It was a happy prayer. They rose from it with holy joy and confidence; and, in accord with an old rite at parting, silently clasped their hands above the Holy Book—a solemn promise of each soul to be true to all it had promised.

Malachi's trunk was to leave by the carrier at midnight, in order to catch the coach which passed a certain point early in the morning; and before the dawning the youth kissed his father and mother on the threshold, and went forth into the world to begin his life-work.

For this life-work, Edinburgh University offered him the grandest apprenticeship. Its spirit, eminently religious and thoroughly democratic, had always refused to acknowledge any peculiar privilege for the noble or the wealthy. The son of the peer and the son of the labourer met and studied within its halls upon equal terms. Its fees were within the reach of all earnest scholars; it had no reserved rights for those who could afford to exceed them.

In his own classes Malachi soon became a great favourite. He possessed, indeed, an almost irresistible personal magnetism. When he entered the hall, many an eye watched the noble poise of his head, the swing of his broad shoulders, and his ruddy, handsome face. His eyes were specially attractive. There was in them a gleam as of the morning star, and they laughed out upon all with boundless good humour and sweetness.

He had other advantages rather exceptional in a student of his social position. Though in some sense a peasant's son, he was not poor. John and Janet had not put their savings into a bag with holes in it. Year by year the increase, if modest, had been sure; and John had remembered his son's needs in no scrimping spirit. Malachi was well clothed; he had a comfortable room, and all reasonable money for college expenses. Besides which, if he ranked as a peasant's son, he felt himself to be by birth a Highland gentleman. He was a MacFarlane, and the same blood flowed in his veins as in those of "The MacFarlane" himself. The poor kinsman of the chief of his family, he inherited, as truly as the chief, all its traditions of civil and military glory; and this feeling, being inborn and natural, was worn with that ease and grace that the vulgar in soul, be they ever so rich, can never successfully assume.

His life in Edinburgh was very pleasant to him, and he took care that his parents shared in its pleasure. Each week he wrote them a letter which filled all the next seven days with delightful interest; and every Saturday afternoon John walked to the post office, seven miles distant, for this pleasant token. Not even Jura rain torrents, nor snow, nor wind, could prevent him, and he was never disappointed. The thick white letter was sure to be waiting. He always put it in his pocket unopened. It was the charmed hour of the whole week when Janet and he sat down together upon their hearthstone, with the tea-table between them, and Malachi's letter in John's hand. Yes, indeed, the few sheets of paper had a power beyond that of Ethiopic sorcery or Chaldean magic; they transformed the little house in the Jura mountains to college and kirk, and to the busy streets of a great city. Famous preachers and professors spoke through them. They brought the air and the enchantment of a life new and wonderful within the narrow walls; and made John and Janet breathe an ampler life than they had ever dreamed of.

For two years there was very little change in Malachi's nature. Though he increased rapidly in knowledge, he kept all the dew and freshness of his youth. He had still that spirit which has ever a look upward, and is open to the whole noon of sunshiny influences. The fact was, that the companionship in which he was thrown during this time had no power over him. The home memories were far stronger. For the empty laughter and practical joking, the boyishness and slang which was its tone, he had only a good-natured toleration. In his father's company he had learned, even in early boyhood, a dignity beyond such things. The youth whose amusements had been to stalk the wing-footed red deer, and bring down the eagle, and spear the leaping salmon, could hardly find any pleasure in silly student tricks.

But when he reached the higher classes, and was thrown into the society of men of wider experience, the case was different. It was a time of great mental and spiritual excitement. The Free Kirk Movement was at its height. Temperance was beginning to be a great moral power. Sunday schools, ragged schools, and many hitherto unheard-of charities were exercising the church; while, on the other hand, German philosophies and doubtful speculations of every kind were rife in the reviews, appealing to the minds of the young and the inquisitive with that peculiar force which novel ideas have for intellects in a state of formation. Young men of twenty-two years set themselves to solve the mysteries of existence and the problems of the Eternal. There was something fatally attractive in this temptation. It was a trap set by the devil for souls which could not be lured by sensual baits. Milton represents the fallen angels discussing such topics; and holy angels in heaven must have gazed with pitiful eyes upon the assemblies of fine young fellows meddling with things as fatally beyond their capacities.

In such a club Malachi was at first a silent listener. But it was perhaps this very quality which made him so popular that he was unanimously voted its chairman. Even in that capacity he had little to say; but the words he heard, brought him many hours of great unrest. He often found himself walking rapidly about his room in order to cool the fever of spiritual contention; and once he trembled with a new terror when he stopped before the old black Bible with its silver clasps, which he had brought from home with him, and was aware of a question, subtle and cruel, that crept into his soul about it. He repelled it by lifting the book reverently and clasping it to his breast. But, oh! if that question should come back and back, and each time with fresh power and new doubts, how could he bear it? Would his faith stand the trial, or should he run away from it?

But running away, even from a spiritual foe, was not in the MacFarlane nature.

"I will write to my father," he said, after a long argument with himself. "I will tell him just what these men say anent The Book; and I will do what he counsels."

But while the letter was pending, the question was settled for Malachi in a manner that he had not even dreamed of. It was the night of the club, and he had determined to excuse his attendance until he received his father's advice; but a young man called Traquair urged him to go and support his argument upon a subject which heartily commended itself to Malachi's conscience and reason.

There was a stranger present that night, a grave, swarthy man with gleaming eyes, who sat at Malachi's right hand. He seemed very much interested in the debates, and, though he said little, he contrived by adroit questions to lead the discussion frequently from its proper channel. Mainly through his suppositions, dropped now and then in few words and with singular modesty, the argument had drifted in the course of an hour, from a geological problem to the more tremendous issue of the soul's immortality.

Then, to his horror, Malachi discovered that there were Sadducees in modern Edinburgh, as well as in ancient Jerusalem. As they spoke, his heart began to burn within him, his eyes to flash, he grew restless, and finally angry.

"On what does the evidence of our immortality rest?" inquired the stranger.

"The evidence is in the Holy Scriptures," answered Traquair.

"You'll no find a word i' the Auld Testament to support the doctrine. It's a maist materialistic book a' the gither," answered a member.

At that moment, swift and penetrating as lightning, Malachi heard these words spoken in his soul, "Arise and shine, for thy light has come!" A trumpet blast in his ear, the noise of multitudes shouting, could not have stirred him like that heavenly whisper.

He rose to his feet, his face shone with the light behind it; a majesty and a magnetism far beyond the power of words to express, seemed to pervade and to surround the wonderful and beauteous body and soul, which the speaker was dooming to annihilation.

"Will you be silent?" he cried. "How many more o' you will blaspheme the Word o' the Living God! Stand up, every one, who can daur to say in His Presence, that they hae ever read the Auld Testament carefully through, missing not a word i' the book."

No one moved, and no one spoke.

"Not ane o' you then! If it was a question o' an acre o' land, or o' a bit twa-roomed cottage, you would hae read the title-deed frae end to end. Yet you'll fling awa' your soul's heritage without ane fair reading o' its rights. If you were familiar wi' the Auld Testament, you would know weel that it is in a' things the charter which the New Testament affirms and confirms."

"Iteration is na' any proof, MacFarlane, and we are na' the men to be taen in wi' it," said the doubter. "Just gie us chapter and verse whar the immortality o' the soul is taught in it."

"I tell you the doctrine is in the whole book as the salt is in the seawater. You canna avoid it. When Jacob is dying, he gives Joseph blessings not only for this world but unto the the bounds of the everlasting hills; and he welcomes his ain death wi' these words: 'I have waited for Thy salvation, O Lord.' Do you think he would ca' the corruption o' the grave and the annihilation o' his soul, 'the salvation o' the Lord'?"

"Na! na! na!" answered Traquair.

"When Moses had taen the people o'er the Red Sea, he anticipates the passage across the grave, with the same strong arm to help, and says wi' a' confidence, 'Thou shalt plant them in the mountain o' Thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which Thou hast made for Thee to dwell in; in the Sanctuary, O Lord, which Thy hands have established.'"

"That would mean Jerusalem, MacFarlane."

"It would mean naething o' the kind. God doesna promise to hae His tabernacle wi' men until He mak's the new earth i' which there will be nae sin and nae tears. Auld Jerusalem, as you weel ken, was ane o' the sinfulest o' cities, and ane o' the maist unfortunate. And Hannah, rejoicing at Shiloh, whispered in the temple—'The Lord killeth and maketh alive; He bringeth down to the grave and He bringeth up.' Balaam, constrained against his will, asks to 'die the death o' the righteous man;' but if there was naething after death, the death o' the sinfu' man would hae been the same in its results to him. Job knew that 'his Redeemer lived,' and said, 'Though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God.' You'll find the doctrine a' through the Psalms. David was weel acquaint wi' it, and sang in his triumph, 'God shall redeem my life from the power o' the grave.' Wi' the Psalms, martyrs hae walked to a fiery death, mothers hae given up their sons, and husbands their wives and wives their husbands. I dinna think a book that works miracles is a materialistic book."

"The Ecclesiastes! MacFarlane, what o' that, then? Isna it a bit o' despairing materialism?"

"You'll find the key o' the book at the end o' it: 'Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and walk in the ways o' thy heart, and in the sight o' thine eyes;'—Vera weel, and what then? 'But know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment.' But what for need I go further wi' men who are wiser i' their ain conceit than patriarchs and prophets; and wha ken mair than the saints on earth, or the angels in heaven? You'll be to get yoursel's a new chairman forthwith; for if I wouldna sit and hear my father spoke ill of in his ain house, or 'The MacFarlane' on his ain hills, it's no vera likely I'll listen to you while you deny the Word of my God, and mak' little o' His promises."

He had spoken rapidly, and with a growing indignation. At the last words he pushed back his chair and left the room. An authority of which he was quite unconscious had fallen like a mantle upon him. Even after the door had closed behind him, there was a moment or two of intense silence. Then the stranger who had prompted the question quietly followed Malachi. He looked this way and that way, as if desirous of overtaking him; but Malachi, impelled by a rush of feelings which he scarcely understood, had walked with marvellous swiftness, and was very soon safely locked in the seclusion of his own room.

A wonderful happiness had been given him. The call he had longed and waited for, and almost resigned, had come! He had heard it! And he had answered it! Oh, how glad he felt that he had not hesitated for a moment! How doubly precious was the Book which he had defended! He lifted it from the table and clasped it firmly in his hands. At that moment he felt that neither life nor death could part him from it, and that for nothing would he relinquish one jot or tittle of its promise, or prove disloyal to the Divine Lord and Saviour revealed in the Scriptures.

SUNSET AT TINTERN.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE HARVEST OF A QUIET EYE," ETC.

IT was from the river that I first saw Tintern Abbey. Once, in boyhood, I had been very near the realising my mind's vision of the august and pathetic Ruin; but I was then just the one-too-many of the party, and had to remain in the fair garden of Newland Rectory, in solitude, but well pleased with my book (agreeable "Companion of my Solitude"), under the linden-bower. It was twenty years after that I found myself actually drawing near to Tintern, to exchange my dream of it for reality. Deftly has Wordsworth, in his "Yarrow Unvisited," described the sort of shrinking of the meditative and poetic mind from accepting, however lovely, a reality in place of the heart's long-cherished idea.

> Be Yarrow's stream unseen, unknown!
> It must, or we shall rue it;
> We have a vision of our own,
> Ah, why should we undo it?
> The treasured dreams of times long past,
> We'll keep them, winsome marrow!
> For when we're there, although 'tis fair,
> 'Twill be another Yarrow!

And, in actually drawing near to Venice—Stratford-on-Avon—Tintern, I have especially felt this almost reluctance.

There was, happily, no railway from Ross to Monmouth, nor from Monmouth to Tintern. Therefore I had the delight of starting, on a lovely late September morning, upon the box of a four-horse coach of the old style, for a drive, through exquisite scenery, to Henry the Fifth's City. And what a beginning of the journey was the splendour of the view from Ross itself! To look down on the lovely landscape, and the winding Wye, and ruined Wilton Castle, from the top of the coach, hard by the grounds of the Man of Ross;—this, for the beginning of the day, and then, for its close, the first view of Tintern! The time flew by, as the swift air parted hither and thither, meeting our blithe onward motion, and soon the exhilarating drive was a pleasant memory only. And, Monmouth explored, the question was, How to progress, at reasonable charges, and, if it might also be, in manner the most agreeable, to grave grey Tintern. The most agreeable proved to be also the most economical method, and soon I found myself in a boat, being pleasantly rowed down the winding Wye, "vocal in its wooded walls." Along the bends and loops of the river we glided: here the solemn woods with the gold of the autumn beginning to crown a nearly-accomplished work; here fair fields sloping up from the babbling water that sometimes ran shallow over the brown-amber of shelving stones at the bottom; fair fields, dotted with straggling homesteads, that clustered presently into villages about the grey ancient Tower of the House of God. And sometimes I might see the seldom-seen Maypole of old days, sending skyward its inland mast from the village-green; and, all the while, the pleasant smooth gliding; and the thud of oar, and, in a pause, the drip of water, giving time and tune.

And so on, past a Moravian settlement on the left river-bank, until another bend in the river will reveal the venerable Ruin. A little further monotone of oars, and behold the reality of the long-cherished idea!

There TINTERN ABBEY arose from the river-side, pathetic in its dignity, dignified in its pathos, unique, surely, in its melancholy grandeur; for if it be apt to speak of "fair" Melrose, no one would dream of speaking of "fair" Tintern. No; the Ruin is too noble for our pity, too grand for smooth adjectives. Without the rugged sternness of a crumbling fortress, it has a discrowned hauteur before which you stand uncovered. Even the British tourist, methought, would hush the babble and bend the head in presence of that august and melancholy majesty.[1] And the poet, what must be the emotions of his heart! Could any poet set Tintern before the mind with any word-magic? Wordsworth, to my mind, has not done this, and I know not that any other has essayed it. Ruskin might build it, grey and pathetically noble, on his page, with reverent placing and mortaring of apt and appreciative words.

There is no ruin like it that I have seen. And now the plash and the prattle of the water had ceased, the grating of the prow on the shore, the light leap from the boat, the "good-night" to the boatman:—these were now things behind me. And in front, Tintern, and the day falling towards sunset. This thing and that seen to, and decent and quiet lodging secured (close to the Abbey, reflecting it, as in a camera, upon the open lattice-window of my bedroom), the sunset itself was dying down, and the gleam of some large eastern star pierced the cold heaven, above the amber-rose sky, as I drew near, with intensified deliberate enjoyment, to make my dream all that I would.

And I stood now before the western window, wide, piteous, with its broken tracery. But the ivy had beautifully and bounteously scarfed the despoiled stone-work, and, through the empty pointed arch, in the upper steely blue, the bright star shone.

* * * *

I passed into the Abbey, and there mused far into the evening, having purchased peace by a gift to the troublesome warder who came to disturb my serenity of tender meditation. The noisy jackdaws—too noisy, the cloud of them, by day, for the solemn hush within the grey walls—were quiet now; the fading after-glow of the sun made, with the brightening moon, enough and suitable light for such a scene. The still broken tablets of the Sleepers, waiting for the Resurrection Dawn, were touched by the moonlight that fell through the windows, and slept in the long narrow aisles. The grouped wands of the tall grey pillars were deepening into ivory and ebony; and here and there a lovely fallen capital or a fluted shattered shaft of lichened stone broke the smoothness of the floor of Transept or of Nave. Each ruined window had its own peculiar loveliness. That in the north transept still kept the triple beauty of the principal lines of its design, the ivy doing all it could do to make up for the delicate stone tracery, the carved work which axe and hammer—and after that, onset of wind and weather, and undermining of slow decay—had brought to nought. But the grand east window—only one tall shaft, the central, was left in the wide forlorn space. Yet, still, the ivy bordered the vacant arch: and beyond, quiet in the growing moonlight, the autumn-wooded hills rose, halfway towards the apex of the great empty window. And above the woods, the sky, with faint stars unobtrusive in the grey.

* * * *

I had some days to spend at Tintern, and my refreshment time was spent every day in the abbey walls. I loved to fancy what the stately ruin would be in apple-blossom time, when the rose-flush made a gay and laughing sea about the sad and solemn pile. I loved to see, in fancy, the piled snow resting on its capitals, and turning the ivy-tracery into purest marble, while the large flakes yet stole down, clinging here and there as silver moss, to the dark lichened stone. I loved to note the dark, and the gold, and the frosted-silver lichen bringing their homage of subdued rich tinting to the time-honoured grey. Also to take heed of the maidenhair, and the black-stemmed hard-fern, and the fleshy, round-leaved moneywort, bringing adornment of yet more exquisite beauty in place of the wreathen leaf-work that Vandalism and Time had overthrown. I loved to go, plan in hand, throughout the building, court after court, and try to people it with the forms of the past. Here was the Refectory, into which in quiet order the grave monks would file. Here, in the wall, the sort of pulpit from which one of them would read, while the rest ate and drank in silence. Here the Abbot's room; here the Calefectory, here the Dormitories would have been.

But most I loved to call back in imagination its pristine glory to the stately Fane. To see the magnificent beauty of its proportions restored, the exquisite delicacy of its tracery replaced; to call up the splendour of the ceremony, the grand organ peal, the blending notes of the full choir, the monks in their stalls, the spiral incense-clouds, the great Nave crowded with worshippers. But it could not be! The proud Ruin refused the restoration of any mind-architect. It remained, and must remain, the grave, or rather the monument, of ancient splendour. Aye, it seemed to my rapt mind as though the venerable pile would resent the intrusion of the modern workman, of the reared scaffolding, of the noisy hammer and chisel, and the coarse and careless laughter of men, scaring away the chattering Babel of immemorial jackdaws. Even as, in silence, the splendid fabric of Solomon's Temple of the Lord "rose, like an exhalation," and, in silence, grew towards completed beauty, so, in silence, must this majestic building crumble into decay. So it must be, but who shall forbid the natural tribute of regret to a departed glory? Who, remembering Belisarius in his halcyon days, shall refuse the "meed of a melodious tear" to Belisarius in the pathos of his fall?

Many an "impulse of deeper birth" may "come to us in solitude" as we sit upon a broken stone, in a corner of the building; above us, a capital of profuse sage-green polypodium fern, with the gold underwing; about us, the broken shaft of some splendid column, on whose dark grey an Admiral butterfly has lit, eclipsing the tints of the varied lichen; and, in the distant aisles, a reverent guest or two, seen now, and now passing into obscurity. For one theme of thought:—Alas! that splendour and pomp in worship should so often, in the later years, in the years long after the devoted builders had raised these stately

[1] Alas! since the visit here recorded, I have stood again within the venerable walls—brought to Tintern by rail—and have—yes, indeed, I have—read within them the notice: "Visitors are requested not to dance, in Tintern Abbey!" Not to dance! O tempora! O mores!

E. M. WIMPERIS, R.I.] [EDMUND EVANS.

SUNSET ON TINTERN.

fanes for magnificence of worship, have obscured the true heart-worship in spirit; and, too often, have, by degrees, substituted the accident for the essence, in the adoration due to God! That this need not be so, I believe. But that it has been so who can deny? Beautifully does R. W. Evans in his "Rectory of Valehead" expose and reprove the folly that would think to "please God's ear" merely "with pomp and power, and rites of pride." And, though written of another ruin, yet the verses will fit in well with our train of musing here.

I made for Buildwas—o'er her graves,
Her shattered tombs, her rifted tower,
Her shafts where the tall ivy waves—
To have a meditation hour;
And, as I journeyed, in my mind
A picture of old days designed,
Forgotten rites renewed;
And I beheld assembled there,
From Porch to Chancel bowed in prayer,
A countless multitude.

The vase with holy water teemed,
The pealing Organ shook the Nave,
Hoar clouds of fragrant incense steamed,
Bright lamps a flood of radiance gave;
And from their chairs of sculptured stone,
Three gorgeous priests, as from a throne,
Surveyed the prostrate train;
Image on image fired my breast,
And,—with the dazzling show possest,—
I stood within the fane.

There all the consecrated ground,
Nave, Chapel, Choir, and Aisle,
Thronged by a bleating flock I found;
Quite crowded was the pile.
The holy vase with waves was filled
From heaven's own sacred breast distilled,
And, in the stony chair,
A shepherd's boy, with cord and crook,
Kept watch, with contemplative look,
Upon his fleecy care.

The use and abuse of splendour in worship,—much might be thought and written on this theme. There is, undoubtedly, a tendency to idolatry in the human mind, and this causes that there is a danger in the outward, lest the symbol should push aside the inward, and usurp its place in worship. Yet God gave the poet mind, the appreciation of beauty; nor did He, who praised the widow's mite, disdain to accept and to record the costly offering of ointment, very precious, that was given out of devotion. And we are made body, soul, and spirit; and the affection, as well as the intellect, should be offered at His shrine. And, as Jeremy Taylor says, imagination and poetic feeling, and thoughts and things of beauty, should all be enlisted in His service. And, as one quaintly complained, "Why should the devil have all the best tunes?" so we may ask, why should our houses be cieled and painted with vermilion and richly adorned, and the House of God be the meanest house in the parish? Solomon's Temple, and that glance given us in the Book of the Revelation of the divine Apostle, set before us costliness and beauty in the worship of God, as that which is appropriate and approved by Him. And if, saying even this, we seem to tread upon thin ashes, under which yet lurk smouldering fires, we may yet be bold to say this much, now that most of us, in our just and righteous fear and distrust of Popery, are yet agreed that decency, and even beauty (that I say, not splendour) in the worship of God, need not be, and are not necessarily, Popery. If beauty, decency, and order in our prayer and praise be, really, incompatible with heart-worship, by all means let them go, and let the simple flock and the shepherd boy in the ruined temple be the type for all ages, and for all frames of mind. Natural tastes will differ, and temperaments are created different; and, within the limits of becoming reverence, who art thou that condemnest thy brother? Who will say that George Herbert was less spiritual in his Church than George Fox in his Meeting House? Might not words for peace be said within this pathetic Ruin? words good for patience, forbearance, brotherhood? "One believeth that he may eat all things, another—eateth herbs. Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not; and let not him which eateth not, judge him that eateth."

Let heart-religion, spiritual worship, be kept first in aim, not in any wise obscured. If this be so kept, let certain diversities of temperament be allowed for. And let love be guarded, above all. Truly has it been said that he is in danger of harm from beauty in the externals of worship, who requires them for his worship. He is safe who can, on occasions, worship earnestly and heartily, or within four bare walls, or in a cathedral. And it is a good rule, that old one—"In things essential, unity,"—but all know how it goes on.

It is time to leave Tintern, and its associations, now. Let me, before parting with it, recall, for poetic and artistic enjoyment, an episode in its story of grey dissolution of which I read some years ago. There was a great meeting of clergy, I do not recall on what occasion, at Tintern, or in some parish hard by. And the idea occurred to some one among them, the Rural Dean, suppose, that it would be a thing impressive, solemn, and inappropriately appropriate, to have their usual introductory celebration of Holy Communion, within these consecrated, but dismantled walls.

And this was done. Imagine, as I have loved to do, the solemn service once again, of these white robed worshippers, the strange sound of the thin voices within the grey gaunt walls, whose only canopy was the blue heaven. The solemn chant and hymn, faint in the open air, below;—above the noisy startled crowd of birds resenting their right of solitude thus strangely disputed. The very words used there of old (many of these, at least, the very words, only in the vulgar tongue) heard, after centuries of silence, in the deserted fane; and, under the ivy, and amid the briars, and the fox-glove, and the fern, a table spread, in the wilderness. A congruous incongruity, an apt inaptness. A paradox pathetic in its eccentricity; a medley, stranger and sadder than that, in the "Princess," of the nineteenth-century crowd and the ruined Castle. A kind of link, between the earnest Past and the earnest Present. All around, the "pensive tablets," marking the resting-places of the former worshippers. And, above them, the thin, scarcely heard, soon-to-be-silenced voices of those yet worshipping, and militant, here on earth.

Passing on, in a procession that only seems to be broken, to "where, beyond these voices, there is peace," to the Land and the time where perfect beauty, and perfect warmth, and perfect spirituality, of worship, shall be, if three, yet one.

LETTERS TO MY CHILDREN FROM THE EAST.

BY HENRY HARPER, AUTHOR OF "LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND," ETC.

II.—THE SIMOOM.

YOU ask me, my children, what is the meaning of that terrible picture which is in my room? I painted it from my sketches to commemorate my escape from deadly peril in the desert. You know I have travelled in many desert lands, but this was "the Desert of Shur;" you know Moses led the children of Israel through that "wilderness." I had been to Sinai to paint the "Mount of God," and, returning, had lingered to make other sketches. Thus it happened that when we got as far as "Elim," we found our stock of food had nearly run out. We had hoped and expected to meet a Bedouin tribe, and to buy some meal from them. But we failed to find them, they had moved off somewhere. We had plenty of water, for we filled up all our water-skins at "Elim." But we had next to nothing to eat. I consulted my Bedouin, and found we must push on. We had a camel-boy with us who was not well, and also a very sickly camel, and we decided we dare not take them on, as we knew we must make a "forced march." So we gave the poor boy some food and left him and the camel at Elim, knowing that before long some Bedouin were sure to come there, because that was the only place where water could be got.

The morning we started there was a very high wind, so cold that I had to put on all my warm coats. We pressed on all the day at a great pace, not even stopping to lunch, hoping that by the end of the day, we might get across the desert to a place called "Wady Werdan," where a small depression would give us shelter if the dreaded "simoom" should come upon us.

Late in the afternoon the wind rose to a gale, sand was driving up all round us, the sharp bits of sand almost blinding us. At last the camels refused to face the storm and fairly turned round. We got off, and in great excitement tried to drag them to where a few low sand hillocks somewhat broke the fury of the blast. There we made them lie down, and then tied their legs to prevent them running away in their fright. We tied up our own faces with our head shawls, covering well our mouths and nostrils, and threw ourselves down by the side of the camels. After a time the cold wind passed; and in the night the wind was hot, like the blast of a furnace.

It was a strange sight: sand filled the air. I could dimly see the mountains of the "Tih;" as the sand drifted up them, they seemed all smoking by the faint and sickly light of the moon, which now and again tried to show through the storm. This "smoking" was sand drifting up their slopes. The sunset, I must say, had been awful, the clouds black with lurid edges. Ever and anon a vivid flash of lightning tore down from the upper sky. I heard no thunder; but then the noise of the wind, the howling of the camels might have deadened that. Bathed in perspiration, loaded with sand, half stifled with sand and heat, we gave ourselves up for lost.

At one time in the night the storm subsided a little and I saw a few stars, but it gathered strength again in the morning. I rose several times to shake off the weight of sand which had fallen on me, and also to get a drink of water from my leathern bottle. But the water was full of sand which had drifted in. Again, at times, we all had to rise, for some of the camels in their agony broke their leg ropes and got up, and we had to pull them down again and retie them.

In the morning one felt braver, though no one had slept a moment; so, in spite of all my Bedouin could say, I began to make sketches in my note-book, and also to write down the general effects. The dark clouds passed; light came on the distant horizon. Huge thunder-clouds hurled their forms high in air. Again came the rushing cold wind. Then towards the middle of that day we were enabled to collect our scattered camels and effects, and again try to push on. But, oh! the weakness, the painful weakness, racked with headache, faint with hunger, and only a bit of hard bread to eat. By the blessing of God, in time we arrived at the oasis of "Moses' Wells." There we got food and rest before continuing our journey to Suez.

Now, dear children, is this wind ever mentioned in the Bible? Yes, frequently. I think the Prophet Isaiah meant it when, in chap. xxv. ver. 4, he says, God will be "a refuge from the storm, a shadow from the heat when the blast of the terrible ones is as a storm against the wall."

Jonah (see chap. iv. 8) "was very angry" that God had not destroyed Nineveh, "that great city," so he went out of the city to the east side, and built a shelter, a booth (verse 5), and then God prepared a sultry (or vehement) east wind, and the sun beat upon the head of Jonah, that he fainted, and requested for himself that he might die. He then, without doubt, experienced this "kamseen" or simoom. It is called "kamseen," because it blows on and off for fifty days. Fainting and sickness with feverish headache generally follows exposure to its virulence.

THE SIMOOM

Moses, in Deut. xxviii. 24, says: "The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven shall it come upon thee, until thou be destroyed."

Then, David, too, in Psalm ciii. vers. 15, 16, while blessing the Lord and speaking of His mercies, and of His eternal duration, says of men by way of contrast: "As for man, his days are as grass: as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone."

And I think, too, that when Sennacherib, that haughty Assyrian king, threatened God's holy city Jerusalem, and so cruelly taunted its inhabitants, he had experience of this same awful blast. Isaiah (xxxvii. 7) was told by God to tell the king, that God would "send a blast upon him." In the thirty-sixth verse we are told that the "angel (or messenger) of the Lord went forth, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians a hundred and fourscore and five thousand." This messenger, remember, is called in the seventh verse "a blast."

What does Hosea say in chap. xiii.? Speaking of the wickedness of Israel in serving false gods, he warns them that they shall be "as the chaff that is driven with the whirlwind," and in ver. 15 of the same chapter he says: "an east wind shall come, the breath of the Lord cometh up from the wilderness, and his spring shall become dry."

Oh, no, it was no new thing I experienced in that Sinai desert. History tells us of large armies who were entirely destroyed by its terrible effect. The "blast" is called by Jeremiah a "destroying wind." The Arabic version says a "hot pestilential wind." One great historian, Herodotus, says that it overwhelmed the whole army of Cambyses, sent against Amon, so completely that it disappeared as if swallowed up by the waves of the sea. Arab historians say it was accompanied by intense darkness. You remember the last plague of Egypt, before the children of Israel were allowed to go, followed the plague of darkness. That darkness might have been caused by a "kamseen," or pitchy dark storm wind. It has often been noticed that the "plague" followed this wind. Once, in 1696, 10,000 people died of it in one day in Cairo, and, in one year (1714), in Constantinople, 300,000 people died of it.

Remember, children, that the "wind" is a "messenger of God," "fulfilling His word;" and whenever you look on that picture, thank God that your lot is cast in England, where God does not permit such terrible forces to have their way.

RALPH ELLISON'S OPPORTUNITY.

CHAPTER X.

FROM that hour Ralph knew that he must lose her.

After all those years in which his prison doors had been opened and he set free, when there had been love in the world for him and peace in his heart, he was to be forsaken.

And Josie? It says something for the moral and spiritual progress he had made that when he thought of her he was able wholly to forget himself and his own coming loneliness.

It seemed to him that to send this young girl, whose purity and innocence had been sheltered from all knowledge of the grosser side of life, into the world in the companionship of such a man as Vane, was to degrade and insult her. Even if he reformed—turned over a new leaf, went in for respectability, as he himself phrased it; even if he conformed to an outward decency of life, how much there was in him that must inevitably shock and wound her! For her sake Ralph stooped once more to entreat for at least a respite.

"Leave her here for a little longer," he said, "till she is older, more fitted to face the world. Come and see her if you will"—he forced himself to give the invitation—"but leave her in peace."

But it was all of no use, and he knew it even while he spoke.

"You trouble yourself quite needlessly, my friend," said Vane with a sneer; "you have done your part by my daughter, I admit, as well as your extremely limited views would permit, but it is high time for me to interfere."

"You have been long in making the discovery." Ralph's tone was bitter.

"The more need to act upon it at once before my daughter becomes too saintly to appreciate my poor society. She is a very pretty girl, and she will have some money when I drop off, and, excuse me, but I don't particularly wish that she should throw herself away upon one of your Sandbury worthies, even if he should happen to be your successor in Sion Chapel, and the inheritor of your mantle. Come," he ended more gaily—careless or perhaps incapable of understanding the pain he was inflicting—"I will make a bargain with you. You shall give her wholly to me for three years, and at the end of that time she shall choose for herself. If she has the bad taste to prefer your rustic dulness to my lively world, you shall have her again and welcome. I want a companion, not a whining victim."

It was after all Josie who settled the matter.

She came to Ralph in his study next day—that little room where she had played as a baby, and learned her letters at his knee; where, in her budding womanhood, she had borne him company through many quiet and happy hours. Her face was white and her eyes heavy with a night of weeping. She put her head down on his shoulder and rested it there with clinging tenderness, as if she could not bear to part with him.

His heart, too, was full, and it called out that the sacrifice was too great.

"Josie, my darling," he said, "he cannot force you to go against your will. He gave up his authority over you when he forsook you as a baby; you do not owe him the unquestioning obedience of a child who has had a father's guardianship all her life."

"I know," she said, "I have been thinking of that. Oh, I have been thinking of everything! I cannot love him or feel drawn to him because he calls himself my father—there is no sacredness in such a tie, but, perhaps, I can help him."

Ralph shook his head.

"You would only suffer, my dearest."

"But, if it is my duty? I heard what Dr. Rose said to you; that if he went on living without restraint, without any one to care for him, he would kill himself in a month or two."

Ralph was silent. He knew that Henry Vane's life was in his own hands, and his fears for him were far greater than his hopes. If he chose the downward path, what could Josie do to hinder him? She could but suffer herself. Her little hands might as well attempt to turn the course of a torrent as to stem the tide of a man's passion when it set that way.

But her next words checked his remonstrances.

"There is one thing I want to ask you," she spoke, still hiding her face, almost in a whisper; "do not tell me anything that will make it harder—more difficult to go, but tell me this. My mother—I—I am afraid she was not happy?"

"No," said the minister, and could say no more.

"But she stayed with him, she did not leave him?"

"She gave up all her friends; even you, her little baby, to follow him. She was with him till she died."

Josie lifted her head, and there was a resolute light in her eyes.

"If I see it is of no use," she said, "I will come back. But I think I could never be quite happy, never look in my mother's face in heaven if I let him go alone. And oh, you must pray every day that I may be a help and comfort to him!"

For the little time that was left Josie was busy with a hundred contrivances for Ralph's comfort; it seemed as if she could not rest in her feverish desire to serve him to the last. She gave no thought to her own preparations, and indeed it was with no girlish anticipations of delight in the new scenes that she was setting out.

She took her farewell of Ralph alone in the little study; but the true parting had begun already, on the day when she made up her mind to leave him and all the dear familiar joys of the little home by the sea.

Ralph took the hand Henry Vane held out airily to him.

"For her sake keep yourself pure," he said; "as you will answer to God when you come to die, see that no shadow of your bringing rests on her. Be good to her," his voice suddenly broke; "be good to my Josie."

"Ah," said Vane, with well-assumed patience, "you are zealous in your office, my friend; you lose no chance of improving the occasion. Come, my child," he turned to Josie; "if your last words are said, we shall set out."

Was he touched or moved at all, as he looked into Ralph's haggard face and took the hand offered him in token that the past was forgiven? Perhaps some faint chord of long-forgotten goodness was stirred in him; more likely he was glad to get away from the restraint of the minister's dull little home, the reproaches of his sad looks.

How dull, how cheerless it was when Josie forsook it, and how Ralph missed her bright sovereignty, her merry laugh, her blithe step; the love that had made life sweet. Every moment he came upon some reminder of her that set his wound aching afresh; a bit of work with the needle sticking in it; a book she had been reading, the slippers she had worked for him; the ivy she had trained at his window, her canary that seemed to miss her, too, and call aloud for her with its shrill, piping note.

The rooms she had made so homelike were strangely desolate, as in that long-gone time before she had come to fill the empty place in his affections, and yet he did not suffer the old rebellion, the old fierce revolt from trouble.

He had lived through the tragedy of his life, he had known its keenest pain, and in this new sorrow he had still the support and comfort of Josie's unchanging love. Somewhere in the wide world, wherever she wandered, she took a heart that beat in utmost faithfulness to him, and knowing it he could give her up.

The bitterness, too, had passed from his spirit. He had forgiven his enemy, he had yielded him his best and dearest treasure; he could no longer hate or scorn the man to whom Josie had given her youth and strength. So in all his walks by the seashore, more than ever his chosen path now, there were blessed memories that helped his resignation and hopes, that touched his trembling prayers when he daily pleaded that she might be shielded from evil.

There was human companionship too. Perhaps it was left for Ralph's loneliest hour to taste to the full the consolations of sympathy. There were many kind hearts that were sorry for him in his bereavement; and, if they took rather oppressive ways of manifesting it, he was more patient than he had once been.

He was ready with his habitual courtesy and with something of a new gentleness to welcome Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Culpepper when they announced that they had come to take tea with him; then Mrs. Brown would produce a little pot of cream from under her shawl, and Mrs. Culpepper would mention casually that her Anna Maria had been baking and that she had taken the liberty of bringing a few hot cakes. Miss Lavinia Saxby—to whom advancing years permitted the indiscretion—was sometimes of the tea-parties too. The ladies brought their knitting and sat round the fire trying to give an air of easy sociality to the gathering, and to hide as tenderly as they could the blank in the little circle.

They gave him the latest gossip of the town and the chapel, and he listened now with none of the old inclination to scorn; they brought him their troubles and told him of their hopes and fears for their children, some of whom had fled the home nest too.

Ralph showed a special interest in those wanderers, and it was noticed by many people that though he grew suddenly much older in the years after Josie went away, he learnt to talk more, and was gentler—that little children found out the smile in his eyes and no longer feared his stern face, and that perplexed fathers and mothers brought their burdens to him sure of his sympathy.

Every one was very good to him, he thought, with a new wondering humility, touched by a thousand thoughtful little kindnesses that knit him closer to his fellow-men and helped him in his solitude.

But it was the days that brought letters from Josie that made epochs in his life. He shared little bits of them with Culpepper or Brown when they dropped in to chat and smoke a pipe, or with the ladies when they came to tea; for Sandbury was loyal in its love for its adopted child. She wrote cheerfully, bravely, and always with unchanged affection. If there was any shadow on her life, she kept it unrevealed. Of Vane she had not much to tell. But she spoke of his indulgence to her and his liberality. With the money he gave her she sent many remembrances to her friends at home, to tell them of the wonderful places she was seeing.

"Don't let them forget me," she would say; "my heart is with you all, always; I am coming back some day to fill my old place."

This was the only hint she ever gave of her possible choice. When the third year of her absence was well advanced, Ralph began to wonder with a trembling hope whether its close might restore her to him. The possibility served to sustain him when for almost the first time in his life he fell ill. The early winter was unusually severe, and he had caught a heavy cold, which did not leave him, and finally developed more serious symptoms.

His friends nursed him with a very tender fidelity, and a real dread that they might lose him. He had slipped in those years from the brilliant preacher, of whose eloquence they were proud, into the friend who was downcast when they were in sorrow, and glad with them when they rejoiced. Not one of them could afford to spare him now.

He had asked one day for a letter which had not come. Mrs. Brown, who was sitting by his bed, had feared this question, but she answered it as unconcernedly as she could.

"The weather has been such as you can't believe," she said; "and the snow has blocked the lines, they say. All this fine stir and talk of the new railway hasn't done Sandbury much good, that I can see; give me back the old coach, where you knew what to depend on, and weren't left in a worrit, not knowing what to expect."

But when she slipped out of the sick-room presently, to let Mrs. Culpepper take her place while she went home to dispense the family dinner, she said emphatically—

"We'll have to send for Josie, that's clear, unless he mends. The light seemed to go out of his eyes when he heard there was no letter. Her father, indeed! the minister is the only father she's got to think of."

"But where are we to send?" asked Mrs. Culpepper anxiously; "we can write to the last direction, to be sure," she consoled herself, "and tell them to forward it."

Mrs. Brown did not share this innocent belief in the obligingness of foreign officials, but she had decided on her own plan of action; all she said however was—

"We'll wait a week; and if he doesn't mend by then, home she comes, father or no father."

Before the week was ended, however, something happened.

Ralph was still in bed, not seriously worse, perhaps, but no better. The trains were set free, for a rapid thaw had set in, but Josie's letter had not been buried in any of them: Christmas-day had come and gone without a sign from her. Miss Lavinia Saxby was the watcher this time; perhaps the hot shaded room and the enforced silence had a drowsy effect—at any rate Miss Lavinia's knitting-needles had ceased to click, and her head had drooped forward. It was not a profound slumber, and she was wakened with a start by the gentle opening of the door. It was perhaps permissible that she should still think herself dreaming when she looked up and saw Josie standing there,—Josie, paler, thinner, changed somehow, but with the old look of love in her eyes, only shadowed by what might be a dawning fear.

Miss Lavinia, forgetting her rheumatism, started up, her knitting falling unheeded to her feet. She would have cried out in her astonishment, but Josie held up a warning hand.

She came in softly, and parting the curtains knelt down by the bed.

"Dear guardian," she said, "I have come back to be with you always."

Ralph put out a trembling hand. "Josie, my Josie," he murmured.

Then Miss Lavinia, finding a use for it, discovered that she had forgotten her pocket-handkerchief and slipped quickly from the room.

* * * * *

A few days passed, during which Ralph was slowly but surely recovering his grasp on life before he was told how it was that Josie had come back to him. She wore a black dress, and she was grave and pale—Henry Vane was dead.

There were those who found Josie changed, and some who held that she had grown more beautiful. She had lost some of the old girlish gaiety; she was more serious, older, with a deeper look in her eyes, and a new gentleness in her smile, but of what she had seen, or known, or suffered in the years of her exile, even the minister was never told; he only knew that the close of them had brought her comfort.

"I think," she said, "he was glad to have me near him. He spoke of you—he sent you a message; some day I will give it you. He died with his hand in mine, and with a prayer for pardon on his lips."

"God has been very gracious to me," Ralph said, and his voice broke as he laid his hand on her bent head.

But for Ralph she could not sufficiently show her tenderness. Perhaps in those years of close companionship she had come to some knowledge of his story. If that were so, it made him but the dearer. He grew well again under her care, and life's broken threads were taken up once more in the house by the sea. Its rest and peace were inexpressibly soothing to Josie, and by and by she recovered her old cheerfulness, and the years of her absence came to wear the look of a dream.

The fortune Henry Vane had left her went to make a good many people happy, for Ralph and she had early agreed that they would not spend it on themselves. She still kept the name that had the best associations for her, and in the very few letters that she wrote, she signed herself Josephine Hughes,—until, upon a day, she took her husband's name and became for the rest of her life Josephine Verney.

For Josie was one of the women who are born to be wives and mothers, and who but love the more, the more that is claimed of them. When with Ralph's full sanction she married the young Doctor who came from London to assist and succeed Dr. Rose, she had, indeed, to leave the little house by the sea; but she took the best of it with her, when Ralph, at her husband's persuasion and her own, consented to share her new home.

So Ralph is at rest at last, with his people's love to bless him, and with Josie's children at his knees.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR.

IX.—EDINBURGH MISSIONS.

THE Carrubber's Close Mission began in 1858 in the old Whitefield Chapel, which Allan Ramsay the bookseller-poet had built on a theatre in 1736. The Close is famous in the history of Edinburgh. Its No. 135 was the meeting-place to which the Episcopalians were reduced on the ruin of the Stuart scheme, which twenty-seven years of persecution and martyrdom failed to force on Presbyterian Scotland. Here the bishop and his few adherents held together, and here for a century after the Revolution was the "Hanoverian usurper" denied the benefit of prayer. Strange that from such a spot a new light should be kindled, and the old High Church retreat become the centre of perhaps the most energetic evangelical propaganda in these islands!

Since the commencement, this wonderfully active mission has held over 10,000 consecutive meetings, to say nothing of outdoor meetings, at least equal in number. During the last year there were held over a thousand of these ordinary meetings, over six hundred evangelistic meetings, about the same number of meetings for Bible study, and over nine hundred and fifty prayer meetings. Its staff consists of over four hundred unpaid workers. What its week's work is like can be most readily gathered from its list of meetings, which shows no less than twenty on the Sunday, ten on the Monday, seven on the Tuesday, six on the Wednesday, seven on the Thursday, eight on the Friday, and five on the Saturday, these taking place in different rooms at the same time, and covering ground ranging through Evangelistic Meetings, prayer meetings, School Work, Fellowship Associations, services for children, young women, teachers, mothers, policemen, railway men, and others, Dorcas meetings, Mizpah meetings, Band of Hope meetings, and Bible classes, writing classes, sewing classes, and choir classes.

At the opening of the new building in March 1884, Mr. D. L. Moody expressed a hope that it would become "a sort of Edinburgh Mildmay, where all the different tribes of the Lord's host are united and banded together." . . . "I would have the place open from ten in the morning to ten at night every day, and the rooms kept cheerful and pleasant. Something might be going right along of a useful nature from morning till night. Why should there not be a grand work of grace bursting out here? There are a great many Christians pot-bound, like a plant confined in a small pot where it has not room to grow. Many think that because a thing has been done in a certain way for the last fifty years, it must always be done in that way. We must get at the masses in some way, but I am convinced that we are not going to reach them wholesale; we must have individual effort, seeking to win them one by one. Have temperance meetings, go in for the blue ribbon or the pledge, or anything that will get hold of the people. Neither the pledge nor the blue ribbon will save a drinking man, but it is a great thing to get these people out and have their names and addresses taken; then you can visit them in their homes next morning, and pray with them, and tell them of the Saviour. It is my belief that the masses are not going to be reached wholesale—it is going to be a hand to hand fight. Some of you may say that if you go at the people in this way you will be encroaching on the field occupied by some one else. It seems to me that nothing will wake a man up much quicker than to have people from four or five churches after him in one day. At any rate get at them some way." And in this spirit the mission has been conducted. What the results have been, none can tell, but that the seed scattered so profusely has not been without fruit, there is much evidence to show.

The mission-house is a handsome stone building, with a large hall at the back holding 1500 persons, and a number of halls and class-rooms in front, the largest of which can hold 220. When the mission was begun in 1858, Whitefield Chapel, with its side room, afforded the only accommodation, but in the following year the premises beneath the chapel were added for class-rooms. Then a hall and side rooms, in the middle of the Close, were acquired; but on Sunday evenings the chapel was found incapable of holding the crowds that sought admittance, and through the kindness of the Government the old Theatre Royal was obtained for some considerable time. It was filled to overflowing, sometimes twice in the same evening. When the theatre was taken to make room for the General Post Office, the use of the Free Assembly Hall was obtained, and notwithstanding the accommodation afforded by the new building, it has been occupied ever since. In addition to this and other meeting-rooms, the mission has branched out into Marshall Street, where it has its counterpart in the Congregational Institute. There, as the centre, is a Sunday School, with over three hundred scholars; connected with it are no less than seven different Bible Classes, a Young Men's Christian Fellowship Association, a Children's Church, and an Evangelistic Sabbath Meeting. There is a Penny Savings Bank, a Sabbath School Library, two Bands of Hope, with a choir and orchestra, a staff of Lady visitors, a Dorcas Society, a Mothers' Meeting, a Young Men's Literary Association, and a number of classes through the week conducted by members of the congregation, for sewing, reading, writing, arithmetic, history, and other things, for all of which the building provides ample accommodation free. Truly the effort has been great enough, and persistent enough to satisfy even Mr. Moody! And it gives no sign of flagging. We were last at the tall Mission House in the Canongate one Tuesday night, and floor above floor, every window was alight, and each room was occupied with its meeting for study, prayer, or praise.

Wider in its work, but less demonstrative in its effort is the Edinburgh City Mission, with head-quarters in St. Andrew Square. Working hand in hand with the churches, supplying help to the ministers wherever needed, and in populous parishes holding services of its own as auxiliary to that of the parish church, it labours quietly, but no less effectively. It has covered the city with a network of branches, and its missionaries and visitors are met with in every slum and rookery. Its methods and means are on familiar lines, and, being thus readily conceivable, need no lengthened mention. Over and above its special religious results there can be no doubt as to its widespread social influence. It is in touch with all the benevolent agencies, official and otherwise, in which Edinburgh is so rich, and the sick and destitute owe it a deep debt for the good it is doing in sifting the worthy from the worthless, and bringing help to the deserving.

Mention of other missions we must for the moment leave. Here we must end. In the religious condition of the young and adolescent, increasing interest is being taken. Like Glasgow, Edinburgh has its Sabbath Morning Breakfast for the Destitute and its Working Boys' and Girls' Religious Society, though both are on a small scale; it also has an energetic Young Men's Christian Association, and, bridging the gap to it and church membership, is a very flourishing battalion of the Boys' Brigade, whose present important influence it is difficult to overestimate.

W. J. GORDON.

God's Forge.

THE hammer of Thy discipline, O Lord,
Strikes fast and hard. Life's anvil rings again
To Thy strong strokes. And yet we know 'tis then
That from the heart's hot iron, all abroad
The rich glow spreads. Great Fashioner Divine—
Who sparest not, in Thy far-seeing plan,
The blows that shape the character of man,
Or fire that makes him yield to touch of Thine—
Strike on, if so Thou wilt! For Thou alone
Canst rightly test the temper of our will,
Or tell how these base metals may fulfil
Thy purpose—making all our life Thine own.
Only, we do beseech Thee—let the pain
Of fiery ordeals through which we go,
Shed all around us such a warmth and glow;
Such cheerful show'rs of sparks in golden rain,
That hard hearts may be melted, cold hearts fired,
And callous hearts be taught to feel and see
That discipline is more to be desired
Than all the ease that keeps us back from Thee.

MARY E. ROPER.

A DUCHESS IN SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

HEN I was a lad of twelve (said Mr. Norton), there was an exciting rumour amongst the boys of my class in the Sunday-school. We had known for some time that, on a certain Sunday, our own regular teacher would not be able to attend; but we had never been told who was coming to take his place, nor indeed had we interested ourselves much in the matter. We should probably be taught, we supposed, by the son of the village grocer, who instructed us now and then, or it might be that the clergyman's wife would take us for once. In any case, our imaginations had not soared higher than the daughter of the squire. You may imagine, then, our feelings when, on the evening of the preceding Sunday, as we loitered together after church, there rose an idea which spread from mouth to mouth, informing us that when next Sunday came, we should have the privilege of possessing as our teacher for that one afternoon only, a Real Duchess!

Yes, it was quite true, really true, Fanny Bolton had said so, and she was the sister of a parlour-maid in the house of the squire, and had learnt the news from her. The duchess was coming to the great house on the Saturday night. She was an old friend, and they were much attached to her. She had been so truly kind as to promise to take the class. Ada Bolton had heard all this when she brought in the afternoon tea; for they had made use of her services in that way for once, the footman being ill. So there could be no doubt about it.

Only fancy, we said to each other, a real duchess! What would she be like? How would she be dressed? Would she be very much grander than the daughter of the squire? Ada Bolton had been so fortunate as to see a duchess once, and her sister reported that that Duchess had been dressed for a dance in "yellow satin and diamonds, so as the Queen couldn't be more beautiful." Our hopes and expectations, therefore, rose very high.

About the spiritual instruction which the lady was to bestow upon us, we did not think it necessary to inquire, that being, in our minds, a secondary consideration, with which we did not concern ourselves. The idea of the yellow satin dress was quite enough for us.

How I remember all my foolish excitement that week! I had just left school, and gone out "upon the land," rising with the dawn every morning, and working till long after sunset; for now that the hay was ready for cutting, it was necessary to labour as long as there was any light by which to work. Through all these long hours (and they were long to a boy), and even through the cricket matches, which we played once or twice by moonlight, and on the Saturday afternoon, I found my mind often occupied with the thought of the diamonds and the yellow dress. I am afraid I had never looked so much forward to Sunday-school before. And I am sure that all the others were very much interested too.

The Sunday morning was very fair and bright. Our class was in a state of great excitement, and throughout morning school we were exceedingly ill-behaved. Our temporary teacher—the son of the grocer—was very much displeased with us, and informed us that if we whispered so much again he would complain to the superintendent, and we might lose the squire's treat. But even this terrible threat did not alarm us much, because we were certain that as soon as the duchess came we should be good.

The squire's family were not accustomed to attend the village church in the morning. On fine days they walked over to the beautiful cathedral, about two miles away; so we had no expectation of seeing the duchess until the time for afternoon school. A few of us, however, went to church upon the chance, and were kept in order by fear of the sexton's stick. The squire's pew was empty.

No matter; we would see the duchess in the afternoon. As soon as our dinner-time was over, we started off for school. There were no idle excuses made or sent by any member of the class that afternoon; we all attended. And so early were we, that it was about ten minutes before the time for school when we arrived.

We went first—a crowd of chattering boys, eager with excitement—into the small separate room where our class was held. We wished to see if any preparation had been made for a distinguished visitor there. Our disappointment was great; there were only the usual forms and table, and a wooden chair for the teacher. I think we had supposed that an armchair would be provided for the duchess; but it seemed that we were mistaken. The bell rang sharply; we hastened into school.

And there we had barely taken our places when a string of teachers arrived. The superintendent came first, a great, harsh-looking man, about six feet high, who was a tax-collector; then the kind old clergyman, who looked in on us sometimes; then the daughter of the squire, who had come to introduce her friend; and then—Was this the duchess?

A thrill of anger and disappointment went through us all. Could this be the duchess?—this young, shy lady, very plainly dressed in black, without a single ornament of any kind on her dress, without anything remarkable to distinguish her? Why, there were girls in the Sunday-school more grandly dressed! There was not a teacher with a gown so plain. For one moment we were silent, stunned, overwhelmed with dismay, and then——

"It's all her pride," whispered our head boy to me. He was a lad of fourteen, and his name was William Bold. "I've heard as the rich folk do this kind o' thing; they won't put on their fine clothes to come to such as we!"

"Silence," said the superintendent; and school began.

But in spite of the influence of hymns and prayers a spirit of wrath rose fast amongst us all. We had been deluded, deceived, tricked into an expectation that had not been fulfilled. We felt that we had a right to complain of the manner in which we were treated; and, notwithstanding the restraining presence of many teachers, our growing discontent was fast passing from the silent stage into the stage that speaks.

"I tell you it's all her pride," said Billy Bold, who was always foremost amongst us as best or worst. "It's her nasty mean way to dress herself like this. When we're in the class-room, I shall tell her so."

"Oh, Billy!" whispered all boys who were closest to him, a mingled exclamation of horror and delight. To the hero of the moment it was a stimulant which confirmed him in the resolve he had made. The kind old clergyman read the opening prayer; we rose to our feet to march off to our room. A burning excitement once more was in our hearts, but it was a different kind of excitement now. We reached the room, and all of us took our places. The young lady followed, and sat down on the chair. She seemed very shy, and quite inexperienced as one who has not learned in what way to deal with boys; and then, in an instant—how well I remember it!—without allowing her time to say a word, the ardent Billy rose suddenly to his feet, and addressed her, with the recklessness of his tribe, in loud, rude tones, before us all:

"I say, you are shabby!"

The young lady started, the colour rose to her forehead, she stood up, she sat down again, and burst into tears. And at this moment, the superintendent, who had entered the room, came in, and stood before us.

It may easily be supposed in what state of mind he was—a lady had been insulted before his eyes and ears. He was a hot-tempered man, with more zeal sometimes than discretion; he did not give himself time to think that the young lady might not wish the affair to be brought under public notice. In an instant, without allowing us time to speak, we were swept out of our class-room and into the school again. The other classes had not yet dispersed; they had been detained to hear some directions given. We were hustled into our places before them all; and there, whilst every one was silent with surprise, the wretched Billy was made to stand up in the midst of us, and the master desired to know, in tones most terrible, the reason for the extraordinary rudeness he had displayed.

"I couldn't have believed it," said the master, "of any boy in this school, if I hadn't been present to hear his words myself."

"They told us she was a duchess," blubbered Billy. "We didn't know as she'd come and look like this."

"A duchess!" echoed the master in amazement. "Miss Argile!"

"It is my nickname," the young lady murmured, blushing. "I do not know how the boys could have heard of that."

"They said as she were a duchess," spluttered Billy, becoming emboldened by the courage of despair. "We knew as we owed to be good if a duchess come; but we thought—we thought——" And he broke down and cried.

"You owed to be good to a duchess!" cried the master; "you idle, impertinent, and conceited boy! You don't imagine that you owe any goodness to those who are kind enough to teach you, I suppose? You owe to Miss Argile," he went on, waxing terrible, and becoming more terrible with every word he spoke, and heaping up all his phrases on each other, as if every one added to the load of guilt, "you owe to this lady, who has been kind enough to teach you, what every schoolboy owes to every teacher; what every gentleman owes to every lady; what every man owes to every woman; what every human being owes to every other human being; and that is—civility. We do not wish to teach you any more this afternoon. You may leave the school, sir, this instant, and go home."

And the miserable Billy slunk away at once, the classes dispersed, and quiet was restored.

We were not suffered to remain an unbroken class that day. The superintendent divided us himself, and, leaving the best of us in the charge of Miss Argile, took under his own direction all whom he supposed likely to offend. I remember the subject he chose for his lesson—it was sins; and, as he was still in a warm state of mind, I believe, if you will excuse the expression, that he made the lesson "hot and strong." But of that hot strong lesson I remember nothing. It was another lesson that I carried away with me. There were a few words that haunted me ceaselessly. ". . . What every man owes to every woman. . . ."

It was a new idea.

Poor, rough lad as I was, I had known no such thought before. My own ideas of politeness were scanty and confused; they were very far from possessing universal tendencies, and, after their fashion, were based upon a descending scale. Before her Majesty the Queen (with whom I had no personal acquaintance), I was prepared to abase myself as a loyal subject should. All peers and peeresses I was ready to hold in awe. I was aware that I ought not to be ill-mannered to the daughters of the clergyman and the squire. With the pretty lasses of the rich farmer near us, I preserved a respectful familiarity; and, to my own mother, supported as she was by the strong arm of my father, a somewhat surly obedience. But the idea of a politeness that was practically unlimited, and that should include the whole world within its scope; that, whilst mounting as high as her Majesty the Queen, could yet descend as low as poor Nan who swept our kitchen—the thought of that was a new imagination, and it was, moreover, the largest I had known. I suppose it must have taken root in my heart, for it began to bear some practical fruit at once.

"Thank you, Jack," said my mother, when I had laid the tea that evening. "You are very kind to-night."

I could not help getting hot. Why had I never laid the tea before?

"Nannie," I observed to our poor little "slavey" that same night before she left, "if I were to give you a needle and cotton you would be able to mend your dress."

Nannie was annoyed with me for saying this; but my meaning was good.

And I think that in some shape or other that meaning has remained with me, even though I may not always have acted up to it as I ought to have done.

The other day, my boys, when I was vexed with you for being unwilling to help the poor old woman who had dropped her basket of fruit in the street, my friend, who was walking with us, asked me, for a joke, in what school I had learnt my own manners. And the idle question brought back to me, with odd distinctness, my old, almost forgotten remembrance, of the duchess in Sunday-school. You will understand now why I have told the tale to you.

I wish for you, my boys, that you may follow, now and always, the one perfect Man, whom old Chaucer, with all reverence, calls the "stock-father of gentleness," who never thought any human being beneath His notice, though He was Lord of all. I shall have no fear for your manners, or for any other part of you, if you do.

Well, I have said enough.

M. A. C.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XVII.—p. 560.—OBEDIENCE, 1 Sam. xv. 22; Heb. v. 8; Rom. v. 19.

O-badiah	1 Kings xviii. 7-9, 15, 16.
B-alaam	Numbers xxii. 18.
E-li	1 Sam. ii. 12, 17, 25; iv. 11.
D-aniel	Daniel vi. 7-10.
I-saac	Gen. xxii. 6-10.
E-ndor	1 Sam. xxviii. 7, 8. Deut. xviii. 10-12.
N-aaman	2 Kings v. 11-14.
C-ornelius	Acts x. 1-8.
E-den	Gen. ii. 15; iii. 17-19.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

A STEP OUTSIDE.

No. 1799.—OCTOBER 20, 1888.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

A Step Outside.

THE neighbours think me lonely: and they wonder much, I know,
That though I'm happy when they come, I'm quite content they go;
And when they watch me smiling, I feel they say, "We fear
Her mind is growing weak and dim: she's very old, poor dear!"

I smile because I live again through all the joys I've known,
My own dead don't feel far away when I am quite alone:
There's my old man—I think of him in all his youthful grace,
And yet our fifty years of love shine also in his face!

And there's my little Susie—she was six years when she went—
More than forty years ago (she'd be oldish now, and spent);
She must be a grown-up daughter in our Father's house on high,
Fit to fetch the poor old mother, when it's time for me to die!

And then there's Jem, who died abroad—ah, it was bitter hard
To know our boy was sick to death—and we from him debarred:
'Twas hard for me—and hard for her, the girl he was to wed,
Who's living yet, and brave and bright, but faithful to the dead.

Her visits are my best of joys—I hear her softly say,
"Who shall I talk of Jamie to, when you are gone away?"
Yet Mary will be always cheered, whatever may betide,—
Life keeps its best for those whose love by Death is glorified.

But there's my Tom—poor Tom!—who was different from the rest.
Tom isn't dead to my knowledge, the Father above knows best;
Tom went away like Jem, but poor Tom did not often write—
And I can't say my Tom made as good a son as he might.

Sometimes I dream of Tom—he's always just holding my hand,
And speaking; and I am happy, but wake ere I understand;
I've watched for Tom of a morning,—I've watched in the gloaming dim,—
I never finish a stocking I put on the pins for him!

The only prayer that I utter outside of "God's will be done!"
Is "Father, give me one word, before I die, from my son."
I can't help hoping—But—hark! what step is that just outside?
Is this a dream? No, surely.—My Tom! I am satisfied!

ISABELLA FYVIE MAYO.

JANET MACFARLANE'S PRAYER.

CHAPTER II.

How many serve, how many more
May to the service come;
To tend the vines, the grapes to store,
Thou dost appoint for some:
Thou hast thy young men at the war,
Thy little ones at home.

MALACHI was eating his dinner next day when a visitor was announced. It was the stranger who had sat beside him on the previous evening.

"Good afternoon, sir," he said, with a frank smile: "I am, just as you see, eating my dinner. Will you hae a plate o' collops and a potatoe wi' me?"

"Thank you, I will."

"Sit down, then. It isna often a man has enough for twa, unexpected like; but I thought John Traquair was going to eat wi' me to-day, and then he couldna come; sae, you can hae his share. There's a hot plate on the fender."

They fell readily into talk about the club and its objects; and the collops were eaten and the table cleared, before Malachi remembered that his visitor might have some special business with him. The thought made him silent, and he looked critically at the grave, dark face before him. It was handsome and thoughtful; and when Malachi ceased speaking, a slight shadow of melancholy crossed it. He seemed, however, to be quite satisfied with the silence, and Malachi, after waiting two or three minutes, inquired:

"Did you hae any reason in particular for coming to find me oot, sir?"

"Yes, I had a reason, MacFarlane. I don't know what you will think of it—I came to ask for your friendship—my name is Gordon."

"My friendship may be worth little or much, Mr. Gordon, but it isna a thing for command; you ken that, I'm sure."

"It may be for desire, though I am strongly drawn to you. I loved you at once last night. I apprehended thoroughly your clear honesty and your fearlessness. I have never had a friendship; my lips are not used to the commonplaces of its pretence. Will you let me come and see you, until you learn to like me?"

"I'll do that, Gordon, and I dinna think the lesson will be hard to learn. Are you in the medical classes?"

"No, I am not taking any course of study. I matriculated simply for the sake of hearing Dr. Chalmers and other great men lecture, but I do not think I am a lazy man:—

> He that attends to his interior self,
> That has a heart and keeps it, has a mind
> That hungers and supplies it; and who seeks
> A social, not a dissipated life,
> Has business.

Do you not think so, MacFarlane?"

"More than most men manage."

"You are in the medical classes?"

"Yes."

"Ought you to be there? Is not your place in the Theological Hall?"

"I never felt that I was wrong until to-day—still, I dinna just see my way clear."

"What for?"

"Weel, I hae just paid my fees for this year."

"Take what good you can from the classes you have paid for, but enter for theology to-morrow; waste no more time. I hear you are clever in mathematics. Give me an hour every day, and I will pay you for it, 100*l.* for the terms, if you will accept it."

"Do you ken weel what you are offering me? It is o'er big a sum."

"I think it is a very moderate sum for time so precious as yours is. I have plenty of money; say 'Yes,' and you will make me happy."

"This morning I asked God to clear the way for me, and He has sent you to do it. I hae neither right nor inclination to say 'No' to His messenger. I'll go to the theology classes to-morrow—the first thing I do."

"Your friends will not object, I hope?"

"If I reach the holy office, it will make them glad above measure; but I'll no gie them the anxiety of my probation to bear. I have but father and mother, and they gave up the hope lang syne, and have become content wi' the way I have gone sae far. If I succeed in the ministry, it will be tidings o' great joy to them. If I fail, may be they'll ne'er hear tell o' it."

"Where do they live?"

"They live in the Jura mountains."

"I am Highland, myself, MacFarlane. I come from the braes of the Findhorn, and Moray Land."

He put out his hand and Malachi took it, saying, "Then we are land-brothers; and, oh, it is a bonnie land! There is none like it!"

"To Highlandmen—yet, I have seen many a lovely spot beside. And you were born in Jura?"

"Ay, was I. My father has a little flock of sheep there. My mother makes butter and cheese, and spins the finest of wool and flax. I am their one child. Few lads have had such a home, or such a father or mother as mine. I wouldna give them a minute's heartache for a' the joy that could come to me. We are poor folks, but you know we are MacFarlanes, for a' that; and my father fought with his regiment through many a hard campaign in many countries. He is a grand old man. That is a' about me."

"I'll be free with you, too, MacFarlane. I never saw my mother, and I had not a very good father, and I never knew what home meant. I was brought up in schools, and since I left off study I have wandered about a good deal. Two years ago my father died, and since then I have lived mostly in Edinburgh. I like its thoughtful society. I think I should have been a minister."

"I think not. God makes no mistakes in His dispensations. You'll doubtless be mair fit for a landlord than a preacher; and I am not one o' them that lightlies His gifts o' wealth and honour and position. You'll have many a chance for the kind deed, and the great deed, and I believe that you will take them a'. A man can serve God as usefully in common life as in the ministry."

"I'll try, MacFarlane."

"Then we'll try thegither."

This was the beginning of a year brimful of happy work, and of happy companionship in work. When Malachi had been studying medicine, he had never been satisfied with mere verbal knowledge, but had eagerly sought every opportunity for actual practice either in the hospitals or among the poor. In the study of theology, he followed a like course. He allied himself with Dr. Guthrie's hard-working church, and was found foremost in home mission services, in Sunday-schools and ragged-schools and night-schools. He became an enthusiastic advocate of the then scorned teetotal crusade. His magnificent physique and amazing vitality enabled him to do an incredible amount of work; and his personal attractiveness drew like a magnet the wretched and suffering around him.

Gradually also his social life widened. Wherever Gordon visited, Malachi also visited; and Gordon might be found a great portion of his time in his friend's little parlour. He never troubled Malachi. While Malachi studied, he sat quiet at the fireside, lost in some train of thought, or in some new book. Part of every evening they spent together; and Gordon seemed unhappy if they were long apart. The companionship did Malachi a great deal of good. In it, all traces of his isolated bringing-up gradually vanished. He dropped much of the rustic vernacular; only a word here and there gave a Doric simplicity and strength to his discourse. He insensibly gathered grace and polish, and, scarcely conscious of the fact, he acquired habits of personal refinement which added greatly to his influence.

But nothing made him neglect the least iota of his loving duty to his parents. After the third year his education ceased to be any charge in the way of money to them. He gave lessons, and he received a small salary from Dr. Guthrie's church; and so simple were his tastes, that from these sources he not only paid all his expenses, but also bought many valuable books. Every year he went to Jura for a few weeks, and, after the example of Jesus, even when he had disputed with doctors and won prizes for his eloquence and learning, "he was obedient unto them." But he said nothing of the change of his plans, for he could not bear to think of what a disappointment might be to them.

In the fourth winter something wonderful happened to Malachi. He fell in love. Many good and fair women had looked kindly on him, and his friend had frequently pointed out the fact; but vanity was the very last foible in Malachi's nature. One night he was going to speak before his fellow-students on the subject of Medical Missions. Gordon did not go, but promised to call for him before the lecture was over. In the enthusiasm of his subject Malachi soon forgot all else. His words flew like arrows, every one of them to its mark. His heart burned with holy fire until every heart was on fire with his heart. He ceased amid tumultuous applause. Then he looked around for his friend, and, to his astonishment, saw him approaching with a lady.

"A far awa' cousin of mine, MacFarlane," he said, "Miss Helen Forbes. We have been listening to you for half an hour, and you have almost persuaded us to become missionaries."

Helen looked at Malachi, and put her hand in his. In that moment he learnt to love the girl, and to long for her to love him. She was not pretty, but there was the charm of a pure heart on her calm face; and indeed Malachi never thought whether she was pretty or not. He only felt that she was the one woman whom his soul desired. They walked home with Miss Forbes, and then Malachi went to Gordon's house. He wished to talk of the young lady, but did not like to open the subject.

Gordon, perhaps, divined the feeling, for he said, "Malachi, I often wonder if you look like Joseph. There is a tradition that the women of Egypt all loved him. You know what a favourite you are with the Edinburgh ladies—old and young—and now here comes my bonnie cousin Helen Forbes, and she has eyes nor ears for none but you."

"Forbes is a Highland name?"

"Oh, yes, she is Highland born—a little body, as you see, but she has a great heart, and a good heart; he'll be a happy man who wins it."

During the winter they met frequently, but the wooing did not progress. This was mainly Malachi's fault. He had found out that Miss Forbes was rich, and also closely allied with more than one noble family. Gordon was frequently with her, and yet he very seldom spoke of her. Malachi thought it only likely that he was seeking her hand. It would have been impossible for him to interfere with his friend's hopes; and her rank and wealth were almost as impassable a barrier—but love thrives upon contradictions. Fifty times a day he told himself that it was madness to think of her, and yet he went on loving. He suffered after every interview, and yet he missed no opportunity of meeting her.

Had he dared to have been more demonstrative, perhaps, he would not have found Miss Forbes unkind; but the circumstances in which he was placed, compelled him to put a restraint upon his feelings, which gave an air of coldness and reserve in his behaviour to her. And this denial of his tenderest self was perhaps the hardest part of his trial. If he could only have let her understand how dearly he loved her, and what a sorrow it was to resign his hopes to the honourable obligation of her position, he could have borne it better. The silent strain told a little even upon his fine temperament, and he was glad when the long vacation drew near. "As one whom his mother comforteth"—he had thought often of those words, and he looked forward to telling that tender heart all his sorrow. She would understand the honour that had kept him silent. She would read aright for him, certain looks and words of the beloved one, which he cherished.

But even this comfort, when the vacation came, he felt it right to resign. He had the offer of travelling with a wealthy youth during it, and both John and Janet willingly resigned their own pleasure, and urged him to accept so manifest an advantage. Only Gordon grumbled a little at the event.

"My father had a friendship with 'The Mac Farlane,'" he said; "and for the sake of being in Jura this summer with you, I have taken the trouble to renew it."

"Our friendship will be all the better of a little time to grow in, Gordon, and we are na likely to forget all that we have been to each other."

So the students scattered, and Malachi with his charge went to the Rhine cities. It was a wonderful thing for the old people in that wilderness to get letters from such far-off countries and famous places. More than one letter told about the homes and haunts of the great Luther. John carried them in his pocket, and with pardonable pride took them to "The MacFarlane" to read. The old chief was very sympathetic.

"He will be a credit to the name, dootless, John," he answered, "and we'll a' be proud enough o' the lad. You'll gie my respects to him!" And if the Queen had sent a similar message, it would not have seemed to the happy father any greater honour.

THE REVOLUTION OF 1688

ON ITS RELIGIOUS SIDE.

I.—SOME ILLUSTRATIVE INCIDENTS.

"To condemn those who in the flames invoke the name of Jesus Christ is no light matter."—Anne Dubourg.[1]

IT is a thousand pities that English history is treated alone and without reference to that of Europe. The great man of the later Stuart period was Louis XIV., and he set the fashion to Society in his age. Charles II. and James II. followed his example, and worked for the same ends. Nothing more natural: they were bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh, and largely educated under the same influences. Bourbon—Medici—Guise, brought up in France under a bigoted Catholic mother, and dazzled by the blaze and blare of their illustrious relative at Versailles, how could they do other than try to effect in England what he had done in France?

And they found a great part of the people and most of the leaders in church and state blindly ready to assist their purpose. What king was ever welcomed to the throne with more intense enthusiasm than Charles II., or was maintained upon it by more devoted loyalty? Macaulay tells us that every servant-girl in London went into mourning at his death; and before he expired all in the room, including Bishop Ken, fell on their knees and invoked his blessing as their common father.[2]

He had a parliament as entirely devoted to his person as if he had himself nominated the members, and he kept that parliament in existence for eighteen years. Charles II. alone knew what he was aiming at, but neither ministers nor parliament seemed to have known where they were drifting. One minister after another found him out, and then they fell, and at last the Cavalier Parliament itself got into a panic and ended by aiding and abetting the infamous concocters of the Popish Plot. But there was and had been a real plot to turn England into a Romanist despotism, and the dominant party had been so bent in destroying the work of the Puritans, that they made themselves its docile instruments. Darker days never befel the truly godly in this country than those between the Restoration and the Revolution. The days of "Mary I." look more lurid, but they were not nearly so hopeless and depressing. In the days of Charles II. England was well typified by Mansoul in the hands of the Diabolonians.

No better place at that time to hear the news, especially "the police news," than a county gaol, for the prisoners were crowded together in large rooms where they were allowed to see their friends. Certainly John Bunyan was thinking of all he daily learnt about the condition of the country during his twelve long years in Bedford gaol when he wrote his "Pilgrim's Progress" and "Holy War." And I cannot help thinking that in painting the character of Diabolus he had Charles II. in his eye.[1] Otherwise, he surely would not have represented the great enemy of the kingdom of Jesus Christ as an easy-going, good-natured gentleman, careless of his own honour and dignity, provided that he could attain the end of his policy to make his power secure and absolute. Notwithstanding Charles the Second's bonhomie, he was a true disciple of Machiavelli, and knew the importance of beginning his reign by striking hard and deadly blows against his enemies. Hence his revengeful pursuit of those who had sat in judgment on the late king. The Convention—at least the Lower House—at first resisted the cry for blood, but, giving way at the end, thirteen persons were executed with all the horrors attending death for high treason: and, as the principal offenders had passed beyond the reach of human law, their bodies were dragged from their graves to the gallows at Tyburn, where the putrefying remains were hanged as a terror and a warning to all their adherents.

The Parliament of 1661, made up for the most part of young men, were passionately determined to reverse everything done under the Commonwealth, and all who in spirit sympathised with the late order of things were made to feel acutely the change. How numerous these were is shown by the fact that, when after the execution of Colonel Okey the king consented to give the body to be buried by his wife, about twenty thousand persons assembled to attend the corpse to its last resting-place, so that the Government, affrighted, withdrew the permission, and Colonel Okey's remains were interred in the Tower. Instead of trying to conciliate this formidable opposition, which included nearly all who were most worthy and most earnest in the nation, the authorities sought to terrorise them. In the State Trials of this time I have met with the following illustration of the way in which the wicked watched the righteous, seeking to slay him. It gives a most graphic picture of the spirit of the time, and seems likely to have been one of the histories John Bunyan had on his mind when he described the trial of Faithful in Vanity Fair.

---

[1] Anne Dubourg was a counsellor in the Parliament of Paris, who, like Nicodemus in the Sanhedrim (John vii. 50), tried in vain to move the consciences of his fellow-rulers. He spoke these words in a Bed of Justice, held in 1559, in the presence of Henri II. of France, and they cost him his life.

[2] Bishop Burnet's History of his own Times.

[1] Andrew Marvell, describing Charles II., says:—

"Of a tall stature and a sable hue,
Much like the son of Kish, that lofty Jew."

On the 19th of October, 1661, Whitechapel was in a hubbub. A preacher among the Seventh Day Baptists, named John James, had just been seized; being pulled by force out of the pulpit. In the midst of a rough crowd, crying "Treason! treason!" he was dragged to a tavern close by, until the Lieutenant of the Tower appeared on the scene, who committed him to Newgate, where he lay until the 14th of November; when he was taken to Westminster to be tried before the judges of the King's Bench. He was indicted for high treason. The sole ground of this serious charge being certain words which one Tipler, a journeyman piper, professed to have overheard as he stood listening[1] at a window in Bulstake Alley, which words the congregation, being questioned by the Lieutenant of the Tower, on the day of the arrest, utterly denied had been spoken.

John James asked for a copy of the indictment, but was refused. Having pleaded "not guilty," he was committed to the King's Bench prison in Southwark, where he received a letter from a person of note, warning him that such a jury had been empannelled, being all picked men, and most of them knights and gentlemen, that if he did not except against them he was a dead man. On the 19th he was brought forth to his trial, in order to his condemnation. The Lord Chief Justice[2] and three other judges sat on the bench, and five of the king's counsel, besides the attorney-general and the solicitor-general, were there to plead against him. Serjeant Keeling opened the case, and Sir Geoffrey Palmer followed, the latter suggesting that a man came under the law who harboured treason in his heart. The witnesses now gave in their evidence. Tipler had stood in a window in the yard next adjoining the meeting, and had heard the prisoner at the bar say that the king was a bloody tyrant, a blood-sucker, and a bloodthirsty man; and that, further, the said prisoner did wonderfully adore Oliver Cromwell, saying that every finger of his was a champion, and that when they had power again they would do it more thoroughly. Another witness then deposed to being at the time in Tipler's house, to hearing loud speaking, to coming out and hearing dangerous words, but what the dangerous words were he could not remember. Finally, Bernard Osburn, a sailor, swore to all Tipler had said. To rebut these charges, James produced four witnesses who came into court and stated that Bernard Osburn had confessed to them that he had sworn against John James, he knew not what; and a woman, a near relation of Osburn, came forward and affirmed that he had told her that he had been affrighted into what he swore, in fact that it had been brought to him in writing. But Osburn declared that he had never said such things.

James then began his defence, in which he categorically denied every statement made by the witnesses for the prosecution, affirming that he had not said one of the things attributed to him; then he warned the jury not to shed innocent blood, and was proceeding to speak of the Kingship of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the eternal character of His reign. At this, the Lord Chief Justice cried: "Hold, sirrah; sirrah, you think you are in the conventicle in Whitechapel, preaching." Then Serjeant Glynne proceeded to try and lessen the effect of the objections to the evidence; after which, Serjeant Maynard spoke. "The prisoner," he said, "had referred much to his innocency and integrity, but he believed that there never was any offender or the vilest miscreant in the world that would ever have received the reward of his doings if his own excuses and protestations could have saved him." Then upstood Sir Heneage Finch, who declaimed against the treason and rebellion of the prisoner at the bar—"horrid treason and rebellion for spurning against the meekest king on the earth." "He tried," Finch said, "to affright your consciences with his innocency, but the punishment of this malefactor will affright like malefactors in future, and further, that while some were allowed liberty of conscience for a time, till they were better informed, this man, and those of his kind, are none of these men." And further, he told them they were not to be affrighted by what the prisoner had said on account of innocent blood, for they would find that if his blood be rightly and swiftly pursued, it would be the means of preventing the shedding of the blood of thousands. Finally, Judge Foster tried further to incense the jury against the prisoner by telling them that he was one of the same spirit as those who heretofore had put all the nation in a flame, and that no treason was comparable to that treason that was covered with a pretence of religion.

John James now desired to address one word to the jury, but was told that he could speak no more; whereupon he cried out that then they had as good have hanged him at Bulstake Alley without bringing him there to cover over the matter with the pretence of law; for which explosion of righteous indignation he was solemnly rebuked. A verdict of "guilty" was soon returned, and the prisoner was ordered to come up for judgment on the Friday following.

In the interval, his wife was persuaded to petition the king, and she presented a memorial to Charles II. as he came out of the park, stating at the same who she was. "Oh!" said the king, "Mr. James, he is a sweet fellow!" and the door was shut in her face. Next morning she followed the king downstairs from the gallery into the park imploring an answer, but all she got was, "He is a rogue and shall be hanged."

On November 22, James was brought up again before the judges, and asked why sentence of death should not be passed on him. Not much, he replied, only two or three Scriptures: "Know ye for certain that if ye put me to death, ye shall

[1] "I command, moreover," said Diabolus, "that there be spies continually walking up and down the town of Mansoul." —Holy War.

[2] Sir Robert Foster. "After the Restoration it was considered necessary to sweep away the whole of the judges from Westminster Hall, although they were learned and respectable men. Immense difficulty was found in replacing them. . . . At last a chief-justice was announced, and his obscurity testified the perplexity into which the Government had been thrown in making a decent choice. He was one of the few survivors of the old school of lawyers which had flourished before the troubles began."—Lord Campbell: "Lives of the Chief Justices," vol. i. p. 491.

certainly bring innocent blood upon yourselves and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof, and 'precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints.' I have no more to say for myself, but I will say one word for the Lord Jesus Christ. The Son of God is King of England, Scotland, Ireland, and of all the kingdoms of this world." He was then silenced, and sentence of death pronounced with all the horrid tortures inflicted in those times on traitors. James exclaimed, "Blessed be God! whom man hath condemned God hath justified."

Taken back to prison, he was, notwithstanding his extreme poverty, subjected to all kinds of extortions, from the governor of the King's Bench prison to the executioner, who came to demand money that he might be favourable to him at his death. Twenty pounds would satisfy him, but James pleading poverty, he fell to ten, and, in conclusion, told him that unless he could pay him five pounds he would torture him exceedingly.[1]

There had been a time in his imprisonment when John James had been greatly troubled, and had said, "Why should I live any longer? Lord, take away my life." But this, he said, the Lord rebuked, and he had much calmness of spirit, and very suddenly by grace arrived to rejoicing in God. At times in imagination he put the halter round his neck and the sled before his eyes, but found they were not at all terrible (as yet). The friends who visited him found him exceedingly cheerful, and much filled with the sense of the goodness of the Lord, declaring tha he could truly say, "Whatever the Lord had spoken of in His blessed word in relation to any trials he had hitherto met with, He had been in them all every way as good as His word." When he had thoughts of living, he said to another friend, he had nothing but trouble and distraction; "for, alas," said he, "what will my life signify? It will signify but little; but my blood will cry aloud; it will speak louder than my life." Some could not forbear weeping when they visited him in the dungeon at Newgate, after his sentence; but he smiling said, "I beseech you, let me not see any of this, for all is well, and therefore forbear, I beseech you, such carriage, which will too much encourage the enemies of the Lord." To others he said, "I am going to a place where the 'wicked cease from troubling, and where the prisoners be at rest.' God has been eminently with me; and though it be hard to look the king of terrors in the face, my dear Lord hath helped me over two of my steps, and now I have but one more before I shall be free from all that care and fear of dishonouring God or grieving His people in the work to which I am called." And to another he said, "I bless God I do no more fear this death than to lie down upon this bed. Oh, how good is God! There is a ground for encouragement in the Lord's dealings with such a poor worm as I, for all the saints to trust Him in every condition."

Upon the seventh day, in the morning, he was allowed to be alone with his wife, and when the friends waiting to see him inquired how he was, he replied, "Never better in all my life; my wife and I have had the best morning that ever we had. We have been giving up one another in the Lord, and I bless the Lord that He hath made us willing to part one from another."

While in prison he preached more than one sermon, especially on his favourite topic, "Jesus Christ, King of all the nations of the earth." Pass what judgment men might on such phrases, they were not used in this instance as political weapons. Finally, several persons of quality came to visit him, men and women, courtiers and others, to persuade him to petition the king and to lay forth his innocency; especially one of eminence in the city laboured much with him to that end, but he replied that he had discharged his duty and conscience already in clearing himself and that to the king he had done no wrong; therefore would submit himself to the Lord and rest satisfied in His good pleasure. He seemed indeed to feel a sort of glory in his death, dwelling on all the details of his trial—the cause for which he suffered, the kingdom of Christ and the righteousness thereof; the false witnesses, who laid to his charge things he knew not; the importance given to his trial by its taking place in so high a court and before several judges, by the Government employing four of the king's counsellors besides the attorney-general and the solicitor-general to plead against him, and empannelling a jury of knights and gentlemen, all of the same spirit; thirsting after his blood; the being robbed of his garments; and finally the mode of death with its details, even the fact of his body not being put into the grave, but on poles, so bringing it to resemble that of the witnesses in Rev. xi.

The night before he suffered he sat at supper with some friends, and said unto them, "I sup with you to-night, but you would be glad to sup with me to-morrow night." About three in the morning he had a sharp conflict with the king of terrors for about an hour and a half's time, but spoke no word, only had an inward wrestling that put him into a sweat. A friend who watched with him read the eleventh of Hebrews, and therein the Lord discovered, to the refreshing of his soul, how that the way he was to travel that day had been travelled through by the Lord's worthies of old, and by faith they endured and accepted not of deliverance on man's terms because they looked for a better resurrection; and afterwards that friend sought the Lord. Then John James declared that the Comforter was come to him again, and had refreshed his soul, and then he made himself ready, and in a joyful frame took his Bible and read James i. 12: "Blessed is the man that endureth temptation: for when he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, which the Lord hath promised to them that love Him." Then he discoursed from this Scripture for half an hour, and when he had ended his discourse he kneeled down and prayed and praised the Lord. After that he discoursed with much joy and sweetness, and said that the Lord had granted him the desire of his heart; for he had desired and sought the Lord that he might be far from being afraid of any amazement, that he might endure the shame with joy when it came.

[1] This hangman went by the sobriquet of "Squire Dun." In a curious little tract of the time, entitled "Groanes from Newgate, or an Elegy upon Edward Dun, Esq., the Citie's Common Hangman, who dyed Naturally in his bed the 11th of September, 1663. Written by a person of Quality, 1663," the epitaph concludes by calling him "the miracle of crueltie," and then proceeds to give details too horrible for reproduction, but which ought to be recalled sometimes if we would realise the world in which our suffering forefathers lived.

Just before his going forth, the friends arrived who had particularly desired to accompany him to the place of execution. "Here come my bridemen," he said, embracing them with joy. Then the keeper of the prison delivered him to the sheriff, who brought him into the press-yard, where, hearing the noise of the multitude without, he said there would by and by be as many Hallelujahs. They then bound him about the back with a new cord, and so he was led into the street, and being placed on the sled, and attended by the sheriff's men and a company of foot-soldiers, he was dragged to Tyburn; and the way out of the town being very foul, he was drawn through much dirt and water, besides much splashing of the horses that went beside him.

It was one of the last days in November 1661 when this poor saint was dragged through the mire to endure his horrible sentence. But he was full of joy and cheerfulness, and not at all dismayed or terrified, when at last he stood beneath the gallows. Leave being given him to speak, he discoursed at large on the charges made against him, in the course of which he described himself as coming from a mean family, but of God-fearing people; mentioned that his aged mother was still living; referred to his principles as a Baptist, as a Seventh-Day Baptist, and as a believer in the visible kingdom of Jesus Christ here on earth. "I do desire to declare it humbly and in the fear of the Lord, that Jesus Christ the Son of God is King of all the nations of the world." Then having declared that he had not the least rising of the spirit against either judge, jury, or witnesses, having asked God to pardon them, he spoke earnestly to the people of God not to forsake the assembling of themselves together, or to neglect the ordinances of the Lord, but to stick to them whatever should happen, not to content themselves with what they already knew, but to endeavour in the fear of the Lord to be seeking after more, and to have a care not to defile themselves with any superstition by treading into paths that might not suit the mind of God, however much they might be accepted in the land. Finally, he spoke to those that had not yet an interest in Jesus Christ, that could not call God Father. First he addressed himself to the young, then to the ancient, saying, "There is yet a day of grace. Jesus Christ is held forth in the Gospel freely, He holds forth His blood freely; for the worst of sinners are not too old, nor too wicked, nor too great, they are not too unclean for Jesus Christ to pity." Then he addressed himself to the Lord in prayer. And this prayer, now lying imbedded among legal reports, is one of the most touching man ever offered.

"Sweet Father! blessed be Thy holy and dear name, that such a poor worm as is before Thee can call Thee Father, that such a poor worm as is before Thee can come and take hold of Thee through Thy dear Son." Then praying very earnestly for the poor witnesses in his late trial, he came to plead for "the poor executioner who is to destroy Thy servant and take him out of this world: that God would be pleased, if it may stand with Thy glory, and if he be within the line of the covenant of grace, that Thou wouldest wash his soul in the blood of Jesus Christ." Then he prayed for all the people in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and all the people up and down the countries, praying specially for the people of God everywhere, and for their unity.

"And, sweet Lord, remember our dear King, our righteous Redeemer, and that Thou wouldest be pleased to give Him the heathen for His inheritance, and the utmost part of the earth for His possession." Then praying finally for courage in the presence of the instruments of death, he ceased, being very tired, and his body brought very low. The hangman said, "The Lord receive your soul." He replied, "I thank you." Then another said, "This is a happy day." He said, "I bless the Lord it is so." The other said, "The Lord make your passage easy." He said, "I trust He will do." Then the hangman, having prepared him for his death, drew away the cart, John James saying aloud, lifting up his hands, "Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit," and so he finished his course.

The sheriff and executioner appear to have been so far affected as to suffer him, contrary to the sentence, to be dead before cutting him down; then the hangman took out his heart, burnt the interior of the body, and returned his head and quarters back to Newgate to be disposed of by the king, his quarters being put up on the gates of the city, and his head first on the bridge, but afterwards it was taken down, and put on a pole in Whitechapel, over against the passage to the meeting-place where he was apprehended.

Though wrong in justice place be set,
  Committing great iniquitie;
Though hypocrites be counted great,
  And still maintain idolatrie;
Though some set more by things of nought
Than by the Lord that all have brought;
    Blame not my lute.

Blame not my lute, I you desire,
  But blame the cause that we thus play;
For burning heat blame not the fire,
  But him that bloweth the coale away;
Blame ye the cause, blame ye not us,
That we men's faults have touched thus;
    Blame not my lute.[1]

RICHARD HEATH.

[1] John Hall's ditty "On the Wicked State and Enormities of Most People in the Present Miserable Daies."

THE ENTRY OF THE PRINCE OF ORANGE INTO LONDON.

(Reduced facsimile of a portion of a print bearing date 1689, by Romein de Hooge.)

SOME NOTABLE PULPITS.

A PILGRIM FATHER'S PULPIT.

WHAT a sail we had in a small yacht from Hunstanton to Boston! The wind was fair right over the Wash. The little vessel sent the water flying on one side and over us. It was most enjoyable. We overtook a number of fishing-boats with deeply-tanned sails going up the river on the flood, and we went with them up the narrow estuary and low-banked treeless river.

As we strolled up the streets of Boston we were struck with the quaintness of the buildings and general picturesqueness of the place. The house in Archer Lane and the Guildhall drew forth much admiration—the one for its beautiful timber-crossed antiquity, the other for its graceful Gothic window with a niche for a statue in middle of the tracery. The whole place is to me as interesting as Antwerp, and the "Stump," as the tower of its famous church is called, is a rival not to be despised by the continental cathedral. What mariner does not know the "Stump"? What a landmark it is! Marvellous tower! Massive, lofty, graceful! The church is almost the largest parish edifice in England. It might be a cathedral.

We wonder how it is that in fen districts such fine churches are found. We are willing to accept as explanation that which is put forward sometimes as a reason, namely, that in past ages the feudal lords imparted to their vassals full hereditary rights to their lands on condition of payments to be laid out in pious uses, and that the erection of such churches as St. Botolph's was connected with grants of land as it was gained, from time to time, from the water.

This church of St. Botolph appears to have been built in the reign of Edward III., at a period when there was a great movement in the way of church-building. It is a remarkable structure. We shall not easily forget the first view of the "Stump" from the bridge, with the reflection of the lofty tower, so perfect and lengthy, making one enormous Jacob's ladder. Then the view within of the church, from under the curtains of the Cotton Chapel, was superb. There are pews on the ground-floor for nearly 2000, and then space in the aisles for 2000 more. Americans have taken a great interest in the place, and filled one chapel, called the "Cotton Chapel," with stained windows. There are brasses also of wonderful workmanship, notably one with the twelve apostles around the effigy of a pea-merchant. But the pulpit is the most attractive object to me. There the celebrated Dr. Cotton had preached. It is attached to the first pillar at the east end of the church, is hexagonal in shape, and of the Elizabethan period. It stands on one pillar, and the sides are elaborate pilasters with arches and florid panels. It is of oak, and the dark ornamental parts are picked out with gold. It must be confessed that the pulpit is in a measure out of harmony with the Gothic of the building; but though the eye of the æsthete might turn away from it, the eye of the antiquarian and religionist would rest upon it with pleasure as the place where that most earnest, God-fearing Dr. Cotton had preached.

The custodian described to me in glowing words the emotions of Dr. Phillip Brookes and his brother, Dr. Cotton Brookes, of America, when they stood in that pulpit. Both said it was a high honour to stand there; and when one went to preach at Westminster Abbey, the other remained to preach from the spot where his namesake and ancestor had so fervently and frequently proclaimed the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

We ought perhaps to mention a little more particularly the history of this exemplary minister. Dr. Cotton Mather says of him, "He was descended from honourable progenitors, and his immediate ancestors were, by some injustice, deprived of great revenues. His father, Mr. Rowland Cotton, had the education of a lawyer bestowed upon him that he might be the better capable thereby to recover the estate of which he had been wronged." The son did not take to the law, but went from the grammar school at Derby to Trinity College, Cambridge. He was, it appears, only thirteen years old when he entered that college. He gained great reputation as a scholar and preacher. A funeral sermon he preached made such a stir that the next time he preached the church was filled with dons. The Vice-Chancellor was there also. High expectations were raised. A polished, high-class sermon was looked for, but, instead, he preached such a practical and pungent discourse on repentance that many were disappointed and disgusted. Instead of ears being tickled, consciences were pricked.

Soon after this Dr. Cotton was appointed to the vicarage of Boston. The presentation was in the hands of the corporation. The men wishing to have him were met by an equal number objecting to him. The casting vote of the Mayor was to decide the election; but the Mayor made a mistake, and, when intending to vote against him, voted for Dr. Cotton. He requested a second ballot, but again repeated his mistake. Demanding a third ballot, it was refused, and so in 1612 Dr. Cotton became vicar of St. Botolph's.

It seems that he could not "digest the ceremonies which were so pressed, nor conform to them." His Nonconformity gave him trouble in the court in Lincoln. Still for twenty years he laboured in Boston. He had many secret enemies, but he maintained his position. "His heart and door were ever open to receive all that feared God, especially godly ministers, and ministers driven into England by the persecution then raging in Germany."

He wrought a great reformation in Boston. Profaneness was extinguished, and superstition abandoned. He was, through the interference of a dissolute man, summoned before the High Court of Commissioners in London, and Dr. Cotton applied to the Earl of Dorset for his intercession with the Government. The intercession was rendered unavailing through Archbishop Laud's opposition, and Lord Dorset informed Dr. Cotton "that if he had been guilty of drunkenness, uncleanness, or any such lesser faults, he could have obtained his pardon; but as he was guilty of Puritanism and Nonconformity, the crime was unpardonable, and therefore he advised him to flee for his safety." In 1633 he resigned the vicarage, flew to London, and lay concealed there for some time. He then changed his dress and travelled under an assumed name, and eluded the officers of the High Commission, who had long sought for him. He managed to get on board a vessel in the Downs. His wife was with him, and a child was born to him on the Atlantic, and named Seaborn. The vessel that carried him was only 300 tons burden, and she had 300 passengers. We can only imagine what sufferings must have been endured during that seven weeks' voyage.

Dr. Cotton settled down at a place called by the Indians Shawmut, but afterwards changed to Boston. Instead of preaching beneath the broad roof of stately St. Botolph's and sending his voice reverberating among its Gothic arches, he had to preach in a small low-thatched meeting-house. But here he was enabled to leave such an impress on the civil and religious arrangements of the day that he has exercised a far mightier influence than if he had remained in England. When Cromwell was in power, some of the principal men of both Houses of Parliament "wished to send a ship to convey Mr. Cotton and other leading colonists to England to aid in public affairs." Something hindered this design, and Cotton remained to carry on his work in New England. He caught cold when crossing a ferry, and died when nearly seventy years of age, and was carried on the shoulders of fellow-ministers to his resting-place. Said one, "Both Bostons have reason to honour his memory, and New England most of all, which oweth its name and being to him more than to any other person in the world."

Among his descendants in the female line in New England are the Byles and Brookes, Cuslings and Everetts, names household words over the Atlantic.

FREDERICK HASTINGS.

THE MISSIONARY SHIPS.

BY ROBERT CUST, LL.D.

PART II.

ON the River Niger, in 1857, appeared, for the double purpose of commerce and evangelization, the ship Day Spring, under Bishop Crowther, which ascended the stream as far as Rabba. In 1878 the steamer Henry Venn I. was placed by the Church Missionary Society on the Niger. It was worn out in the course of eight years. A second steamer of a different construction, Henry Venn II., was sent out in 1885, solely for the navigation of the Niger River, and not to navigate the sea from the mouth of the Niger to the Island of Lagos. The mission is thus independent of the service of the African Company's commercial steamers. The steamer is furnished with steam launches to navigate the creeks.

The Wesleyan Missionary Society has supplied their missionary with a boat fitted with awning and curtains for the navigation of the River Ogan from the ocean to Abeokuta. It is named the Alafia, the Yoruba term for Peace.

The Basle Missionary Society on the Gold Coast in 1866 purchased the schooner Palme to carry its missionaries to the African field. It was got rid of, as the commercial steamers supplied regular and better means of communication. A small river steamer has been supplied for the navigation of the River Volta.

The North German Missionary Society, on the Slave Coast, since 1857 made use of a ship, the Dahómey, which is now engaged in commerce, though formerly belonging to the mission. The commercial steamers have removed the necessity of this or other ships.

The "United Brethren in Christ," a missionary society from Ohio, in the United States, have a small steamer, the John Brown, to serve the stations of their Mende Mission, in West Africa.

In the American Province of Alaska the Moravians have a sailing boat, the Bethel Star, to navigate the rivers of that desolate region.

Following the American coast southward, we find ourselves in the interesting mission settlement of the Shimshi Indians at Metlakatla, belonging to the Church Missionary Society. The head of the mission, Bishop Ridley, of New Caledonia, has a small two-masted steamer, the Evangeline, built in England. Still farther south, but belonging to the same mission, is the steam-launch Eiréné, for the navigation of the Frazer River.

In the Diocese of Algoma, in Canada, which skirts the northern shore of Lake Superior, the Bishop has started a steam-ship, the Evangeline, which enables him to visit his numerous stations lying at great distance, and establish new ones.

In the famous Labrador mission-field of the Moravian Mission, the mission-ships have a longer and more romantic pedigree, extending over one hundred and eighteen years. In 1770 the Jersey Packet led the way, but was superseded by a large vessel, the Amity. In 1777 followed the Good Intent, which was captured by a French vessel, and released by an English cruiser. In 1787 the Amity, which had done good service, was replaced by the Harmony I., a much larger vessel, which lasted till 1802. Like its predecessor, the Resolution had narrow escapes from capture by French cruisers, and worked on till 1808. Its successor, the Hector, after only two months, was replaced by the Jemima. This vessel ran many risks from the icebergs and the perils of the North Sea, but went backwards and forwards from Labrador to England till 1817. Harmony II. was specially built for the work in 1818, and kept on till 1831, in which year Harmony III. was launched, and had a wonderful career, till 1851, when she was replaced by Harmony IV., which was launched in 1861, and is still afloat. This vessel traverses the Atlantic, but for keeping up the communication in the mission-fields we hear of mission-boats, named Meta, Union, Amity, and the schooner Cordelia: this last was run down in the course of a voyage to Europe in 1881 by a steamer in the Thames, and was replaced by the Gleaner, which is still afloat, and carries freight. In the inhospitable clime of Labrador the missionaries and their flocks depend upon the arrival of the mission-ship for their provision and very subsistence. This places the service of these boats upon a distinct category from those of other societies.

The following lines from a Moravian source indicate the spirit with which the successive voyages of the Harmony are watched:—

Thither, while to and fro she steers,
  Lord, guide our annual bark
By night and day, through hopes and fears,
  While lonely as the Ark,
Along her single track she braves
Gulphs, whirlpools, icefields, winds, and waves,
  To waft glad tidings to the shore
  Of longing Labrador.

How welcome to the watcher's eye,
  From morn till evening fixed,
The first faint speck, that shows her nigh,
  Where surge and sky are mixed!
Till looming large, and larger yet,
With bounding prow, and sails full set,
  She speeds to anchor on the shore
  Of joyful Labrador.

In Newfoundland the Bishop since 1865 has had a church-ship called the Hawk, but this is used for pastoral rather than missionary purposes. The Bishop of Nassau for the same purpose in 1885 had a ship, the Messenger of Peace: there is another ship, the Red Cross, and a third ship was sent out in 1880, the Baynes, by the Baptist Missionary Society, but its occupation is pastoral.

On the Moskito Coast the Moravians have had for many years ships for their mission-work. In 1858, Messenger of Peace I. was launched, and lasted ten years, and was then replaced by Messenger of Peace II., which was lost in a storm in 1873. In 1875 the Herald was afloat. It is interesting to note that a large portion of the cost of these ships was collected from the children in Germany, Great Britain, and the United States.

In their mission stations in Dutch Guiana the Moravians are compelled to use boats, among which the Dove is worthy of special mention.

Passing downwards to the region of the Lone Star Mission in Tierra del Fuego, we find in 1854 Allan Gardiner I., which has made important geographical discoveries in the course of the prosecution of strictly missionary work. It has had the mournful honour of being plundered by the natives, but escaped burning. In 1884 Allan Gardiner II. replaced the old vessel, and was a steamer, but has since been converted into a sailing vessel, which sufficiently answers the requirements of the mission-field, and is much less expensive.

The Roman Catholic Missionaries are generally found among the steerage-passengers in the ordinary passenger steamer, after the manner of St. Paul in his famous voyage from Syria to Italy; he had no cabin accommodation like the Protestant missionary and his wife in modern times. Even the negro missionaries claim first-class accommodation, though travelling for their own pleasure. The Roman Catholic Missions appear to have a ship, the Christopherus, for the navigation of the River Amazon; on the Lake of Abbitibi, in Upper Canada, they have a new boat. In Oceania the mission to the Paumotu Island has a boat with the name of the Vatican. The Mission of Bagamoyo near Zanzibár has a boat, and on the Nile above Khartúm the Austrian missionaries once had a Morning Sar, but their mission has ceased to exist, and the Star has disappeared. The missionaries are still prisoners.

A great many considerations arise from the review of this secular side of mission-work.

Let us consider the objections:

1. The dangerous encouragement given to men of enterprise to become geographical explorers, and get a repute as such to the neglect of their proper spiritual work.

2. The temptation offered to secular men, like Henry Stanley, to seize mission-steamers for the transport of troops, weapons of war, gunpowder, &c.

3. The temptation on the part of the missionaries to use the steamers for the purpose of commerce.

4. The temptation on the part of the missionaries to make their ship the refuge of runaway slaves, or to oppose the slave-dealer in a way that may lead to bloody reprisals.

5. The danger which the ship, laden with valuable stores, runs of being boarded, captured, or sunk by armed bodies of natives; and the inexpediency of placing a missionary under the necessity of taking away life to protect his own and that of his companions.

6. The great expense of purchasing or building, of conveying it by sea or land to the mission-field, of repairing, replacing, and maintaining it. This last remark applies specially to steamers.

7. The danger of transgressing the customs or police regulations of a civilised country, and being suspected of being smugglers, or refugee of criminals, as in China.[1]

The mission-ship may appear in several forms.

1. The sea-going steamer, or auxiliary steamer, as in the South Seas.

2. The river-going steamer, as on the Niger.

3. The sailing sea-going vessel, as in the South American Mission.

4. The steam-launch, as on the Niger.

5. The European boat adaptable to steam engines, as in preparation for the Victoria Nyanza.

6. The European boat with sails and oars, as the Wesleyan boat at Lagos.

7. The native boat, as at Port Said, for the Bible Society's agent.

It is clear that a missionary society should think three times before buying a steamer, and weigh the advantages and disadvantages, the profit and loss; it is not a simple problem, nor of universal application. In the South Seas the steam mission-ships have been an universal blessing: their course from island to island has been marked by a track of light on the waters. Without a mission-ship of some kind mission-work in the Northern Sea would be impossible. Independent of the risk from the dangers of the sea and fire, experience has shown that a steam-ship has a very short career. The Henry Venn I. steamer on the Niger lasted only eight years, owing to climate and local causes. But there is another contingency: after an expensive steam-ship has been placed on the water to connect certain places, commercial steamers may occupy the line and the mission-ship is no longer required. It is not expedient for a mission-ship to make profit by a carrying trade, even of legitimate merchandise, exclusive of liquor and materials of war. This opens out a great many serious questions. Our safest course is to keep our missionaries to the work of evangelizing, education, and healing, and try to relieve spiritual men, as much as possible, of secular work and cares. Perhaps, on Lake Nyassa, the happiest solution has been found, where a commercial company has undertaken the duty of navigation on terms of strict amity, but entire independence of the missionaries.

[1] We give place to these objections simply as raising practical points that may demand consideration in particular cases.—Ed. S. H.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

"J. R. L.," Tunbridge, writes: "I beg to call your attention to the fact that notwithstanding the solemn injunction laid upon Gentile Christians, by the Council of Jerusalem, as recorded in Acts xv., that among the other things named they should abstain from 'things strangled,' yet modern Christians make no scruple about eating strangled poultry and strangled rabbits. Can you tell me when the injunction, said to be in accordance with the will of the Holy Ghost, was abrogated; or whether it is not equally binding upon Christians in our day? Some may plead that circumstances have altered; but if this plea can be maintained, upon the same ground other infractions of the sacred word will be resorted to with impunity, so far as the Church is concerned."

It must be remembered that this was the decree of the Church in Jerusalem to meet a special case—that of Gentile converts newly received into the Church of Christ, and still having much to do with heathens on the one side and Jews on the other. Special temptations and difficulties arose from their position, which it required much wisdom to meet. First, the associations of heathenism, with its evil habits and impure rites, demanded a special warning against the deadly sin of fornication, as well as against the complicity with idol worship which would be involved in eating what had been offered on the altars of false gods. This eating, as St. Paul abundantly proved to the Romans and the Corinthians, was not essentially sinful; it was a case in which Christian liberty might be claimed and allowed; and yet it was wisest to have nothing to do with what was connected with the abomination. Secondly, with regard to Jews, to whom the blood was something to be poured out in sacrifice before God, and thus consecrated to Him alone, the employment of blood in any way as food would be an intolerable scandal. The prohibition, as old as the days of Noah (Gen. ix. 4), had been plainly repeated in their Law, with as plain a statement of the reason: "The life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar to make atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh atonement by reason of the life: therefore I said unto the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood, neither shall any stranger that sojourneth among you eat blood" (Lev. xvii. 11, 12, R. V.). The reason for the prohibition no longer existing, the prohibition itself would naturally fall to the ground. But for a time, until larger views of Christian truth and liberty should prevail, it was needful, for the sake of union in the Church, to maintain the restriction. The Jewish believer could not so completely overcome the habits of a lifetime and the Divinely warranted usage of centuries as not to be horrified and alienated by the practice in question. "For Moses," it is added, "of old time hath in every city them that preach him, being read in the synagogues every Sabbath day." In every Gentile city there would thus be a voice from the synagogue to condemn the profanation. The essentials of the Jewish ritual were abrogated once for all when the veil of the Temple was rent, but the circumstantials long remained, vanishing gradually as the largeness of the Gospel was more completely understood.

As a matter of history, we may add that, until the fourth or fifth century, the prohibition was generally recognised in the churches as binding. Thus Tertullian (about A.D. 200) explicitly states (Apology, § 9), that Christians abstain from blood, from things strangled, and from animals that die a natural death, being tempted by their enemies in mockery "with sausages of blood," which the tempters knew to be held unlawful. But Augustine (A.D. 400) refers in his great treatise against the Manichæan heresy (Reply to Faustus, bk. xxxvii. § 13) to the prohibition as having been laid upon the Gentiles as "an easy observance that could not be burdensome, and which the Gentiles might have in common with the Israelites, for the sake of the Cornerstone who makes both one in Himself;" adding that, "since the close of the period during which the two walls of the circumcision and the uncircumcision, although united in the Cornerstone, still retained their distinctive peculiarities, no Christian feels bound to abstain from thrushes or small birds because their blood has not been poured out, or from hares because they are killed by a stroke on the neck without shedding their blood. Any who still are afraid to touch these things are laughed at by the rest; so general is the conviction of the truth that 'not what entereth into the mouth defileth a man, but what cometh out of it'; that evil lies in the commission of sin, and not in the nature of any food in ordinary use."

THE ARK OF THE COVENANT.

A correspondent, W. R., quotes Hebrews ix. 3, 4: "After the second veil, the tabernacle which is called the Holy of holies, having a golden censer (or, as R.V. margin, altar of incense), and the ark of the covenant overlaid round about with gold, wherein was (R.V. margin, is) a golden pot holding the manna, and Aaron's rod that budded, and the tables of the covenant; and above it cherubim of glory overshadowing the mercy seat (or propitiatory, R.V. margin)." Our correspondent then asks how this statement is to be reconciled with 1 Kings viii. 9 and 2 Chron. v. 10?—"There was nothing in the ark save the two tables of stone which Moses put there at Horeb;" and adds the following remarks:—

"PROFESSOR EADIE suggests that the contents of the ark were different at different periods (but where is the authority for that?), or that the phrase 'wherein' in Heb. ix. 4 refers not to the ark but to the antecedent 'the tabernacle.'

"In the directions given by God to Moses (Exod. xxv. 10–21), we notice what the use of the ark was to be. The mercy-seat of pure gold, without any alloy, was to cover up in the ark the tables of the law written with the finger of God (Exod. xxxi. 18; Deut. ix. 10, 11). These first tables were broken (see Exod. xxxii. 15, 16, 19). They were graciously renewed (see Exod. xxxiv. 1; Deut. x. 1–5). From the last-mentioned passage it would appear that Moses made and took a small box with him to carry the tables of stone safely up and down the mount, temporarily to hold them until the ark proper was completed.

"When all the articles used to compose the tabernacle were completed, Moses was commanded to set it up (Exod. xl. 21): 'And he took and put the Testimony into the ark, and put the mercy seat above upon the ark.' Now, in the subsequent history, there appears no evidence that the mercy-seat was ever lifted up again, either to see what was in the ark or to add anything whatever to it, until the Temple was destroyed, and its contents were taken by the Babylonians.

"As to the pot of manna, see Exod. xvi. 32, 33, and 34: 'So Aaron laid it up before the Testimony to be kept.'

"With regard to Aaron's rod that budded, see Numb. xvii. 10: 'The Lord said unto Moses, Bring Aaron's rod again before the Testimony to be kept.'

"In both cases the instructions were to put these things 'before the Testimony to be kept,' not inside the ark.

"Another thing, not alluded to in Hebrews, may perhaps throw some light on this matter. In Deut. xxxi. 24–26 it is commanded: 'Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark.' Is this not the 'book,' or roll, which was found by Hilkiah the high priest in the reign of Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 8)?

"There was probably a shelf, or ledge, attached to the ark, on which the roll, the manna, and Aaron's rod might be placed for the purpose of transport; otherwise the Levites, who carried the ark by the staves through the rings of gold attached to its four corners, would have had to leave these accessories behind them.

"Very particular directions are given for the protection of the ark from public gaze (comp. Exod. xix. 21), or the touch of any but the priests (Numb. iv. 4–6, 15). 'When the priests have made an end of covering, then the Levites shall come to bear it, but they shall not touch, lest they die.' In verse 18 is a warning given to the priests how they should guard the bearers from danger, by seeing that each one attended to his own particular service. And lastly, verse 20, 'They shall not go in to see, lest they die.'

"This explanation, it is submitted, will throw light on the narrative of the men of Bethshemesh (1 Sam. vi. 19), which has already been discussed in these Notes and Queries.[1]

"When the ark was taken by the Israelites to the war against the Philistines, it would not be uncovered. (The representations therefore given in pictures are erroneous.) Consequently, when the Bethshemites who were near to the cart which carried the ark saw their opportunity to gratify a carnal curiosity, they lifted up a portion of the covering, when instantly 'fire consumed them' (Psalm lxxviii. 63).

"The ark into which they pried included the things that were commanded to be kept with it; so the writer in Hebrews, when summarising its contents, writes as if all were in the ark, whereas he only meant that they were inseparable from it when folded up for travelling."

On the whole, then, it appears, according to our correspondent, that the objects covered up with the ark, and stated in the history to be kept "before the Testimony" or placed "in the side of the ark," were never really inside the sacred chest, either in the tabernacle (as generally assumed by expositors of Hebrews) or in the Temple; and that the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews uses the phrase translated "wherein" in a general sense, to include what was on or by the ark, or wrapped up with it. We think that our correspondent has made out a strong case, especially as there is no record whatever in the history of anything being put into the ark but the "Testimony," i.e. the tables of the law.

[1] See SUNDAY AT HOME, 1887, p. 138.

WILLIE WILLS' WINGS.

BY MRS. G. S. REANEY.

CHAPTER I.

HE was a fair-haired—crisp, curly-headed—little fellow, with blue eyes which could look overflowing with mirth, but which were more often—as now—very plaintive in their mute sadness. Willie Wills was in trouble. He was the youngest of a family of five, but had never known the petting which so often falls to baby's share. All Willie's good games and merry romps were associated with somebody else's home. His heart-aches and tears belonged to his own.

To-day had only been a repetition of many and many a scene, which for the time made Willie very sad, very miserable. His father and mother had both, alas! been drinking, and this drinking had—as was often the case—led to quarrelling; and when Willie, frightened and troubled, had ventured to plead, "Please, mother, don't," tugging at his mother's skirts the while, his father had turned upon him, boxing his ears and driving him down the stairs of the lodging-house where they were staying. This brought little Willie to just where we find him, leaning up against a lamp-post in a street to which he had run to distance himself from home, looking so sad, but shedding no tears.

It was Sunday. A few hours ago Willie had watched the people going to church, wishing again and again that he had been one of the little boys who walked beside his mother carrying her books for her. The town was new to Willie; his parents had only come there a few evenings ago, and this was his first Sunday. Willie could remember the days when Sunday meant, to them all at home, clean clothes and the Sunday-school. He had belonged to the infant class, and the only verses he could repeat to-day were those he learnt with the other children: a very favourite hymn, which was not only said but sung every Sunday afternoon. Willie had strangely mixed and muddled the tune, but at times it was very soothing to him to hum through dismally—

"Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me;
Bless Thy little lamb to-night;
In the darkness be Thou near me,
Keep me safe till morning light.

All the day Thy Hand hath led me,
And I thank Thee for Thy care;
Thou hast clothed me, warmed me, fed me:
Listen to my evening prayer.

Let my sins be all forgiven,
Bless the friends I love so well;
Take me when I die to heaven,
Happy there with Thee to dwell."

Willie was humming this to himself to-day and looking strangely pathetic—so, at least, thought Rose Simmonds as she watched him at a distance.

Rose Simmonds had felt led to offer herself that day as a teacher at the All Saints' Sunday school. Something had come to her heart by way of beautiful inspiration, and as Grannie—with whom she lived—felt it to be "a leading of the Lord," as indeed all good longings are, no matter to whose heart they come, Rose had no doubts in her mind as to the wisdom of the step she was taking. Grannie's parting words, "God's biddings are His enablings," gave her courage to enter the All Saints' school-room and ask to speak to the superintendent.

When the superintendent had listened to Rose's desire to take a class, he answered deliberately:

"We shall be very thankful of your help, Miss Simmonds, if you will bring your own scholars. Some chairs and yonder corner are at your service; the boys you will find by looking for them outside; any ragged little fellows will be welcome."

That was how it happened that Miss Simmonds came to notice poor little Willie

CHAPTER II.

WILLIE had reached the second verse of the hymn, and was pausing over the line

"And we thank Thee for Thy care," wondering if a little ragged boy, whose ears still tingled with the blow they had received, could feel quite the same about God's care as the little well-dressed boys whom he had watched on their way to church that morning with their fathers and mothers. Willie was wishing he could change places with those little boys just for one day, to find out "how it felt" to wear nice clothes, and be called "dear," when Miss Simmonds stood before him, and, placing her hand on his shoulder, said, with a very kind smile—

"Little boy, would you like to come to my Sunday-school class?"

The voice was so tender, and the smile so sweet, that Willie's eyes filled with tears. Rose Simmonds noticed this, and, as Willie did not answer, she slipped her hand in his, and gently drew him in the direction from which she had come, saying brightly—

"We will have such a happy afternoon. You were looking so sad when I came up just now. Were you wishing you could go to a Sunday school?"

"No, miss," said Willie, turning his blue eyes fully upon the questioner. "I don't expect to go to Sunday schools while father travels. We mostly only spend one Sunday in a place, and you see we're only strangers."

"What does your father do?" asked Rose, keeping Willie's hand fast in hers, and walking slowly.

"He has a van, and sells things. Baskets, and brushes, and mats," said Willie, growing communicative.

"Have you many brothers and sisters?" asked Rose, now really interested.

"There's Sal; but she's gone to service," said Willie. "The clergyman's wife where we used to live before father got a van has taken her. Then there's Becky; but she's had to go to hospital, because she was took bad on the road when we were ten miles out of the last town we stayed in. Jim works at Farmer Smith's, near our old home, and Bert has gone for a sailor."

"Then how many does that leave at home—I mean with your father and mother?" asked Rose.

"Only me," said Willie; "and I help mother with the brushes. We've not done this town yet. Perhaps, miss, you might give us a turn if we should chance to come your way?"

"Certainly," said Rose, smiling at Willie's business faculty; and she added, "When we have had our Sunday-school lesson to-day, I will tell you where I live, so that you may find me without difficulty."

Willie's face brightened up. Perhaps it was because he thought when the morrow came it would sound a little grand to be able to tell "mother" he knew where to find a customer; for the poor little fellow knew all too well that nothing was so likely to make him in favour with his parents as putting "an honest penny," as they called it, in their way.

Just at this moment, Miss Simmonds told Willie to wait where he was, while she crossed the road to speak to two boys who were playing marbles. Neither had a hat on, and both looked even more ragged than Willie did. After a few moments of earnest talking, Miss Simmonds got the two boys to come with her, and within a very short time she and her three scholars entered the All Saints' Sunday school.

SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. VII.

Very many incidents in our Lord's history are alluded to in the prophecies of the Old Testament. These passages may be divided into two classes: (1) those in which reference is made to Him directly; (2) those in which another person is spoken of in the first instance and there is a remoter allusion to the Messiah. This set of questions is upon the first class:—

1. It was prophesied that He should have a forerunner. Where is the prophecy, and where is it alluded to in the New Testament?

2. Jacob prophesied long before that He should come from the tribe of Judah. Give the prophecy and two texts from the New Testament connecting our Saviour with the tribe of Judah?

3. It was foretold that He should be born at Bethlehem. Give the prophecy and say where it is quoted in the New Testament.

4. The 22nd Psalm contains the following allusions to Jesus' death. Mention the parallel passages in the New Testament?

(a) Jesus' words upon the Cross.
(b) The mocking of the bystanders at His crucifixion.
(c) The division of His garments among the soldiers.

5. The prophet Isaiah has the following, for which parallel passages may be found in the New Testament.

(a) The miracles of our Lord.
(b) His refusal to answer Pilate.
(c) His crucifixion between two thieves, and His burial by Joseph.

6. The prophet Zechariah speaks

(a) Of His riding into Jerusalem.
(b) Of His being sold for thirty pieces of silver.
(c) Of the piercing of His side.
(d) Of the scattering of His disciples.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS.

NO. VII.—p. 560.—REBEKAH.

(1) Gen. xxiv. 15; (2) 17; (3) 22; (4) 3, 4; (5) 61, 67; (6) xxv. 28; (7) xxvii. 15–17; (8) xxvii. 46; xxviii. 1.

NO. VIII.—p. 576.

1. A-hithophel	1 Chr. xxvii. 33. 2 Sam. xvi. 23; xvii. 23.
2. B-athsheba	2 Sam. xi. 3, 27. 1 Kings i. 30; x. 23.
3. S-himei	2 Sam. xvi. 6, 7; xix. 19, 20. 1 Kings ii. 36–40.
4. A-bner	1 Sam. xiv. 50. 2 Sam. ii. 8, 9; iii. 8–10, 27.
5. L-ot	Gen. xiii. 10; 2 Pet. ii. 7. Gen. xix. 15, 25.
6. O-bededom	2 Sam. vi. 11.
7. M-ephibosheth	2 Sam. iv. 4; ix. 13.

ANSWER TO HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. IX.—p. 576.

A wise son maketh a glad father.—Prov. xv. 20; also x. 1.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert

JANET MACFARLANE'S PRAYER.

CHAPTER III.

Far, far above thy thought
His counsel shall appear,
When fully he the work hath wrought
That caused thy needless fear!

"I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward."—Gen. xv. 1.

"COME IN, AND WELCOME."

ONE afternoon in August, John came in early.

"There is going to be a storm, gude-wife, and there is a party o' strangers on the hills. They'll be here for shelter vera soon. Get the fire built up, for they'll be wet enough before they reach it."

John's surmise was true. In half-an-hour a couple of ladies and gentlemen, accompanied by a guide, stopped at the little house. There was a good fire and a cup of tea waiting for them, and for a short time the quiet, spotless kitchen was as busy as an inn. One of the ladies was Helen Forbes, but her cousin Gordon was not with her. She was soon attracted by a picture standing open upon the high mantel-shelf. She drew near the fire, and, holding her wet feet toward it, she looked, without seeming to look, at the pictured face. She had not a doubt as to its identity, but what was it doing there? Then she remembered that she was on the Mac Farlane's land, and that very likely this motherly old woman had been a nurse, or foster-parent. "To-morrow I will come again, and come alone;" and, with this thought in her heart, she contrived to drop her riding glove, where it would not be readily seen.

The next afternoon Janet, sitting spinning in her house-place, saw Helen Forbes standing at the door. She remembered her face readily, and said at once—

"Come in, and welcome, I found your glove this morning. Will you hae a cup o' tea, or a cup o' cream and a bit o' oat cake?"

"I would like well the cream and cake."

It was easy enough to get the proud mother to talk of the one so dear to both. She took down the picture, and explained how much inferior it was to the original. "As if I did not know that," whispered Helen to herself. Then the mother told the history of his whole life; only too happy to have such a patient listener. Helen could never forget that hour. She thought through all the future she would remember just how the sun glinted through the open door, and how the bees hummed among the stocks and thyme in the small garden, and how the old woman's happy voice blended itself with the "tick, tick" of the long clock in the corner.

"You have a good son;" she said in a soft voice.

"I hae the best son i' a' the wide world, miss."

"What made you call him Malachi? It is a very unusual Scotch name."

"I'll tell you, miss. It was the day before he was born, and I had done up the house-place, and sat down to rest a wee, and read a few words in the Holy Book before his father cam' frae the hills. It was the prophecy o' Malachi I opened, and my e'en fell upon his description o' a gude minister—here it is, miss, read it." Helen read: "The law of truth was in his mouth, and iniquity was not found in his lips; he walked with Me in peace and equity, and did turn many away from iniquity. For the priest's lips should keep knowledge, and they should seek the law at his mouth; for he is the messenger of the Lord of hosts."

Helen laid down the Bible, saying, "A beautiful description, indeed."

"Even sae; and as I read it my soul rose up to my God, and I asked of Him with a' my heart, if it was His pleasure, to gie me a lad bairn and to mak' him ane o' His messengers. Sae then, when the child was born, I called him Malachi, in remembrance, and in hope; and I keep it the Lord in memory o' my prayer year after year. But it was'na to be; and sae I have bowed my head, and said, 'Thy will be done!'"

"Oh, but God would surely hear such prayer as that! When you first made the petition I have no doubt that it was granted."

"He is a doctor;" said Janet, a little sadly.

"Nevertheless, your prayer will be granted."

"All things are possible to God, miss; I ken that."

Helen perceived that there was something unexplained, but she thought she understood Malachi's motive, and she kept her thoughts in her own heart, where also a great personal conflict was going on. She had all the class prejudices of her rank, and she valued good birth more than gold. As far as the world could appraise Malachi MacFarlane, he was only a peasant's son. "But," she told herself with a tender glow upon her face, "he was consecrated from his birth to the service of God! He is sure to become a burning and shining light in the kirk; and Scotland has the grace to put, even socially, the servants of the King of kings on a rank with any earthly nobles. When hands have been laid upon him, and he can assume the gown and bands of his office, he will be greater than the judge on the bench, or the earl in his robes. I am not ashamed of my peasant-born lover; and, if he is not ashamed of the cottage where God caused him to be reared in all noble simplicity, then he shall understand that I think him most worthy of love and honour."

She did not meet him again until Christmas. Malachi had returned to his classes at the proper time, but Helen did not go to Edinburgh until near the holidays. She saw at a glance that travel had much improved him. He was standing at the side of Dr. Guthrie, and the great man's hand was affectionately laid upon his shoulder. They were in parlours crowded with notables from the kirks and the college, but her eyes rested upon no two nobler figures. For nearly an hour Malachi did not know that Helen was present. Suddenly he met her face to face. She was sitting quietly under a large tropical plant, its broad green leaves making an exquisite background for her white-draped form.

It was impossible for Malachi to hide his delight in seeing her again, and Helen permitted herself to show that she shared his pleasure. They parted with the understanding that he was to call the following day and show her some prints he had collected during his summer travels. And it was after a pleasant hour over them that he asked Helen "if she had spent the summer at her home in Nairn?"

"I was in Jura for a month," she replied. "The MacFarlane was a friend of my mother's. Is he any relative of yours?"

"All the MacFarlanes are kin, near or far off."

A cloud gathered on his face, and a sense of constraint fell between them. Helen's heart beat painfully. Would he deny, or even evade the truth? Alas, if her idol should be clay after all! It took but a moment for these painful doubts to wound her, and in that same moment Malachi had faced the question before him. It was to be her test, as well as his. If she shrank from it, it was better to know the truth at once. He looked at her steadily, and yet with all his soul in his eyes, as he continued—

"Some of them are rich and well-born, some are poor and peasant-born. My father—God for ever bless him—is more than well-born, he is born from above, and a son of the most High, though but a shepherd on the MacFarlane's hills. My mother—there is no sweeter mother—is just a pious, wise, housewife, whose sole aim is to please her Maker and make her husband and son happy. But I do assure you, Miss Forbes, that I bless God for them morning and night! I owe the opportunities I have had to their industry, economy and love. All honours I may come to will be the reward of honouring my father and my mother. I would be a base craven to be ashamed of them! I have no cause to be ashamed of them! If you only knew them, you would understand that!"

The face she lifted to him was bright with admiration, her eyes tearful and tender.

"I do know them!" she said, softly. "I honour you with all my heart for what you have said."

She gave him her hand, and then he found the words to say all that was in his heart. An hour afterward, going home, he felt as if Paradise had been regained. Life seemed so beautiful, so wonderful. Everything was possible. There was a prayer in his heart that was a song.

"Perfectly happy!" he whispered to himself. "Perfectly happy! What must it be in heaven to be always perfectly happy?"

On Princes Street he met Gordon.

"What is the matter, Malachi? You look as if you had come into a kingdom."

"I have come into something far awa' better. Helen Forbes has promised to be my wife. Could you ever have expected a thing like that to happen?"

"Oh, yes, I expected it a year ago. I congratulate you with all my heart. Helen will be one of the wives that are from the Lord. But, my dear, dear Malachi, we will never forget these years in which we two alone have been everything to each other."

"Never, never, Gordon! No circumstances continue long, but we have made the best of those we have shared; and I'll no doubt but what they'll dovetail into any others that lie before us."

The next half-year was a very busy and happy one for Malachi. In it he passed his examination with the highest honours; and almost simultaneously with his ordination he received a call from a church, with the active work of which he had been long connected. The invitation, in its promptitude and unanimity, gave him great pleasure. It was a small kirk in a fashionable locality; but then, as Helen said, there were a great many sinners to save, even among that decorous class which Charles Kingsley called, "sitters in pews," and for work among the indigent and ignorant he had many other outlets.

After he had preached one Sunday in his new charge, he resolved to let his father and mother share in his joy. There could be no fear of a disappointment to them now; and he wrote and entreated them to give themselves a holiday, and come to Edinburgh for a few weeks. He urged them upon two grounds—work which he could not leave to come to them; and his probable early marriage. John felt that they could well afford this trip. His son's education had cost him much less than he had anticipated; so, with almost childlike delight, they prepared for it.

It was indeed a great event for Janet, who had never been twenty miles from her home; and even John felt a nervousness which, as an old soldier, he would not acknowledge. But all went well; and Malachi met them with a beaming face, and took them to his own home. Janet was much amazed at the handsome dwelling, but it was Saturday night when they arrived, and the strictness with which the Western Islanders observe the Sabbath admits of no worldly curiosity or conversation so near to it. In the morning John asked what minister they were to hear.

"Maybe you would like to hear your namesake, the Rev. Mr. MacFarlane, I think you would enjoy the service there."

"Ay, I would like fine to hear ane o' the name preach. He'll be Menzies MacFarlane's son, dootless;" said John with a sigh. "I heard tell that he was in the holy office."

At the church door Malachi said to one of the deacons, "This is my father and my mother, deacon; will you put them in the minister's pew?"

But this request raised no suspicion in the old people's minds. The minister's pew was generally the place of honour for a stranger, and John and Janet silently congratulated themselves upon being so near to the pulpit. They sat with bowed heads communing with God until Malachi's voice, uplifted in the opening prayer, broke the silence. He knew them too well to fear any visible or audible sign of their emotion. He was certain that, of all places on earth, they would have desired that this joy should come to them in the house and the presence of God.

Janet indeed laid her trembling hand upon her husband's, but, even in that supreme moment, John would not suffer his human love and pride to enter with him into the presence of his Maker.

By the time the prayer was over, both were grave and self-possessed. Indeed, John felt that it behoved him to listen without favour; and he was determined that none of the deacons should see that he was at all "set up" with having a son in the pulpit. But, oh, what a fountain of holy joy was in his heart! and it required all the stern conscientiousness of his nature to prevent his thoughts that day from rambling from the sermon to the preacher.

As for Janet, she had less strength. She sat with closed eyes, saying with Hannah of old, "For this child I prayed; and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of Him. Therefore, also, I have lent him to the Lord; as long as he liveth he shall be lent to the Lord. My heart rejoiceth in the Lord."

A grip of his father's hand, the look in his mother's eyes, said far more to the happy preacher than any words could have said. They, of course, came the next day, but the Sabbath's silent thanksgiving had a joy beyond them.

"You gave us twa grand sermons, Malachi," said John at the breakfast-table. "It was a Sabbath o' pleasant things to me, my son. I ne'er had such a day afore—God has been vera gude to me."

"I was just the happiest woman i' a' Scotland, Malachi; my dear bairn, you hae paid me the hire o' my love a thousand fold."

They remained in Edinburgh until after Malachi's marriage, and it was a wonderful visit to them. But at the last they pined a little for their home, and before the winter closed in they were back on the Jura Hills. But there was no longer any necessity for them to toil, and, indeed, John was no longer inclined to do so. He was seventy-seven years old, and the wounds and exposures of his hard life began to remind him that his day's work was done. He dug a little in his garden, and read his Bible, and talked with Janet about Malachi, and thought a great deal about the land to which he was going.

One day in the following spring the MacFarlane called to see him.

"John," he said, "they tell me that you are sair failed, but you look happy enough."

"I hae happy memories, and happy prospects, MacFarlane; and my work is done. I am just resting a wee afore I gae the way that I'll ne'er return."

"John, I heard your son preach last Sabbath day; his words went to the very bottom o' my soul. I'll be a better man, my life long, for that sermon, I hope. John, I hae the lands, and I hae the title, but your son Malachi is, 'The MacFarlane,' he is that, John!"

Of all human praise, this touched John most. His dim eyes filled with happy tears; he lifted his bonnet and bowed his head gratefully. It was difficult for him to say clearly—

"Thank you MacFarlane, and praise be to His name!"

One lovely night in the midsummer, John went home almost without warning. Sitting quite still and silent in his great chair at the open door of his cottage, he was looking over the ocean, which lay smooth as glass under a full moon, and letting his thoughts wander solemnly through eternity.

Suddenly his face shone with an adoring wonder, and his staff fell from his hand. He needed it no longer; treading the star-strewn spaces with the sons of God and stumbling not.

Then Janet listened to Helen and Malachi. The little house was locked up, and she dwelt for the rest of her days with them. She heard her son preach every Sabbath, she carried his sons and daughters in her arms. She had nursed her boy for the Lord, and the Lord paid her grand wages. She saw him beloved and honoured, she saw him rise to the highest offices in the kirk. She shared in all the love and happiness of his beautiful home—she never grew old. When she was eighty years of age, her heart was so young, that Malachi's children made her their companion and confidant. Her last act was one of beautiful and appropriate significance.

It was her eighty-second birthday, and on it Malachi's new church—a large and splendid edifice—was to be opened. She had been weak and inclined to sleep for many days, and it was not thought well for her to be present. When Malachi returned from the opening service, she was still farther away from life. He told her about it, and she seemed to listen.

"Do you hear me, mother, my dear mother?"

"A lang way off, my dear lad!"

"Mother, there is to be a beautiful tablet over the entrance to my new kirk—you are to choose the verse for it. What shall it be?"

"The fourth chapter o' Isaiah and the sixth verse," she answered, without a moment's hesitation; though her voice was faint and far-away, as if it came from the very border-lands of being.

They were her last words. After them she went the way of all the earth, but Heaven had opened to her, and from the calm of the other side she yet speaketh, through the love of her faith and her dedication; for the verse which she chose for Malachi's church has been ever since its sentiment and its motive:

"A tabernacle for a shadow in the daytime from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain."—Isa. iv. 6.

"The Brook in the Way."

(MELMERBY.)

"He shall drink of the brook in the way, therefore shall he lift up his head."—Psalm cx. 7.

THIS shining brook, I drink it with mine eyes,
As down the secret dell it winds its way,
While thro' o'erhanging boughs full many a ray
Trembles uncertainly from steadfast skies.
This singing brook, whose softened murmurs rise
Through the green umbrage, where cool breezes play,
I drink it with mine ears, as on I stray
Marking its cadence and its symphonies;
And, from the mystic influences shed
Through eye and ear upon the trusting heart,
Soothed I return, and cheerful lift my head:
A fellow-worker, Nature fair, thou art
With Grace, and by twin angels we are led
To yon safe heights where mortal fears depart.

RICHARD WILTON.

ST. JOHN:

APOSTLE, EVANGELIST, AND SEER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

VI.—WRITINGS OF THE APOSTLE: THE APOCALYPSE.

THE great transition in the life of St. John, from the Jewish to the Gentile world, was evidently directed by the Spirit of God with a view to those works in which the apostle was to speak to all the ages with a voice that grows only clearer and more thrilling with the lapse of time. The Gospel, the three Epistles, and the Apocalypse, more than any record of outward incidents, are the memorial of his life in Ephesus.

With regard to these writings, many questions have been raised, especially in modern times. One question, in particular, lying as it does on the surface, cannot be ignored. Is it possible, the critic and even the general reader asks, that books so diverse in form and spirit can have been the work of the same hand? What is there in common between the "Revelation" with its glowing symbols and startling imagery, and the divine philosophy of the Gospels and the Letters? Is it not with a sense of violent contrast that we pass from the sublime abstractions of Light and Love, Truth and Peace, to the vials and the trumpets, the white horses and the warrior angels? Then, as a minor but significant matter, the style in the two sets of writings is very different. In the Apocalypse the language is that of a Hebrew employing Greek as a foreigner. The constructions are rugged and irregular: the writer thinks in Hebrew although he writes in Greek. In the Gospels and Epistles his mastery over the language is much more decided; the roughnesses have disappeared: he writes as one to whom the tongue had grown familiar.

Some readers, no doubt, would account for the contrast by simply saying that the Spirit of God Himself so controlled the vehicle of speech as to lead the same writer to adopt various styles according to the message he had to communicate. But this explanation will hardly satisfy those who consider that the inspired writers as a rule employ their own characteristic modes of speech, the human element in their compositions being employed and possessed by the divine. The author of the Gospel and the author of the Apocalypse in each case writes in his own style; and, believing as we do that both works proceeded from the same pen, we must seek some satisfactory reason, on literary grounds, for the difference between the two.

There have been critics from ancient times who have boldly cut the knot by denying the common authorship. Some have rejected the Johannine origin of the Apocalypse, some have denied that of the Gospel and Epistles. The former alternative is that adopted by the earlier rationalistic critics; the latter is now more generally chosen. In fact, it may be said that, after long controversy, the authorship of the book of Revelation has been settled beyond the reach of fair objection. There is scarcely a book of the New Testament on behalf of which such decisive testimony can be adduced;[1] while, as we hope to show, although at present more frequently attacked, the Gospel stands upon as certain a foundation.

A question of greater difficulty concerns the dates of these respective writings. From considerations of style alone, the natural inference would be that the Apocalypse was the earlier of the two. This is in fact the conclusion at which the great majority of modern critics, orthodox as well as rationalistic, have arrived. The exile in Patmos, and the visions of the Revelation, it is held, belong to that part of the apostle's career in which he had but recently quitted Judæa, with the associations of his early life still surrounding him; the Gospel and Epistles to his closing days, when by long intercourse with the Greek-speaking people of Ephesus he had become familiar with their language. "It is not difficult," writes Canon Westcott, "to see that in any case intercourse with a Greek-speaking people would in a short time naturally reduce the style of the author of the Apocalypse to that of the author of the Gospel. It, is, however very difficult to suppose that the language of the writer of the Gospel could pass at a later time in a Greek-speaking country into the language of the Apocalypse."[2]

We cannot now go into the collateral arguments for the earlier date of the book, drawn from the contents, especially from those passages which seem to imply that Jerusalem was not yet destroyed, and that Nero or Galba was at that time Emperor of Rome. These points belong to the difficult subject of apocalyptic interpretation, which we have no space to pursue into details. The general purport, as we shall see, is clear; although we may hesitate to admit with Professor Harnack that "the Apocalypse is the most intelligible book in the New Testament."[3]

---

[1] See the list of authorities in Canon Westcott's "Synopsis of Historical Evidence," Canon of the New Testament, p. 593.

[2] Speaker's Commentary on St. John, p. lxxxvi. Substantially the same conclusion is maintained by Bishop Lightfoot, and by Professor Salmon, not to mention other names. Professor Lee, the commentator on the Apocalypse in the Speaker's Commentary, as strongly maintains the later date.

[3] Encyclopædia Britannica, 9th ed., vol. xx., art. "Revelation."

The most serious difficulty in the way of accepting the early date is in the testimony of early Christian writers, and especially of Irenæus, the pupil of St. John's disciple Polycarp. His statement is made incidentally, in a discussion of the name of Antichrist ("the number of the Beast"[1]). "If it were necessary," writes Irenæus, "that his name should be distinctly revealed in this present time, it would have been announced by him who beheld the apocalyptic vision. For that was seen no very long time since, but almost in our day, towards the end of Domitian's reign."[2] Attempts to explain away this testimony must be pronounced unsatisfactory. Thus, instead of that, i.e. the vision, was seen, some propose to render he, i.e. John, was seen; while others take "Domitian" as an epithet of Nero. But these explanations do violence to the language of Irenæus, which will fairly bear only the rendering above given. Whatever this father's testimony may be worth, it is clearly for the later date.

Other writers of the early centuries do not help us much. Thus, Clement of Alexandria, in the narrative given last month, simply says that John, "after the tyrant was dead," returned from the isle of Patmos to Ephesus. Eusebius understands this without question of Domitian: but the epithet might well stand for Nero; and, in fact, the travels of the apostle of which Clement goes on to speak, "to appoint bishops, to organise churches, and to ordain to the ministry," could hardly have been undertaken by so aged a man as St. John must have been after Domitian's death, A.D. 96. Jerome also assigns the exile in Patmos to the reign of Domitian. Only a note in the Syriac Apocalypse of the sixth century states that "John was banished to Patmos by Nero Cæsar."

Thus, then, stands the external evidence. Taking this as an authority, we should be compelled to place the Apocalypse in the latest years of the apostle's life, and must explain its diversity of style from that of the Apocalypse in the best way possible. It must be confessed that the explanations hitherto proposed have not been very successful; and perhaps the latest word on the subject has not yet been spoken.

An argument in support of the later date has been drawn from the Epistles to the Seven Churches. Too short a time, it is urged, would otherwise have elapsed for the church in Ephesus to have left its first love, and for the heresies associated with the names of Nicolaus, Balaam, and "that woman Jezebel," to have crept in. The argument has some force; and yet, remembering the Epistles to the Galatians and to the Colossians, we need not be surprised at a very rapid development of false doctrine. Bishop Lightfoot, in his Commentary on Colossians, points out that the errors denounced in the Seven Letters were existing in the germ in the days of St. Paul;[1] and the stern reproofs of the Apocalypse are the almost immediate sequel.

These letters seem, in fact, on the whole to tell in favour of the earlier date. Thus the boast of being "Jews," tested and repudiated by the church in Smyrna, would rather befit the time when Jerusalem and its temple were still standing than when all that glory was in the dust: and the commendation of the Ephesian community for having rejected the claim of false apostles seems rather to belong to the time when apostles still were living, and the name could be assumed by pretenders, than to the days when all the witnesses of Christ's resurrection, save John himself, had passed away.

These various points, and others that might be raised, serve to show the difficulty of the question. The main conflict is between external and internal evidence. Readers who confine their attention to the books themselves will, we suspect, be inclined to place the Gospel and Epistles after the Apocalypse, and to assign the latter to that period of storm and tribulation in which the final catastrophe was gathering over the Jewish state, while in the Roman world the name of Nero everywhere spread horror and dismay. Those who are chiefly guided by the voice of Christian antiquity will still adhere to the view that Domitian was "the tyrant" by whom St. John was banished to Patmos. The advocates of the latter view, we observe, are apt to speak of the former as "rationalistic." No doubt it is accepted, almost universally, by the rationalistic school of expositors; but there is an array of names on the other side sufficient to show that the early date of the book of Revelation may be maintained together with an undoubting acceptance of its inspired authority, and a full recognition of its true prophetic character.

If we cannot hope, in the present state of the discussion, to settle this question satisfactorily, we may at least discern in the Apocalypse the characteristic thoughts and tones of the disciple whom Jesus loved. The outward contrasts of which we have spoken only heighten the effect of those inner harmonies which he who seeks will surely find. So signal indeed are these, that some of the acutest critics who reject the identity of authorship have been constrained to admit that the Gospel must have been written by one under the influence of the seer of Patmos!

Generally, it may be said that the deepest and most spiritual truths of the Gospel are thrown in the Apocalypse into a concrete form. In the one we have the abstract reality, in the other the living picture. If the proëm to the Gospel tells us of the WORD made flesh, the Apocalypse shows us a warrior from heaven going forth to the world's conquest: "and His name is called the WORD of God." The words which introduced

[1] With regard to this vexed question, it may suffice to remind the reader that Irenæus proposes the interpretation Lateinos, or Teitan, but without any certainty. Those who maintain the later date cannot be said to have reached any accepted conclusion as to the meaning of the symbol. Those who maintain the earlier, with practical unanimity find in the number 666 a cryptogram (in Hebrew) for Nero Cæsar.

[2] Against Heresies, b. v. ch. xxxi. § 3. See also Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., b. v. ch. 8.

[1] "The message communicated by St. John to Laodicea prolongs the note which was struck by St. Paul in the letter to Colossæ. An interval of a very few years has not materially altered the character of these churches. Obviously the same temper prevails, the same errors are rife, the same correction must be applied."—Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 41.

the two disciples of the Baptist to Jesus announced Him as the LAMB of God; and the deep thoughts which the phrase contains are translated into the glorious emblems of the vision—"the Lamb that was slain"—"the Lamb standing upon Mount Zion,"—"these are they that follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth." The great point to be here noticed is that these descriptions of our Lord are found in the Apocalypse and the Gospel, and nowhere else. So, twice over in the ministry of Christ, as recorded in the Fourth Gospel, the promise of the "living water" was given; and in this vision of the heavenly Jerusalem is beheld "a river of water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding from the throne of God and the Lamb." The invitation, "If any man thirst, let him come to Me and drink," has its perfect echo in the words, "Whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." Again, "I am the good Shepherd," in the Gospel, becomes in the vision a living picture: "the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall be their Shepherd, and shall guide them unto fountains of waters of life." Once more, the gift of the manna, as an emblem of spiritual blessing, is found alike in the Gospel and in the Revelation, and in these alone. These peculiarities reveal to us the same mind at work, apprehending the same great realities, now as abstract truths, now as concrete symbols. Some other kinds of accordance, less markedly on the surface, may be noted; as the phrase "keep my word," or "commandment," characteristic of these writings,[1] and the expressive verb to "tabernacle," also peculiar to the Gospel and the Revelation. "The Word was made flesh and tabernacled among us:" "He that sitteth on the throne shall spread His tabernacle over them.[2]" A coincidence in thought of yet another kind is in the application to the Crucified of Zechariah's prophecy: "They shall look on Him whom they pierced"[3]—the same word being employed in both quotations, differing from the Greek version of the Old Testament, and agreeing with the Hebrew.[4]

The argument based upon these and similar instances is cumulative; the accordances being at once too numerous and too peculiar to be resolved into mere coincidence. But beyond all this there is, as Canon Westcott has well shown, a deep interior unity between the theme of the Apocalypse and that of the Gospel. "The main idea of both is the same. Both present a view of a supreme conflict between the powers of good and evil. In the Gospel this is drawn mainly in moral conceptions; in the Apocalypse mainly in images and visions. In the Gospel the opposing forces are regarded under abstract and absolute forms; as Light and Darkness, Love and Hatred; in the Apocalypse under concrete and definite forms, God, Christ, and the Church warring with the Devil, the False Prophet, and the Beast. But in both books alike CHRIST is the central figure. His victory is the end to which history and vision lead as their consummation. His Person and Work are the ground of triumph, and of triumph through apparent failure. It follows that in both books the appearance of Christ is shown to issue in a judgment, a separation, of elements partially confused before. The 'hatred' of evil gains a new intensity. The Apocalypse gives, so to speak, in an ideal history, the analysis of the cause of unbelief which is laid open in John viii."[1]

It is on these lines, we are persuaded, that the true exposition of this wonderful and mysterious book is to be found. It is "an ideal history." To attempt an interpretation of details is beyond our province; we only remark that the popular schemes "præterist, progressive, futurist"—all have an element of truth; but the moment we restrict the symbols to one historical line of things our failure begins. Sufficiently humiliating, in truth, has been the issue as yet of every attempt to forecast the times and seasons of the future from the apocalyptic emblems; while the hopeless discordance of interpreters even as to the past[2] proves that their methods can help to no sure conclusions. But still it stands written for us, as it stood written for the seer's own contemporaries: "Blessed is he that readeth, and they that hear the words of this prophecy, and keep those things which are written therein; for the time is at hand."

The ceaseless contest on behalf of goodness and truth still centres round Christ, the Captain of our Salvation. The tumults and the convulsions, the mystery and sorrow of this world, prepare the way of His appearing. The four "living ones"—the great cherubic symbol—emblems of the forces by which God controls the universe—each in his turn cries, "Come!" It is a misfortune, we cannot but remark, that in the sixth chapter, which is so signally the key to what follows, we have the reading Come and see perpetuated in our version.[3] The appeal is not to the prophet, nor to any mere spectator of their wonders, but to Christ Himself. So at the end of the vision: "The Spirit and the Bride say, 'Come'"—not surely an invitation to the children of men, but to their Lord! "Come forth out of Thy royal chambers, O Prince of all the kings of the earth. Put on the visible robes of Thy imperial majesty. Take up that unlimited sceptre which Thy Almighty Father hath bequeathed Thee. For now the voice of Thy Bride calls Thee, and all creatures sigh to be renewed!"[4]

Connected with this is the downfall of the godless world-empires and systems of evil. The catastrophe is pictured in language and imagery of the Old Testament. The fall of Babylon, in the [1] John viii. 51, 52, 55; xiv. 23, 24; xv. 20; xvii. 6. Rev. iii. 8, 10; xii. 17; xiv. 12; xxii. 7, 9.

[2] John i. 14. Rev. vii. 15; see also xii. 12; xiii. 6; xxi. 3.

[3] Zech. xii. 10. John xix. 37; Rev. i. 7; ἐξεκέντησαν, a word occurring in the N. T. only in these two passages.

[4] It might be added, as a small point, that in several passages of the Gospel and the Apocalypse, and in these only, an adverb is used, meaning "in Hebrew speech": ἑβραϊστί.

[1] Speaker's Commentary, Introduction to St. John, p. lxxxiv.

[2] Archdeacon Farrar has given a curious list of these interpretations: Early Days of Christianity, ch. xxvii.

[3] Not of course in R. V. The instance is one among many of the incalculable gain which the new translation gives to the right understanding of the Apocalypse.

[4] Milton: Animadversions on the Remonstrant's Defence, § 4.

fifty-first chapter of Jeremiah, and more especially that of Tyre, in the twenty-seventh chapter of Ezekiel, supply the details. Pagan Rome is in the foreground of the vision; but every feature in the description has had manifold fulfilments, wherever secular or spiritual tyranny has oppressed the souls of men. Great Babylon falls, and the heavenly Jerusalem descends from heaven to earth. Babylon and Jerusalem are constant antitheses in Scripture; and, if the former designates the world-power, the latter as plainly stands for the spiritual city, or, in other words, for the ideal Christian church, reared as by invisible hands among men; or, in the language of the Seer, coming down from God out of heaven. The ideal yet awaits its accomplishment, in the day when the "great voice" shall be heard "out of the throne, saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men!" And yet there is an incipient fulfilment even now.

That there is a sense in which the holy city is upreared on earth is manifest from the description of the Tree of Life, whose fruits are not only for the refreshment of the saved, but for the "healing of the nations." Plainly, therefore, round about the New Jerusalem are nations that require to be healed, consequently of the sinful and the miserable. Again, "the nations shall walk in the light of it, and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honour into it." There is the moral and spiritual influence of the church of Christ, gathering to itself the homage and tribute of the world. It may be noted again that some misunderstanding copyist has explained "the nations" in this verse by adding the words of the saved, thereby making the prophet say exactly the contrary of what he intended. Those "who are saved" constitute the City, and "the nations" at large are sharers of the benefits which radiate from the true Church of Christ.

We may not, then, wholly restrict the vision to the future blessedness. "Ye are come unto mount Zion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem." This we believe, and yet with the seer we cry even from the midst of the spiritual city in which we have already found a home: "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!"

Only Begun.

"The former treatise have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and teach, until the day in which He was taken up."—Acts i. 1, 2.

O CHRIST, for three-and-thirty years
Thy blessèd feet our earth did tread,
Thine eyes did weep our human tears,
Thy frame did live by mortal bread,
Thy lips the word of life did speak,
Thy hands did heal the sick and weak.

But when, above the wooded height,
With gentle hands in blessing raised,
A cloud received Thee from the sight
Of friends in lingering awe that gazed,
Was all Thy work of mercy o'er,
And couldst Thou save and bless no more?

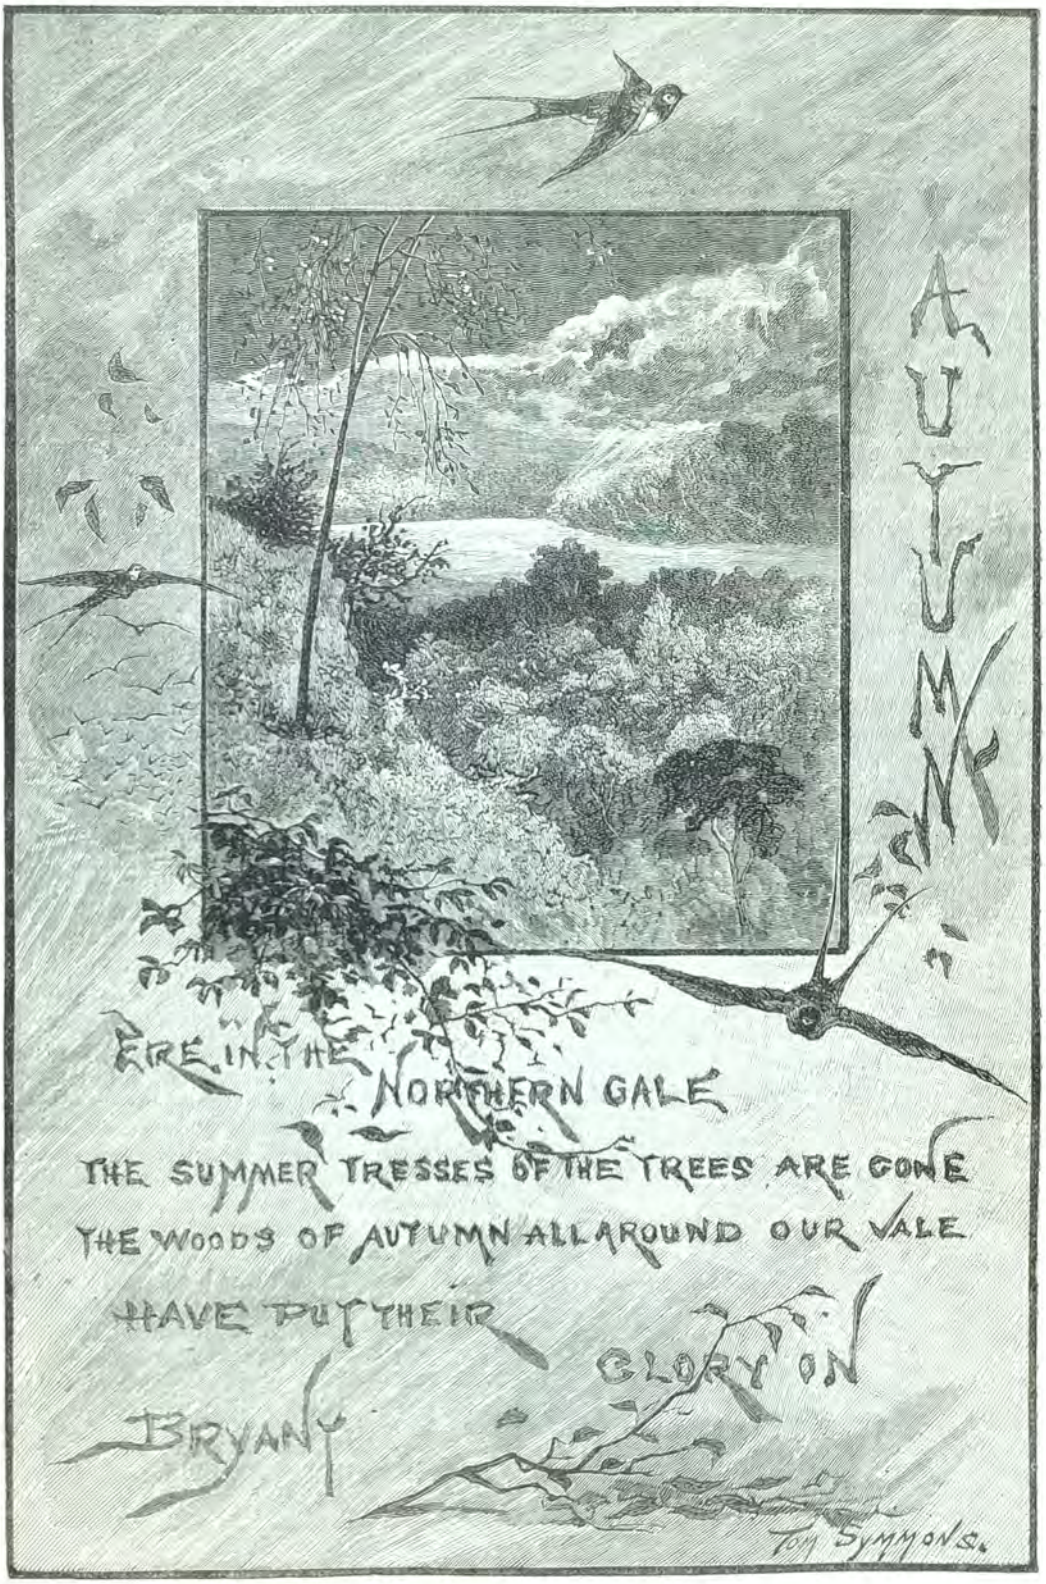
Ah, no! that brief and blessèd space
Did but behold Thy work begin;
Still from Thy high and thronèd place
Thou lookest on our world of sin—
Nay, dost not gaze from far away,
But minglest with us day by day.

While still by Thee our streets were trod,
One wasted frame Thy touch could cure;
One group on beach or grassy sod
Could hear Thee bless the meek and pure;
Now art Thou nigh in truth and deed
In every place to every need.

Thy presence make us alway feel;
Let every spirit prove Thee near
To teach and guide, to bless and heal—
A tender Heart, a willing Ear,
A mighty Hand, till all be done,
Still urging on Thy work begun.

Victorious Saviour, throned sublime,
All hearts and every thought control!
Lead Thou the ordered march of time,
And guide creation to the goal;
Wrought out at last the purpose schemed,
Reign o'er the world Thou hast redeemed.

FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE.



AUTUMN
ERE IN THE NORTHERN GALE
THE SUMMER TRESSES OF THE TREES ARE GONE
THE WOODS OF AUTUMN ALL AROUND OUR VALE HAVE PUT THEIR GLORY ON BRYANT
TOM SYMMONS.

HOSPITAL NURSES

IN LONDON AND ON THE CONTINENT.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER IV.—MUNICH.

"It would be hard to find stronger evidence that the times we live in are better than the times past than that young ladies of good social position, influenced by the high motives of religion and charity, give themselves to the work of nursing the sick poor."—Sir James Paget.

MANY English people in their travels have become acquainted with Munich, its inhabitants, its galleries, its beautiful buildings, its charming gardens and surroundings, and yet the under-current of earnest work going on from day to day which gives life and character to the Bavarian capital may have escaped their notice.

Not the least important part of this unobtrusive methodical work is the education and training of nurses for the sick—the preparing and holding in readiness of every necessary article required by them in the performance of their duties, and the employment of poor, industrious women and girl-seamstresses at remunerative prices, not to speak of the nursing in the hospitals.

One remarkable and pleasing feature of this work is that it is not done by one class alone, but by the union of sovereign and subjects of every degree.

Even all question of creed is merged in the desire of obtaining skilled aid and comfort for the sick and wounded, whether in hospital, home, or battle-field.

This state of things has obtained only during the last few years, and probably nothing but the overpowering sense of external dangers could have brought it about, welding together opposing forces and breaking down all social barriers.

It is not easy for strangers to get an intimate knowledge of the practical work going on beneath the surface, and hence it is that when a crisis comes we are astonished at the preparedness and readiness of the Germans, which looks as though they had been waiting and watching for the event; and this is in fact so, and is the reason why in an emergency they do not lose their heads.

There are many centres of work here in Munich, all under the same regulations and striving for the same object, viz., the possession of a scientific and well-trained band of nurses, who, at a few hours' notice, may without hurry or bustle be ready to take up their duties under medical authority in any part of the kingdom.

To give effect to this aim, there is in Munich a depôt which supplies every possible requisite for the nurses and their patients.

One advantage of the class of nurses which have superseded the old here, as in our country, is the wonderful influence they exercise over their patients — they are at once teachers, servants, comforters.

In going over the various institutions in Munich, I have been reminded often of Florence Nightingale's words, "That a nurse must be of higher stamp than will suffice for most other kinds of work, and that, wherever she enters, order and cleanliness must step in with her."

Just as we observed the Albertinerins in Saxony devoting their lives to nursing, so here we see the Red Cross sisters and the deaconesses in active work.

The Order of the Red Cross was first started in Weimar, and it has never lacked the fostering care of the Empresses Augusta and Victoria, the Queen Mother of Bavaria, and the Grand Duchess of Baden. They one and all cherished it as a means of occupation to refined, loving-hearted women, whose talents for comforting and tending the sick had often lain waste for lack of knowing how and where to use them. They fostered and cherished it as a preventive to that lavish waste of human life which followed every battle and every outbreak of epidemic. It may be said with truth that the Red Cross Order has nobly carried out what was expected of it. The number of unions working under its banner is over 800, while its members amount to 75,000. In Bavaria alone there are over 20,000 members.

Formerly, deaconesses, as nurses, were only to be found in purely Protestant countries, but in 1830 Pastor Fliedner first employed them in nursing; and now many thousand deaconesses are actively engaged in public and private sick nursing. Here, in Munich, they pursue their important calling with much self-sacrifice and love, more however in the homes and prisons than in the hospitals. In time of war they would nurse the soldiers, but would be paid by the Red Cross Order for their services. Their dress is black with white inside the bonnet. The deaconesses come to Munich fully trained, their school of learning being at Neuzettelsauf.

In Munich, as in Dresden, every servant is bound to contribute two shillings and sixpence a year towards the support of the general hospital, the advantage being free admission in time of sickness.

This General, or City Hospital, is situated outside, but quite close to one of the city gates. It is a fine large building, and the average number of occupied beds is 700.

It is divided into two parts; one for men, the other for women.

When patients are brought in, they are asked their name, rank, address, religion; and whether they would like to see a pastor of their own particular creed.

The wards are differently arranged to ours—they are in groups of three, all connected with each other, with a tiny scullery between. Each contains twelve beds, six on each side, and over each bed a blackboard, with the patient's name written on it.

The windows are large, admitting plenty of fresh air and light into the wards, which are warm and dry.

Two sisters and two probationers have charge of each group of three wards.

The doctors come round twice a day, visiting every patient with the students, as with us.

There are fifty wards and twenty private rooms, which, are, of course, paid for extra, and six isolated rooms for very serious or infectious diseases.

The private rooms are divided into first and second class; for the first the patient pays six shillings a week, for the second three shillings and tenpence.

A description of one of the rooms will do for all. It is a bright, sunny room, containing a bed, sofa, easy-chair, table, chest of drawers, wash-stand, two ordinary chairs, and four bright pictures on the walls. It had a quiet, comfortable air about it, and from the window we could see the home where the sisters live, and which is joined to the hospital by a covered passage.

The second-class rooms have not quite so much furniture, otherwise they are the same as the first.

The theatre, as the operating-room is called, is small but light, with a movable table in the centre, on which the patient is placed, and its walls and ceiling are painted white.

The medical and surgical wards are alike, except that in the latter there is a long pole fixed over each bed, from the foot to the head, with a ring hanging from the centre, by which the patient can drag himself up.

The housework is very heavy in this hospital. The sisters and probationers scrub out and clean thoroughly all the wards and private rooms; but servants clean the corridors and stairs, of which there are a great many.

Passing from the wards, we went through stone passages and down polished staircases, where not a speck of dust was seen; and were shown with pride the lift, worked by steam, which is long enough and wide enough to admit of a patient being laid in bed, and thus carried up and downstairs.

The kitchen is large, light, and clean. The huge coppers were full of soup, coffee and milk puddings and looked appetising. 500 lbs. of meat daily is the average amount cooked. The bills are paid every month. The kitchen is managed by six sisters and four girls.

One thing pleased me greatly, which was to see a large room given up to a sister and two or three probationers for the purpose of mending the patients' own clothes. These, after being washed and mended, are done up in clean, tidy parcels, ready for the patients' use on leaving the hospital.

Before leaving, we saw the steward, who could tell us little or nothing about the detail of carrying on the hospital; and, to our great astonishment, we learned that no annual report was issued, and no balance-sheet required.

There were portraits hanging in his room of all the doctors who had worked in the hospital during the century; and a telephone; but no reports.

The night watching and nursing is taken by the sisters two and two, so many hours at a time.

Our next visit was to the Children's Hospital, which has been in existence sixty years, and is nursed by the same body of sisters as the City Hospital.

It is pleasantly situate, with a garden back and front, and not over-crowded. There are eight beds in a ward, and nine wards managed and nursed by eight sisters and eight maids, a man to look after the machinery, and an odd man for gardening and rough work.

The children, of whom there were fifty, were prettily dressed in white woollen jackets, with little red frills round throat and wrists, made and presented to the hospital by a lady.

In each of the wards were tiny tables, and benches suitable for children; and there was no lack of amusement for those who were well enough to be amused.

Patients are taken in here of every class and creed, and with every kind of disease, and therefore it seemed to me somewhat dangerous that there should be but one entrance for all comers.

The lady superintendent who showed us over the hospital was a kind, courteous woman, exactly the person to have the care of the little ones.

We were pleasantly impressed with all we saw. Everything was clean; there was plenty of light and fresh air, and no cutting draught. The cots for the babies were very dainty and pretty. The absence of flowers struck us—it is rarely that one catches sight of any in a German hospital. It seems a pity not to have them in a land where they are so abundant and so cheap.

Our attention was next given to the Red Cross Administrative Depôt, and as we went through we wished we could transplant it to our own land, so useful and admirable in all its detail did we consider it.

I asked how the ladies got means to produce such stores; and learned that they obtained for this depôt part of the indemnity paid by France after the war, amounting to 8,600*l.*, and that it is supported by voluntary contributions of two shillings up to twenty-five.

There is a division of labour, some ladies undertaking the cutting out, and preparing the work for the poor needle-women; others keep the books and accounts; others distribute the articles set aside for hospitals, while others arrange and keep the stores for the nurses in time of war.

This last store-room had six large presses in it reaching up to the ceiling. One was full of towels tied up in bundles of hundreds; another contained socks, bundles of mending materials, and coloured flannel jackets; another was full of soft old linen sent from the palace; another of shirts and handkerchiefs. Tied up in parcels by themselves were the operation shirts, which have no sleeves or fastenings, so that they can be slipped off in a minute. In another press were seven hundred sheets, beautifully made and very soft. The old lint bandages are no longer used, but of the red and white Pembridge bandages there was a large stock.

We saw also the bolsters stuffed with horse-hair, which are provided in large numbers, and which seem to be excessively comfortable.

Within fourteen days after the declaration of war all these things, together with nurses, could be on the scene of action. These articles would be taken out of the presses and packed in the waggons.

There are branches of this Administrative Depôt in most of the principal towns of Germany, and their help and work are given to all German soldiers indiscriminately, and not to those of Bavaria only.

Red Cross sisters are bound by their order to nurse on the battle-fields, but if deaconesses are sent under the Red Cross sisters they are paid.

All the sisters must have worked at least six months in the hospitals before they are qualified to tend the wounded.

A good rule is that every nurse must have four or five hours of undisturbed sleep.

In looking over the directions given to the nurses I see how they are exhorted not to let anything not absolutely clean touch a wound; the directions about the bandages and lint are also most minute.

When I compare this state of things, so scientific, so orderly, so refined—all set in motion for the preservation of life, with the neglect, the want of nurses and of every requisite for the alleviation of suffering on the battle-fields of 1866, which I saw with my own eyes, I can but join in the general thanksgiving to Him who put the desire into the hearts of good women to come forward, with their intellect, their hearts, their very lives, to minister unto His sick and poor.

JOTTINGS FROM THE SOUTH PACIFIC.

RESPECT TO THE AGED.

THE Hervey Islanders, even in their heathen state, were remarkable for the veneration they paid to the aged. If the fathers of the tribes speak, the younger men obey implicitly. I shall never forget a meeting of the king and chiefs held many years ago, on the island of Mangaia. The aged king and the equally aged chiefs had given their opinion on a matter of grave importance at the time. As the four younger chiefs remained silent, I begged an expression of opinion from them. The senior (about sixty years of age and a grandfather) looked up into my face and said—"Gilirua! why do you ask for our opinion? We are only children. Our fathers have spoken; that is sufficient!" There was never a smile on the faces of the three very aged men as with one voice they said to me, "Yes; that is true." Now, as a matter of fact, six of these chiefs were equal in rank; but, on account of seniority (being uncles) and age, were spokesmen for their respective clans. Upon the decease of these very aged men the turn of the younger ones would come.

So in families; the eldest, as a matter of birthright, rules his brothers. To the native mind how right and good appear those beautiful pictures of the special honour paid to age found in the book of Job and elsewhere in the ancient Jewish Scriptures. Even our modern "advanced civilisation" might learn a lesson from the brown Polynesian.

TRUE AND FALSE RELIGION.—"One man (said Keta) plants by the wayside; another in a cleared spot in the forest known only to himself and family. The former plantation is the talk of all; the latter is unnoticed. Stray cattle and hogs are apt to make havoc in the roadside plantation, and passers-by (as by custom allowed) help themselves to the ripe bunches of bananas, &c. Now the owner of the forest plantation has no anxiety and is sure to reap the reward of his toil."

"This is just the difference between the religion of the Pharisee and that of the publican. The one is to attract the eye only; the other is hidden in the heart, but is well known to God. The Pharisee has his reward in the praise of men; the publican, life eternal."

THE GOSPEL NET.—It is customary to wall off portions of the lagoon, leaving only a narrow passage for the capture of the fish brought in by the tide. When the tide ebbs, strong nets are placed at this opening to catch the retreating fish. These valuable fish-preserves are the property of the high chiefs. In allusion to this, Maretu said,—

"The lagoon-enclosure represents the church, the property of the High Chief Jesus; the ocean fish, the unconverted. Let the servants of Christ be constantly on the watch to spread the Gospel net to catch them, lest they return to their evil ways."

W. WYATT GILL, B.A.

WILLIE WILLS' WINGS.

CHAPTER III.

HE superintendent's face brightened as he saw them come in. He took them all to a pleasant corner of the room and gave them hymn-books. Willie felt a little shy and awkward—for one thing, he was more conscious than ever that his clothes were ragged—but when the singing began he was quite at his ease. How strange that they should have chosen the "Shepherd Hymn":

"Jesus, tender Shepherd, hear me," and the tune, although a new one to Willie, was so pretty that he quickly caught it. Miss Simmonds watched his bright face, and could not help contrasting it with the pitiful one she had noticed when she found Willie leaning against the lamp-post, and she was more glad than ever that she had offered herself as a Sunday-school teacher that day. During the hour which followed, Miss Simmonds, while teaching the three boys, felt every moment to get more interested in Willie. Willie listened so earnestly, that that had a great deal to do with it, while the other two boys glanced about them, and only seemed to give half their attention to Miss Simmonds. Willie's cheeks grew quite rosy with animation as Rose told a story about a little cripple boy who was very sad, very lonely, until he came to love his Bible and could look upon the Lord Jesus Christ as his Friend.

"Please, miss, did he go to be an angel up in heaven?" asked Willie, breathless and eager to learn the end of Johnny's story.

"No," said Miss Simmonds, smiling; "no, Willie, but he stayed on earth to be an angel here! He still lives, and at home he tells every one by his own true and beautiful life what a Friend the Lord Jesus Christ can be to every one who seeks Him!"

Willie looked mystified, but asked no more questions then. It was quite a new idea to him "to stay on earth and be an angel here." He thought all good people, whether grown up or boys and girls, went off to heaven very quickly; and dimly in his own heart in very dark, very desolate days, he had longed for the time to come when "somehow" (he never quite made up his mind how it was to come to pass) he could die and go to heaven—the heaven which was never separated in his mind from the Sunday-school and the hymn-singing of some years ago.

Miss Simmonds kept Willie back when, at the close of school, the others went away promising to return next Sunday.

"I want to give you my name and address, as I promised," said Rose, and she asked Willie if he could read writing.

"Yes, miss," replied Willie, quickly, "I can read and write first class for my age. Sometimes—but that was a bit ago now—father sent me to a night school and I learnt a deal."

"How old are you?" inquired Miss Simmonds.

"Twelve, come autumn, miss," said Willie, who was well made and fairly round of limb, but small for his age.

"And have you enjoyed our lesson to-day?" asked Rose, loth to let Willie go before she had learnt a little more of his history.

"Yes, miss. I've learnt about Daniel before," said Willie, thoughtfully; "but, please, I would like to know about that cripple boy-angel that still lives on earth. Does he have real wings of his own?"

Miss Simmonds laughed.

"I think he has, Willie," she said, "only everybody cannot see them. I think he has wings which help him to fly higher in thought, and word, and life than people can who are not angels. I know he never tells a lie; and I expect he is tempted just as much as other boys, but I think his wings keep him up nearer to the Lord Jesus, and that makes him very brave for the truth. Then he never gets into bad tempers; just as they are coming, his wings, I think, help him to rise above the temptation. Would you not like to be a boy-angel too, Willie?"

Willie looked shy. He was thinking how often he was untruthful, how frequently he gave way to naughty tempers.

At length he looked up steadily into Miss Simmonds' face and said deliberately—

"Yes, miss, I wish I could be like him; but I guess it isn't possible with such a home as I've got!"

"Do not say that, Willie," replied Miss Simmonds, quickly. "Everything is possible with the Lord Jesus Christ. He can keep as well as save us! Do you know what it really means to be—what we sing about in the hymn—His little lamb? The Good Shepherd will not let His lambs who trust in Him be hurt. He will lift them right up in His arms and carry them in His bosom."

"I'd like to be His lamb," said Willie softly. "He would take care of me then, and I guess He knows I would like to be good and do right, if only I had some one to help me. I know I'm very wicked, but I don't like being wicked!"

The plaintive, sweet look on Willie's face as he said this, touched Rose Simmonds deeply. She yearned more than ever to be a help to Willie. She saw the superintendent standing a little distance off, evidently waiting to speak to her when she had finished her talk with Willie. Rose went to him, and asked him to come and say a word to her new scholar. This Mr. Sartus was only too pleased to do.

CHAPTER IV.

WILLIE was in his place in Rose Simmonds' class for three Sundays, much to his own delight and his teacher's, the reason being that his father was ill, and the van could not proceed without him. But for his Sundays, this would have been a very very hard time to Willie. Ever since that first Sunday, the boy had resolutely determined not to tell the untruths his parents tried to force him to utter in regard to the things he was selling from door to door. One day Willie had been offering some combs for sale at a country house on the outskirts of the town. One of the servants said she could take one of a better kind if Willie happened to have one in the van (which stood at a little distance). Willie at once ran back with the news.

"Mother, I've got a customer for a comb, only she wants an eighteenpenny one instead of a sixpenny one."

"Give me those you've got in your hand, lad," Mrs. Wills said in business-like tones; and, choosing one from the packet, she neatly wrapped it up in pink tissue paper, and said; "There, take that to the young woman, and tell her she's lucky to get it, as it's the last your mother's got in stock. Mind you get two shillings for it!"

"But, mother, it's the same I asked sixpence for just now," said Willie in hesitating tones. (He was accustomed to other "tricks of the trade," as his father would call them, but not to this one.)

"Go along, and mind your own business," said his mother quickly; "or come inside for a flogging."

Willie did not seem disposed for either. He stood on the step of the van in deep thought.

"Be off quick with you, Willie," said his mother. "What are you waiting for?"

"Mother, I can't—tell—a lie," said Willie, bursting into tears.

It was the first time in his life that he had utterly refused to do his mother's bidding, although often and often he had hated the part he had had to take in having to say things which were not true, and had long ago been teased by his brothers and sisters for being "a little saint."

"You dare to defy your mother?" said Mrs. Wills, bringing her wrathful hand down on little Willie's shoulder with a blow which gathered its force from the weight of her own fury. Willie did not move to avoid the blow, but, as it came, he staggered to the ground, and, burying his face in his hands, cried silently to himself. He thought of the boy-angel Miss Simmonds had told them about, whose invisible wings helped him to fly away from temptation and to get nearer to his Saviour; and Willie prayed in his heart, "Good Shepherd, keep me from telling untruths. Mother can beat me, but she can't force my tongue to speak what it won't say."

And, somehow, there came into Willie's heart such sweet contentment—a feeling so restful and glad that, although his face looked pale and tearful all the morning afterwards, it wore a calm, strong look of one who was not to be turned from a secret determination—at least, Mrs. Wills felt this. She herself had delivered the comb, telling her own tale, and getting the money asked; but she made up her mind that she must "get the upper hand of Willie," and let him understand once for all that he was to do as he was told on all occasions, that "her word was law, and he must abide by it!"

Hence each day had brought its orders, which Willie refused to obey. Very often he was whipped for this, when, after a long round through the villages, they at length came home; but never once did Willie knowingly tell a lie.

Rose Simmonds noticed the last Sunday Willie was in the class that he looked very pale and languid. She spoke to him as he was leaving.

"Are you feeling quite well to-day, Willie?"

"Yes, miss, thank you," answered the boy; "only I've a bruise on my back which hurts a bit." And Willie winced.

Miss Simmonds looked sad. She felt sure Willie had a very suffering life at home. She had gathered from him that he sometimes was flogged when his mother got angry, and on the second Sunday when Rose asked her three scholars if they would join the All Saints' Band of Hope, Willie had said that he belonged to one in the village where they used to live, and that mother was a teetotaler then. A sudden pause and flushed cheek told Rose Simmonds—she being quick to read—that mother was not a teetotaler to-day. This made her urge upon Willie the desirability of never, never having anything to do with "strong drink."

To-day, as Willie spoke of his bruise, Rose Simmonds said—

"Have you had a fall, Willie, or—have you been beaten for anything?"

"I don't mind the beatings, miss," said Willie tearfully "Perhaps, some day, my wings will grow like the cripple-boy's, and I shall fly up and up, and up, so near to the Lord Jesus, that He will give me a message to bring down to mother about its being wicked to deceive people. It does hurt so, to think how I used to do it, too, until I came here!"

Then Willie told briefly the cause of the special bruises. He had refused to tell a lady at, whose door he was selling his brushes, that "poor father was dead."

"I think your wings are growing very quickly, Willie," said Rose tenderly.

As she looked into that little fellow's face, she thought of the inward longings and struggles of the heart beating beneath these ragged garments. Willie's hands and face were perfectly clean, and his hair as smooth as its curls would permit; but his clothes were as ragged as the first day Rose saw him. Willie had asked his mother to "tidy them up a bit," but, as she never put any questions to him about his reason for wishing to be neat, he had not felt it necessary to tell her of his coming to the Sunday-school. He was so afraid she might forbid it, and Willie was more than half convinced in his own mind that, if his mother told him not to come, it would be almost like being untruthful did he attempt to do so after being forbidden. Hence he had not dared to press his claim to mended garments lest it might lead to questioning; and his mother had taken no notice of his request.

"Is your father better, Willie?" inquired Rose as they left the school together.

"Yes, miss; he has been out a bit to-day," answered Willie, looking wistful. "I'm afraid it means going on this week. Our next stop is Birmingham, and that's a big place, you know."

"No place is too big to have the Lord Jesus very near to us, Willie," said Rose, as at that moment a friend came up, and she had to wish Willie good-bye. "If you go before next Sunday," she called out after him, "come and let me know."

"Yes, miss, thank you," said Willie; "if there's time, I'm sure I will."

And Willie meant to do so; but he did not know that within twenty-four hours from then the van would be some miles out of the town on its way to Birmingham.

SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. VII.

1. This verse contains the names of three cities, a garden a fertile country, a river and a plain.
2. Our Lord dwelt in one of the places mentioned.
3. Angels visited another.
4. Some pots and shovels were made in the plain.
5. Bela is another name for one of the cities.
6. Some young men felled trees on the banks of the river
7. The verse refers to past and present blessing, and to future judgment.
8. Only one man is mentioned in it.
9. The same action is ascribed to him in the verse that is related of his cousin, and his cousin's bride.
10. He was rich and lived with another rich man.
11. He had an uncle and great-grandfather of the same name.
12. He was attracted to his home by water, and driven away by fire.
13. The verse contains forty-three words, eight being proper names.

L. T.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE important conferences of the summer are now being supplemented by the usual autumnal gatherings. Meanwhile, many matters of grave moment have been brought under general review by the Encyclical Letter of the Lambeth Conference. The formal resolutions of the Conference, and the reports of the several committees, have also since been published. These have all more than a passing interest: they not only embody opinions, they will more or less influence action, and they raise questions which will be debated for some time to come.

Temperance, purity, the sanctity of marriage, the treatment of polygamy as found in the mission-field, the observance of the Lord's Day, threatened by the growing laxity, Socialism, the case of emigrants, the definite teaching of the Faith—are all subjects briefly touched. The authoritative standards of the Church, and its relation to various other bodies—to the Scandinavian Church, and Old Catholics, and to the Eastern Churches, and others—come also under consideration. Many of the suggestions made must approve themselves to Christians the world round; some deal with debated points, on which agreement is not to be expected. We can quote but a few words.

In regard to Sunday: "We call upon the leisurely classes not selfishly to withdraw from others the opportunities of rest and of religion. We call upon master and employer jealously to guard the privileges of the servant and the workman. In 'the Lord's Day' we have a priceless heritage. Whoever misuses it incurs a terrible responsibility."

In relation to Socialism: "To study schemes proposed for redressing the social balance, to welcome the good which may be found in the aims or operations of any, and to devise methods, whether by legislation or by social combinations, or in any other way, for a peaceful solution of the problems without violence or injustice, is one of the noblest pursuits which can engage the thoughts of those who strive to follow in the footsteps of Christ."

In connection with the need of more definite teaching: "The doubts which arise from the misapprehension of the due relations between science and revelation may be, and ought to be, treated with respect and a sympathetic patience; and, where minds have been disquieted by scientific discovery or assertion, great care should be taken not to extinguish the elements of faith, but rather to direct the thinker to the realization of the fact that such discoveries elucidate the action of laws which, rightly conceived, tend to the higher appreciation of the glorious work of the Creator, upheld by the word of His power. The dangers arising from the hostile or sceptical temper and attitude are increased by the difficulty of determining how far our teaching and the popular acceptance of it can be harmonized with a due consideration for the views on inspiration, and especially on the character of the discipline of the Old Testament dispensation, which, although they have never received definite sanction in the Church, have been long and widely prevalent. We must recommend to the clergy cautious and industrious treatment of these points of controversy, and most earnestly press upon them the importance of taking, as the central thought of their teaching, our Lord Jesus Christ, as the sacrifice for our sins, as the healer of our sinfulness, the source of all our spiritual life, and the revelation to our consciences of the law and motive of all moral virtue."

The following passage on "the attitude of the Anglican Communion towards the religious bodies now separated from it by unhappy divisions," has scarcely less general interest: "We gladly and thankfully recognize the real religious work which is carried on by Christian bodies not of our Communion. We cannot close our eyes to the visible blessing which has been vouchsafed to their labours for Christ's sake. Let us not be misunderstood on this point. We are not insensible to the strong ties, the rooted convictions, which attach them to their present position. These we respect, as we wish that on our side our own principles and feelings may be respected. Competent observers, indeed, assert that not in England only, but in all parts of the Christian world, there is a real yearning for unity—that men's hearts are moved more than heretofore towards Christian fellowship. The Conference has shown in its discussions as well as its resolutions that it is deeply penetrated with this feeling. May the spirit of love move on the troubled waters of religious differences."

The whole subject of reunion from the Anglican point of view is discussed with much minuteness in the report of the committee. Several of the resolutions formally adopted by the Conference, also deal with it. Of these, the following has perhaps the widest scope, and comes nearest to practical measures:

"That this Conference earnestly requests the constituted authorities of the various branches of our Communion, acting, so far as may be, in concert with one another, to make it known that they hold themselves in readiness to enter into brotherly conference (such as that which has already been proposed by the Church in the United States of America), with the representatives of other Christian communions in the English-speaking races, in order to consider what steps can be taken either towards corporate reunion, or towards such relations as may prepare the way for fuller organic union hereafter."

The Encyclical Letter begins with a reference to the "We,—archbishops, bishops metropolitan, and other bishops of the Holy Catholic Church, in full communion with the Church of England, one hundred and forty-five in number." Bishop Ryle, of Liverpool, however, owing to diocesan engagements, was not present when the draft of the Letter was adopted, and has since published a letter protesting against its silence on the "unhappy divisions about the doctrine and ritual of the Lord's Supper which are at this moment convulsing the Church of England." This he characterises as a glaring defect.

THE Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have decided that the Archbishop of Canterbury has jurisdiction to entertain complaints of ecclesiastical offences made against bishops. They express no opinion as to whether the Archbishop had or had not a discretion whether he would issue the citation in the case of the Bishop of Lincoln which has been brought before him, but they "humbly advise her Majesty to remit the case to him to be dealt with according to law." The Privy Councillors forming the Court were the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hobhouse, Lord Herschell, Lord Macnaghten, and Sir Barnes Peacock. The Bishop of London, the Bishop of Ely, the Bishop of Salisbury, the Bishop of Manchester, and the Bishop of Sodor and Man were present as ecclesiastical assessors. The charges preferred against Bishop King include the use of lighted candles on the Communion Table when not needed for light, the ceremonial mixing and administering of water with the wine at the Holy Communion, the eastward position, the singing of the Agnus Dei after consecration of the elements, the ceremonial cleansing of the paten and chalice, and other offences of a similar kind. All such acts have been declared illegal in the case of ordinary clergymen.

THE state of the Christian communities in Turkish Armenia appears to be pitiable in the extreme. According to the correspondent of the Standard, the Pope has proposed to intervene, and, by inviting their allegiance, to secure standing-ground for their protection; but the Protestant sympathies of the people are too strong to admit of any general movement in this direction. The Rev. R. Chambers, writing to the Turkish Missions Aid Society, states that "hundreds are crowded into the prisons of Erzeroum, Erzingan, Diarbekir, Harpoot, and Van." "The most jealously watched prisoners are school-teachers and priests. These are suspected of attempts to arouse the national spirit of the Armenians. The country is full of spies. The Sultan has hastened to decorate some of those who have been most prominent in effecting these pitiless and senseless arrests. There are two Protestant political prisoners in Erzeroum. One is a lad of about seventeen years of age, who composed a song expressing sentiments unpalatable to the rulers of the country. The other is a school-teacher, who corrected certain grammatical faults in the song. These two are closely confined, and are allowed no communication with friends nor with their fellow-prisoners. Even the pastor and the missionary are refused admittance. The gates of Erzeroum are guarded by police, and Christians going out and coming in are searched for books or papers, and imprisoned until any found can be translated and examined." The time seems come for some helpful expression of sympathy, if not for joint remonstrance from the Protestant powers.

At the annual meeting of the Spanish and Portuguese Church Aid Society, in Exeter Hall, sympathetic reference was made to the case of Señor Vila, the brave and faithful pastor at Malaga, who has been sentenced to two years' imprisonment in a Spanish dungeon, because he was courageous enough to protest against the degrading form of image worship which prevails so largely throughout Spain. He was not the aggressor, having merely made a reply to a violent attack upon the Reformed Church by a Roman priest.

The popular edition of the Bible, issued in halfpenny numbers from the office of the Secolo newspaper, in Milan, has proved so great a success, that an arrangement has been made for a Spanish edition of the Bible to be published at Barcelona, in similar form. Thus the Scriptures are being brought under the notice of the people, free from the ban of ecclesiastical prejudice.

By instruction of Lord Salisbury, the consul-general at Zanzibar has moved the Sultan to exercise his power in the case of the three (so-called Arab) slave-traders who attacked the African Lakes Company's agents at the north of Lake Nyasa. The property of the criminals at Kilwa has been sequestrated until they return and explain their conduct. The Sultan has sent a special mission to the spot to check the slave-traders. Meanwhile, news of another and more serious attack reaches us as we write. Dr. Laws, of the Livingstonia mission, referring to serious troubles caused by the slave-traders, in a letter of earlier date, says:—"My last told you of the wound Mr. F. Moir had received at the north end, and of the state of matters there. We have no further accounts from the north, but the Charles Jansen has brought us the news of the seizure of Acting-Consul Buchanan and Mr. Johnson by Makanjira, and the murder of one of Mr. Buchanan's men, the seizure and retention of the Charles Jansen's boat, and the holding of both Mr. Johnson and Mr. Buchanan till they were ransomed by those on the steamer."

Missionary work in New Guinea continues to extend and prosper. The Rev. James Chalmers has been revisiting some of his old cannibal acquaintance. In a note relating to the village of Vagavaga, he says: "There is a change seen even in the appearance of all the natives. They were a wild cannibal lot a few years ago. One of the natives who came off spoke a little English. Pearse asked him if they eat man, and was answered; 'No. No eat man now, all fellow missionary now.' In the evening, at seven, a bell rang, and soon hymn singing was heard; they were having evening prayers. You cannot realise it—savages, cannibals, murderers—now seeking to worship God. It was strangely pleasing to hear an old hymn tune in such a place." And so again, at Navaopou a New Guinean, preaching, said: "The time has come for us to be up and doing. Foreigners have brought us the Gospel, many have died of fever, several have been speared and tomahawked; now let us carry the Gospel to other districts, and if we die 'tis well, for we die in Christ; if we are murdered 'tis well—'tis in carrying His name and love, and 'twill be for Him. Motu, let us do it!" "He knows," adds Mr. Chalmers, "only a little, so very little; yet he loves, and he is willing to endure for Christ. I saved that lad a few years ago from being attacked, perhaps murdered, by his own people."

Miss Whately's work in Cairo has long been familiar to our readers. It is proposed to build two new wings to the English-Egyptian Mission School at Cairo, one of which will afford more room for the girls' school and the other for the boys, this step being necessary owing to the lack of accommodation. Five hundred pounds are wanted, of which only a part is yet collected. The scholars number between 600 and 700, and consist partly of Coptic and partly of Mohammedan children, the latter being the most numerous. The pupils are all instructed in the Holy Scripture as well as in the branches of a good secular education. Many have shown in after-life the fruits of the teaching here received.

At the Keswick Convention this year as last the claims of the mission field had full attention. There was a short missionary prayer-meeting every morning at nine. "On the Wednesday,"—we read in the "Church Missionary Intelligencer"—"the seven o'clock meeting itself, which was attended by a thousand people, was one of prayer for Missions. On Wednesday afternoon a great meeting took place in the large tent, some two thousand persons being present, and on Saturday forenoon there was a similar one. Subsequently open-air meetings were held on two or three evenings on the banks of Derwent Water. The greatest interest was manifested throughout. There was much earnest prayer, and many persons, clergymen, laymen, and ladies, inquired about the openings for personal service in the field. At the Saturday meeting there was a remarkable burst of enthusiasm as to giving. A young man sent to the platform, anonymously, a 10*l.* note, his savings for a year, which he had intended putting in the savings-bank, but which, he wrote, 'he felt the Lord wanted'; and this being announced, within a few minutes cash and promises were sent up, which, with some subsequent additions, amounted to over 900*l.*"

The Salvation Army is sending out another detachment of fifty officers, male and female, to India. At the farewell meeting in Exeter Hall, General Booth said he was very much surprised that the recent International Convention on Missions, and other great assemblies that had met, had so feebly stirred the heart of Christendom, if they had stirred it at all. So far as he could see, there had been very little increase of effort even proposed, much less undertaken. "If the poor Salvation Army can send out fifty missionaries at a batch, the rich religious corporations, numbering two, three, or four hundred thousand members, ought to send out their hundreds and their five hundreds." There are now seventy corps and "outposts" in India, and 230 officers exclusive of these last just sent out. At the same meeting it was stated that six hundred souls had "professed salvation during the last quarter, 450 of whom were heathen."

The Young Men's Christian Associations met in general conference this year at Stockholm. Nearly a thousand delegates were present from different lands. The Swedish welcome was hearty in the extreme. The introductory sermon was preached by the Rev. Professor Rudin, of the University of Upsala. The opening address was given by the Bishop of Visby. The discussions dealt with practical questions affecting the Christian life, and were shared by the members of various nationalities. That on the means to be employed for spiritual development in the conversion of young men generally, was opened by Count Bernstorff, of Berlin, and Mr. Daamen, of Amsterdam. The statistical report presented by the International Committee shows that there are to-day in Great Britain and Ireland 605 associations, and a membership of 51,518; Canada and the United States, 1,240, and 152,721; in France, 93, and 850; in Germany, 673, and 35,752; and in other countries a goodly number.

The mission cause in Burmah lately sustained a severe loss in the sudden death of the Rev. James Alfred Colbeck, S. P. G. missionary in Mandalay. For fourteen years had Mr. Colbeck been working in Burmah, and not only had he become a thorough master of Burmese, but also had won greatly upon the Burmans, by his life of almost apostolic simplicity, self-denial, and hard-working devotion. On the annexation of Upper Burmah, he was sent to resume the mission work in Mandalay, which had been interrupted under the misrule of King Theebaw. In little more than a year he had gathered round him a band of baptised converts, and a large number of enquirers, many of them Buddhist monks.

After a Painting in the "Musée Moderne" at Brussels.]

"THE BLESSING."

[By Charles De Groux (1825–1870).

"O YE HOLY AND HUMBLE MEN OF HEART, BLESS YE THE LORD, PRAISE HIM AND MAGNIFY HIM FOR EVER."

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

OLD GWEN.

BY ANNE BEALE.

CHAPTER I.—THE COTTAGE BY THE RIVER.

"HUSHT!" SAID OLD GWEN, AND SHE BECKONED HIM OUT OF THE HOUSE.

"I'M as sure as sure can be, that our Toom never did the deed. Rouse up, Tisha, and think of your children," said old Gwen, the Castell, to her daughter-in-law, Letitia, Caban Afon.

"I shall never be rousing up again, Mamgu. I shall never be looking my fellows in the face. I shall never be leaving this bed so long as I do breathe," answered Tisha.

"Nonsense, mother; you must, or we'll pull you out, and carry you off in the coracle," cried Gwen fach, or Gwen the younger.

"To my burial! In poor father's coracle! There's unfeeling you are!" sobbed Tisha.

"Don't cry, Mam fach," shouted Shonny, a youth of seven, giving Gwenny a punch with his fist, which caused Mamgu to burst out laughing.

These words were spoken in the house-place of a tidy cottage. Old Gwen was seated in an antiquated bee-hive chair by the fire; young Gwen, or Gwenny, as she was called, was standing near her, arms akimbo; and Tisha was lying in a big cupboard-bedstead, enveloped in flannels, while Shonny sat on a three-legged stool at the knees of his Mamgu, or grandmother.

"You're more unfeeling than Gwen fach, Mamgu," moaned Tisha from beneath her blankets, which caused Shonny to punch his grandmother, and jump upon his mother's bed.

At this juncture two other children came in, apparently much excited. They were a boy and girl of twelve and fourteen, and they had slates and satchels swung over their shoulders.

"What's the matter, David?" asked old Gwen.

"I fought him, and I'll do it again. Evan Ty Gwyn said father was——"

"Hush! never say the word," cried old Gwen, her finger on her lips. "Your father is not the man. The prophet Nathan 'ould never have pointed to him. But he suffers, like our blessed Lord, 'the just for the unjust,' and I will say so to my dying day. But the laws o' the land were against him, and don't you be breaking them by fighting and going to prison yourself. One trial's enough for anybody's lifetime. You're a naughty boy, you are."

David, or Dai bach, as he was familiarly called, slunk off to the cupboard-bedstead, and began to whisper to the blankets.

Little was visible of his mother, for after the custom of the poor when invalided, she had enwrapped herself, or enrolled herself, to speak literally, so closely in the bed-clothes, that her form alone was displayed. And this was soon hidden from view, for at David's whisper, she pulled to the panel of the bedstead, and lay, sobbing audibly, between its four sides.

"What did he do? Tell the truth, Dorcas," said old Gwen.

"He knocked down Evan, Ty Gwyn," replied Dorcas, the girl who had just entered, "because he said father was——"

"Husht. What can we do, Gwen fach? We must get them away from this place," said the grandmother, or Mamgu, as we will call her for brevity. "So long as Toom bach was here, he carried on the fishing, and could manage the coracle nearly as well as his father—God bless and keep him!—but he could bear it no longer, and went and 'listed."

"I wish I could go and 'list, I do," said Dorcas. "I 'on't be going to school any more. Let me go to service, Mamgu. You are knowing everybody, and can get me a place. Let me be nurse to one of your babies."

"You must stop at home and take care of mother, Dorcas," cried Gwenny, excitedly. "Mamgu has promised to get me a place with one of her ladies." Mamgu was a trusted nurse. "And when we get mother up to the Castle——"

The sliding panel of the bedstead suddenly withdrew, and a melancholy voice was heard from amongst the flannels, murmuring lugubriously, "I'm not going up there. Do you 'spose I'll be leaving this caban where father and I lived ever since we were married"—suppressed sobs—"and where all you children were born, and Toom bach besides; and where I've got my pretty chairs and tables, and bed-linen that I bought with my own savings when I was head nurse at Lewis, Bryntowy; and all my crockeryware, and spoons, and ornaments in the corner-cupboard, and the pig, and cocks and hens, and dog and cat"—more sobs—"and—and—father's coracle and the river and the fields, to go upon the top of a bare rock, where the ruins frighten me to death."

"That's just what you want, so you say, mother," interrupted Gwen fach, who was slightly provoking.

The sobs increased, and the boys began to howl for company.

"Husht! Hold your noise!" said Mamgu authoritatively. "Listen to me, Tisha. There's room for all your things at Tybach. I'm not wanting the little parlour, and you shall have it for your own. Joshua will carry up your goods in his little cart——"

"And father's coracle!" interrupted Tisha, suddenly displaying a pale face and red eyes.

All the children looked aghast; for they had not seen so much of their mother since Toom bach enlisted.

"Laban will take it on his back," pursued Mamgu, feeling that she was progressing; "Oncet you get change of air, you'll feel better. 'Tis dampish down here by the river, and dry as dust up with us."

"Are you sure you'll have room for all my things?" asked Tisha, actually sitting up, and surveying her property, from the beloved corner-cupboard to the equally adored dresser.

"Yes—children and all," replied Mamgu, with, for her, a slight asperity of tone, for she had a notion that if the children were put in one scale and the precious furniture in another, Tisha would find it difficult to choose between them.

This was not quite true; though most of us know how deeply we get attached to our goods and chattels.

"Ach! my poor children!" cried Tisha, suddenly remembering them, and surveying the quartette.

"God will provide for them," returned Mamgu solemnly. "They're worse than orphans, but their father served the Lord all his days, and is serving Him still in his—what do they call it, Gwenny? My memory can't be carrying hard words."

"Penal servitude for life," replied Gwenny importantly; for she was a scholar according to board-school education.

"And what did they say besides?" groaned Tisha, disappearing under the blankets as rapidly as she had emerged from them.

"Sentence commuted on account of unimpeachable character, and extenuating circumstances," answered Gwenny, bringing out her words like a judge.

"There's foolish I am!" muttered Mamgu. "She was just coming round, and now she's gone out again like a candle. Oncet for all, Tisha, and you, children, I do declare, for I'm as sure as sure can be, that father is as innocent as the babe unborn. He swore it to me on the Holy Bible, as calm as could be, and he never told me a lie in his life. There's a Judge up in Heaven a sight grander and more powerful than them as comes on circuit, who 'seeth the secrets of the hearts, and spyeth out all our ways.' He knows all about our Toom, and if it be His blessed will, his character will be cleared in this world—anyhows it will be clean of crime at the great Judgment. He no more took the life of Thomas, Plas Newydd, than he took the life of his own father, who died when he was six years old. Why can't you believe it, Tisha, as well as me? I'm going my three score and fifteen, and I'd scorn to let the world fancy I thought him guilty."

"You ain't so weak as I, Mamgu," moaned Tisha. "You're twice my age and have much 'sperience. Ach yn wir! I shall never look up again. I was getting better when Toom bach 'listed, but that finished me up."

"There's the spoons and ornaments in the corner-cupboard to clean, mother. Who's to do it?" asked the shrewd and wide-awake Gwenny. "Dorcas, you'd better try."

"P'raps I could rub up the spoons; Dorcas is so rough," said Tisha, roused to interest.

"All right, mother. Just sit up in bed and we'll bring them along."

Mamgu's sides began to shake a little, for her normal state was mirth; but the astute Gwenny bade Dorcas bring the spoons, while she pillowed up her mother. In a few moments Tisha was polishing up her plate, and forgetting her troubles, while the two girls began to lay the cloth for a very frugal meal of bread and cheese, to be helped down by that universal panacea, tea. The teapot was already on the hob—indeed it was never off it, for whenever Tisha was unusually miserable a cup o' tea was the restorative. No lecturers on the baneful properties of this beverage had, as yet, appeared in the neighbourhood, and poor Tisha knew nothing, happily, about tannin or theine, or any of the noxious or beneficial qualities of the leaf she loved. She felt that it stimulated her drooping energies, and did not intoxicate her, as the cwru da (good ale) of her country might do if she imbibed it to the same excess—she knew, also, that people lived to a hundred and more, who drank nothing else; so she desired no enlightenment. But then, she always bought good tea, and disdained the "cheap and nasty" adulterated compound sold under its name. Your peasant has a notion that "little and good" is a sound axiom, and old Gwen was wont to say that "a spoonful at half-a-crown a pound went further than three at one and nine." And she was in all things a practical philosopher, self-taught by experience, and not by lectures. Indeed she had a horror of all lecturers, ever since she had heard an infidel hold forth on the "non-authenticity" of the Holy Word. She had defied him on the spot, and, her friends declared, had had the best of it; but "No more lectures for me, 'scept those delivered in church or chapel," she had said ever since. "Don't listen to 'em. Itching ears catch any disease. Satan finds out when they itch and knows how to irritate 'em, till his poison kills the soul."

In like manner she would have confronted any man who dared to lecture against the use of tea. Nevertheless, she did not like it "stewed," as she expressed it; and when Mamgu appeared, a fresh infusion was prepared. All her grandchildren—and they were legion—knew and respected her peculiarities. Not one of them would have dared to contradict her; nor, for that much, would her children. She had had, she declared, three quivers' full; for she had somewhere read, that a quiver contains five arrows, and as she had been blessed with fifteen sons and daughters, she assumed that there must have been, somewhere, three quivers to hold them. Twelve of these were still alive, the youngest of whom was the husband and father of Tisha and her five olive-branches—and was the unfortunate Toom or Tom, who had been either justly or unjustly sentenced to penal servitude for life for the murder of Thomas, Plas Newydd.

The spirits of old Gwen and her grandchildren rose at sight of Tisha rubbing up the spoons. They all knew the value she set on these rarely used but ostentatiously displayed articles, and had themselves so great an admiration of the contents of the corner-cupboard, that they almost considered them as household gods—the Lares and Penates of the moderns. Certainly Tisha greatly venerated her furniture.

"There's nice it is to see mother sit upright again," said David, surveying his parent.

"Husht! Boys shouldn't make remarks about their elders," returned old Gwen, who foresaw a collapse; but the spoons held sway.

It was no wonder that Tisha resisted removal from that comfortable cottage. She was furtively looking about her while brightening the spoons with a piece of very old chamois-leather, that had seen service ever since her marriage. She heaved a deep sigh as she watched her children eat. What appetites they had, she thought, and what good teeth, to be able to masticate the very hard cheese they eagerly devoured. Neither did they disdain the stewed tea in the big brown teapot: but drank it with gusto, sweetened as it was with coarse sugar, and cooled by skim milk. Mamgu had a small teapot to herself, the contents of which were shared by Tisha, who was also regaled with thin slices of bread-and-butter, which she ate as she rubbed up the spoons. For a moment she forgot her troubles as she contemplated the tea-table and its surroundings. She was not herself a particularly captivating sight in her present costume, and looked as old, if not older, than Mamgu. The frills of her nightcap were concealed by a flannel petticoat, which framed her lank and mournful face. Her shoulders were enwrapped in a many-coloured plaid shawl of Welsh flannel, which, as the practical Gwenny expressed it, "had cost a lot o' money at Hollantide Fair, and was too good to sleep in." For the rest, all the blankets of the small establishment were heaped about her.

Very different was the cheerful and helpful mother-in-law, whom she contemplated with a sort of jealous annoyance. Old Gwen's face was fat, fair and smooth, and looked like a very full-blown rose, beneath the snow-white cap and pinners that encircled it. Of course it was surmounted by the high beaver, which she, at least, she said, intended to wear as long as she lived, as well as the picturesque costume of her native land. Her figure was as round as her face, and the short striped petticoat and tucked-up flannel gown seemed to become it.

Young Gwen resembled her as the rosebud resembles the rose. Round-faced, dimpled, red-cheeked, black-eyed, raven-haired, laughter-loving maiden, she was as irrepressible as a lark at sunrise. Not even her father's misfortune, nor her brother's 'listing, could break her buoyancy. But then, she lived for the most part with her grandmother, and had imbibed her good humour with the bracing air of the mountain where they dwelt.

Dorcas, on the contrary, was like her mother, while David, a sturdy, plodding youth, was, old Gwen declared, like nobody belonging to him. As to Shonny, he was an imp of mischief, and wholly spoilt by the rest of the family. Thus, when he declared his intention of winding up with bread and treacle, Tisha ordered Dorcas to give him a slice, in spite of Mamgu's remonstrance.

While describing these specimens of Adam's race, the other members of the household must not be forgotten. Snap, the somewhat surly and sarcastic dog, and his devoted friend and admirer, the tortoiseshell cat, awaited and received their full share of the meal; while sundry cocks and hens and a couple of tame pigeons walked familiarly in and out, pecking up the crumbs. In winter they had to dispute possession with flocks of birds of all denominations. Who can wonder that Tisha should grieve at the prospect of quitting this home that she had shared with an indulgent husband ever since their marriage?

Her tea and bread and butter finished, and the spoons "rubbed up," she began to cry again.

"You'll have to carry me," she sobbed.

"So we will, mother. Shall it be pick-a-back or queen's cushion?" returned Gwenny.

While she was speaking a man entered, who was boisterously hailed as Uncle Joshua. This was old Gwen's eldest born, who, toil-worn and grey-headed, looked almost as old as herself. He had come to enforce the necessity of the move, and his advent sent Tisha back amongst her blankets, and made her hastily draw the sliding panel.

"How's Tisha? I've nothing particular to do to-morrow, and I've settled——" began Uncle Joshua.

"Husht!" interrupted old Gwen, and, rising with some difficulty from the bee-hive chair, beckoned him out of the house.

The children followed as a matter of course, and Tisha was left alone.

"Which corner 'ould be best for the cupboard in Mamgu's parlour, and where could the dresser stand?" she muttered, when the coast was quite clear. "Ach a fi, I never shall survive it. What 'ould my poor Toom say?"

Who shall describe the scene outside the cottage? As far as eye could see, stretched on all sides, meads and valleys, through which wandered a wild and wilful river. In the centre of a lovely valley rose one of Nature's rocky fortresses, surmounted by a ruined castle. It was at some distance from the cottage and towered skyward three hundred feet above its level. A mighty giant indeed; bare, isolated, unapproachable. This was Careg Cennin Castle, near the entrance to which lived old Gwen. It must have been in some strange freak or convulsion that Nature threw up this precipitous rock of mountain limestone; and in some equally strange and convulsive mood of the ancient Britons that they surmounted it by an apparently impregnable fortress. It appeared to rise out of the narrow ravine of the river Cennen, which flowed into the broad flood of the Towey. The cottages scattered in its neighbourhood looked like the dwellings of pigmies, and even the so-called giant oaks dwindled into dwarfs by comparison. While the surrounding valleys were green and fertile, well watered by the fair river and dotted everywhere by flocks and herds, the barrier of hills was, like itself, bare of verdure and composed mostly of sandstone. From its base the castle at its summit looked a part of itself, and the once formidable and now crumbling walls seemed but a continuation of the gloomy rock. Not that it looked gloomy to old Gwen and her descendants, as they held consultation outside the cottage. They were used to it, and to them it was Castell Careg Cennin, and nothing more. They wondered why archæologists should come to speculate upon, tourists to admire, and artists to sketch, this massive excrescence, and were of opinion that some people had more money than wit when they gave old Gwen or a grandchild a douceur for showing them over the ruin: for she had certain privileges connected with it. It is to be feared that she had not appreciated as she ought the many celebrated people who had visited her house on their way to and from the castle, or understood their speculations concerning that Knight of the Round Table, yclept Urien, said to have founded it. But she had made a pleasant acquaintance with the painters John Varley and David Cox, who had sketched not only the castle, but the neighbourhood. Indeed two of their most remarkable productions were this bare and castellated rock, cloud-capped and rugged.

The afternoon sun of a bright spring day, however, woke up the giant to momentary life, while old Gwen and her son Joshua finally settled a change of abode for Tisha and her children. The latter, with the love of variety inherent in youth, thought any change better than none, and their Mamgu, in the solidity of age, knew that it was easier to keep one house than two. So she finally decided that all the live-stock and all the furniture should be transported from the base of Careg Cennin, or Cennin stone, to her small abode near its summit.

Here it may be well to account for the necessity of this change of residence. Thomas Gwillim, the husband of Tisha, had been all his life a fisherman. In the beginning of his career, he and his coracle had been wont to navigate the rocky river Towy from its source to its end, and to make a decent living out of the fish caught in it. But of late years, landed proprietors had begun to preserve the river, and he and his income were impeded thereby. One of these, Squire Thomas, of Plas Newydd, who was young, bold, and wild, set himself up as a staunch conservator. As such, he and Gwillim were constantly brought into contact. He was in the habit of accusing Gwillim of poaching, and summoned him accordingly. Gwillim always got off, for he was strictly honest and conscientious in the matter; and this irritated Thomas. High words arose between them whenever they met, and people said that if Thomas was overbearing, Gwillim was insolent.

About four years before this story commences, Thomas was found dead, with Gwillim close at hand. The discovery was made by one of Thomas's keepers, who affirmed that Gwillim was in the act of flight when he secured him. The spot was a retired corner, near the turnpike road, and close to the river. Thomas's dog-cart was not far off, and Gwillim's coracle was moored close by. The body bore marks of violence, which had indisputably caused the death, and a great struggle must have preceded it. Gwillim stolidly persisted in denying all knowledge of the event, and in declaring that he had come unwittingly on the body; but nobody believed him, save his mother, though most people acquitted him of intent to murder.

The customary trial and imprisonment succeeded, during which it evolved that Thomas was taking money to the bank, which money was nowhere to be found. Gwillim denied all knowledge of this also; indeed, "Not guilty" was all he had to say for himself.

It is not necessary to enter into the details of the trial and evidence here; suffice it to say that sentence of death was passed upon the prisoner, but that, owing to the good character he had heretofore borne, the sentence was commuted into one of penal servitude for life.

Some time after the sad events, his eldest son was driven, by the taunts of his companions, to enlist, and the circumstances of the family declined from bad to worse. The health and spirits of the mother gave way, and the result was the change of abode from the base to the summit of the rock on which the ancient castle was situated.

But for old Gwen, Tisha and her children would have been still more badly off. She was a woman of faith and prayer, and believed that the Almighty could unravel the most intricate affairs of human life, and weave good out of them. So she did not hesitate, trusting wholly in His strength, to charge herself with her son's family. They, too, had been brought up in "the nurture of the Lord," and believed in Him according to their various lights, knowing that He could bring good out of evil for those who loved Him.

ST. JOHN:

APOSTLE, EVANGELIST, AND SEER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

VII.—THE FOURTH GOSPEL AND THE THREE EPISTLES. (1.)

THE common consent of the Christian Church has marked out the Gospel and the First Epistle of St. John as the pre-eminently spiritual writings of the New Testament. Their Divine philosophy carries the reader into the upper air of pure thought and of eternal realities. Their phraseology, so simple that a child may understand, opens the way to infinite depths. Imaginative expositors, discerning in the fourfold cherubic symbol an emblem of the evangelic narratives, are accustomed to describe the Fourth Gospel as the "eagle," in its lofty flight and its piercing vision.[1] To many, who have here found the very Holy of Holies of the Christian revelation, it comes as a shock of strange surprise to be told that they are "the battle-field of the New Testament." Yet for nearly seventy years[1] this has been literally true; and it is the singular fate of modern Biblical critics to have to establish the authenticity of these writings, before surrendering themselves to their spell.

One happy result of the attack upon the "Johannine Books" has been a minuteness and care in their examination which might never have been accorded to them as undisputed. The literature of the subject has grown into a library; and in tracing the career of the beloved disciple,

[1] "Christ's own Eagle."—Dante. Yet in early times John was sometimes the Lion, Mark the Eagle. So Irenæus.

[1] We may date from Bretschneider, the learned theologian of Gotha, whose Probabilia de Evangelii et Epistolarum Johannis Apostoli indole et origine, 1820, really begun the controversy. An Englishman, however, Evanson, had been first in the field, as will be shown in the next note. Bretschneider himself eventually acknowledged the Johannine authorship; but Strauss and Baur afterwards strenuously opposed it.

we can give no more than the barest outline of the vast and exhaustive discussion.[1]

The appeal to ancient testimony establishes first of all, the unchallengeable fact that Eusebius, the ecclesiastical historian in the early part of the fourth century, familiar as he was with early Christian literature, including many books no longer extant, asserts that the Gospel of St. John had always ranked in the church among the homologoumena, that is, among the canonical writings concerning which there was no dispute.[2] We can add but a few corroborative quotations from writers of an earlier date. Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, writes in his Apology, about A.D. 175: "The Holy Scriptures teach us, and all who were moved by the Spirit; one of whom, John, says, 'In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God.'"[3] This is probably the first reference in Christian literature to the Gospel as the work of St. John. But obviously, it carries back the evidence far beyond its own date. The bishop would quote what was already recognised and accepted on all hands, by orthodox and heretics alike. A few years later, i.e. between A.D. 182 and 188, Irenæus, bishop of Lyons, argues for the existence of four Gospels, and only four, by a chain of reasoning which could not possibly have been employed unless the fact had first existed and the reasons been sought afterwards.[1] And of the four, "that according to John" is first mentioned. Now Irenæus, although at that time in the West, was the depository of the Eastern tradition, which had come to him through Polycarp, direct from the apostle. There is no question, again, that Tertullian at the end of the second century, and Clement of Alexandria, at the beginning of the third, recognised the Gospel as the authentic work of the apostle. The Canon of Muratori, discovered at Milan about 1740, and believed by competent judges to belong to the last quarter of the second century, not only mentions the book, but gives an account of its origin which probably presents an actual fact in a legendary dress. A few lines are worth quoting.

> "At the entreaties of his fellow-disciples and his bishops, John said, 'Fast with me for three days from this time, and whatever shall be revealed to any one of us, let us relate it to one another.' On the same night it was revealed to Andrew, one of the apostles, that John should relate all things in his own name, aided by the revision of all. What wonder is it then that John brings forward each detail with so much emphasis, even in his epistles (or, epistle), saying of himself, 'What we have seen with our eyes, and heard with our ears, and our hands have handled, these things have we written to you'? For so he professes that he was not only an eyewitness, but also a hearer, and moreover an historian of all the wonderful works of the Lord in order."

Once more, Tatian the Assyrian, in the second century, compiled a Gospel narrative made up from the Four, whence its name, Diatessaron. It was not precisely what we now call a Harmony, inasmuch as it did not embody the whole contents of the evangelists, but selected and arranged from them severally what appeared sufficient for a combined and complete history. Until recent years, all that was known of this compilation was that it was largely read in the Syrian churches, and that Ephrem, the Syrian poet and theologian of the fourth century, wrote a commentary upon it. The Diatessaron and Commentary alike had vanished. The latter has now, however, been recovered from an Armenian translation preserved at Venice, which has been rendered into Latin; and the work of Tatian can with tolerable certainty be reconstructed. It begins with the proem of the Fourth Gospel: "In the beginning was the Word;" and throughout, says Professor J. M. Fuller, "of the Four Gospels, St. John is Tatian's favourite. The text of that evangelist is generally adopted, then that of St. Matthew, and, at a long distance, the texts of St. Luke and St. Mark."[2] Now Tatian was a disciple of [1] Readers who may wish to pursue the subject will find in the English edition of Dr. Luthardt's St. John the Author of the Fourth Gospel, Clark, 1875, a list of books and articles on both sides of the question, down to that date. The list includes 491 works, including essays in periodicals; and during the last twelve years the number has greatly increased. It is observable that the controversy was begun in England, by Edward Evanson: The Dissonance of the Four generally received Evangelists, and the Evidence of their Authenticity examined, Ipswich, 1792. Evanson, however, rejects all the Evangelists but St. Luke. He was answered by Dr. Priestley; Letters to a Young Man: Works, vol. 20. In the Introductions to the best recent commentaries, the question is exhaustively discussed. Those of Luthardt, Tholuck and Godet (Eng. ed. in Clark's Library), of Canon Westcott (Speaker's Commentary) and of Dr. H. R. Reynolds (in the Preacher's Commentary), leave nothing to be desired. A briefer but cogent and masterly summary of the argument is given in Dr. Plummer's two volumes (Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges) on the Gospel and the Epistles of St. John. Canon Westcott's Introduction to the Study of the Gospels, and Dr. Salmon's Introduction to the New Testament, will be consulted by the student with the greatest advantage. Dr. Sanday's Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel (1872) has a special and unique value from the carefulness and insight with which the author comments upon the whole Gospel, chapter by chapter, bringing out the indications of genuineness at every step. Luthardt's interesting Essay has already been mentioned. Dr. Ezra Abbot has also treated the external evidences in a scholarly and convincing manner, in his Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, 1880. Dr. Davidson, in his Introduction to the New Testament, 1848, argues strongly for the genuineness of the Gospels and Epistles; but is as decidedly on the other side in his Introduction to the Study of the New Testament, 1868. Against the Johannine origin of the Gospel the writers best worth consulting are the late John James Tayler (The Fourth Gospel, 1867), and Dr. Edwin A. Abbott, Encyclopædia Britannica, art. "Gospels." Nothing, however, has really been added by these writers to Baur's Kritische Untersuchungen über die Kanonischen Evangelien, 1847, with his successive essays in the Tübingen Theologische Jahrbücher, from 1844 to 1857, of which the English reader will find a fair account with a very able refutation, in Mr. R. H. Hutton's Essays Theological and Literary, vol. i., 1871. Mr. Hutton, however, gives up the Johannine authorship of the Apocalypse. An anonymous book published in 1874, entitled Supernatural Religion, excited great attention, but the searching criticisms of Professor (now Bishop) Lightfoot in the Contemporary Review (1874–1877) have effectually disposed of its pretensions. Many other works might be mentioned, but the above contain all that is essential on either side.

[2] Eccl. Hist., bk. iii., c. 24. "John's Gospel," writes the historian, "so well known in the churches throughout the world, must first of all be acknowledged as genuine."

[3] Theophilus to Autolycus, bk. ii., ch. 22. Theophilus succeeded to the bishopric of Antioch in the eighth year of Marcus Aurelius, i.e. A.D. 168.—Eus. Eccl. Hist.

[1] Irenæus Against Heresies, book iii., ch. x. § 8.

[2] Smith & Wace's Dict. of Eccl. Biog. Art. "Tatianus."

Justin Martyr, and his testimony to the Gospel is all the more valuable, as that of a reputed heretic.

These testimonies must be taken for what they are worth, and no more. We do not propound them as sufficient to establish any doctrine of inspiration, or as carrying any theological authority. They bear simply upon matters of historical fact; and the fact which they establish beyond all controversy is the reception of the Gospel as the work of the Apostle John, by the Churches of the East and of the West, before the last quarter of the second century.[1]

But how are we to fill up the sixty or seventy years which separate this date from the apostle's death, an interval in which the Gospel and its author are not explicitly mentioned in any extant Christian writing? The question is a fair one, and the answer to be given is threefold.

1. The literary relics of the period are very scanty. Leave out the writings of Justin Martyr, and every scrap of Christian authorship that has survived from those seventy years could be included in a volume of very moderate size. The omission, therefore, is not wonderful.

2. The fact that at the end of the period the Gospel is found in full possession, recognized and reverenced as St. John's by the Universal Church, requires, on any hypothesis, to be accounted for. That this Gospel actually came from the apostle's hands in his old age at Ephesus, is a simple and natural explanation: that a forgery in his name was imposed upon the churches and everywhere accepted, East and West, is the most wildly improbable of suppositions.

3. There is from the very first a chain of quotations in this early Christian literature sufficient to render it morally certain that the Gospel and Epistle were in the possession of the churches, and were received as veritable Scripture. That these quotations are not so numerous as those from the other Gospels, is certain. These earlier writings had been longer in possession, and their language had grown more familiar. But when we read in Ignatius, "of Jesus Christ as the bread of God," and of "His blood as drink, which is incorruptible love;" and of "the Spirit of God as knowing both whence it cometh and whither it goeth;" and when in Polycarp we find the words, "Whosoever does not confess that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is an antichrist," can we resist the conclusion that these "apostolical fathers" were conversant with the Johannine writings? Again, in the anonymous Epistle to Diognetus, about the middle of the century, we have such phrases as these: "Christians dwell in the world, but are not of the world," "God sent His Son, loving not condemning," "He sent His only begotten Son;" the very turn of expression irresistibly recalling the Fourth Gospel. About the same time, Justin Martyr is full of "echoes" of the Johannine writings, seldom indeed in forms of exact quotation, but sufficiently exact to show their source. Thus: "Christ said, Except ye be born again, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven; and that it is impossible for those once born to enter into the wombs of those that bare them, is manifest to all;" "the blood of Christ is produced not of human seed, but of the will of God;" "we are called and are the true children of God, who keep the commandments of Christ." The same writer speaks of "the Word" as "the Son of God," as "made flesh," as "with God begotten before all His works." Once he quotes John the Baptist as saying, "I am not the Christ, but the voice of one crying." "This," says Tischendorf, "depends upon John i. 20 and 23, for no other evangelist has reported the first phrase of the reply." A great number of other correspondences might be adduced.[1] It is true that many of these might be individually explained away, but their concurrence forms a moral demonstration that the writings we know as those of St. John were in the hands of Justin. In fact he distinctly says that "the Memoirs of the Apostles were read in the weekly services of the church on the same footing as the writings of the Prophets," a phrase which, if it may apply in a general sense to the Four Gospels, appears to have a more specific application to the two which bear the apostolic names of St. Matthew and St. John. In view of this statement, and of such quotations as those we have adduced, it seems the very perversity of criticism to argue with the late Mr. Matthew Arnold that Justin may have but incorporated Christian sayings (logia) current in the church before they were gathered into one book—say by the Ephesian elders,—and that this collection may well have been of later date than the days of St. John. That the book itself furnished the sayings is the most satisfactory as it is the simplest solution of the problem.

But we may appeal to the Gospel itself for evidence; and we are at once arrested by the fact that the author claims to have been an eye-witness of the events narrated, and a disciple of Christ. At the very outset we find the parenthetic statement, "we beheld His glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father." In recording the marvel that followed the crucifixion, he adds, "he that hath seen hath borne witness, and his witness is true, and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye also may believe." At the end of the Gospel, in a chapter that is evidently an appendix to the work, a similar declaration is confirmed by the testimony of others: "This is the disciple which beareth witness of these things, and wrote these things, and we know that his testimony is true."[2] Now it would be easy to show that there is no one save the Apostle

[1] An insignificant exception only makes the unanimity more striking. The Alogi (so named, or nicknamed, by Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis, two centuries afterwards), an obscure sect in Asia Minor at this period, rejected the Gospel because it was quoted by the Montanists in support of their mysticism; but they seem to have had no other reason for repudiating it. In the word Alogi there seems to be a double meaning: "opponents of the Word," and "without reason."

[1] See Professor Charteris, Canonicity, pp. 176-179, for a careful and valuable list. The whole subject of Justin Martyr's quotations, and especially of his doctrine of the Logos, or Word, has been largely discussed, but the conclusion above indicated seems irrefragable. See especially Abbot's Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, pp. 28-52.

[2] John i. 14; xix. 35; xxi. 24.

John to whom these concurrent declarations would apply: and if the Gospel be not his, it is no less than a literary imposture, all the worse because he implies that others are parties to the fraud.

If from direct assertions like these, we turn to indirect evidences of truthfulness in the record, they meet us on almost every page. So marvellous, so minute, is the correspondence between the details of the Gospel and its professed authorship, that if it be a forgery it is unmatched in the literature of the world for its consummate skill. The hand of an eyewitness is everywhere, as in our sketch of the apostle's life we have already shown. Minute particulars, thrown in as if unconsciously, mark out persons, places, times, shades of character, moods of feeling, which, if not represented with the simplicity of truth, are drawn with unparallelled dramatic genius. The narrative of the Samaritan woman (ch. vi.), of the cure of the blind man (ix.), and of the raising of Lazarus (xi.) may be given as instances; but every reader will have observed for himself these notes of authenticity. That the writer was a Jew continually appears in his familiarity with Jewish topography,[1] festivals, modes of thought, as well as with the Old Testament Scripture: it is equally plain that he wrote for Gentiles, from his interjected translation of Hebrew phrases—Messiah, Siloam, Rabbi and Rabboni; from such explanations "as the passover, a feast of the Jews;" and especially from the use of the term Jews, as descriptive of the opponents of Jesus. This last fact also suggests the true date of the Gospel, when the Jewish glory was in the dust.

Very remarkable also is the constant reference to the words and even the thoughts of our Lord's hearers, especially of His disciples. The evangelist writes as one who has listened to the cavils of the sceptical, and the questionings of those who longed to believe. Of the apostles, especially, he knows the very thoughts, as thoughts which he himself had shared. He presupposes facts, again, that he has nowhere before mentioned, writing of them in an easy unforced way, as though he knew that his readers had access to other records. Thus, "Andrew, Simon Peter's brother" (ch. i. 40); Simon Peter having not been previously mentioned: "John was not yet cast in prison" (iii. 24), nothing being further said about his imprisonment: "Have not I chosen you twelve?" (vi. 70), the call and the number of the apostles having been nowhere related in his narrative: "Bethany, the home of Mary and her sister Martha" (xi. 1), alluding to the sisters as well known, although not spoken of before. These and other instances are characteristic of a truthful narrative, implying the existence of the others as too well known to need further reference.

The connexion between the Fourth Gospel and the other three (usually called the "synoptic" or "parallel" Gospels) demands a brief separate consideration.

[1] The writer knows all about Jerusalem, although the almost unconscious turn of his expression shows that the city had been destroyed: "Bethany was nigh unto Jerusalem" (x. 18); "Beyond the brook of Kedron was a garden" (xviii. 1); "There was a garden in the place where He was crucified" (xix. 41); the localities being already laid waste when he wrote. Against these references may be quoted ch. v. 2: "There is in Jerusalem at the sheepgate a pool"; but it may well have been that the watercourse remained by the shattered gate, as a natural feature of the scene, long after gardens and country villages had become indistinguishable in the ruin. The phrases therefore all point to one conclusion.

THE BLESSING.

CHARLES DE GROUX, the painter of the picture engraved as a frontispiece to this number, died in 1870, at the early age of forty-five. He was a leader in the movement towards realism in art, which in Belgium took place towards the end of the first half of this century.

Weak and suffering himself, De Groux quitted the comfortable quarters of affluence for an obscure suburb, where he was surrounded by straitened homes, distressed faces and pale wrecks of humanity. Into the sombre depths of this vale of tears he descended, seeking to understand its trials, its anguish and its vice. Then he tried to express on canvas what he saw and felt; the squalor in which the people lived, the stagnation of their souls, the coarseness of their minds, the icy bareness of their homes, the solitude of their firesides, often without a father, sometimes without a mother, their sparse and broken furniture, everything cracked and fallen into decay, their skins wan, worn, and deeply furrowed, and often marred by eruptions and scaly sores. He sought, in brief, to delineate that continuous perishing of persons and things—the action of certain social conditions hitherto regarded as inevitable.

Sometimes he depicted the dull, oppressive monotony of their daily life—the long afternoon spent in mending the clothes of the husband and the children; the wearied tramping of beggars through the mud; the gossiping of half-frozen paupers near a stove where a grocer is roasting his coffee; or he became still more touching as he showed a fond mother interceding at the foot of a Calvary for her dying child; or the humid depths of dark churches, filled with bending suppliant forms.

His sympathy for the people made De Groux one with them, and their soul took possession of him, and through his pencil found expression, and thus in the best sense of the term he became "a great man."

Among the most characteristic of his pictures is the one we reproduce. An act of common faith unites the members of the household. Notwithstanding the sombre gloom of the surroundings, and the certainty that the lives of all represented have been and will be hard, we cannot help exclaiming: "Blessed are ye, poor, for yours is the kingdom of God."

By permission from the Painting in the Royal Academy, 1888.] [Frank W. W. Topham.

NAAMAN'S WIFE.

"And the Syrians had gone out by companies, and had brought away captive out of the land of Israel a little maid; and she waited on Naaman's wife. And she said unto her mistress, Would God my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria! for he would recover him of his leprosy."—2 Kings v. 2, 3.

HOSPITAL NURSES

IN LONDON AND ON THE CONTINENT.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER V.—VIENNA.

THERE is no city in the world more favourable than Vienna for viewing every variety of nursing. The good and the bad, the religious and the lay, the new and the old, all may be seen there. But of whatever character the nursing, it must be paid for, there being no such thing as free admission to the hospitals, even for the very poor.

Vienna is famous for the number of its hospitals, and for the rare skill and devotion of its doctors; but its institutions, unlike those in England and Germany, lack the interest and sympathy of royal and highly-born women. Neither nurses nor patients are cheered by visits such as in England do so much to bring the rich and the poor together. The work goes on in these crowded wards day after day, and year after year, without the exercise of any gentle outside influence to cheer the monotony or soothe the pain of the sufferers.

It will be no more possible to give an account of all the Vienna hospitals than it was of those in London; so we will take three as examples, where we shall see specimens of the various classes of nurses—the old untrained type, the strictly religious sisterhoods, and the Red Cross nurses.

Besides these three classes of women, there is an order of nurses quite peculiar, and only to be met with in Austria and Bohemia—I mean the Brothers of Mercy, whose surgical skill and sick nursing in their own special men's hospital, and among the poor in their homes, cannot be overlooked if we are to consider the question of nursing at all. Their work is confined to Austria and Bohemia. It is gentle and humane, and highly valued among the poor; for in Vienna, even more than in other cities, the sick poor have no comforts or appliances in their homes with which to ameliorate pain, and, but for these Brothers of Mercy, the working classes would have no home nursing of a skilled character.

Besides nursing in the homes of the poor, they tended last year in their own special hospital 4,140 sick people, of whom 257 died, 3,980 were healed, and 639 were sent back to their homes much improved in health. They tended each patient on an average 15½ days, and of the 4,140 so nursed, 427 were day labourers, 312 brewer's workmen, 282 shoemakers, 198 coachmen and stablemen, 172 millers, 175 butchers, 168 workers of steam machines, beside many of a better class, such as doctors, chemists, teachers, clergy, and missioners, who sought their help.

Leaving them to their humane and benevolent work, we take our way to the largest hospital I have ever seen, viz., the Allgemeines Krankenhaus, which has been in existence for over two hundred years. It occupies an immense area, and contains 2,000 beds, all of which were in use when we were there.

There are thirteen huge courtyards or gardens, which must look very pretty in summer, but which were buried deep in snow at the time of our visit.

Professor Dr. Carl Böhm, Director des Wiener K. K. Allgemeinen Krankenhauses, received us most courteously, and gave himself up to the task of making us acquainted with every corner of this vast city of the sick and its working powers. I do not think there is a living person who would willingly change places with him, so overwhelming and hopeless must seem the work before him. It was his known skill as an administrator and organiser which secured for him the post of honour which he now occupies, in the hope that he may bring this hospital into some such order as that in which he left the Rudolph Stiftung.

On his appointment as director he was in despair, not only at the size of the hospital, but at the general laxity of discipline and disregard of rules and cleanliness which prevailed throughout. Imagine, also, two hundred and fifty nurses, and one hundred helpers, untrained, uneducated, each going her own careless way, no matron, no means of keeping them in subjection, except while the director's or doctors' eyes are upon them.

His first attempt at a nursing staff was a religious sisterhood; but this did not answer at all. They were prejudiced, and disobedient to lay instruction and direction.

He then started on a tour of inspection to the hospitals in Dresden, Baden, and other great centres of hospital work, and being greatly pleased with all he saw, determined—at first on a small scale—to introduce something of the same sort; but, before returning home, he went on to Paris, where he met a certain abbé who had founded both a brotherhood and a sisterhood for nursing. The two talked the matter over. Influenced by what he heard and saw, the director conceived the idea of establishing something similar in Vienna, and would certainly have done so, had not the abbé suddenly died. The project fell through; and at the present moment, the nursing is wretched, dirty, unprincipled, unreliable.

The nurses are taken from the streets, or from wherever they can be obtained, without a question of their fitness or training.

Their dress is a dirty, red-check, loose blouse, and when you look at them with their untidy hair and slipshod feet, you feel as though you were moved back more than half a century, and all the improvements were absolutely wiped out.

It is almost impossible for one individual to overlook the whole of so large a hospital, and much must be left to the honour and conscientiousness of the nurses; but from what we saw it was easy to perceive that they were quite unworthy of the trust.

The director told us he would welcome with delight any English lady of moderate means, clear head, with a talent for organisation, and well trained as a nurse, who would undertake the post of matron.

If only one of the many wards could be organised and managed as ours in London, it would be a beginning in the right direction.

The great ladies of Vienna—including the Empress herself—take no interest in the hospitals; and thus it is that few but the least educated of the women are nurses. Women of a higher class for the most part think the work beneath them, and so the organisation suffers.

We went through men's wards and women's wards, and were unfavourably impressed with all. The beds were arranged down each side, twenty-five or thirty in a ward, but the coverlets were unwholesome-looking, and, as in most German beds, the sheets did not tuck up at the bottom, and the bare, and in most cases dirty, feet of the patients protruded. The bedsteads, too, were wooden, and much too short. We asked why iron bedsteads were not used, being much more healthy, and heard that the managers thought them too barrack-looking.

In the midst of each ward stood a table, supposed to contain various useful appliances; but the arrangements were carried out in a very inefficient and primitive method indeed. Down each side of the wards ran a piece of matting, all awry, and before we could pass on, a thick ridge or stream of dirt had to be swept away, and this at four o'clock on a Sunday afternoon.

Outside each ward was a small kitchen or scullery, but how different to the spotless ones we have grown accustomed to! These looked as though they had not been cleansed or scrubbed for a week, and the various pans and utensils were equally dirty.

The patients who were well enough to do so, were walking about in greasy dressing-gowns. Altogether there was not one bright or pleasant thing to look at in the whole building.

This, like other hospitals, has certain rules, which, however, are quietly set aside; for example, the hours for visitors are from two to four o'clock, but the Sunday we were there going through the wards, although long past four, visitors were arriving, and those already there showed no signs of moving. Again, there is a rule to the effect that no eatables are to be brought to the patients; but, as we entered a ward, a father, who had come to see his sick child, hastily tried to hide a huge cake he had brought her, and the nurse standing by aided him by saying he was going to take it away again, which, however, we found he did not do.

This sort of thing must happen again and again, and, when the nurses are untrustworthy, they but help the visitors to break the laws, and undo the good work of the doctors, who can but visit their patients twice a day. I could not help thinking of what Florence Nightingale would have said had she been with us. And yet it was exactly from such a state of things that her energy rescued us.

The whole arrangements of the hospital cry aloud for inspection and improvement; for example, the food is neither bought nor prepared by the hospital authorities and their servants. The providing is farmed out—a plan which works very ill. The food is carried in large open baskets, and by the time it reaches the patients, it is cold and messy. The covered tins in which it is sent round are not supplied with hot water, even in the severest weather, and the pudding are carried across the gardens singly, which is worse.

The medicines, again, are contracted for by the chemists in Vienna, so that practically neither the kitchen nor the dispensary are under the hospital control.

The dispensary is a very large airy room, with several little rooms and lobbies leading out of it. The patients, if able to walk, are allowed to come down and take their own physic away with them, which seemed to us an extraordinarily bad plan.

There are very poor people, out-patients, who can get a prescription from an outside chemist and then come to the hospital to have it made up. Over a thousand a day avail themselves of this privilege, but there is no separate dispensary or waiting-room for them, so that in their coming in and going out, they mix with the in-patients, a state of things which would not be tolerated in a London hospital.

Here is a hospital in one of the finest cities of the world, with a director clever, conscientious, full of desire to cleanse and ennoble it, with doctors whose fame is known throughout Europe, with powers of working immense, calling for pity and reprobation, simply for the lack of a body of nurses, such as we possess in almost every London hospital.

We will go now to the Rudolph Stiftung, a fine hospital situate in the Rudolph Strasse, and where an altogether different state of things obtains.

It is built in the form of a square, with a beautiful garden in the centre. One side of the building is for men, another for women, a third for kitchens and offices, and a fourth for the dwellings of the medical men. The halls, staircases, and corridors are lofty, airy, and grand, and there is no sense of stuffiness or bad smells about any part of the building.

The wards are composed of two rooms, one large and one small, with a scullery, bath-room, and ante-room, all enclosed in a passage, with a door opening into the main corridor. The large rooms contain twenty-eight beds, the smaller six beds. Should an infectious illness break out, the wards are provided with double doors, so that one can be always kept shut. These wards are warmed by stoves burning coke and coal; they are lighted by windows on one side only, and kept pure by ventilating shafts high up near the ceiling.

The doctors—of whom there are seven head surgeons and physicians, and twenty-three assistants—make their visits from eight to nine in the morning; therefore no one is allowed in the wards except the sisters and nurses until these visits are over.

There are eight hundred and sixty beds in this hospital, nearly always occupied, for every class of disease is received. At the time of our visit, the hospital was so full that beds had to be put up in the corridors.

It has its own special fund, and is otherwise supported by the money paid for and by the patients. The annual cost of each bed is, on an average, about 300 guldens, or 25*l.*

But to speak of the nursing staff.

There is a matron, an assistant matron, seventy sisters, and from thirty to thirty-five nurses.

This is the first time I have seen a divided service—if I may so term it—in a nursing staff; for example, the matrons and sisters are Roman Catholics, either Servantes du Sacré Cœur, as the doctor told us, or Dienerinnen von Herrn Jesus, as the matron told us, and are answerable to their order alone. The nurses, on the contrary, belong to no order, may hold any creed, and are under the direction of the doctors, and not of the sisters. As far as cleanliness goes, or kindness and attention, this curious combination answers well; but in any emergency, it seems to me, it would greatly increase the difficulties.

We found the sisters courteous, and willing to answer questions to the best of their ability, but they could tell nothing of importance.

The sisters take it in turn to have twenty-four hours' rest, and twenty-four hours' work. They, together with the nurses, learn their work by daily experience in the wards. The monthly pay for their service is from 1*l.* to 1*l.* 3*s.* in money, their mid-day meal, and a penny a day for bread. Three sisters and three lay-nurses are told off to each set of wards.

There are separate dormitories for the sisters and nurses, which are shut off from the rest of the building by plate-glass doors; so that all appertaining to order and cleanliness is as it should be. The laundry-work is done out of the house by contract.

The sisters wear the dress of their order; but the nurses wear no special costume.

The patients are dressed in loose white shirts and jackets provided by the hospital.

In passing through the wards, I was startled to find my hand grasped by every patient that could get within reach of it, and carried to the lips with a "God greet thee." I got quite accustomed to it, however, before I left Vienna.

The bedding in this hospital is extremely good. Spring metal foundations, on which are thick soft mattresses in three portions, so that they can be the more easily cleansed and disinfected. The sheets were good, and the counterpanes clean and warm.

Taking it as a whole, this hospital left a pleasant impression upon us, and we owe many thanks to the director, who bestowed time and patience upon us in order that we might get a correct view of the hospital and its power of work.

And now for a view of the third and last type of nurses, viz., the Red Cross Sisters. These ladies are messengers of love and comfort, and their deeds by the sick-beds and on the battle-fields are often heroic. They arrange themselves under the banner of the Red Cross for the purpose of nursing, saving, recovering, and strengthening people's lives, and they do this because they love the work, and long to be of use in the world, and in order to do this well, they submit themselves to the most severe discipline and training. The very sight of them at their work inspires one with confidence, so orderly, clean, and gentle, are they.

The Empresses Augusta and Frederick of Germany have and do work under this banner, and have been heard to say that they thank God for His grace in permitting them to take part in so grand a work of love.

The Red Cross Hospital in Vienna is known as the Rudolfinerhaus. It is outside the city, and beautifully situate in the midst of a large garden, round which are various cottages, which were bought with the ground, and made use of for kitchens, superintendent's house, and wards for third class patients, until better could be built.

This hospital is supported partly by a society, whose members subscribe from three florins to a thousand yearly. Five thousand florins endows a bed for life, and a thousand for a year. There are now fifty beds, and, when the building is finished, there will be a hundred. There are eighteen Red Cross Sisters, and six pupils, or probationers. These last come a month on trial, to see if they are fitted for the work. If they remain, they receive, during the first year, board, lodging, dress, and 12*s.* a month; the second year the pay is increased to 30*s.* a month, and the third year to 40*s.*

The Red Cross Sisters are from all ranks of society, the refined and better-educated being selected where a choice is possible. Their dress is a blue and white striped washing costume, with a shoulder-cape edged with plain blue, a white band on left arm, on which a red cross is stamped, and an inscription worked round it, a brooch with a red cross on it, a white muslin cap without strings, and a white apron completes it.

The probationers have the same, with the exception of the cape, badge, and brooch, which are gained only after three years' service, and which constitute them as Red Cross Sisters.

In time of war this hospital will be devoted to wounded soldiers, and the Red Cross Sisters will be their nurses, for this is their special mission. In time of peace, as now, civilians are received with surgical and internal complaints, but no infectious or imbecile cases.

On Wednesdays and Saturdays lectures are given to the nurses, which some ladies of Vienna attend in order to learn something of nursing.

The patients are divided into first, second, and third class. The last of these pay 2*s.* 6*d.* a day, and have several beds in a ward.

The pavilion, containing the third class wards, is lighted from above, large, and airy. On the tables in the wards are all things necessary for use, such as bandages, medicines, and instruments, and being on india-rubber wheels, can be moved from bed to bed without noise. We are quite accustomed to these in London, but we had seen them nowhere in foreign hospitals before.

The pavilions are of wood, and are warmed by hot-water pipes.

In the summer the patients can be wheeled out on their beds into the gardens without the least difficulty, giving them pleasure and appetite for their food, and affording opportunity to the nurses of cleansing the wards.

The principal building—which is the nucleus of the large new one already planned—contains the first and second class patients, and is both imposing and handsome. The first class pay twelve shillings a day, and each patient has a separate room; the second class eight shillings a day, and are two in a room. All the rooms are warmed from the passages.

The first class rooms looked most comfortable, with stove, polished furniture, wardrobe, cosy bed, and pictures.

On the first floor is a large verandah, where the sick can sit in the summer and enjoy the garden, together with a splendid view of the mountains and woods.

The night sister has a little room in the corridor, where she watches all night. It is fitted up with electric bells, by means of which she can summon aid if required.

The staircases are broad and shallow, and easy to mount, which is a great advantage in a hospital.

The secretary told us that, as a rule, the women were more patient than the men, and that if the same operation were performed on a man and on a woman, the latter bore it better, and the result in her case was better. This is exactly opposite to what we find in London. The Baron Rothschild is a large contributor to this hospital.

If any who read this should have the opportunity of visiting this institution, I would say make use of it. It is perfect in its working and its workers. You cannot take them amiss, go in when you will, and you will find every one at his or her post. Secretary, doctors, matron, and nurses, all will be glad to see you.

LETTERS TO MY CHILDREN FROM THE EAST.

BY HENRY HARPER, AUTHOR OF "LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND," ETC.

III.—PILLARS OR HEAPS.

"Set thee up waymarks, make thee high heaps: set thine heart toward the highway, even the way which thou wentest: turn again, O virgin of Israel, turn again to these thy cities."—Jer. xxxi. 21.

THE prophet Jeremiah, who wrote these words, lived at a time of sore trial to the Jews.

A great king from a far country, a king of a terrible nation, had brought an immense army, and had overrun all the country, carried away the young men as captives, while he had killed with the sword vast numbers of people. This prophet of God, Jeremiah, had for long foretold all the evils which were coming on the nation; but neither they nor their rulers would listen to him, though God had sent him. Instead of turning back to God, and putting their trust in Him, they had fancied that an earthly king, he of Egypt, would deliver them from the power of the Chaldeans; but these hopes were vain. Their Egyptian friends were beaten in a great battle—that of Carchemish—and then the Jews lost all heart, and, knowing they would soon be taken away prisoners, thought that they should never see the loved land again. Despair took the place of presumption; it is ever so.

By many different ways, the prophet sought to teach the people, telling them of their danger. He besought them to leave off worshipping the foul and senseless idols they did worship; to put no trust in the heathen king of Egypt, but to return to the Lord God. He did various curious things, as we would say, but all Eastern people are used to teach by parables and signs, as we know our Lord Jesus did. So once this prophet summoned all the rulers and the people to come to him, to a place just outside Jerusalem, where he would show them something. Impelled by curiosity they came. To their surprise, they found the prophet with no book, no "sermon," but holding in his hands an earthen jar—a water-bottle. He called their attention to this, and then, raising it high above his head, dashed it into bits at his feet.

What a strange sight it must have been! Picture to yourselves the valley thickly crowded with people, the great wall of the city, and the proud towers of the temple, and above a bright blue sky, and there in the valley this solitary man, on whom all eyes were fixed, and then this strange action of his. Then he told them that as he had dashed the water-jar to bits, so would God dash their city and temple to pieces, and the people should be scattered like the broken pottery.

All this came true; but though he told them all these sad things, yet God had told him to say some comforting words to those who believed in Him, though they would be carried away prisoners to a strange land. The passage I have given is one of counsel; but in the tenth verse the prophet says that though God would "scatter" Israel, yet would He "gather" him again, and he further says that He will be their God. "He will forgive them, and remember their sins no more"—verses 33, 34.

Then they are told to set up "waymarks"; they are to make "high heaps." Remember they are to be carried away to a far distant land, to live amongst strangers, strangers in religion and speech. They had no maps in those days; no railways, no coaches, no roads even, so they are to set up their "heaps" to mark the way they went, so that they might know how to return. This was a most comforting thought to these poor captives, to think that their bondage would not last for ever: they were to have this hope of seeing the dearly loved land again. Though they went out "weeping," they were to come back with "joy." Children, you will find as the years go on, that the thought and the hope that the "trouble," or the "pain," will "soon be over," wonderfully helps us all to bear what men call "the ills of life."

PILLARS OR HEAPS.

When travelling in the desert, I often noticed how my Bedouin were guided by heaps of stones which marked the "way" we were to go, and noticed, too, that we never passed one of these heaps without every Arab picking up a stone to add to the "heap" to increase its size, and therefore its usefulness. At times the heaps were large, so that in sand-storms, or dark nights, they could yet distinguish it. Ah, sad too was it to see at one part of the desert, the "way" was marked out by the skeletons of camels, or of men bleached white by the sun, victims who had fallen by the "way" and died—such a true type of life; for one of the saddest things in life is to "remember" those we have loved and lost—"gone before." But then comes the comfort to us, as it did to those poor Israelites, that our "sorrow" is not to be for ever; we shall one day have the "joy" of reunion.

Often when I have wished to explore unknown tracks in the desert hills, I have made a small heap of stones, so that I would know the way back. Sometimes I would put a bit of paper under the top stone, to more effectually mark the place. I have seen this done by natives of the Upper Nile, when we have been exploring ruins; and that great traveller, W. G. Palgrave, who has explored so much of Central Arabia, and with whom it was my pleasure at one time in Eastern lands to spend several days, tells of a fearful desert he crossed. He says, "'The Red Desert' is never traversed by ordinary wayfarers without an apprehension which has too often been justified. Many have perished; whole caravans have been known to disappear." But one good Arab had, two years before, laden several camels with a prodigious quantity of stones, which he had thus conveyed midway across the sands, and then piled up in what the Arabs call a "Rejm," namely, a stone heap, or rough pyramid, between twenty-five and thirty feet high, forming a most desirable landmark in the pathless desert. Many a blessing had been bestowed on Aboo-'Eysa for his "Rejm"; and, better still, another Arab had copied him and put up a second "heap" farther on. And Palgrave tells how, when his party were lost and ready to die they saw the first heap, and then took courage, and were safely led out of the desert.

This is quite a picture of what the prophet wrote. He tells the Israelites to make "heaps," and then in God's own good time, after they had spent the years in exile he had decreed for their punishment, they should have "waymarks" to lead them back.

Children, if when we are in our sins, in the "far-away country," we repent and go back to our old standpoints, God will meet us, and lead us in the way. He will pardon and forgive all our sins. Oh, let us then set up a "high heap," —even His Word; study our Bible; realise His promises; let us turn our hearts towards the right "way"—even the Christ who came to this earth to save us, and though we may in the weary desert of this world often wander, yet if only we look to our "heap," our "tower," God will restore us; and we shall find in His Word many a landmark which He has set up, and many a "heap" of mercy to guide us back to Himself.

WILLIE WILLS' WINGS.

BY MRS. G. S. REANEY.

CHAPTER V.

IT was winter. Willie Wills looked a year or two older than when we saw him last, although it was only six months ago. The poor little fellow had had a sad time of it. The more determined he was "to be good, and never to tell untruths," the more angry he made his parents. They constantly told the little fellow that he was useless to them in their trade if he did not do as they did; and as this meant being always ready with a falsehood, Willie more and more shrank from the work, and was always nervously anxious lest he might be called upon suddenly to do something which would make him miserable afterwards. This nervous anxiety, and the really cruel treatment he continually received, made poor Willie quite ill. Oh, how often he longed for a friend like Miss Simmonds! He never forgot what he had learnt at her class. Once he had written to tell her a little about himself. It was a quaint little note.

"DEAR MISS,—

"I hope this finds you well as it leaves me at present. We are still travelling. Father is quite well again, and mother tried to be a teetotaler, but she broke down in the Fair here, and I'm very glad that I've made up my mind never to touch drink. Poor mother! I'm so sorry for her, and father too! Please think of us all when you say your prayers. I'm sorry I can't give no address; but we're bound for London, certain, so if you write to the big post office there, maybe they'll keep the letter till I come.

"Your much grateful,
"WILLIE WILLS."

"I say the Shepherd hymn night and morning, and I want more than I ever did to be a boy-angel on earth; but travelling about makes it hard, I think, for the wings to grow. I do wish I had a real home; but there's Heaven left, if I never get another!"

This letter gave Rose Simmonds a great deal of pleasure. Her class had grown to six boys, and every Sunday they talked about and prayed for Willie Wills. Rose's only sorrow was that she had no better address to which to send an answer to Willie than the General Post Office, London.

Willie had a bad cold. They had been for ten days in a large city in the south of England; but for more than a week Willie had been too ill to go from door to door with his father and mother. For a day or two it was warm enough to sit out in the court where the lodging-house at which they were stopping stood, to get a little fresh air, and watch the boys and girls in their rough play; but when December came in with a sharp frost, Willie was glad to stay indoors and amuse himself by minding the landlady's baby; for this kindly office Willie had sometimes a copper given him, or a little drink of milk.

One day, Mrs. Jones, the landlady, came into the room where Willie sat nursing her baby, and said abruptly—

"Willie, lad, where do your father and mother go when they leave here?"

"Please, ma'am, I don't know," replied Willie languidly.

He had lost all interest in family plans. He seldom heard his parents discuss them now, for he was generally asleep before they came in to settle down for the night, and he was up and out of the room before they got about in the morning.

Poor, lonely, desolate little Willie! He had—since too weak to work—always felt in the way. Nothing he dreaded more than to hear the step of his people upon the stairs, and be still up and about. If in bed they took but little notice of him; but if up they spoke cruelly to him about being lazy, and shirking work. Willie would keep out of the way while they were having their meals, stealing in after they had gone, to help himself from the broken pieces left in the cupboard.

Hence it happened that Willie knew nothing of his parents' movements.

The landlady sat down upon a chair, and took her baby on her knee.

"Little Willie," she said, not unkindly, "you're a poor little fellow, and I'm awful sorry for you; but I'm not able to provide for other folk's children, with enough and to spare of my own, and a delicate husband in the bargain."

Willie opened his eyes. He failed to see the drift of the landlady's remark.

"Maybe you won't be surprised to hear," she continued, "that your folks left the town at four o'clock this morning. As you can't do them any service now, they thought well to leave you behind them."

"Gone—gone? Have they left me all alone?" said Willie.

Weak, and tired, and faint, what wonder that he burst into tears! Yes, it was hard to be constantly flogged, and more often cruelly tormented; but even that seemed "company." To be left behind seemed so lonely, so desolate! Willie's sobs came as well as his tears.

"There, dearie, don't take on so; we'll find them yet maybe," said the kind-hearted landlady, catching hold of Willie's hand and drawing him towards her, as in see-saw fashion she was trying to comfort her baby, who had commenced crying when Willie began.

But for a time Willie refused to be comforted. He had taken the landlady's statement for granted; but now his only hope came in asking her who told her. Was it not all a mistake? Alas, the landlady had learnt from another lodger that Mrs. Wills had fully planned to leave her useless weak boy behind her, hoping the workhouse would give him shelter when the landlady tired of him, &c., &c.

"You are welcome to stay for a few days, Willie," said the landlady. "You have been very kind to baby——"

For answer Willie gave baby a hug. And thus it happened that for a little while Willie made his home with strangers.

CHAPTER VI.

FIVE weeks had passed. Willie began to lose hope of his parents coming back to him, although this was at first his settled conviction. The days had followed each other in rapid succession. Willie had shared the bed of one of the landlady's boys, a lad much older than himself, out at work. He had had his meals with the family, and for many reasons had not, while still weak and ill, felt in the way; but, as he grew stronger, he was afraid, with his increased appetite, he brought more cares to the kind-hearted landlady, upon whom the chief burden of the family's support depended; and when one day he heard the delicate husband say fretfully to his wife, "How much longer are you going to house that youngster Willie? Why don't you ship him to the poorhouse?" Willie's mind was made up—he must move on—anywhere, anywhere, but not to the workhouse. He was afraid to tell his intention lest they should overrule his plans and make him after all a workhouse boy. He took baby for a last walk, taking care to go to a waste piece of ground, where he and baby could sit down and have a friendly talk quite undisturbed upon a heap of rubbish.

"Baby, baby, your Willie's going to leave you," he said, taking baby's two hands in his and looking lovingly into her blue eyes. "Did you know, dearie, what going away means? Baby will have mother to love her and pussy to play with, but Willie—poor, poor Willie—has no mother to love him and no pussy to have games with!"

Baby listened and crowed until she saw Willie's tears flowing, and then her lip fell and she began to cry too. In a moment Willie forgot himself and his sorrow (which a few minutes ago had seemed more than his heart could bear), and he began to laugh to divert baby's attention. He picked up a broken plate from the rubbish upon which they sat and very cleverly contrived to make his fingers dance at the back of it, only appearing now and again round the broken edge. Baby laughed gleefully, swayed her little body backwards and forwards and was so funny in her glee that Willie laughed because baby laughed—quite unconscious that he was teaching the world a beautiful lesson—namely, that our greatest sorrows melt away and disperse as morning clouds before the uprising of the sun, when the sunshine of tender pity and gentle love for others comes to a human heart burdened with grief, and self is forgotten in patient ministry to those who, in their turn, take us into the partnership of new-found joys.

Willie stayed out some hours with baby. It was Mrs. Jones' washing day, and he knew this would both help and please her. At length it was time to go in for a meal; baby had had a brief sleep in Willie's arms, and had awoke a little cold and fretful, although too much accustomed to this outdoor life to take real harm. Willie retraced his steps homewards very silent, excepting for the involuntary hugs which he from time to time gave baby. At length they reached the court, and Mrs. Jones welcomed them with kindly smiles and hearty words. To Willie she gave a cup of tea and a crust of bread-and-butter; to baby some milk and water sop, making the former draw near the fire while she nursed the latter upon her knee. The invalid husband was in a kindly mood, and praised Willie for being such a good nurse to baby. Hence it happened that when a little later Willie stole out into the darkness, he took with him the happiest memories of those who had in a time of need proved so truly friendly.

Willie took up his stand at the end of a street which Mrs. Jones' son came down in returning home from work. His plans were all made. He had said good-bye to baby; but he would not leave good Mrs. Jones in suspense. Hence when Jim—her son—appeared in sight, Willie drew him on one side and said—

"Tell your mother, Jim, that I'm off to find father. If I don't come back to-morrow or next day tell her to make up her mind it's all well. And, please, thank her and everyone for being so good to me!" Willie ran off before Jim could ask any questions and was on his way to the heart of the city when Mrs. Jones received her message. It cost that good woman a night's rest. She could not sleep thinking of Willie—but as her husband had been urging her to make plans to get rid of him there seemed nothing to do but to wait and hope for the best. In the long hours of that weary night Mrs. Jones thought again and again of little Willie's strange sayings and doings. His patience and gentleness under severe provocation, when his father and mother treated him cruelly, had led Mrs. Jones to say many times to her husband, "Bless the lamb; there's something in him and his nice ways which makes one think of heaven, where there's no noise, but everything peaceful like!" And to-night, as she lay thinking of him, she could not help recalling many of the things which Willie had said and done, and she "put up" a very earnest prayer from her heart that the child might come to no grief, and that she and hers might grow "more thoughtful like" about better things. Thus did Willie's angel-wings flap themselves with gentle, beautiful influence as they bore him away to a new home and new friends.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. X.

One word from each text will give a blessed assurance.

1. Whoso loveth wisdom rejoiceth his father.—Prov. xxix. 3.
2. The word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak.—Num. xxii. 38.
3. The Lord will give strength unto His people.—Psa. xxix. 11.
4. In Thee, O Lord, do I put my trust.—Psa. xxxi. 1.
5. Blessed are the pure in heart.—Matt. v. 8.
6. Blessed are the peacemakers.—Matt. v. 9.
7. O give thanks unto the Lord.—Psa. cxxxvi. 1.
8. He shall give His angels charge over thee.—Psa. xci. 11.
9. My soul shall be joyful in the Lord.—Psa. xxxv. 9.
10. Hold Thou me up, and I shall be safe.—Psa. cxix. 117.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

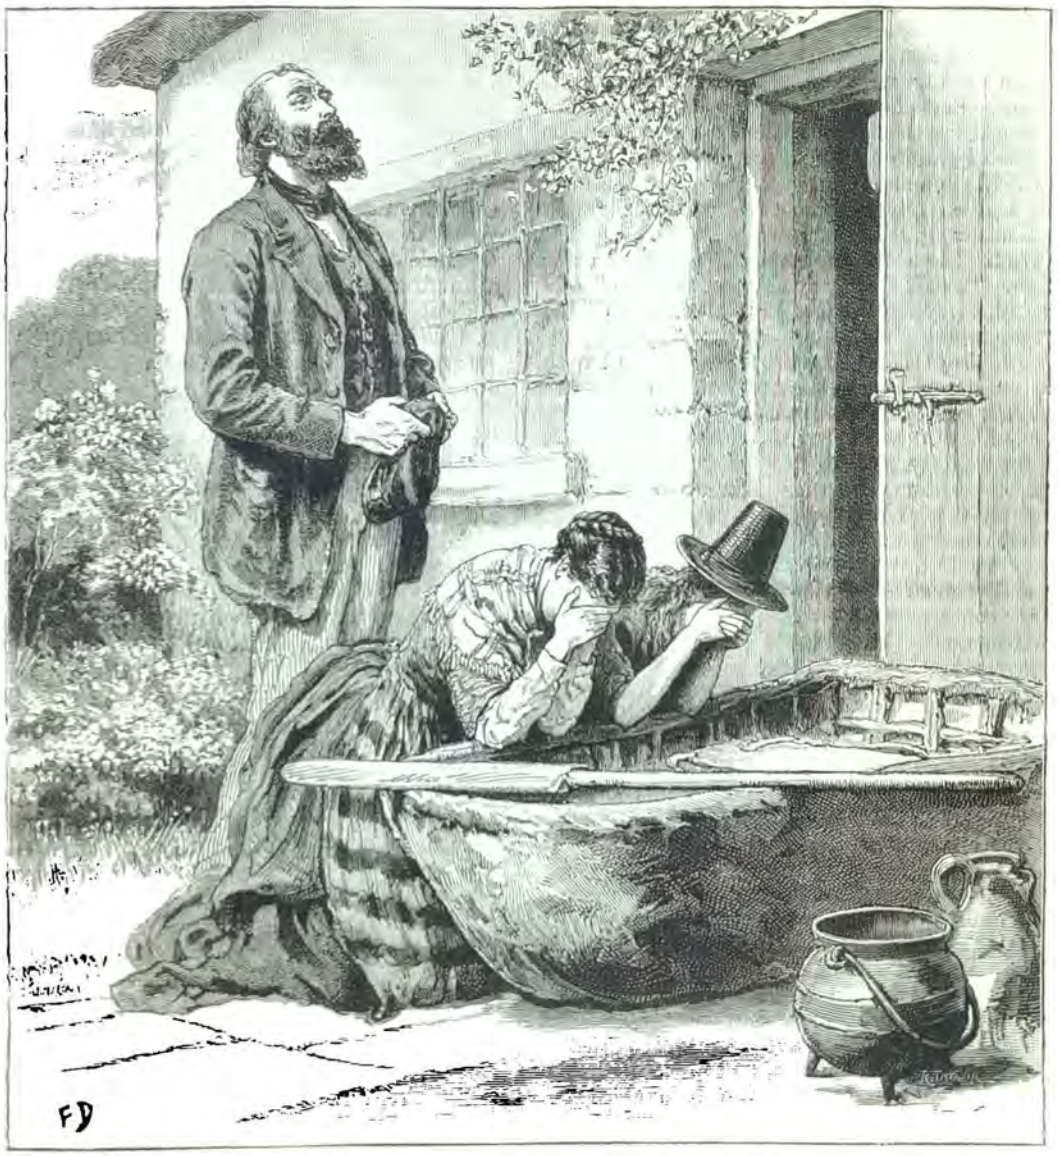
OLD GWEN.

CHAPTER II.—THE FLITTING.



"LET US PRAY BEFORE WE LEAVE," SAID UNCLE LABAN.

A MOVE, even if it is a move for the better, is always a melancholy matter. Still, it stirs up dormant energies, and even poor Tisha's were aroused at sight of her dismantled cottage. Her brother-in-law, Joshua, had made short work of the preparations, having no time to spare, and his nephews and nieces aided him vigorously.

Young Gwen, who had a turn for management, had ruthfully begun by the beloved corner-cupboard; and when her mother saw tumblers and wine-glasses, china ornaments and spoons, about to be consigned to a clothes-basket, she jumped out of the bed to which she had condemned herself for several months, and with her favourite sentence, "There's unfeeling you are!" snatched from the hands of Gwenny a wonderful sheep with a very green tree growing out of its back.

In another moment she had taken from Dorcas an equally amazing piece of workmanship in the shape of a man and woman under an umbrella, that the children were wont to designate, father and mother.

Although her costume was peculiar, she was by no means undressed, seeing she had shawls and petticoats ad libitum about her. But Dorcas, who was the genteel and thoughtful member of the household, with a certain inborn tact, whispered that she had "better put on her shoes and stockings, because Uncle Joshua would be here directly minute." She accordingly submitted to be led into a small inner room where the boys slept, and as Dorcas shut to the door, she was heard moaning, "My poor Toom."

"We'll leave the china and ornaments for mother. 'Twill do her good to pack them," said Gwenny, carrying the bee-hive chair outside the cottage.

The little garden and path were crowded with furniture, and Uncle Joshua and David were surveying it. The cart was close by, and the pony quietly browsing at no great distance. It was, fortunately, a fine day.

"Uncle Joshua, you must take up mother and the small things first," said managing Gwenny. "You'll never get done if you leave her and the chaney behind. Mamgu is at home to receive her, and we can send the fowls and pigs along. Mother could never be walking so far, and she'll go willing with those blessed ornaments. When I'm marrying, I'll never have a corner-cupboard. I say 'tis wicked to put things as can't feel before things as can."

"Your mother has had sore trials, Gwenny," replied Uncle Joshua reproachfully, and Gwenny hung her head. "You should pray to the Lord to increase her faith and patience. He has been very merciful to you all, and given you 'food and raiment' through your troubles."

"I do pray, uncle, indeed I do," said Gwenny.

Meanwhile the quieter Dorcas had persuaded her mother to dress, and she re-appeared in linsey gown, apron and shawl, to the no small delight of Shonny, who overwhelmed her with caresses.

"There's nice you look, mother!" exclaimed Gwenny. "Now if you and Dorcas 'll pack the chaney, we'll do all the rest, and uncle will take you up first. You can lay the breakables between the clo'es. I'll turn out the draws."

Tisha began to cry, but astute Gwen stayed the tear on the lid, by attacking the contents of the corner-cupboard. Tisha was rather an interesting-looking woman now that she was properly dressed, and, though pale and wan, had the remains of beauty. Seated on Shonny's three-legged stool by the clothes-basket, she received her treasures from Dorcas, while Gwenny emptied a chest of drawers and sundry boxes of clothes and linen, in the contents of which she carefully wrapped them. The dresser was also dismantled, and Gwen counted twenty jugs of all conceivable forms and patterns, which were stowed into the empty boxes. By degrees Tisha forgot herself and her troubles, and became interested in her work of packing.

Meanwhile Uncle Joshua and the boys had much difficulty in catching the majestic cock and his small harem of wives. Doubtless they feared they were to be taken to market instead of to old Gwen's homestead. There was also a brood of young chickens that gave them much trouble; but Shonny, who had his wits about him and knew more of birds and animals than did his uncle, who had been a carrier all his life, caught the hen first, and then her "cluck cluck" drew the witless chickens about her. He attracted the tame pigeons by a handful of grain, and finally, by a masterly management, much admired by his uncle, deposited the feathered fowl in a crate where they had not too much room, and made a commensurate amount of noise. The pigeons were placed in a basket by themselves.

Uncle Joshua passed in and out of the cottage a hundred times to watch the progress of Tisha, and at last, out of all patience, exclaimed, "If you don't finish up that tomfoolery, you must carry up your goods yourself, for I can't wait any longer."

"There's unfeeling you are! The things I've had ever since——" sobbed Tisha.

"Never mind, mother. We'll pack the plates and dishes against the next load," interrupted Dorcas. "Go you out with Uncle Joshua."

Tisha obeyed, and a drooping reed of a woman she looked, as she followed her stalwart brother-in-law. The cart was already partly full. The live-stock occupied the back portion of it; the bee-hive chair the centre; and the rest was left for Tisha's special treasures.

"Get you in first, Tish fach," said Uncle Joshua kindly, and uplifted her into the cart. "Sit you down in the chair. I've fastened it famous."

Tisha sat down, and no sooner was she duly established, than the two girls brought out the clothes-basket, enveloped in a blanket. Tisha uprose in excitement, and superintended the placing of her valuables before her in the cart.

"Suppose the little mare should kick," she suggested.

"She never did kick in her life. Why for should she begin now," returned Uncle Joshua. "You should think more of the Lord's mercies, and less of your furniture, sister-law. You have a good house to go to, and good children to take care of you, and He, when on earth, 'knew not where to lay His head.'"

"True for you, brother Joshua, but 'tis hard to change all the same," returned Tisha.

Every cranny of the cart was filled, and Tisha was soon surrounded by such light articles of furniture as would not endanger either her, the bee-hive chair, or the crate containing the poultry. When all was completed, the little mare was duly harnessed, and the family party stood to witness the first move. It was a pretty and pathetic scene. Tisha was crying piteously, and even the resolute Gwenny had tears in her eyes. Shonny was howling, and Snap whining for company, while David and Dorcas stood a little apart, trying to comfort one another. A cloud suddenly passed over the face of the sun, as if for sympathy, and the grim old castellated rock looked mournfully down upon the family it had known so long and so well.

At this moment a stranger appeared, a tourist apparently, who paused at a little distance, to look on. Snap snarled at him, and the rest glanced at him from their tearful eyes; for strangers did not often come that way. He was a thick-set man of middle height, dressed in a tweed suit, with a broad wideawake on his head. A short pipe protruded from a mouth hidden by a bushy beard, and he carried a knapsack over his shoulder. There was nothing remarkable in his appearance, and had he not approached David and Dorcas, he would have attracted no further notice. But he was inquisitive, and asked the children several questions concerning the neighbourhood, and especially the great rock that frowned in the distance.

"How am I to get to the top of it?" he enquired.

"By yonder path for short, please, sir; or by the lane mother's just going" replied Dorcas.

"What are you all crying about?" he asked.

"Because we are going away from here," answered David sturdily, for he objected to being questioned.

"What is your name, my lad?"

"David Gwillim."

"Gwillim?" repeated the stranger. "Is that your father?" pointing to Uncle Joshua.

"No, sir. That's my uncle. But I can't answer no more questions, because we're changing house," replied David resolutely, for he had sense enough to parry questions concerning his father.

"I dare say I shall see you again. There's something for you," said the tourist, putting a coin into David's hand, and walking off at full speed.

"Did you see the rings on his fingers, and the pin in his tie? I'm sure they were diamonds," said Dorcas.

"Hullo, sir! hullo! You've been giving me a sovereign instead of a shilling," shouted David, racing after the stranger, just as Uncle Joshua cracked his whip and said "Gee up, Nanno."

"Keep it," returned the stranger, without looking round.

But David overtook him and laid hold of his coat.

"They'll say I've been stealing it, sir, and put me in jail. Please take it back," said David. "We are praying every day to have our hearts turned from the love of riches, and Mamgu 'ould be angry if I took it."

"Give it to your mother," said the man, pausing a moment.

"None of us 'ould have it, sir. Thank you all the same, but there it is, for I mustn't stay any longer."

The boy dropped the money on the ground, as if afraid of some unseen tempter, and ran back to the house. The man picked up the sovereign and put it into his waistcoat pocket. Doing so, the pipe dropped from his mouth and broke. He uttered some sort of exclamation in a hoarse voice, and stood to watch the family party at the cottage.

"Not accept a sovereign!" he muttered, as he thought of the tearful eyes he had just seen, and gazed after the cart. He got a side view of Tisha in the bee-hive chair, of Uncle Joshua with his whip in his hand, encouraging Nanno; of Snap jumping at Nanno's nose but never catching it; and of Shonny, holding by the back of the cart. When the little procession disappeared, he turned towards the cottage, but the trio left behind had disappeared also. They were busy packing. A heavy cloud hung over the scene, and Careg Cennin frowned ominously.

"It is going to pour," he muttered, and cut across the grass towards the lane up which he had seen the cart and horse toiling.

He met a labouring man who appeared to be making for the cottage, and who touched his hat with a "good day" He arrested him to make some enquiries concerning the weather: then he asked "what was up?" as he expressed it, at the cottage below.

"They are changing house, sir," said the man, who was Laban, old Gwen's fourth son. "I'm just hurrying down to help them."

"They seem in great trouble?"

"No call to be in trouble. They're only going to live with their grandmother, and will do very well. But women make a fuss over everything."

"Is their father dead?"

"Well, not that I know of. Good day, sir."

If the stranger was inquisitive, certainly his interlocutors were reticent enough. The fact was, that none of old Gwen's numerous descendants cared to talk of poor Toom. He was the only blot on their escutcheon.

But Laban did not stay for more interrogatories. He hastened to the cottage, where he was received with a shout of welcome by his nephew and nieces.

"Now, uncle, we can get out the corner-cupboard, and take the bedstead to pieces," cried Gwenny.

Laban was a carpenter and had brought his tools; so, long before the mare and cart returned for a fresh load, the carved panels of the bedstead were out, and the posts tied ignominiously together, while the beloved cupboard was somewhat roughly extracted from its corner.

"Take care of the glass, please, uncle," said Dorcas. "It 'ould break mother's heart if the diamond panes were broken."

"I'll put 'em in again. Talk o' diamonds! I've just seen a chap covered with 'em. I wonder somebody don't murder him."

David repeated the episode of the sovereign.

"Mamgu says that the love of money is the root of all evil," put in Dorcas sententiously.

"Evil must be a big tree by this time!" ejaculated shrewd Gwenny, tugging at a feather bed. But Uncle Laban, who was a thoughtful man, said that perhaps the stranger had been moved by the Lord to help them in their trouble, though David was right not to take so large a sum. All old Gwen's sons were, more or less, "preachers of righteousness."

The cart returned in due time, Shonny seated by his uncle's side as whip, and Snap, with canine perseverance, still jumping at Nanno's nose. The patience or indifference of that beast of burden was, as Joshua was wont to say, "a lesson to the rest of us." But then Nanno was always well treated, and Snap's intentions were more amiable than his actions. Many human Snaps do what they declare they never intended.

Again Nanno was unharnessed and permitted to poke her oft-attacked nose into the tender spring grass, and eat as much as she could in a brief space. Nanno was accustomed to make the best of the situation. Certainly her patience was put to the proof ere long, as well as her strength of muscle. Uncle Joshua piled up the goods in the cart with an accustomed hand, and it was no wonder that Dorcas asked solemnly:

"Will Nanno ever get the load up the hill?"

"Of course she will if we all push behind," was the reply.

Truly beds and bedsteads, chairs and tables, pots and pans, were piled one upon another higgledy-piggledy, apparently; but Joshua and Laban had tied everything securely, so that when Nanno was again torn from the sweet grass and put to, she made light of the load at her back.

"Furniture ain't so heavy as flesh, Dorcas. Nanno 'ould rather be carrying that load than all you girls and boys. You must bring up the rest by hand, and you girls had best stop and see to it. Laban and David 'll come back for the coracle and the pig," said Uncle Joshua.

"And puss! we must find her: though she 'ont stop anywhere but here,"said Gwenny.

She and Dorcas stood at the cottage door to watch the last load. They saw the uncles and nephews "pushing behind" when they reached the steep lane, and then they lost sight of them. There succeeded a violent outcry for puss, who had been watching proceedings at a safe distance, in other words from the pig-stye; for she and the pig were friends. She sometimes condescended to share his meal when it contained any savoury ingredient. She crept furtively forth, and was soon in the arms of her favourite Dorcas, who shut her up in the inner room of the cottage, which was quite empty, while she and Gwenny busied themselves with collecting a few odds and ends that had been left amongst the straw. Evening came on, and they were still at this work.

"Will mother ever survive it?" asked Dorcas.

"Of course she will. She'll be all the better for the move," replied Gwen.

"Can I be of any help?" were words that suddenly arrested the two girls, and the tourist who had given David the sovereign stood before them.

"No, thank you, sir. We've done," replied Gwenny curtly, who thought no more of strangers than of friends, because she had had a great deal to do with them up at the castle.

"I just came back to ask whether you would accept the money your brother refused," he said, offering the golden bait.

"Thank you, sir, but we aren't paupers, and we all earn our own living. We're much obliged, I'm sure, but we've done nothing for you," said Gwenny. "If you're wanting to see the castle and the well, one of us will show you over it, and then you can pay us if you like. But we don't want more than sixpence or a shilling for that."

Gwenny never knew what to do with her hands and arms when they were unemployed, which was not often. She could not place them akimbo before so grand a gentleman, so she put them behind her, while she examined his face with more of scrutiny than politeness. His eyes fell before hers, and he looked uncomfortable. What was visible of his face between the wideawake and beard was very pale, and she thought he must have been ill, and was probably "touring" for his health, as so many people did who had more money than they knew what to do with.

"When people change house they generally want money," he muttered, avoiding Gwen's eyes. "Why do you all refuse it?"

"Because the love of it is the root of all evil," broke in Dorcas unexpectedly.

"Who's coracle is that?" he asked, pointing to the boat that lay close by, awaiting the return of Laban.

"Father's."

"Where is he?"

"He's away from home just now," said Gwenny, and as she thus evaded the question, Uncle Laban re-appeared, and the inquisitive stranger hurried off.

He did not go far, however, but stood behind a neighbouring tree, watching the little party. His place of concealment was within earshot, so that he heard most of their conversation.

"Take care of father's coracle, uncle," said Gwenny, as the trio stood before the time-honoured vessel bearing that ancient name.

This remnant of the usages of the ancient Britons is a sort of oval canoe, formed of basket-work and covered with a hide or leather, or sailcloth, and is so light that the fishermen carry it on their backs. Being only about four feet in length and three in width, it manages to navigate the rapid, rock-encumbered rivers of Wales, where larger boats would not venture to intrude. Formerly, as we have already said, the fisherman made a good living by catching sewen or small salmon with which some of the rivers abound; but in these days owners of land preserve their rivers in order to improve the salmon, and what was once freely permitted now becomes poaching.

"Let us pray before we leave," said Uncle Laban, who was a sort of local preacher or missionary in his district, and much respected as a truly Christian and God-fearing man.

The two girls knelt down by the coracle, and placing their elbows on its edge, covered their eyes with their hands. Laban stood behind them. His prayer was short and impressive, and spoken with the rhythmic roll of the grand old Welsh tongue. Translated, the substance was as follows:—

"Bless, oh Almighty God, our goings out and our comings in. Protect those who are widowed and orphaned before their time. Grant that if the husband and father is innocent, his innocence may be proved. Oh God! we believe him innocent, but Thou alone knowest the truth. Justify him, oh Lord. Behold his children! behold yon empty house! Behold the means of his living. Bring him back to us, and forgive his enemies, for Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

The girls, who were sobbing audibly, repeated the "Amen," and rose from their knees. As if to calm their grief, they hurried into the house; Laban took up the coracle and placed it lengthwise on his back, saying to himself that Joshua had promised to come back for the pig. Dorcas came out first, a basket in one hand containing the cat, a bundle in the other. Gwenny followed laden with more baskets and bundles. She locked the door, saying that she would give up the key with the arrears of rent, which the landlord had promised to wait for.

Laban led the way with the coracle on his back, which looked like a big tortoise, and the girls followed slowly; while the stranger watched the melancholy little procession up the lane beneath the gigantic rock.

Gwenny and Dorcas continued to cry silently, and when Uncle Laban turned suddenly and perceived their tears, he paused a few moments to comfort them. He was a tender-hearted man, and loved his nieces almost as much as his own children.

"Cheer up, my dears," he said; "if the Lord will, you may return some day to Cabon Afon."

"That's what I am thinking," replied Dorcas. "Only—only—poor father! It seems as if you must be father there in his coracle."

"I am sure I will take his place, God willing," said Laban. "But you have your duties to do, my dears. You must try to support your mother, who is feeble, and to help your grandmother, who is old. Think of the commandment with promise, 'Honour thy father and thy mother.' God has blessed us as a family, because we have been always clinging to one another and doing what we could for mother. Follow her example, my dears; she remembered her Creator in the days of her youth, and now she is old He does not depart from her."

"We will try, Uncle Laban," returned Gwenny and Dorcas, and somehow their hearts were lightened.

THE LATE ION KEITH FALCONER.

ION KEITH FALCONER was a genuine growth of these later days. The muscularity, the philanthropy, the Christian zeal, of which we have seen so many examples in different directions, united in him. He was one of the noblest types of the new revival. The spirit which has sent men forth from the universities, and from rich and cultivated homes, to labour in squalid city streets, or on the missionary field, was strong upon him. He combined physical energy with intellectual vigour, and all that he had of personal or social advantage he gave to the service of God and his fellows. There is a beautiful naturalness, so to say, in his life—no hint of painful effort or of self-denying virtue, but a simple faith which makes its devotion appear a matter of course.

His Biography should be read by young men of every calling, but it has its lessons also for older people. It is exceptionally good, full and yet proportioned, reserved in its praises, and yet leaving the impression of a rare and vigorous personality. It was fitting that such a career should have its memorial, and be chronicled by a discerning friend.[1]

The third son of the Earl of Kintore, himself a man of faith and good works, Ion Keith Falconer was born in 1856, at Edinburgh. His childhood was spent at the family seat in Aberdeenshire. There is a singular foreshadowing of the future man in the recollections of those early years. An old nurse describes how from the very first she was struck with his extreme unselfishness and consideration for others. "He was always eager to give up to his brothers and sisters; if anything was to be shared among them, he would say, 'Give it to the others first, I will wait.' . . . He never required to be amused like most children, but was always full of resources in himself—reading was at all times, and above all things, his delight. From the time when he was about five years old, he used on Sunday afternoons to read the Bible to the other children and explain it; and his elder brother and he were in the habit of reading and praying together. When he was about seven, he began to go and read the Bible in the cottages, and the people were perfectly amazed at his knowledge of the Bible and his power of explaining it. He did this entirely without suggestion from any one, and never talked of it to any one; it was only from the people themselves that it was found out. His old nurse used then to say that she was sure he would one day be a missionary. He was so much loved by every one, that he went by no other name in the household than that of 'the angel.' He was as generous then as he was in later years. When out walking, he could not pass ragged or hungry-looking persons without emptying his pockets for them; and when all his money was gone he would save up biscuits and the like and give them away. Before he received his allowance of pocket-money, he always carefully planned how every penny was to be spent, and faithfully adhered to his scheme. He once saved up to buy some ginger-nuts, which were his favourite weakness, for himself, and went down to Inverurie to buy them; but on the way back, he met a hungry-looking boy, and promptly bestowed them all on him. Of such things he would never speak . . . . He did it all, as the nurse said, 'just as if it were his ordinary work.'"

[1] Memorials of the Hon. Ion Keith Falconer, M.A. Late Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge, and Missionary to the Mohammedans of Southern Arabia. By the Rev. Robert Sinker, B.D., Librarian of Trinity College. Deighton, Bell and Co., Cambridge.

Not less remarkable was his early interest in the story of the Cross, and all that pertained to it. At thirteen he was sent to Harrow. There, the master in whose house he resided being witness, his "boyish life was noticeable from the first for marked individuality and determination." "He was one of those boys, not too common, who are not afraid to have the courage of their opinions. Always high principled and religious, he never disguised his views . . . . Not that he was anything of a prig or Pharisee, far from it. He was an earnest, simple-hearted, devout, Christian boy." In harmony with this testimony are the words of a schoolfellow: "His religion was by no means self-contained, personal and passive. He longed to make others better, and he took an earnest, and, as he rose in the school, an authoritative part against those forms of 'evil communications,' which are always present in greater or less degree in every assemblage of boys."

In later years his affection for Harrow bore fruit in the Kintore prizes for Scripture study, which he was instrumental in founding.

On leaving Harrow, Keith Falconer went to reside at Hitchin, in the house of the Rev. Lewis Hensley, a senior wrangler of earlier date, in order to prepare himself for his mathematical course at Cambridge. It was while he was here that his elder brother died, and the first great sorrow of his life befell him. The nature of his sympathies appeared in many acts of quiet service amongst the poor of the town. He was fond of visiting them in their cottages, and would often speak a kindly word to rouse them to serious thought; and "often by the bed-side of the sick and infirm would he sing and read to them, cheering and comforting many a weary soul, and not forgetting to help those in distress with his purse." The same spirit was shown after his removal to Cambridge. "During the nine years he was in residence with me," testifies his landlady, "his sole aim seemed to be to benefit all needing help, whether friends or strangers. He would frequently bring in those he met accidentally in his walks, give them refreshment, better clothing or money, and start them in fresh spirits."

Bicycles were just coming into fashion when Keith Falconer entered the university. It was at Hitchin that he obtained that mastery of the machine which made him afterwards the champion rider of England. This bicycling became his favourite exercise, and brought his indomitable will into popular esteem. It was in 1874 that Keith Falconer's name was entered in the books of Trinity College. Here is a fragment from a letter written scarcely two months later:

"Yesterday was the ten-mile bicycle race—three started, I was one. I ran the distance in thirty-four minutes, being the fastest time, amateur or professional, on record. . . . To-day I am going to amuse the public by riding an 86-inch bicycle to Trumpington, and back. There is a little scale of steps up it, up which I am helped, and then started off and left to myself. It is great fun, riding this leviathan: it creates such an extraordinary sensation among the old dons who happen to be passing."

More characteristic is the following, of a few months later date:

"The bicycle race at Lillie Bridge has been postponed. . . I went to stay with my antagonist for a few days, and took him and his mother and his aunt to Spurgeon's on Sunday. They were slightly astonished to see such a mass of people all riveted for nearly an hour. Moody and Sankey will probably hold a meeting in his tabernacle. I shall go to hear them, I hope. I expect it will be glorious."

In stature, Keith Falconer rose six feet three inches; his kindly voice and radiant face, that a manly pensiveness often overshadowed, live in the recollection of his friends. He never allowed his bicycling to interfere with his reading, but regarded athletic exercises as means to the sana mens in sano corpore, whereby a man might be better fitted for the discharge of any duties. But his feats were not few; and some perhaps were such as could only be justified by his possession of unusual powers of physical endurance. Once he rode all the way from Cambridge to Bournemouth, a distance of nearly one hundred and fifty miles, between dawn and darkness. He won in numerous races, the one that probably excited most interest being the five miles, in which he competed with John Keen, the professional champion, and won by five yards, the time being 15 minutes 11$\frac{2}{5}$ seconds; but the next year he won also in the twenty miles race, the time being 1 hour 4 minutes 15$\frac{3}{4}$ seconds, which at that time was the fastest on record. On the day of this race, we are told that "he was studying hard all the morning, and forgot that he had to race; and it was not until all the other competitors were at the starting-post ready to start that he rushed into the dressing-room, changed his clothes as quickly as possible, and mounted for the race. He rode several miles before he recovered his breath." Three years later he won in the 50 miles Bicycle Union Amateur Championship race, at the Crystal Palace, beating by seven minutes all previous records, in 2 hours 43 minutes and 58$\frac{3}{5}$ seconds. Amongst his other achievements was a ride in 1882, from the Land's End to John o' Groat's house—"994 miles in thirteen days less forty-five minutes," an average of 76 to 77 miles a day. Such facts help us to measure the energy which he carried into nobler spheres of effort.

Another accomplishment of his leisure hours was shorthand, which he taught himself, and in which he acquired remarkable dexterity both as to speed and accuracy. It was turned to serviceable account on many public occasions, as well as in his private studies. The article on this subject in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," was written by him.

In his career as student, Keith Falconer also won honourable distinction. Many a man might be found of profounder scholarship, or of wider range in thought or knowledge; but he brought an ever-growing store to the tasks he set himself. A characteristic incident is narrated of his "Little-go" examination. On the day before it was to take place, a fellow-student, finding he was to sit by his side, wrote to him, asking him to give him a few hints as need might require and secret opportunity allow, to which "Keith Falconer replied that he could not dream of such a thing, but if the other cared, he would devote every minute of time till the examination began to 'coaching' him for it." He had not been long at Cambridge before he determined to put aside his mathematical plans, and read for honours in the Theological Tripos. The energy with which he set himself to master Hebrew was curiously shown in the post-cards he wrote in that language. "They show a power," says his biographer, "I have not often seen equalled of bending the inflexible idioms, and making the scanty vocabulary suffice for the needs of nineteenth century English." When the Tripos examination came, his name was one of the six in the first class, and the prize for Hebrew was awarded to him. The Semitic languages came next in the programme of his studies, and in these also the examination resulted in his being placed in the first class, "his work having been distinctly brilliant and of decided promise."

A remark of Mr. Bowen, one of his old Harrow masters, deserves well to be pondered in this association:—

"I think this clear-headedness in matters of intellect was after all only a reflection of the moral simplicity which was his highest and most beautiful gift. I have often known young men who were candid, many who were devout, and many who were pleasant; but I can hardly remember any who united the three qualities so fully. He approached the world of ideas as great observers approach the world of nature, with wonder, with reverence, and with humility."

From Cambridge Keith Falconer went with a student of like pursuits to Leipzig, not only to continue his Arabic studies, but that he might see something of the life of a foreign university, and at the same time become thoroughly versed in German. Three days in the week he "read Koran," with one of the professors—a man, however, who it soon appeared knew less of the bare facts of the Bible than many an English child of nine or ten years. These studies had all an intimate bearing on the future which still lay hidden. As yet there was no distinct indication of ultimate purpose in them, but they had no small share in shaping his final plans. On returning to London he met General Gordon. The following note from the latter has a value of its own:

"Southampton, 25.4.81.

"My Dear Mr. Keith-Falconer,—

"I only wish I could put you into something that would give you the work you need, viz., secular and religious work, running side by side. This is the proper work for man, and I think you could find it.

"Would you go to Stamboul as extra unpaid attaché to Lord Dufferin? if so, why not try it, or else as private secretary to Petersburg? If you will not, then come to me in Syria to the Hermitage.

"Believe me, with kind regards,

"Yours sincerely,

"C. G. Gordon."

Another project soon interested him. Not content with his knowledge of classical Arabic, he planned a residence at Assiout, on the Nile—a place then little frequented by Europeans—in order to acquire an easy use of the language as now spoken. While there, he conceived the idea of a camel ride across the desert, but was compelled by an attack of fever to stay his preparations. On his return once more to Cambridge, he was, in 1883, appointed one of the examiners for the Tyrwhitt Hebrew Scholarships; and later in the same year, he was offered and accepted the post of Hebrew lecturer at Clare College. The next event of moment in his life was his marriage at Cannes, to Miss Gwendolen Bevan, daughter of Mr. R. C. L. Bevan, of Trent Park, Hertfordshire. It would seem to have been towards the end of the same year that the foreign mission field came clearly within the scope of his vision as practicable for himself. The departure of his intimate friend Mr. C. T. Studd, of Trinity College, set his thoughts in a new direction. Early the next year he published his "Kalilah and Dimnah," or the "Fables of Bidpai," a translation from the Syriac, with elaborate preface, of certain stories which, as he remarks, have probably had more readers than any other book except the Bible. Nothing gave plainer proof than this piece of work of the services he might have rendered in this department of literature. But his gifts were soon to be laid on another altar. He was much influenced by a paper in which General Haig urged the duty of attempting the evangelisation of Arabia. A consultation followed, and then much anxious and careful deliberation as to practical points. All things pointed to Aden as a suitable place of approach. In order to clear the ground, he and his wife undertook a preliminary journey, and spent some months on the proposed scene of action.

The glimpses which we get of this four months' sojourn at Aden are full of interest; the step-like house on the side of the hill, the early morning lesson to his wife in Arabic, the "gathering of the servants" on the roof after dinner, his rambles in the town, and talks and gospel readings with the natives—the people looking at him in the street, and saying, "That man knows kurân and nahwi." After a visit twenty-five miles inland to El-Hautah, the capital of Lahej, we find him writing:—

"Though I had been warned to use the utmost caution in introducing 'religious topics,' on account of the supposed fanaticism of the people, I found no difficulty whatever in circulating Arabic gospels. Several came to the bungalow to get them. Books are greatly valued in Aden and neighbourhood, and the name of Isa, the Messiah, is held in veneration by all. The Injil—Evangelion—a term applied to the whole Testament, is acknowledged as God's book, and as having come down from heaven. It would not surprise me in the least if a Christian mission, conducted with prudence and self-denial, were welcomed as a message from God."

In the same letter he writes of the oasis of Lahej :—

"The Sultan owns every inch of the fertile oasis, and the people are so many serfs. His 'soldiers' get no pay, only their food. One of the natives who came to us for treatment with an extensive sore behind his foot, told us that the Sultan had given him a year's imprisonment for tearing a water-skin, and that the fetter had produced his sore. The Sultan came to see us, and consulted the doctor (Keith Falconer's companion) about his ailments. On being told that he must take daily exercise, he exclaimed, 'Impossible!' If I shew my nose outside my palace, twenty men run after me crying for justice. The Sultan took us to see his chief secretary. On seeing this functionary, I was surprised to recognise a man with whom I had conversed at Aden, and to whom I had given a gospel. He now asked me for the whole Bible. Thus a book given in Aden may be carried far away."

These reconnoitrings completed, Keith Falconer and his wife returned to England, but before he left he had purchased "a garden plot" as a site for future use, and the dim vision of a new sphere which he had seen afar off had become bright with the sense of near possession. The culminating point of his Cambridge career was now close at hand. The post of Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic in the University, becoming vacant by the resignation of Professor Robertson Smith, it was offered to him, and after some deliberation accepted. Though his heart was at Aden, the mission was not yet constituted; and it was possible that by accepting the office, he might be able to serve, not only Cambridge, but more efficiently the larger cause to which he had given himself; and that he might, with our present facilities of movement, be able to discharge the duties even from Aden, at least temporarily. Thus it came about that in November of the same year he took upon himself the responsibilities of the professorship, by giving three lectures on Mecca, and the Meccan pilgrimage.

At this point of our sketch, it is necessary to retrace the years. This missionary spirit was no new development in Keith Falconer. Neither man nor boy can know the ultimate issue of his own best impulses. The communicative life had been his from the first. The simple piety of his childhood had unfolded in simple acts of service. The same outflowing soul had kept his student days free from stagnant doubt. His manifold deeds of helpfulness will never be fully recorded. Not content with steady missionary work in Cambridge itself, he came frequently to London, and bore an active part in the evangelistic work carried forward with such success by Mr. Charrington in the East End. Once in the streets he was covered with flour by the frequenters of a neighbouring music hall. He was the honorary secretary of the movement by which the last great Assembly Hall was built, now so conspicuous a structure in the Mile End road, capable of accommodating nearly five thousand people, and sheltering many various agencies of good. His circular appeal was a model of its kind. For the mission he pleads that it is "evangelistic, unsectarian and sober." "I say sober," he adds, "because of late years some have despaired of reaching the masses except by using certain unseemly methods, and our work is an emphatic protest against this practice, and a standing disproof of its necessity." "It is overwhelming to think of the vastness of the harvest field," we find him writing to a friend, "when compared with the indolence, indifference and unwillingness on the part of most so-called Christians, to become even in a moderate degree, labourers in the same. I take the rebuke to myself . . . To enjoy the blessings and happiness God gives, and never to stretch out a helping hand to the poor and the wicked is a most horrible thing."

This Aden scheme, it will thus be seen, was no sudden outbreak of enthusiasm. The studies in which he was engaged led his thoughts naturally to Arabia, and when the special call came it appealed to a heart already glowing with Christian zeal; here perhaps was a task for which he was more fitted by training and circumstance than some other men. It was arranged that the mission should be associated with the Free Church of Scotland, to which Keith Falconer had been always attached, though he was to go forth at his own charges. The preliminary arrangements were made with all prudence, a suitable doctor was found for the medical mission work; and plans and methods were well considered.

Within a few hours of delivering his last Meccan lecture, Keith Falconer had left Cambridge and was on the way to London. His little dog "Jip" travelled with him. A few farewell visits paid, and he pressed onward to Marseilles whence he took ship to Aden, arriving there early in December, 1886. The story of the next few months must be summed in few words. His wife joined him before the end of the year. A temporary home was set up at Shaikh Othman, but the bright early days of the mission were quickly overclouded. The house, not the one first intended, proved unhealthy. Keith Falconer was prostrated by fever—"five attacks in eight weeks." Yet his spirits never failed him. "How I wish," he said, "that each attack of fever had brought me nearer to Christ—nearer, nearer, nearer." All too soon came the end. There was no shrill cry of alarm. Death entered with the soft silent step of an angel of light, and, while the household slept, bore him away (May 10, 1887).

Six months, and this the close. But the work which Keith Falconer began goes forward; his spirit is an inspiration yet. This Biography of thirty-one short years is not only a record of affection, it is also a Voice of Appeal. Let him that hath ears for its message, hear.

A PURITAN PREACHING.

THE REVOLUTION OF 1688

ON ITS RELIGIOUS SIDE.

II.

PHILIP HENRY in his diary, under date September 2, 1666, writes:—"A lamentable fire began in London which continued burning till Thursday following, laying waste that famous and beautiful city, except a very small remnant of it in its own rubbish."

And in his reflections on the event, he says:—"May it not be a further voice to our Governors, like that to Pharaoh, saying, Let my people goe that they may serve Mee, and if ye will not, behold, thus and thus will I doe unto you."

By "a further voice," he evidently refers to that heard in the Plague the year before. Surely it is a significant thing that a period in which the "people" to which Philip Henry referred were put under such cruel bondage should have been visited by a series of such great national calamities as the Plague in 1665, raging not only in London but in several other parts of the country; the Fire of London (1666) than which, to read Evelyn's account, no scene more sensationally awful was ever witnessed in England; and finally, in 1667, the unparalleled disgrace to the honour of the country, when the Dutch fleet sailed up the Thames as far as Gravesend, threatening London and setting fire to three of our great men-of-war.

How strange that Christian men should be so apt to see the providence of God in their own private affairs, and so blind to the fact that "the government of the earth is in the hand of the Lord." Yet both during the height of the Plague, and during the progress of the Great Fire, though the lessons read were exactly the same, no one seems to have paid the least heed to them, and yet they were so vivid, so exactly appropriate to the occasion, if we consider the particular sins of king and people, that supposing any one wished to portray these two great national calamities in a sublime form of poetry, he could not do better than make the lessons read at the most special times mentioned, from the books of Joel and Amos, its groundwork.

No doubt men like Philip Henry did, but it would have become a subject for prosecution to preach such things.

Under date, July 11, Pepys writes: "Home where all our hearts do now ake, for the news is true that the Dutch have broke the chains and burned our ships and particularly the Royal Charles." And in his terror he holds a consultation in his bedroom, with wife and father-in-law, as to what they shall do with all their money and where they shall escape to.

And after his visit to Whitehall, he says: "There is hardly anybody in the Court but do look as if he cried." "The truth is I do fear that the whole kingdom is undone." If Pepys had gone to church the previous evening, the evening of the day of De Ruyter's exploits, he would have heard words which exactly described the anxiety which the wicked must feel the moment they realise the truth of their position. (Job xv. 20–35.)

And if he had attended morning service on the day that he learnt the disastrous news, he would have listened to a bolder denunciation of proud, tyrannical, covetous nations and kings, than any man of those times would have dared privately to mutter. But who will believe these things? Who is there that believes these so-called "Lessons" are always lessons indeed to those who have ears to hear?

When John James was asked why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, he replied:—"Know ye for certain that if ye put me to death, ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city, and upon the inhabitants thereof."

And John James's case was only a flagrant example of a tyranny that was crushing out the lives of hundreds.

And to be dragged through the mire of London streets, to be hanged at Tyburn, with the atrociously inhuman outrages by which earthly power sought to terrorise men into subjection, was perhaps after all not so unendurable as to lay a prisoner for life in some horrible gaol, a moral leper-house, where a gangrened mass of humanity were cast, to get more and more ulcerated, more and more irremediably corrupt. To such circumstances not less than five thousand Quakers were reduced, besides an innumerable host of other Christians, some of the most excellent men and women in the country. If we want to know with how much iniquity the whole matter proceeded, we have only to read the histories of their trials, in some cases preserved in our law records. Read, for example, in the State Trials that of John Crook, and two other members of the Society of Friends, arrested May 13, 1661, while peaceably engaged in their devotions. Called upon to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, they refused, on the ground that they dared not break Christ's commandment—"Swear not at all." In the course of the trial, the Lord Chief Justice not only hectored them in the usual manner of the judges of the time, and which Bunyan so exquisitely touches off in the following colloquy:—

"Faithful—May I speak a few words in my own defence?"

"Judge—Sirrah, sirrah, thou deservest to live no longer, but to be slain immediately on the place, yet that all may see our gentleness towards thee, let us hear what thou hast to say."

But Lord Chief Justice Foster did not pretend even to the same show of justice as the judge in the court of Beelzebub, but continually called on the executioner, present with his badge of office, his ropes round his neck, to stop the prisoners' mouths, which was done several times with a dirty cloth and a gag. Possibly Sir R. Foster was infuriated at the high position the prisoners took as men, innocent men, and Englishmen. "Sirrah, you are too bold," he said to John Crook; who replied, "Sirrah is not a word becoming a judge. Mine innocency makes me bold," and when the gag was out of his mouth he further had the temerity to say, "It is justice, I stand for, let me have justice." But the judges would hear no defence, and ordering the gag to be again applied, they talked with the jury, who gave the Chief Justice a paper finding the prisoners guilty of refusing to take the oath of allegiance. Upon which John Crook and his companions were sentenced to forfeiture of all their real estates during life, and their personal estates for ever; to be out of the king's protection, and to be imprisoned during his pleasure. A sentence, which as Lord Campbell has pointed out, placed them in the position of wolves, "they might be put to death by any one as noxious vermin!"[1]

Charles was, as we know, a most successful dissembler, and we have other proof that he did sometimes speak "the language of Zion," when he wished to "dulcify" its professors. In any case, it is certain that he sent over a declaration from Breda, in which he said: "We do also declare liberty to tender consciences, and that no man shall be disquieted or called in question for differences of opinion in matters of religion which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom." How was it that directly he was firmly established on the throne, he permitted so flagrant a reversal of this promise?

The truth was, he found that those to whom he made this promise were far more unpopular throughout the country than he had supposed. The Commonwealth had not continued long enough to heal the wounds it had inflicted, and there were thousands of persons who had suffered from its various actions, who were only too glad to have their revenge. If Charles II. had been a just king, desiring first of all the common weal of the country over which he was called to preside, he would have done his best to give a right direction to the higher thought which animated the dominant party:—the desire for national unity. In this way he could have laid the foundations of a splendid work, and earned the everlasting gratitude of the country; but he found it only too easy to take the common despot's course Divida et impera. He tried to crush the remains of the Puritan party by means of the Church and King party, and again to dominate the latter party by means of the Nonconformists and Catholics; but happily the best men of all sides were true to the religion which formed the soul of the country, the Nonconformists preferring to remain under much injustice rather than put in hazard the Protestant character of the country.

But Charles was no common despot. There is a fascination about him which does not exist in his contemporary, Louis XIV., but which is felt in Bunyan's Diabolus and Milton's Satan.

> He, above the rest
> In shape and gesture proudly eminent
> Stood like a tower, his form had yet not lost
> All her original brightness; nor appear'd
> Less than Arch-angel ruin'd . . . shone
> Above them all the Arch-angel, but his face
> Deep scars of thunder had intrench'd, and care
> Sat on his faded cheek, but under brows
> Of dauntless courage, and considerate pride
> Waiting revenge: cruel his eye . . . .[1]

This is certainly not the idea the historians give us of Charles II., but one has only to look at his portrait by Lely to feel that there could be no better description of his outward man. Moreover history reveals him as having a purpose, a will and a policy which made him more than a match for any of the English statesmen of the time. He duped Clarendon, Shaftesbury, and Danby, throwing them over as they became dangerous to his purpose. He duped the parliament, the church, and the nation. Gay and dissolute, good-natured and accessible, apparently sauntering through life with no other object than to kill time, he pertinaciously pursued his purpose, hiding his real views until the proper moment came for declaring them. That moment never came, but he and his successor understood one another, and, with a truly philosophic mind, he resigned himself to quit the stage pleasantly, and without any agitation of spirit. It seems a fact little heeded, but it is most important as a key to the political purpose of Charles II. to remember that he was a pupil of the philosopher Hobbes, who taught that the best possible form of government was a pure and unrestrained monarchy.

Burnet says that in the year 1645, the Duke of Buckingham being newly come to Paris, and finding the king (who was then fifteen years of age) being enough inclined to receive ill impressions, he, who was then got into all the impieties and vices of the age, set himself to corrupt the king, in which he was too successful, being seconded in that wicked design by Lord Percy. And to complete the matter, Hobbes was brought to him, under pretence of instructing him in mathematics; and he laid before him his schemes both with relation to religion and politics, which made deep and lasting impression on the king's mind.

They had to part when Charles was about twenty-one years of age, but the love and regard of the royal pupil for the philosopher seems to have been real to the end.[2] To find out Charles' views as a statesman, we must go then to the works of his master, and we shall find they teach that the greatest happiness of a state is to have all authority centred in one single person, who is the representative of all. And that one man, Hobbes maintained, should not only be the absolute ruler, but the teacher and priest of the people. The sovereign, he said, cannot but choose to take in hand the control of the whole life of the subject; the state must be at the same time church if it is to remain state, and the king will give ground to the priest unless he is himself priest as well as king. The state cannot control freedom of thought, but the claim of anything called conscience to override the sovereign's commands must be at once rejected.

[1] "Lives of the Chief Justices of England," vol. i., p. 498.

[1] "Paradise Lost."

[2] Charles took him into his favour after the Restoration, and he had his portrait in his closet at Whitehall, but the name of Hobbes was regarded in his own day as that of Voltaire or of Tom Paine was in later times, and the king had to give him up to his foes.

This is a key to the inner thoughts and object of Charles, it was the peculiarity of the time that he had a Parliament even more despotic in spirit than he was himself, and a great deal more disposed to disregard the claims of conscience than suited his purpose. In 1661 it passed the Test and Corporation Act, by which all who took any office civil or military were required to take the Sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England. The object was to eliminate the puritan element from the corporations of all the cities and towns in England. Bunyan evidently had this Act in his mind when he represents Diabolus immediately after getting possession of Mansoul, as new modelling the town, and turning the Lord Mayor, the recorder, and all the old magistrates out of office.

But it was in 1662 that the great blow was struck in the Act of Uniformity, the avowed object of which was to force the whole puritan party out of the ministry of the Church of England. It was determined to require an unfeigned assent and consent to every thing in the Book of Common Prayer (it having been altered in order to render it still more difficult to tender consciences), to exact a renunciation of the Solemn League and Covenant, and a declaration that it was unlawful under any pretence to take up arms against the king. More than 2000 clergymen resigned their livings on St. Bartholomew's day, 1662, many to realize the evening lesson of the day; the contempt that awaits the poor Christian man who has to go about from house to house, living on the alms of his brethren. However, they went, some died broken-hearted, some left the country, some rose to be physicians, some sank to be farm-servants or artizans, while some were too old to support themselves by any kind of labour. Unable to believe that any earthly authority could stand between them and their ordination vows, notwithstanding all penal laws they continued to preach, and to assemble their flocks for prayer. Sometimes these congregations met in the woods or in lonely valleys among the hills, or in the dead of the night in private houses, the ministers wending their way in divers disguises. For it was on these last the law fell, and the prisons were soon crowded with such offenders.

When men like Joseph Alleine, who had always been known as a royalist, refused to cease preaching, let them make what laws they might, one would have thought the dominant party would have stopped to consider where they were drifting. But no, Alleine was treated by Chief Justice Foster after the same fashion as he had treated Crook and James. Presbyterians, Quakers, Baptists, all were driven into the same prisons, and at least into a community of suffering.

On the 1st of July, 1664, an Act came into operation called "The Conventicle Act," rendering any person above the age of sixteen attending a religious meeting, not allowed by the liturgy or practice of the Church of England, where five or more persons were present besides the household, liable for the first offence to three months' imprisonment or a fine, and for the third offence to be banished for seven years to the plantations. New England was specially excluded, and from what was reported this banishment must have seemed much like being sold into slavery. Otherwise why should it have been necessary to add the clause, that if a convict returned to England during the period of his sentence he was to be hanged. Still further in carrying out this Act a jury was unnecessary. A single justice of the peace and the oath of an informer were sufficient.

Imagine the fearful tyranny to which this subjected some of the most godly people in England. Who were the persons who had the chief carrying out of this Act? The country magistrates. Macaulay has pictured them for us in his famous chapter on the State of England in 1685. Hardly better educated than their grooms and gamekeepers, and using language as coarse, and speaking with a pronunciation as provincial, constantly drunk, and that with heavy potations of beer, obstinately adhering to the traditional ideas on religion and politics of a very narrow country circle, hating bitterly all Frenchmen and Italians, Scotchmen and Irishmen, Papists and Presbyterians, Independents and Baptists, Quakers and Jews, withal proudly conscious that they were men of family, magistrates and officers of the train-bands; what mercy could a tradesman, artizan, or farm-labourer, accused of defying the law and attending a seditious conventicle, expect at such hands?

It would really seem as if some began to think themselves Turkish pachas, and that they could imprison and hang as they pleased. At Aylesbury, in Buckinghamshire, in the year 1664, the magistrates filled two houses with prisoners, and resting on an old statute, some one raked up, of the 35th of Elizabeth, they proceeded to offer twelve of these unfortunate men and women their choice, to conform, abjure the realm, or suffer death. They gave them an afternoon to consider of it, and the victims declining either method of concluding their troubles, were found guilty of felony and sentenced to death. They included Stephen Dagnal, a minister, Ellit, a teacher, eight other men mostly tradesmen, and two women, one a mother with six children. The son of one of the condemned men, a farmer named Monk, at once took horse and rode to London, where he immediately saw William Kiffin, who, though a Baptist, had influence at court, he being so rich, that on one occasion to escape lending Charles 40,000*l.*, he presented the king with ten thousand as a gift. Kiffin went at once to Whitehall, and the king seemed surprised, and inquired whether there was any law in force which would justify such proceedings. Being assured by the Lord Chancellor that there was, Charles granted an immediate reprieve, with vhich Thomas Monk returned with all possible ıaste to Aylesbury.

This incident we give as showing the extreme engths to which the dominant party would ometimes go. Its spirit was fully exhibited in the Oxford or Five Mile Act.

Any one may see from Defoe's account of the Plague, even if their imagination did not assure them, such must have been the fact, that its terrific ravages and truly awful scenes could not fail to have affected Londoners somewhat as the earthquake did Paul's jailer at Philippi. Yet at this moment a great many of their spiritual guides fled and shut up their churches. It seemed a distinct call to some of the dispossessed preachers and other Nonconformists to supply their places. The presence of death awoke both preachers and hearers. Many who hung on their words literally listened for the last time. Next day their bodies were cast into the pit.

What did the Parliament which had fled to Oxford do? They passed an Act, October 31st, 1665, forbidding any minister to come within five miles of the city or corporation where he had been in the habit of officiating, under a penalty of 40*l.*, unless he took an oath declaring it unlawful, under any pretence whatever, to take up arms against the king, or at any time to come to endeavour the alteration of the government either in church or state. When we know the sort of men who immediately suffered from this Act, men like Philip Henry, who was obliged at once to leave his home, his family residing at the time within four reputed miles of his old parish, we know that those who refused the oath were not moved by mere political considerations.

But what has all this to do with the Revolution of 1688? Revolutions are not made in a day. It is not one or many acts that can drive men to imperil the foundation of society, the poorest, the most discontented are sensible of the value of law and order: the revolutionary agents are the tyrants themselves, who work zealously and persistently till at last the day comes when a very slight accident brings the whole edifice to ruin.

RICHARD HEATH.

LETTERS TO MY CHILDREN FROM THE EAST.

BY HENRY HARPER, AUTHOR OF "LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND," ETC.

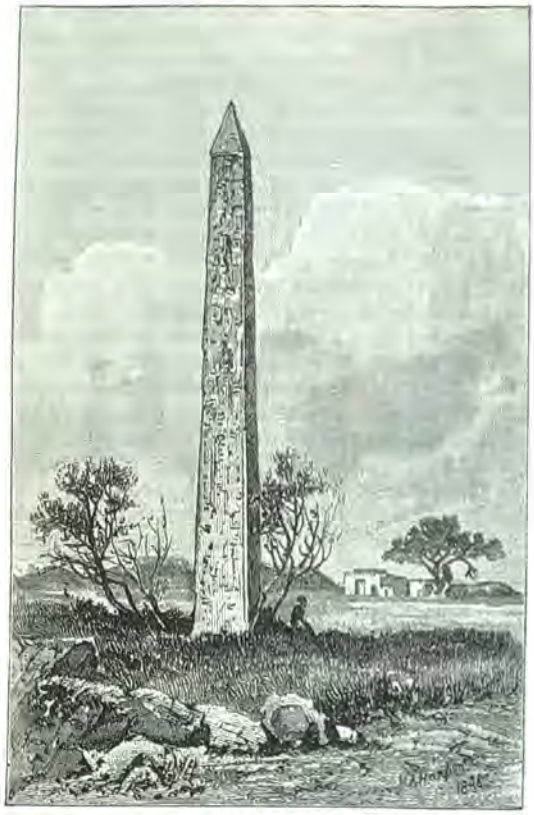
IV.—THE OBELISK OF HELIOPOLIS.

I DO not think that you children will call this a beautiful picture. I hope, however, to show you that it is a most interesting one. It is what is called an "Obelisk." They were invented by the ancient Egyptians. You may call them "pillars" if you like, only remember they are not round, but have square sides and a pointed top, and it is believed that they were often coated with gold. On their sides inscriptions are carved in old Egyptian writing, which inscriptions give a history of the king who then lived, and his doings. The "obelisk" was upright, made of one piece of stone cut out of a hill, or quarry, trimmed to the shape required, then taken to the place where it had to be erected. In London, on the Thames Embankment, you can see one which was brought from Alexandria, in Egypt; that one is called "Cleopatra's Needle." It cost both money and time to bring it here and erect it. Though very interesting, it is not so much so as the one in my sketch, which still stands at Heliopolis, near Cairo.

I will now tell you why this one is so interesting: it marks the site of "On," which place was a great Egyptian University four thousand years ago, the great college where Egyptian priests were educated. Joseph must have often looked on this obelisk as he walked or drove to "On." That was its Egyptian name, though in the Hebrew Bible it is also called "Beth Shemesh." In the Greek it is Heliopolis,—all these different words meaning the same thing, "The City of the Sun God." We know Joseph must have been there, for in Gen. xli. 45–50 we are told that he married the daughter of the priest of "On"; and further we are told that "Joseph went all over the land of Egypt," and moreover he would be sure to visit his father-in-law. This obelisk is therefore believed to be the oldest in the world, and placed here by the first king called "Menes."

Another great man of whom we read much in the Bible must also have lived here—Moses. You know that the Egyptian princess who found him in the water, had him well educated. We are told "he was learned in all the knowledge of the Egyptians," so we may think of him as a young college student, sent to this great seat of learning; and as he walked from his room to his tutor (who would be one of the Egyptian priests) he would note this obelisk and watch the changing length of its shadow, flung on the marble courtyard. What was it they taught in this famous college? The sacred books of the Egyptians, also astronomy, arithmetic, geometry, architecture, medicine. Here, probably, Moses obtained all that human knowledge which afterwards he put to such good use, when he was divinely chosen as the ruler, lawgiver, and teacher to the Israelites.

All the earthly teaching of these priests availed them nothing, for they were worshippers of "idols," and served "false gods." Their temples were not left to slow decay, they were destroyed.



OBELISK OF ON.

Read Jer. xliii. and especially the thirteenth verse, and you will see that God commanded the great king of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar to destroy all the "pillars" or "obelisks" (Revised version) of Beth Shemesh (or "On") because they did not serve the Lord God.

Speaking of this same invasion, Ezekiel (xxx. 17) says that all the "young men" shall be slain, "they shall fall by the sword," the "cities" are "to go into captivity," not only are the seats of learning to fall, but the very stronghold of the Pharaoh, his famous palace with its fortifications is to be "darkened" also. Late investigations have discovered the "Tahpanhes" of the eighteenth verse, all proving the exact truth of this inspired passage.

But what a long time this college of "On" had lasted, it was a college when Jeremiah wrote five hundred and ninety years before Christ. All these years priests had been teaching their "wisdom," but they had failed themselves to see the true God, and therefore they could not teach Him! God had borne with them all those long years—what long-suffering patience—"if haply they might repent," but they did not.

Do not you feel, children, great pity for those "young men" slain in their college home? The courts where boys and tutors had rambled when classes were done, now are only represented by mounds of rubbish; and this tall weather-beaten obelisk, it has seen all this. Oh, had it but a tongue to speak, what a history it would relate! To mark the palaces of the priests there is nothing but a few mud huts inhabited by poor Arabs. Some tall palms and fragmentary remains of the great wall, enclosing one and a half square miles of ground, showing how huge this settlement of the priests must have been.

Is there no lesson for us in this short story of "On" and of its departed greatness? Yes, you know how anxious I am that you should acquire knowledge, that your lessons should be learned properly and well, but the knowledge I want you mostly to gain is that knowledge of God revealed in the Bible. God the Maker, the Creator of all things.—God the loving Father, the loving Saviour. Children all, that is true knowledge. Pray God the Holy Spirit to apply that knowledge to your hearts. Then it will be better than all the "knowledge of the Egyptians." Get that knowledge if possible, and like Moses apply it to the honour and glory of God. If that is done you will resemble our Blessed Lord, for we are told that He, when a boy, increased in knowledge and stature and in favour with God and man.

SITE OF CITY OF ON.

WILLIE WILLS' WINGS.

CHAPTER VII.

WILLIE did not get far that evening after leaving Mrs. Jones. He missed his way in the darkness, and towards nine o'clock, afraid to venture further, he sat down on a doorstep to reconsider his plans. A gentleman, in passing, noticed his white face, and with a kindly "Poor little chap," tossed him a sixpence. Willie's colour was very rosy as he ran after the gentleman to say, "Thank you, sir," and then without a moment's pause crossed the road to speak to a policeman who was standing there, asking him to tell him the nearest way to a lodging-house. Before getting a bed for the night, Willie purchased a cup of coffee and a penny roll. Something while he was eating the bread reminded him of baby, and it was with great difficulty that he managed to keep back his tears.

Willie had a good night's rest. The bed was clean and comfortable, and the house quiet; he was up by sunrise, thinking to leave the town on his parents' track, but seeing a notice up on a shutter, "An Errand Boy Wanted," Willie thought he would wait until the shop opened and go after the place. He had still one penny left of the sixpence which the gentleman had given him; with this he bought a cup of coffee at a coffee stand.

It was some time before Willie could see the master of the shop to inquire after the errand boy's place, and then it was only to be told that he was too young. However, the little fellow was determined to try elsewhere; and so, for many hours, he trudged those city streets, eager to find a notice up, "Boy Wanted." Three times during the morning he came across the advertisement, and very eagerly made application, but each time to be sent away, "Too small," "Too young," or, "Too inexperienced," being the reason assigned.

By the afternoon Willie was completely worn out. Hungry and weary, he longed to find a quiet doorstep where he might curl himself up and get a sleep. But as he paced street after street he saw the hopelessness, in broad daylight, of doing this. Again and again he wondered what would become of him. He was feeling sick from exhaustion and his head was aching terribly. He tried to comfort himself by saying over and over again his Shepherd hymn, but only one line came to his memory—

"And we thank Thee for Thy care."

This he repeated again and again.

Of course God was caring for him, although he did feel dreadfully alone and tired; perhaps He would help him to get a little place with some good people. Willie's idea of perfect happiness in this world was to live with good people, "who loved the Bible and said their prayers regular!"

Willie was walking very slowly now. He was almost too tired to look about him for the notice, "A Boy Wanted," which had been his one thought all day, but even the habit of a few hours has its influence, and Willie found himself unconsciously scanning each house or building as he wearicdly passed it. Thus it happened that he noticed on a board against a gate which led to a small piece of land, at the back of which stood a large house,

REFUGE FOR THE DESTITUTE.

"The destitute—the destitute," said Willie coming to a sudden halt, "why, that must be me! Left all alone in the world! Father and mother gone, I don't know where! Mr. Jones too poor to let me stop any longer! No food since last night only my one cup of coffee this morning! No home to go to—no bed to rest upon—tired, weary, aching. Yes! if ever there was a poor destitute one, it's me!"

With a new hope in his heart, and new strength in his limbs, Willie crossed the road, passed through the little gate, went down the garden path and up the steps which led to the front door, then timidly—his heart was beating very quickly—he rang the bell.

It seemed a long time to Willie before he heard the bolts drawn within, and the door opened, although it was only the time that it took the matron to come from her room at the back into the hall.

As she opened the door, and caught sight of Willie, the matron's face beamed with a kindly smile.

"What is it, little boy?" she asked.

Now Willie had made up a long sentence to say when some one answered the bell; but everything was forgotten at the moment, and the only words which came to Willie's mind were these, uttered with trembling eagerness—

"Please, ma'am, I'm a poor destitute boy. Will you—will you—refuge me?"

CHAPTER VIII.

THE Committee were sitting in earnest consultation. How could they find more space to enable them to meet the applications which were before them in a heavy pile of letters lying on the table?

At this moment a knock was heard at the door.

"Come in," said the perplexed chairman, who had a very tender heart, and to whom "refusing a case" was a positive pain.

The "come in" was answered by the entrance of the matron leading Willie by the hand.

"A personal application, ladies and gentlemen," said good Mrs. Brown, her eyes overflowing with tears. "A lamb of the fold, I take it, who has strayed our way that we may have a little care over him. Will you please to hear his story? Pretty dear, it's pitiful from what I can pick up!" And good Mrs. Brown wiped her eyes.

Willie thus introduced, was brought to the table, and many questions were put to him, all of which he most unhesitatingly and truthfully answered.

"Why do you think your parents left you behind?" said the chairman, kindly going back to that part of Willie's story.

"Please, sir," said Willie, "I was not able to do the things father wanted to make work pay."

"Why? you look sharp enough," said the chairman. "What was to hinder you being a good man of business?"

"Please, sir," said Willie, "it was not a good man of business that they wanted; it was a bad man."

"A bad man," said the chairman, laughing; "no, no, that won't do, little fellow."

"Please, sir, I mean"—and Willie's voice trembled, while his colour rose high in his cheeks—"I mean someone to tell lies, and cheat, and deceive. Isn't that a bad man of business? I couldn't do it, sir—no, I really couldn't, especially after I was in Miss Rose Simmonds' Sunday-school class."

"Miss Rose Simmonds—what Miss Rose Simmonds?" asked the chairman earnestly.

Willie told him the name of the town where Miss Simmonds lived, and related how he came to join her class.

"Most singular," said the chairman, turning to the committee. "Miss Rose Simmonds happens to be my niece. I can soon get this story verified. I suppose we might manage to squeeze the little fellow in somewhere. Eh?"

To Willie's great joy, every one said "Yes," and that night Willie felt more than ever that he did right in repeating

"And we thank Thee for Thy care,"

when everything seemed most dark, most sad; for surely it was God's care which brought him lonely, desolate, and sick with hunger to that Home for the Destitute.

Alpine Cattle Bells.

HOW soft the music of the bells
Borne by the breeze from sheltered dells,
Where herds of mountain-cattle feed,
In friendly groups, on flowery mead!

These bells send forth, not one alone,
But vibrate notes of every tone;
This chorus of the Alps is sung,
With one accord, by old and young.

Such artless music of the hills
The soul with a strange rapture fills;
So many sounds, so varied, meet
In such sweet harmony complete.

The distant blending with the near,
The tenor, bass, and treble clear;
The bell sonorous, slowly swung,
With the small heifer's sharply rung.

Help us, O Lord, to raise to Thee
Music, each one in his degree;
Despising none because their note
In differing tone may heavenward float:

For though to listeners standing near
Some notes discordant may appear,
Yet unto Him who hears above
All blend in harmony of love.[1]

NEWMAN HALL, LL.B.

The Sky-Lark.

I LOVE to see the sky-lark
Soar up to greet the day;
I love to hear the rapture
That swells its sunny lay.

Straight from its earthly dwelling,
As to its home on high,
Exulting in the sunshine
It mounteth to the sky:

And then again with singing
To nest and brood descends,
In lowly toils delighting,
And heaven with home-life blends.

Help me from plain or valley
To rise, my God, to Thee:
To duty still returning
With glad humility.

NEWMAN HALL, LL.D.

[1] For other Alpine recollections, we may refer our readers to a pleasant volume of Mountain Musings, by the Rev. Newman Hall, recently published by Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton.

SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. VIII.

Among the prophecies relating to our Saviour in the Old Testament, besides those which speak of Him directly, there are several, in which the prophet seems to be speaking of himself in the first instance, but afterwards rises into a style of speech too high for any mortal man, and which can only apply to the Son of God, the Messiah who was to come. Thus not one person alone becomes a type of Christ, but circumstances connected with many of the leading men guide our thoughts to Him of whom all the prophets bear witness.

I. Of these we will take first those that relate to David. In the Psalms there are passages treating of the following points, and these passages are applied in the New Testament to our Lord:

1. The gathering of the nations against David?
2. The fact that David was at first rejected but afterwards accepted as king?
3. A Psalm in which David speaks of himself, as though he would not remain in the grave?

II. Those that relate to Solomon:

4. His kingdom is spoken of as everlasting?
5. The kings of the East are mentioned as bringing offerings to him?

III. Those that relate to Hezekiah:

6. His birth was foretold to Ahaz?
7. One of the well-known titles of Christ is used with regard to him?
8. He is spoken of as a rod out of the stem of Jesse?

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. VII.—p. 672.

1. Malachi iii. 1 and iv. 5; and the latter is alluded to Matt. xi. 14 and xxii. 10, 13.

2. Gen. xlix. 10. Luke ii. 4. Heb. vii. 14.

3. Micah v. 2. Matt. ii. 5, 6.

4. (a.) Matt. xxvii. 46. Luke xxiv. 44. (b.) Matt. xxvii. 43. (c.) Matt. xxvii. 35. John xix. 24.

5. (a.) Isa. xxxv. 5, 6. Luke vii. 22. (b.) Isa. liii. 7. John xx. 9. (c.) Isa. liii. 9. Matt. xxvii. 38, 57.

6. (a.) Zech. ix. 9. John xii. 14, 16. (b.) Zech. xi. 12 Matt. xxxi. 15; xxvii. 3, 10. (c.) Zech. xi. 10. John xix. 34, 37. (d.) Zech. xiii. 7. Matt. xxvi. 31.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

HIS EVENING PORTION.

"Here souls cast down and fearful
Are strengthened from on high."

His Evening Portion.

O WONDROUS revelation!
O Book of books divine!
Wherein for all creation
God's tender mercies shine!
What music fills its story!
What sweet compassions move!
Where love is all the glory,
And all the glory love!

Here souls cast down and fearful
Are strengthened from on high,
The tempest tossed and tearful
Find help and succour nigh;
Here hope the storm assuages,
And peace floats wide unfurled,
A refuge for all ages,
A stronghold for the world.

The child in slumber nestling
Hath breathed its words in prayer;
The youth with evil wrestling
Finds strength for conflict there;
The stout heart learns endurance,
The sorrowful are blest,
And calm in its assurance
The aged sink to rest.

Though slaves of wrong and terror
Its glory have denied,
Though wanton doubt and error
Its message may deride:
All hell its weapons casting
Against its truth must fail,
The word is everlasting
And mighty to prevail!

Dear chart of our salvation,
Our book of life indeed,
Still grant us consolation
In every hour of need;
Sustain our hearts when lying
Sore wounded in the strife,
And be to us in dying
The power of endless life!

MARY BOWLES.

OLD GWEN.

CHAPTER III.—THE NEW HOME.

CENNIN Farm or Tybach, as old Gwen's homestead was called, was situated just outside the castle walls. Farm was scarcely a suitable title for it at the period of the migration thither of Tisha and her family. It had been a small farm once upon a time, and the house was, consequently, larger than the cottage Tisha had quitted; but such farm buildings as were left, were let to other tenants. Still old Gwen had her poultry-yard and her piggery, and there was ample room out-of-doors for Tisha's live-stock, while there was place for her and her possessions within.

It took a long time to settle these, and the effort made by Tisha both of body and mind, was beneficial to her so long as the said "settling" lasted. Old Gwen, who was as unselfish as she was jovial, let her have her way, and crowded her own furniture into all sorts of available holes and corners, to make way for her daughter-in-law's. Tisha alternately cried and scolded from the moment when she descended from the bee-hive chair, at the door, till that in which kind Uncle Laban put the finishing touch to the corner-cupboard and the big bedstead. "Now, Tisha fach," he said, as he surveyed his work, "we have done our best, and you must do yours. There's a deal we don't understand in this world; but the Lord knows, and this should comfort us. He knows your sorrows, as He did know your joys, and you must bear your cross for His sake, who did carry it first for yours."

"I'll try, Laban," said Tisha in reply.

While this passed the two Gwens were in the kitchen.

"Where shall we have the company if they should want a cup o' tea or a glass of milk?" asked Gwenny of her grandmother. "They'll be coming soon to see the castle."

"I never thought of that," replied old Gwen. "Make you the kitchen as old-fashioned as you can, and put all the cracked chaney upon the dresser, and the brass candlesticks on the chimney-piece, and the carved oak chair and chests that Lady Lewis wanted to buy, in sight, and make believe they are as ancient as the castle, and you'll never get rid of 'em. Everything old's the fashion now, and made after the pattern of hundreds of years ago, all but our Welsh hats and linseys which you young girls despise. I expect to see the gentry in 'em soon, and then you'll be sorry you took to bonnets and cottons, feathers and flowers, and the like unholy trash."

"Must we ask the tourists into the kitchen, Mamgu?" persisted Gwenny.

"What else? You can't have 'em in the parlour, if your mother takes to her bed again," replied old Peggy.

"Tell mother we'll shut her up in the bedstead while they're having their tea, and that will be frightening her into keeping about," suggested Gwenny.

Old Peggy laughed till her fat sides shook, and said it was a capital plan.

She had kept the keys of the castle for a generation, and to her was given the small privilege of showing a certain well that it contained, which during the tourist season brought grist to her heavily-encumbered mill. Her children had been showmen or show-women until they all married or were taken from her by death; after which period Gwenny had undertaken the post. Her good looks and ready wit had brought many a coin to the farm; but her office was soon to be transferred to the younger children, as she was anxious to go to service.

Shonny, who knew the castle by heart, was to succeed Gwenny, aided, occasionally, by his elders, and, pleaded Gwenny, "he must get over his schooling somehow. Mother must be helping. At the worst you must give the visitors the key, and let them find their own way about. Some of 'em prefer it."

"They'll all be asking the age of Tisha's bedstead," laughed old Gwen "and be wanting to buy it."

"I'll pretend it came out of the ark, but I suppose bedsteads like that weren't invented in those days," said young Gwen demurely.

She and her grandmother enjoyed their little jokes, which, if dull when translated, were funny enough to amuse them and their friends.

As the days went on, Tisha and her children grew accustomed to their change of abode. Indeed they were all the better for it, the more bracing air of the castle acting as a renovator to Tisha; and the company of the two Gwens, as an antidote to her children for her querulous complainings. Her precious furniture was arranged as nearly as possible like the cottage, and her poor Toom's coracle lay outside the window, so that she could contemplate it at leisure and pleasure. She bemoaned the fact that the castle-walls overshadowed the farm, and wished for the meadows and the river below the rock, but she accommodated herself to circumstances better than was expected. So long as old Gwen and Laban were at hand to console her, and to answer her plaints by texts from Holy Writ, she seemed to try and rouse up; but when they were absent her weak faith grew weaker, and she misdoubted the justice of Him in whose Almighty Hands are the tightening and loosing of all prison bars, and at whose commands chains fall off and massive doors unclose. In this frame of mind, it is no wonder that no sooner did old Gwen go off to a nursing engagement than Tisha took to her bed again, and left the young folk to manage as best they could.

Gwenny was equal to the emergency. One day soon after the departure of her grandmother, the hero of the sovereign episode arrived. He came to the farm and requested to be shown over the castle. She opened the door to him, and asked him to walk in while she fetched the key. He went into the kitchen, where Shonny was seated astride upon the arm of the oaken settle, and began to question him about his father, which caused Shonny to begin to howl, as was, he considered, his duty. But Gwenny was not absent long. She had hurried to her mother, hastily pulled aside the panel of the bedstead, and said:

"Now, mother, you must get up and dress. Here's the first tourist. I'm going to show him over the castle, and then he'll be sure to come back to tea. Mamgu says all the tourists will be wanting to see your bedstead because it's as old as Adam, or nearly, and we must have tea and crumpets and plank-cake ready here. Put you out your best chaney. Dorcas will be home 'rectly and help; but you must make haste, for he's a grand gentleman and looks as if he 'ould'nt be kept waiting."

Gwen did not even stay to hear the "There's unfeeling you all are," that followed her; but hastened back to the tourist. Giving Shonny a push and a shake, she bade him come and tell the gentleman about the ruins; so the trio went out together.

The stranger did not appear to be in the hurry Gwen anticipated, but looked about him in a leisurely way. He remarked upon the quaint porch and windows of the old house, and paused before the coracle in the court. He asked if the pig in the stye were the one he had seen below, and what had become of the poultry.

"Uncle Joshua brought up the pig, and I was catching the fowls and the pigeons," cried Shonny, whose howling ceased easily.

At the moment Dorcas came running up the hill with the cat in her arms.

"I've found her at last, and she's nearly starved," she cried without noticing the stranger.

Gwenny and Shonny both went to look at poor puss, who was truly a melancholy sight; for field mice are not fattening, and she missed her milk. She, like Tisha, was more attached to places than people, and she had disappeared the very night of the move. The tourist looked on with something like a frown, but Gwenny bade Dorcas make haste to mother, and turning towards him whispered to her, "He's sure to want his tea."

But he strode away towards the castle walls, and Gwenny and Shonny hurried after him. The pad-locked gate was soon unfastened, and they found themselves within the enclosure.

Now Shonny was the genius of the family, and had a high reputation for his parts at school. He knew really more about the castle than Gwen, and she was slightly jealous of his superior lore; still, as he was to succeed her as clerk of the works when she went to service, she was anxious that he should make a start. Accordingly, Shonny began to say his lesson with the rapidity customary to school children, who learn more by rote than sense. He had got up a few sentences from a certain guide-book he had come across, and rattled them off famously, albeit with a good Welsh accent.

"The history of these ruins has not been recorded; antiquaries have claimed for them a British founder, Urien, one of the Knights of the Round Table, or a Roman origin; but the existing constructions are probably not older than Henry III. or Edward I. The platform of rock on which they stand is not more than an acre in extent. It is almost impregnable on all sides but one. These two square towers defend the entrance, and there is the large round tower and the oc—oc—octagonal tower. . . ." Poor Shonny paused a moment for breath; then he rushed on again, omitting part of his lesson. "The very curious passage descending through the solid rock," he began, but here Gwen stopped him with an imperative "That'll do, Shonny. The Well's my business and I know all about that."

She spoke in Welsh, but it would have been all the same to the tourist had she spoken in Arabic, for he was not listening. He had wandered off towards the towers aforesaid, and Gwen followed at a respectful distance.

Shonny's vanity was hurt, and he turned his back upon them, and went in a contrary direction. It was not long before the tourist rejoined Gwen.

"Would you like to see the Well, sir?" she asked.

"By all means. I should like to see every thing," he replied.

They stumbled over blocks of stone and other débris, and went to what looked like the entrance to a small cave. Gwen took a couple of candles and a box of matches from a pouch which she carried at her side, struck a light, put it to the wicks, kindled a flame, and giving one candle to her companion, led the way into a dark passage, holding the other candle aloft. Had she not been fearless and accustomed to the work, she would scarcely have ventured down that dank, slippery cave alone with a stranger. But she explained as she went, more graphically than Shonny, despite his genius.

"The passage is a hundred feet long, and descends through the solid rock," she said, "and wasn't made by man, but has been always here, ever since God made the rock. It is called the Well because of the dropping water."

The passage was so narrow and slippery that the tourist got through it with difficulty. Fortunately it was lighted at intervals by loopholes cut through the limestone rock, for his candle went out, and Gwen's loomed dimly before him. They reached the end at last, when Gwen relighted his candle, and said triumphantly: "This is the real Well, sir. Here you must drop in a pin to dress the White Lady."

A well it was not, since it was only a natural basin capable of containing a gallon or so of water, the bottom of which was visible. A number of pins lay beneath the water, which, Gwen said, had been there "ever since last autumn, and must be quite rusty." She dropped in a bright new pin herself, and presented one to the tourist who did likewise, with an attempt at a smile. His slouched wide-awake had been disarranged by the rock, and Gwen saw his face clearly for the first time. It was a melancholy, white, stony face, which frightened her.

"Do you believe in the White Lady?" he asked. "And what does she want with all these pins? How can a spirit fasten her gown?"

"That is always puzzling me, sir," answered Gwen showing her very white teeth.

"Would you like to be educated and made a lady of?" he asked abruptly.

"No, sir, I'd rather be as I am. Mamgu says the ladies aren't as happy and free as the country women," she replied.

But not quite liking the question or the look that accompanied it, she began to make her way back through the rocky passage. Had she been a reader of sensational romances, she would have thought to herself, "what a situation!" but happily she was not, and she merely mentally asked, "what is he meaning, I wonder?" He did not say, for it was as much as he could do to keep up with her, over the pointed, uneven, slippery rock.

Shonny was waiting for them at the entrance, and said Dorcas had been to ask if the gentleman would like to have tea. He overheard the question, and said, "The sooner the better; for he was tired."

Gwen begged him to come to the farm as soon as he had inspected the ruin, and ran off with Shonny. He wandered aimlessly about for a few minutes, and then stood to look at the magnificent view. Did he really look at it? The answer would be difficult. He stood on the immense height whence were visible valleys, ridges, river, woodland, as far as eye could reach on every side; but his heavy eyes scarcely looked as if they had received any impression which could be communicated to the soul within.

"These peasants are good and happy, in spite of their trials, while I have neither courage nor faith. God help me to both," he muttered, and turning hastily, walked towards the farm. Dorcas showed him at once into the parlour, as her mother's apartment continued to be called. Tisha, terrified at Gwen's sudden announcement, was up and dressed, and had actually obeyed orders so far as to put out her own china for the delectation of the "first tourist." He did not notice it, however, neither did he make enquiries concerning the age of the venerable bedstead, which, being closed, looked like an abnormally big black carved oaken chest.

"Are you Gwen's mother?" he asked instead.

"Yes, sir. She's a good girl, but having been living with her grandmother, isn't as feeling as she ought to be for me, who have had great troubles," she replied.

"Ah! your husband. Where is he?"

This abrupt question took Tisha aback. She was never good at concealment and always ready to air her grievances. She was not reticent like the rest of her family, and longed for some one to whom she could pour out her pent-up grief. Here was an opportunity. A stranger would not be likely to tell the neighbours what she had said, and the absence of old Gwen removed one restraint from her tongue.

"My husband, ach yn wir, sir, he's suffering penal servitude for life instead of somebody else," she replied, glancing at the door as if afraid of interruption.

"That sounds strange. How did it happen?" asked the tourist.

"He was up fishing miles away from here, when he was found, all of a sudden, beside a gentleman who was murdered. Thomas, his name was, and because my poor Toom and he used to quarrel about the little sewens in the river, they said he done the deed. He as 'ould never hurt a fly, and left me to punish the children when they were naughty."

Tisha began to weep.

"Where did it happen? What did he say?"

"He said he found the body, and they 'ouldn't believe him, and there was nobody else near but my poor Toom, and he had been quarrelling over the fish."

"Was no one else suspected? Was any money found?"

"No; but they did say that Thomas did ought to have had money about him: but my poor Toom had none. As his mother do say, he never did harm a fly in all his life, and every night and morning he was saying his prayers reglar, and reading his Bible day by day. But husht! Here's Gwen fach, and she will be keeping noise if she is hearing me talk of her father: and he as innocent as a baby."

Tisha wiped her eyes, and the tourist turned towards the door as if to watch the entrance of Gwenny and Dorcas with the teapot, the crumpets, and a certain plank-cake for which old Gwen was celebrated. All was so hot and well-buttered that he made pretence to snuff up the appetizing smell, though Gwenny thought he looked, as she expressed it, as white as a trout. Moreover, his hands trembled as he took up his teacup, and she heartily wished him off the premises. Still he appeared to be a gentleman. Tisha declared afterwards that he was as grand-spoken as Lord Dynevor or the Earl of Cawdor, whom she had seen at the cottage from time to time. Golden Grove and Dynevor Castle were both within no great distance of our castellated rock.

He made a good tea and praised the plank-cake. When he had finished he asked what their charge was for so excellent a meal. Ready Gwen replied that when there was a party, it was sixpence a head; but she thought Mamgu might ask ninepence when there was only one. He placed a florin in her hand, and she went into the kitchen in search of change, followed by Dorcas. During her temporary absence he rose to examine the carved bedstead, and standing by Tisha in her bee-hive chair, whispered to her that he should like to help her and her family in their trouble. He hoped to come back again, but meanwhile she must accept a trifle.

"Put it in your pocket till I am gone," he said, opening a pocket book and abstracting a paper, which he placed in her hand.

Not having the conscientious qualms of her family, she obeyed, and when Gwen returned with one shilling and threepence, the tourist was reseated, and Tisha had her hands innocently clasped on her lap.

"Here is a shilling for showing me over the castle, and you can give the threepence to Shonny," he said, to which arrangement Gwen saw no objection.

His hands still trembled as he took the coins and returned them, and he stammered slightly over his words.

"Are you ill, sir?" asked Gwenny. "Shall I give you some of Mamgu's cordial?"

"No, thank you. I am due at Carmarthen this evening, and must catch the next train."

He hurried off with a nod and a good day.

When he was fairly gone, Tisha took the paper from her pocket, unfolded it, and found that it was a five-pound note.

"What will Mamgu say?" was the general exclamation, while Tisha declared her intention of keeping it, contrary to Gwen's advice.

But Uncle Laban looked in before the day was done, and said he believed the good God had put it into the heart of the stranger to relieve the wants of a bereaved family, and that He would show what use was to be made of the money. "God seeth not as man seeth," he said, "and raiseth up friends where we least expect them. Let us pray to Him to show us how to use His blessings as we ought." And in simple faith they all knelt down and asked for a blessing on the gift and its donor.

ST. JOHN:

APOSTLE, EVANGELIST AND SEER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

VIII.—THE FOURTH GOSPEL AND THE THREE EPISTLES. (2.)

THE chief points of distinction between the Fourth Gospel and the other three must now be noted, partly because these have been employed as an argument against its authenticity, but chiefly because they bring to light hidden coincidences which confirm the truthfulness of all four.

1. According to the Fourth Gospel the ministry of our Lord lasted for at least two years and a half, possibly for a year longer, the time being defined by successive passovers; the first, after the call of His earliest disciples and the miracle in Cana (ch. ii. 13); the second, possibly at the time of the miracle in Bethesda (v. 1); the third (which Jesus did not attend) signalised by the miracle of the loaves and fishes and the discourse in the synagogue at Capernaum (vi. 4), and the fourth, by the Crucifixion (xiii. 1). But if, as Kepler first suggested, and many of the best modern critics have held, the festival mentioned in ch. v. 1 was the feast of Purim, only three passovers are included, and the interval between the fifth and sixth chapters shrinks to about a month.[1] The question is however immaterial to the argument. The synoptic Gospels give no such notes of time, and have been thought by many expositors to intimate that our Lord's ministry lasted but for one year; the reference to "the acceptable year of the Lord" being anciently employed to support this conclusion. From St. Luke's Gospel, however, it appears that at least one spring-time, and of course a passover, did occur during this period. "The second-first Sabbath" (Luke vi. 1), on any explanation of its meaning, was a passover Sabbath; and even if with the Revisers of 1881 we reject the phrase, the circumstances of the narrative equally point to the time of ripening corn. So far, then, the chronology of the Fourth Gospel is sustained by an undesigned and remarkable coincidence.

2. A still more noteworthy fact is that this Gospel places the scene of our Lord's ministry mainly in Jerusalem. The three preceding narratives are almost confined to Galilee; and from them alone it would appear as though Jesus had never visited the metropolis until the eve of His sufferings. A closer scrutiny, however, will again bring to light a hidden harmony between the synoptic and the Johannine accounts. We do not dwell on the remarkable various reading in Luke iv. 44: "He was preaching in the synagogues of Judæa," a reading, says Alford, which "must on any intelligible critical principles be adopted."[2] Other intimations there are, less open to doubt, of a Judæan ministry. "There followed Him to Galilee great multitudes of people from Jerusalem, and Judæa, and from beyond Jordan" (Matt. v. 25). At least one of his disciples, Judas, was a man of Kerioth, in the hill country south of Jerusalem; another, Joseph, of Arimathæa, to the north-west. But the most decisive passage is our Lord's pathetic appeal (Matt. xxiii. 37–39), "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem. . . how often would I have gathered thy children together! . . . . Ye shall not see Me henceforth." These are not words that belong to a first visit: the inference is irresistible that there had been a repeated and earnest ministry in the metropolis of the land—in a word, precisely such a ministry as only the Fourth Gospel records. Again, therefore, the harmony appears—all the more striking because not directly obvious.

3. It is undeniable, again, not only that John omits much that the other Evangelists give in full detail, but that he dwells far more prominently than they have done upon the sublimer aspects of our Lord's character and work, and especially upon His own assertion of His highest claims. That this fact may be fully explained we shall endeavour to show. But it is worth while here to remark that the omission of so many miracles was evidently designed by the evangelist. In fact, he fully recognises these wondrous works, although he enumerates so few. "The works that I do in My Father's name, these bear witness of Me" (x. 25). "This man," said the enemies of Jesus, "doeth many signs" (xi. 47). "Though He had done so many signs before them, yet they believed not on Him" (xii. 37). "Many other signs did Jesus in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book" (xxi. 30). The eight that are set down are recorded in view of the writer's great purpose: they are "signs," one and all, of spiritual truths beyond themselves. But the chief point to be noted here is that the other Gospels also contain some of the greatest of the sayings in which the Son of God advances His supreme claim. "A greater than Solomon is here." "In this place is One greater than the Temple." "All things are delivered unto Me of My Father, and no one knoweth the Son, but the Father; neither knoweth any one the Father, but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal Him" (Matt. xi. 27). This great passage in St. Matthew has been called Johannine: it suffices at least to show that Christ's assertion of oneness with the Father, so constantly found in the Fourth Gospel, was no afterthought, but belongs to the whole substance of evangelic record.

4. The chief point of external difference remains. From the account of the Last Supper as given by the first three Evangelists, we should naturally conclude that it was held on the evening of the passover feast, i.e., on the 14th of the month Nisan. "The Master saith, My time is at hand. I keep the passover at thy house with My disciples;" "With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer" (Matt. xxvi. 18; Luke xxii. 15). But from the account in the Fourth Gospel we should as naturally infer that the passover supper had yet to be eaten when Jesus was betrayed. "Before the feast of the passover" the supper was held, at which He washed His disciples' feet: when Judas went out some of the disciples thought that he had gone to buy what things were needed for the feast; the Jews on the early morning of the crucifixion would not enter into the Prætorium lest they should be defiled, and so be disqualified from eating the passover; and finally, when Jesus was led away to the cross "it was the Preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour" (ch. xiii. 1, 29; xviii. 28; xix. 14). These passages point in one direction; they have a cumulative force; and the attempts made by explaining them individually into a meaning other than their obvious one, can hardly be said to be successful. To us it seems certain that the writer of the Fourth Gospel intended to set forth the Christ as the true Paschal Lamb; His sacrifice being consummated at the very time when the lamb was directed to be slain. So he quotes from the Mosaic ordinance the words: "A bone of Him shall not be broken." Tradition confirms this view. John, it was said, persisted in celebrating the Christian feast on the fourteenth of Nisan, instead of the Sunday following, as usual in the western churches. The anniversary, as observed by him, was not that of the Lord's Supper, as strangely maintained by many writers, but that of the Lord's death, which he thus assigned to the time of the passover.

[1] The Feast of Purim was at the full moon of Adar, the month before Nisan.

[2] So also Westcott and Hort; but not the Revisers of 1881.

Now here is at least a superficial discrepancy between the Fourth Gospel and the rest; and it may fairly be argued that no writer wishing to pass off another evangelic narrative in the face of those already existing would have ventured to differ from their testimony on so obvious a point, and one on which the churches were so sensitive. The very difference proves artlessness, sincerity, and we may add, authority. The writer was one who knew the facts, and who had a right to speak. Instead of being an argument, therefore, against the authenticity of the Gospel, it is to us a strong confirmation. How to harmonize the two narratives remains a difficult problem, nor does any satisfactory solution appear possible.[1] Probably there are facts unknown to us, connected with the laws and usages of the festival, which would make all plain. At present the tendency among critics appears to be to accept the literal meaning of St. John's account, from which it would seem to follow that the meal as described by the other evangelists was an anticipation of the customary passover: and certainly there are indications in their words of something unusual in the celebration. To the early fathers in general Christ was the true Passover, and the great Sacrifice was offered at the very hour when the victim was slain.

Too much perhaps, in the discussion of the Fourth Gospel, has been made of differences; too little of that deep spiritual accord in which all the evangelists are one. For centuries it never seems to have occurred to devout readers of the Gospels, however critical they might be, that the several pictures of the Master were mutually opposed. One Christ has been recognised in all outward diversities—one Divine Man, to whose portrait each inspired artist added lines of his own, while John heightened the delineation of the rest to an unspeakable beauty. This recognition is a fact of spiritual experience to which we may fearlessly appeal. To secure such a result no human skill would have been sufficient. The outline must have been rendered indistinct by the successive touches, or the features would have been blurred. As it is, the Only-begotten of the Father stands forth clear and glorious to view, the same Jesus upon the Mount of Beatitudes and in the Upper Chamber, amid the uplands of Bethsaida or in the courts of His Father's house in Jerusalem. Critics may strive to destroy this sense of unity; but a deeper criticism, in which literary taste concurs with the instincts of the heart, restores the image, that had for a moment been broken by the waves of doubt, to its completeness in the crystal depths of every soul in sympathy with the Divine.

[1] That the Last Supper was the true passover is maintained by Wieseler, Chronological Synopsis of the Four Gospels; by Dr. Edersheim, Life of Jesus the Messiah; and by Dr. E. R. Conder, Outlines of the Life of Christ. That the crucifixion was at the time of the passover, is held by Canon Westcott, Speaker's Commentary on St. John; and by Dr. Sanday, Authorship and Historical Character of the Fourth Gospel. Many other writers might be quoted on either side, but the above have given all the material arguments.

It should never be forgotten that the purpose of St. John was in part apologetic. His steady aim was to recount those incidents which were the test of faith,—which led disciples to believe, or in which the antagonism of evil natures found new incentives to dispute or to oppose. Faith and unfaith, truth and falsehood, light and darkness, death and life, such are the contrasts of this wondrous history. As in the flashing vision of the Apocalypse, Michael and his angels contend with the dragon and his angels, only the contest is fought out in the spiritual realm. So the old man at Ephesus recalls as the centre of these warring forces, the face, the form, the words, of Him whom he had known so well. It was no wonder that his narrative should present points of difference from the earlier chronicles of that divine life. Even from a human point of view, our estimate of the noblest greatness is not best made close at hand. A certain distance is required, in space and time, to secure the true perspective. All the highest genius seems to warn those who attach themselves to it in closest intimacy: "I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." By loving thought and remembrance, insight is deepened; words and acts half understood at the time assume their true significance; the full meaning of the character and life is apprehended—or, to apply the thought to the contemplation and memory of the Divine, as quickened by heavenly inspiration, the words are fulfilled: "The Paraclete, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in My name, He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."

Tempted like as we are.

"For we have not an high priest which cannot be touched with the feeling of our infirmities; but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin."—Hebrews iv. 15.

SAVIOUR, in all things made our very kin,
Tempted like us, yet pure from stain of sin,
O strong to succour struggling hearts and tried,
In Satan's onset leave not Thou my side;
Nerve Thou mine arm the Spirit's sword to wield,
And with Thy "Lo, 'tis written," win the field.

When Satan tempts my heart in weak despair,
Heedless of all my Father's watchful care,
To stretch my hand and take the thing I need,
As though at this His arm fell short indeed,
Recall the word, "When fails his daily bread,
God sendeth bread from Heaven, and man is fed."

When Satan tempts my heart in reckless pride
To trust that God will hold and lead and guide—
Claiming the pledge to saints of olden days,
The while I turn from mine appointed ways—
Recall the word, "Thou shalt not tempt thy God, Nor look for grace in paths perversely trod."

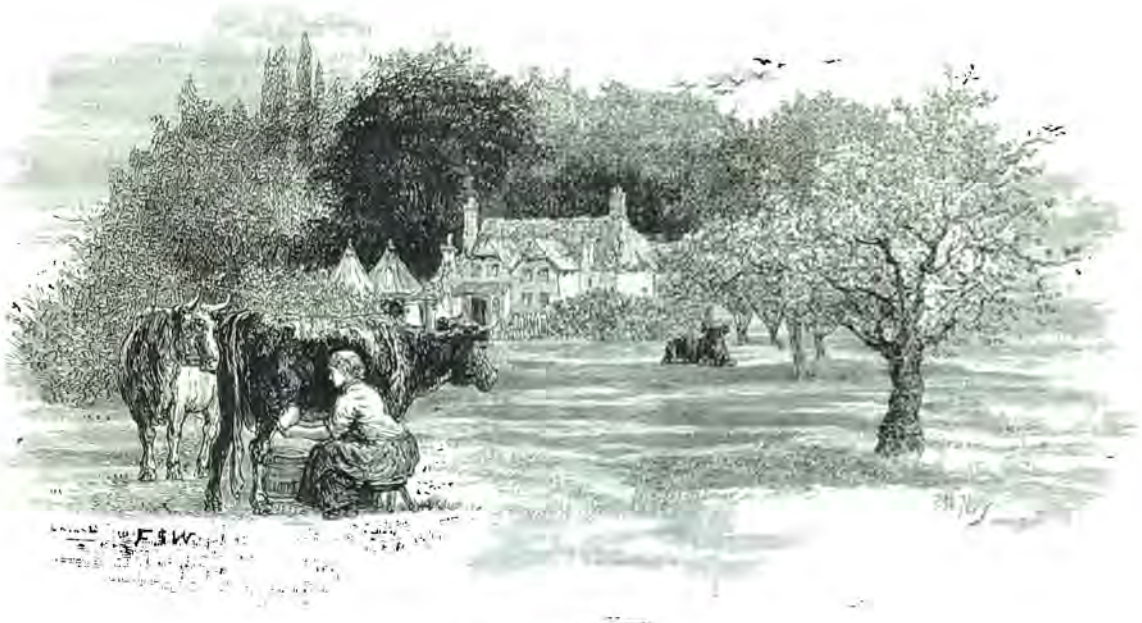
When Satan tempts my heart, for praise or gain,
For any chosen end I might attain,
To bate a little of God's homage due,
Or fearing Him, to bow to Mammon too,
Recall the word, "Serve thou the Lord alone,
His favour only seek, His lordship own."

FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE.

ON COMING TO LONDON.



LIFE IN THE OLD HOME.

HOW many people come to London yearly to seek their fortune? Year by year the great majority in want of work is greater, and the work proportionately less. As the crowds grow the struggle becomes keener, the wages sink, and the chances of living get more precarious.

And yet the death-rate lessens! What is to be the end of it all? Are we coming to the time when this country is to be run entirely on half-loaf principles?

This thronging to the town is a serious matter. It has its religious as well as its social aspects. There is no social question of the present day which bears more immediately on the moral welfare of our people.

A strange position is ours. Here we have a vast empire, with the largest extent of cultivable land in the hands of one people that ever the world saw, and in one little corner of it is a congested mass of workers idle, and money idle; and in the rest of it, waste and despised, are millions of acres of fertile upland and lowland, with rivers and ports and unequalled communications waiting in vain for labour and capital to develop them and yield a store of wealth to all such as has never yet blessed mankind!

"The worker goes where work awaits him!" Would it were true! Is it not rather that the worker goes where work used to await him; and that like a sheep he follows in the track of his forerunners, never thinking of seeking a path for himself?

But to go to the colonies is "banishment!" Is it? In the days of George the Second, to go no farther back, was not coming to London "banishment?" As many weeks then were spent on the road as are spent now on the road to Australia; as many weeks elapsed then between the despatch and receipt of an inland letter as now take a letter half round the world. How many men then went back to their friends? Far fewer, actually and proportionately, than come back now from over the sea.

But the stream is flowing. It has made its bed, widened it, and deepened it, and become a river; and nothing will stop it without disaster. All that can be done is to lead its waters onwards by continuing the channel. There was once a worthy who thanked Providence for always making big rivers flow past big towns. He would have further cause for congratulation if matters should so turn out as to make the great population river flow past the big town and on to the ocean of untilled land that yields the only hope to the crowding English. "The increase of population must be checked," say the economists! "The ocean must be kept out with a broom," said Mrs.

LAST WORDS.

Partington! The solution of the economical problem lies not in checking the population but in planting the population where its work will pay.

And with most of our country-born there is an idea that work will pay best in London. And there is reason in this idea. Unfortunately, the course of trade in this old country has been such as to unduly develop the middleman. As the people grow more numerous, the distributing trades, which, in the strict sense of the term are not trades at all, assume an importance out of all proportion to the good they do. The shopkeeper performs a useful function as a sort of commissariat clerk dealing out food and clothes, but the bulk of the people are no richer for his proceedings. He produces nothing; and those who do produce have to produce at a cheaper rate in order that the distributor may live. It is the man who makes, not the man who deals, that adds to the nation's wealth. But the man who makes has to work hard for his living; the man who tills works far harder than the man who sells, and his gains are less. The man who takes toll of his fellow-man has an easier time of it than the one whose prey is the land and its produce; and his occupation is more constant. No wonder then that the distributing occupations have the call, and that the flow of recruits should be towards them. No wonder that the town, where those distributing occupations thrive most, should gradually drain the country, and that to the centres of population men should come to live on each other.

And the quantities in which they come, is shown at the great decennial numberings of the people. According to the last census, when the something called London held a population of 3,816,000, only 2,401,000 of them were of London birth; the rest were from all parts of the kingdom, and all parts of the empire, in addition to 1253 folks who had been born at sea, and 78,000 foreigners. Just as a magnet loses attractive power with distance, so does a great city. Draw circles round the city as a centre, and the farther the circle from the city the less is the tribute it pays. To show this clearly, let us eliminate from the 1,336,000 non-cockneys such as have obviouly come by sea, or in through trains at cheap rates. Of colonists we have 26,500, the majority being women; of Irish we have 80,700, the majority being women; of Scotch we have 49,500 the majority being men—and in answer to a well-worn joke, it may be pointed out, that, notwithstanding all the journeyings of Scotchmen into England, there are not nearly so many Scotchmen in England, as proportionately there are Englishmen in Scotland. With 5397 from sundry islands, we may assume that we have deducted from the incomers all who have been tempted by special travelling facilities, so that the rest may be compared on equal terms.

GOOD-BYE.

UNDER THE SHADOW OF ST. PAUL'S.

Of these, the great contributors to the population of the metropolis are the south-eastern counties of Surrey, Kent, Sussex, Hampshire, and Berkshire, which between them sent 289,000 natives to the London crowd. Next to them, and continuing the inner ring, are the south-midland counties of Middlesex, Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, Northamptonshire, Huntingdonshire, Bedfordshire, and Cambridgeshire, by which London was reinforced with 249,000 natives. Next to them come the eastern counties—Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk, which contributed 195,000; so that 734,000 of the London population were born in the counties that surround it. Beginning the outer ring, we find that 169,000 came from Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Devonshire, Cornwall, and Somerset; 95,000 from Gloucestershire, Hereford, Shropshire, Staffordshire, Worcestershire, and Warwickshire; and 42,000 from Leicestershire, Rutland, Lincolnshire, Nottingham, and Derby. This completes another ring. Taking another and further round we find Cheshire and Lancashire contributing 34,000, and Yorkshire only 32,000; and taking the outside, and now detached portions, we have Monmouth and Wales contributing 28,000, while Durham, Northumberland, Cumberland, and Westmoreland send up only 20,000. The meaning of these figures is obvious; the nearer the attractive point the greater the attraction, and the less the cost of travel.

Taking the natives of the whole country, about three quarters live in the county of their birth, the remaining fourth, migrating chiefly to the towns. More women migrate to the towns, than men—as indeed, is to be expected. The counties retaining most of its natives attract most strangers, and the county that retains fewest attracts fewest, so that there are counties of attraction and counties of dispersal. The most attractive county in this, if not in another sense, is Surrey. The population of Surrey at the last census was 1,436,899, but the total number of persons born in the county, and discoverable in the county, was only 996,655, so that over 440,000 Surrey natives were still required to make up the number of people then living within its boundaries. As a county of dispersal, the best example was Radnor, the natives of which, scattered through the kingdom, were more than 43 per cent. in excess of the county's population. This is the highest dispersal percentage, but there are twenty-four other counties like Radnor acting as feeders to the rest.

A CONTRAST.

These are all figures of seven years ago, but they are facts not estimates. Those who ought to know tell us that this rush to the towns is greater than it ever was, and that every year it increases. London has the lion's share of course, but the great manufacturing towns of the north are growing at a rapid rate. And in them, as in London, poverty is increasing by this influx of outsiders. In truth, these outsiders are not always desirable acquisitions. With the enterprising there come the shiftless and the unruly. The town has its attractions for the men who have failed. Chance work is plentiful: there is no doubt about the existence of the work, the doubt is as to its falling to any particular individual, and this uncertainty brings a certain sporting excitement into its reach which is not unpleasing to the speculative mind. And thus we are led to another consideration we cannot well pass by. That the streets of the city are paved with gold is a saying as old as the city, for where men are gathered the thickest, there money is easiest made; but it is made not out of the streets, but out of those that throng them, and of the thousands who come to make their fortunes, the majority become the victims of the money spinner.

That London is equal to breeding enough to carry on its own business is obvious; but how to put a stop to its increase from the outside is not so clear. What are our country folks to do? Agriculture is under a cloud; mining is in a bad way; and even the country factory is running half-time owing to "the natives of the distant shore," becoming sharp enough to see that by manufacturing a product in the country of its growth, two profits and a double freight are saved. Village industries have been started, to which all wish well, but they are mere drops in the ocean. Something else must be done, but what is it? Talk there is much; work there is none. And in a hopeless, helpless way, our should-be leaders are standing by watching the great migration.

A LONDON ATTIC.

As things now are, it must be, in most cases, a migration unto misery. Even the news of work does harm; so many hearing where only one can obtain. In fact, as it has been pithily put, in the east and south of London more work means more workhouse. It is all very well to say that the worthy can always get work; so they can if they have the means of living till their worth is discovered; but it takes a long time to find them in the crowd, and the greater the crowd the greater the chance of their not being found when wanted.

Though success in finding work may be a proof of merit, the want of that success is no proof of incapacity. Small as the percentage may be of the deserving among the poor of this great city, that percentage represents many hundred individuals thrust under and kept down by the daily increasing throng. And under such circumstances fierce is the temptation to do evil and join the ranks of the desperate.

It is a pitiful story of disillusionment, this coming to London—a story that has often been told. The happy village home, the journey full of hope, the wearying search day after day for something to do, the gradual sinking into poverty, the struggle to keep body and soul together in a cheerless garret, slaving at starvation wages for the rest of a lifetime, in fact—till the fairy prince arrives, in fiction. But the prince seldom comes, and the miserable toil goes on—on match-boxes, perhaps, at twopence a gross, or shirts at two for three halfpence. As with the women, so with the men; never a chance of regular work; living from hand to mouth, beaten down; the hope deferred making the heart sick of the world. Perhaps they are married; then the doom is worse. Tenants of a wretched room in a dirty barracks in a narrow street, keeping themselves and their children just alive to cry out for charity, and demand it as the ransom paid by the rich to the poor.

This growth of the towns cries out for the sympathetic and practical attention of all Christian people. It is a fruitful source of evil. In over-crowded dens crime thrives apace, and sin runs riot.

And yearly the pressure grows worse; and the same city is the richest in the world; and the city is the capital of a state that has 5,760,000,000 acres of land within its boundaries. Surely there is something wrong!

If the Lambeth Conference did well to direct the attention of the clergy to social questions, surely all who labour amongst the poor have some responsibility in a matter such as this.

W. J. GORDON.

Things New and Old.

GORDON OF KHARTOUM.—In writing of courage, it is impossible to omit a reference to my friend and comrade Charley Gordon. His courage was an instinct, fortified by faith in God and in a future life. This life had no intense pleasures for him, and he shrank from the applause of men. He did whatever came to his hand with all the loyalty of an English gentleman, and especially with the earnestness and zeal of a servant of Christ. The world was to him a sort of prison, beyond the precincts of which lay that New Jerusalem from which his waking thoughts, and very dreams even, never wandered. Whilst in this mundane prison, he tried to do God's bidding with that unbounded sympathy for the sufferings of all animal creation that was one of his most remarkable characteristics. And yet he had absolutely no regard for human life. To die, to be killed, or to kill, was as natural, as much a matter of course, to him as to be born. He cared nothing for his own life, and could not understand why others should set any value upon theirs. It always struck me when conversing with him that he was, more than any man I ever knew well, made up of opposite qualities. The God whom he worshipped was at one time the sternly just God described in the Old Testament; at another He was the God of love revealed to us by Christ. Not that these two conceptions contradict each other, rather is each the complement of the other; but yet the union of such widely different qualities which seems to us natural, necessary even, in God, strikes us as strange in a man. And so the union in Gordon of stern severity and exceeding gentleness always seemed to me to be extraordinary. It was not that Gordon was simply brave in action, but that danger had actually and positively for him nothing terrible about it. There is a curious page in his Khartoum diary where he discusses the question of whether he should, or should not, allow the Mahdi to take him alive. Death to him was really the open door to a new life, and whether he passed through it in action or under any other circumstances was all the same. Death to him was merely a release from all the paltriness of human life. When shall we see his like again?—Lord Wolseley in the Fortnightly Review.

THE MCALL MISSION.—The Rev. Paul Monod has published some interesting facts illustrating the indirect benefits of the McAll Mission. The direct benefits are widely known from the official reports, verified by the personal testimony of many visitors. There are now no fewer than a hundred and thirteen mission rooms, where services are regularly held, of which thirty-three are in Paris.

It is in the provincial towns that the facts recorded by M. Paul Monod are most remarkable. As in the case of the visit of evangelists, like Messrs. Moody and Sankey and other zealous gospellers in English and American towns, the operations of the McAll Mission have stirred the missionary zeal of the French Protestant churches, many of which had fallen into a somewhat torpid condition. From this state many have been awakened to active and aggressive work in the cause of Christ, through the impetus given by the McAll evangelists.

The churches at Marseilles have taken entire charge of several of the mission halls, opened in connection with the McAll Mission. The Consistory of the churches at Rheims is undertaking, at its own expense, a similar charge for that city. This re-awakening of the missionary spirit in the old Protestant communities is a promising feature in the recent experience of the evangelistic movement. Numbers of people attend the meetings, who never were seen to enter a church, or temple of the reformed faith. Some may at first be attracted by curiosity, but after a time it is observed that in each mission hall are groups of regular attendants who never miss a meeting, and who appear to be earnest inquirers and devout worshippers.

INDIAN MARRIAGE REFORMS.—The gradual influence of European ideas upon the civilisation of India is seen in the marriage reforms adopted by the Rajput chiefs, at the instigation of Colonel Walter, the British Agent. At his suggestion the chiefs, assembled in council, agreed upon a set of rules which, if fully carried out, cannot but effect a most beneficial change. The money spent upon marriage ceremonies is to be strictly limited in proportion to the income of the parents. Men who have at least Rs. 20,000 a year are not to spend more than a quarter of their income, while those who have less than Rs. 1,000 a year may in no case exceed two-thirds. This amount is to include everything—the actual marriage, the betrothal, and the largess usually bestowed upon certain classes of people who have been wont to assemble in large numbers wherever a marriage was to be performed. Furthermore, expenses at funerals are to be limited likewise. But perhaps the most important regulation is one that was proposed by one of the oldest and most respected of the chiefs themselves. It bears upon the age of marriage, and declares that henceforth boys are not to be married under eighteen, nor girls under fourteen. When the ordinary age of marriage is remembered, this change appears a great advance.

THE STORY OF THE MARÉ MISSION.

THE little island of Maré, from whence the agent of the London Missionary Society, the Rev. John Jones, was recently expelled under French authority, is one of the Loyalty group, lying between New Caledonia and the New Hebrides, from the former of which it is distant some seventy miles. As seen from the sea it appears rocky and barren, but it has coral cliffs which rise in some places abruptly from the sea to a height of about two hundred feet. In other places it presents lower levels, only some twenty to thirty feet above the sea, and these are dotted over with villages. The top of the island is flat and covered with dense scrubs, with here and there lofty trees. The island is but small, being only about twenty miles in length, varying in breadth by reason of its irregular coast.

The population numbers about 4,000. Before the missionaries landed on the island the people lived in small tribes, which were little more than families, and between them was kept up a constant strife, differences on the most trivial matters generating petty wars. They might indeed have been described as naked savages, their only approach to clothing being a cord round the man's waist, and a fringe sufficing for the woman. The men painted their bodies white and adorned them with strange devices; the women cut their hair short and shaved the crown. They were ferocious cannibals, eating their enemies taken in war. Their ordinary food consisted of yam and other vegetables, and what fish could be got from the not very prolific harvest of the deep seas around. Their dwellings were huts, made by a post being fastened in the earth, and twigs stretched around it, with a thatch of grass or sugar-cane leaves. A more rude or barbarous race could scarcely have been conceived of than were the people of Maré before the English missionaries went to them.

Christianity was first introduced to the island by some native teachers from Samoa, who landed there from the John Williams, and were left to teach the people as much of the Gospel as they knew. In 1854 two missionaries from the London Missionary Society proceeded to Maré under the direction of the Samoan District Committee. These were Messrs. Creagh and Jones, who settled respectively on the west and north sides of the cape, and at once commenced missionary operations. It may be noticed here that after some years of labour Mr. Creagh removed from the island, the entire work of the mission being from that time under the superintendence of Mr. Jones. It is the work of the latter, therefore, that has for many years stamped itself on the entire island.

Those who have long known Mr. Jones, and who have from time to time been made acquainted with his work, have considered him pre-eminently fitted both by nature and grace for the special work that had to be done in Maré. On going there he at once constituted himself the friend and helper as well as the religious teacher of the people, while they were interested and attracted by the new way of living, and the various conveniences of civilisation introduced by the missionary. They saw the missionary build for himself a better house than they had ever seen before; under his superintendence some of them had assisted him in the building of it, and soon they desired "improved dwellings" for themselves, and set to work to rear them. The door and the window, and the lock and key were indeed to them works of art; but with the help of the missionary, who supplied them with the latter and directed them in the construction of the former, they soon attained to respectable cottage homes. The mission station was the centre of all operations. Some fourteen acres of land were marked off and enclosed in a thick stone wall. Within were the missionaries' premises, a house, and ere long a church and school, with several work-shops, and a depot for stores.

It was soon discovered that but little way could be made in training the children to better their heathen habits without taking them wholly under the care of the missionary and his wife. A "boarding-school" was therefore established, where the children were fed and clothed as well as taught. All this was of course without expense to the parents, contributions of money and clothing and other commodities—consignments of soap and simple medicines being specially desired—came from friends in England. About a guinea a year would supply a child with yams and so sustain life, and many in England were pleased to support a child in Mrs. Jones's boarding school. Many of the present generation of Maré people passed through this school and so attained "better manners" and sweeter habits than those of their fathers and mothers, together with the knowledge of the truth of the Gospel. Thus civilization took root and extended in various directions, the people soon took to clothing when they came to their "right mind," and they had to resort to the mission stores to obtain a supply of calico such as sufficed for their simple needs, as well as such other things as could only be had by the negotiations of the missionary from England or Sydney. Amusing stories are told of the taste of the people in respect to the clothing they chose, their preference being decidedly in favour of "loud" colours, and with but little appreciation of "neutral tints." Fairly clothed, comfortably housed, and tolerably well-informed respecting things in general that concerned them, the people of Maré became a civilized and comparatively happy people. They are now remarkable for their industry and thrift. Something like commerce is beginning amongst them, and they busy themselves in growing maize for export. They have formed roads, under the instructions of the missionary, from one part of the island to another. Horses, donkeys, and cattle have been introduced, and work is done and business transacted under improved conditions. The homes of the people are getting to have quite a European air of comfort, furniture—tables, chairs, clocks, chests of drawers, etc.—being imported, and purchased by those who have the means.

Best of all the land is Christianized, the people have a high regard for the religion that has been the means of their elevation. Of course they are not all Christians any more than are the people in England. But the idols are "utterly abolished," Christian churches have been formed, and these are presided over by native pastors, who are elected by the vote of the Church; they also support themselves as churches, not taking help from the Society at home, but sending contributions to it in acknowledgment of the good they have received at the hands of its agents. Family prayer is almost general throughout the island, and family life obtains. Mention might be made of the translation of the Scriptures into the language of the people, involving of course the formation of a language.

And all this has been the work of Mr. Jones, who has well earned for himself the designation of "The Apostle of Maré." What John Williams was to other of the islands of those seas, John Jones has been to this little island.

So the good work has gone on in Maré; but as long ago as 1864, the French authorities stationed in New Caledonia cast eyes on the island, determined to "annex" it, as well as the neighbouring island of Lifu. It was done on the false showing that these islands were dependencies of New Caledonia. At Lifu the people resisted what was deemed an invasion, and the invaders had to meet hostility. When the governor appeared at Maré with an armed force, the missionary advised the natives not to resist. At first the French authorities occasioned but little trouble, they simply held the island, and their rule was not felt. It was always suspected that the French priests, emissaries of the Church of Rome, were at the bottom of the annexation, and certainly they soon began to plot and to stir up strife. The people showing little willingness to desert their Protestant "bishop" who had done so much for them, the determination of the priests to get rid of the English missionary became the more fixed. Only some 600 converts set over against 3300 nominally evangelised Christians would not satisfy their ambition. So they were continually making their representations to the governor, which were sometimes if not always credited. From time to time the work of the missionary was curtailed, the school was closed, and ere long Mr. Jones felt obliged to confine his exertions almost wholly to the completion of the translation of the Scriptures, hoping thereby to have the whole of the Bible ready to leave with the people, should things come to the worst.

By the most insidious means did the government authorities seek to undermine the missionary's influence. Seeing that the people did not take kindly to the régime of the priests, a French pasteur was brought in to turn away the hearts of the people, but this device did not succeed to any extent. "At length events culminated in Mr. Jones's expulsion from the island." Home, church, the loved mission station, and the dear people for whose good the devoted missionary had spent his life's labours—all had to be left at an hour's notice. Happily Mrs. Jones was spared part of this trial, being at the time with her daughters in Sydney.

Meanwhile the people of Maré are "as sheep having no shepherd," and with the wolves not far off. True, they have their native pastors, but these are harassed and obstructed in their work; their churches are taken from them, and only household worship allowed; and we know not what may yet be heard of the treatment of the pastors and of their flocks. Some of them have already suffered imprisonment and exile for their fidelity. They are indeed an afflicted and persecuted people. The effect of French influence upon some of the unconverted inhabitants of the island is already disastrous. Drunkenness, Sabbath-breaking, and licentiousness are gaining hold, and the young are rather encouraged than checked in evil habits.

The friends of missions may well ask whether nothing can be done to arrest the present state of things in Maré, and to right a grievous wrong. Is the life-work of a devoted and efficient missionary to be upset by an unjustified invasion on the part of a foreign power? Are the valuable mission premises to be "annexed" also by French officials or by popish priests? Are the people to be handed over without protest to the emissaries of Rome? We are aware of the extreme delicacy with which the French Government must be approached in such a case; but surely an appeal may be made to justice and honour.

A deputation, consisting of some sixty members of Parliament and other influential gentlemen, was received by Lord Salisbury, who questioned Mr. Jones and expressed sympathy with him in the treatment he had received. Lord Salisbury intimated that Mr. Jones being hurried away from the island without the opportunity of arranging for the disposal of his own and of the mission property, was the point to be regarded as the most serious, and that upon this the French Government might effectually be approached. This no doubt will be taken up by our government. The issue must be awaited with due patience, but meanwhile events show that the danger of new complications is not overpast.

J. BRANWHITE FRENCH.

WILLIE WILLS' WINGS.

CHAPTER IX.

I MUST not dwell upon little Willie's history during his stay at the Refuge. There would be much to tell of his beautiful life which would make us very very glad to hear. Willie daily grew in grace, or, as Mrs. Brown, the matron, put it, he was just like a bit of sunshine amongst them—not talking, but living Christ. Oh, how patient he was when teased! How good to the boys who treated him badly! And what a tender-hearted little fellow to the boys younger than himself! Willie was very popular, and oh, so happy!

One day Mrs. Brown came for him in school. Her kind face was literally all aglow with delight.

"A caller for you, Willie," she said, looking a little mysterious.

Our Willie hastened into Mrs. Brown's own private room, to find Miss Rose Simmonds, who was on a visit to her uncle, and had come to see her little Sunday-school scholar. She had had a long talk with Mrs. Brown before Willie had been sent for. Hence she knew a few details of his history.

Miss Simmonds noticed, in spite of Willie's beaming face, that he was much thinner, and looked very very delicate.

"Willie, I can see your wings have been growing," she said when Mrs. Brown withdrew, to give them a little time alone together.

Willie blushed.

"Yes, miss, I hope so," he said softly; then he added: "When my cough was so bad, and my side was always aching, and I seemed in everybody's way, I thought perhaps when they grew strong enough, I might fly home to heaven."

"And not live on earth an angel-boy?" said Rose Simmonds questioningly.

"Please, miss, it was only if I wasn't wanted here. I'm very very happy now; but—but——" And Willie hesitated.

"What is it, Willie?" said Miss Simmonds encouragingly.

"Please, miss," Willie went on shyly, "doesn't the Bible talk of boys and girls playing in heaven? I think they'd play a bit more softly than here. I get tired in the romps here; but I'd be able to manage it there, if my turn comes to go before I get grown-up."

Poor Willie! Miss Simmonds thought of these words when a week later she watched beside his bed as he lay stricken for death—the doctor feared—with a fever then raging in the town. Willie had been unconscious for hours; but now he recognised his kind nurse and friend, and smiled on Rose.

"Can I do anything for you, Willie?" inquired Rose softly.

Knowing how ill he was, she was very very anxious to learn his wishes, now that he could think and speak.

"Would you go," Willie began, then stopped a moment to collect his thoughts, "to No. 4, Poole Court, down by the Fish Market, and ask Mrs. Jones to let me see baby? I do so want to say good-bye to baby." And Willie's eyes glistened with tears as he added, under his breath, "little dear!"

"But Willie," said Rose gently, "you are suffering with a bad fever, and baby might take it."

"Oh, please, miss, then I send my love, and—a kiss—instead," said Willie, with something of the old impetuous ring in his tones. Then he added earnestly: "But won't it hurt you, miss, please? Please don't stay if it's going to hurt you?"

"The doctor says I am all safe, Willie," said Miss Simmonds brightly. "I was ill with this same fever last year, and since then have nursed two dear little nieces through it."

Willie only smiled in answer, then asked for water, and finally sank again to sleep. By-and-by Mrs. Brown came to take her place, and Rose left, and after changing her clothes, washing her hands and face, and rinsing her mouth in Condy's fluid, to insure being free from infection, she went down to Poole Court, to give Mrs. Jones Willie's message.

"Perhaps," Rose said to herself, "they might have heard some news of Willie's father and mother."

CHAPTER X.

ROSE found Mrs. Jones at home. Twice in the past twelve months had she heard from Willie, but only that very morning had she for the first time seen anything of his parents since he had left.

"They are staying here, but won't be in yet awhile, I fear," she said feelingly. "The very minute they do come, I'll send them on; but what about infection?"

"Oh, you must trust us to see to that!" said Rose. "The doctor is very particular! It would be a pity for them to lose the hope of seeing him once more."

"Poor bairn—poor bairn!" said Mrs. Jones weeping. "I always said he was too good for this world! He taught me my first good thought of a better life. I've been to church regular of late; but I owe it all to Willie's silent example for good."

Miss Simmonds saw the baby, now a bonny little pet of twenty months, and gave her a kiss for Willie; then she left Poole Court to go home to dine with her uncle, and returned later to the Refuge.

It was midnight. Willie lay dozing, his breathing very laboured, many signs that life was ebbing. A man and woman, and girl of about twenty, stood by the bedside weeping bitterly. These were Willie's father and mother and sister. As yet he had not recognised them.

"Dear lamb!" wailed his mother; "and he always was such a little Christian! More shame to us to have treated him as we did!"

"Ay, ay!" said Willie's father; "we were cruel, and no mistake. May God forgive us and our likes!" And honest tears coursed down his cheek.

Willie roused a little, gazed round him, then recognised his people.

He smiled very sweetly upon each in turn.

"How good God is! I did so long for this," he said feebly. Then, in a louder tone: "Dear father, and mother, and sister, I'm going—going—away from this world, and I do want you to come too! My Saviour. . . . may be your Saviour."

He paused, and only his father's and mother's sobs broke the silence. His sister stood cold and hard, and unmoved. Willie closed his eyes, and lifted his hand, and prayed.

"Dear Lord Jesus, please bless my dear father and mother, and sister Sal. Give them new hearts, then they will love Thee and—hate sin. Help them all to give—up—the—drink—and—bad—words. Let them go to church—on Sunday; and bless all my other brothers and sisters. Forgive us every one our sins, because Jesus died—for us, and wants—us to come to his—beautiful—home—in heaven. For Jesus Christ's sake. Amen."

As Willie paused, his sister knelt down by his bedside and kissed his hand again and again, now weeping bitterly.

Willie stroked her hair tenderly with his remaining free hand; then, looking at both father and mother, he said hoarsely—

"Promise—promise—no more drink—for Willie's sake."

"I promise."

"I vow it."

"And I too," said all three in chorus; and Willie waved his hand, and his face was radiant with joy.

Mrs. Brown and Rose were in the room. He beckoned them nearer, and whispered faintly—

"My love to all the boys, and tell them—to live—for—my Jesus."

Then, fixing his eyes on Rose, he said—

"Thank the cripple boy—you've told me about, but whom I've never seen—for helping me—to try to do right. Tell him we'll meet in heaven. My wings—the Lord Jesus will teach me how to fly."

And Willie smiled, and that smile—unlike any other—never faded from his face, but seemed as the first bright gleam of heavenly sunshine which rested on him as he passed within the portal of his Saviour's home.

Little Willie's influence is still felt at that Refuge, although many years have passed since he left it for his heavenly home; and Rose Simmonds often talks to her Sunday-school class of the possibility of being like the cripple lad and Willie Wills.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XXI.

I give it all.

The ark, and Israel and Judah abide in tents.

Why have I found grace in thine eyes that thou shouldest take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger?

Give me a man that we may fight together.

Saviours shall come up on Mount Zion to judge the Mount of Esau.

Let me not fall into the hand of man.

Why hast thou deceived me so, and sent away mine enemy that he is escaped?

The Lord killeth and maketh alive.

I coveted them and took them, and, behold, they are hid in the earth.

I cannot escape to the mountain, lest some evil take me, and I die.

Come in, thou blessed of the Lord; wherefore standest thou without?

When I have a convenient season I will call for thee.

I had not thought to see thy face.

I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding.

This is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead.

We have found this man a pestilent fellow.

I sat on the judgment seat and commanded the man to be brought forth.

There is no nation or kingdom whither my lord hath not sent to seek thee.

Behold, thou trustest upon the staff of this bruised reed, even upon Egypt.

My lord Joab, and the servants of my lord, are encamped in the open fields.

Rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft.

Search out each text, and find the speaker's name
And set it down;
Many enjoyed an honourable fame
And wide renown;
Patriarch, priest and angel, each are here,
And Haran's son;
Governor, giant, orator appear
When all are done;
Servant and master, too, prophet and king,
Maiden and wife,
And one who dared to touch the cursed thing,
And lost his life.
Initials give, when taken from them all,
The words of one who built a city wall.

L. T.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. XI.

Write out these texts and then mark one word in each to form another text containing a promise.

1. He only is my Rock and my Salvation.—Psa. lxii. 6.
2. Come and hear, all ye that fear God.—Psa. lxvi. 16.
3. He that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve Me.—Psa. ci. 7.
4. Do not My words do good to him that walketh uprightly?—Micah ii. 7.
5. He that walketh with wise men shall be wise.—Prov. xiii. 20.
6. And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death.—Lev. xxiv. 17.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMAS.

NO. XVIII.—p. 592.—JESUS CHRIST, OUR REDEEMER.

1. J-erich-o	Josh. vi. 26.
2. E-lih-u	Job xxxii. 2.
3. S-ei-r	Ezekiel xxxv. 2.
4. U-r	Gen. xv. 7.
5. S-hunamit-e	2 Kings iv. 12, 13, 26.
6. C-hilma-d	Ezekiel xxvii. 23.
7. H-ittit-e	2 Sam. xi. 6.
8. R-om-e	Acts xxviii. 16–31.
9. I-coniu-m	Acts xiii. 51.
10. S-alom-e	Mark xv. 40.
11. T-abo-r	Judges iv. 6.

NO. XIX.—p. 622.—ANANIAS, Acts ix. 8, 9, 17; xxiii. 2, v. 5; AGRIPPA, Acts xxv. 13.

A-rimathæ-A	Matt. xxvii. 57–60.
G-oshe-N	Gen. xlvii. 1–6.
R-hod-A	Acts xii. 11–15.
I-bza-N	Judges xii. 7–9.
P-hilipp-I	Acts xvi. 12, 13.
P-ersi-A	Ezra i. 1–3.
A-pollo-S	Acts xviii. 24–27.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE PUZZLE.

NO. I.—p. 622.

Jeremiah xxxii. 14.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

OLD GWEN.

CHAPTER IV.—ONLY A TOURIST.

A SHADOW DARKENED THE DOORWAY.

WHEN old Gwen returned home, there were many consultations concerning the disposition of the five-pound note. Tisha was resolved to keep and use it, and the rest of the family wavered—all but Gwenny, who remembered the educational question put to her in the cave. She was shrewd enough, and wondered if this paper-bait were held out to induce her to submit to being sent to school. She did not, however, mention the circumstance, thinking it wisest to keep her own counsel, for she had no great faith in the multitude of counsellors.

"The gentleman asked me questions about my poor Toom, and was so sorry for us, that he did give us the money to comfort us," argued Tisha, whose spirits had decidedly risen with the prospect of helping her mother-in-law to pay her rent.

"It was a handsome thing for a stranger to do," said old Gwen;" and perhaps it was put into his mind from above. I see no reason for casting away the mercies of Providence. We can buy Gwenny a new gown for Sundays. She'll want it when she's in place."

"I'd rather stop till I can buy it with my wages," put in young Gwen. "When must I be going, Mamgu?"

"Soon as possible. Mrs. Bowen is wanting you for the spring cleaning, before she lets her rooms."

Old Gwen had succeeded in getting what she considered a suitable situation for her granddaughter, as maid-of-all-work with a lady in reduced circumstances.

"Not till after Easter, Mamgu?" said Gwenny.

"Easter Tuesday at latest," replied old Gwen.

"We shall have enough to do to get ready, and learn our hymns and chapters, and pack up," suggested young Gwen importantly.

"There's unfeeling you are! You none of you think of me. What shall I be doing without Gwen fach?" moaned Tisha.

"Hach! mother. What have you been doing ever since I was six years old?" asked Gwenny.

"You'll have enough to do to be helping with the tourists. There's beautiful you put out the tea! and you got five pounds for doing it."

Gwenny laughed merrily, which caused Tisha to cry. She always cried when they laughed, because she said, it was unfeeling to laugh when poor Toom was away, and never coming back. They all felt the truth of this more or less, but old Gwen was an encourager of mirth, and wished Tisha could be made to rouse herself.

She did so during the ensuing week, for tourists multiplied, and such as wanted tea had it in her parlour. Easter was late that year, and a fine spring brought sightseers to the castle earlier than usual. We none of us like to lay down the keys of office, and Gwenny was much troubled when she committed her's into the charge of Dorcas and Shonny. The latter was, however, so good a diplomatist, that she told her mother that "she shouldn't wonder if Shonny 'ould make his fortune some day, if only, you mother, will be stirring up to teach him." This was a good stroke of business, for Tisha was devoted to her youngest born, and what with the unexpected riches, the guests, young Gwen's outfit and the Easter lessons, she almost forgot herself.

We have nowadays Easter manœuvres, Easter cards, Easter eggs, Easter decorations, and Easter offerings, to say nothing of Easter holidays; but there was never a prettier or holier way of celebrating the thrice-blessed season, than that in which old Gwen and her numerous progeny took part. Weeks before Easter Monday, hymns and repetitions of Scripture had been resounding at the farm during every leisure moment; and when the day arrived all the household save Tisha started for church. A neighbour had volunteered to look in upon her; while she, with many moans, had promised to give the keys of the castle to any tourist who might chance to want them.

"You needn't say anything about tea, mother. They must do without it," said Gwenny.

"What do you mean? Why for?" responded Tisha, spiriting up. "Are you thinking that nobody can make a cup o' tea or a plank-cake but you?"

Old and young Gwen interchanged a sly glance of satisfaction.

Old Gwen started with her four grandchildren. It was a glorious day. They had a three-mile walk to the parish church, but it was down hill all the way. They sang hymns and recited as they went, and all Nature seemed to join. As to the birds it must be confessed that their songs surpassed those of the human choristers, though they did not assimilate ill, since all were to the praise of the Great Creator. It was a resurrection pæan. And the voiceless flower-bespangled banks united in the hymn of praise. Primroses sent up their mute thanksgivings, glancing open-eyed at the sun that had renewed their life; fox-glove and fern listened with bending heads—celandine and anemone, bird's-eye and campion, rejoiced—and away in the meadows bluebells rang their quiet peal, as if in unison with the church bells down below in the valley.

From every wayside cottage came human songsters, who joined old Gwen, and increased the volume of sound as it rolled down the hill. All the while, the tripping, sparkling brook that danced beneath the trees and among the stones on the left, uttered its prattling orisons, and creation animate and inanimate swelled the chorus of grateful praise to the risen Saviour, who had opened wide the gates of everlasting life.

Down the hill and along the high road wended the cheerful party, gathering strength and volume as it went. Processions of school-children with their teachers, fell in from various outlying villages, and when they all reached the bridge that spanned with its one fine arch, the lovely river, they made a goodly show as they mounted the hill towards the picturesque town. The church bells were ringing, the gates were open, and crowds had assembled to celebrate with prayer and praise the all-comprehending event of that glad festival. The church was soon filled to overflowing with a congregation consisting of the members, old and young, of the various schools in the district, old Gwen and her grandchildren joining the long procession of the townsfolk.

It was a grand day for catechizing, and after the morning service, each school stood round the reading-desk, and responded to the questions of their respective "pastors and masters." They recited chapters in the rythmical monotone of their fine old tongue—if monotone it could be called, when the voices rose and fell; they said the catechism, they entered heart and soul into their joyous service. Then each school, led by its master, sang a separate hymn; and the congregation was never tired of listening, for harmony, and not discord, pervaded the choirs. Now and again, in intervals of repose, some member of the assembly rose and repeated chapters from the Bible. Still the congregation did not tire of listening. Amongst the reciters was old Gwen. From time almost immemorial, she had repeated her chapter at the Easter gathering and as years thickened around her she had been heard with ever-increasing reverence. She had a marvellous memory, and it was said of her that she "knew the Bible by heart." It was certainly in her heart, for she had lived by its precepts hard upon threescore years and ten, and brought up children and grandchildren according to its commands, none of whom had ever doubted that they were directly inspired by "Him who cannot lie." She was only one of several elderly women who repeated their chapters from Sacred Writ, but her fine voice, manner and, above all, unfailing memory, always commanded attention. She was, besides, well known by rich and poor. Young Gwen was sitting beside her grandmother, and during the sonorous repetition of the chapter was startled by a whisper from behind.

"Is your mother at home alone?" it said.

"Yes," she replied, and, turning, saw the tourist.

As there was much coming and going in the church, during the various intervals, she alone perceived that when old Gwen ceased, this mysterious friend slipped out. She had an instinctive fear of him, despite his generosity, and wondered if he were going to take advantage of her mother's solitude, by offering more money and perhaps proposing to educate her daughter.

The so-called morning service lasted into the afternoon, for the schools were numerous, and each clergyman and superintendent lingered fondly over his particular work, so that the untiring listeners had enough of it. But the Welsh love their Bibles, as well as the old Psalmody of their country or their hymnals, and the repetitions, whether choral or Biblical, continued. Shonny, who inherited his grandmother's memory, repeated a chapter, and Uncle Laban was heard to say that he "spoke it out just so well as the parson; and he shouldn't wonder if he took to preaching some day."

A feast of tea and buns awaited the schools when all was over, but the two Gwens decided upon returning home, and leaving the children to follow at their leisure. Happily for old Gwen, whose breath was not quite so perfect as it once had been, a friend gave her a lift in his empty coal-cart, while he walked up the hill himself, saying that "a merciful man was merciful to his beast."

"Then you mustn't take me along," laughed old Gwen, whose weight was not slight.

Indeed it was with some difficulty that she mounted the cart.

When they reached home, they found Tisha in a very excited state. From the condition of her eyes she must have been weeping even more copiously than usual, although her speech flowed rapidly. She was dressed, and the best china was outspread. But she was alone. The tourist had been and was gone. When Gwenny asked her what had passed, she was reticent as to the fact that the stranger had wormed out of her all she knew of the murder, and the subsequent condemnation of her husband, but she was profuse in her praises of his generosity.

"He wants to pay for the schooling of Gwenny, or Dorcas, or Shonny," she moaned.

"Gwenny has had schooling enough for her state of life," responded old Gwen. "She knows her catechism and her duty to God and man, and that is enough to make a good faithful servant of her. As for Dorcas, the sooner she gets a place the better, for her brains are being well addled by all their 'Standards.' David knows what he's about, and Laban says he'll make a first-rate carpenter—but Shonny!"

"Ah he do puzzle himself terrible over his Shakespeare," interrupted Tisha. "The gentleman says he'd like to be bringing him up, he's so clever."

"Shakespeare," repeated old Gwen with a tone and gesture not complimentary to the immortal bard. "What have poor folks to do with him? I have no opinion of all the learning they're cramming down poor children's throats in these days. The Gospels are far better than all the Standards. The chapters and hymns they've been singing and repeating to-day will be doing more good than what they're learning now."

Tisha was silent. When old Gwen began to preach everybody listened; for even her grandchildren reverenced her, and had not yet learnt the masterful ways of many of their school mates. But young Gwen broke the silence.

"I'll do my best, Mamgu, to keep to my Bible," she said. "I hope my mistress will let me come home sometimes."

This sudden allusion to her departure set poor Tisha off again, and she began rocking herself and repeating the words "Come home! Oh, if my poor Toom could only come home."

A shadow darkened the doorway, and Gwen fach, who was always looking for the tourist, saw it. She rose involuntarily, and was greeted in Welsh; but not by the stranger. It was her brother Toom.

"Here I am, mother," he cried, and hurried towards Tisha.

He was a stalwart young soldier of whom any mother might be proud; but Tisha only wept the more. Naturally the shock of his sudden return overcame her. He knelt by her side, put his arms about her and soothed her. His grandmother received him with energetic delight, and as for young Gwen, she nearly danced for joy. She did, indeed, upset a chair which caused a revulsion of feeling in her mother, and turned her tears to reproaches.

"There's noise you're keeping just as Toom bach has come home!" she cried.

He told them that his regiment was quartered at Carmarthen, and that he had leave till the following day. He had not seen them for two or three years, and they began to kill the fatted calf, in spite of his having enlisted contrary to their wishes. The past was all forgotten, and when the children returned, the family joy would have been full, save for the sad shadow in the far-away prison at Portland. But for that, young Toom would still have been the stay of his mother at home.

"The Lord can turn our weeping into rejoicing," said old Gwen. "I believe He will yet make the crooked straight, and bring father back again."

As she spoke another shadow darkened the doorway, and this time it was the tourist.

"I think I left my umbrella," he said. "I beg your pardon for interrupting you."

"This is my eldest son, sir," said Tisha. "I was telling you about him, and how he 'listed."

The stranger glanced at the young man, took his umbrella from the corner where he had left it, either accidentally or designedly, and hurried off with a few muttered words about catching a train.

"I've seen that gentleman somewhere. Who is he?" said Toom.

"Only a tourist," replied young Gwen. "But he thinks I'm born for a lady and Shonny for a scholar."

"I'm sure he's very kind," remarked Tisha.

Toom had plenty to tell of his military life, for his letters had not been frequent, and he was not so clever a scribe as his younger brothers. He made his grandmother thankful by his assurance that he never neglected prayer, and that he and a few of his messmates read the Scriptures together.

"I think of you and poor father, Mamgu, when I'm tempted, and then I turn away from the drink and the vice, and ask for help to resist."

"Thank God, my boy," said old Gwen solemnly.

Uncle Laban looked in, and rejoiced with his relations. He proposed that they should thank God for the safe return of his nephew, by singing some of the hymns in which they had already joined that day, and the farm soon resounded to notes of praise. Afterwards they all knelt and offered up prayer and thanksgiving to Him who had brought the wanderer home.

No member of that scattered family ever forgot to ask of the Almighty Searcher of hearts, for the forgiveness of the poor convict, if guilty, and for his clearance from crime, if innocent. This burden lay heavy on the hearts of all, but it did not crush them.

Toom was somewhat of a rustic still, and his delight was great when Snap the dog recognised him, and the cat jumped on his kneo. By dint of watchful perseverance, Dorcas had accustomed puss to the farm, and she strayed no more. She told her brother this, and he said he should like just to look at the old home before he left on the morrow.

That morrow came all too soon. Reunions would be perfect but for the inevitable parting. This was softened by the feeling that the distance between Toom and his friends was now trifling, and that he and Gwenny would be, for a while at least, in the same place. They started together the following afternoon, Gwen with a bundle in her hand, and Toom carrying her small box. Dorcas and Shonny were to meet them at the station on their way from school, David being occupied at his trade. Tisha's lamentations were loud, but old Gwen kept hers with her blessings, in her heart.

The brother and sister visited the cottage on their way to the station. It was still unoccupied, and the garden and little yard were overrun with weeds and grass.

"If I hadn't run away we might have been here still," said Toom, reflectively. "But I couldn't bear to be twitted about father."

"They are forgetting it, and everybody's kind now," said Gwen.

They lingered about the old place as long as time would let them, then hastened over the meadows and by the river, to the station. Here Dorcas and Shonny were awaiting them.

"Take care of mother, and don't let her fret, Mamgu, more than can be helped," said Gwen to Dorcas. "Now I've got a place, I'm sorry to leave home."

"Then come back again and bring Toom," cried Shonny, who showed symptoms of the customary howl.

They were cut short by the arrival of the train; and the brothers and sisters were soon separated by inevitable steam.

This was Gwenny's first start in life, and she sat silent awhile ruminating on her possible future. She was roused by a whispered word from her brother, who put his hand on hers. "'Tis hard leaving home, Gwen fach. I wish I hadn't done it. So will you, may-be. But now we're soldier and servant, let us do our duty. You to your mistress, I to mine; and both to our Lord and Master, Jesus Christ."

The word was answered by a hand pressure, and Gwenny prayed quietly in her heart.

SELFISHNESS AND SELF-SACRIFICE.

BY THE VERY REV. G. A. CHADWICK, D.D., DEAN OF ARMAGH.

EVER since Cain smote Abel—nay, ever since Eve preferred tempting food and worldly wisdom to her Creator's blessing, two theories of life and happiness have been face to face in the world.

One of them relies for its well-being upon force; the strong arm, the well-filled pocket, and the powerful brain, all these are engines of personal exertion; they are various forms of force. And this view leads of necessity to selfishness, because every ounce of energy which is beyond my control reduces the relative influence of what I possess. My hundred pounds will not purchase what another bids a thousand for; and thus we are all rivals, more or less openly, snatching, thrusting, competing against each other, and muttering those Christian proverbs, "Every man for himself," and "Take care of number one."

And a view of the physical world has come into the foremost place, within our own time, which tends to encourage powerfully and dangerously this selfish way of thinking. For it proclaims that all the living world around us, crowned by man as its last and noblest development, is the result of a selfish struggle to exist. Life was full of hard conditions. The weak animal was crushed by the strong, the slow of foot was run down by the swift, the foolish was outwitted by the crafty. And thus did various races grow more and more vigorous and intelligent and well shaped, until at last one prosperous species became a human being, thanks to the long and merciless weeding out of all but the choicest specimens.

Religion is not concerned to prove that no effects were really produced by such a competition for existence. She only insists that all such theories come miserably short as an adequate explanation of the world and of man. And she protests against the havoc which, when taken for complete, they must work in the conscience and the heart.

We are not perfect yet—very far from perfect. And how shall the disiples of such a philosophy advance upon the road, but by the old plan, by fierce and pitiless competition, by sifting out every defect, by crushing all the weak and sickly and stupid specimens? Napoleon at Jaffa gave poison to the wounded whom he could not carry off: he was right, let us follow his example; that is the true plan for uplifting the human race; down with the infirm, down with the sickly, down with the deformed, and away with the foolish. All this is very shocking to every humane heart, but such a creed as I am speaking of will gradually conquer any weakness of the sort.

It may nourish hospitals in which to study surgery, but the hour of its triumph will be rung in by the death-knell of all asylums, workhouses, and almshouses, all charities which keep alive the inferior specimens, instead of letting us free the garden from the weeds. At the recent meeting of the British Association there was a protest against the action of our hospitals on this very ground, that they perpetuate the feeble and sickly individuals, who ought to disappear with all speed. What a world that will be to live in!

Face to face with this theory is another. It teaches that while we have need of food and raiment, and our Father knoweth that this is so, yet the life is more than meat, and the body more than raiment, and a man's life consisteth not in the multitude of the things which he possesseth. It teaches that this world is God's world, and man is God's child, born to know and love Him, and to find his happiness in his Creator. It teaches that as the south wind and the gulf stream keep our climate temperate, so the whole world is endurable, and happiness is not a dream, only because the soul of man is warmed by the breath and bathed in the currents of a far serener clime.

And it appeals to our experience. What has the fruit of the tree of Godless knowledge ever taught us, except our own misery and shame and guilt, until we cover ourselves from each other, and cower into the dimmest thickets if the footsteps of the Divine ruler shake the ground we tread? What ever happened when we smote a rival—who was also our brother—down, except the sense of curse and loneliness—a punishment greater than we can bear?

Our religion does not underrate the common things of daily life. God feeds His people with the finest of the wheat, but they must not live by bread alone, nor think they can have anything except as He gives it. And then, as children seated at the same table, nourished and loved by the one universal Father, we learn to bear each other's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ, instead of snatching each other's bread, and pushing each other from the board.

Our hearts, which grew sick at the other doctrine, rise up to do homage to the majesty of this. We feel that it is a nobler and better and manlier way of thinking. And it is certain that we could never thus approve and aspire to the doctrine of self-sacrifice rather than worldly wisdom, the thorny crown of Jesus rather than the jewelled mitre of Caiaphas, if selfish struggles to exist were the real secret of the universe. We could not be so false to our origin. There is within every man a living witness to the truth of religion—to our need of something above and beyond ourselves, a voice which we may stifle, and perhaps destroy, but with its dying breath it will protest that though we are weak, dependent, sinful, yet are we not so mean that we can be happy alone, or by another's loss, or without a blessing from above; that we need pardon because all of us have sinned together; and that we are all lost unless we have a common Saviour.

This doctrine sanctifies and ennobles weakness, because all the care we can bestow on it, is really God's grace reaching our brethren through our hands. And we need no longer be selfish in mere self-defence, because God Himself will keep and guard us, reckoning the least service to our brethren, as a service done to Him.

How comes it that sometimes even the unbelievers in our creed rise to its generous level? It is because they are often far better than their beliefs, even as we are worse than ours. But this does not refute the argument that selfish faiths will shrivel up the heart of society, and that generous faiths will expand it. The question is, what would the next generation become, if all the influences of the cross were replaced by the influence of belief in a struggle for existence as the clue to the mysteries of life?

Grasping violence or sweet self-sacrifice, which of them is really the king of life? Jesus it was who first answered that question, fully, perfectly, for ever. At the outset of His mission He saw all the kingdoms of the earth and the glory of them, He refused them all: He turned away to become least of all, and servant of all: He became obedient, even unto death, even unto the death of the cross. Therefore God highly exalted Him. Death and the grave could not hold Him down. He is King of kings, and Lord of lords, and He has sat down with the Father in His throne.

And as the Father sent Him, even so He sent His followers. He had once exposed the folly of a king who should go to war without reckoning whether he was able with ten thousand to meet an invader with twenty thousand. Now He sent the Twelve, fishers and publicans, and their disciples, including one disciple of Gamaliel, themselves to invade the world. Not many wise, nor strong, nor noble, they matched themselves against Rome, with her steel-clad armies, with the riches of the plundered world, with torments which but to name makes courage itself turn pale. The disciples had no longer among them "the matchless personality," "the grace," "the fascinating sweetness" by which sentimentalists pretend that Galilee was won. On the contrary their greatest leader was contemptible in bodily presence, and weak in speech. What then was the secret of their unparalleled victory? It was the worship of Divine weakness, Divine self-sacrifice; the Gospel that God was among us as He that serveth; the preaching of the cross was the power of God and the wisdom of God.

And this has changed the world. Men who deny the truth of the story cannot deny the marvellous suitability of that story for human nature, for the very nature which they profess to have been evolved by thousands of generations of successful and benignant selfishness, blessing the world by remorselessly treading down the weak. Upon their own showing, the power of Christ is supernatural, it is the introduction of a new force, into the world, from above it.

THE REVOLUTION OF 1688

ON ITS RELIGIOUS SIDE.

III.

"ALL Tyranny is of small endurance," said the lesson for one of the great days of national judgment which came so frequently in this reign, and this has been especially the case with the persecutions the church has passed through. The zeal of the persecutors slackens, and the more intelligent come by degrees to recognise that from their own point of view persecution does more harm than good. The Act of Uniformity, the Conventicle Act, the Five-Mile Act were all carried out rigorously, but only with the result of blowing into a flame the ashes of puritanism. Notwithstanding the combination of all the authorities: the council, the parliament, the bishops, the judges and the magistrates, with a host of officials, and spies: the party which at the Restoration appeared broken and ruined, was now considered both by friends and foes to form two-thirds of the nation, numbers among them being prepared to defy the laws, passively by going to prison, or actively by joining in plots for a change of the government. In 1665 there were rumours of an intended rising, information of all sorts being sent to the government concerning plots in Yorkshire. London, too, was felt to be especially dangerous as there were 20,000 of Cromwell's old soldiers in and about the metropolis. To the eyes of some civilians it was becoming evident "that there was very little fruit of all these forcible courses." Nevertheless, as late as 1670, Archbishop Sheldon sent out a letter to the bishops of his province, dated Lambeth Palace, May 7, urging watchfulness and zeal in the prosecution of all holders, frequenters, maintainers, and abettors of conventicles, and unlawful assemblies, under pretence of religious worship, and especially of those who preached and taught in them.

> O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,
> Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse,
> Without all hope of day!

Such was the groan that went up from the religious soul of England in these doleful days of Charles II. and James II. A crowd of poor godly men lived henceforth "a life half dead, a living death," but their religion though buried was not exempt

> By privilege of death and burial,
> From worst of other evils, pains and wrongs.

And as "Samson Agonistes" teaches us, that suffering was not borne with angelic meekness. Blind Samson raging against Dalila, and the bully Harapha of Goth, represents the spirit in which enthralled puritanism regarded the society which fluttered about Whitehall and had got possession of power. And we may depend upon it, as its despondency became more and more hopeless, it looked forward to some divinely ordained effort of strength, which should bring this awful tyranny to utter irretrievable ruin.

And this, had England then known all, it is possible might have taken place. But hardly any one, not even ministers who believed they were privy to all the secrets of state, were aware of the treason against England which the king was meditating, or had more than a suspicion of the conspiracy about to be concocted against its liberties and its religion.

The development of his schemes and the elucidation of the mysteries of his policy by the facts which in later times have become known, enable us to understand why he was so persevering in his attempts to modify the harshness of the penal laws against nonconformity. As early as 1662 he tried to do this by claiming a dispensing power in virtue of his prerogative as Head of the Church. However, his Parliament would not hear of it, and he withdrew the proposition. But in 1665 he again recurred to the idea, and to remove all doubts as to his right, a bill was brought into the House of Lords, but failed, in consequence of the opposition of the bishops and of the Chancellor, Clarendon.

The king, mortified, henceforth supported the effort to bring down this eminent pillar of "Church and State," and Clarendon, driven from office in 1667, was impeached for high treason and forced into exile.

Charles, placed between two antagonistic parties, adopted the policy of Catherine de Medici in a similar position, and sought to play them one against the other. He hoped to pulverise the broken remains of the parliamentary party by giving free scope to the bigotry and revenge of the royalist party, and again to dominate the church and king party by making himself the saviour and protector of the varied hosts of nonconformity. And this policy he pursued through the whole of his reign, openly and cynically playing the part of a royal "Vicar of Bray." However, it was tiresome work, and he longed for the repose of a monarch who could give and not take the law, and besides, from a philosophical point of view, he believed absolute monarchy the best form of government. But how was it to be brought about? His personal popularity was so extraordinary, and the ignorance and venality of the times so great, that it would not have been difficult for him to have done with the country what he would. But he had neither faith, industry, nor enthusiasm. The easiest, the readiest course was to rely on force, and to link himself on to the fortunes of the great representative of the cause of absolute monarchy in Europe: Louis XIV. After preliminary negotiations through the French ambassador in London, the Duchess of Orleans was sent to Dover to conclude a secret treaty between Louis XIV. and her brother. By this treaty, the terms of which have long been matter of history, Charles promised to declare himself a Catholic, and to bring about the conversion of this country to that religion. But there was the chance that Englishmen would not remain firm in the favourite doctrine of the dominant party, Passive Obedience, but might conclude that the religion and liberties of the country were as much worth fighting for as its commercial advantage or its vain glory.

With this possibility in view, Charles made the following arrangement. "The king of England," ran the words of the treaty, "is convinced of the truth of the Catholic religion, and he has every reason to hope that none of his subjects, even those on whom God shall not have yet so abundantly shed His grace as to dispose them to follow the king's august example, will fail in the inviolable obedience due from all people to their sovereigns, even of a different religion. Nevertheless, as there are sometimes turbulent and restless spirits who endeavour to disturb public tranquility under the plausible pretext of religion, His Britannic Majesty believes that the best way of preventing this is to be assured of the assistance of His Most Christian Majesty, who, willing, in order to contribute to a design so glorious, so useful to His Majesty, and even to the whole Catholic religion, has promised and promises to give for the purpose two millions of livres tournois, and binds himself to assist His Britannic Majesty with troops to the number of 6000."

The treaty of Dover was signed on the 14th of June, 1670, and a glance at the old lectionary of 1662 will show that the lesson read in English churches on that day recounted the treachery of Judas.

That an English king should have actually conceived the idea of destroying the liberties and the religion of our country by the aid of French gold and French troops is startling enough, but Charles would not have actually signed the treaty, and struggled, as he did, for the immediate realisation of the clause that related to himself, the clause which bound him to declare himself a Roman Catholic, and bring about the conversion of England, if he had not felt tolerably sure of success.

The French Ambassador, a son of the celebrated Colbert, in a famous letter, says that Lord Arlington, one of the ministers most entirely in Charles the Second's confidence, had given him to understand that if the Holy See would so far condescend as to allow the sacrament in both kinds, and mass in the vulgar tongue that "most of the bishops, and following their example almost all the Protestants of England would reunite themselves with the Roman church." Had Arlington any ground for a statement, which if it only had a shred of truth in it, is full of suggestiveness? Certainly he knew, as every man in England knew, that the leading doctrine of the Church and King party was Passive Obedience, and that it made the test by which it judged a man fit for any office in church and state, his willingness to swear that it was not lawful under any circumstances to take up arms against the king; moreover Charles and his minister watched closely, we may be sure, the real sentiments of those around them, and they saw that while it was the fashion on the one hand to mock at everything Puritan, it was the mode on the other to speak with respect of everything Catholic. But what Arlington could not fully know, but which constituted the greatest danger of all, was the ardent, disinterested spirit of loyalty which pervaded the people. "Kings," said honest John Bunyan, "must be the men that shall down with antichrist, and they shall down with her in God's time. . . Let the king have visibly a place in your hearts, and with heart and mouth give God thanks for him. He is a better saviour for us than we may be aware of, and hath delivered us from more deaths than we can tell how to think."

Moreover, Charles had a powerful lure by which to draw over the commercial classes to support his designs. One of the leading provisions of the treaty with Louis XIV. was that England was to assist him in crushing the United Provinces—England tackling the Dutch by sea while France invaded and overpowered them by land. The hope this would give to British merchants of destroying their great competitors in the commerce of the world, and drawing its chief advantage to themselves, Charles could not fail to believe would be a powerful temptation to one of the most important classes of his subjects. In his small council of five he had two parties, one working at the real, the other at a sham treaty. Shaftesbury and Lauderdale, who represented the puritan or nonconformist party, were led to believe that the alliance with France was solely for a war with the Dutch, to which they consented in exchange for a control over the Act of Indulgence, which had always a prominent place in Charles's policy, but which they were bent on rendering as little useful to the Catholics as possible.

This indulgence, promulgated March 15, 1672, declared all penal laws against the nonconformists or recusants to be immediately suspended. The nonconformists were to be permitted to open places of worship, provided they applied for and obtained a licence; recusants of the Roman Catholic religion, while sharing in the common exemption of the penal laws, were to be allowed to exercise their worship in private houses alone.

Demands for licences poured in, and soon upper rooms, barns, malting floors, gardens, outhouses in orchards, halls belonging to public companies, chambers in ruined monasteries, and cellars in old castles, resounded with long-silent voices.

How often have we seen the moon break out on a dark night and flood the gloom with light, suddenly a dark cloud passes over it, and the landscape appears once again as if shrouded in crape. Such was the scene England presented in 1672. The Act of Indulgence, suddenly flashed on the country in the spring of 1672, was withdrawn early in the next year.

WILLIAM, PRINCE OF ORANGE. [After Romein de Hooge.

The air was full of whispers, rumours, and instead of the Act of Indulgence being merely opposed by the royalist high-church party, it was regarded with suspicion by many of the dissenters themselves, and ere long the very minister most responsible for its promulgation, the Chancellor, Shaftesbury, declared himself against it. Charles in a fit of drunkenness had let out his secret, and the long-deceived minister went home overwhelmed with the gravity of the situation. He reversed his policy, and not only opposed the Indulgence but supported a Test Act, which compelled every one in the service of the State to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, to make a declaration against transubstantiation, and to receive the Sacrament according to the rites of the Church of England. The Duke of York resigned his office of Lord High Admiral, whilst hundreds left the civil and military services. The king seemed completely defeated, and Shaftesbury master of the situation.

QUEEN MARY II. [After Vandervaust.]

Moreover, the other point in the royal plot had failed. "Do you not see your country is lost?" said the Duke of Buckingham, one of the English ministers sent to negociate the submission of the Dutch. "There is a sure way never to see it lost," said the young Prince of Orange who had just been appointed commander of the army of the United Provinces, "and that is to die in the last ditch." This unexpected firmness in the Dutch disconcerted the allies, and Shaftesbury seeing that there was a revulsion of feeling in England against the war determined to bring it to an end. Shaftesbury, however, soon learnt that it was not he, but some one else, who directed the king's policy. He was ordered to deliver up the great seal, and dismissed from office.

Shaftesbury rapidly organised "the Country" party, a title translated by the French ambassador le parti du Peuple. Charles replied by throwing himself into the arms of "the Church and King" party still dominant in the House of Commons, and the fruits appeared in a fresh persecution of the nonconformists and the suppression of their conventicles. However, the English ambassador in Paris quarrelling with Danby, the new Lord

Treasurer, came back to England, obtained a seat in the House of Commons, and laid on the table a despatch forwarded to Louis XIV. requesting payment for the king of England's services during the late negotiations, and this despatch being signed by Danby, he was at once impeached; whereupon Charles, in terror lest all should come out, made a bargain with Shaftesbury: Parliament should be dissolved if the impeachment was withdrawn.

But what probably frightened Charles still more was the extraordinary panic occasioned by the discovery of a supposed "Popish Plot." Hans Christian Andersen's curious story of the Man and his Shadow received an illustration in English history. Just as in that story the shadow goes about as the real man and the real man becomes the shadow, so, a mere adumbration of the real plot for making England a Catholic country took possession of the public mind, and was made the subject of solemn Parliamentary inquiries, impeachments and great state trials, followed by the liberal use of the gallows at Tyburn and the block on Tower Hill.

The seizure of the papers of Coleman, the secretary to the Duchess of York, made it clear that in Catholic circles high hopes were entertained of great and immediate religious changes in England by royal authority. In a letter to Père la Chaise, the Jesuit Confessor of Louis XIV., Coleman said—"We have here a mighty work upon our hands, no less than the conversion of the three kingdoms, and by that, perhaps, the subduing of a pestilent heresy which has domineered over a great part of this northern world a long time. There was never such hopes of success since the day of Queen Mary, as now in our days."

The unfortunate secretary was hanged on December 3, 1678; just before he was turned off he was heard to say, "There is no faith in man." If he had expected the intervention of the head-centres of the plot for which he suffered, he was miserably deceived, for it was not the custom of Charles or of James to risk anything for subordinates in trouble. A series of judicial murders followed, the result of the perjuries of Oates, and of a vile race of informers whom his success had called into being. The corrupt society of the Restoration, whose chief weapon after the jail and the gallows was to represent the puritan as a canting drivelling hypocrite, now made itself one with hypocrisy of an odious description, for in the autumn and winter of 1678 Titus Oates was all the rage, fashion giving him for a time supreme power, so that the Council, the Parliament and the Courts of Law all did his behests.

With the return of a new Parliament, Shaftesbury, and his friends Lord William Russell and Lord Cavendish became the King's ministers, and had the honour of passing the famous "Habeas Corpus" Act. Their great object was to exclude the Duke of York from the throne as an avowed Catholic, in which they might have succeeded, had not Shaftesbury conceived the project of declaring the Duke of Monmouth successor to his father. Charles, seeing that Shaftesbury had made a mistake, took an early occasion to dismiss him from his service. The fiery statesman threw himself on to the country, which was soon rent by the contending cries of the two factions of Petitioners and Abhorrers, the former petitioning for the exclusion of James in favour of Monmouth, the latter declaring their abhorrence of the scheme. Shaftesbury would have precipitated a revolution, but feeling that it would not succeed, he withdrew to Holland and there two months after his arrival breathed out his stormy soul. Left without his guidance, some of his followers commenced dark and useless plotting, which only ended in the ruin of the nobler members of the party. Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney were beheaded, and Monmouth fled.

Thus Charles triumphed over the effort made to defeat his absolutest schemes, and he was more than ever the object of an idolatrous loyalty. On the very day Lord William Russell was executed, July 21, 1683, the university of Oxford affirmed that the doctrine of passive obedience, even to the worst of rulers, was a part of religion.

Charles now rested on his oars and quietly steered in the direction of despotism. He re-admitted the Duke of York into the Council, and to the office of Lord High Admiral. Supplied with money by the king of France, he did not trouble to assemble Parliament. The towns were forced to surrender their charters, and the corporations limited to ultra-loyalists. Steps were taken to form a standing-army.

It is a striking lesson on the necessity of being ever on the watch against the prevailing opinion of a time to note how the best men succumb to it. Even Tillotson and Burnet adopted the doctrine of passive obedience. Where did they really get their ideas? Tillotson, on one occasion preaching before the king, maintained "that no man is obliged to preach against the religion of his country, though a false one, unless he has the power of working miracles." "It is a pity your Majesty slept," said a courtier to the king at the close of the service, "for we have had the rarest piece of Hobbism that ever you heard in your life." Charles rejoined with an oath, "He shall print it then." Which anecdote affords much material for reflection, for it shows not only the faith of the king himself, but that the clergy were, however unconsciously, deeply imbued with the prevailing philosophy.

Well might Charles have Hobbes' portrait in his private closet as one of his most precious treasures. This powerful philosophy worked for royal authority as a tutelary influence, repairing all its errors, smoothing the most stormy seas; and concentrating all the winds of fortune on its task, drove it full sail into the ocean of despotism. There were many among the educated classes who were opposed entirely to Hobbes, Lord William Russell, for example, who, notwithstanding the pressure brought to bear upon him by Tillotson and Burnet, even at the very last, and in face of the scaffold, refused "the very particular and deep repentance" which Tillotson told him his opinions called for. These opinions were generally shared by the nonconformists, and this explains that dreadful storm of persecution which prevailed against them during the last three or four years of Charles's reign, "destroying not a small number of lives and ruining multitudes of families."[1]

It was probably at this period they got the habit of hiding their meetings in out-of-the-way parts of the town, and lanes and alleys. Dr. Stoughton, in his "Religion of England," gives the following picture of one of their meetings, drawn from the trial of Thomas Rosewell, a Presbyterian minister. "The place in which he preached was situated in Salisbury Street, Rotherhithe, and consisted of a tenement or tenements so altered as to adapt the building for accommodating a large number of people. The rooms were but of a low height. There was a low parlour, and a little room up six steps; and where the preacher stood was a large room and a garret. He stood in the door-case of the room, that the sound might go up and down." Three or four hundred people commonly attended, some "people of quality"; and a store of "watermen and seamen, from Deptford, Rotherhithe, and thereabouts. There were shutters in the windows, and the sun came in, and Rosewell was afraid lest the people that went by should hear him."

And in some state papers of 1682 the same author found the following account of the place of worship in which Thomas Vincent, one of the ejected ministers, preached. "Almost every seat that adjoins to the sides of the conventicle has a door, like the sally-port of a fire-ship, to make escape by; and in each door is a small peep-hole, like in taverns and ale-house doors to ken the people before they let them in." And elsewhere, quoting a note taken from the old books of the church meeting in this curious place of worship: "April 1st, met at Mr. Russell's in Ironmonger-lane, where Mr. Lambert administered to us the ordinance of the Lord's Supper, and we sung a psalm with a low voice." Compare this with the account of John James's meeting-house at the beginning of the reign, where, according to the witnesses, the windows were open, and the minister spoke so loud that what he said could be heard in the adjoining houses, and we see how religious liberty, to say nothing of civil liberty, had fallen during this most disastrous, most disgraceful, period of English history.

RICHARD HEATH.

[1] John Howe.

FOR THIRTY YEARS.

A RETROSPECT OF THE YOUNG WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

ABOUT thirty years ago the work of the Young Women's Christian Association began. Like all wide-spread organisations its commencement was small. It was originated by Lady Kinnaird in a Home near Fitzroy Square, which had been used by nurses at the time of the Crimean War. The war came happily to an end; those special nurses were no longer needed, and the small house was turned to good account for the benefit of young women needing help and protection in this inhospitable yet hospitable metropolis. Hence has spread far and wide an association which, in London alone, numbers 13,500 members, and 129 branches. This great central tree has rooted itself where it was first planted so firmly that its ramifications have wandered, like the railways, all over the United Kingdom and Ireland. If the roots of a tree could cross the water, they might almost be said to have reached America, for a sister society now exists there.

This was founded by seven young ladies who united in prayerful purpose for the benefit of their fellow-women, and began what is already becoming a power in their land. This year a conference has been held at New York, and it is interesting to know that Lady Kinnaird's son and two of her daughters responded to an invitation to join in it.

It is impossible to count up the blessings which have accrued to tens of thousands from this small beginning in the Home near Fitzroy Square. Similar homes and institutes have multiplied, and girls need no longer be alone in London if only they will join the one nearest to them. Here they will find recreation and improvement, classes both secular and religious, and friends to whom to apply in difficulty, as well as a safe shelter during the hours of leisure. The Central Institute, at 17, Old Cavendish Street, will serve as a specimen. Hither resort of an evening young people from the large houses of business in the vicinity, and the spacious, comfortable, well-lighted rooms are cheerful and homelike. It is delightful to see the girls during the social evenings engaged in "books, or work, or healthful play," making friends and befriended. And it is still more delightful to know that from this and similar institutes elsewhere emanate every kind of good work. The members unite, not merely for personal benefit, but for the benefit of their fellow-creatures. They teach in ragged-schools, they work for the orphan, they help one another, they become missionaries at home or even abroad. This seems to be essentially a missionary age, and the members of the Young Women's Christian Association are not behind it. Thirty-five girls have lately volunteered for foreign mission work, and eight are in actual preparation for India, China, Algeria, or Central Africa, as may be. It is even in contemplation to send them forth soon, under one of the ladies who is herself anxious to become a missionary.

Once at 17 and 16A, Old Cavendish Street it is difficult to depart, because here is the nucleus of the varied operations of the association. Here are the secretaries always at work, and feeling, as said one, "as if labouring under a mountain, and not knowing when it might fall in." This mountain is debt, since, with the best intentions to keep out of it, imperative claims suddenly arise which apparently cannot be set aside. A friend sends a large gift provided certain new efforts be made. They are made, the gift is expended, but the efforts must be continued. Still, the cost of the machinery is wonderfully small when its enormous workings are known; this is simply because devoted ladies undertake certain branches at their own cost, and give their whole time to them, both in town and country.

There have been several new branches of late which deserve special recognition; of these, "The Travellers' Aid" is perhaps the most important, the secretary for which is at 16A, and very "greedy of gain," not for herself, but for the friendless girls sent to her from the railway stations. It is now pretty generally known that girls throng to London in the vain hope of making their fortunes, or performing some other mythical feat. They often come entirely unbefriended, and have been enticed to their ruin by wicked men and women. To remedy this evil, a regular system of railway-station visiting is established. A letter addressed to the Secretary of The Travellers' Aid, giving three days' notice, will bring a lady to any of the principal stations to meet any unprotected girl, and to see that she is duly cared for. Inspectors, porters, waiting-women kindly and efficiently co-operate in this good work, and, when the visitor is elsewhere, send the lonely girl either to The Travellers' Aid, or to some one of the many respectable lodging-houses connected with it, or to a lady in the vicinity who benevolently allows her name to be used. This Christian surveillance now extends far and wide, both in town and country. Placards are also placed in steamers pointing out to unbefriended girls the dangers of their position, and to whom to apply in a moment of need. Over 27,000 such warnings have been circulated in vessels, and girls have been brought from the docks to the office in times of immiuent peril. An agent in connection with the Protective and Rescue Society of Jewish girls, who speaks several languages, is permitted to aid the Young Women's Christian Association and to hand its address to young women seeking help outside the Jewish pale. Indeed, the unanimity of all sects and societies on this particular question proves the necessity of the case.

Happily, a bedroom has been secured at the central office which can be used in case of emergency, and the kind housekeeper receives her visitor at any hour. Quite lately, at past midnight, the Victoria waiting-woman sent one of fifteen years of age, who had arrived from Paris en route for Birmingham. Through a series of either premeditated or unpremeditated mistakes, there was no one to meet her, and but for the Travellers' Aid, she would have been exposed to serious risk. Another of fourteen was sent from a heartless uncle to an equally heartless father. Nobody met her. She was bewildered. A porter spoke to her and directed her to the Travellers' Aid. A situation was subsequently found for her, after every enquiry had been made. A third came the other day, who had been turned out of doors by her mistress and had attempted to commit suicide. She was only fifteen, and in most melancholy plight. Another sat for several hours at the station, expecting the mistress to whom she engaged herself through an advertisement, and who never arrived. She would have sat on till midnight, she said, but for the inspector, who saw and rescued her. She, like thousands of others, believed in what was promised, little guessing at the ways and means of advertisers. Such mistakes, however, often occur through sheer inadvertence: a wrong train—an ill-written address—sometimes no address at all—will launch a girl upon a world of trouble.

"We never know what exciting event will come next," says the secretary.

Another branch thrown out of late years is that for visiting the different parks, and for endeavouring to influence the young women therein, to seek out the lonely, and to cheer the sad. Here may be found servants in and out of place, who are the better for help; and nursery-maids innumerable, who change their places according to present-day custom. Many have joined the Young Women's Christian Association through the instrumentality of the visitor, and a Sunday Bible class attracts some. The temptations of our parks are too well-known to need recapitulation here, and "a word in season" often arrests the tempted. So does the book or tract presented with it.

We grow bewildered, like the poor girls at the stations, amid all the agencies of this Old Cavendish Street centre, and can only glance at the employment agency, where employers and employed get suited free of charge; and the Penny Bank where money honestly earned may be safely housed.

A bare enumeration of the agencies open to young women and girls cannot fail to interest and astonish, and they have only to become members of the Association to benefit by them. In addition to those already mentioned we find holiday club and convalescent homes; drawing-room meetings; total abstinence; circulating libraries, to which contributions of suitable books are greatly to be desired; emigration; flower mission; home study; restaurant and public-house visiting; and a factory helpers' union. The last two being comparatively new branches, should have special notice. Not long since we were at a social evening at Morley Rooms, 14. John Street, Bedford Row, to meet a large gathering of the young women engaged at restaurants and railway bars. It need scarcely be said that their position is one of great temptation, and they are frequently dismissed at a moment's notice. One to whom we spoke, a pretty, well-mannered girl from the North of England, had lately been thus dismissed, and the only person she knew in London was a fellow waitress. Fortunately her acquaintance was a member of the Young Women's Christian Association, and directed her to Morley Rooms, where board and lodging are obtainable for half-a-dozen or more of the restaurant girls, and where all who spend their lives in this vocation will find in the secretary and restaurant visitor a kind friend and ready helper. On that particular evening about fifty were present, and these were off duty for a few hours; though several of them were obliged to leave to resume it, after a short interval of "tea and talk." Some of them work fourteen hours each week day, and a portion of the Sunday, and such as really appreciate the rooms find great difficulty in availing themselves of them. Still, there are 140 members, 40 of whom are abstainers.

"We think we shall make our fortunes if only we can come to London," said one; "and had it not been for the rooms, I should not have known where to find a shelter." Much the same may be said of thousands of young women allured to the great city by imaginary gain.

Yet are the needs ever increasing. The last demand is for institutes and every conceivable aid, both religious and secular, for the factory girls, all over London. It startles one to hear that there are, at a rough computation, 140,000 of them engaged in between seventy and eighty different trades. They help to make our jams, preserved meats, envelopes, matches, pickles, cigars, corks, sacks, shirts, ropes, and fifty other useful articles, the enumeration of which would fill this column. They perform the same monotonous round of work all the day, and at night, for recreation, seek the music-halls, penny-gaffs, and public-houses. Soul and body are equally in danger of ruin. Not that they have been forgotten either by churchmen or dissenters; but as a class they are so difficult to reach, that new efforts have to be made and continued. The Young Women's Christian Association would, under the head of "The Factory Helpers' Union," aid in bringing this vast multitude of young women under Christian teaching, and providing for them of an evening something better than the music-hall or gin-palace. These "hands," as they are called by their employers, have also hearts and heads, to say nothing of the souls so grievously ignored. It is awful to think of the unprotected girls at this moment in this huge metropolis. Not only in factories, but in shops, domestic service, restaurants, offices, art studios, and, alas, in the streets! Much is being done, more is needed.

The Morley Halls have lately been dedicated to them in 316, Regent Street, and where the Lotus Clubs were, is now, as if by magic, a place of union, where are sitting and bedrooms, reading and class-rooms, a servants' home, and large halls for general meetings. Communicating with them is the Welbeck Restaurant, where hundreds of young women have their meals daily, and where individual and united effort combine to induce them to lead such lives as become the children of God.

An admirable addition to the work of the Association has recently been made in the formation of evening educational classes which meet at the various London institutes. An endeavour is also being made to extend the movement to the provinces.

Comparing the present with the past, we may indeed take courage to work on in hope and faith. A pile of reports, old and new, show what has been done. The earliest is headed, "The United Association for the Christian and Domestic Improvement of Young Women;" the last, "A Year's Work, Change and Advance." In the latter may be read wonderful details of a far-reaching sisterhood, whose order and badge are faith and prayer. The motto for the year on its first page is, "Not by might, nor by power, but by My Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts"; and its chief object, "To unite together for prayer, mutual help, sympathy and instruction, young women of all classes who truly love and desire to serve our Lord Jesus Christ." A. B.

LETTERS TO MY CHILDREN FROM THE EAST.

BY HENRY HARPER, AUTHOR OF "LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND," ETC.

V.—THE MIRAGE.

AS you look on this picture, you children all say, "Father, what is a mirage?" What does it mean? Why are some of those men lying down as if they were very tired? Why is that man pointing to that beautiful lake? Why do not they all go to it at once, instead of looking at it? Ah! some of them know only too well that it is a "mirage," that beautiful lake. Those wavering trees and distant hills are not real! Not "real," you call out; how can you say such a thing? Why, the trees are reflected in the water; the wind is waving the trees, and yet you say the lake is not "real." Ah, sadly did I learn that once! Parched with thirst, burnt up with heat, almost blind with the glare from the sun, the rocks and sand quite burning hot, not a breath of cool air, we had halted on a barren ridge, like the ridge in this picture. No shade of trees there, and yet far away I thought I saw water, a lake and trees! I called out in Arabic "water in plenty;" but the Bedouin replied sadly, "No water—no water;" and then I found what we saw was the "mirage," common to all hot countries; common in the deserts; in the wilderness of Judæa, and the deserts of Arabia, it seems born but to mock the weary traveller by holding up to his eye the very blessing he so much needs; the one thing needful to give him strength, or to save his life, and yet it has no real existence!

There is sometimes seen even in England a "mirage." I once saw one in Sussex, on the Romney Marsh. I had been looking over the marsh, and seen the flocks and herds grazing, when suddenly all this vanished, and in its place there appeared a sea, with ships in full sail! A few moments and the sea was gone, and the real landscape stood forth again!

Does the Bible ever speak of the mirage? Oh, yes! And, depend upon it, the more you study your Bible, the more you will find in it. In Jeremiah, chapter xiv., we have an account of a terrible time. God had judged Jerusalem because of the sins of the people, and He had withheld hear. Jeremiah then calls upon God, and in verse eighteen of that same chapter, he says, "Wilt thou be altogether unto Me, as waters that be not sure?" The Septuagint version translates the words as "waters which have no reality." Jeremiah most probably had often seen in the deserts of Judæa a "mirage" such as I have described to you. If he had not, he would not have used those words.

Another prophet, Isaiah, in chapter xxxv, 1st verse, says: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." That word "desert" is also translated the "parched land," and he goes on to say that "the 'glowing-sand' —or, as again the marginal reading puts it, 'the mirage'—shall become a pool, and the thirsty ground springs of water." So you see he knew of this "mirage" which makes the hot and glowing sand look as if it were water; but he the rains. Now even with us, you know, if we have a long hot summer, as last year, to what straits we are put for water; but in that land of Palestine, without rain, the land becomes like iron, and the sky brass, and so it was now. The earth "chapt"—that is, "cracked"—the plowmen could not plough, and in sorrow "covered their heads"; the very cattle forsook their young ones in the field, and the "wild asses"—who are so clever in finding water, and seem to find it by the smell—they got blind through the heat, and faint because there was no grass. The want of water was so sore, that even the rich sent their "little ones" to seek it; and they, poor children, took their water-pots and came to the wells and the holes for water, and found them all dried up—waterless! And so with sad hearts and aching heads, the "little ones" returned.

THE MIRAGE.

So angry was God with these people that, in the fifteenth chapter, He says that if "Moses and Samuel," those great and good men, were to intercede for them, He, the Almighty, would not speaks of a time when they shall no longer be mocked by false or unreal water, for the "real" "living" water shall appear. When is that time?

The prophet tells us "when the glory of the Lord shall appear." "The glory of the Lord." That was the Lord Jesus, who said "If any man thirst let him come unto Me and drink;" who told the woman of Samaria at Jacob's well that if she had asked of Him, He would have given her "living water." St. John tells us: "The word became flesh and dwelt among us, and we beheld His glory—glory as of the only begotten of the Father full of grace and truth." Yes, Jesus is the only "living" water if we love Him, trust Him. No "mirage" will lead us astray, and though we are sure to have many sore trials in this life, yet He knows all, is ever guiding us, and we shall find that, as our day so shall our strength be.

In cloud or sunshine He will guide—
In heat or storm be at our side.

HENRY A. HARPER.

Monthly Religious Record.

MANY anxious thoughts have been directed towards Africa during the last few months. The failure of the Stanley Relief Expedition, the death of its leaders, the long lapse of communications with Emin Pasha, war in the interior, the conflicts also between the Germans and the Arabs, the appearance on the scene of great commercial companies—all point to a period of danger and transition. One hopeful fact appears at Uganda in the restoration of friendly relations between the capricious Mwanga and the missionaries.

Letters have been received from Mr. Walker describing his reception. The king sent for him, and he went, accompanied by Mr. Gordon, who had been for some time, so to say, "holding the fort." "As we drew nearer," says Mr. Walker, "and came in sight of the gate in the high (20 ft.) reed fence we saw hundreds of people. As we came nearer still men came running to meet us at full speed. They rushed right up to us, only pulling up just before they touched us. They said, 'Come quickly,' and then, turning round, ran back to the entrance gate as fast as they could; then they returned at full speed, and kept on running backwards and forwards until we reached the gate. The road for some three hundred yards from the entrance gate was lined with warriors, armed with spears and shields, dressed in native style, many of them with faces painted red, others with curious arrangements of their hair to give a look of fierceness to them. I suppose there were six or seven hundred of them, as they lined the road on both sides for such a distance. As we entered between their ranks the drums beat, and all of them shouted and kept up a sort of tremulous cry, quivering their spears as they held them above their heads. When we entered the first gate the courtyard inside was full of soldiers, dressed in white, and armed with guns, and many of them carried red and white flags. We marched between their ranks, and they, at a given word, marched quickly past us on both sides, and returned behind the first row, thus making their numbers seem very great. I suppose there were three or four hundred of these men in white. At last, after passing through several doors in high reed fences, we came to the court-house itself. A bodyguard was drawn up in front of it. Gordon made me go first. As I stepped over the raised doorstep all in the court stood up—the Arabs, the chiefs, and the king himself. The band played—the band, I fancy, consisted of a big drum, two kettle drums, a bugle, and several native horns. I walked up the centre aisle towards the king, and in my ignorance went up far too near to him. Gordon hurried after me and touched me on the shoulder; I stopped. The king placed his hand on his breast and bowed towards us; we acknowledged the salute in the same way. Then the king and the chiefs sat down, and we, passing behind the first row, walked up to the wall against which the throne was placed, and took our seats on camp-stools some ten feet to the king's right hand. The court was full of people, and all along the walls were ranged soldiers with guns pointed towards the door. The king spoke kindly to us, made several remarks upon my personal appearance, and decreed that I was not such a good-looking man as Gordon. He asked if I had come in the place of the bishop (Hannington). Of course Gordon, who did all the talking, and told me what was being said, assured him that I had not come in any sense as the bishop's representative. He then asked if I was a smith or carpenter. Gordon assured him I was neither, but, like himself, simply a teacher. He seemed pleased and satisfied. I watched his face, as our presents were shown to him, at a distance, and he looked pleased and rather surprised at the size of the piece of carpet. The chair is a very, very much better throne than the thing he has at present, and the carpet will be a great improvement on the red and green table-cloth that now is placed under and before his throne. . . The court lasted some three-quarters of an hour, and then the king rose, and as the band played, left the court-house. As we left the king's enclosure the soldiers in white formed line and marched on each side of us, conducting us much of the way home. Such a reception Gordon thinks has never been given to any one before. The Arabs who came to see us to-day say they never saw the king of Buganda stand up to receive a guest on any former occasion. They think we are in great favour now. . . Surely we may regard this as in some way a sort of apology for his past ill-treatment of the missionaries and their converts." A telegram from Zanzibar speaks of the missionaries as "holding large Sabbath congregations." Remembering the days of fiery persecution, this news will be hailed by the churches with unfeigned thankfulness, though the character of the young king forbids reliance upon him.

THE principles of religious liberty need strong re-assertion in Turkey. There is a growing disposition to infringe on the privileges secured by treaty after the Crimean War. The rule of equality in civil rights is too often ignored. At the present moment two Protestant school teachers are languishing in prison in different provinces of the empire, without the possibility of securing attention to their demand for a trial, or for a definite statement of the charges under which they have been treated as felons. In another province a Protestant clergyman is under arrest, having been torn from his congregation in violation of the rule which exempts the clergy from imprisonment without a regular trial. When, after lying in the common gaol twenty days, he petitioned the government for a statement of the charge on which he was arrested, the governor tore the petition into pieces, and flung it into the waste-basket. He has now been released on bail, but with specific orders not to return to his own town. In the same province, in another town, a Protestant merchant has been harassed during two years by repeated arrests on trivial charges connected with his evangelical views. He is now in prison on the charge of "trying to make men Protestants," and of "trying to make his house a church;" neither charge being an offence under the law, neither having been made the subject of the slightest investigation by the authorities, and both being untrue. In the same province, in three separate cases, the local authorities have arbitrarily and illegally forbidden the solemnization of marriage among Protestants. Other cases show that restrictions on the freedom of worship, and on education, as well as on the publication of religious books, are common, notwithstanding the existing guarantees for toleration.

THE marauding spirit still gives trouble in Bechuanaland, and those interested in the native tribes have still to be on the alert. A letter in the London Missionary Chronicle, mentions that "Khame's territory, in the British Protectorate, had been seriously threatened by bands of Boers and unprincipled Englishmen thirsting for gold. The chief was courageously and patiently holding his own against them. On Lord's Day, July 8th, he and his people held a monster open-air service around the church. A space of some 200 yards in length by 100 in breadth was covered with a mass of men, women, and children. The purpose of this meeting was to commend the country and people of Mangwato to the gracious care of God, or, as the Chief Khame put it, 'to put the country before God' in prayer. The chief made a statement with reference to the need for this step, on account of the difficulties which threaten them continually. The Bamangwato, with their Chief Khame, have sought the help of the British Government more than once. But the necessary help has not been rendered. In this strait the Bamangwato turned away their eyes to Him who is King of kings, the Lord of heaven and earth." There is reason to hope that ere this the British representatives have appeared on the scene, and taken steps to protect the district.

MR. EDMUND STURGE calls attention in the Times to the state of affairs in Madagascar. Slavery is in process of revival under the dominant French influence. In the west the freed Mozambiques are being impressed to work in the French gold mines under French taskmasters; eight men who refused were savagely put to death, and this was declared to be done by command of the queen and prime minister. Although the introduction of new slaves has long been declared illegal, they are being brought in by the Arabs in large numbers under the protection of the French flag. The flag of the French Republic is being likewise employed in sheltering a largely-revived slave-trade in the South Indian Ocean. The reaction has extended to the east coast, where the worst forms of the slave-trade are said to be fostered by "British subjects, Christian, and often highly educated."

THE work of missions, which was so promising in Corea, has received a check in the notification of the Corean Government that all Christian teaching in schools there must stop, on penalty of withdrawal of Government patronage. A correspondent of Evangelical Christendom states, that two missionaries who had started on an evangelistic tour had been forbidden to preach. The reason alleged is one that requires investigation. "The Jesuits were grading a hill on which to build a cathedral in a part of the city overlooking a royal temple. They were asked to stop, but refused. The king then offered to refund all moneys expended on the present property, and to give free of cost an equally large plot of ground in another part of the city, giving the Jesuits their choice. They asked for the old (now deserted) Palace grounds. Thus defied, the king ordered all teaching of Christianity to cease at once."

THE Baptist Congo Mission has sustained another loss in the death of the Rev. Michael Richards, of Lukolela. Mr. Richards was returning from the Upper Congo to the coast, to take his first furlough in England—which had evidently become necessary to his health—when he was attacked with fever, and died, at Banana.

THE announcement that Raratonga, and the rest of the Hervey Group of Pacific Islands, are to be taken under British protection, will be hailed with satisfaction in that quarter of the globe. The news will be the more welcome, seeing that so many elements of disquiet have recently manifested themselves in adjacent groups.

AT a conference of Protestants, representing eleven different denominations, held in Mexico, it was resolved to establish a college for students of theology, on the basis of the Evangelical Alliance. It was also proposed that in all cities having less than 15,000 inhabitants there should be only one denomination for the work of evangelization.

THE Rev. E. P. Rice, of the Bangalore Mission, writing to the Religious Tract Society, describes a visit to Madura, where there is a large famous and very wealthy temple, which is to the ordinary temples what the grandest cathedrals are to small parish churches. "I have never seen," he says, "so much stir and activity in Hindu ceremonial as in this temple. To walk through its thousand-pillared corridors, every pillar bearing colossal grotesque figures carved in high relief out of solid granite—to see the wealth of gold and silver lavished on senseless and utterly uninspiring images, and to watch the throngs of pilgrims from all parts of India making their obeisance before dark shrines, dimly lighted with a flickering lamp and reeking with oil, and to note the utter want of reverence or spirituality in those about the temple, is a thing to make one sad. How I wish I could make English Christians see it for themselves. It would give them much food for thought. Yet Madura has the best organised missionary work it has yet been my privilege to see—that of the American Mission. They are doing a most admirable work—a work that bears close looking into. One could scarcely light upon a greater contrast than that between the work of those missionaries and what goes on within the temple. Many European visitors come to Madura expressly to see its temple; but I believe few turn aside to see the mission work there. Yet the day will assuredly come when that old temple will be used for Christian worshippers, and be gazed at with wonder as we now gaze at the Coliseum."

THE Bishop of Manchester, in a sermon preliminary to the recent Church Congress, spoke of the spirit of consecration to Christ's service as spreading amongst all classes of men. There were even nobles amongst them who were not only shaming the wasteful luxury around them by their simple lives, but were also working hard and faithfully in the midst of the offensive quarters of our great cities, and bearing the personal abuse of the masses they were labouring to save.

THE subjects brought under discussion at the Congress were many of them of national interest. The date at which we go to press prevents more than a passing reference here. Among the speakers on the first evening, at the working men's meeting in the Free Trade Hall was Mr. A. T. Balfour, who bore the testimony of a layman as to "The Needs of Human Nature, and their Supply in Christianity." "I feel myself," he said in conclusion, "that religion appeals as freshly, perhaps more strongly, and more freshly, to the hearts of men than it ever did before. I see nothing in the circumstances of modern life to alter that. I see everything to strengthen it. Science changes, science must change, from day to day, and from hour to hour; but as long as human hearts remain what they are, as long as suffering exists, as long as the sense of sin and the sense of weakness oppresses us feeble men, in the face of the overwhelming forces of inanimate nature, so long shall we and our children be able to draw inexhaustible sources of comfort from the same streams which have fed our forefathers." Later the same night, Mr. Balfour took part in a discussion on "Positivism," and read a paper in which he reviewed, with much force, the question of gain or loss to the highest interests of mankind which would follow a substitution of the Positivist for the Christian theory. He showed that Positivism must, even within the limits of mundane experience, prove inferior as a moralising agent to Christianity. Glancing at other aspects, the "the religion of humanity" seemed specially fitted to meet the tastes of that comparatively small and prosperous class who were unwilling to leave the dry bones of Agnosticism wholly unclothed with any living tissue of religious emotion, and who were, at the same time, fortunate enough to be able to persuade themselves that they were contributing to the attainment of some great ideal for mankind. But what had it to say to the more obscure multitude who were absorbed, and well-nigh overwhelmed, in the constant struggle with daily needs and narrow cares, who had but little leisure or inclination to consider the precise rôle they were called on to play in the great drama of humanity, and who must, in any case, be puzzled to discover its interest or its importance? Could it assure them that there was no human being so insignificant as not to be of infinite worth in the eyes of Him who created the heavens, or so feeble but that his actions must have consequence of infinite moment long after this material system should have crumbled into nothingness? Did it offer consolation to those in grief, hope to the bereaved, strength to the weak, forgiveness to the sinful, rest to the wearied and heavy-laden? If not, then, whatever its merits, it was no rival to Christianity.

THE statue of Lord Shaftesbury in Westminster Abbey was unveiled on the third anniversary of his death. It is the work of Mr. Boehm, R.A., and represents him in the robes of the Garter, with his hands clasped in front. The statue of William Pitt stands on the right, that of Charles James Fox on the left; while hard by are the memorials of Sir James Mackintosh, the reformer of our criminal code, and of Zachary Macaulay, one of the heroes of the abolition of the slave trade. Canon Duckworth applied to him, on the occasion, the words written in praise of another in the last century:

> "Ne'er to these chambers, where the mighty rest, > Since their foundation came a nobler guest."

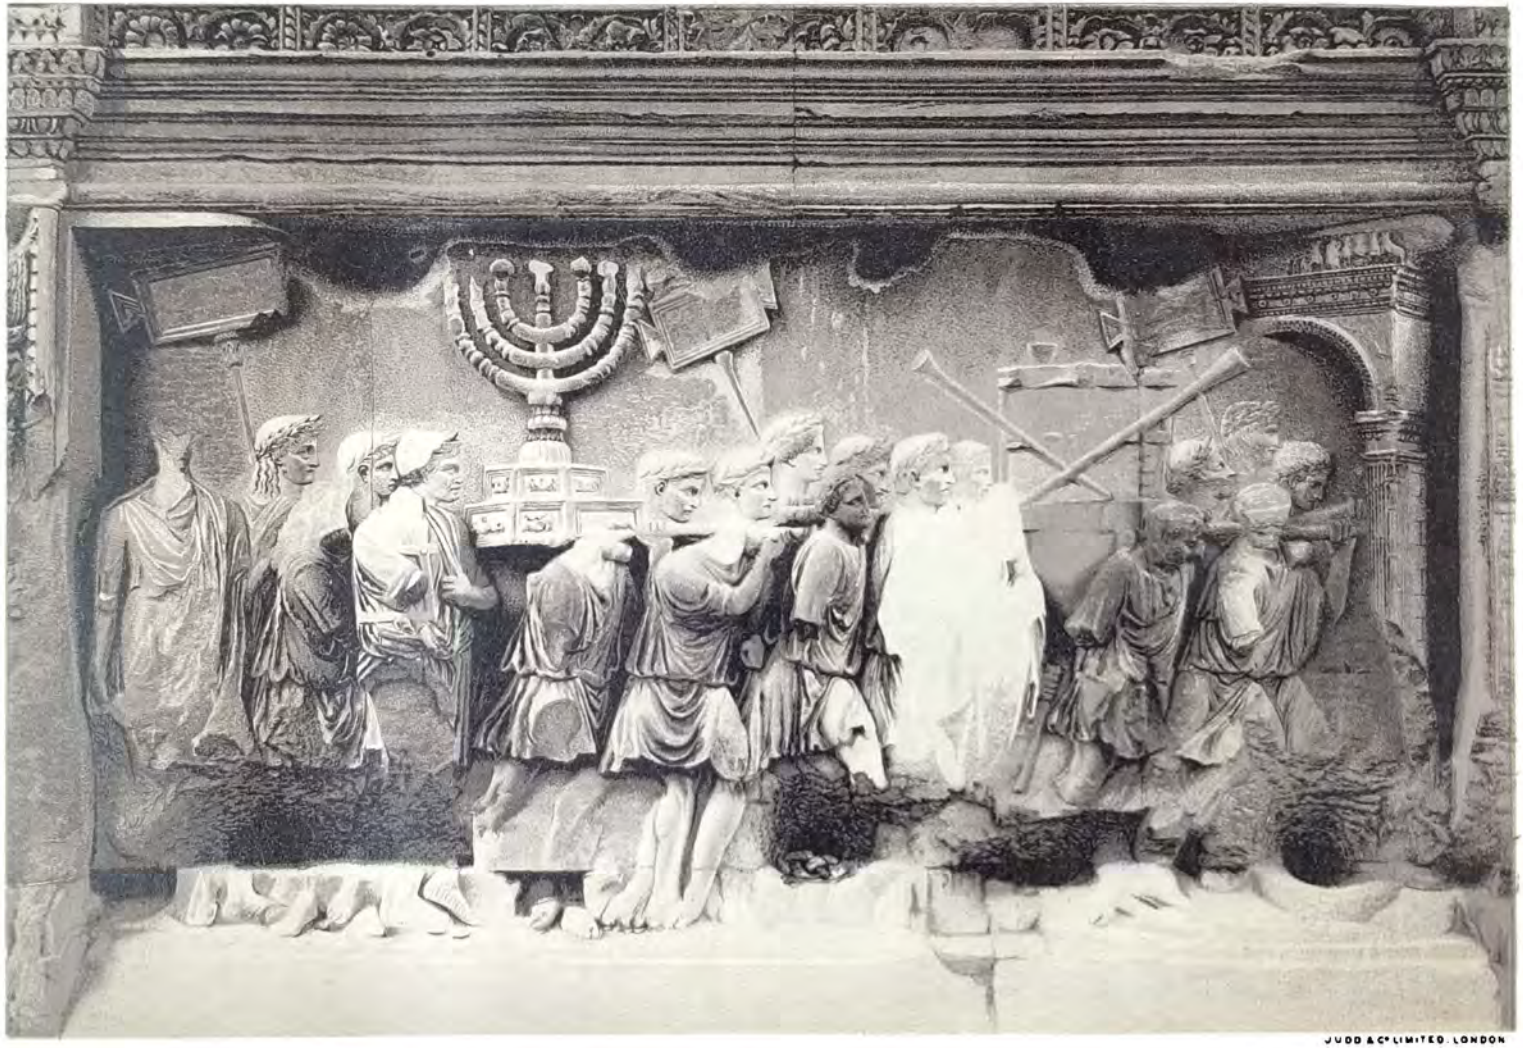
SOME remarkable statistics (says Dr. Cuyler) have lately been published in regard to the Protestant churches in New York city. In a population of much over one million, the Methodist churches have but 13,000 communicants. The Dutch Reformed, but 7,200. The Congregationalists have decreased from 2,450 to 2,315. The Presbyterians of all shades number 23,016. The Episcopalians, who attract many from other denominations, report 33,900 members. The total membership of all these denominations, including 13,600 Baptists, is only 93,000. This is a sad showing for the great metropolis. There is food for grave meditation, and a call for a general uprising among God's people, in view of so startling an exhibition.



FRIEZE FROM THE ARCH OF TITUS AT ROME.

COMMEMORATING HIS TRIUMPH OVER THE JEWS

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

CONVALESCENT.

"Lead us, O Father, to Thy heavenly rest,
However rough and steep the path may be,
Through joy or sorrow, as Thou deemest best,
Until our lives are perfected in Thee!"

No. 1805.—DECEMBER 1, 1888.

OLD GWEN.

BY ANNE BEALE.

CHAPTER V.—A FIRST NIGHT IN SERVICE.

"YOU are Nurse Gwillim's grand-daughter," were the words that greeted Gwen after she had given a shy single knock at the door of her "place."

"Yes, please, ma'am," she replied with a courtesy.

"Who is that young man? I don't allow young men," said the voice.

"My brother, please, ma'am: he's just carrying my little box," returned Gwen.

It was dusk, and the door was only partially opened, but at these words it fully unclosed, and revealed the figure of a little woman in black with a widow's cap on her head.

"Bring in the box, young Gwillim. A soldier! I don't allow soldiers. Why is your brother a soldier?"

"Please, ma'am, he 'listed."

"I'm quartered in Carmarthen for a bit, ma'am." Toom thought it best to speak out.

"Quartered here! Then you'll bring your regiment, I dare say, to look at your sister. This is a bad beginning. I never have any peace. However, you can bring in the box."

Toom placed the small, inoffensive article in the passage, touched his cap with soldierly salute, and recrossed the threshold of the house.

"Good-bye, Toom," cried Gwen, running after him. "I'm sure I shall never be staying here," she added, tears in her voice.

But Mrs. Bowen's bark was worse than her bite. She took Gwen into a tidy little kitchen at the back of the small house, and told her that she felt sure any one belonging to nurse Gwillim would be obedient and honest, and that if she did her work well, she would have a comfortable place.

"I will do my best, ma'am," responded Gwen, courtesying again.

Mrs. Bowen bade Gwen bring her box and bundle upstairs to a slip of a room dedicated to her one maid. There was scarcely room to turn round in it, and Gwen reflected that it was no bigger than mother's bedstead; but she was to have it all to herself, which she thought would be delightful. It contained all that was necessary for cleanliness and tidiness, and was neat as a new pin: but it was so chock full of furniture that she scarcely knew how she should get in and out of bed. But all the house was chock full she afterwards found.

However, she easily accommodated herself to circumstances, and soon, at her mistress's desire, stowed away her things, and went downstairs. Mrs. Bowen took her through the house, which was very old, but small and compact, and consisted of two sitting-rooms, two bedrooms, and Gwen's "slip." Indeed the house might be called a "slip," since the rooms ran in single file, from the street to the garden at the back.

"This is the lodger's parlour, and his bedroom is above," said Mrs. Bowen, showing the front room. "This is mine"—the back—"and looks into the garden. You'll have your kitchen all to yourself, for I allow no callers. Plenty to do to keep this house clean, though it's small: and to wash Patsy, and to wash and iron for me and yourself, and to help me to see to the garden, for we do it all between us; to say nothing of the cooking, which, your grandmother says, you have to learn."

Patsy was a white poodle, curled up on the hearth-rug in Mrs. Bowen's parlour. Gwen resented the idea that she could not cook, and assured Mrs. Bowen that she could bake and boil, and make crumpets and plank bread, and various other culinary dainties.

"Glad to hear it," said Mrs. Bowen curtly, who, Gwen found afterwards, did not think any one knew anything but herself.

Now as Gwen was tolerably self-sufficient, and had a fine organ of self-reliance, she had got into the right school according to the system of teaching by contradictions. Everything was done by rule in Mrs. Bowen's small establishment, even to the exact measurement of the food necessary to sustain life. "Enough's as good as a feast," was one of her favourite axioms, and "Waste not, want not," another. Indeed, poor soul, she could not afford to waste.

When Gwen had eaten her supper, she fancied she should have liked more, for she had a fine healthy appetite; but there was, apparently, no more to be had. Her mistress superintended her while she washed and put away the supper things, both in parlour and kitchen, and then bade her come into the parlour for prayers. Gwen, who had been accustomed to Mamgu's and Uncle Laban's extempore petitions in Welsh, felt her fervour chilled by the English prayers read by her mistress; and even the chapter seemed to her colder in the latter than the former tongue; but she pulled herself together by the reflection that it did not matter to the Almighty what language it was, and remembered how her grandmother used to roll out those hard words, "Parthians and Medes and Elamites and the dwellers in Mesopotamia," etc., and to say that all nations of the earth became one in Christ Jesus.

"I will let in Mr. Milbank. He only came this morning, and will expect to see me; you can go to bed. You must get up early, for there's plenty to do. "'Early to bed,' you know the rest," said Mrs. Bowen.

Gwen withdrew with a courtesy and a "good night, ma'am," and went to her small apartment.

There she sat down on the foot of her bed, and began to cry. "I wish I was at home with Mamgu, and mother and Dorcas in the cupboard bedstead. Better to sleep two a-top and two a-bottom than all by oneself," she muttered. "And I'm as hungry as Shonny always is. But Mamgu said Mrs. Bowen was obliged to be 'conomical, so it can't be helped."

Here we may remark, that Mrs. Bowen was a woman who abhorred debt. Like many honest people she had the reputation of niggardliness, simply because she kept within her very small income, and took a lodger to eke it out. It is a melancholy fact that the majority have more sympathy with those who are lavish on other people's means, than with those who live modestly on their own. In Mrs. Bowen's proverbial philosophy, "Out of debt, out of danger," held a conspicuous place; and she was what might be called a proverbial philosopher, since she had a proverb ready on all occasions. This was almost as tiresome "as if she had been a professional punster."

Gwen soon wiped her eyes, said her prayers and got into bed. She was asleep in no time. Her digestion never troubled her, and on the present occasion she had not too much to digest. But she had not been more than two or three hours asleep when she was aroused by some sort of unearthly noise. She could not make out whether it was within or outside the house. It was like the flapping of wings, accompanied by a mysterious sound, and seemed quite fiendish to her imagination. At first she thought it must be birds, but they neither flew nor sang in the night; except the nightingales of which she had heard and read. However, there were said to be no nightingales in Wales. The legend was that St. Patrick had cursed them once upon a time, for interrupting his preaching; and that they had quitted the country for ever. This happened at a wild, wooded and rocky place called Llandewy Brefi, in a neighbouring county; and they certainly had not taken refuge in Carmarthenshire. Only once had she heard of a solitary bird singing in the Dynevor woods at night, and all the countryside had flocked to listen. The learned said it was a stray nightingale, but whence it came or whither it went, they were not prepared to affirm.

Like most of her countrywomen, Gwen was superstitious. She believed in corpse candles and magpies, and all sorts of omens; though these beliefs were gradually disappearing; but above all, she believed in ghosts. She had never seen one, but she felt quite sure the strange noises that continued, at intervals, all through the night, were ghostly. Some one was dead or going to die, she was sure. She thought of her father, and cover her head and stop her ears as she would his form and face haunted her. She had no lucifer matches, for Mrs. Bowen never trusted her maids with such inflammable things; so she had nothing to do but to wait for the dawn. It came at last, and with it the most demoniacal noise she had ever heard in her life. She got up and hastily dressed herself, while a pink light crept in at her little window.

Suddenly she heard a door unclose, and a voice exclaiming "Mrs. Bowen! Mrs. Bowen! I can stand this no longer." There was no answer—Mrs. Bowen was either asleep or obtuse. Gwen, terrified out of all propriety, answered for her.

"What do you want please, sir?" she said, dashing into the passage.

"Want! come here," was the reply, and Gwen followed the voice.

All she wanted was companionship.

"Mrs. Bowen, what is the meaning of all these fiends?" cried the voice.

It was of course the lodger. He was dressed and Gwen paused on the threshold of his room, as he entered it. His apartment faced west, and no ruddy streak had penetrated the gray dawn that filled it. He had, however, lighted a candle.

Gwen recognized the tourist!

"Oh, sir! I'm glad it's you," she exclaimed; for a familiar face, even though she instinctively disliked it, seemed preferable to a stranger's.

He took her by the arm, and led her in.

"What is it?" he asked.

"I—I—don't know, sir, unless it's ghosts," she replied.

The supernatural noises were much worse in this room than they had been in Gwen's. The house and air were full of them. The flapping of wings seemed to be actually in the room, and there was a cry as of something in pain. It was almost like the old mythological story of an imprisoned spirit.

"This has been going on all night," said the tourist. "Will you rouse the landlady? I hate unnatural noises, and must find out what this is."

Gwen began to sob, and as she sobbed, it seemed that the supernatural sounds increased. The air was full of them, and they were like nothing she had ever heard before.

"What is the matter?" came from a half-open door, at last.

"Fiends! ghosts! spirits are the matter," shouted the tourist.

"Oh, I know; I'll come as soon as I'm dressed," returned Mrs. Bowen and shut her door.

Gwen was about to depart, but the tourist detained her. The noise grew with the light.

"It sounds like birds, sir. They come at night before a death," muttered Gwen. "Open the window. May be the ghost can't get out."

Gwen's ideas were gathered from many superstitious tales she had heard from time to time.

The tourist obeyed, and looking out, saw a dense cloud of what seemed to him restless spirits.

At this juncture Mrs. Bowen appeared suddenly in hastily-donned widow's garb. She looked severely at Gwen.

"I was frightened, please, ma'am," apologized the girl.

"What at? 'Tis only the jackdaws. I forgot to tell you about them, Mr. Milbank," said Mrs. Bowen, looking at her lodger.

She removed a chimney-board from before the grate, and out tumbled a mass of black matter, while an awful croaking cry, and fluttering of wings was heard up the chimney. A cloud of unmistakable soot accompanied this inroad.

"Poor little things! The nest has fallen down the chimney," said Mrs. Bowen, stooping over the lively mass at her feet. "I don't wonder at your being alarmed, for an accident like this disturbs the whole colony, and they flutter and fidget and make queer little noises, not knowing what to do in the night. Listen to the parent birds! They are chattering up above to their young. We must put a cage in the chimney, and they will come and feed them. They are most interesting."

"Not in my chimney, Mrs. Bowen, I hope," said Mr. Milbank, with an attempt at a smile. "Where do these ill-omened creatures live?"

Mrs. Bowen was too busy with the nest to answer this question. She asked her lodger to be so kind as to go downstairs until she had cleared his room, expressing much sorrow at the accident, and he gladly disappeared. She fetched a large cage, evidently kept for the purpose, and placed the nest of young jackdaws therein, saying she would hang the cage outside in the garden and the old birds would come and feed them. Then she ordered Gwen to fetch dustpan and brush, and sweep up the débris.

Meanwhile, Mr. Milbank, as we will now call him, unbolted the front door, and went out into the street. It was a fresh, bright May morning, and the night was giving place to the dawn. The old town was quiet, or would have been, but for the feathered colonists who had thronged the portion of it in which he had located himself. He could understand the rookery in the trees above the fine old church down below, upon the tower and roofs of which the sun was shining; but he could not make out why that particular house was infested; for there was scarcely a tree near at hand. He glanced up, and the roofs of the houses were all alive with jackdaws, which chattered, flew from friend to friend, and plumed themselves with the glistening rays of the rising sun. He knew that it was a sleepy old-world town, but he had not realized that birds could build unmolested in the roofs and chimneys of that portion of it, and take all the courage out of him as they had done.

He paced up and down the silent street, until he met a policeman. His pale face and disordered appearance, excited the suspicion of this limb of the law, but he explained why he was parading the town at that hour. The policeman smiled, and said strangers were often alarmed by the noise of the birds, but he believed they had been there for generations, and many people thought it would be unlucky to disturb them. The inhabitants were used to them, and as for himself, they were a kind of clock to him, reminding him of the hour.

"They often go to sleep when I wake up, and awake when I am ready for my bed," he said. "I mean when I am on my beat at night."

"I suppose you sleep soundly?" asked Mr. Milbank.

"Rather," replied the policeman, leaving his questioner to determine what that adverb, so fashionable in modern days, meant.

"I wish I slept soundly," muttered Milbank, resuming his beat.

As he paced he meditated on the old town he had known when a boy. It was unchanged, save for a few improvements. He paused outside the restored parish church, which was at the end of the street where he lodged. He uttered an uncomplimentary epithet to the rooks and jackdaws in the trees above it, and longed for guns enough to shoot them all. He remembered how he used to meditate in by-gone years, on the old monuments within the church, particularly on the altar-tomb to Sir Rhys Ap Thomas, who commanded the Welsh under Henry of Bosworth.

"He fought for his country; so did General Nott, whose tomb is there also. And was not Bishop Farr burnt in the market-place for his religion? All memorialised in stone. And I, what have I done?"

Thus he moralised and turning hastily, retraced his steps. The church spire was like burnished gold when he turned his back upon it, and he bethought him that it must be late. But few shutters were unclosed in the sleepy old town, and the door of his lodging was shut; so he walked on, he scarcely knew where. He stood to gaze on the vale and river all aglow in the sunshine; he thought of the antiquity of the place,—the Maridunum of Ptolemy—of what Spenser said about it and its neighbourhood; of the myriads of human beings who had lived and died there.

"More numerous than those accursed ravens," he muttered, as he rushed on to the Picton Obelisk. "All have done some good in their generation, but I, what have I done?" he added.

The town was astir at last, and he suddenly recollected his appearance. Fortunately, nobody knew him, so he reached his lodging unnoticed. The door was open, and Gwen was on her knees scrubbing the passage. He nearly stumbled over her and her bucket.

"There's glad I am, sir!" she exclaimed. "We thought you had run away; and I had a mind to run away too, but I was afraid of the police."

"Then you don't hate me, Gwenny?" he returned.

"Why for should I be hating you, sir? You was never harming me; and Mamgu says we must love everybody, even our enemies."

Mrs. Bowen appeared, and with solemn manner assured him that his rooms were ready, and breakfast waiting.

"Such an accident may never occur again," she said. "The parent birds have already discovered their young. Instinct is strong in the animal creation."

"And they are keeping noise out there in the cage," put in Gwen, who had not yet learned that, in service, she should not give an opinion unasked.

Mr. Milbank went to his room, and found the chimney board replaced, and not a straw or feather left.

"He do look shocking bad," said Gwen.

"He certainly does. What do you know about him?" asked Mrs. Bowen severely.

Gwen told her in a whisper, the history of her various encounters with the tourist, and how that he wished to educate her. She had no concealment. Mrs. Bowen looked grave, for she had seen much of life and wondered why a gentleman should choose to make friends with people in a different rank to himself. Gwen was a good girl, of that she was sure, or she would have misdoubted his taking her rooms just as she entered her service. She resolved to wait upon him herself at breakfast, and try to discover his reasons. When he appeared, however, he seated himself at the table without taking notice of her, and when she said, "Anything else I can do for you, sir?" he merely replied, "No, thank you," and gave her no further opportunity for conversation.

He sat so long over the meal, that she despaired of finding one, unless she made it herself, so she knocked at the door, and asked if she might bring him some hot coffee, as she was sure what he had must be cold.

"I thought it was Gwenny," he said absently, and she, thereupon, dashed into her subject—

"Gwenny is new to service, sir. I am going to teach her to wait."

"She waits admirably," he replied. "Nothing can be better than the teas at Careg Cennin."

"She is young, sir, and being, I may say, as good as fatherless, she requires watchful care. I have known her grandmother for many years, and she has placed her in my charge, feeling sure that I will do my best, God helping me, to keep her from the evil, and to lead her to the good. Old Gwen is the best woman I ever knew, and has done more good in her time than most people, because she carries her religion with her wherever she goes. There is nothing like example, sir."

"Certainly," assented Mr. Milbank, moving uneasily.

"Gwenny tells me, sir, that you have offered to educate her," pursued Mrs. Bowen. "Excuse my freedom, but was it on her account you came here? I am her protector, and could not answer to my own conscience, or to my Heavenly Father, if I allowed temptation to stand in her path."

Milbank smiled as he replied in a straightforward way to this straightforward question—

"I did come here because I heard that Gwenny would precede me. But I had no ill-intentions. I am interested in her family, and wish to be of service to them. Perhaps you can help me. She refuses to be educated."

"So much the better, sir. Ambition to rise above our natural sphere is the ruin of most of us. Contentment is lost with dissatisfaction."

Mrs. Bowen spoke feelingly, for her husband had ruined himself and her in scheming to "better his condition," as it is called. She had passed through the fire of adversity, and had been purified.

"You need not fear for Gwenny, Mrs. Bowen," said Milbank. "She and her family are sacred in my eyes."

An expression of pain passed over his face, and he rose, as if to conclude a conversation, which had quite satisfied Mrs. Bowen.

THE GAMUT OF GRACES.

BY THE REV. JOHN MONRO GIBSON, D.D.

"Giving all diligence, add to your faith virtue; and to virtue knowledge; and to knowledge temperance; and to temperance patience; and to patience godliness; and to godliness brotherly kindness: and to brotherly kindness charity."—2 Peter i. 5-7.

"GOD hath called us unto holiness." But what is holiness? We have all an idea what it means, and yet we should find it hard to define it. It seems to be not so much any particular quality or grace, as a something diffused all through the life which is the result of the development in harmonious proportion of all the graces. It is etymologically connected with "wholeness," completeness: so that the idea of rounded symmetry of character is suggested as its basis. From this it follows that holiness is not something which can be directly cultivated by itself. To cultivate holiness we must cultivate all those excellences which enter into the complete symmetrical Christian character. Hence the value of such directions as are given in the passage before us.

One can see at a glance the beauty and excellence of the character set forth in this circle of attainments; and therefore it is a very useful passage even to the casual reader. But besides what lies on the surface, there are many things worth exploring; and therefore it may repay us if we devote some time to looking closely at it.

Observe the order. And the first thing that strikes us, on looking at the arrangement, is the beginning and the end of the series. It begins with faith and ends with love. It begins with faith—why? Because faith is the foundation of all; it is the soil out of which all the flowers of grace grow. Faith is at all the springs of action in our life. It is for this reason, and no other, that faith is so much insisted on in the Gospel, never as a matter of opinion, but always as the ground of action, the foundation on which the structure of life is built. Hence faith is here taken, not simply as co-ordinate with the others, but as something already present, to which the others must all be added. Then the series ends with love. "Love is the fulfilling of the law." "The end of the commandment is love out of a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith unfeigned." How beautifully consistent is Scripture with itself; and in nothing more so than in this, that faith is always represented as the foundation of character, and love as its consummation.

Look now at the links between. Links, we say; though there is nothing in the Authorised Version to suggest the idea. The thought there is simply that of adding, so that the different virtues might be supposed to stand together in a row, like balls or blocks, without being fastened to one another. But we see by looking at the Revised Version that the preposition in is used all through the series; so that the idea of successive links is in this way plainly and most expressively suggested. Each grace is firmly linked into that which goes before, so that we have not a mere series, but a chain. The practical difference will be at once evident. You may leave out one of a series and retain the rest. Your series is defective, but that is all; and if, for instance, only one number is omitted, it may look pretty well, and the casual observer might not notice the fault. But drop one link in a chain and it is spoilt. Christian character is not a loose and variable aggregation of excellences; it is a closely compacted whole.

Let us now examine somewhat closely these intervening links between faith at the beginning and love at the end. There is a certain vagueness in some of the English words that keeps us from getting at the precise idea without some explanation. We shall endeavour to remove this vagueness, and to reach a clear comprehension of each link in the chain.

Next to faith, and linked firmly into it, is "virtue." Our modern use of the word virtue is quite indefinite, so that to many readers "add to your faith virtue" means nothing more than "add to faith goodness," a term so large that if understood in this sense we might stop there and let the series end, for it already includes everything. But the old "virtue," corresponding to the Latin virtus, was not a word implying general goodness, but a specific term which is often fairly enough translated "courage." But the word "courage" again is rather narrow. It is only at times that courage is called into request, whereas the virtue the apostle has in view is always in request. It is that practical energy which resides in the will, and which is necessary to carry faith into action. We may, for convenience, call it the grace of doing. "Faith cometh by hearing"; but there are many who hear and fail to do, for want of this practical energy, this determination which leads on to action. It is the practical, as distinguished from the speculative or the sentimental spirit. A moment's consideration will show that this is the first link in the formation of character upon faith; and it is for want of it that we have so many sad illustrations of "faith without works." We may deal with divine truth in the way of speculation, and our characters be no better for it. That is for want of this "virtue." We may deal with divine truth and even with divine love in the way of sentiment, and yet be no better for it. That is for want of this "virtue." But when we have this energy of the soul, this practical determination, then we have a strong bridge between believing and good living, between faith and works. The first and most important link then is this practical energy, this grace of doing.

The next is the grace of seeing. Add "to virtue knowledge." It is evident that practical and not speculative knowledge is meant—knowledge in its relation to character. And what is knowledge in respect to character? Is it not discrimination? Many a man who is practical enough and energetic enough, loses all the good of his energy for want of discrimination. He has zeal, "but not according to knowledge." Hence to practical energy there must be added practical wisdom. Some may think it strange that this does not come before the other; but a little reflection will show that it is in its proper place. For it is just in proportion as we show an obedient spirit that we shall have an enlightened spirit. "If any man will do," i.e. is willing to do (which is just this grace of doing of which we have been speaking) "His will, he shall know of the doctrine" (which is just this grace of seeing, the next link of the chain). I have been interested to find in the work of an acute modern writer on ethics a discussion on the nature of the moral agent, in which he treats first of the springs of action, next of the arbiter or executors of action, and last of the guides of action. The analysis is based on logic simply, without any reference to the Scriptures; and for this reason it is interesting to note the correspondence. The springs of action first—that is the region of faith; the arbiters or executors of action next—here is the practical energy called "virtue" in the text; the guides of action follow, corresponding to the knowledge here spoken of. First, the grace of doing founded on our believing; and then the grace of seeing. And in fact it is of importance to remember that unless we have the first link, the will to do, there cannot really be the second; and that is the reason why so many people who think themselves Christians can go on doing things and living in a way that any one else can see is unchristian, and yet never suspect it themselves. For want of the grace of doing they lose the grace of seeing. (see v. 9.)

Let us look now at the next pair of graces, temperance and patience. The word "temperance" has in modern times become narrowed, just as the word "virtue" has become extended in meaning. Most people understand it now in relation to one sin, which is called the "sin of intemperance," viz. drunkenness; but it need scarcely be said that while it of course applies to that sin, it does not apply to it alone; it is temperance in all things. The best word perhaps is self-control. It is the grace of abstaining from all kinds of evil to which we are tempted; of holding back when lust urges us to go forward. And certainly we all find it hard enough in some direction or other. It may be very easy for me to "hold back" from the use of intoxicating drinks, if I have no temptation in that direction. It does not follow that it is easy to abstain from hasty words or from angry feelings. But to give way to the latter would be just as much a breach of self-control as to yield to the former.

What is the reason that self-control is so hard to many of us? It is a trite saying that only the man who has learned how to obey is able to command. And this is manifestly true of self-government. A man who has not that spirit of obedience which constitutes the first link will certainly not have that self-control which constitutes the third.

This leads us to notice what an abuse of language, or rather confusion of thought, it is, to call a selfish man a man of strong will, as is so often done. The truth is that such persons are the men of weak will. What is strong in them is not their will, but their passions, and it is just because their passions are so much stronger than their will or their wit (virtue or knowledge), that you cannot do anything with them. But if a man really have the strong will implied in the "virtue," and the strong wit indicated in the "knowledge" of the text, he will certainly have "self-control" enough not to act like a baby because he cannot have his own way.

"And to self-control, patience:" patient and steadfast endurance as opposed to impatience, fickleness and changeableness. The former, temperance, has to do with the control of that which is within us; the latter, patience, has to do with the control of that which is without us, our circumstances. A man without self-control is at the mercy of his lusts within him; a man without patience is at the mercy of circumstances. The relation between the two is very apparent, and perhaps we may express it by saying that while the former is the grace of holding back, the latter is the grace of holding on. The one holds back when lust urges on, the other holds on when vexations and annoyances threaten to move us from our equanimity or steadfastness. Now it is quite evident that patience is closely linked in self-control, and in the graces that go before. Who are the patient ones? Those who have learned to exercise self-control, through the power of a faith-governed will and under the guidance of an enlightened conscience. Who are the impatient, irritable, fickle, complaining ones? Those whose wills are weak, whose sense is small, and whose passions defy control. Notice here as a practical point, how patience must be a plant of slow growth. You cannot summon it up when you want it. You cannot make up your mind all at once, "I will be patient to-day," and then certainly be so. No, no; your patience must be linked in self-control. And your self-control, as we have seen, must be linked in those elements of character which precede it in the chain.

We come now to the closing group, a group of three—godliness, brotherly kindness, charity. This is perhaps the best time to notice the relation of the groups to each other. The first two—the "virtue," and the "knowledge," the will and the wit, the grace of doing and the grace of seeing—are fundamental qualities which, with the faith to which they are closely linked, lie at the foundation of character. The next two—temperance and patience, self-control and steadfastness, the grace of holding back and the grace of holding on—belong to the management of ourselves. It will be observed, however, that they are only negative. The one is the grace of abstaining, that is, not doing what lust or passion prompts us to do, not allowing lust to control us. The other is the grace of not allowing circumstances to control us. The three that remain and close the series, supply the positive elements of character; and they include respectively our relations to God, to our fellow Christians, and to all mankind—godliness, brotherly kindness, and charity.

Now there is an easy kind of godliness, brotherly kindness and charity, which is not connected with self-control and patience, or with any of the links that have gone before. There is a godliness which a man may be conscious of, when all is serene in his life, but which disappears in the face of temptation or trial. How often have you been in a calm and apparently heavenly frame of mind for five minutes, ten minutes, twenty minutes at a time; and why not longer? Simply because the first annoyance you encountered drove it all away. That is not the right kind of godliness. It is not snatches of godliness, but abiding godliness that is expected, amid the frettings that come into our home life, through the cares of business, in weakness and weariness, and even amid the strife of tongues, which is the hardest test of all; and such godliness there cannot be apart from self-control and patience. "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of Thy presence from the pride of man; Thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues."

Then there is an easy kind of brotherly kindness which consists in loving and being generous to those of the brethren that are particularly loveable. But "if you love those that love you, what thank have ye?" Or if you love those whom nobody can help loving, what thank have ye? But how do you get on with the brethren who are cantankerous and disagreeable, who misunderstand you and fail to appreciate you? To carry brotherly kindness that length (and it is not brotherly kindness but mere friendship, if you do not) will require a large degree of the grace of self-control and of the grace of patience. And if this be true of brotherly kindness, much more is it true of charity, which means love to all men, among whom are included not only persons who have that in them or about them which naturally excites contempt or disgust, but even those who hate us and do all manner of evil against us. Ah, it is appropriate that this hardest grace of all should stand at the end of the list. Some people think it clearly impossible. But they forget or do not know that "all things are possible to him that believeth;" but possible only, if to his faith he add these other links of the golden chain of character, without which no one can reach that lovely crowning grace of "charity, which is the bond of perfectness."

Now is not this a golden chain? Did you ever see its equal anywhere? Some people have tried to throw this second Epistle of Peter out of the New Testament, on the ground of insufficient evidence of canonicity. But is there not enough in this single passage to show that we have not here the word of man only, but of God, that word which is "living and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the hearts?" Some of the common virtues, such as honesty and truthfulness, are not in the list; but why not? Because they are not needed. The graces in the list touch all the springs of honesty and truthfulness, and of every other grace. Do you think a person who had all these graces could be capable of anything approaching to dishonesty or deceit? When rightly understood every one of the graces in the list cuts at the root of dishonesty and deceit and every evil thing. Yes, "if these things be in you and abound," you will be "throughly furnished unto all good works."

At this point there is suggested a beauty in the passage which we have not yet noticed, and which indeed is veiled in the English. In the original the word translated "add" is not the common word, but a technical term borrowed from the language of the Greek theatre meaning to furnish the chorus; so that to the minds of those to whom the words were first addressed, the thought would be suggested that these graces would come into the life like a chorus. They would come singing and dancing into it, filling it with joy and loveliest music. A saint of old thus carolled: "Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage." And here in the New Testament we have the Christian graces introduced as a chorus into life, which would be dull and flat and discordant without them.

We have spoken of the series, and we found it was better to call it a chain, and now may we not better still call it a Gamut of Graces? There is just the right number for the musical scale. Faith is the foundation of all, the keynote with which all the other notes are harmonized. Advancing up the scale, we have found it natural to pause at the third and the fifth, as in the common diatonic scale; and then at the upper octave we have the glorious grace of love, tuned in unison to faith, but sounding high above it. Have we not often wondered how endless the variety of music that can be won from the simple scale of seven with its octaves? As endless is the variety of soul-music that will flow from this simple scale of grace. And nothing but music will come from it. From a musical instrument quite correctly tuned, and on which the scale is faultless, the most discordant noises may be produced; but this cannot be in the spiritual sphere. Given the gamut of graces, and all discord is banished from the life. Life will become one continual song, not always in the major mode, but perhaps most beautiful of all when it modulates into the minor in life's dark days; but a song it shall be from beginning to end, from the keynote and starting point of Faith swelling onward and forward till it closes in the grand finale of the upper octave Love.

The Earth is the Lord's.

THE earth is Thine, Creator, Lord,
Sustained, renewed and kept by Thee;
The depths with gold and jasper stored,
The quiet shore, the restless sea.

The mountains that in silence stand
Like girded warriors round Thy Throne,
The rushing stream, the pleasant land,
Are all beloved and all Thine own!

The cattle on a thousand hills
Thine eye regards through sun and showers;
For them Thou dost send forth the rills,
And clothe the field with herbs and flowers.

The cedar, monarch of the height,
The buttercups of most fine gold,
Alike are precious in Thy sight,
And both Thy wondrous power unfold.

How vast are Thy possessions, Lord!
How manifold Thy works and ways!
Earth's myriad tongues, with one accord,
Proclaim Thy love and sing Thy praise.

MARY ROWLES.

THE SLOPES OF MOUNT TABOR.

A YOUNG CHRISTIAN SINGER AND HER LETTERS.

WITH ORIGINAL TRANSLATIONS.

AMONG the Welsh Hymn-Writers of the last century was a young woman named Ann Griffiths. The hymns she wrote could scarcely be surpassed for spiritual fervour. A few of her letters have been preserved and published along with her hymns. They reflect the lights and shadows of a mind that lived within itself in Christ.

She died when twenty-nine years of age, after a married life of about ten months. She had led a Christian life of about eight years; and during that time she was a "lamp that burned and shone." The letters were mostly written to a young friend in the ministry, and became a valuable means of unburdening a mind that was bowed down with an exceeding weight of glory. They are the revealed secrets of an unresting heart, told in simple and devout speech.

The Bible was her fountain of life—a fountain of water clear and cool as the dewdrops of a June morning, embosomed in fadeless flowers of spring. She drank of the living stream, she carried away choice flowers of peace to lie close to her soul. Her piety had in it a sweet tyranny, which compelled each verse to yield the comfort she needed at the time. For instance, in one letter we read:—

"I have had some trials like stormy winds, until I was nearly breathless on the steep paths of the hill; but I was brought up to the summit as by these two chains:—'A Man shall be as an hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest;' and—'Come, My people, enter thou into thy chambers: hide thyself as it were for a little moment.' My spirit felt the peace and warmth for a while."

And in another letter:—

"Lately the following words were of great value and comfort to my soul—'Thy neck is like the tower of David builded for an armoury, whereon there hang a thousand buckles, all shields of mighty men.' In myself, I am but helpless and unarmed against my foes; but if I shall have the privilege of turning into the tower, I shall there find armour and strength to run through the hosts. These words also were to me of great comfort:—'For it pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell;' and again—'A garden inclosed is my sister, my spouse.' I am greatly bound to speak well of God, and to be grateful to Him for some degrees of the fellowship of the mystery. But this is my grief—I fail to stay—I am always forsaking Him. I see how great is my loss on that account: but more than all is the dishonour and disrespect thrown upon God. Grant me help to stay!"

She could even reverently thank God for using His word as an instrument of trouble destroying the strong root of self-conceit, without doing the soul injury.

Her sacred passion brought with it a precious pain and grief. The very fervour of her devotion to Christ, made her judge herself with all the severity of a Paul:—

"For a long time I have been sorely troubled. I have many disappointments in myself continually; but I must say that all trials and all storms of every kind have wrought me to this: that is, they have brought me to see more of the corruptions of my nature and more of the Lord in His goodness and unchangeableness toward me. Lately I was far from the Lord in the backsliding of my soul; and yet I held up against His ministry, as if I were not refusing to stay and walk in His fellowship. But for all my art, the Lord visited me in these words:—'If I be a Father, where is Mine honour? and if I be a Master, where is My fear?' . . . In view of my path after forsaking God, and hewing out broken cisterns, this word anew raised me a little on my feet—'The Lord is my Shepherd; I shall not want.' I the one going astray, He the Shepherd; I unable to return, He the almighty Lord. Oh! Rock of our salvation! entirely dependent upon Himself, saving and cherishing sinners! I would wish to be always under the treatment, be it ever so bitter."

This is more cheerful, but still the spiritual element is of the same self-searching earnestness:—

"I feel renewed affection toward the doctrine of the Gospel, because it shows a way to cleanse the unclean. I think I have no need to change my garment, only to be purer in it. I feel a stronger longing than ever I felt before to be pure; and these words are on my mind:—'And the house, when it was in building, was built of stones made ready.' I feel an earnest desire to be shaped by Him, until I am made fit for the heavenly building."

The Rev. Thomas Charles, Bala, once made a remark to her that touched her soul to the quick. Considering the depth and rareness of her experiences, and the marvellous dispensations through which God led her spirit, he said that she seemed very likely to meet with one of three things: either she would meet with severe trials, or her life would soon be ended, or she would fall back. When she heard of falling back, she burst into tears. That fear is touchingly echoed in these sentences:—

"What presses most heavily on my mind at present is the sinfulness of permitting any thing seen to have too large a place in my thoughts. I am reverently ashamed, and wonderingly rejoice, to think that He who humbles Himself in looking at the things of heaven, has made Himself an object of love to a creature as poor as I am: and in view of such a dishonour upon God as to give the first place to second things, I simply think that I would prefer my nature to be crushed to death (if need be), on account of its weakness to bear the heat of fiery trials. I sometimes think that I could joyfully endure that, rather than the glory of God should be clouded before my mind, through granting my material nature its pomp and its desires."

Mercifully did the Providence of God respond to her prayer.

Her mind was eager to discern the vivid outline of Christian doctrine; but mostly in its practical relations. How modestly, how devoutly she takes herself to task in these words for having unwittingly ignored the personal office of the Holy Spirit!

"The most particular thing on my mind is the great evil and great danger of grieving the Holy Ghost. The following words have struck me—'Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you? In penetrating somewhat into the wonders of that Person and that He dwells and abides in the believer, I simply think that I was never possessed with the same degrees of reverent fear lest He should be grieved; and along with that it was given to me to see that one cause, and the chief cause, of this great sin having such a slight impression of uneasiness on my mind was, that my thoughts about the Divine greatness of His person were too low. My whole conception of the Persons of the Trinity was too low; to think of it my mind is held with shame: but I owe it to myself to say that my mind has changed. I used to think of the Persons of the Father and Son as equal: but I held an opinion of the Person of the Holy Ghost, as if he were an officer inferior to the Father and Son. Oh! fanciful and mistaken opinion concerning One who is Divine, all-present, all-knowing, all-powerful to bring forward and perfect the good work which He has begun, according to the conditions of the covenant of grace, according to the decree of Three in One on behalf of the objects of heaven's morning Love! Oh! to be of their number! I thirst to rise higher in the belief that there is a personal indwelling of the Holy Ghost in my soul,—a belief brought through revelation—not fancifully, expecting to comprehend the form and manner in which He dwells; this would be idolatry. In considering the sinfulness in itself of grieving the Holy Ghost; and on the other hand, in looking down to the depths of the Great Fall, and that I am dispossessed of every power, except of being able to grieve Him—my soul is sorely pressed. The following words are on my mind:—'Watch and pray.' As if the Lord were saying, though the commandment is strong, and thou art unable to fulfil one out of a thousand things there, on the ground where thy mind stands, go forth, prove the Throne of Grace; for 'the effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much'—'My grace is sufficient for thee: for My strength is made perfect in weakness.' Blessed be the God who fills His promises!"

Her hymns and her letters form an interchangeable commentary. Both are the simple and fresh outpourings of her soul. In one of her letters we find her tremulously approaching the mystery of the Creator becoming a Sufferer:—

"My mind at present is looking on Jesus bearing the crown of thorns and the scarlet robe, and afterwards in His great sufferings upon the Cross. It is not to be wondered at that the sun should hide its beams when its Creator was pierced with nails! My mind stands astonished when I consider the Person who suffered on the Cross—He whose eyes are as a flame of fire piercing through heaven and earth, at the same time unable to see the work of His hands when darkness was over all the earth! My mind is overwhelmed with too much astonishment to say any more. No wonder that word is written down—'The Lord is well pleased for His righteousness' sake; He will magnify the law and make it honourable': and the other word—'Kiss the Son, lest He be angry.' Would that the remainder of my days were a season of unfaltering fellowship with Christ and His sufferings, and with the Father through Him!"

The same spiritual emotion can be traced in these verses, almost line by line:

Heaven sweetly will remember
The decree of Three in One,
Ever gazing on the Person
Who became a Son of Man:
In fulfilling the conditions
Dying sorrow pierced His soul;
Now the host no man can number
Mightily His praise extol.

In remembering the battle,
All my tears for joy are dried;
Free for ever stands the sinner,
While the law is magnified:
For the peace of man behold Him—
Life's Almighty Author slain!
And the Resurrection buried
For an endless human gain!

In the midst, between two robbers,
There the great Atonement died;
And by Him the arm was strengthened
Which had learnt to pierce His side:
When His Father's law was honoured,
And the sinner's ransom paid,
Justice stood in shining glory—
We were free and undismayed.

King of kings, and great Rest-giver!
See, my soul, His lowly bed!
All creation in Him movèd,
He within the grave lay dead!
Wonder of the holy angels,
Life of those who once were lost:
Unto Him, the God Incarnate,
Sings the great adoring host.

Her latter days were spent close to the frontiers of the Better Land. Her soul was filled with the thoughts and desires of her eternal home. We can almost watch the flame of the spirit's life burning higher and higher—burning up the earthliness of her nature and the last remainders of unheavenly interests. Thus she writes:

"I see more need than I have ever seen before to spend what there is left of my days in giving myself daily, body and soul, to the care of Him who is able to keep that which is committed unto Him against that day. Not giving myself once, but living in giving myself, until, and even when this tabernacle is put off. The thought of putting it off is specially sweet sometimes. I can say, it is this of all things which gives me most joy in these days. Not death in itself, but the great gain to be had after passing through it; every inclination contrary to the will of God left behind, every inclination to dishonour the ordinance of God left behind—all infirmity swallowed up of strength—perfectly conformable to the law—in the likeness of God to enjoy Him for ever. I am sometimes so carried away with these things that I fairly fail to stand on the way of my duty in the things of time; but waiting for the hour when I shall be dissolved and be with Christ, for it is much better, although it is very good with me here sometimes. When my Beloved showeth Himself through the lattice, He sometimes reveals, in a glass darkly, as much of His glory to me as my feeble faculties can bear. I rejoice to say in closing—I would wish to say it with thankfulness—in spite of my sinfulness, and the cunning of hell, of the world and its charms, through the good grace of God I have not changed the object of my affection till to-night: rather from my heart I rest in His love, and joy over Him with singing, although I cannot obtain that in the least degree, on this side of death, except with effort and violence."

And thus she sings:

Must I face the stormy river?
  There is One to break its flood,—
Christ, my great High-priest and faithful,
  Christ, my all-sufficient good:
Through His blood shall come the triumph
  Over death and hell to me;
And I shall be in His likeness,
  Sinless through eternity.

Disembodied of all evil,
  I shall pierce with earnest eyes
Into Calvary's deep wonders,
  And its infinite surprise:
The Invisible beholding,
  Who is living and was dead;
In a pure, unbroken union
  With the ever-living Head.

There I shall exalt the Person,
  God's own Sacrifice Divine,
Without any veil or fancy—
  And my soul like Him shall shine:
With the mystery revealèd
  In His wounds, I shall commune;
Losing sight no more for ever
  Of the all-belovèd Son.

From salvation's highest fountains,
  Oh, to drink with each new day!
Till my thirst for earthly pleasures
  Has completely passed away:
Waiting always for my Master,
  Quick to answer to His call;
Then to hold the door wide open,
  And enjoy Him, all in all.

These letters and hymns were not written and sung in a cloister. They are divine breathings rising out of the quiet stir of country life like a lark out of the wind-swept heather. She lived a woman's ordinary life of a century ago. When her mother died, she became her father's helpmate. She was busy from morn till eve with the daily duties of the farmstead. She had no hour of prayer and song marked out, nor was there any need. Her prayers accompanied the work of her hands; her hymns were composed in the midst often of her household tasks. She became a "priest unto God," and the golden bells round about the hem of her spirit's robe were not often silent.

If she had a deep concern for personal piety, she was equally concerned for social religion. A member of the Calvinistic Methodist church at a place called the "Bont," she carried all its joys and sorrows in her heart. When the church was wounded "by the stroke of the world and of those falling back," her own soul was also wounded. Her prayers breathed revivingly on the Lord's "faded garden." And when the church had its bright awakening, her joy was full. She had heavy and rugged paths to travel from her home to the chapel, but the darkest winter night made no difference to her. She could sing on the way. It was a narrow way, too, her soul had to travel, and she met some wintry nights of doubt before she reached the gate of the temple. But she sang for the Light that was to come.

There's a day to journey homewards
  For the children of the King;
God shall from the fields of bondage
  To the throne His loved ones bring:
There shall faith to sight be changèd,
  Feeble hope to perfect gain;
And the song shall grow for ever
  To the Lamb which once was slain.

Pilgrim, worn with stress of tempests,
  Look, and see the dawning light!
There the Lamb makes intercession,
  In His flowing robes of white:
Faithfulness, His golden girdle;
  Round His garment's hem, the bells;
Token of the full forgiveness
  Which in His atonement dwells.

H. ELVET LEWIS.

LETTERS TO MY CHILDREN FROM THE EAST.

BY HENRY A. HARPER, AUTHOR OF "LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND," ETC.

VI.—MEMPHIS.

LET us take a walk through an Egyptian forest, so unlike an English one, which, as you know, is made up of various kinds of trees. The one we are now visiting is a forest of palms. This eastern tree, always graceful, is here especially so, and has a character of its own; the stems of the trees are taller than usual. They are closer together, and the stems are bare, unlike the desert palm, which is feathered from root to crest. These trees have foliage only on the tops; they show the truth of the Bedouin proverb, that the palm "has its head in the sun, while its foot is in the water," for marshy pools abound. At times the trees grow where a disused canal has overflowed its banks, and has become a stagnant lake; at other places, on broken hillocks or mounds—which to those who understand the past, mark ruins of a city or palace.

FALLEN COLOSSUS OF RAMESES.

As you wander through this forest you come to quiet pools, with flocks of white ibis, or paddy birds feeding in the shallows. Storks and other water-fowl abound, doves "coo" in the bushes, and bright green and gold songsters, very tiny, flit about. What wonder then if time soon passed, as I sketched in this enchanted region? But, oh! the sunset; all then was turned into a psalm of colour, orange, pink, blue foliage, water, all became one glow of glory and peace; and then, as in all the east, with one swift plunge, the night and gloom; soon, very soon, to be followed by the stars which here really shed a light, and by which I find my way to my resting-place. Such was my first sight of "Memphis." In one of the pools, surrounded by tall palms, lies a fallen colossus, forty-five feet long, lying on its face in the mud, and quite lately a second statue has been found by the English, who drained this pool. What does this fallen statue represent? Rameses the Great! How came it here? I will try to tell.

Memphis was the first town built in Egypt, built by their first king, "Menes." From Memphis came "Cheops," the builder of the "Great Pyramid," the king who worked the mines in Sinai desert. This place was famous for the learning of its priests, for the grandeur of its temples, palaces, gardens, public works. The temples were enclosed by a sacred wall—"white," so the city was often called by the ancients, "the city of the white wall." The whole town, temples, palace, gardens, are said to have covered seventeen English miles, or a diameter of six miles.

For long ages it continued to be the seat of government—the abode of the king, in short, and yet nothing of the "old" world has so utterly disappeared, for though Thebes, Babylon, Nineveh, have also gone, yet they show even in their ruins emblems of their past greatness; but here there is nothing but this fallen colossus, of which I have spoken. This "Rameses," remember, was the "oppressor" of Israel.

Without doubt this "Rameses" was a great man, one of those mighty men who appear at intervals in the history of our race, who tower head and shoulders above all ordinary men. Here this mighty, this "strong" man held sway, increasing the palaces, the temples, fostering all learning; and what wonderful "guesses" of truth these same Egyptians had given to them? "The father of history," Herodotus, came here, to this old city, and he tells us of all he then learned from the priests, tells how "Menes" changed the course of the Nile, "draining the swamps," and opening a new way for the river. What an engineer he must have been; and an engineer with an eye to military requirements, for Memphis then would bar the way to any incursions from above. We are told of great fortifications, of "stately halls," of "lovely gardens," "rose" gardens, "trees," "vineyards!" where are they now?

Here, too, at Memphis, was firstly instituted that wondrous rite of "embalming," in which the dead body was preserved in spirits and spices, wrapped in almost endless lines of linen bands, and so made into what we call a "mummy." Why did they thus? These old Egyptians believed in the immortality of the soul; they thought the soul would be absent from the body for three thousand years, and then that the soul would return, if its own body was still existing. Therefore they took all care to preserve the body that each soul might find its own again. This, remember, was for the rich, the poor had not that comfort; and here, mark well the difference between the old heathen religion and that of our Lord Christ. Rich heathens had comfort in their old Egyptian days. If they could afford to pay what amounted to seventy-five pounds, English money, they could be "embalmed," and so look forward with ease to the time when, after the long sleep, they would recover their own again. But the poor? No; the heathen world had no comfort for them; they were "outsiders," "lost," if they could not pay their expensive rites, and so the "old" world went on, age after age, till, in the fulness of time, "to the poor the gospel is preached." To the poor! that makes all the difference; the "poor" were uncared for, unspoken of in those old days of temple magnificence and stately glory. No, not till the Son of God came down did rulers or priests realise that in the lowly walk might be found the "Messiah"—the Saviour.

Let us go back to Memphis, or Noph, as it is called in the Bible. Is there any notice of this city in Holy Writ? Yes; Isaiah says (xix. 13): "The princes of Noph were deceived, they have also seduced Egypt;" and Jeremiah (xlvi. 13 to 20) warns Noph that it shall be "waste and desolate"

Ezekiel (xxx. 13) says:—"Thus saith the Lord God; I will also destroy the idols, and I will cause their images to cease out of Noph."

The inscriptions tell us that Esarhaddon invaded Egypt, captured Memphis, also Thebes; that all the gold, all the statues were taken away to Nineveh.

Then some time after we are told that the Egyptians so valued their sacred city Memphis, that they rose in revolt and retook it; but again they were defeated by the invading Assyrian. These inscriptions tell of a third attempt of the people to recover their freedom, only to be again defeated, and we are even told how this last "rising" was overcome. Though the fight went on, all was in vain. Assur-bampal says: "My hands took the whole of it, silver, gold, precious stones, the furniture of the palace, all there was; garments, costly and beautiful, noble houses, two lofty obelisks covered with carving 2500 talents in weight, and carried them off to Nineveh."

From other inscriptions we read of the awful sufferings of the captives. Some of the rulers had their tongues torn out, some were skinned alive, or roasted to death, others crushed in the great gate of Nineveh. These and such like deeds are recorded with feelings of pride! Such is pagan humanity—"the fellow feeling" for man we sometimes hear so much of. There never has been any "fellow feeling for man," except as taught by Christ, and that is one of the great revelations He made, that all men are brothers—all "children" of the great Father.

Herodotus gives a picture of the capture of this city by Cambyses. The children of the Egyptian king were treated as slaves; and with two thousand of the children of the rich, also dressed as slaves, were made to walk with ropes round their necks and bridles in their mouths, before the captive Egyptian king, and then put to death—some were spared, but the Egyptian king was ordered to drink the blood of a bull! Not only disgusting, but, to an Egyptian, much more, for he believed the bull Apis was his God! Cambyses' rage went further, for he had the mummy of the dead king brought before him to be beaten of rods and suffer other shameful acts of ignominy. All this is related by the old historian.

And yet we have reason to know that Cambyses was cheated when he thought he beat the mummy of the king, for we know now that faithful attendants had removed the embalmed bodies to a place of security. They were only to be brought to light in these latter days. Some of these mummies have been unrolled in the presence of the British Commissioner, Sir Henry Drummond Wolff. Others are now in Boulac Museum, near Cairo.

SITE OF OLD MEMPHIS.

From this short account you will see how great this city of Memphis once was. How terribly she was destroyed; nearly all traces of the city have passed away, except the fallen statues of Rameses, lying as I told you in the mud. How completely are those prophecies fulfilled that foretold that Noph, should be "waste," "desolate!" Look at that palm forest, grown up over the ruins of palace and temple! that poor village of mud huts now occupying the site of the proud "City of the White Wall!" Indeed, we may say here, "How have the mighty fallen!" Nothing endures but the word of God, which, though it tells of His judgments on idol worship and sin, yet all through reveals His love to man.

LITTLE MEG AND THE LODGER.

I.—THE THIN END OF THE WEDGE.

"ELL, you have got a lodger now, and no mistake, Mrs. Harris! I got a glimpse of him this morning, and really I couldn't tell whether he looked most like an old clothes-bag, or a walkin' dust heap."

"Yes, Mrs. Wilkins, he is rather a queer party; but he have paid for his room in advance, and I'm too poor to pick and choose my lodgers. Since my dear husband died, it's been a struggle for me and my little girl, and it won't do to quarrel with our bread-and-butter. Poor old man, he's as quiet as a lamb, nor he don't seem to drink or smoke, and I'm in hopes we may get him gradooal into cleaner ways. My Meg, she couldn't help laughin'—kind little soul though she is—yesterday, when he'd been unpackin' some of his things; and down the stairs he came, with bits of straw, and hay, and the like, stickin' out of his head, and his collar, and his pockets; and says my Meg, says she, 'Oh, mother, Mr. Martin looks just like the camel at them gardens up in Regent's Park. You know he's always gettin' hisself all over bits and ends, and has to be cleaned with a broom.'"

"Well, I wish you joy of him, Mrs. Harris," said Mrs. Wilkins, with a toss of her head meant to denote superiority. "But I wouldn't have him for half-a-crown a week—no, nor yet for twice that."

"You've got a husband that works for you steady and reg'lar, my dear," said Mrs. Harris, "and—thank the Lord for it—you don't know what it is to make shift to keep the wolf from the door. But we're goin' to do the best we can by our lodger (God helpin' us), and maybe he won't be no worse to deal with than a many what looks nicer."

Certainly old Micah Martin was not a very attractive person. Tall and thin, with a stoop in the back, and a bend at the knees, he appeared weak and ill. But still he might have washed himself, and brushed his clothes, and combed his great shock of tangled grey hair, which, like a furze-bush, collected specimens of every floating and falling object, and retained quite an interesting and unique collection of straw, fluff, ashes, thread-ends, twigs, and shavings.

A few mornings after Mr. Martin's arrival, there came, about half-past eight o'clock, a gentle little knock at his door.

"Who's there?" asked a gruff voice.

"Please, Mr. Martin, it's me."

"And who's me, pray?"

"Meg Harris, if you please, sir."

"And what do you want, Meg Harris?"

"I've brought my broom and duster, and mother says p'r'aps you won't mind my doin' your room up a bit, and gettin' it tidy. I won't make a noise and disturb you. But if so be, sir, as you're goin' out soon, mother will do it while you're away, for I've got to go to school."

"Oh, indeed?" replied the rough voice. "Anything more?"

"No, sir, nothin' more just now."

"Well, Meg Harris, just go down to your mother, and say that I won't have any one in my room at all, either when I'm here or away. What cleaning it wants, I'll do myself. All I care for is not to be meddled with. Do you understand?"

"Yes, sir," replied the child; "but, please, your room will get uncommon dirty, and——"

"There, that'll do! If the room's dirty or not, it's my affair! You've not got to live in it, you know. Now go, for I'm tired of shouting to you through the door."

So then poor Meg travelled down again with her broom, and told her mother how she had been repulsed.

"Well, never mind, dearie," said Mrs. Harris. "We won't worry the old man, and presently, may be, he'll not be so rough with us, and will trust us more."

Micah Martin was undoubtedly a very curious specimen of humanity. When he went out in the morning, he locked his door, and when he returned, he went straight upstairs, opened his door, and locked himself in again.

Good Mrs. Harris at first asked him what she should get and prepare for his meals, but he answered shortly that his meals were nobody's business but his own, and that she ought to be thankful if she got her half-crown a week for the room only, and hadn't to cook or wait upon him.

After this she let him alone about his food, nor, indeed, could she do otherwise. But it grieved her sometimes to see the poor old man, instead of sitting down to a wholesome nourishing meal of warm food, bringing home with him odds and ends, picked up hap-hazard, anywhere. One day it would be a two-penny loaf, sliced, with a bit of rusty yellow bacon between the pieces. Another, it would be a lump of stale bread with a piece of cheese, or a couple of slices of red salt beef in a greasy paper. No tea, no coffee, no milk. All he drank was water, and as he never had a fire in his room, he could cook nothing for himself.

But this was not the worst.

Old Micah seemed to be fully as negligent of his soul, as he was of his body. He never went to a place of worship, and once when the good widow offered to lend him a Bible, he roughly told her that nothing of that sort was in his line, and that when he wanted Bibles, he would ask for them.

The days and weeks passed, and the lodger did not improve. Now and then Meg was allowed to bring up a broom, and he swept out, after a fashion, his little chamber, and Meg took away the dust in her dust-pan; but nothing else was done, and for aught that Meg and her mother could foresee, this state of things might go on for ever.

But one day, just at the beginning of November, Micah came home, visibly troubled and unhappy, and there were traces of tears on his grimy cheeks. He seemed to have forgotten to bring home any food, but his trembling hand held a newspaper. Meg saw him come in, and her tender heart was wrung with the pain in that poor face.

Often as she had been repulsed, she felt as if she must make one more venture now that the poor man was in trouble.

"Mother," she said, going into the kitchen where Mrs. Harris was busy preparing the tea, "will you pour out a cup nice and hot, and strong, and cut some bread and butter, and I'll take it up to our lodger; he looks as if he was too unhappy even to have thought of bringing home any supper, and I'm in hopes he'll let me in for once."

"He won't, child! You'll see, he won't," rejoined Mrs. Harris. "You'll have your trouble for your pains, with, may be, a few hard words thrown in."

"Never mind, mother, dear; I'd like to try him just this once. Why it was only yesterday that teacher was tellin' us at Sunday school that as God has such patience with us, we ought to be patient with others; and that it wasn't no merit to be patient with them as didn't provoke us. And, mother, I couldn't but think of our lodger, and how we tried to be friends with him, and help him, and how he wouldn't. But now p'r'aps there'll be a chance, if so be he's really grievin' over somethin'."

"Well, well, child, here's the tea; there's no harm in tryin' him once more. Your teacher was right in what she said too. Sure enough, if we think of the good Lord's patience with us poor sinful creatures, and how He's always a-forgivin' of us, and teachin' us, and leadin' us back when we've wandered away—it's a wonder, it is! But there, if He loved us so that He sent His Son to die for us, it's likely He'll be patient with us."

Little Meg took the tea and bread-and-butter, nicely arranged on a little tray, and carried it up to the door of Micah's room. There was no sound, except a kind of sniff now and then, so she knocked quite softly.

"Who's that?" asked the old voice as rough as ever, only rather more shaky than usual, which made little Meg say to herself, "Poor old dear, he's got a lump in his throat, just as I have sometimes, when I want to cry and won't."

"Please, sir, it's only me, and I've brought you a cup of tea to warm you this bitter night."

"I don't want your tea nor you either. Take it away, and take yourself along with it."

Poor little Meg! This was too much. She had so wanted to be kind, and gentle.

She felt as if she could not go down at once to her mother, and announce her failure, also she was ashamed to be seen crying, and yet the tears would come, for the hard cruel words had hurt her sorely.

She put the little tray on the floor, and sitting down close by, she leaned against the wall, and sobbed as if her heart would break.

There, at the top of the stairs, with her handkerchief up to her face, and her back turned towards Micah's room, the child neither heard nor saw his door open, and his tangled head appear.

But she started to her feet in real surprise when the hoarse voice said—

"I say, what's all this about? I never saw any one cry like that before. Tell me what it means!"

Poor Meg tried to speak, but she could not say a word. Choking with sobs, she pointed to the tray.

"What!" exclaimed Micah, "do you mean you were crying because I wouldn't take that?"

Meg nodded.

The old's man haggard face worked convulsively. For a moment Meg thought he was going to cry too. Then he said shakily, "Do you think you could stop sobbing, if I tried to take what you've brought?"

Meg flushed scarlet, smiled through her tears, and nodded vehemently, while she handed the tray to him.

He seemed half repentant of his concession, as he took it, looking at the tea and bread-and-butter with a doubtful eye; but another sob from Meg made him decide quickly, and he disappeared with the tray. The door closed upon the old man, and Meg wiped her eyes and went down to her mother.

"You don't mean the old man's been and took it?" asked Mrs. Harris looking up, and seeing that Meg's hands were empty.

"Yes, mother."

"Well, then, child, that lesson in patience wasn't for nothin', after all. That's the first thing Micah Martin have give in to since he came to us, over eight weeks agone. Meg, my darlin', this is the thin end of the wedge."

Meg did not answer. She was wondering how she had best follow up the advantage she had gained, without disturbing old Micah or seeming impertinent.

About an hour after tea, she went up to see if he had put the tray outside. No, it was in his room. Could that mean that he wished her to fetch it? Full of this hope, she knocked.

"Come in," said Micah's voice; but Meg thought that it was certainly not so gruff and cross this time, only hoarse and trembling.

She stole softly in. The tray was on the table; the old man had drunk the tea, but the bread was untouched.

"Oh, I am sorry, Mr. Martin, you've eaten nothin'!' cries Meg. "And mother cut it nice and thin on purpose to tempt you."

"Yes, child, it's nice enough; but I've no appetite. The truth is I'm in sore trouble, Meg Harris, and there's no comfort for me. I never thought to tell even that much; but you are but a child, and you've a kind tender heart, and will be sorry perhaps even for poor cross old Micah Martin."

"Sorry for you! Ay, indeed I am!" replies the little girl. "But, oh, Mr. Martin, there isn't a sorrow or grief as we can't find some comfort for. Teacher 's told me long ago, and I've learned it since for myself, that God never sends no sort of trouble that He isn't willing to help us through. When we lost father, mother and me thought it was more than we could bear. But God helped us and comforted us, and we seem to have known and loved Him better ever since."

The old man buried his face in his bony hands, and did not speak for some moments. At last he said—

"You lost your father, you say; but you still have your mother, and she has you. But I—— Oh, God, it is more than I can bear! I had but one son, and to-day I read in the paper that the ship of which he was the second mate has gone down off the African coast, and it is thought every soul has perished. Oh, Jack—Jack, I didn't think I'd as much heart left in me as has gone down into death with you!"

The exceeding bitter cry—the agonised wail of the bereaved, lonely old man went straight to the child's heart. Feeling her utter helplessness to comfort such sorrow as this, she instinctively turned to the source Divine of all consolation. Dropping on her knees by the old man's chair, she lifted up her innocent little face and streaming eyes, and sobbed out a broken prayer for help and comfort.

The child rose from her knees, and stood for a moment, her tender eyes compassionately bent on the bowed grey head of the old man. Then, as he did not raise himself, she noiselessly turned away, and left the room, closing the door softly behind her.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

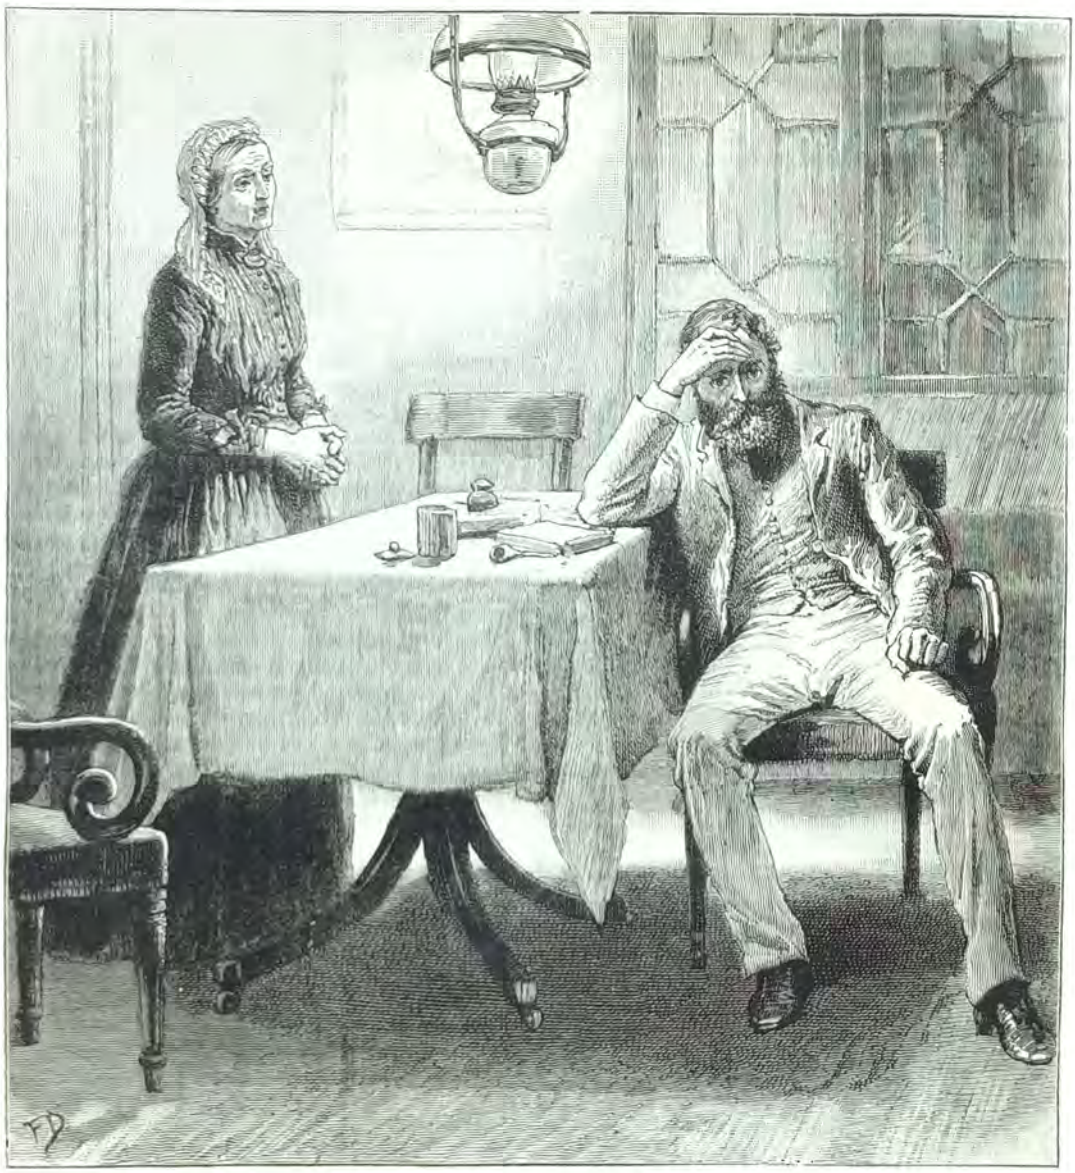
OLD GWEN.

CHAPTER VI.—A MAID-OF-ALL-WORK.



"I HOPE YOU ARE NOT ILL, SIR?" SHE SAID.

GWENNY'S first day of service was much more pleasant than her first night. She was, as her mistress said, sharp as a needle, and seemed to anticipate her orders. In spite of the unusual sleepiness caused by her sleepless night, she was bright and ready, and Mrs. Bowen thought to herself, "I've got a treasure at last, if my lodger don't spoil her. The men are at the bottom of all the mischief."

She mused feelingly; for her deceased husband had not been a pattern of conjugal love. She was, moreover, of a suspicious nature, and had gone through so many troubles, that she failed to realize the essence of Christianity, that one is to do good expecting nothing in return. She still misdoubted Mr. Milbank, of whom she knew nothing, except that he had left Carmarthen when a boy, and had spent the best part of his life in the colonies. He was not Welsh, as his name proclaimed; and said he was the son of an officer who had been quartered for a time in Carmarthen but who had since died. He evidently knew no one, though he said he had friends in the country, who happened to be abroad, but who were likely to return before he left.

Mrs. Bowen had not paused to consider whether she were wise to house a stranger without references. He wanted a lodging, she a lodger. He had paid a week in advance, had not demurred to terms, and had said that he could get endless references from a distance, if she required them. She had nothing of value to lose, if he were a thief; but he certainly could not be a thief, she thought, with such an evident disregard of money. But why did he come direct from Careg Cennin to her, on the very day of Gwen's arrival! This still puzzled her, and made her resolve to keep an eye on Gwen.

This particular surveillance, however, was not necessary, for about noon of that eventful day, Mr. Milbank told Mrs. Bowen that he was going on a fishing expedition up the Towy, and should be absent some days, if not weeks. He wished to retain his lodging, and desired to pay a month in advance, which seemed a small fortune to Mrs. Bowen. He left a pound with her to be expended for the benefit of Gwen or her brother, the soldier, and quitted the house as abruptly as he had entered it.

"If he doesn't come back, I am all right for a month," mused the landlady philosophically, adding to Gwen, "He's a gentleman. He speaks and acts like one."

"I am not knowing, ma'am; but I don't want his money," replied Gwen.

"Perhaps your brother would like it. You may write to him and tell him to come and see you for half an hour—not more mind—next Sunday evening."

Toom bach accepted this invitation, and Mrs. Bowen was so much pleased with him, that she allowed Gwen to walk out with him after evening service.

"You must be in by nine," said that lady. "It isn't respectable for young girls to be out late, for people don't know he's your brother. Besides, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.' I hear that in what they call the great world they are making Sunday a day of pleasure, and have no more respect for it than if it was a Hollandtide Fair day. May the Lord keep us Welsh from such sacrilege."

"That is what granny says, ma'am," responded Gwen. "She tells us that we can't expect God's blessing, if we don't keep His commandments."

"She is right, Gwen, and it is our duty to obey His word, and not to pick and choose what we like out of it. The least we can do is to dedicate one day in seven to the service of the Great Being who has not only created but redeemed us."

"Yes, sure, ma'am," returned Gwen with a courtesy, and a solemnity of manner which convinced her mistress that she meant what she said.

Toom was present during this discourse, and clenched it and the favour he had gained in Mrs. Bowen's eyes, by saying, "That's my opinion, ma'am, and I try to preach to my comrades on that text. Some of 'em laughs at me, and some joins with me; but, says I, If the Bible's true, we are dishonouring God by despising His day. Poor father used to be telling us that whatever people said, we couldn't be far wrong if we respected God's word."

"Her children shall rise up and call her blessed," muttered Mrs. Bowen, as the young people departed. "Old Gwen and her family are all God-fearing people, and I don't understand how one of them should be convicted of murder."

Yes, all belonging to old Gwen were, what is called, strict sabbatarians. And hitherto God had greatly blessed their observance of His day and their veneration for His holy word. It was quite natural to them to attend Divine service regularly, and to spend the remainder of the day in "making melody in their hearts to the Lord." And not only were their consciences clearer, but their lives happier than are those of people who devote the seventh, or Lord's Day, to pleasure. If the great Creator rested and allowed us the privilege of rest on this, His day, surely we should consecrate it to His service, and strive to loosen the burdens of overworked man and beast, by doing our best not to employ them, neither should we endanger our own souls, by worldly pursuits.

During the ensuing fortnight, it was strange to see how mistress and maid occupied themselves from morning to night in cleaning and arranging the furniture of that very modest mansion, and tidying up the small garden at its back. They were never idle, for when the active work was over, there was the sewing and knitting to be done. Mrs. Bowen superintended the making and mending of Gwen's wardrobe as well as her own, and assuredly a neater pair never issued cap-à-pie from a bandbox. When the one sat down to her sewing in the parlour and the other in the kitchen, they had the gratification of knowing that there was not a speck of dust to be found, even in the corners; that the brasses and irons were scoured to abnormal brightness; that the glass and china were free from the shadow of a stain—that there was not a crease on the bed-clothes—that the linen and muslins were white as soap, untainted by washing powder, could make them, and that two pairs of arms had done it all. Gwen was the washerwoman, her mistress clear-starcher and ironer; and when Gwen hung out the clothes on the line in the wee garden, she was especially careful not to trample down the borders, because she had had a hand in tying up the flowers and plucking out the weeds. It is astonishing how interested we get in our own works! Gwen even took to loving, not only the caged jackdaws, but the flocks that haunted the roof and chimney of the house; and as to the white poodle, she all but adored him. And he returned her affection. But then she fed and washed jackdaws and poodle herself, and had a personal pride in them. Not that the old jackdaws neglected their young, but Gwen, who was a managing sort of body, fancied they did not give them enough to eat. She was already getting accustomed to the inharmonious chant of the colony, and her nights were no more disturbed by it.

"Managing" was just the epithet that suited Gwen, but her mistress was also "managing," and Gwen was too wise to display her own propensity in the face of a superior power. Mrs. Bowen did not even find it out, and unceasingly congratulated herself on the possession of a maid-of-all-work who did everything just as she ordered. And Gwen was quite as proud of her position as if she had been apprenticed to a milliner, or was even a teacher in a board-school, which she saw some other girls, no better or cleverer than herself become, because they said, they would on no account be a maid-of-all-work.

"I wish Mr. Milbank could see his rooms now!" said Gwen to her mistress one day. "I'm hoping he'll come back."

"So am I, Gwen, for one month in advance won't keep a house going. 'One swallow doesn't make spring,'" returned Mrs. Bowen. "He's been away three weeks. If he should return, don't you be forward, Gwen."

"Why for should I be forward, mistress?" asked amazed Gwen, who did not understand that Mrs. Bowen was afraid lest her lodger should put false notions into her head; for Gwen was certainly a comely maiden. "I hope nothing hasn't happened to him. He was a nice gentleman."

That very afternoon there was a double knock at the door, and when Gwen answered it, who should it be but Mr. Milbank.

"Here he is, mistress," she cried in sudden excitement, forgetting her duty as parlour-maid, and rushing to her mistress who was in the kitchen. The lodger followed unceremoniously, saying, "Are you really glad that I have come back? Oh, how clean and comfortable you look, Mrs. Bowen. May I warm myself? They say it is summer, but I am always cold."

"Gwen, light a fire in Mr. Milbank's parlour," said Mrs. Bowen, placing a chair, meanwhile, for the lodger, who began to rub his hands over the glowing anthracite coal.

A conversation ensued which tended to assure Mr. Milbank that his landlady was glad he had come back, though he suspected that his warm welcome was more due to the prospective "month in advance" than to his personal merits. Mrs. Bowen was undemonstrative, and did not carry her heart on her sleeve as Gwen did. Indeed, had she so paraded it, her lodger would have read that its owner did not like people whose history was not clear as the day, and who did not gratify her laudable if feminine curiosity. Gwen soon announced that the "fire was burning famous," and Mr. Milbank enquired if it was likely to disturb the jackdaws, since he believed the same chimney carried off the smoke from his sitting and bedroom.

Gwen, who was afraid of being "forward," restrained a smile and said demurely that no nest had fallen since he left. He withdrew into his parlour, and shutting the door surveyed it.

"How clean and fresh and home-like!" he muttered, and sat down by the fire just as if it was winter.

He rang the bell, and when Gwen answered it, asked for tea.

"Were you really glad to see me, Gwenny?" he said moodily.

"Deet yes, sir!" she replied, taking a clean table-cloth from a drawer in a chiffonier, and spreading it.

"I have been to Careg Cennin. I have seen them all, except your grandmother. Your mother asked me to go and pay your brother a visit at the barracks. I shall do so after tea. I think she will let me educate Shonny."

"Gwen!" sounded in the passage, and that damsel speedily disappeared.

"I wasn't 'forward' ma'am, but the gentleman was telling me about mother," she said.

"I daresay. He seems wonderfully interested in you all," replied Mrs. Bowen, who was, as we have said, of a suspicious nature.

"He do look so unhappy," said kind-hearted Gwen.

"I put a Bible on his drawers, and I hope he'll read it," returned Mrs. Bowen severely. "I haven't seen one amongst his things, and his soul must be fed as well as his body. Take you the tray and I'll carry in the kettle."

So Mr. Milbank had two waitresses instead of one. But as Mrs. Bowen herself fried the eggs and bacon, Gwen was obliged to carry them in, which gave the lodger the opportunity of asking her if she was happy with Mrs. Bowen. He looked disappointed when she replied in the affirmative.

A solitary meal is rarely cheerful: certainly Mr. Milbank's was not. He ate without apparent enjoyment, and although he consumed a respectable portion of the tempting tea before him, there was no lifting of the gloom from his countenance. When he had finshed he went out, and did not return until nine o'clock. Mrs. Bowen opened the door to him and followed him into his parlour to ask him about his supper.

"I hope you are not ill, sir?" she said, seeing a harassed, hunted look in his face.

"No, thank you. Will you kindly sit down, and tell me what you know of Gwen's family. I have seen her brother, and he seems a steady fellow, for a soldier."

"I do not know much about them," said Mrs. Bowen. "Everybody knows the grandmother, who is as much respected as the Queen. Gwen seems a good girl, and I hope nobody will spoil her by putting false notions into her head. Her brother appears a well-conducted young man, and I understand all the family bear an excellent character, with the exception, of course, of Gwen's unfortunate father."

"Ah! what was the public opinion of that affair?"

"It was thought, I believe, that Gwen's father, Toom Gwillim, and Thomas Plas Newydd had a quarrel over the fish. Mr. Thomas was a resolute conservator, and all the fishermen hated him. Gwillim was always preaching at him, they said, and trying to prove from Holy Scripture, that all sorts of fish and wild game were free to all; while Mr. Thomas, who was not a religious man, cursed and swore at him, and stopped all fishing in that part of the river that ran through Plâs. He summoned Toom more than once before the magistrates, but he got off victorious. Other fishermen summoned by him were not so fortunate. He was a tyrannical man, and not much liked either by gentle or simple."

"But the—the murder; what of that, Mrs. Bowen?"

"Everybody believed Gwillim guilty, for he was found with the body soon after life was extinct. It was said they fought fiercely, for not only was there blood, but the body was much bruised. No suspicion fell on any one but Gwillim, and his protestations of innocence failed to convince the jury. Everybody pitied him, and thought he must have been terribly provoked; but no one believed him. Mr. Thomas was supposed to have had a large sum of money with him, but if so, there was no trace of it. His horse must have run off with his dog-cart, for they were found at a distance."

"Thank you, Mrs. Bowen, that will do. I will pay another month in advance, as I may leave again to-morrow for a few days."

Milbank's face was turned from Mrs. Bowen,—indeed she had never met his eye—so that she did not see its expression, but she perceived a strange trembling of his body.

She laughed quietly, for she had never before seen so nervous a man. Being a conscientious woman, she demurred to receiving another month in advance, since the last had scarcely run out, but he insisted, saying that he should probably be more with her in future, and that he wished to leave his traps in her care: so the money was paid.

"I have been a settler and know how to manage with a knapsack," he said. "I like the independence of carrying my wardrobe on my back. I want a word with Gwen."

Much against her will, Mrs. Bowen sent Gwen to him. All he wanted was to give her another douceur. This time it was only a few shillings, which she received with a courtesy and thanks.

"Have you any message for home, Gwen?" he asked. "I shall probably be at Careg Cennin soon."

"Only my love, please, sir, and tell them Toom and I are hoping to be at home for Whitsuntide."

"Do you believe in ghosts, Gwen? And warnings, and omens, and the like?"

"Mamgu says they're nonsense, sir, and nothing happened after the birds," replied Gwen, laughing. "They did keep noisy! and they all go on just the same, only I've got used to them."

The following morning Mr. Milbank disappeared, and in the afternoon Gwen's soldier brother came, ostensibly to see that gentleman. Mrs. Bowen invited him into the kitchen, and he said he had come to ask the gentleman if he had made a mistake in leaving a sovereign with him the day before.

"He has more money than wit," said Mrs. Bowen. "But you had better keep it till he comes back."

She left the brother and sister together, and Toom proceeded to make enquiries concerning Mr. Milbank. Gwen told him all she knew. Toom was much puzzled, and declared that he had seen him before, fishing up the Towy.

"I remember his face as clear as light," he said. "Father and I were together when we saw him last, and he touched his hat and said, 'Good day,' as we passed him. I believe it was the very day of—of—" he could not say "of the murder," but Gwen understood.

"He is a kind gentleman," said Gwenny. "He don't seem to have any relations or friends, and if he have taken a pity for us, I'm sure we may be pitying him; for—oh Toom! what should we all be doing without one another? He do seem like poor father, all alone; only father has the Lord with him, and I'm afraid he hasn't; but, perhaps, gentlefolk don't read their bibles as poor folk do."

"Some do, some don't," said Toom; "but all that I can say is, those as do, make the best officers. As my captain says, 'Put on the whole armour of God, and you are sure to do your duty.'"

THE CHAUTAUQUA SUMMER ASSEMBLY.

BY BENJAMIN CLARKE.

FOR some years past, a strange and inelegant looking word has crept from time to time into our magazine literature, with some explanation of what the term conveyed. When one first saw the word Chautauqua he asked what it meant; and then he asked how it was pronounced. The latter question was easy to answer, by saying it was a North American Indian word, pronounced by the natives Shaw-tauqua. The former question was not so easily disposed of; generally, it might have been correct to say it was a great summer assembly of a religious and educational character, but the movement now to which the word Chautauqua is attached is so far-reaching that its scope cannot be defined by any one term.

Every year, however, makes us better acquainted with Chautauqua, as one Englishman after another is attracted to the place from interest or curiosity, or else is privileged to be invited to take part in the varied programme of the summer's engagements.

It was in the latter capacity that the writer spent a full week at Chautauqua, during the present summer; and he desires to share his happy experiences, and, if it be possible, also some of the mental and spiritual stimulus that he there received. If he could help to do even more he would think himself indeed happy. Every Englishman who visits Chautauqua wishes that the idea could be transplanted to these shores and carried out, at least in some of its features.

Our climate, alas! is not so favourable for camping out, or for any out of door exercises; but some of the Chautauqua programme might be attempted.

The Summer Assembly is an enlargement and development of the old camp-meeting idea, so dear to the Methodist and other bodies. Chautauqua, indeed, owed its origin to the Methodist Episcopal Church, Dr., now Bishop, Vincent, and Lewis Miller, the famed agricultural implement maker of Akron, Ohio, being its founders.

It occurred to these gentlemen that an impetus might be given to Sunday school work by the establishment of a Summer Assembly, and in 1874 the first meeting at Chautauqua was held. The place selected was admirably chosen; an estate of some hundred or more acres was purchased, situated on Lake Chautauqua, in the county of the same name. This lake, about twenty miles long, and from two to three broad, is a picturesque sheet of water, whose banks in many places are very prettily wooded; and on one of the prettiest parts of the lake the site for Chautauqua was fixed. At first, rude wooden huts and tents afforded shelter for the early settlers; but it was evident from its initial stage that the assembly would become popular; and very soon plots of ground were purchased, on which the owners built convenient, substantial, and in many cases, elegant wooden cottages and houses.

The financial success was soon assured, managed as the assembly was by men of keen business insight; but with the interest only of the assembly at heart, it was laid down that any profits arising from the undertaking should be spent either on improving the grounds, or on the programme, so as to make it increasingly attractive.

It is unnecessary to trace the growth of Chautauqua, step by step, suffice it to describe what it has grown to in this present year of grace, and in this its fifteenth season.

The estate now comprises about a hundred and eighty acres—a beautifully-wooded grove and some fourteen acres for a base-ball ground having been added this year. There are now about five hundred permanent wooden houses erected, some of them of a most picturesque character, of commodious extent and luxuriously furnished. These belong to merchants, professional men, manufacturers, and others, who come here season after season with their families; other houses of plainer construction have been built by their owners for family residence during the assembly, and others again are occupied by their owners, or let to tenants for a longer or shorter term. Many of the houses are used as boarding-houses, some of them accommodating as many as fifty guests. Then there are tents of various sizes, some of them belonging to private parties who live in them, and others the property of the association managing the assembly, who let them out by the week or month.

There can be no doubt that one of the main features of the success of the assembly has been the camp-life idea. To live in the woods with all the freedom of unconventional life, with just enough of the camping-out and pic-nic element to make it pleasant, and yet with so much of the conveniences of living as to redeem it from roughing it, has doubtless charms for other than the young people of the families. And here one can have just as much or as little of this camp-life as he likes; some go in for it to the extent of lighting their own fires at the back of the tents, and doing all their cooking out of doors. Some are furnished with oil and other stoves, and by no means are unmindful of the culinary art.

Young men club together, and under their own canvas, or in a more al fresco condition, manage to cater for themselves with some comfort and much enjoyment. At one of the assemblies—at the New England Chautauqua at Framingham at Boston—we were invited, with Bishop Vincent and the conductors of the meeting, Drs. Dunning and Hurlburt, to take luncheon with some young ladies, a party of six of them, all connected with the Congregational Publishing House at Boston, some of them as clerks, two of them missionaries from Utah, and one of them the secretary of the New West Commission, a missionary enterprise to the Mormons. They had purchased a little cottage, and here in the woods, with the mother of one of them as chaperone, they spent their holidays, or a portion of them, year by year, enjoying the free life—so great a change from their more confined residence in the city—taking advantage of the educational and social advantages of the assembly, and at a more economical rate than they could live at any other summer resort. Seated on a little verandah in the rear of the cottage, with leafy trees waving their welcome, and with birds piping their cheerful song, we laughed, and chatted, and ate our simple meal with a sense of enjoyment that more elaborate repasts would fail to give.

For those who wish to get rid of all cares of housekeeping there are, as has been observed, the boarding-houses, or the more elaborate Athenæum Hotel, a building capable of accommodating four or five hundred guests, situated on the border of the lake, with wide verandahs on each side of the house; it offers a very pleasant and commodious retreat for the numerous visitors that patronise it. Provided with electric lights and bells, with telegraphic and telephonic communication with distant parts of the States, with the comforts and cuisine of a first-class hotel, and managed by the association in a manner and at charges to make it desirable, it attracts a constant stream of guests, who themselves help to form one of the enticing features of the assembly. For here, in its dining-room and parlour are gathered together throughout the season men and women of note in the religious, educational, intellectual, or musical world of America, whom one could not meet in such numbers in any other place in the States.

In this respect, in its ability to engage the services of the most eminent men and women, to instruct and to entertain, Chautauqua advances year by year. By fees charged for admission to the grounds—twenty-five cents for day ticket in July, forty cents in August, one and two dollars respectively for a week's ticket, two dollars and a half and three dollars for a month's ticket, five dollars for a full season ticket—by sales of land, rents of cottages and tents, royalties paid by those who supply stores and provisions, a very large income is secured, which enables the management to pay high prices and secure the attendance of the best preachers, lecturers and entertainers. Without being furnished with official data, one would not be far wrong in estimating that nearly 4000*l.* had been spent this year upon its platform, that is in providing preachers, lecturers, musicians and others. This may seem a large sum, but then the sources of revenue must be large also. There have been this season fifteen thousand people located on the ground at one time, besides others from neighbouring towns who have paid for day admissions. It was estimated that on the Sunday when Dr. Talmage preached there were upwards of twenty-two thousand assembled, all of whom would be living there from Saturday till Monday, for there are no Sunday admissions.

The attractions that bring so many people to Chautauqua are many and varied, and they extend over a period of eight weeks.

The assembly opens in July, for early in that month the schools and colleges have begun their vacation—some of the colleges, indeed, close towards the end of June, but all educational establishments finish their term in time for the celebration of Independence Day on July 4th.

July, then, is the month when ministers and teachers who desire to take up regular courses of study come. First there is the School of the English Bible, for the study of the Word like any other classic, from an historical and scientific standpoint, under the direction of Professor W. R. Harper, of Yale College. This season there have been three courses, the general course including the literature, history, and contents of the Bible for six hours a week; and the principles of Biblical interpretation studied inductively, for six hours a week. The Old Testament courses have included: (1) Old Testament History—Samuel to the Disruption. (2) The Disruption to the Captivity. (3) The Prophets and Prophecy. (4) The Messianic Prophecies. (5) Isaiah 1—12. (6) The Book of Psalms. The New Testament courses included: (1) The early years and opening ministry of our Lord. (2) Studies in the Epistles. (3) The Epistle to the Galatians. (4) The Epistles to the Corinthians; and to each one of these subjects six hours a week have been given—the courses extending to three weeks. Then, in addition, there have been series of lectures relating to the studies, by eminent professors; and, besides these, there have been conferences on Bible study in the Sunday school, in college, in theological seminaries, by ministers, and on Bible helps. These conferences have been very spirited and stimulating, and have indicated how great an importance the teachers and professors at Chautauqua attach to a more thorough and systematic study of the Bible. The conferences have been attended by Sunday school teachers and others who have not taken the regular Bible courses of study; and a very profound impression has been made, that at colleges and theological seminaries, and by ministers in the preparation of their sermons the Bible is not studied scientifically and thoroughly, not so much so as other classic works in college courses are. It seems to us that one of the most important results of the Chautauqua assembly this year has been to deepen the sense of the importance and need of a more thorough study of God's word, both by those preparing for the ministry and those already ministers.

One of the most valuable developments of the Chautauqua assembly is the College of Liberal Arts, which is in effect a summer college, with a term of six weeks' study. We were present at the close of the term, when an al fresco meeting was held under the trees, and presided over by Bishop Vincent. We were thus enabled to judge of the scope of the term's work and of the spirit that animated professors and students. The curriculum included English, French, German, Spanish, Italian, Scandinavian language and literature; Latin, Greek, Sanskrit, Zend and Gothic: New Testament Greek, Hebrew; the Semitic languages and philology: mathematics, physics, geology, mineralogy, and botany, history, political economy, and social science, psychology and ethics. There is a staff of some thirty professors and teachers under the direction of Dr. W. R. Harper, as principal. The brief report given, showed how remarkable was the personnel of the students. Of the three hundred and eighty-four on the rolls of membership, there were thirty-five ministers, twenty-six professors in universities and colleges, sixty-three college students, eighteen theological students, thirty-one teachers in institutes, academies, and seminaries, seventy-three teachers from public and private schools in grades below the normal and high school, and nine principals of schools; one hundred and sixteen of the students have received college degrees. Most of the religious denominations are represented, the Presbyterians heading the list with eighty-nine, and the Methodists following with seventy-nine students.

It may safely be said that no college in the world can boast of a better set of students; and, indeed, when men, still at college, or who have been there, are ready to give up six weeks of their holiday to further study, one may be quite sure they mean business. It is not surprising, therefore, to hear the professors speak, as we did, in the highest terms of the industry, and even enthusiasm of the students. One professor said he had never found in any college a class of students he could take as far as these of Chautauqua. Another said that better work had been done than ever this year, and all agreed as to the value of even a six weeks' course, when there were so much enthusiasm and inspiration in the students. So much for the charge of superficiality sometimes brought against Chautauqua.

The teachers' retreat provides a three weeks' meeting for secular school teachers, with classes in all kinds of school studies, as well as writing, drawing, kindergarten work, modelling, and school organisation.

It may be asked why it is that teachers, who, presumably, have been hard at work during the term, should be willing to sacrifice any part of their well-earned holiday to study? The answer can only be, that they are impelled by a desire to continue their education, either in the line of their own particular subjects, which they are required to teach, or, as is often the case, in the direction of other studies which they have no opportunity of pursuing during the school term. It is found that the educational atmosphere of Chautauqua is so stimulating, the professors and teachers are so much in earnest themselves, the students bring to their studies so much enthusiasm that there is no perfunctory work done, and teachers and students are alike inspired with their studies.

Then something must be put down to the surroundings of the place: there are charms about Chautauqua that have their attractions for all who come. The day is not one continuous round of study; there are the educational and intellectual companionships, the enjoyment of nature, the recreational facilities, and the general charms of out-of-door life. The managers are very wise in catering for all kinds of taste, and especially in providing for the recreation of the various classes that attend the assembly. Indeed, a casual observer, paying a cursory visit to the grounds, might suppose that the recreational element was the most conspicuous, if not the only one. He would see young people boating, fishing, bathing, and playing lawn-tennis; he would be drawn to the amphitheatre where there might be, at the time of his visit, a concert of vocal or instrumental music, or else a lecture that might fairly be called an entertainment. But, unless he were told, he would not know that many of those whom he saw present were attending classes of one kind and another.

In addition to these classes already mentioned, there are those attended by teachers and others for the study and practice of vocal and instrumental music, drawing and painting, photography, clay modelling, wood carving, elocution and oratory, shorthand and typewriting, physical training, and even the newest study, Volapük. The courses for these are of various lengths, and all of them require the payment of a small fee.

Chautauqua may be said to be at its height during the Assembly proper, which opens on August 7th, and lasts for three weeks. Originally and primarily intended for Sunday school teachers and for the development of Sunday school methods, it is then that the presence of teachers is the largest, because special provision is then made for them. There are two normal courses—the first, and the advanced, under the charge of Drs. Hurlburt and Dunning, two of the leading Sunday school men in America, who for years past have given up most of their holiday-time to this work. These classes are held daily for three weeks, and from personal attendance at them we can say they are most instructive and stimulating. At the end of the course, examinations in writing are instituted, and certificates awarded; and, if desired, the courses can be continued and finished at home under the auspices of the Chautauqua Assembly Normal Union. This year the classes were attended by between four and five hundred students. During the assembly period meetings and conferences are held for the consideration of all kinds of topics relating to Sunday school work, and these are attended by foremost workers from all parts of the States and of Canada.

Perhaps the most popular outcome of Chautauqua, and certainly that which has become most known, is the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle, abbreviated for convenience' sake to the initials C. L. S. C.

Ten years ago, at the assembly, Dr. Vincent proposed a four years' course of home reading, which should promote habits of reading and study among those who had left school or college, which should help to give a bent to young people's minds, and should supplant desultory and aimless, by systematic and useful reading. It was proposed by its scope to give the college student's outlook upon literature and life, to secure for those whose educational advantages were neither great nor long continued, opportunities for carrying on their studies, in the leisure of domestic or business life, and to carry on the culture of those who had been obliged to leave school or college just when they were beginning to be stirred by intellectual quickening. A four years' course was proposed in history, literature, science, art, and general reading, requiring on an average about forty minutes' daily reading.

The proposal was received with favour, and from the first success was assured, though no one, not even the sanguine promoter, anticipated such wide-spreading results. We were present at a meeting to celebrate the completion of the ten years' course of the C. L. S. C., and a more enthusiastic testimony to the value of any educational or intellectual movement could not have been given. More than sixty thousand persons are pursuing the reading, and nearly fifteen thousand have completed the four years' course and received their diplomas. Members are found in every part of the world, in every State and territory of the United States, in Canada, Mexico, Great Britain, France, Germany, India, Persia, South Africa; and in Japan there are some hundreds of intelligent natives who are enrolled.

The course of study is announced early in the season, and the term begins in October and finishes in June—the three summer months, however, enable those who are behind in their readings to complete them. Every member is furnished with a four page memoranda or question paper upon the readings of the year. The questions are to be answered as the various books are completed, from memory, if possible; when this cannot be done, the answers are to be looked up and given in the student's own language. These memoranda are more in the nature of review sheets than examination papers; and are retained by the student until the required reading has been finished. In connection with the regular course of each year a supplemental or Garnet Seal course of reading relating to the subject taken up, is provided for those who wish to pursue their studies along the indicated line. The annual fee for membership is fifty cents. (two shillings of our money) and the cost of books and of the "Chautauquan"—a monthly magazine containing some of the prescribed readings—is about six dollars and a half.[1] The C. L. S. C. has proved of immense advantage as an educational agency, in stimulating mental activity among both young and old, and its influence is continually increasing. At most of the summer assemblies conducted on the Chautauqua model the C. L. S. C. Recognition Day, when the students for the class of that particular year having finished their four years' reading receive their diplomas, is the heartiest and most successful day of the season; and there can be no doubt that the summer assembly, with its C. L. S. C. mottoes, songs, vesper services, memorial days, diplomas, seals, badges, class gatherings, alumni reunions, processions, &c., has proved of great service in promoting the success of this reading circle.

The far-reaching influence of Chautauqua, with all its provisions for educational stimulus and mental improvement cannot easily be estimated.

There are other assemblies based on the model of Chautauqua, which are springing up all over the States. Upwards of forty such have been held this year, some of them attended by thousands of visitors, and all of them giving impetus to religious and educational training.

We rejoice to know that our American cousins are so keenly wide awake as to appreciate such a movement—a movement which identifies religion with intellectual progress and activity—and we cannot but desire that our own land should be stirred by some similar quickening impulse.

THE REVOLUTION OF 1688

ON ITS RELIGIOUS SIDE.

IV.

IN the sixteenth century Geneva and Rome had been the centres of the influences which struggled for the mastery in England and France; in the later part of the seventeenth century the opposing movements looked either to Versailles or to Holland for direction and support. The republic, or federation of republics, called the United Provinces, was in Europe the city of refuge for all whose opinions in religion or politics rendered them obnoxious to their own rulers. In the Dutch cities English Dissenters met with Scotch Covenanters and French Huguenots, and naturally inspired each other with much more intense enthusiasm in the cause in which they were all interested than if they had been living isolated and separated in their native towns and villages. The three or four concluding years of the reign of Charles II. had witnessed the beginning of the agony of French Protestantism. One dragoonade after another had followed, and thousands of those who had the means had already fled to Holland. Doubtless in this ardent society were bitter strifes and fierce disputations, but notwithstanding, and perhaps I might say, because of these palpitations, Holland was at this time the real heart of Christendom.

It was a cosmopolitan land. Its commerce brought it into connection with all the world, and thousands of energetic men visited its ports and cities. Naturally this community—the very heart and soul of European Protestantism—looked with horror at such a portent as the accession of James II., an avowed Catholic, to the throne of England, one whom the Scottish portion of the exiles already knew as a cruel persecutor. James became king February 8, 1688. He at once began to have mass said in St. James' Chapel, and on Easter Sunday he went to hear it in state, surrounded by the Guards, and accompanied by the Knights of the Garter and other great nobles. At his coronation he neither partook of the communion nor accepted the Bible. Nevertheless he was welcomed to the throne with enthusiasm: his promise to support the Church of England being considered quite satisfactory since it was "the word of a king." Addresses of a furiously loyal character poured in; those from London, Bristol, and the Universities not being less obsequious than the rest. Oxford declared she would never under any circumstances swerve from the principles of an unlimited obedience.

When the Parliament elected under this influence came together, James felt that he could not have done better had he named the members himself. However it did not at all represent the country, for the city and borough corporations had been so reconstituted that only supporters of the government could be returned, while in the country where the people had some chance, every possible influence was brought to bear to prevent their candidates being elected. This state of things naturally filled with dire alarm the party which had been founded by the great men of the

[1] The Rev. Donald Cook, Dundee, is the correspondent for Great Britain, who will enroll members and furnish all particulars.

LAMBETH PALACE AT THE TIME OF THE REVOLUTION IN 1688.

(From a Print in Lambeth Palace Library.)

Long Parliament, and had recently followed Shaftesbury, Russell, and Algernon Sidney.

Was it strange that its exiled members should think it their duty to make an effort to rescue the lands of Wiclif and of Knox from the fate that had befallen those of Huss and Calvin? The Earl of Argyle undertook to lead the attempt in Scotland, the Duke of Monmouth the greater effort in England.

The story of both these enterprises is a melancholy one. With the exception of the rebellion in Kent and Essex in the days of Richard II., and that in Norfolk in the days of Edward VI., there has never been an insurrection which so took hold of the heart of the people as that in the Western counties in 1685. The vast bulk of the population threw themselves into the rising, or gave it aid and sympathy, its soul and mainstay being the godly people of every denomination: Church of England, Presbyterian, Independent, Baptist. In the contemporary minute-books of the Independent Church at Axminster it is recorded: "A great number of sober and pious men marched forth with the army." "Divers of the brethren belonging to the church marched with them." And special reference is made to the deaths of two members of the Axminster church who fell in battle. Macaulay speaks of the numerous puritan ministers in arms against the Government, and describes them as praying and preaching in red coats and huge jack-boots, with swords at their sides. The joy with which Monmouth was received in Taunton reads like a page from Bunyan's description of the entry of Emmanuel into Mansoul. Every door and window was wreathed with flowers, and every man in the street wore a green sprig in his hat. A train of young girls presented him with a royal standard that female hands had embroidered. And the lady who headed the procession offered "England's Darling" a Bible of great price, which he reverently accepted, saying, "I come to defend the truths contained in this book and to seal them, it may be so, with my blood." Now Taunton was the very town where Joseph Alleine had lived, laboured and suffered.

But if we would form a true idea of the spirit of the men who were willing to give their lives rather than England should fall into the condition of the Jesuitised countries of the continent, we ought not to forget the histories which have been preserved of the last hours of the Hewlings. These two young men were the sons of a Turkey merchant in the city of London, and grandsons of William Kiffen, the pastor of the Baptist church in Devonshire square. The younger, not twenty years of age, who was pursuing his studies in Holland, came over with Monmouth; his elder brother Benjamin, aged twenty-two, joining the duke's army subsequently in England. After the great disaster at Sedgemoor, they sought to escape in a boat, but being driven back to land, were obliged to surrender. Taken to Exeter, they were conveyed in a frigate to London and thrown into Newgate, and after being in that prison three weeks, they were led, loaded with heavy chains, to Dorchester; the keepers who went with them being filled with admiration at the grave, serious, and Christian carriage of such young men.

At Salisbury a friend found them very cheerful and resigned, stating that they were in a more happy condition than ever in their lives, from the sense they had of the pardoning love of God in Jesus Christ to their souls, expressing themselves thus: "Anything what pleaseth God, what He sees best, so be it;" "We know He is able to deliver, but if not, blessed be His name, death is not terrible now, but desirable." And Benjamin Hewling added: "O, God is a strong refuge, I have found him so, indeed."

While the friend who narrates their last hours was waiting with William Hewling the issue of his trial, the young prisoner told him "how God by His Holy Spirit did suddenly seize upon his heart when he thought not of it, in his retired abode in Holland, as it were secretly whispering in his heart, 'Seek ye My face,' enabling him to answer His gracious call, and to reflect upon his own soul, showing him the evil of sin and the necessity of Christ, from that time carrying him on to a sensible adherence to Christ for justification and eternal life. Hence he found a spring of joy and sweetness beyond the comforts of the whole earth. He also said that he could not but admire the wonderful goodness of God in so preparing him for what He was bringing him to, which then he thought not of; giving him hope of eternal life before He called him to look death in the face, so that he did cheerfully resign his life to God before he came, having sought His guidance; and that both then and now, the cause did appear to him very glorious, notwithstanding all he had suffered in it, or what he farther might suffer, although for our sins God hath withheld these good things from us."

Sentence being passed, he was only allowed one day before his execution; nevertheless, his friend found him in a most joyful state of mind. At dinner, just before going to Lyme, where he was to die, he dropped many expressions of inward joy, and sent his particular recommendations to all his friends, saying that he advised all to make sure of an interest in Christ, for He is our only comfort when we come to die.

As he passed through the sympathetic crowds who followed him and his fellow sufferers with great lamentations, his discourse was exceedingly spiritual, and when he got into the country he said: "This is a glorious creation, but what then is the Paradise of God to which we are going!"

At Lyme, just before they went to die, he consoled one of his companions thus: "Here is a sweet promise for us—'I will not leave you comfortless, I will come unto you'—Christ will be with us to the last." To each friend who bade him farewell he gave some encouraging word. Then he prayed with the greatest fervency for three-quarters of an hour, offering earnest petitions for the peace of the church and of these nations in particular, so that many persons were melted into pity and wept.

Just as he was departing out of the world, he said with a joyful countenance: "Oh, now my joy and comfort is that I have a Christ to go to," and so resigned his spirit to Christ on 12th September, 1685. No notice was given of his burial, yet when the body was brought into Lyme two hundred came to accompany it, several young women of the best families in the town laying him in his grave in Lyme churchyard.

Great exertions were made to save his brother; strong interest being brought to bear on Judge Jeffreys, who was believed to have the power in his hands. But in this case it was the king who was responsible for the carrying out the sentence. Hannah Hewling went to James personally, and besought him to pardon her brother, but found him, as Lord Churchill had warned her, as hard as marble. Benjamin suffered on the 30th of September with such courage that the very soldiers around the gallows joined in the lamentations. Asked if he would pray for the king, he replied, "I pray for all men." Then he requested that they might sing a hymn. The sheriff told him that it must be with the ropes round their necks, which they cheerfully accepted, and sung with such heavenly joy and sweetness that many who were present said it both broke and rejoiced their hearts.

Macaulay's chapter, descriptive of the Western Insurrection, gives a faint idea of the horror of which the doings of the king's judges at the Bloody Assize that followed must have caused throughout the western counties. Lord Chief Justice Jeffreys hanged three hundred and twenty persons on this circuit alone. In every spot where two roads met, in every market place, on the green of every large village where Monmouth's followers had been provided with food, there ironed corpses, clattered in the wind, or human heads and quarters stuck on poles, terrified the miserable people; hideous reminders of the ruin of the cause they loved. "Very few of the convicts," says Macaulay "professed any repentance for what they had done." Their dying words were carefully remembered, and their farewell letters preserved as sacred treasures.

The authorities feared the widespread sympathy with the rising more than they did the efforts of the insurrectionists themselves. Two women were actually condemned to be burnt to death for no greater offence than sheltering fugitives. Lady Alice Lisle's sentence was finally commuted into decapitation, but Mrs. Elizabeth Gaunt was left to suffer her fate. Bishop Burnet says, "She rejoiced that God had honoured her to be the first that suffered by fire in this reign, and that her suffering was a martyrdom for that religion which was all love. Penn, the quaker, told me that he saw her die. She laid the straw about her speedily, and behaved herself in such a manner that all the spectators were melted in tears. She was executed at Tyburn, October 23, 1685; within a few days of the signing of the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes. In a paper she wrote and delivered to the keeper of Newgate, she said that she heartily and freely forgave the cruelty as against herself, whether committed by 'the furious judge,' 'the unrighteous jury,' the pitiless jailer, or 'the great one of all (James II.), by whose power all these and multitudes more of cruelties are done,' but as it was done in an implacable mind against the Lord Jesus Christ, and His righteous cause and followers, she left it to Him who is the avenger of all such wrong, and who will tread upon princes as upon mortar, and be terrible to the kings of the earth."

It was a dark time for all who sympathised with people like the Hewlings and Elizabeth Gaunt. Never were their persecutors more on the alert. Such people had to perform their worship in the night or at break of day. Yet their spirit was not broken. A justice of the peace coming with a strong force on one of the nocturnal prayer-meetings held in a gravel pit about two miles from London, seized the preacher and broke up the meeting; but the congregation, numbering about two hundred, turned on their assailants, rescued their pastor, and put the constables to flight.

Many nonconformists gave up England in despair and left the country, among others the greatest of their divines, John Howe.

In the autumn of 1685 the power of James II. reached its zenith. The Parliament was devoted to him, the corporations were filled with his creatures, the judges were his tools, the established Church professed unlimited obedience to his authority. He accordingly set about carrying out the dream of his life—to become an autocrat like Louis XIV. and to make the Roman Catholic religion the dominant power in the land. To accomplish these things he relied on the "loving Commons" to abolish the Habeas Corpus Act, to give him means to keep up a standing army, and to repeal the Test Act. But at this moment Providence opened the eyes of all Protestants not wilfully blinded. The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes gave Englishmen a startling lesson on the nature of the despotism into which they were drifting, a lesson they could not avoid applying, when they learnt that the Bishop of Valence as the representative of the Gallican clergy had told Louis XIV. that "the pious sovereign of England looked to him for support against an heretical nation." The bishop's harangue was much talked of in London, and members of the House of Commons were especially eager to see a copy. To counteract the effect, James opened a subscription for the Huguenot refugees, subscribing towards their relief from his privy purse.

Though alarmed for a moment, he was soon again at his favourite work. He published the fact that the late king had lived and died a Roman Catholic, and producing two papers Charles II. had written in defence of that religion, he challenged Archbishop Sancroft to reply to them. The archbishop discreetly declined, but the revelation must have produced an effect upon him analogous to that which Shaftesbury experienced when he was made privy to the shameful designs of Charles II. to force Catholicism on England by aid of a French army.

James, seeing that he had awakened suspicion and opposition, determined to give up all thought of becoming powerful in Europe, and to concentrate his energies on the work of forcing Catholicism on England. "It is my resolution," he said to the Spanish Ambassador, "to establish my authority at home, and do something for my religion." And instead of attempting to rival Louis XIV., he determined to work with him and under his protection. Accordingly when Jeffreys tried to deter him from ordering a book on the sufferings of the Huguenots written by the pastor, Jean Claude, to be burnt at the Royal Exchange, he said, "One king should always take another's part, and I have particular reasons for showing this respect to the King of France." And for this end he, who wished the repeal of the Test Act, ordered that no Huguenot should receive any aid from the vast offerings the English people had made on their behalf, unless he first of all took the sacraments according to the rites of the Church of England.

Two prerogatives inhered in the royal authority, both undefined; the dispensing power and supreme authority in the church. By the use of the first, James hoped to remove all obstacles to appointing Catholics to places of trust, military, civil, and ecclesiastical; and by means of the second to compel the Protestant Church of England to become the accomplice in its own destruction. To obviate a doubt raised by the distinct surrender of the dispensing power by Charles II., it was determined to obtain a decision from the judges in the king's favour, and this was done by the dismission of four judges not to be relied on.

By virtue of this reclaimed prerogative of dispensing with the laws, Roman Catholics were now introduced into the Privy Council, and clergymen permitted to retain ecclesiastical benefices after having become Roman Catholics. One such pervert was the master of University College, Oxford, who was not only allowed to retain his position, but to introduce a Jesuit as chaplain into the college. The next step was to prefer Roman Catholics to high ecclesiastical office, and the deanery of Christ Church becoming vacant, it was bestowed on a papist. James did not dare yet to appoint Roman Catholics as bishops, but he appointed men whom he could rely on to support his designs. Meanwhile he kept the see of York vacant, evidently intending it for a papist when the favourable moment arrived. James II. meant to play the part of Henry VIII. only to reverse the performance. The Act of Supremacy, by which that redoubtable monarch had separated the Church of England from the Holy See, was now to be used to reunite her to Rome.

But the power of the crown over the church had been greatly lessened by the abolition of the Court of High Commission by the Long Parliament. James now determined to revive this formidable tribunal. In July, 1686, the country was startled by the news that James had placed the Government of the Church of England in the hands of seven commissioners; they were to be fettered by no rules, and were to be both prosecutors and judges. The accused were to be allowed no copy of the charge for which they were indicted; they might be subjected to any amount of examination; they could be suspended, ejected, and rendered incapable of holding any office whatever; they could be excommunicated, deprived of all civil rights and imprisoned for life, and, by the weight of the costs thrown upon them, reduced to poverty. The chief commissioner was the furious and brutal Lord Chancellor Jeffreys; and with him were appointed the Lord Treasurer, the Lord Keeper, the Chief Justice, the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the bishops of Durham and Rochester: Sancroft refused to sit, pleading ill health. The court at once proceeded to business by citing before its bar the Bishop of London, for neglecting the royal order to suspend the rector of St. Giles for preaching a discourse against the pretensions of the See of Rome. The Lord Treasurer, the Chief Justice and the Bishop of Rochester were for his acquittal: but the first named—Lord Rochester—being offered his choice, a verdict of guilty, or dismissal, chose the former alternative, and thus Dr. Compton was found guilty, and suspended from his office as Bishop of London.

James was anxious to renew diplomatic relations with the Roman See, but Innocent XI. was not at all disposed to look with favour on his proceedings in England. This pope was a Jansenist, and he doubtless knew that James was under the influence of the Jesuits. At the instigation of the Jesuit Petre, whom he had made clerk of the closet, James dismissed his Franciscan confessor, and took a Jesuit in his place. Towards the end of 1687, the King advanced Petre to a place in the Council, and he, Jeffreys, and Sunderland, became the King's chief advisers. James sent Lord Castlemaine as ambassador to the pope, but Innocent would hardly see him, always pretending to be ill. However, his master was determined not to be offended. James caused the papal Nuncio in England to be conveyed in state to Windsor Castle, and on one occasion he fell down on his knees before him in the presence of the whole court and implored his blessing.

That a Catholic king should wish to annul the cruel and terrible laws against his co-religionists was natural, and James could not have been blamed had he used all his influence to bring about their abolition legally, or even had he freely used his prerogative of mercy to prevent cruel sentences from being carried out. But it suited his temper better to suspend the whole mass of legislation on the subject by the simple exercise of his royal will. Accordingly, Londoners soon began to stare with wonder at the unwonted sight of Franciscans, Carmelites, and Benedictines in their respective garbs moving about the streets, and were not a little discontented to find them founding houses in various parts of the town. In the Savoy, for example, the Jesuits opened a school where they soon had four hundred boys, half of whom were of Protestant parentage. Riots broke out, and the train-bands sent for in order to suppress them, cried out, "We cannot in conscience fight for popery." Upon which the king, determined to have his way, formed a camp at Hounslow. However, the crowds who came to look at the soldiers, corrupted their loyalty, and the army was soon as little to be depended upon as the train-bands.

So far from these things moving James, he openly expressed his joy to the French Ambassador at finding himself in a situation to strike bold strokes, declaring that he would not flinch. And the 4th of April, 1687, saw one of these bold strokes, when he published a Declaration of Indulgence, in which, by his sole authority, he annulled a long series of statutes, and suspended the penal laws against all classes of nonconformists. Henceforth they were to be permitted to worship publicly, and no religious test was to be imposed as a qualification for any civil or military office.

What did this indulgence mean Simply this: Indulgence to fill the Army and Navy with believers in the idea of absolute authority, indisputable and indefeasible. Indulgence to fill the judicial bench with men imbued with such a belief of divine right inherent in supreme authority, that their very idea of law was the will of the king. Indulgence to rule England by the aid of the wild Irishry and French dragoons. Indulgence to fill the Royal Council with Jesuits, and the country with monks and friars. In fine, Indulgence for a hundredth part of the nation to suppress the rest.

R. HEATH.

JOTTINGS FROM THE SOUTH PACIFIC.

SEA-SNIPE.—We have on our coral reefs a species of sea-snipe, called from its cry "Kuri." When not on the wing, it is always dodging about in shallow water pecking at molluscs and small crustaceans. In allusion to the habit of this bird, Tuārae said, "Let the professors of the Gospel cultivate a calm, trustful spirit, content to feed on the promises. Do not be like the ever-restless wandering Kuri, ever on the move in quest of some new thing."

SANCTIFICATION.—The same preacher went on to say: "We have not seen the process of silver-refining referred to in the Scriptures, but we all understand about the cooking of kape (a species of Caladium, so acrid that the mouth of wild hogs biting the raw stem drips with blood), upon which in winter we mainly subsist. One, two, three, or even four cookings are needful, according to the sort[1] of kape, to render it fit for eating."

"God's children may be compared to this acrid but valuable plant. We all need to be placed in the oven of affliction to purify our natures. With some the process is speedy; with others it must be repeated. Some again have such perverse dispositions that it would seem as if the needful purification would never be accomplished. It will eventually; for we are in the hands of One who is infinitely wise and patient."

"THE BRANCH" (Zech. iii. 8.)—Angene lived on the western side of Rarotonga, under the ridge of hills (of slate) known as Tuoro, believed to be the track of ghosts on their route to spirit-world. It behoved him to be very careful not to offend the eyes, nostrils, or ears of the numerous gods ever hovering about that fatal district. But the impious fellow defiantly threw the refuse of his food before and behind his dwelling. On one occasion, when asked by Great Tangaroa, the tutelar god of Rarotonga, what he was eating, he insultingly replied, "The legs of little (i.e. insignificant) land and sea gods" (=crabs). Tangaroa resolved to make an example of this impious man. At his bidding a stage was quickly extemporised, and Angene placed upon it,—the major gods carrying him off with a mighty shout of triumph to a neighbouring marae (at Nikao), to be cooked and eaten. A troop of minor gods followed exultingly.

On the road to death, Angene passed under a tall hibiscus tree, to a stout branch of which he clung whilst the empty stage was borne to the marae. For in their joy the major divinities did not hear the voice of the minor gods as they chanted these words:—

> Angene is safe in a tree;
> Angene clings to the branch.
> 'Tis but a bundle of sticks,
> An empty stage, that you bear on!

On depositing their burden within the sacred precincts, great was the chagrin of the major gods at discovering how they had been outwitted by a mortal and deprived of a feast.

But what about Angene meanwhile? As soon as the gods were out of sight, he dropped to the ground and ran as fast as his legs could carry him to Avarua, where he lived in peace, and where his descendants still dwell.

Thus runs the ancient myth, so well known at Rarotonga. Native preachers descanting on Zechariah iii. 8, never fail in a few well-chosen words to allude to it. Of course Angene represents the impenitent sinner hurried away at last to unquenchable fire. Jesus is the strong Branch, clinging to which he may escape the malice of his spiritual foes. An impassioned native orator will break out thus: "Oh, Angene, you are on your way to destruction. Do you not see the yon 'Branch,' strong enough to bear the weight of you and your many sins. Cling to it—your only chance—and live!"

The family of Angene believe this myth of their ancestor to be true. Like the early Christians in Europe, our Polynesian converts regard the divinities anciently worshipped to be veritable evil spirits under the control of Satan. Hence the horror with which they regard the idols worshipped by their ancestors.

W. WYATT GILL.

[1] Four varieties grow in the Hervey Group. The "one-oven" sort is most cultivated. It sometimes attains the length of ten or twelve feet.

LITTLE MEG AND THE LODGER.

II.—DRIVEN HOME.

IT must not be thought that the battle was wholly won, and that nothing now remained to be done, after the incident with which we closed our first chapter. True, little Meg, taught of God, had been permitted to carry the Gospel message to this stubborn yet suffering soul, and out of her loving, pitying nature, had spoken words which had touched the old man as he had thought that no words could ever touch him again. Her simple prayer had pierced his inmost soul. But Micah's heart, sore with bereavement, was rebellious; not in a condition as yet to receive comfort, because there was no submission to the Divine will.

But one great step had been gained. To the child he was now no longer inaccessible. Indeed, if she did not come to him for at least a quarter of an hour when he was at home mornings and evenings, he was grieved and hurt. And though at first he preferred that she should just chat with him, he after a while allowed her to bring her Bible, and read him a few verses, and talk them over.

But some things about the old man were still the same as ever. Fond as he now seemed of little Meg, he would not allow her to do anything to his room, and if she even so much as moved a chair, his quick eyes noted it, and he looked suspicious and annoyed.

Even the little girl had perception enough to feel that she did not know Micah Martin's character thoroughly yet, and that beside the sorrowful resentment which his boy's death had called forth, there was some other and more secret sin unrepented of, unconfessed, which was keeping his heart closed against Him Who was saying in His tenderest love-tones, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock."

But God has various methods of dealing with those whom His love has ransomed, and who will not accept the proffered salvation; and now, having sent His angel of bereavement, He sent also the messenger of sickness.

One morning, when Meg ran in as usual, before going to school, she found the old man in bed, burning with fever and racked with pain.

"Oh, Meg," he said, "I'm very bad; I'm afraid I've got a touch of rheumatic fever, such as I had a few years ago."

"Dear me!" cried Meg, "what can I do for you, Mr. Martin? Shall I run for the doctor?"

"Oh, no, no! That costs a lot of money," groaned the old man. "I'll wait and see how I get on."

"Shall I get you some stuff at the chemist's?" asked Meg. "He's most as clever as a doctor, and if I tell him just how you are, I'm sure he'd let me have somethin' for you."

"Money, child, money! It all costs so much!" sighed Micah.

"Poor, dear Mr. Martin!" murmured the child, bending over him tenderly, and smoothing the forest of hair from his burning brow. "It must indeed be hard to be so ill, and yet so very, very poor!"

The old man frowned, and moved his head uneasily.

"There, there, Meg!" he said at last; "tell your mother to make me some rice or barley water—whichever's cheapest, you understand—and let me have a jug of it here by my bedside. But don't go sending for any doctor or medicines till I give you leave. And I don't want any food, but just the barley water."

"You won't mind mother just comin' in to look after you while I'm away at school, will you?" asked Meg.

"No, if she doesn't come spying and prying round," replied Micah. "But before you go, Meg, just shove that box under the bed, will you? It's rather in the way where it is."

Meg obeyed, but found that it was as much as her strength could manage to push the box along the floor and under the iron bedstead.

"Did you find it heavy, child?" asked Micah, with a look which had something of suspicion in it, as Meg lifted her face, flushed with the effort.

"Yes, sir, very heavy. Such a little box, too! Why, it might be full of stones by the weight of it."

"What can it matter to you what it's full of?" snarled the old man, showing his teeth like a growling dog.

Meg looked at him in silent wonder and sorrow. He had been so gentle with her now for some time that she did not understand this sudden return of the old rough manner, when she had given him no cause for anger.

Seeing the child's look of innocent surprise and trouble, he said, as if ashamed of his sudden outburst—

"I beg your pardon, Meg. I'd no call to speak to you like that, but this pain in the joints does play the mischief with my temper, and that's none of the sweetest, my dear, as no one knows better than yourself."

Several days passed, during which nearly all the spare time that Mrs. Harris and Meg had, was spent at the bedside of their lodger, who suffered very much, but would not allow them to send for medical advice. At last, one night he became so much worse, that the widow said—

"Mr. Martin, I daren't take upon myself to answer for you if we are to go on in the dark like this. So, whether you approves, or whether you doesn't, I must send for the doctor; and if you're too poor to pay for his visits, well, I'll make shift to do it myself somehow. He's a kind man, and will give me time, I know—but have a doctor you must!"

There was no such thing as resisting fate in a form like this. Besides, Micah was himself alarmed at the course the disease was taking, for the heart was threatened, and he well knew the danger of this, and did not feel ready to die yet.

So he submitted with the best grace he could to the remedies prescribed, and if not actually amiable and patient, was still not altogether so hard to nurse as might have been expected; even allowing himself to be kept clean and tidy.

By the second week in December, he was able to leave his bed, and sit up in an old armchair, which Mrs. Harris carried upstairs for him; and Meg often brought her lessons to prepare, and sat with him, appealing for his help now and again in something she did not understand, or if she had an interesting book, she would read aloud to him, to beguile the long weary hours during which he could do nothing to employ himself.

One day the child was sitting with him, knitting a comforter for her mother. They had both been silent for some time, but at last Micah said—

"What are you and your mother going to do for Christmas?"

Meg flushed.

"We're not goin' to do nothin', Mr. Martin," said she, "at least nothin' but go to church."

"But don't folks always have a good Christmas dinner on the day, and some kind of a treat on one of the days soon after?" asked the old man.

"Yes, sir, and we have had sometimes, but it won't be convenient to do it this year."

"And why, pray?" questioned Micah, with strange pertinacity.

The blush deepened on the child's round cheeks.

"After all, Mr. Martin," said she, "the truth is always the best. We're very poor, and we can't afford anything extra by way of keeping Christmas. But it don't matter, we can remember what the day stands for, and why the dear Lord became the child Jesus; and the great work He did, all the same."

"Then you're poorer this Christmas than you've been before, is that it?" pursued Micah.

"Yes, sir, things can't be always the same. We've nothin' to grumble at."

There was silence again. At last the old man said with a great effort—

"It's I that have been this expense to you, and used up what you had saved, now isn't it, Meg?"

"Don't mention it, Mr. Martin. You was ill, and poorer than us, and we did what we could for you, as we should have done for any one—as mother says—for the dear Lord's sake."

The old man's eyes dropped. For a moment he could not meet that sweet truthful gaze of little Meg's. Then he said hesitatingly—

"But Meg, supposing, you know, that I—I——" There he paused, uncertain how to complete his sentence, and Meg said—

"Please Mr. Martin, we won't suppose nothin'. Make haste and get well, and let's all thank God for His mercy. Then this'll be a happy Christmas, even if it isn't very rich in some ways."

For days after this conversation, the lodger was strangely thoughtful and silent, nor did he again allude to Christmas Day, or ask any more questions. He looked care-worn and distressed, and at night, the widow, when going to her room passed his door, she several times heard him murmuring as though in prayer, and once she caught the words, uttered like the cry of a perishing soul, "Lord help me! Christ save me! Help me to be willing to give up my sin, and come to Thee."

Christmas Day passed very quietly. There was no Christmas beef, nor was there any pudding. But there was a little Christmas green about the house; a few sprays of holly and laurel here and there, and some of the prettiest were reserved for old Micah's room.

The season was a very mild one, and in Christmas week Mr. Martin was allowed to go out a little. It was about this time both the widow and her little daughter noticed that a great change had passed over him. It was as if he had shaken off some terrible weight, something that had been oppressing his conscience, and making his sorrow for his lost son harder to bear. These last days he had accepted Mrs. Harris's invitation to spend the evening with Meg and her in their cosy parlour, cosy because it was clean and tidy, and warm, in spite of the bareness that poverty brings. And the old man's manner had so changed, that it would have been hard to recognise in him the gruff, shaggy creature that first excited the wonder and ridicule of Mrs. Wilkins.

Mrs. Harris's parlour was in the front of the house, and as she and Meg and their lodger sat there one day early in the New Year, they could not help remarking upon the commotion that appeared to be going on in a house nearly opposite, which for some time had been standing empty, but which now apparently had been let, for furniture was being carried in, and fires seemed to have been lighted in all the rooms to air them.

"I wonder who's took that house?" said Mrs. Harris. "It's a partic'lar nice house, and when my poor husband was alive he used always to say, that if he was but a bit richer, there weren't a place in the town as he would have cared to have so much as that, bein' so well-built, and dry, and every way convenient. Whoever's took it must be precious well off; just look what furniture that is bein' carried in; nothin' showy, but so good and substantial."

"Yes, the house does seem a nice one," rejoined Micah, with another look across the street, "and I am glad it is, because some friends of mine, I understand, are going to live there. There are a good many rooms, and it is just the house for lodgers. Shouldn't you say so, Mrs. Harris?"

"Yes, indeed, Mr. Martin. But dear me, to think of you havin' some friends after all! We always thought you hadn't no one."

"Well, you see, I am richer than you imagined!" responded the old man, laying a significant emphasis upon the words, which made little Meg look up wonderingly into his smiling face.

The day after, the preparations in the house seemed to be nearly or quite complete, for all was quiet, and Mrs. Harris saw a neat-looking servant appear at the door to admit Mr. Martin, who called to inquire, on his friends' behalf, how soon they might move in.

That evening the old man came home more cheerful than he had ever been since Mrs. Harris and Meg had known him; and after tea, he said to them—

"I want you to come across the way with me, and look over that house you think so nice. I know very well that the people who have taken it would be only too happy to have me show the rooms to any one I please. Get your hat and coat, Meg, and come!"

Rather wondering at the accommodating disposition of the future tenants of the house, and still more at the strangely exhilarated state of mind in which Mr. Martin seemed to be, the widow and her child accompanied him across the road.

The door was opened by the servant whom Mrs. Harris had already seen, and who now smiled, and said good evening very pleasantly.

They walked through the rooms, which were simply but well-furnished, everything looking beautifully fresh and new.

"This is the linen-closet," said Micah, unceremoniously throwing open the doors of a large cupboard in the store-room. "You see there is plenty of table and bed-linen for the lodgers. Look, it is all marked!"

"Why, so it is!" cried the widow. "And how very strange, Mr. Martin; the folks that are comin' have the same name as ours, Harris! There it is, as plain as markin'-ink can make it."

"Oh, yes—by-the-way, didn't I tell you that?" asked

Micah. "Harris is not a very uncommon name, after all, so there's nothing wonderful in it."

But now Mr. Martin led the way to the top of the house, and there was one dear little room facing the south, which took Meg's fancy immensely. It had a little white bed, and white curtains to the windows, and a pretty round table, and on it a big illustrated Bible which attracted Meg's notice at once.

"Oh, what a lovely Bible, Mr. Martin!" cried she; "might I just look at it?"

"Yes, my dear," said he, "do." She did so, and uttered a little cry.

"What is it, child?" asked her mother.

"Oh, mother, look here!" and Meg held up the book, and showed the words, "For my dear little friend and kind nurse, Meg Harris, from her ever grateful and affectionate old Micah Martin."

"Well, now," said Micah, when Meg had almost overwhelmed him with her rapturous thanks; "suppose we go down to supper, it will be ready for us by now."

"I must run across and prepare it, you mean, Mr. Martin. It can't prepare itself, you know," replied Mrs. Harris.

"No, no, nonsense!" cried Micah, "we're going to have supper here this evening. Come down into the dining-room, we'll be grand for once!"

He threw open the door as he spoke, and there was the supper-table spread with a delightful repast, to which they all sat down, the widow and her child wondering more than ever.

"It's no use, I can't be a dissembler any longer!" said Micah at last. "Mrs. Harris, I'm glad to see you are pleased with the house, and with what it contains, and that you, dear little Meg, think the little white room and the Bible nice. There remains now nothing more for me to do than to ask you to take possession of your new home as soon as you like, begging you to reserve a room for me, if you will still kindly allow me to remain your lodger."

"But I don't understand!" stammered the widow; "what about your friends that are comin', whose name is Harris, you know?"

"You are my friends, and you have come, and your name is Harris, is it not?" laughed the old man. "Listen, dear friends;" and his face grew grave and earnest again. "You thought me poor when I came to you, and so I was, in all save money, but I was a miser. I had persuaded myself that I was right in hoarding for my son, but when my son was taken, I found that the money remained as precious as ever, and as hard to part from as before, which showed me that I had come to love the filthy lucre for its own sake. You, my little Meg, with your loving, faithful words and earnest prayer, set my conscience working. I began to feel how terribly far from God I had been living all my life, and the danger of it. Your patience and Christian gentleness, dear friends, taught me that a Christian's faith must be a real thing. Then, without any hope of reward, you expended your all upon me in my sickness, doing it for Christ's sake.

"Was it strange, then, that I began to long to know this Christ for myself; this Saviour whose love constrained His children to gracious deeds and constant self-denial?

"But my riches stood in the way. That box you saw, Meg, contained gold and silver, but that is not a quarter of what I possess. And the passion for hoarding had grown so terribly, that the pain of parting with a single coin was real agony. But God helped me to conquer this demon of avarice. He answered my prayers, and made me willing in the day of His power—and now I only want to use my money for His service, and the good of my fellow-men. As for this house, dear Mrs. Harris, I offer it you in humble gratitude for benefits that you and this child have conferred upon me, such as I can never hope to repay; but God Himself will reward you openly for the good that you have done in secret."

And the poor widow could only exclaim in a broken voice—

"God bless you, sir!" while little Meg sobbed, "and He will, I know He will!"

M. E. B

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XXII.

Under a palm was her dwelling-place,
Up in a mountain, where face to face
With Israel's God, in the solitude,
Wisdom was given, and strength renewed.
And hither, from cities of many a name,
God's chosen people for judgment came.

1. As the letters of fire on the wall decreed,
Victory was won by this princely Mede.
2. For thy care of a prophet so cast away,
Thy life shall be saved in the evil day.
3. On moved the star, and made no delay,
Till it stood o'er the place where the young child lay.
4. O warrior of might, thy valorous sword
Brought thee fair guerdon and sweet reward!
5. Oh peaceful Sharon, thy solitude glows
With the face of this loveliest flower that blows.
6. In him was found, by the Heavenly King,
In that house of wickedness, "some good thing."
7. Out of the eater came forth meat,
And out of the strong came forth this sweet.

M. E. B.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XX.—p. 640.—SARAH.

1. S-hepherd . . . . John x. 11.
2. A-aron . . . . . Exod. xxxii. 1-5.
3. R-ebekah . . . . Gen. xxvii. 6-17.
4. A-bigail . . . . . 1 Sam. xxv. 3.
5. H-osannah . . . . Matt. xxi. 15.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. VII.—p. 686.

"And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the Garden of the Lord, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest unto Zoar."—Gen. xiii. 10.

(1) Gen. xiii. 10; (2) Matt. iii. 13, 14; (3) Gen. xix. 1; (4) 1 Kings vii. 45, 46; (5) Gen. xiv. 2; (6) 2 Kings vi. 1-4; (7) Gen. ii. 8, 10; xix. 28; (8) xiii. 10; (9) Lifting up the eyes, xxiv. 63, 64; (10) xiii. 1, 2, 5; (11) xi. 25, 27 (12) xiii. 11, 12; xix. 23, 24; (13) xiii. 10.

ANSWER TO HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. X.—p. 704.

Whoso putteth his trust in the Lord, shall be safe.—Prov. xxix. 25.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

HOW MARY CAME HOME.

OLD JEAN BRINGS STARTLING NEWS.

WE were all together in the parlour between five and six o'clock on Christmas Eve.

Looking back on that evening now, it is very distinct to me, and comes back through all the years as if I were in the midst of it again.

I seem to feel the stillness of it; the silence that had fallen on us all—to see the lamp upon the table, and the snow falling through the darkness outside, for we had not drawn blind or curtain yet. Jem sat reading in a corner beyond the fire—he could always see anywhere to read. Father was in his armchair upon the rug; Anna sat thinking by the piano, and Gracie and Kittie in low chairs, and with a little table to themselves, were trimming their new bonnets for Christmas Day. A little apart from the rest, against the wall, was the sofa where mother always lay; her eyes were shut as if she were sleeping now, and I sat sewing by her side, separating her now, as always, from the rest, for it was my one business always to wait on her. It was all warm and bright and quiet, and, though sad thoughts could not be far from any one of us, a sense as of comfort was beginning to come round us all, safe in our home-shelter, with the lamplight round us, and New Year's hopes so near. Only with that one anxiety that we all possessed—now more than ever present to our hearts—we could not speak, we could only sit working and be quiet. And so we sat in silence, and the lamplight shone.

And then—all at once—I do not know how it was, or who heard them first, we seemed to catch the sound of footsteps under the window on the snow. Right under the window they seemed to be, as if someone had been waiting there and had gone.

Jem started up, and went to the window. I think a sort of thrill went through us all. He stood there, looking out into the blackness, with his face pressed against the glass; the snow was falling all the time outside. Then he turned round with his slow, quiet smile, and looked at us. "No good," he said, "there is nothing to be seen."

"It was the boy going round to the kitchen with the greens," said my father, almost sternly, as if he were rebuking some silent fancy that oppressed us all. And, as if half ashamed, we bent our heads over our occupations, and Jem went back to his corner and sat down, though he did not take up his book again.

"Of course! the boy," murmured Anna in her shy, quiet manner, from her work. "But I wish we had not heard him all at once like that. It made me think——" and suddenly she paused, whilst a deep, sudden flush covered her face and neck. No one ended her sentence for her; no one dared to put the silent feeling into words—on that subject there had been no spoken words since many months had passed.

Yet as we sat silent, trying still to work, the one unspoken feeling that possessed us all seemed like a silent presence in the room with us. How long a time, nearly a year now, had passed, since wandering footsteps had gained new meanings, since the sight of vagrants dimly seen in the night-time could make our hearts beat faster as with unspoken hope! For some day, in some such way, it had seemed to us that we must see or hear of her again. That—anything—would be better than the deadness of blackness into which, for so many months, her life had passed—like death, worse than death, without one word to tell of her since nearly a year had gone. Our Christmas preparations had recalled these things, our fancies for the New Year had turned first to these, and now the Christmas and New Year were close upon us, and the wanderer had not returned as yet. And, stranger still, the thought of her, though always with us, had grown dim and faint with time; the sharper edge of shame and trouble had gone, we had bent ourselves to our altered life, and the once well-known form was like a phantom now. Looking at Kittie's drooping head, I could see that she was thinking earnestly, whilst the light shone on her fair hair and the dark blue velvet her fingers held, but her thoughts had evidently slipped away to other subjects now. For other hopes had risen for her, for us, not allowed indeed to us in our disgrace—and yet—yet—seeming possible, now the New Year was so close. We were all silent and thought with her.

But now, all at once, strange sounds could be heard in the distance, voices, exclamations—the distant kitchen was the scene of some commotion. My father raised his head in an irritated way, perhaps he thought the mistletoe that was to be put up that evening was in some way to blame; my mother stirred on the sofa where she lay, and I, whose charge she was, bent over her at once. And now came hasty steps towards the door; it burst open, and old Jean, our oldest servant, broke in on us and spoke.

"Oh, ma'am, ma'am, Miss Mary's come."

We all started to our feet, my father and Jem with newspaper and book; I with my sewing in my hand; even my mother raised herself a little as she lay. We stood blank, panting, without a word, without looking at each other, till, perhaps, a minute had gone. Last year we had all so started up when the news came suddenly in on us that the Christmas pudding was spoilt—but it was a very different feeling now.

"Mary?" said Anna, with a sort of sob, and no one else could speak.

"She come in," said Jean, "she tapped at the door; and then she come right in, and sit down in a chair, wi'out a word. And she haven't move nor spoke—not a word have she. Into the kitchen she came——" And stopping here, she wiped her eyes.

Into the kitchen! A long, deep breathing, like a sob, went round us all. So it was like that, in that manner, she chose to return to her father's house. Ah, doubtless she was afraid to come into the parlour and face us all! The thought of the difference, of our altered home, of these strange tidings, seemed to thrust and pierce, sinking deep into our hearts. We all stood silent.

"Mary—Mary," said mother, in a little laughing way.

"Where—oh, do tell me where she is?" faltered Anna, so shy always to speak her feelings, though she was the eldest of us all.

"She haven't move, nor spoke, Miss Mary haven't," Jean replied. "She just sit there, in that chair by the kitchen door, with her bonnet a-dropping off her head—such an old bonnet!" And she wiped her eyes again. We looked at each other now.

"Don't you think—some one ought to go?" Anna faltered once more, looking towards my eyes, as if to find her counsel there. We all looked downwards then, but no one moved or stirred.

Oh, we had prayed for this thing, we had longed for it; we had not dared to hope that anything so good might yet be given. It had been our one hopeless, desperate Christmas prayer, that God, in His infinite mercy, might permit this weight to be lifted from off our hearts at last; and now that it was so, we stood motionless. What was the matter with us that we could not stir hand or foot to meet her? It was as if a spell was upon us. I raised my eyes, so did Kittie, and our glances met. Something else, I think, rose in the hearts of both of us at that moment —something of some one very near to her, who would be coming to-morrow, not knowing of this change that had come already to us all. For one instant that thought must have struggled in her mind, and then she raised her head suddenly as she moved.

"I don't care," she said, in her sudden, decided way; "I will go to her. Poor Mary! Where is she? Let me go!" And out of the room she ran.

Jean followed her, and the rest of us were left alone together again. What did that matter? One of us had gone to welcome the wanderer at last.

There was an instant's silence, whilst we strained our ears, though from the distant stillness no faintest sound of that welcome could be heard. Mary come back! The shock of it was still too much for us. Come back to us—to the kitchen—as one of old-time to the "hired servants." . . . I could not get it straight in my head at all. But now mother, a little excited at first, had fallen from her comprehension into the babbling state in which she would talk to herself at times, and I bent over her to soothe her if I could. Then Grace spoke, in her little precise manner. There was no fear that our poor invalid would understand her now!

"I should think," she said, "that Mary will be very sorry when she hears how ill mother has become through her."

And I turned my head to answer, though the words seemed to come suddenly, against my will, and almost against my wish.

"I don't know. She never seemed to me to care much for anything or anybody but herself."

Jem turned now, and his eyes met mine, his slow glance seeming to speak instead of words: "It is not right of you, Susan, to talk like that." Perhaps it was the growing tumult in myself that spoke for him. His eyes seemed to question; they all seemed to wait for me—for me who, although I had been always considered so dark, and reserved, and silent, and unlike the rest, had yet, ever since that terrible time, nearly a year ago—when I had given up my love, and hope, and all my work and plans, that I might wait day and night by one couch, and bear the wanderings of one imbecile mind for my only society—been looked on with some silent wonder by the others as some strange sort of living virtue actually present in the house. No one but myself could tell how hard to bear the days, the nights, of those months had been; how under that terrible strain it had sometimes seemed to me as if my health and life itself must sink; how that only the family love and admiration, given at last to me, had been able to keep me to my work. And now as in some tumult of reaction I sat silent, separated from them all again, not able to be dishonest, not able to pretend to be good and tender, and to put out my arms towards the sister from whom our misery came—the beautiful, proud sister who would not make renunciation, but had clung to her hope in defiance of our counsel, had rejected with pride our advice and tenderness, and had wandered away into darkness from us all. And still, though I felt in myself a difference from the others, I knew that the same feeling which restrained me held them back as well.

But now Anna rose, trembling very much, and with that quick consumptive flush, that last year had brought, coming and going over face and neck. Poor Anna, who, though she was pretty, and the eldest, was always too shy to speak.

"I think—we ought to go," she said, almost crying. "She must want—Mary—she must want so much to see us all. Won't you come, Susan?"

But I did not move. She stood irresolute, looking still at me, then turned and went. Another of us gone; the rest were motionless, but there seemed some relief in that.

"I don't want to see her; I can't bear to see her," cried Grace into the silence in a sort of passionate way. Father turned his head, and looked silently at her.

"I don't want to touch her," said I in a very low voice, and, turning his head again, he looked silently also at me. Then, all at once, Jem leant his head against the mantelpiece, and sobbed. He had never done such a thing before, and we were all frightened into quietness for a moment. Mother began to talk to herself, and that checked him, as astonished at himself, I think, as we were at him. I was on my knees by the sofa; father sat in his chair; the two others stood in their different parts of the room, and we were silent. Mary come back! Come in the gloaming, as Kilmeny, only not as Kilmeny came! It was not to be understood as yet.

And I remember still how that, in that pause, it passed through my mind to wonder how the bonnets could ever be done, or the decorations put up to-night.

Now came footsteps again, and Kittie came in, and sat down at once on the nearest chair, leaning her arms on the back, and her head upon them, and crying very much. Through broken crying we got her words. Mary would not move, speak; she looked so strange, so old. Oh, it seemed so sad! and then she cried again. For one moment Jem stood with his head against the mantelpiece; and then he raised it, with his face red all over, and turned to us, to Grace most, who stood scornful by Kittie's chair.

"I want to go to her," he said.

"What do you want to do?"

"I want to kiss her."

No more words. He went, shuffling slowly and awkwardly, as he was used to do. But as he passed me where I knelt, a sudden longing came up over me to rise and follow. I started up, and then, all at once, I fell down into the nearest chair, as if all impulse to move was gone. I stared out into the darkness, through which the snow fell. Oh, I could not bear to see her yet! And still the thought that his arms would soon be round her was in my heart, but only in a kind of dull cold way—a terrible sense of shrinking left me no power to stir. Kittie had gone out once more, and we were silent again.

"I don't care," cried Grace, with her little delicate, precise manner, that was so like her features, quite absorbed into passionateness; "I don't want to see her; we can't be glad of her now. She was the best of all, so they all said, and we were always ready to give up everything for her, and she pretended to be so quiet and sweet, and then she went and stole away from us like this. I say she's a hypocrite, and she has only come to us because she can't help herself; and I don't want to see her, and—and, oh, draw the blind! Poor Mary must have been so cold in the snow." And she sat down and cried, and a long while passed.

A sudden noise of footsteps, that all at once seemed to make our blood stop, and then sent our pulses throbbing in our throats, and our hearts thumping against our sides. We all strained our ears to hear. They were coming towards us. My head tingled, and my hands turned cold. I longed to get up and hide myself, and yet I could not. No, the footsteps had passed; they were gone.

Mother raised her head then, and as I bent towards her to soothe her, she looked at me in a sort of frightened way.

"Don't—don't stop me," she said.

"Do you know what has happened then?"

"Yes—Mary come."

She turned round, and hid her face in the sofa-cushion. I was so startled that I could not move; then she raised it, and spoke querulously, and yet in more of her old manner than she had ever spoken since that one terrible month had passed.

"She will want so many things," she said. "The fire lighted, and—and everything else, and I can't remember now. I should like to go upstairs and see that it is all quite ready for her." And she looked helplessly at me.

Grace had been sitting bent together, with her little delicate fingers clasped over her face; but she raised her head with decision now.

"I will come with you, mother," she said.

And she moved to the sofa. I could have found it in my heart to cry out, to entreat them not to go and leave me alone; but I could only sit and stare stupidly at the snow as I had done before. Mother got down off the sofa, clinging helplessly to my youngest sister, as she was used to cling to me. They went out, and were gone.

Slow minutes passed; the clock ticked; my father sat crouched in his chair, and I in mine. We neither moved nor spoke. I was conscious of nothing but my own conflict, and was scarcely sensible even of his presence.

Oh, was it not terrible? Now, at this moment, when every best feeling that was in me should have come uppermost at once, to fail so strangely; to be so bad when all that year I had been trying so hard for the life of self-denial that should make all things easy to me! I had been so separated once from the others, and she had caused it, and she had laughed at me always for being so unlike the rest, and I did not want to see her now in her humiliation, or to touch or kiss her until I could feel that such touch meant a whole forgiveness from me. And yet all the while that I sat still and silent, I felt almost heart-broken with shame, so bad, so alone in my badness, so unable to think and pray. . . . I could not bear it at last. But, as I raised my eyes with a sort of despairing movement, I saw that those of my companion were bent on me, and, in that instant, I was sure that I was not struggling alone.

He had drawn his thick grizzled eyebrows together, the grey eyes beneath looked steadily at me. His face was hard and stern enough, but his voice was very soft and quiet when at last he spoke.

"Lass, will you shut the door?"

It was not a name by which he was accustomed to call me, or any of us—a remnant, perhaps, to him of long past times—it seemed natural then. I got up and shut the door, slipping the bolt too, and then sat down again, with my elbows on my knees, and my head between my hands, looking towards him. So our eyes met, and then they dropped, and we looked down on the ground, and said no more. A long time seemed to pass. We had each our work to do, and had no words to say.

He raised his head at last. I remember his manner, something like that, I fancy, in which a captive might announce to his fellows the possible escape that he had found. Yet his words came slowly, and gravely too.

"I've been thinking—thinking," he said.

He looked then at me, as if to see if I too had some help to give, but I could only raise a face that I could feel was pale, and look silently at him. He went on in broken words, though I could catch the meaning as he spoke.

"I've been thinking," he said, "that if one of His sisters . . . . for He might have had sisters, you know. . . . ."

There was a pause.

"They said something like it ('here with us,' you remember, perhaps?) I've been thinking then that if a sister of His, a daughter of His mother, had been away from home and had come back through the night and the snow, perhaps——" and here he stopped.

"I'm thinking that He wouldn't have sat all away by Himself, and let the others go to meet her. It would have been His step out of all of them she would have heard the first. He wouldn't have told her He forgave her. There would have been no need for that when she felt that His arms were round her."

A pause.

"We must try to be better Christians, Sue."

"It's very hard," I muttered, for all reply. I had spoken rebelliously, but his face had a curious tenderness as he looked at me.

"I've not paid enough heed to thee, maybe, my lass," he said. "So taken with your mother of late, and never quite like the rest. I'm thinking of what they used to say of me, 'A good one to work, but a bad one to forgive.' That's true of more than me. I should like to have been more help to thee, my girl."

And then suddenly, as if broken by his tenderness, something hard and cold that had been in my heart through all my life seemed to snap at once, and I rose from my chair, and fell upon his neck. "I will be good," I cried, and I clung to him and sobbed.

"We'll pray, Sue," he said, putting me tenderly down from his breast at last, and we knelt together.

Hand in hand we went upstairs when our prayer was done. At the door of the spare bedroom we paused, I remember still the light under it, and the sound of voices. We opened it, and went in.

I remember that sight now. The room was warm and bright, they were all standing about it, she was in an armchair by the fire. Worn, changed, stricken, her face like that of an older woman, with a strange, silent look upon it, yet with the beautiful blue eyes beneath the brown, dark hair as of old. For one instant I saw, but for no longer. For she was in my arms, and I was devouring her with kisses, her hair, her lips, her cheeks—I had never in all my life felt the impulse to such passionate embracing. I think she was surprised, for a little cry escaped her lips—she had not uttered a sound before—and then as I loosed her I saw she was looking past me to where my father stood.

He came slowly up to her and got hold of her hands, whilst we all stood silent round. For one instant, one breathless pause, their eyes met, and then he spoke.

"It's a good thing, Mary, you have got back in time for the Christmas dinner," he said.

Oh, what a trivial sentence for that instant of reconciliation! And yet somehow the word gave a sort of warm feeling to us all. And as we stood silent, looking at those two on whom the light of the fire was shining, some other thoughts rose vaguely in our hearts—thoughts of another Feast that we could hope for now, and of a far away Land where the members of a family may be glad to meet again and have no broken links to count at last. For ah! in all families there is so much to forgive before we may join in that country where all troubles can be forgotten.

But now Mary roused herself. All the while since she had come silently in through the kitchen door—through all the welcome that the rest had given, she had found no word to say, the strange silent look had been in her eyes as if in some painful dream she was enduring all. Now she raised herself a little, still looking hard at my father who held her hands, whilst a colour with a sharp edge rose in her face; her voice was quiet when she spoke, altered, but still the same, and she turned her head slightly towards us for an instant.

"Send them all away," she said; "I want to speak alone with you."

So out we all trooped, into Kittie's room, whose turn it was to have a fire that night, and there whispered and huddled together—all but Jem, who turned his face to the wall in the corner and cried—until father's voice summoned us to the side of our sister again.

But I think that of that story which had been told to him we never heard the whole, though something we all heard afterwards of the terrible rapidity with which the awakening had come—of the agony with which she felt herself deceived, deserted—of her painful wanderings, and long and sore distress—and of the night on which, in a death-struggle with her pride, she made up her mind to return to her home once more—that was enough for us.

We had our Christmas communion with our mother, in our home, and the other feasting too, afterwards, though we had not much heart for that—and we stayed within doors all that day; and the bells chimed with a distant sound over the snow that I can remember now, and a sacred, silent sort of Christmas feeling seemed to possess us all. I think it has dwelt always through all our lives with us, that Christmas day.

Many years have passed since its sun has set, and we are all scattered, and have but little share in each other's lives and feelings now. And Mary is happy as she never thought to be again; and, of the rest of us, some have died and some are married, and we are far distant from each other. But for me at least that evening of which I have spoken has had power through all my life, a sort of life of its own that no after living could destroy. Many years indeed have passed, and strange things have happened, and I am even far from my own country as I write. But that evening keeps its place in my heart, in spite of that, and as I lie now, in the distant country, alone and dreaming, with my baby by my side, the sound of the Christmas Eve bells across the snow is mingled with the echoes of a long-past evening—the silent family is still gathered near the fire, the snow is still falling through the increasing darkness, and Mary comes home through the twilight.

M. A. COURTOIS.

LETTER MISSIONS.

AMONG the many philanthropic efforts of this our wonderful age, letters have played a prominent part. We all know the effect of a letter, and how its contents can make one joyous or sorrowful, pleased or annoyed. Thoughtful letters are the intercommunion of soul with soul, and those written especially for the spiritual good of the receiver, are frequently wonderfully blessed, both to writer and reader. They are often more powerful than speech, inasmuch as they may be pondered over in solitude, and so have the effect of staying the hand from evil deed, or the heart from unholy communication. Naturally, letters written by hand, are more warmly welcomed than printed ones, and we will glance at them first.

Let us imagine, if we can, all the prisoners in all the prisons of Great Britain and Ireland, of many foreign countries, and of portions of America, and endeavour to realize their feelings on receiving a friendly letter on Christmas morning. Tens of thousands of such letters are written by ladies all over the country, and illuminated either by drawing or coloured scrap of fruit or flower. They are essentially bright to look at, and hopeful to read. Let us picture to ourselves the solitary inmates of prison cells receiving this tender remembrance from the hand of chaplain or warder, and watch the gleam of pleasure on their callous or sad faces. The birth of a Saviour becomes a reality, for none but His followers would have thought of the felon or the outcast. And it proves a reality, since the letters help to bring claimants for work to the great steam-laundries, and penitents to the Conference Hall. Mrs. Meredith's work bears fruit, not only among the children of Addlestone, the prison women in Clapham-road, and the invitations at the prison gates; but in the solitary cell where no eye but God's sees the tear fall on this Christmas letter of hope and love. Testimonies of the good thus wrought come now and again to cheer the workers, not only from our own country, but from abroad; and prove that even the criminal classes are alive to the charity which "Blesseth him that gives, and him that takes."

All great works spring from small beginnings, many probably originate at our own doorstep; indeed, we need never stray far to find our vocation. These letters to prisoners are written by ladies in their own homes, and sent by hundreds at a time to the "sorting house" in Clapham-road. Hence they are dispatched on their service, both domestic and foreign; for numbers are in strange tongues.

In the same way, The Theatrical Mission employs many hundred pairs of willing hands to write to members of the profession it seeks to benefit. This, also, is home work, and from it springs an interchange of thought, which, almost mesmerically, moves from heart to heart. Any one who has visited Macready House, and seen a portion of the seven thousand members of the institute, rejoicing in the haven provided for them, between rehearsal and play, will readily learn what these letters have accomplished. They inaugurated the mission, and the young employées of the ballet, chorus, or pantomime, have to thank their kind correspondents for good advice and often for timely help. It is touching to hear the anxious enquiries of the young people, for their own particular "lady," and to see their joy if she actually "turns up" in person. It does not seem a great work to write a monthly letter to a woman or child engaged from week to week—sometimes for the best part of a life—in fantastic performances for the amusement of others, yet it is often the means of kindling the fire of holiness in the breast, where, otherwise, it might have died out. Wandering from floor to floor of the huge building in Henrietta-street, Covent-garden, dedicated to those who tread the "mimic stage," we are amazed to see the results of a movement begun by letters. Not only in London, but in all the provincial towns, this tide of correspondence flows after the young actors and actresses, and brings with it the argosies of Christian love. Mr. Courthorpe Todd, the originator, can no longer curb the ever widening waves of this, his remarkable work, which now bear with them the blessed truths of the Gospel to strange and varied strands.

And what shall we say of Miss Skinner's "Friendly Letter Mission?" This is a volume in itself. "These Seven Years" is the title of her book but lately published, which gives an account how she began by one letter, written in a country parsonage, and has continued, until it it has swelled to thirty, addressed, literally to "all estates and conditions of men." Of course these are printed, since they do not, as in the previous instances, profess to be from one individual to another, but from one to a multitude. They have opened public-houses large and small, to the reception of texts, books, and even preachers and teachers. They have been welcomed at railways, cabstands, stables, prisons, markets, lodging-houses, laundries, factories, collieries, and other great centres of amalgamated labour. As they are addressed to individuals of every class, and especially designed to help each member of that class, their effect cannot be overestimated; for they touch and vibrate on chords that often thrill through the frame and reach the heart. They have gone forth to medical men, nurses, and invalids; to merchants and warehousemen; to young ladies, and labourers' wives; to young women at counter or bar, and those in mill or factory; to shepherds and donkey-boys; to gamekeepers, and grooms; to organists, printers, and grocers; to missionaries, and all who labour for the Lord; in fine, to Jews and Gentiles. These letters have been reprinted in French, Breton, German, Italian, Swedish, Danish, Bohemian and Arabic, and it is contemplated to publish them in Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch, and the Indian and other Oriental languages. That they have been asked for, again and again, proves their usefulness. Truly "a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump."

Les Lettres Amicales drew forth a petition for one in French to soldiers, priests, and printers of impure literature. It was answered in the two first instances by one written and translated, Aux Soldats, and Aux membres du clergé catholique.

Who shall calculate the good done to immortal souls by these letters? Each one is so written as to arrest attention without the use of what people choose to call cant. The reader must take it home, for it is a personal appeal, albeit indited by a stranger. And when we think that these earnest missives are circulated far and near, at home and abroad, and have reached the individuals for whom they were originally imagined; when we think that they have emanated from one brain and heart, and been inspired by the hope of winning souls for Christ's eternal kingdom—we can only praise God for His gifts of writing and printing. Miss Skinner would be glad of help, and from her present residence, 5 St. James'-square, Bath, would furnish specimens of her "Friendly Letters" or lists of them to any person interested.

Bath is a notable place; not only for its warm springs, but for many other emanations from beneficent centres. Amongst them we may class other letters; for Miss Weston was, we believe, native of that far-famed city. Everybody knows her, by name at least, and her life-long work for the sailors. The Sailors' Rests at Plymouth and Devonport testify of her; to say nothing of all the societies she has founded with the prefix, "Royal Naval," The Christian Union, Temperance, Help one Another, and Purity. All sailors know Agnes Weston, and again we say, what hath God wrought through the instrumentality of one earnest follower of our Lord Jesus Christ? Let scoffers scoff, but the results of Letter Missions alone would suffice to overthrow their untenable theories. Miss Weston's Blue Backs, or monthly letters to sailors, should at least convince the sceptic of the power of the Gospel. When we hear of 270,000 distributed in three months to the dwellers on the seas in every quarter of the globe, and know that they are looked for with unspeakable anxiety by members to whom they are sent, we are amazed and thankful. Not only the sailors, but the soldiers crave for these messages of love and peace, and the Bluejackets distribute them to the Redcoats. In the Soudan, a sailor who died in action, had them in his pocket, soaked with his life-blood, and the soldiers were said to be "wild to get them, because a brave man's papers must be worth having." Thus by sea and land, on the battle-field, and in the tempest, in life and death, earnest words of faith in God will cheer and encourage, when other words fall unheeded on the ear or heart.

Some seventeen years ago Miss E. S. Elliott began her letter mission. She conceived the plan of placing a Christmas letter on the pillow of every inmate of hospital, infirmary, or work-house, and her idea has gradually developed into an organised system. Not only in Great Britain but in the colonies, and many European countries, thousands of sufferers are greeted on Christmas morning by friendly letter and illuminated text, addressed to each, individually, and telling of the Saviour born, as on that day for them. These letters are now written in many languages, and the work is carried on by over a hundred secretaries, scattered throughout the world. Who shall paint the effect of such a mission on the soul of the lonely patient, tossing on a bed of pain? "A letter for me! A Saviour for me!" Blessed and often unexpected announcement.

In like manner a letter mission exists in connection with the police force, and much valuable correspondence on religious topics is carried on in all parts of the country. Christmas letters and cards are, almost universally circulated, and many a man on his lonely beat is cheered by good Christian wishes. "We may be sure too that Miss Robinson does not forget her soldiers, and that helpful letters circulate among them, both at home and abroad.

The examples already quoted are tolerably well known to the public; but how many letter missions there are of which the world knows nothing, or at best but little! Among these is the one to asylums. A writer selects a patient whose poor brain is just clear enough to receive ideas, and sends a letter containing, perhaps, a card or slight remembrance. We are acquainted with one, herself an invalid, who thus strives to interest the mentally-afflicted. The pleasure afforded is often far beyond the anticipations of the writer, and the good work is within the sphere of many who would gladly do "some quiet thing." So is that of seeking out some lonely missionary and his wife, and keeping them informed of home news either by letter, magazine, or paper. All have not friends capable of this, and many a weary labourer in the Lord's vineyard, or solitary emigrant in far distant lands, may be cheered by the regular arrival of kind words, whether written or printed. No one need say, "I have nothing to do," or roam far afield in search of occupation. All who can write, and who have brotherly love in their hearts, can find occupation for a leisure hour resulting in good to their fellow creatures.

The letters of Sunday school teachers to their pupils are often invaluable, and tend to keep the love of God alive in the soul, when service or the world would fain extinguish it. So are those from associates of the numberless societies for helping young girls written to their members. We have one before us from the secretary of a branch of the Y.W.C.A. so tender and thoughtful, that her Bible class is never empty. Let every one, whether man or woman, choose some brother or sister less fortunate than himself, and encourage them in the path of duty.

What shall we say of the letters of those Christians placed, by themselves, into the hands of outcasts who would seem almost without the pale of Christianity? They contain invitations to a meal, or to some friendly gathering, where their writers are ready to welcome the poor sinner and to point the way to repentance; and where refuge is offered to all who will accept it, and by means of which, many a lost sheep has been brought back to Christ's fold. Truly a few strokes of the pen may be powerful for good or evil.

We may almost class the texts that accompany the nosegays of the Flower Mission among the letters, for they spring from the written word, and are transcribed by loving fingers. Indeed each may be called a letter from God to man, and together with the sweet influence of the flowers, they touch the heart when spoken words might fail to influence. We have seen the receivers ponder over them and heard them say, "That suits me—that was just written for me," proof that "all Scripture is written by inspiration of God." And surely He will inspire our thoughts and words, whether for the aid of convict brother or fallen sister, if we humbly pray for the direction of His Holy Spirit.

A. B.

THE REVOLUTION OF 1688.

ON ITS RELIGIOUS SIDE.

V.

JAMES hoped by the Declaration of Indulgence to win the support of the Protestant dissenters while he pursued his design of catholicising the Church of England. He was not wholly unsuccessful. Some, blind to the national interests, presented addresses of thanks which were immediately trumpeted forth in the Gazette. But those who intelligently considered the matter, refused to be thus duped, seeing clearly that the Church of England was a bulwark against popery, and that if it went, their own ruin would be rapid and certain. And of this the king proceeded to give some startling illustrations.

For refusing to admit a Benedictine monk to the degree of Master of Arts, the vice-chancellor and senate of the University of Cambridge were summoned before the High Commission, and the former deprived of his office.

Oxford had long been the sacred city of monarchy, but now it seemed as if James was bent on forcing the university into open rebellion.

In March, 1687, the President of Magdalene College died. The king recommended a man of notoriously shameful life, one Farmer, who had been a clergyman, then a dissenter, and was now a Romanist. The Fellows refused to accept him, and chose one of their own number named Hough. They were cited before the High Commission, treated with the utmost contumely, and the election declared void. Nothing more, however, was said about Farmer, but a royal mandate came recommending Parker, the Bishop of Oxford. The Fellows begged to be excused, and declared Hough duly and legally elected.

During the summer James came to Oxford. He sent for the Fellows of Magdalene and severely upbraided them with their disloyalty, threatening them with his vengeance if they did not admit his nominee. They refused, and a special commission was appointed, but Hough protested against all its proceedings as illegal, and announced his intention of appealing to the Courts at Westminster. The Chief Justice said, "I will see whether the civil power cannot manage you. If that is not enough, you shall have the military."

The Fellows were expelled from the college, deprived of their livings, pronounced incapable of holding any ecclesiastical preferment, and, such as were not yet in holy orders, of ever becoming clergymen.

In a few weeks Parker was carried to an obscure grave in Magdalene chapel. The students, all refusing to obey the new authorities, were expelled, and Magdalene College was turned into a Roman Catholic seminary, the Roman Catholic bishop of Madura being appointed President. Twelve Roman Catholic fellows were then admitted, and the Roman Catholic service performed in the chapel.

The terror and dismay which now spread through the Church of England may be imagined. There was no college or church institution in the land but what in a few weeks might be Romanised, and in the hands of Romish priests. There was no bishop or dean, prebendary or canon, rector or vicar, who might not find himself in the meshes of the High Commission, and see himself ejected from his living, and his wife and children reduced to poverty; and, what was still worse, these things, if successful, betokened the ruin of the work of the Reformation, the Jesuitising of England, and the destruction of all its civil as well as religious liberty.

In April, 1688, James re-affirmed his Indulgence, reciting all its provisions, and ordered it to be read in all the churches in England on two successive Sundays: in London on the 20th and 27th of May, in other parts of England on the 3rd and 10th of June.

The London clergy met to consider what they should do. The general feeling was in favour of submission. When speaking out, Dr. Edward Fowler, vicar of St. Giles', Cripplegate, said, "I cannot be bound by the vote of the majority; I shall be sorry to cause a breach of unity. But this Declaration I cannot in conscience read. Tillotson, Patrick, Sherlock, and Stillingfleet having declared themselves of the same mind, all present pledged themselves not to read the Declaration on the days appointed.

On the 18th of May a decisive meeting was held at Lambeth, attended by the bishops in town, and the leading members of the London clergy. Prayers were read, and if the service included the lessons for the day, nothing could be more appropriate, the chapter from the Old Testament describing a state of things analogous to that in which the Church of England found itself, with an all-conquering, ruthless enemy at its gates, summoning it to surrender, and that, after a fashion that should bring it into contempt with the people of the land. "This day is a day of trouble, of rebuke and blasphemy," but, as in the old time, the lesson encouraged them to believe that God would now appear for the preservation of England, drive the enemies of its religion and its liberty from the land, and utterly overthrow them and their designs. The result of the deliberation, was that Sancroft drew up a petition to the king, in which, after disclaiming all disloyalty or intolerance, the bishops stated that parliament having pronounced against the dispensing power the declaration was illegal, and that, therefore, they could not in conscience be parties to its publication. It was signed by the archbishop, and the six bishops present, and immediately taken to Whitehall.

It was after ten o'clock when the bishops were admitted into the royal closet. They dropped on their knees and presented their petition. The king read it and looked thunders. "This," said he, "is a standard of rebellion! I tell you this is a standard of rebellion," he repeated again and again. "I will have my declaration published." "We honour your Majesty," said Bishop Ken, who, all through, spoke in a manner worthy of the occasion, "but we fear God." "Have I deserved this?" replied the king, "I, who have been such a friend to your church! You are trumpeters of sedition. Go to your dioceses and see that I am obeyed. I will keep this paper. I will remember you that have signed it." "God's will be done," said Ken, and after a few more passionate reproaches from the king, the bishops withdrew. That very evening, the document was all over London—no one knew how—printed and lying in every coffee-house. The printer, it was said, cleared a thousand pounds by his penny broadsheet.

It was Friday night when the bishops were with the king, on Sunday morning the crisis came. The Church of England had reached the Rubicon, would it cross it, or would it not? "Hear, O, Israel, thou art to pass over Jordan this day," said the evening lesson, which, with all the others, consisted in a call to the English clergy and the English people to remember all the way the Lord had led them from the Reformation onwards, and at this great crisis in their history, not to be feeble, but to play the man for England, as their forefathers and especially those noble martyrs, for the very cause now in danger, Latimer, Ridley and Hooper, had done.

In only four churches out of a hundred in London and Westminster, was the declaration read. The king vacillated between receding from his position or citing the bishops before the High Commission, and depriving them of their sees. Finally, by the advice of Jeffreys, he took a middle course, and determined to indict them in the Court of King's Bench for publishing a seditious libel.

ARCHBISHOP SANCROFT.

From a Drawing by Loggan in Lambeth Palace Library.]

Sunday, the 3rd of June came, and the churches throughout the country followed the example of London. Not one clergyman in fifty obeyed the king. On the 8th, the bishops were summoned before the Council, and refusing to enter into recognisances to answer in the Court of King's Bench the charge of seditious libel, they were at once committed to prison and conveyed to the Tower.

On that eventful June evening the Thames was covered with wherries and the neighbourhood filled with anxious crowds. Immediately the bishops appeared the people fell on their knees and asked their blessing. All the way down the river they were cheered as they passed on to prison through two lines of boats filled with sympathisers. Directly they arrived at the Tower they went to the chapel. It was the time of evening service, and both Macaulay and Lingard mention the appropriateness of the second lesson, which must have been encouraging and consoling to the seven venerable prisoners: "In all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments."

On Sunday, the 10th, an event happened which brought the struggle to a climax, and destroyed all hope of a peaceable settlement. The Protestant religion, or the favourite doctrine of passive obedience, one or the other, would have to be given up. A Prince of Wales was born, and under circumstances that caused the whole world to cry out that it was a fraud. The whole world was wrong, but there was much to justify the impression, and both the event and the doubt precipitated the revolution.

The trial was ordered for the 29th, but the bishops were liberated on the 15th on their recognisances, the question having been settled against them by the judges. During the fortnight which elapsed between these dates, the flame spread from one end of Britain to the other. The Scotch Presbyterians sent up messages of sympathy, and the Cornish miners threatened to march up to London in their thousands, while throughout the country a vague hope prevailed that "England's darling, King Monmouth," would appear and lead the people to the final rout of the popish monarch and the Jesuits.

The government was alarmed, but James said, "I will go on—I have been too indulgent. Indulgence has only ruined my father."

On the day appointed, this famous trial began. Four judges presided, one a Catholic, who sat on the bench in defiance of what the best lawyers said was law. The jury consisted of persons in high position, one, however, was brewer to the king. They spent a whole night in considering their verdict; nine were for acquittal, three for conviction. Two gave way, but the brewer persisted to hold out. "If I say Not Guilty, I shall never brew more for the king; if I say Guilty, I shall brew for no one else." Such was his dilemma, it is not surprising that he decided for the many throats against the one. But the falling away of such supporters precurse the end of a despotism.

At the words "Not Guilty" cries of joy arose from almost every one in the Court, the news spreading immediately to the ten thousand persons assembled in Westminster Hall, whose roar of delight taken up by still greater crowds without rolled along, ever gaining volume, from Westminster to Charing Cross and through the Strand to Temple Bar. Meanwhile a series of explosions on the river conveyed the good news to the city, and to the fleets of vessels which lay in the pool. But what was stranger than the shouting, was the weeping; the heart of the people seemed as if it would burst for joy.

R. HEATH.

OLD GWEN.

CHAPTER VII.—REMORSE.

THERE was much scouring and cleaning up at Careg Cennin against Whitsuntide. Old Gwen was at home, and the prospect of a visit from Gwenny, and Toom bach, roused the spirits of the ever-drooping Tisha. She even sat in her bee-hive chair, near her beloved corner cupboard, and regularly cleaned it and all its contents. Since her change of abode, she had certainly been better and had not taken to her bed again, as old Gwen had feared she would. But neither time nor change had cured her of her perpetual plaint after her lost husband. She at least had a constant soul. Her children were beginning to forget as children will; but their memories were continually being freshened and a sense of shame instilled into their minds, by their mother's frequent repetition of "There's unfeeling you are!" the one phrase that seemed to soothe her irritable temperament.

The occasional visits of Mr. Milbank were also a pleasure and an honour to her; indeed the family party generally began to look upon him as a sort of fairy godfather, and to feel elated at being selected for the benefits of so fine a gentleman. He came and went like a meteor, and even old Gwen was conquered by his persistent kindness. Still she, like Mrs. Bowen, was afraid it concealed a liking for Gwenny. He had offered to adopt and educate Shonny, and his proposal was under consideration when Whitsuntide came on.

"We will have a family consultation," said old Gwen; "Toom bach will be here Whit-Monday, and Laban and the rest will be sure to drop in. It 'ould be a proud day for them to live to see our Shonny a parson."

Young Gwen arrived late on Saturday. Mrs. Bowen was going on a visit to friends, and had given her nearly three whole days, shutting up the house meanwhile. None of these good people would have travelled on Sunday; they respected the Lord's day, as a day of rest for man and beast, and rested, according to the commandment. Uncle Laban would as much have thought of working himself as of letting his little mare, Nanno, work. She had a happy time of it on Sunday, and began work again on Monday, all the better for the "Sabbath of rest." It was a blessed institution of the Divine Lawgiver, and was never intended, as some affirm, to be a day of pleasure and amusement. To be sure our simple and wise-hearted friends found their pleasure in worship and pious exercises, both at home and abroad, and, as Old Gwen affirmed, "This has promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come."

Young Gwen's repressed spirits burst forth when she came home, and she was soon her old managing self again. That eve of Whit-Sunday was a happy time, and Mamgu contemplated her family with satisfaction. Shonny was in high spirits, because he looked forward to a harvest of sixpences and shillings on Whit-Monday, which was sure to bring excursionists to the castle, and even Tisha was not indifferent to the influx of visitors to the farm, who would be sure to want tea and other delicacies.

Sunday was spent by them all in church or chapel, school, or class,—all save Tisha; for whose benefit Uncle Laban improvised a little evening meeting, which was attended by all the neighbours, so that the parlour was full to overflowing.

"If only father was here," murmured Tisha.

"He is with us in spirit," said old Gwen.

The day was all too short, and Gwenny sighed when it came to an end, and bethought herself of Whitsun Tuesday, when she must return to her place, Mrs. Bowen, and submission.

Toom bach arrived early on Whit Monday, and was much admired, not only by his own family but the neighbours, who, like the rest of the world, the female portion of it especially, were enslaved by a scarlet uniform.

The expectations of a harvest were not disappointed. It was a fine day, and Dorcas and Shonny were overpowered by the number of excursionists who came to see the castle. Many of these either brought their own provisions or went "to town" for them; but a goodly number invaded the farm. Here the two Gwens, assisted by David and much impeded by Snap, made tea, cut bread-and-butter, and baked plank bread and crumpets in the kitchen; while Tisha superintended them in the parlour.

"There's nice mother looks," said David to Gwenny. "She can lift the big teapot and pour out tea quite easy now."

Almost while he was speaking, Mr. Milbank came in, accompanied by Toom. He greeted Gwenny and her grandmother kindly and asked for some tea, saying he would have it in the kitchen.

"You must wait upon me, Gwenny, just as you do at Mrs. Bowen's," he said, with a voice from which all cheer was gone.

She did so, and when he was seated at the table, she gave him of her best and hottest. Toom stood at a distance watching him, and finally came forward with the following question:

"I ask your pardon, sir, but was you fishing up the Towy the year of——"

Toom paused and then named the date and year of the murder: for he, like the rest, hesitated to pronounce that fearful word. Then he added:

"I seem to remember your face, sir, and that you borrowed poor father's coracle."

"You must mistake me for another. I have been many years in the colonies," replied Mr. Milbank, rising and leaving the kitchen with a promise to return later on.

"That's odd. I could 'a sworn he was the same," mused Toom.

Castle and farm were almost clear of excursionists when Shonny came in, pale and breathless with excitement.

"Toom! David! come along quick. Somebody has tumbled down from the top of the castle. I saw him fall, and he just missed the rock. I'm afraid to go to him by myself."

Out rushed all the young people. Dorcas met them with a similar tale to Shonny's. Old Gwen followed as quickly as she could. Shonny led the way, and they soon saw a black heap lying between the outer wall of the castle and the low, broken fence that scarcely separated it from the rock, of which it seemed to form a part. The ledge was so narrow that no one ever ventured upon it, and the prostrate form—for it was a man—appeared to be lying on his face, partly on the ledge, and partly over the low, broken wall. His face, indeed, rested on the latter and but for that slight impediment, he would have been precipitated down the rock.

Toom crept towards him on hands and knees, followed by the cries of his sisters. They feared he might slip and fall over. But Toom was young, strong and fearless, and contrived not only to reach the fallen man, but to draw him by his feet gently towards him. As there was no sound, he believed he was dead. Still on his knees, and clinging with one hand to the gnarled ivy roots that grew into the castle wall, and carefully dragging at the body with the other, he succeeded in freeing it from the broken fence. David was at his heels, fearless as he. It was a perilous moment, and the onlookers feared lest the stones should give way, and the trio be precipitated over the precipice. But David laid hold of Toom, and quick as thought, Gwenny, Dorcas and Shonny made a sort of cordon from the dangerous to the safe part, clinging to David and one another.

"Lord have mercy upon them!" ejaculated Old Gwen, as she toiled up the steep.

Her prayer was as necessary as it was involuntary, for her grandchildren were all in imminent danger. Red-coated Toom on his knees, dragging the prostrate form along the dangerous ridge; David clutching him; Dorcas, David; Gwen holding her sister's frock with strong grasp, and Shonny clinging to Gwen; all held to the gnarled roots of the ivy with one hand. A sudden panic, and they might have been hurled down the almost perpendicular rock.

"Lord have mercy upon them!" again cried old Gwen as she stood panting on the sward below the dangerous ledge.

And He had mercy. Shonny slipped backwards into his grandmother's arms, and one by one the others rounded the castle, and reached the green where she stood; Toom last with his ghastly burden. All surrounded him, and helped the inanimate man over the rough stones to the smooth plot of grass that lay amid the ruins. It was soon stained with the blood of the poor wretch they had risked their lives to save. He lay on his face still, a helpless mass of injured limbs.

It was now old Gwen's turn to assist. She and Toom, on their knees, raised the head, while the others gently took hold of the limbs; all, save Shonny, who, terrified at the sight of blood, ran away to his mother. Very tenderly they turned the maimed figure, and as the poor head lay on old Gwen's lap, they exclaimed simultaneously, "The gentleman! the tourist!"

Old Gwen laid her hand on his pulse; her ear to his mouth; her palm to his heart.

"I don't think he's dead," she said. "David, go for Dr. Evans. Help to carry him to the farm first, then run for your life."

They took him up with all possible tenderness, the boys holding the arms, the girls the legs, old Gwen following. Whence the blood flowed, or what limbs were broken, they knew not, but happily the house was near.

"Take him into the parlour," said old Gwen, and to the horror of Tisha and Shonny who were huddled up in the bee-hive chair, he was borne into that refuge.

"It is Mr. Milbank, mother," whispered the terrified Gwenny.

"Him as give me the five pounds! poor fellow. Put him on my bed," returned Tisha, drawing back the panel of the big cupboard bedstead.

"Lay the blankets double a-top. No call to spoil the bed," said old Gwen, and very soon Mr. Milbank was placed on the blankets, and she was examining with professional acuteness his injuries, and pouring down his throat such restoratives as the house afforded.

Tisha was frightened into unwonted energy, and unexpectedly helped her mother-in-law, while the boys went off in search of a doctor, and the girls did what they could.

Gwenny was crying all the time, for she was a warm-hearted girl, and fond of Mr. Milbank.

"What will Mrs. Bowen do?" she thought, as she surveyed his ghastly face.

Suddenly his eyes unclosed and he looked at her. She uttered a little cry, and the eyes shut again.

"Go you all out of the room except Tisha," said old Gwen. "Keep water boiling, turn out all the old linen, and don't lose your time and strength by crying and wiping your eyes."

Meanwhile, Shonny had found Dr. Evans. His account of the accident was incoherent, and all that the doctor could gather clearly was, that Shonny had seen some one fall from the very top of the castle.

"Then he must be dead," said the doctor coolly, "but tell your grandmother I'll be with her directly."

To his amazement he found the patient alive, but unconscious. It was impossible to move him, so he could not discover what limbs were broken; but he ordered wine, and promised medicine.

"How shall we get the wine?" asked old Gwen. "You doctors find it easy to give your orders, but poor people can't always attend to 'em."

"Here's his own five pound note as he was giving me," volunteered Tisha, producing the treasured paper. "He was very kind to me, and was talking about my poor Toom, and wanted to send Shonny to school; and, now, ach yn wir, he do look awful!"

"We must write to his friends," said Dr. Evans. "Let's have a look at his coat."

Old Gwen had contrived to get his coat off, and the doctor examined the contents of the pockets of his various habiliments. They contained money, and a pocket-book. Gwen came in with the news that she had discovered the knapsack that he was wont to carry over his shoulder, stowed away in a corner of the kitchen. Again the injured man unclosed his eyes and made an effort to speak. It was at Gwenny he looked, but the doctor bent over him to listen. He failed to articulate, and the eyes closed again. Neither pocket-book nor knapsack contained either card or letter that gave the address of his friends.

"Mrs. Bowen may find out," suggested Gwenny; and then all their energy was directed to keeping alight the flickering flame of life.

News of the accident soon spread, and the neighbours came to ask about it. Among them was the owner of the principal property in the vicinity, who was a magistrate, and who took down the account of the event, and all that the Gwillim family knew of the stranger. He seemed, he said, to remember the name, Milbank, and would strive to recall when and where he had heard it. Uncle Laban also came, and there was great confusion in the kitchen, for the doctor refused to allow the inquisitive to enter poor Tisha's troubled domain, where she and old Gwen held sway. But Toom crept in to wish them good-bye, for he was obliged to be back with his regiment that night.

"There's unfeeling you were to go and 'list," moaned Tisha. "Nobody to help now you and poor father are gone."

"Husht!" whispered old Gwen, for Milbank moaned too. "He must be conscious," she thought.

The doctor went into the kitchen with Toom, where they found the magistrate aforesaid, known as Walters Careg, Cennin House, who was still questioning young Gwen. He and Dr. Evans gave Toom orders to inform Mrs. Bowen of what had happened, and to ask her for further information concerning her lodger. He knew Mrs. Bowen, and said he would be very glad to see her, if she could run up the following day, and tell them all she knew of the mysterious man.

THE ARCH OF TITUS AT ROME.

ON a spur, called the Velia, which connects the two hills, the Palatine and Esquiline, at Rome, there stands an arch, the inner sides, as well as the vault of which, are covered with marble reliefs. The marble is black with age; the reliefs are injured in many places; for eighteen centuries have passed away since they were put up. And during that time the arch has suffered strange vicissitudes. It formed the gate of a mediæval fortress, which a noble family, the Frangipani, had built for themselves in the heart of the city. It became completely filled up with débris. The débris were removed; and by order of Pope Pius VII. the walls of the fortress broken down in 1822. The arch itself, thus left without supports, gave way, and had to be rebuilt; but the modern structure contains the ancient reliefs. And the traveller to-day stands on what was one of the main streets of the old city and gazes on that triumphal procession executed in marble which recalls to his memory one of the most significant moments in the history of Rome and of mankind.

Our frontispiece this month represents one of the two friezes, which are placed on either side of the arch. We see to the right legionaries bearing on their shoulders a table, evidently of considerable weight; two vessels or cups of unequal size are on the table; in front of it, placed crosswise, are two long trumpets. Another larger group of soldiers on the left are carrying a massive candlestick with seven branches. The frieze on the opposite side of the arch represents the imperator in a chariot drawn by four horses, which are governed by the goddess Roma, whilst the vault above shows him borne aloft by an eagle. The friezes are somewhat crowded with figures; the workmanship exhibits certain defects, peculiar to a declining age of art; but it is noble all the same; there is that pride and stateliness about the Roman soldiers, marching forward in triumph, which makes these marbles works of real art, and the arch, in which they are placed, one of the finest which has come down to us from the time of the emperors. The meaning of the pageant represented is shown by the table and especially by the candlestick with seven branches; all doubt as to its significance is dispelled by the inscription, on one side of the gateway, which informs us that this monument was erected by the "senate and the people to the (memory of the) divine Titus, the son of Vespasian." The adjective divine as well as the frieze on the vault, which shows the emperor being borne upwards, and which signifies his "apotheosis," we might say, his ascension, clearly indicates that the arch was built, at least completed, after the death of Titus, after 81 A.D. It commemorates the one great triumph which Titus achieved and shared with his father, Vespasian, the triumph over Jerusalem.

There is no need to describe that event; it forms a chapter in history which is read of all men. The fanaticism of the Jews, the oppression of foreign governors, the claims of false Messiahs, the general revolution, the advance of the Roman army, the campaign begun by Vespasian continued and concluded by Titus, these are the main incidents. Then was fulfilled the prophecy which our Lord had uttered before His death, when, seated on the mount of Olives, His disciples around Him, He beheld "the royal city" with its walls and gates, its palaces, its flights of steps, its splendid temple. "Jerusalem compassed with armies, trodden down of the gentiles," witnessed "the abomination of desolation" in its sanctuary. "Not one stone of its temple was left upon the other."

The horrors of the siege have been described by an eye-witness. When sword and famine had done their work amongst the multitudes crowded into the city at Easter time, the Roman soldiers made their entry through the broken walls. They fought their way step by step through the streets into the upper part of the town; they set the houses on fire; and Titus, riding through the blazing piles, could not help admiring the massiveness of the fortifications. Three towers only he left standing, as a memorial of their strength, and of his perseverance. He tried to save the temple; but when the general saw that he could not restrain the fury of his soldiers, nor put a stop to the fire, now rapidly spreading, he ordered the vessels and some of the furniture to be removed from the temple. He himself had penetrated into the Holy. No doubt the vessels removed were those which had been actually used. Some of the treasures belonging to the temple had been hidden at the approach of the enemy in the subterranean vaults and passages with which the hill was honeycombed. But the historian expressly mentions that some of the priests saved their lives by delivering up the treasures which they had secreted. The candlestick, the golden table, the trumpets, the book of the law, and the vessels of incense, taken from the temple, were the same which were carried before Vespasian and Titus at their triumphal procession to the capitol. The artist has with true instinct fixed upon the most significant part of the ceremony which was enacted. The part has however a deeper meaning even than he could have imagined. We can understand it when we recall to our mind the simple fact, that the vessels used for the services of Jehovah were carried by heathen soldiers before a heathen imperator through the streets of Rome, the book of the law to be deposited in the palace, the candlestick and the table in the temple of peace.

Five times, says Josephus, was Jerusalem taken before the time of Titus. Eleven times has it since then been sacked, sometimes with great slaughter; but amongst these captures, the one which was accomplished in 70 A.D., that is within the lifetime of the generation born before the death of Christ, stands out pre-eminently as the destruction of Jerusalem.

Three hundred and twenty triumphs, says Orosius the Christian historian—with somewhat ungenerous exultation—were held in Rome since the foundation of the city; but never before was there the sight witnessed of a father and a son (Vespasian and Titus) riding in the same car, after completing the most arduous campaign and the most difficult siege.

The memorial of that triumph, the marble friezes, one of which is shown in the frontispiece, is well worth a careful study. The most striking object in that picture, next to the figures of the soldiers, is the candlestick. This is "the candlestick of pure gold, of beaten work . . . even its base and its shaft . . . with six branches going out of the sides thereof . . . three branches out of one side, and three out of the other . . . " a full description of which is given in the twenty-fifth chapter of Exodus.

The description does not, however, in point of ornamentation agree with the candlestick, which appears on the frieze. This candlestick is, according to the exact measurement made by an Englishman, Anthony Twyman, two feet and nine inches in height, consisting of three almost equal parts. The breadth of its base is equal to that of the branches at the top, two feet. The branches, though most of them are unfortunately injured at the tops, are clearly seen to rise to the same height, and thus to form one horizontal line. The exterior branches on either side are not similar in their ornaments. The main difference, however, between the candlestick, which stood in the tabernacle of Moses, and the one represented in this frieze, consists of the following points. The former was adorned with "cups and knops and flowers." Three of each were, according to Jewish commentators, fixed on every one of the six branches, amounting to altogether fifty-four ornaments. Four of each were found on the main stem; and if we add the "knops" which it appears were placed at the spot where two branches issued from the main stem, we understand how the commentators arrived at the sacred number seventy, as forming the total of all the ornaments of the candlestick. Whether this enumeration is correct or not, there can be no doubt that in the book of Exodus only three different ornaments are mentioned; but here we meet with four. We recognise the "cup," which is low and flat, with a jagged rim —the "flower," a lily, perhaps, or the blossom of pomegranate. The third figure is round, shaped like a ball, and represents a ripe fruit, an apple, the fourth resembles an egg. And when we examine the exterior branch to the right, with the help of an enlarged print, we find that it contains no less than thirteen ornaments. There are four "apples," three of which are lying on, and covered by "cups."

The next object which attracts our attention in the picture is the table carried in front, to the right. A full description of it is given in Exodus xxv. It was made of acacia wood; two cubits was its length, a cubit and a half its height and breadth; it was "overlaid with pure gold," and "a crown of gold round about it," which rested on "a border of an hand breadth." In the four corners close to the border were rings, for the staves on which the table was borne. The rings certainly do not appear on our picture; and the Roman soldiers evidently carried the table on their triumphal march in a manner very different from that in which Jewish priests had once borne it into the temple.

In front of the table there are the two trumpets, similar to those of beaten silver, which Moses had made (Numbers x.), which the sons of Aaron, the priests had sounded "for the calling of the congregation and for the journeying of the camps."

As regards the difference between the sacred vessels and furniture, described in Exodus and Numbers, and those represented in the Arch of Titus, there is this to be remembered, the candlestick, the table, and all the other things which had filled the temple of Solomon, were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar; they were restored by Cyrus. Again, in the second century before Christ, the sanctuary at Jerusalem was plundered of all its treasures by Antiochus Epiphanes. The tyranny which the Syrian king established over the Jews, the persecutions he inflicted on them, the attempt he made to extirpate the religion of Jehovah, are recorded in the books of the Maccabees. His efforts were vain; and the temple vessels he had stolen were restored by fresh ones.

Whether at that time slight alterations were introduced, or whether the Roman sculptor considered it pedantic to imitate in stone all the small details of ornamentation which he observed in the originals, and allowed himself a certain amount of artistic liberty, we cannot say for certain. But we entertain no doubt about the identity of the furniture which was used in the services of the temple, which was carried through the streets of Rome, and immortalised in the marble frieze of Titus Arch. What became of it afterwards is uncertain. The golden candlestick, the table, the trumpets were, as Josephus says, deposited in the Temple of Peace. That temple was burnt down during the reign of the Emperor Commodus, 180–192 A.D., but later chronicles maintain that the Hebrew spoils were saved from the flames. According to one tradition, Geneseric, the king of the Vandals, when he pillaged Rome, carried with him the trophies of Titus to North Africa in 455 A.D. When eighty years later the kingdom, which he had founded, was overthrown by the general of Justinian, the trophies found their way to Constantinople, then the capital of the Roman Empire; "and there," says a chronist, "a Jew pointed out to the emperor that the sacred vessels had never found a quiet resting place, but had caused the ruin of every city in which they were deposited, first of Rome, then of Carthage. Justinian, alarmed at this observation, gave orders that they should be returned to the place from which they had been taken; and they were handed over to the different Christian Churches in Jerusalem." Another tradition, however, relates that the Hebrew spoils were carried off from Rome by Alaric in 418 A.D.

These conflicting accounts merely show the uncertainty of later historians regarding their ultimate fate. The sacred vessels have disappeared from the face of the earth, like the temple which they adorned. By a strange chance, that very moment when "judgment was executed on the house of God," when things, hitherto jealously guarded within the Holy, were exposed to the light of the sun and the gaze of a heathen multitude, is pictured before our eyes in the marble frieze of the Arch of Titus.

LETTERS TO MY CHILDREN FROM THE EAST.

BY HENRY A. HARPER, AUTHOR OF "LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND," ETC.

VII.—THEBES.

LET me try to give you a slight idea of the ruins of another wonderful city in Egypt. I cannot tell you the size, or give a plan of that old city, for though I spent a good deal of time there, the ruins were so extensive and covered so much ground on both sides of the river—the Nile—that I completely failed to get any definite idea of its former size or plan. One set of ruins is now called "El Karnak," that is on the eastern side of the stream, and here we find ruins of temples, of palaces almost without end. There are great avenues of sphinxes. Those strange creations of Egyptian art are now crushed or battered almost out of shape; they led to great gateways which are covered with inscriptions much defaced. The gateways led (by paths which are now choked with fallen columns, fallen obelisks or shapeless masses of large blocks of stone) to a great central hall, called the "Hall of Kings," where massive columns seventy feet high in a double avenue led in their turn to a temple. These columns are very grand. At one end stands erect an obelisk one hundred and eight feet high, while other obelisks lie half buried in rubbish. Then there are great columns partly buried in Nile mud, while in other directions are great masses of ruined masonry. Mounds in short so large that you wonder how before the days of gunpowder such huge buildings could have been overthrown.

Valuable discoveries are constantly being made by excavators under these mounds; chambers are found covered with inscriptions in rich and varied colours, inscriptions telling of the history of the kings of Thebes and their conquests. My sketch may give a slight idea of some of the ruins.

Let us now cross to the western bank of the river. There at some distance from the stream are ruins of enormous temples, with long rows of columns, and ruins of palaces for priests or kings. Two huge monuments of sitting figures are called "The Vocal Memnon," because the historian of old said that when the first rays of the rising sun struck on the larger one it emitted a musical sound. The first time I visited Thebes I left my dahabeeyah in the dark, and in a small boat rowed across the Nile; and, led by some Arabs with lanterns, crossed the plain in the faint light of dawn. The figures loomed huge and impressive, but when the light struck the figure, judge my astonishment when I heard a low musical note! It seemed such a confirmation of the old story. A few moments, and then I saw the grinning face of one of my Arabs just behind the ear of the larger figure; he had climbed up behind it to where there was a hole in the head, and then with a stone had struck the statue, and the rock gave out this musical sound. Perhaps the priests of old had used this same trick, perhaps concealing a boy, and so deluding their worshippers. Near by there is a fallen statue of the King Rameses II., which is estimated to weigh eight hundred and eighty-seven tons, one solid lump of rock. There is too a vast pile, the temple of Medinah Haboo, on the walls of which we can read of the conquests of people who lived on the shores of the Mediterranean Sea. On another temple we read of "Shishak," who conquered some of the cities of Judah, also of those long lost people of the Bible, "the Hittites." There are also tombs without end; one tomb alone covers an acre of rock, all inscribed. Near here, in a valley hidden from view, were recently found the mummies of the early kings of Egypt. These mummies are now at Bûlak, Cairo; they had been removed from their first resting-places by the priests, when some dreaded invader was nigh at hand.

RUINS OF THEBES.

The life of people living more than three thousand years ago is depicted on these tombs. We see their religious processions, their daily life, feasts, harvests; we learn their ideas of judgment and a future life!

From this brief account cannot you see what a wonderful place this Thebes was? Is there any mention of it in the Bible? Yes.

Let us first remember that the Egyptian name of Thebes was "Nu Amen," "The City of Amen." "Amen" means "hidden." So it would be right to call it, "The City of the Hidden God." In the Bible the city is called "No Amon," or "No." Let us read Jeremiah xlvi. verse 25.

"Behold, I will punish Amon of No, and Pharaoh, and Egypt, with her gods, and her kings; even Pharaoh and them that trust in him; and I will deliver them into the hands of those that seek their lives and into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon."

It was to be destroyed because it trusted in false gods. Ezekiel xxx. 14–16.

"I will execute judgment in No. I will cut off the multitude of No, and No shall be broken up."

Read the more detailed prophecy in Nahum iii. verse 8, where the prophet warns Nineveh.

"Art thou better than No Amon, that was situated among the rivers, that had the waters round about her, whose rampart was the sea (i.e. the Nile) and her wall was of the sea? Ethiopia and Egypt were her strength, and it was infinite; Put and Lubim were thy helpers. Yet was she carried away. She went into captivity; her young children also were dashed in pieces at the top of all her streets; and they cast lots for her honourable men, and all her great men were bound in chains."

We can read on the Assyrian marbles the story told by their king. He tells how all gold, silver, precious stones, horses and booty which could not be counted, with men and women were carried captive by him to Nineveh (about 666 before Christ). Nahum said Nineveh should experience the like treatment from her foe, and in less than one hundred years she likewise fell.

Ancient history tells us how awful the war, how bitter the struggle between Egyptian and Assyrian. Inscriptions show us the merciless cruelty of the conquerors—how captives were chained, blinded with hot irons, pierced with arrows.

As we thus glance at history and read our Bibles, we can understand who it was that destroyed this city (it had other invaders afterwards), but let us ever remember that no earthly power, grandeur, size or might will preserve a nation unless the Lord her God is with her, and dwells with her.

God is so long-suffering, so loving, that as in the days of old, so still He will not destroy a guilty city if even ten righteous men are to be found in her. Let us pray that our dear country England may grow in grace and love to God as she grows in power, and then she will not be like those nations of old "removed out of her place."

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

"H. S.," Plymouth, proposes the question: "In the first chapter of Genesis there occurs after the record of each day's work, except the second, the statement that 'God saw that it was good.' What explanation can be given of this exception, seeing that the thirty-first verse makes the same declaration regarding everything that God had made? I believe I have seen some fanciful idea that the second day's work became afterwards specially the dominion of Satan (the prince of the power of the air, or heavens), and so the commendation was omitted from the record of its creation."

WE have not seen the explanation to which our correspondent refers. On the face of it, it is absurd. That Satan and his angels afterwards invaded the dominion of the air would not render it otherwise than "good" at its original formation. Other parts of the material and spiritual creation also came under the power of evil, notably the soul of man; yet this does not hinder their being "very good" at the outset. For the omission of the words we cannot satisfactorily account. Bishop Wordsworth suggests: "It seems that they are not introduced here because the work was merely in progress and transition, and one of separation rather than of creation." The explanation may possibly be accepted: the scheme of which the firmament was the centre was not complete until the gathering together of the "waters under the expanse;" the commendation therefore is reserved for the end of the two days' work (the second and the third) and equally belongs to both. But perhaps a yet simpler explanation may be accepted. The Septuagint has the words "God saw that it was good," after the account of the second day's work, as after the rest. It thus appears that the Hebrew copy from which the Seventy made their version contained the omitted sentence. May it not have been dropped by some transcriber from whom the copies now extant have come down?

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

OLD GWEN.

CHAPTER VIII.—PLENARY FORGIVENESS.

"HE KNOWS THAT MY POOR TOOM IS INNOCENT!" CRIED TISHA.

OLD Gwen could not prevail on Tisha to go to bed, so they watched together through the night, carrying out the doctor's orders, who promised to return with the dawn. He had discovered that the blood flowed from a deep wound in the side, and they had staunched it with difficulty, as they dared not move the patient, whose groans when touched even, were fearful.

"He must have broken every bone in his body," said Dr. Evans.

But during the night, he recovered speech, and went off into strange, wandering delirious ravings. They terrified Tisha, but old Gwen was too well accustomed to sickness to be frightened.

"He do think of what I was telling him about my poor Toom, and Thomas, Plas Newydd," said Tisha, listening.

"I wish you could have held your tongue," said old Gwen.

"But he was asking me so many questions!" returned poor Tisha, who trembled like a leaf.

Neither of the women quite understood his speech, but it was truly wild and portentous. Wet bandages on his temples, Dr. Evans' effervescent medicines, and old Gwen's remedies failed to stem its torrent.

The doctor, who was uneasy, returned before his time, and said that there was neither sense nor coherence in his delirium; but his mind was wandering on murder and gambling, and seemed to be rather in Australia than in England. Some narcotic, however, soothed him, and he fell into a sort of doze to the great relief of the women.

This state of things continued all the next day. Mrs. Bowen came to the farm, and saw Mr. Walters, but she had not much information to give, and none that we have not already learnt. She remained the night at Mr. Walters's, so that Gwenny was not obliged to leave home. The other children went about their different avocations, while she did the work of the house, and answered the insatiable enquiries of the neighbours. No gossip shop was ever better supplied with inquisitive denizens than was old Gwen's kitchen that day. And as for the uncles and cousins who looked in, they were legion.

The evening brought Uncle Laban. When he arrived the patient was temporarily quiet, and shut out from the observation of in-comers, by the closed panel of his bedstead. Uncle Laban made many whispered enquiries concerning him of his mother, Tisha and Gwenny, and recalled the fact of his apparent interest in their change of abode when he saw them leaving the cottage.

"It is strange. Perhaps the Lord is working in His mysterious way. Maybe he is a backslider. Let us pray for him," he said.

Old Gwen was about to remonstrate, but he knelt down as he spoke, and the three women did the same.

"You must be quick," said old Gwen.

"I will be short," he returned. "He will not understand if he should hear."

He poured forth a fervent prayer for the sufferer, low and emphatic. Although it was in Welsh, there was an awful groan just as it ended, and they rose from their knees in terror, drew back the panel of the bedstead, and all stood beside it. The prostrate, helpless man, looked from one to another. His eyes seemed to pierce them through, and terrified young Gwen.

"Don't be frightened, Gwenny," spake Milbank in a hollow voice. "I am sane. Bring me a magistrate—quick! There is no time to lose. I have a deposition to make. It—it—concerns you all. Run, at once, lest I should change my mind."

"Mr. Walters was here awhile ago," stammered awe-struck Gwenny.

"I know him. He is a lawyer, besides. Bring him," came from the patient in a sepulchral voice.

Old Gwen feared this sudden arousing was a precursor of death, and hurried her granddaughter off in search of Mr. Walters. He was found at no great distance from the house discussing the accident; for country-folk, whatever their social position, love to gossip over any unforeseen occurrence. He hurried back to the farm, and was horrified at the sight of the injured man.

"Bring pen, ink, and paper, and leave us alone," said Milbank to the women and Uncle Laban.

They complied with his request, and placed such writing materials as the house afforded on a small table at the side of the sick man.

"Call me, sir, if he gets worse," whispered old Gwen, as Mr. Walters seated himself at the table.

She and the others went into the kitchen, where they found Mrs. Bowen. They all began to speculate on what was going on in the other room.

"He do know something about my poor Toom," said Tisha oracularly. She seemed to have renewed her life since her arousing by the accident.

This speech caused them to gather up into one connected whole the fragments of conversation that had dropped from time to time from Milbank. He had now, for several months, persistently stuck to the family; he had been desirous to benefit them; he had made constant enquiries concerning the murder and the far-away convict; he had been driven almost beside himself with terror at the episode of the jackaws and Gwenny's suggestion concerning ghosts; he had been evidently disturbed by Toom's recognition of him. Finally, he had left the house abruptly the previous day, and had either fallen from the castle battlements, or had thrown himself from them. Which? they all asked.

"He do know something of my poor Toom," repeated Tisha, who was always ruled by one idea.

"Mr. Walters and I have been talking it over," said Mrs. Bowen. "He remembers the name, and says there was a Colonel Milbank many years ago at Carmarthen, that he left the army and emigrated, and that three or four years ago his son was visiting at Caergwyn. He thinks this is the son."

"That doesn't speak well for him," said Uncle Laban solemnly. "The Caergwyns are a bad lot. They do nothing but gamble, and drink, and race, and ——"

"Thomas, Plas Newydd was always with them, my poor Toom was telling me," interrupted Tisha. "They was agreed to preserve the river, and summonsed my poor Toom. But there was nothing against him."

"Nor ever could be. He was God-fearing from his childhood," said old Gwen with clasped hands.

"A word with you, Laban," here broke in Mr. Walters, and as Laban followed him out of the kitchen, he whispered, "I want you as a witness to his signature. An awful deposition. A fearful confession."

"There's bad Walters do look!" exclaimed Tisha. "He have heard something about my poor Toom."

Certainly the magistrate did look bad; so bad that the women wondered what could have happened.

In a few minutes Laban came back, and bade his mother go to Milbank, who was either dead or in a swoon. Fortunately, Dr. Evans arrived at the moment, and he and old Gwen were left with Milbank, while Mr. Walters and Laban joined the rest in the kitchen. All turned to the magistrate, who seemed too bewildered to speak.

"A wonderful deposition! I—I—will come back and tell you. I—I—must consult the lawyers, the chief constable, the Bench. But you—you—there is good news for all, if he has spoken the truth," he stammered.

"He do know all about the murder. He do know that my poor Toom is innocent," cried Tisha, rising in her sudden excitement, and seizing him by the arm.

The rest surrounded him, and David, Dorcas, and Shonny entering at the moment, caught their mother's words. Mr. Walters gazed from one to another, and repressed forcibly the words that were on his lips.

"Good news for all, if this is true," he said, holding up the paper he held in his hand. "But you must wait—you must wait," and he broke through the group and hurried away.

"He is innocent," murmured Tisha, and fell back fainting into Laban's arms.

Meanwhile, old Gwen and the doctor brought Milbank back to life. His first words were: "Let me die. I have confessed. It is off my mind."

"In the Lord's time. You must lie quiet now," said old Gwen.

"The Lord's time!" he repeated. "Lord, have mercy upon me!" and then he wept pitifully.

The excitement, confusion and hope of that humble family subsided into deep compassion when he suddenly expressed a wish to see them all. The doctor said he had better be humoured, for his hours were numbered. Tisha, scarcely recovered, sank into the beehive chair; old Gwen stood by his pillow, her grandchildren round about and Laban at their back.

"Has he told you? No? He will soon," he muttered in an almost inaudible voice. "I will be before him—I am the murderer."

The awe-struck family thought he was wandering, all but Tisha, who rose and pushed her way to the bed.

"I knew it, I knew it!" she cried. "I will forgive you if you will bring my poor Toom back."

She fell on her knees as if imploring a favour of him who had done her such an awful wrong. The children began to cry as they surrounded her; and the scene grew indescribably pathetic. Old Gwen was the only self-possessed one of the party.

"Come away Tisha, you are killing him!" she said. "Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord."

"Pray for me, all of you. I repent of all I have done you. For Christ's sake, pray for me."

Again Uncle Laban knelt down, but it was old Gwen that broke forth in prayer. She was well used to pray in English as well as Welsh, and her words were always "with power." Now they took the form of thanksgiving.

"We bless and praise Thy Holy name, Almighty God, for bringing this sinner to repentance. Forgive him, for Christ's sake, as we do forgive him. Clear my son from the charge of blood-guiltiness, and bring him back to us in Thy good time. Dear Lord Jesus, receive this malefactor, as thou didst the thief on the cross. Thou didst shed Thy precious blood for the guilty. Wash him, make him clean——"

"Wash me; make me clean!" here broke in the dying man.

"Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow," said old Gwen, motioning the others from the room.

Tisha remained behind. She was no longer the drooping reed, but the tall, erect woman; for her Toom was innocent. Neither she nor Gwen felt any malice towards the man who lay before them, only gratitude that in some way, yet unknown to them, he had made their Toom's innocence clear.

But they had no time to realise this; for the penitent sinner who was lying on the very bed of the man he had unwittingly wronged, grew worse and worse—weaker and weaker. His mind was, however, clear, and he spoke at intervals. They gathered from what he said, that he had not intentionally injured Toom: that he only heard for the first time that he was suffering penal servitude, when he saw his family leaving their cottage: that he wished to benefit them; that he had not courage to confess; that their patience and faith had overcome him; that he had made a will leaving them all he possessed; that he did not quite know whether he had fallen accidentally or premeditatedly from the castle, for the devil was beside him all the time; above all, he affirmed that he had not meant to murder Thomas, Plas Newydd, though he had wandered, like Cain, ever since.

It was astonishing how tenacious of life was this poor wretch, who had taken the life of another. He was still alive the next morning, and his last question was to Tisha, "Is your poor Toom come back? I want to ask his forgiveness before I die."

"I give it you for him," said Tisha.

And so he passed away.

CHAPTER IX.—THE COTTAGE AGAIN.

DAZED, wondering, yet hopeful were the inhabitants of Careg Cennin Farm.

"When will Walters come? When shall we know the truth?" were the questions of the youngsters, and "In the Lord's good time," the answer of old Gwen; while Tisha sat watching, waiting, listening for the magistrate, who seemed to her to hold her fate in his hand. He came at last, and there, in the kitchen, in the midst of the assembled family, confirmed the wandering speech of him who "slept his last sleep" in the adjoining room.

"He affirms the innocence of your son," he said, addressing old Gwen, "and declares himself the murderer of Thomas, Plas Newydd. His deposition was short and clear, and to the effect that he came from Australia, and went on a visit to Caergwyn. He brought much money with him. Thomas, who was a gambler, fleeced him of it at play, and nearly beggared him. He watched for him on his way to the bank, where they said he was sure to place it, and demanded it back again. He jumped into his dog-cart and a struggle ensued. Thomas was thrown out and Milbank leapt down after him. They fought fiercely, and Milbank knocked Thomas down. He did not wait to see if he were dead or alive, but rifled his pockets till he found his own Australian notes. He made off with them, and, as he had left Caergwyn a day or two previously, got away unsuspected.

"He took his passage at once for Australia, and avoided his fellow-creatures, so that he knew nothing of the result of his deed. He would not enquire; but conscience would not be pacified, and after roaming from place to place, he came back to Wales. The rest, he said, you could tell me; and in the interests of justice, there must be a full examination of all the circumstances."

When Mr. Walters ceased, he looked from one to another of those who surrounded him. If they were overjoyed, their joy was so tempered by awe that they did not appear to rejoice.

"I knew it—I knew it! My poor Toom!" said Tisha, and again fell into a faint.

Shonny began to cry, and the usual confusion ensued; indeed, they were all rather in a state of lamentation over one parent than of rapture over another; until Tisha, suddenly reviving, exclaimed: "There's unfeeling you are; all crying, and your father coming back!"

This caused Shonny to leap up in a sort of transport, and the rest to break into smiles.

"Praise the Lord, O my soul!" cried old Gwen, uplifting eyes and hands as she stood in the midst of her children. "I never misdoubted Thy mercy or his innocence."

Mr. Walters left the house, and began at once to set on foot the necessary enquiries. The Prices of Caergwyn were summoned, and confirmed Milbank's statement concerning the gambling, and recognised him, when placed face to face with his remains. It evolved that there had been also a love affair in which Thomas and Milbank were rivals.

Misprison of felony subsequently headed many paragraphs in many papers; but the innocence of Thomas Gwillim, convicted of the murder of Mr. Thomas, of Plas Newydd, Carmarthenshire, was fully proved. He had suffered four years' penal servitude, wrongfully, and would have been hanged but for an irreproachable character. "But then he was always quarrelling with the landed proprietors about the fish, and the game-laws must be kept," said the magistrates. "Is fish game?" enquired the ignorant fishermen.

"We will go back to the cottage, and be there against father do come home," said Tisha to her children. "We must seem as if nothing had happened. There's lucky that nobody has taken it."

Even old Gwen thought this was a good plan, though no one took into account what effect those years of prison-labour might have had on the husband and father. Not a moment was lost in airing and repairing the neglected house, in digging up the garden, in white-washing and yellow-washing, even to the pigstye; and in restoring the old home to its original state.

"I will spend my five pound upon it," said Tisha. "The poor gentleman was very sorry for what he did to father, and 'ould like to think he was helping us. If his will do go for nothing, they can't be taking his presents away."

"And there's my pound," said Toom bach, doubtfully.

"And the money he left with Mrs. Bowen for me," suggested Gwen fach, with tears in her eyes: she always cried when she thought of Milbank, for she would have it "he was very kind-hearted."

"It was honest money, left him by his father, Colonel Milbank," said old Gwen. "I think we may use it for honest work."

And so the long-disputed cash helped to defray the expenses of the second flitting. How different that was from the first! How quickly and joyfully accomplished! Tisha was foremost in everything. She wanted neither cart nor beehive-chair to take her back to her home. She walked as briskly as her children. She accompanied the beloved coracle from its new to its ancient stand-point, and had it repaired and tarred to be ready for her Toom's fishing. All the neighbours as well as all the relatives, helped to convey the goods and chattels, so that young Gwen declared "it was like the jackdaws building their nests on the roofs and in the chimneys."

Mrs. Bowen kindly spared her at this time, and said she would manage without her until her father's return.

His return! Who shall describe the coming back of one supposed to be lost so long as life should last? The day and hour were uncertain; it might be Monday, it might be Tuesday; the journey was long. How they watched by turns at the station—how they tidied up at home!

"Will he ever come, Mamgu?" asked Tisha, Tuesday evening.

"In the Lord's time," replied the trembling Mamgu.

They were sitting by the fire in the twilight, while the children were all on the watch. The kettle sang on the hob; supper was spread; the cat purred on the hearth; the corner-cupboard smiled serenely, as if happy in being at home again; brasses and tins shone like gold and silver; all the furniture, like Tisha, had renewed its youth.

"Husht! what's that? 'Tis like the drum and fife band," cried Tisha, starting up.

In another moment the door was opened, and in burst Shonny.

"Here's father!" he cried.

David and Dorcas followed, holding that father by the hand, and in the rear Toom bach and Gwen.

Tisha was in her husband's arms.

Old Gwen, with a thankgiving on her lips, bided her turn. The children circled round them.

"Tisha, wife, mother and children, once more, thank God," came from the gaunt man, who embraced one after another of those he had never hoped to see again.

His clothes hung about him, he looked ill and aged, his hair was cropped, but he was their son, husband, father. How they laughed and wept by turns, till they were suddenly recalled to other friends by sounds without.

"'Tis the drum and fife band. I said it was. They are playing 'Home, sweet home,'" cried Tisha.

"They all came to meet me. Oh! my friends, my brothers!" sobbed Tisha's "poor Toom."

The words were scarcely spoken when those "friends and brothers" streamed in. The Welsh are not only patriotic but clannish, and all Toom's relatives and friends had met him at the station, and had formed a sort of triumphal procession over the bridge and along the river-side to the cottage. The fife and drum band of which David was a member, had played Welsh airs all the way, till the "Home, sweet Home," seemed the more appropriate; but David had not joined the musicians, because he "had hold of father's hand."

That hand was well-nigh shaken off, and Tisha, who clung to his left side as if afraid they might again be separated, had hard work to repress her sobs. But she meant to make up to him by her love and bravery, for all his sufferings, and she would not give way. It was his worn and wearied spirit that failed, and his the voice choked by emotion.

"You—you—none of you believed that I did it," he stammered.

A negative that almost seemed a cheer, burst from all present, and the hand-shaking began again.

But this like everything else came to an end; and, perhaps, we cannot do better than end with it, and with old Gwen's parting address to the friends who, at last, left the re-united family to themselves.

"We are all of one mind. Let us thank the Lord for making his innocence clear as the light of day. It is His doing. It was He as led the footsteps of the guilty one to this very place, quickened his conscience, and brought him to repentance. May He be with our dear Toom in this, his coming home, and give him strength for honest labour, and a heart prepared by suffering, for the spending of the remainder of his days in His service."

"Amen. Amen," echoed from cottage to river, as the friends departed, and happy Toom was left, with his wife, mother and children.

ST. JOHN:

APOSTLE, EVANGELIST, AND SEER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

IX.—THE FOURTH GOSPEL AND THE THREE EPISTLES. (3.)

HITHERTO we have taken for granted that the John who, according to the testimony of all Christian antiquity, lived and wrote at Ephesus, was one and the same person, with the disciple of the Lord. A second John, however, is thought by some to have been upon the scene;—John the Presbyter, or Elder: and as his presumed existence has been regarded as the key to many difficulties, it may be worth while to turn aside for a moment, and ask what is known concerning him.

The chief indication of such a personage is in a quotation given in Eusebius from Papias, Bishop of Hierapolis, said by Irenæus to have been "a hearer of John, and an associate of Polycarp." Papias writes in his work, entitled An Exposition of the Oracles of the Lord:—

> "Whenever a person came in my way who had attended on the Elders, I would inquire what were the declarations of the Elders, what was said by Andrew, or by Peter; or by Philip; or by Thomas or James; or by John or Matthew; or by any other of the disciples of the Lord; and what Aristion and John the Elder, disciples of the Lord, say; for I did not think that I derived so much benefit from books as from the living voice of those that are still surviving."
>
> "It is proper," adds Eusebius, "to observe that the name of John is twice mentioned, the former time in association with Peter, James, Matthew, and the other apostles;—evidently meaning the evangelist. But Papias ranks the other John with the rest not included in the number of apostles, placing Aristion before him, and distinguishes him plainly by the name of Elder. So that the statement is confirmed of those who assert that there were two of the same name in Asia, that there were also two tombs in Ephesus, and that both bear the name of John even to this day; which it is particularly necessary to observe. For it is probable that the second, if it be not allowed that it was the first, saw the Revelation ascribed to John."—Eccl. Hist. iii. 39.

Such is the evidence. Its significance consists in this, that critics who cannot admit the common authorship of the Gospel and the Apocalypse have here another John to whom to attribute the rejected work. True, these critics are by no means agreed as to which of the two books belongs to this "John, the Presbyter." Eusebius, as we have seen, says the Revelation; moderns more generally say the Gospel. To sounder judgment both hypotheses are alike unnecessary. In fact, there is some room for doubt whether this second John ever existed at all. Papias seems to be referring to two classes of witnesses; first, to those whose testimony belonged to the past—"what was said (formerly)" by them, and secondly, to those with whom he had actually conversed—"what they say (now)." Very possibly, the "John" of both lists is the same. This great evangelist combined the testimony of successive generations. Certainly "the Elder" is not a distinctive title, as Papias terms all the apostles Elders alike. There is no clear trace of a second John in any other ecclesiastical writer; and as to the existence of two tombs at Ephesus, it seems to be a mere rumour which Eusebius took from Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, one hundred and fifty years after the apostolic era. "Some say," writes Dionysius, "that there were two tombs." Jerome, however, remarks: "Some think that they are both tombs of John the Evangelist."[1] This is really all the testimony that we have to the existence of John the Presbyter. Eusebius disliked the Apocalypse, and eagerly caught at any suggestion that might discredit its apostolic origin. It is, therefore, held by many that the personage of whom so much has been made, is altogether mythical.[2] In any case, supposing him to have existed, and to have been a teacher of Papias, there is not the slightest evidence, beyond the worthless conjecture of Eusebius,[3] to connect him with either of the canonical books.

We may then dismiss this Presbyter on whom so much has been written, as having nothing to do with our discussion; and may reaffirm the general belief of the church, as unshaken by all the adverse reasoning of later days, that in the Fourth Gospel and in the Three Letters, we have the mind and heart of the disciple whom Jesus loved.

Nay, we have much more. The Spirit of God that was in him had opened his eyes to discern yet deeper and grander aspects of the truth than had been unveiled to his fellow evangelists, and especially to see how the broken lights of men's thoughts concerning the Divine were but glimpses of that consummate glory in which the Son of God was revealed. St. John, alone among the evangelists, stood face to face with Gentile speculations. He had passed beyond the circle of Judæan thoughts and beliefs, and had become conversant with the figments and the dreams of the world's philosophy, in proud and cultured Ephesus. For in that centre of Asiatic wisdom there was something more refined and subtle than the gross popular idolatry which was content to cry "Great is Artemis of the Ephesians!" and to worship "the thing that came down from Zeus." Still, no doubt, as in the days of Paul, the Demetriuses and craftsmen of the city stood by their "silver shrines," and valued their religion mainly as a matter of art and of business. But St. John had also to meet with men of another calibre. There were many who in their hearts despised the gods of the people, and strove, although in strange, bewildered ways, after a better ideal. Some attempted an impossible eclecticism, in the reconciliation of Jewish beliefs with heathen notions; others, again, to whom the message of Christianity had come, thought to inweave its teachings with the subtleties of their own philosophy. The systems which we class under the general head of Gnosticism, were not as yet fully formulated; the age was chiefly one of tendencies; there was a very chaos of thought—conditions which required another setting forth of the truth than that of the Galilean Gospels.

Of these tendencies, two were predominant. One was to remove the Divine Being to an infinite distance from His own creation, and from human thought. The Unknown and Unknowable, it was held, could only be manifested by emanations,—vaguely conceived as utterances from the Eternal Silence, or even as inferior beings, given off, as it were, from the infinite and inconceivable Substance. Later Gnosticism had a whole hierarchy of these intermediaries between the Creator and the creation; but these we need not now consider. In the time of St. John, the leading conception, so far as the conception had any clearness at all, was that of the Logos, or Word: in Jewish speculation, the Memra, or "Word of Revelation;" in Platonised Greek thought the Reason, or "mediating principle of the Divine activity," in communication with the world of matter and of mind.

The other tendency was to the belief in two opposing eternal principles, as afterwards formulated in Manicheism, but really imported into the Christian circle from older Oriental speculations. In matter was the source of evil; and in the flesh lay the cause of all moral depravation. This dualism led to many wild hypotheses in after days. The time of these had not yet come; but there was, at any rate, the disposition to assert the necessary and everlasting antagonism between the material and the spiritual worlds. Sin, therefore, became a matter of constitution, and man's responsibility for it was practically ignored.

Such were the prevailing modes of thought among the people to whom St. John made the great announcement of an Eternal Father, in closest communion with His children, not by the effluence of power from some mysterious and unimaginable depth of being, but by the Word, personal, eternal, divine, incarnate. For the abstractions of a heathen philosophy, there is given a revelation of light, life, love, in One whose glory, says the evangelist, "we beheld," or again, whom "we have heard, and seen with our eyes, and looked upon, and our hands have handled." This personal revelation of the Divine in humanity is the great theme of these writings;

[1] The supposition of a second monument besides his actual sepulchre would be by no means improbable.

[2] See a full discussion of the subject in Smith and Wace's Dictionary of Ecclesiastical Biography, art. "Joannes Presbyter"; also in an Excursus at the end of Archdeacon Farrar's Early Days of Christianity. Bishop Lightfoot is inclined to believe that John the Presbyter was an actual person, and teacher of Papias, although, of course, not the author of the Gospel or the Apocalypse. See Contemporary Review, August, 1867.

[3] Dionysius also, anticipating much modern criticism, holds that the Apocalypse and the Gospel must have been by different writers; but he is all at sea as to the authorship of the former. The seer was a John, he remarks, inasmuch as he gives his own name (Rev. i. 4, 9; xxii. 8), it could hardly have been John Mark, the companion of St. Paul! "But," Dionysius adds, "I think that it was some other John of those who were in Asia, since some even say that there are two tombs in Ephesus, each of which is called the tomb of John."

it is the master-thought, in the light of which the apostle calls to mind and sets in order the facts and the utterances of that Life in long-past days which was to the end his greatest and dearest memory.

The Word became Flesh, and tabernacled among us, and we beheld His glory as of the only-begotten from the Father. Such is the motto of the Gospel, and the first Epistle repeats the strain, with exhortation, warning, and appeal. The old man at Ephesus knew and felt that the one way of meeting the false metaphysics and bewildered ethics of his day was by setting forth THE CHRIST, by declaring GOD IS LOVE. Long meditation, with the teachings of the Divine Spirit, had made the vision clear to his adoring view. "The Life was manifested, and we have seen, and bear witness, and declare unto you the Life, the eternal Life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us." Far better now did the disciple understand the Master than in the days of their earthly fellowship. The works of Jesus that had borne witness to Him then, were now seen to be fraught with grander, holier testimony; and words half understood when spoken, although heard with reverent wonder and delight, now shone with the full glory of their meaning. These words and works the apostle records—partly for their own sake, that the mind and heart of Christ might be unveiled also to that generation, partly as evidence, that the errors of the time might be rebuked, and that men might believe.

It is, no doubt, an inadequate account of the Fourth Gospel to describe it simply as apologetic. True, it was that, but it was far more. Still less can it be said to have been simply a supplement to the other three. That this also is a partial account of St. John's design may be conceded. There are omissions, as of the Transfiguration, the Institution of the Supper, the Agony in the Garden, and even the Ascension, which seem inexplicable on any other supposition. To this last great event, indeed, there is distinct allusion, perhaps also to the others; but these references we need not be concerned to discuss. It is more to the purpose to remark that in those scenes which St. John describes in common with the synoptic evangelists, he adds vividness and completeness to the narrative. Very especially is this the case with the miracle of the loaves and fishes, the only miracle recorded in common by the four evangelists, and in the description of our Lord's twofold trial before His crucifixion. The added details, while perfecting the narratives themselves, are as evidently given for the sake of the apostle's chief aim, the manifestation of the Christ.

This aim appears especially in the selected miracles or "signs." For it is observable that the word for miracles as "powers," or "mighty works," so frequent in the other Gospels, is never used by St. John. These wonders are always "signs" simply, or "works," the former appellation expressing the spiritual intention which every miracle embodied. Seven in all (or eight, if we include the draught of fishes after His resurrection) are recorded in this Gospel; and in their deepest meaning they are all testimonies to Him and to His great redemption. When He turned the water into wine at Cana of Galilee, "this beginning of signs," we are told "manifested His glory, and His disciples believed on Him." It at once made manifest His power over the material creation, and suggested the enrichment and ennobling of life by His might and love. The healing of the nobleman's son revealed Christ's power over disease, and at the same time exhibited the trial and discipline of faith. The cure of the paralytic at Bethesda was followed by unbelief instead of by faith as in previous cases; that unbelief taking as its occasion a misplaced estimate of the Sabbath, on which our Lord utters some of His profoundest teachings on His own and His Father's working. The feeding of the five thousand at Bethsaida led to our Lord's self-revelation as the Bread of Life; and when soon afterwards He comes to His disciples across the wind-tossed waters of the lake, He proves Himself Helper and Refuge amid all earthly storms. He appears, again, as the Light of the world in the cure of the blind man at Siloam; and as the Resurrection and the Life, beside the open grave of Lazarus. The cycle of miracles is complete; each becomes to us not only an evidence for the confirmation of faith, but a parable in act, revealing some great aspect of His work of redemption.

In the seven miracles many expositors have discerned a numerical mystery, characteristic of the apostle, and another link with the Apocalypse. On the discussion of this point, however interesting and suggestive, we cannot enter. After the Resurrection, an eighth sign was given, as expressive as any that had gone before. Again, as at their call to apostleship,[1] the disciples are shown by an emblem taken from their early occupation, that they are to be fishers of men. But how changed are the circumstances! Then the nets were breaking, now they are unbroken; then the fish were uncounted, now they are carefully numbered;[2] then the cry of the disciple was, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord!" now, from the same lips, "Lord, Thou knowest all things, Thou knowest that I love Thee." The symbolism of the two miracles may be the same, but in this second there is a loftier and grander view of apostolic work.

The record of this miracle, with the conversation following, has one special point of interest for the aged apostle who thus brings his narrative to a close. Our Lord's last words he does not yet fully understand: "If I will that he tarry till I come ——" St. John's fellow disciples were ready to interpret the saying for him, "The Lord has said that our dear Teacher will not die." With inimitable naturalness the apostle puts aside the inference as unwarranted. "Jesus said not unto him that he should not die; but, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" The beloved disciple is simply content to repeat the Master's words, and to await the interpretation that time would bring. That the words were written by another, after the apostle's death had solved the mystery, the form of the passage clearly shows to be an inadmissible supposition.

[1] This call is recorded, we need hardly say, by the synoptics. John omits it altogether.

[2] Some interpreters find a mystery in the number "one hundred and fifty and three." Thus Jerome says that there were just so many kinds of fish, and takes the number as indicating the completeness of Christ's Church. Other solutions of the supposed secret are given by Westcott, Commentary, pp. 306, 7. The simplest explanation is probably the correct one, that the specification of the number, as in other places, is the almost unconsciously accurate statement of an eye-witness.

Then, the Ephesian elders, or other companions of St. John, add their attestation: "This is the disciple which testifieth of these things, and wrote these things, and we know that his testimony is true;" concluding the record with a quotation from the apostle's own words, as shown by the change of phrase from "we know" to "I suppose." As though, when he concluded his dictation, or put the manuscript away, he uttered with a sigh this daring hyperbole, to show how infinite the task would be to set forth every one of the "things which Jesus did!"

The first Epistle of St. John is evidently a supplement to his Gospel. The same thoughts, often the same expressions, recur: the style is identical: the lessons of the Divine life are turned into earnest exhortations: Walk in the light; do righteousness; love God; for God is Light, God is Love. The Epistle, too, as is natural, is more doctrinal than the Gospel. The Divine glory of the Word is there—"This is the true God and Eternal Life;" His redeeming sacrifice—"He is the propitiation for our sins: and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world;" the purifying efficacy of that sacrifice upon heart and life—"the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."

But the one point on which it was needful to insist was that which the Gospel was written to illustrate, that the Word was made flesh. So the apostle begins by speaking of that which his "eyes had seen and his hands had handled." For the tendencies of which we have spoken were growing into shape, probably through the influence of Cerinthus, whose doctrine seems to have been a development of the "Nicolaitan" heresy denounced in the Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia. It was a strange form of rationalism, consisting in the denial, not so much of the divinity[1] as of the humanity of the Christ. Various were the expedients devised for evading this great truth. That the man Jesus was simply human, and that "the Christ" was superadded at His baptism; or, that the manhood was only an outward semblance, deceiving the senses of those who professed to observe Him—such were the theories. Hence the insistance of St. John upon the truth, as essential to Christianity, that Christ Jesus had come in the flesh. The denial of this was the chief antichrist of the early church. There were many antichrists, but this was the grossest, the most insufferable form of unbelief. In the tremendous indignation with which he denounces it, we seem to hear the old Boanerges. "Many false prophets are gone out into the world. Hereby know ye the Spirit of God; every spirit which confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God, and every spirit which confesseth not Jesus is not of God: and this is the spirit of the antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it cometh, and now it is in the world already!" Again: "No lie is of the truth. Who is the liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? This is the antichrist, even he that denieth the Father and the Son."

In connection with the same truth we interpret the difficult passage, "This is He that came by water and by blood," the same Christ all through, in His baptism, which inaugurated His work, and in His death, its consummation. St. John had seen the blood and water issue from His side upon the Cross, and takes the fact as an expressive symbol of His whole work. The two are "witnesses," and the Spirit which He gives, and which continues His power among men, complete the testimony. "There are three that bear record."[1]

This First Epistle of St. John is "general." It was an "encyclical" to the churches, over which he exercised apostolic supervision. These churches contained Christians in different stages of the Divine life. Some, like himself, were fathers, who had long maintained the faith, and to whom he speaks in kindredship of soul: "Ye have known Him that is from the beginning." And young men there were, in the full ardour of their readiness to do or to suffer for Christ's sake. Sympathising with their enthusiasm, the apostle with glowing heart writes, "Ye are strong." Others had but newly entered on the life of faith. Whether mature in years, or youthful in life, they had freshly surrendered themselves to Christ. The apostle speaks to them tenderly, warningly: "I write unto you, little children, because your sins are forgiven you for His name's sake." "Little children, it is the last time." "Little children, keep yourselves from idols."

Such were the apostle's last words to the churches. Two short letters follow, of a private character, which, although sometimes doubted by the early church,[2] are shown by many tokens, as well as by their early general acceptance, to be unmistakably his. In the superscription of each, he terms himself "the Elder," a title, which, as in a similar phrase of St. Peter, may imply old age, or office in the church, or both. The former letter is to the "Elect Lady," or to "Electa

[1] The Ebionites denied His divinity, but were altogether of less influence than the Cerinthians.

[1] "For there are three who bear witness, the Spirit, and the water, and the blood; and the three agree in one."—Revised Version. Such no doubt is the true reading in 1 John v. 8. The introduction of the heavenly Witnesses into the passage seems to have been the work of some early transcriber, who misapprehended the apostle's argument, and presumed an omission.

[2] The shadowy personage "John the Presbyter," to whom we referred in the beginning of the present article, has with some the credit of these two letters also.

A CHRISTMAS BOX IN THE OLDEN TIME.

Kyria," or to the "Lady Electa,"[1] or to "Kyria the chosen one": for so variously has the address been read; some critics again taking it as personifying the Church, the Bride of Christ. To us it appears that the ordinary (and Revised) rendering is likeliest to be accurate, and that the letter, as we have said, is to an unnamed Christian woman of repute in the Church. There were false teachers abroad, carrying with them the pernicious doctrines which St. John denounces in his first Epistle. Some of these might seek the hospitality of this Elect Lady, and the apostle adjures her to refuse it. Keep these people, at all hazards, out of your house! It is Boanerges who speaks again—the John of the traditional story about Cerinthus in the bath. But the letter begins and closes with a lovely serenity, giving us glimpses of a happy home, in which, to mother and to children, the aged and beloved Apostle was an honoured guest.

The Epistle to Caius takes up the same topic of hospitality, but from a different point of view. Where he lived we have no means of knowing. There was a Caius of Macedonia, a Caius of Derbe, a Caius of Corinth;[2] in fact, it was among the commonest of Roman names, and we know how, in its Græcised form Gaius, it has become a symbol of hospitality,[3] partly from this Epistle, and partly because of the entertainment of St. Paul by Gaius at Corinth. This friend of St. John appears to have been delicate in health; for so we understand the apostle's earnest and unusual desire that Caius might be as strong in body as he already was in soul. But at any rate he did what he could, in welcoming to his house and helping on their way those brethren who had gone forth "for the sake of the Name," a striking expression, indicating the missionaries of Christ in early days. But this pleasant task had somehow of late been impeded. There was one, Diotrephes, who harshly refused this welcome. He lives before us in St. John's portrait, a loud-voiced, self-important man, forcing himself to the front, and imperiously dictating to the church. By this man some excellent people had been recently turned away; and those who persisted in receiving them had been expelled from the congregation! These high-handed proceedings must be stopped. But in the meantime Caius must not be intimidated into following the example. Demetrius, probably the bearer of the letter, perhaps one of the brethren denied hospitality, is a good man and true. What higher description can be given of a noble character than that not only his associates, but the Truth itself commended him? So, with greetings to the many friends, not particularised by name, as Caius will know whom the apostle means, this brief and graphic picture of early church life is closed; echoing the farewell benediction of Jesus to His disciples, "Peace be with thee!" Who could utter such a blessing with a greater appropriateness than "the disciple whom Jesus loved?"

[1] This interpretation, however, seems forbidden by the fact that it would require another "lady Electa" (verse 13) sister of the former.

[2] Acts xix. 29; xx. 4; Rom. xvi. 23; 1 Cor. i. 14.

[3] See John Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, part ii.

THE REVOLUTION OF 1688

ON ITS RELIGIOUS SIDE.

VI.

THE English nation and the English church now turned for help exactly in the same direction as the French Huguenots. William of Orange, the Stadtholder of the United Provinces, the head of the Protestant interest, had his eye on everything happening in England, and was organising his forces with a view to the moment for action which he foresaw must soon arrive. Dykvelt, the envoy in England of the United Provinces, spent his time mainly in this work. Conferences of leading noblemen of all parties were held in his presence; and on the very day of the acquittal of the bishops, a document was despatched to William signed by seven representative men; which stated that nineteen-twentieths of the common people of England longed most anxiously for a change, and that the nobility and gentry were animated by the same sentiments, and that if the Prince of Orange could land with a force sufficient to promise protection to his friends, he would in a few days find himself at the head of an army double that of the king's, and would see crowds of officers and privates abjure the royal standard for that of religion and liberty, and that this was a favourable moment for the attempt.

The two kings, James and Louis, who by the exercise of the most common-place wisdom could have rendered all these schemes futile, acted at this moment in so infatuated a manner that we must believe them judicially blinded. The Dutch Stadtholder could do nothing if the ruling classes in Amsterdam, the natural enemies of his house, opposed his English schemes. Yet Louis had the folly to wound these possible allies in their most tender points: religion and commerce. He interfered with their herring fishery, and sent his secret police into Holland after Huguenot refugees. Great demonstrations of the latter took place in Amsterdam, the city was moved and every one crying for war.

James seemed raised up for the very purpose of showing England with unmistakable clearness the nature of the principles on which the great struggle turned, and the issue of the doctrines which Hobbes and Bossuet taught. Even at this moment after the crushing defeat he had sustained in his quarrel with the bishops, he actually proposed to cite before the High Commission every clergyman in England who had refused to read his Declaration of Indulgence.

It was not until the news arrived that the Prince of Orange had actually embarked for England that James awoke out of his fool's paradise, and began to see the imminent peril he was in of losing his crown. In the course of a few days he retraced every step, and annulled almost every Act peculiar to his reign.

On the 22nd of September he sent for the bishops, and solicited their advice and aid.

On the 26th he restored the deputy-lieutenants and magistrates he had shortly before dismissed, because they would not help him to pack a Parliament.

On the 28th he repudiated the design of calling in the King of France, and promised to summon a Parliament.

On the 30th he restored the Bishop of London.

On the 5th of October he dissolved the High Commission.

On the 12th, he restored Dr. Hough and the Fellows of the Magdalene College.

On the 17th, he returned to the corporations the various charters he had taken away, sending that of the city of London by the hands of Lord Chancellor Jeffreys himself.

On the 22nd, he dismissed the Jesuit, Petre.

On the 27th, he dismissed Sunderland.

Nothing more was left him than to dismiss Jeffreys, and then himself, but just at this moment the news came that the Prince of Orange had surmounted the difficulties caused by the wind driving back his expedition, and that he had successfully eluded the king's fleet and had passed the Straits of Dover.

On the morning of Saturday, the 3rd of November, the coasts of Kent and Picardy were lined with spectators, watching the new Armada. A messenger galloped post haste from Dover Castle with the news, and very early on Sunday morning a great muster of troops took place by torchlight in Hyde Park. The winds bore the coming invaders well on down the channel all that day and night, but when morning broke they found that they had gone beyond Torbay where William was to land. But just when some faithless souls believed all was over and the expedition had failed, a soft breeze sprang up from the south, the mist broke, the fleet turned back and rode safely into the harbour of Torbay. "Well, doctor," said the Prince when Burnet came to congratulate him, "what do you think of predestination now?"

The disembarkation had scarcely taken place when a great gale arose from the west, arresting the royal fleet which was swooping down on the invaders. It had just sighted the Dutch masts in Torbay when the tempest drove it back to take shelter in Portsmouth Harbour.

Truly it was the deliverance wrought for us and not by us, for never did a people do less, and never was a national peril greater; however the people had done their part, as Sedgemoor and the cross-roads and village-greens throughout the western counties witnessed. When they saw the Prince of Orange triumphantly marching through the very district in which only three years earlier Jeffreys had held the Bloody Assize, could they fail to recognise that a just God and a Saviour rules the world, and to say in the familiar words—

"The Lord is come to judge the earth,
With righteousness shall He judge the world,
And the people with equity."

MEDAL STRUCK TO COMMEMORATE THE ACQUITTAL OF THE SEVEN BISHOPS.

(From the Original in the Medal Room of the Brit. Mus.)

Charles and James had acted most treacherously towards the nation; now the last Stuart king was so basely deceived and so universally deserted that the people in their simple, magnanimous way began to pity him. He seemed a veritable old Lear forsaken by his own children. But his worst enemy was himself. The sole thing he thought of was to secure the safety of his wife and to save his own head. He then began to prepare for his own flight. To blind those around him, he ordered a meeting of the peers for the 11th of December, and the very day before he fled he told the Lord Mayor and sheriffs that though he had thought it expedient to send his wife and child out of the country, he would himself remain at his post. That night he ordered the great seal and the writs for the new parliament to be brought to him. Such of the latter as could be found he pitched into the fire, and those already sent he annulled by an instrument drawn up in legal form. At three o'clock the next morning, December 11th, James rose, and taking the great seal with him, got into a hackney-coach, and drove to Millbank where he got on board a small wherry. As he was rowed across the river he threw the great seal into the water, and very soon the boat stopped at Lambeth where he got into a coach and drove off to Sheerness.

We may imagine the excitement in London at the news, especially as it was intensified by such items as the following from the country:—The rebels welcomed in Newcastle and the king's statue hurled into the Tyne; the garrison at Hull surprised by a coup de main; Declaration of the Duke of Norfolk against popery and arbitrary power in the market place at Norwich; Bristol opens its gates to Shrewsbury—the bishop the first to welcome the Dutch troops. Rescue from prison at Gloucester of Lovelace; he marches triumphant into Oxford; some of the heads of the university will coin their plate to help the Prince of Orange.

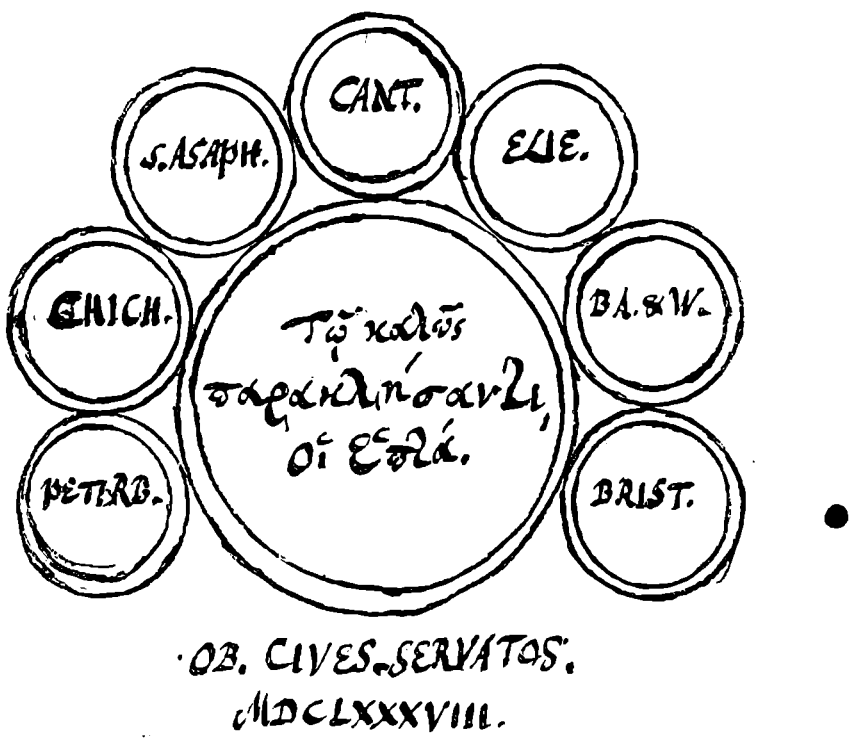
London, according to Macaulay, contained at this time thousands of housebreakers and highwaymen, cut-throats and ring-droppers, and there were moreover in it thousands of idle apprentices who loved the excitement of a riot. The chief authority in the country had extinguished itself, and the lord mayor, the chief authority in the city was so extremely nervous, that the sight of the terrible Lord Chancellor disguised as a vagabond sailor, begrimed with coal dust, and trembling at his bar, so overcame him that he fell into a fit, was carried to his bed, whence he never rose. Yet in the midst of every incentive to the wildest excitement, with all the machinery of law and order legally unable to move, this terrible population committed no "atrocious" crime. What rioting there was, was entirely of a political character, and consisted chiefly in the destruction of Roman Catholic chapels and convents and the houses of Roman Catholic gentlemen. But not a single Roman Catholic lost his life, either in London or throughout the country. With the single exception of the infamous Jeffreys, the people showed no vindictive desire to harm any person whatever. And this although their excitement one night well-nigh bordered on lunacy under the belief that Fevershams Irish troops were marching on London intending to massacre every man, woman, and child in the metropolis. The nation for a moment had realised its unity, and its soul elevated by ennobling thoughts concerning the supreme value of its religion and its liberty, and the way in which God had appeared for their preservation, there was no place for the tempter. He was for a while awed and confounded.

On the very day James finally left London William entered. Great crowds assembled near St. James's Palace to greet him, every hat and cane adorned with Orange favours. The bells were ringing, faggots for bonfires were heaped in the streets. But William, who had no sympathy with the people, avoided their cheers as much as possible, and came through the park at nightfall to St. James's.

It is not part of our purpose here to relate how the revolution was legalised and made the foundation of our present constitution in church and state, for is not that all written in the history books? Suffice it to say that the ghosts of arbitrary power which James so imprudently raised were all decently laid to rest by the Declaration of Right, in which the call of William and Mary to the vacant throne was set forth and duly accepted, and which formed a sort of contract between king and people.

Thus the struggle terminated, a struggle in which great lessons had been learnt, lessons which the country took deeply to heart, and which it has been slowly trying to realise ever since.

RICHARD HEATH



DESIGN BY SANCROFT FOR A MEDAL TO COMMEMORATE THE ACQUITTAL OF THE SEVEN BISHOPS.

(From the Original in the Bodleian Library.)

LETTERS TO MY CHILDREN FROM THE EAST.

BY HENRY A. HARPER, AUTHOR OF "LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND," ETC.

VIII.—THE PYRAMIDS.

THE TABLE-LAND OF DESERT.

WHAT child has not heard of them, for they are the largest and oldest buildings in the world. I hope, however, to tell you a few things about them not generally known. People think they are built on a plain; really they stand on cliffs, and when you ascend those cliffs you find yourself on a raised table-land of desert. Then too there are a great number of pyramids in Egypt, though these largest are at Geezeh, a few miles from Cairo. Now it is quite easy to get to them, as a good road has been made, which road has trees planted on either side; really it is quite a fashionable drive for people to take. Just fancy, having picnics at the pyramids!

You s[illegible] who built them, and what are they for? These are difficult questions, and, until lately, learned men differed very much, but you need not bother your little heads with rival theories. At Geezeh there are three great ones, and some smaller, but the big one of all is called "Cheops." Who was he? Well Herodotus, who is called the "father of history," by which is meant that he was one of the first travellers who wrote an account of what he saw in his travels, and which account has come down to us, says Cheops was a king, that he employed 100,000 men to work on this huge building, that he gave them poor pay, and that many died.

We can see by hieroglyphic tablets or writings of the Ancient Egyptians how the people built them. The stones were brought from quarries across the Nile, and laid in steps or stairs inclining inwards. The whole height of Cheops is 482 feet (that is, if a little of the top had not been knocked off.) Now that is about 100 feet higher than St. Paul's Cathedral in London, so when you look at that great church you can fancy how high this pyramid is. It is said to be 5000 years old. No building in the world can compare with this for the amount of stone used in its construction, and what is worthy of note is that every stone was perfectly laid and finished. Longfellow sings,

> "In the elder days of art
> Builders wrought with greatest care
> Each minute and unseen part,
> For the gods see everywhere."

They are now generally believed to have been tombs for kings, and it is said that so soon as a king came to the throne he began to build his tomb or pyramid, and that the reason why Cheops is so large is that that king lived to be ninety years of age. At least that is the age given to Cheops in an old Egyptian writing or papyrus which is now in the museum at Turin.

Not only is this great pyramid wonderful because of its size, but it has many most wonderful passages and chambers in it. One gallery is called the great gallery, from its size, and one fine chamber is called the king's chamber. It is 34 feet long, 17 feet 7 inches broad, and 19 feet 2 inches high. At one end of it stands an empty sarcophagus of red granite; no inscriptions are on it. Then there are many strange passages, and a very deep pit or well, and other wonders which would take too long now to relate. We will talk about the outside, for we can climb to the top. I cannot say I thought it easy to climb, though the huge blocks of stone are like rude steps, very much worn by weather and time.

When this pyramid was in its glory it was cased or covered with blocks of red granite, polished quite smooth; but the Moslems, when they conquered the country, stripped off these outside blocks, because they were so valuable, and took the stones to Cairo to build their palaces with. You say you want to go up. So you start and take four or six native Arabs, who live in a village near, whose right it is to take travellers up; some of these men go in front and pull you up the blocks of stone, while the others shove you up. You cannot go straight up, but have to zigzag about; half way there is a sort of resting-place, and there you are glad to rest and get breath and drink some water which an Arab boy brings up—of course you have to pay men and boy. When I went up I did not much like it, but the leader of the Arabs said in very good English, "Never fear, I will look after you like the apple of my eye," touching his eye as he spoke. The Bible language sounded so strange.

On the top I stayed a long time to make some sketches; it was, however, a very windy place; I thought I should be blown off; the Arabs had to sit round me and hold my sketching things tight. What a wonderful sight it was! Looking down, the figures at the bottom looked like little dots. The second pyramid seemed small; you looked right over it, and beyond to such a great expanse of desert, all hills of rocks and hollows of sand; and then, looking the side the Nile flows, you saw all Cairo and its gardens, set in lovely tints of green: the Nile, like a broad streak of silver; while the canals gleamed like threads of light and life, while the desert side had a silence of death.

If going up is bad, coming down is worse; you see there is no hand-rail for you to hold on by, so I gave myself quite up to the Arabs, and often shut my eyes, it made one so giddy to look down. Some foolish people think it is not dangerous, and refuse the help of the Arabs; and quite recently a poor silly English soldier said he would come down alone, but slipped and bounded from ledge to ledge; his poor body was lifeless when it reached the bottom.

If these stones could speak what a wonderful history they would tell! In their grandeur when Abraham went into Egypt; quite middle-aged buildings when Moses led the people of Israel out to Sinai; grey and weather-beaten when our Lord Christ was born on earth, and yet they stand!

It used to be said by writers long ago, before people knew much about the history of old Egypt, that these Pyramids were some of the things the Israelites were set to build by the cruel Egyptian king: now we know better than to say things like that. The Israelites had nothing to do with the building of them, for they lived in the "land of Goshen," which is a long way off, and they had to make "bricks" of Nile mud, and built store houses for corn, which we have lately found and dug out; and then, too, these pyramids are built of stone, and they were cut, carved, and builded long before Jacob went into Egypt for bread. There is no mention of these pyramids in the Bible; that book does not tell any of the history of the great nations, and little of the proud doings of kings, but it does often tell of the dealings and most of all of the love of God. That book tells many stories of little children, or of poor despised men. God does not judge as men do.

The Sweetest Song.

"And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God."—Luke ii. 13.

LISTEN, my darlings!
Babes were wrapt in slumber,
With happy smiles upon each little face,
When from the skies swift angels without number
Sang of the Babe of David's royal race.

Shepherds their watch amid their flocks were keeping,
Dim were the hills beneath Judæan skies,
When one bright seraph, as the world lay sleeping,
With light celestial blessed their wondering eyes.

"Behold! I bring glad tidings to all people;
For unto you," he cried, "the Christ is born!"
(This is the news that rings from tower and steeple, Oh, children dear, on every Christmas morn.)

And then the angel told them of the manger,
Where lay the holy Child, in poor array,
Where He, the King of kings, a homeless stranger,
For love of man was born on Christmas Day.

Then suddenly, as if the courts of heaven
Were overflowing with its joy and love,
A host of angels from the skies all riven
Sang the high praises of the Lord above.

"Glory to God! To God the highest glory!"
And benedictions fell like summer rain.
"Peace upon earth!" until the world is hoary;
No song so sweet will fall to earth again.

Oh, what a night of happiness and wonder—
Through the long ages still the angels call.
Are you not glad the heavens were rent asunder,
That we might hear the sweetest song of all?

CLARA THWAITES.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

A CONSTANT READER writes: "I should feel much indebted if you would give an explanation of the following text: 'Christ who through the Eternal Spirit offered Himself without spot to God.'—Heb. ix. 14."

THE "Eternal Spirit" in this passage undoubtedly designates our Lord's Divine nature. So, in Romans i. 3, 4, we read of Him as "born of the seed of David according to the flesh; declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness;" and in 1 Tim. iii. 16, "Him who was manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit." His Divine essential being "justified" or vindicated His claims to the trust and obedience of men. Compare 1 Peter iii. 18; "put to death in the flesh but quickened in the Spirit." Now His offering of Himself was partly through His mortal flesh, for He was slain; it was also through the Eternal Spirit which in Him was incarnate, for that also He surrendered: "Lo, I am come to do Thy will, O God." The purpose in this part of the Epistle to the Hebrews is to show the superiority of Christ's sacrifice over the offerings prescribed in the law. In these, "the victims gave up an animal life, all were unconscious, but Christ gave Himself, His own will and heart consenting—not the man only, but all that was Divine in Him: His higher nature which, before time, acquiesced in the purpose of the Father, and that same nature now a conscious agent in effecting it."—Schaff's Commentary. Note by Dr. Angus.

A FRIEND AND OLD SUBSCRIBER writes from Brighton: "Our Lord's express teaching in Mark xi. 24, is, 'Whatsoever things' (no reservation), 'Whatsoever things ye desire, when ye pray believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them.' And in the verse preceding (23) He tells us to believe that those things which we pray shall come to pass, and we shall have whatsoever we pray. How is this reconcilable with what is often taught, namely that God does not give us what we ask, unless He sees it to be right? Our Lord puts no limitation, he uses the word 'whatsoever.' So then according to the teaching referred to I may pray in vain for the conversion of a sinner, and that he may be restored to his family."

OUR correspondent's question touches a subject which has often occasioned much painful doubt. The promise seems unconditional: and yet it is evidently restricted to the prayer of faith. What, then, is the faith of true prayer? Is it not trust in the infinite wisdom and love of God? Now, if we have this trust, we shall believe first that God will give what we ask if He sees it to be right; and secondly, with equal assurance, that He will not give if He knows it would not be right. If we pray truly, we apprehend this condition. If we do not apprehend it, ours is not true prayer at all, and therefore the promise does not apply. It is impossible to believe that our Lord can have assured His disciples that unconditionally whatever they desired should be given to them. The words of our Lord, as given in St. Mark (compare St. Matthew xxi. 22), declare one element in this faith to be the belief that they already had the things asked for. They had them in idea, though not yet in actuality. But how could they believe that they had these things? The faith, we reply, by which they could so believe, was itself the gift of God: and He would not give it unless He had also granted the request. All true prayer is answered: it is the language of the Holy Spirit in the heart, "making intercession;" and the response is certain. But all desire is not prayer; all asking is not prayer: and even the case that our correspondent supposes—ardent longing for the conversion and restoration of a sinner, may not be in accordance with God's wise and loving but mysterious will. In this, as in other cases, the spirit of entire submission, however difficult, must be maintained by the suppliant.

The Secret Chamber.

(IN MEMORIAM, 1688.)

IN the gloomy years in Scotland—
Dread time of sword and flame—
Lived one who loved the Covenant,
And those who bore its name.

Who wept the husband of her youth,—
One not in battle slain
When Monmouth rode to victory
On Bothwell's fatal plain.

He fell not in the open day,—
Nor fighting sank to rest,
His trusty broadsword in his hand,
And his banner on his breast.

But when a homeless wanderer,
He sped with bated breath
Along the heath, where fierce Dalyell's
And Grierson's names meant death.

The moonbeams shone across his path,
Lag's troopers mark'd his flight,
And their warning cry of "Halt!" rang out
'Mid the silence of the night.

He dauntless faced the scowling band
Eager to shed his blood;
He saw their dark brows menaced death,
And he met it where he stood.

Long, long he lay on the moorland waste,
Ere they found him cold and dead,
The lark his requiem carolling
In the blue lift overhead.

No moss-grown stone is there to tell,
Where his life-blood stain'd the sod;
Yet, though unknown to mortal man,
'Tis not unmarked of God![1]

[1] Mrs. Hemans' "Graves of the Martyrs."

Then for the homeless such as he,
In danger on the moor,
His gentle widow at her home
Kept ever open door.

For hid behind the wainscot
In an old panell'd room,
By side of stately fire-place,
Faint shadowed in the gloom,

A touch on hidden spring reveal'd,
A little chamber fair,
Where fugitives might spend their days
In safety and in prayer.

And kindly hearts the same made known
To friends around the Hall,
And when across the dreaded heath
Night's shadows 'gan to fall,

Would come some hapless wanderer—
Some straggler from the glen—
When moss and dell were hounded o'er
By Clavers and his men.

Would steal the weary foot of age,
The wounded in despair;
And all for love of Him who died,
Were kept and cherished there,

Until from off our troubled land
The shadows roll'd away;
And on her mountain-tops there dawn'd
A new and brighter day

When mercy, born of pitying heaven,
Bade persecution cease,
And won for Scotland and her sons
The holy calm of peace.

ELLEN E. GUTHRIE.

CHRISTMAS BOXES.

THERE are few children in England who do not know what a Christmas box is. The engraving which we give in another page takes us back to a time when the custom took another form, and was not so general. The Romans used to give presents on the first day of the New Year; and in some countries now gifts are more commonly interchanged at that season than at any other.

The Christmas box is said to have had its origin in the custom of collecting moneys that masses might be said by the priests. A box for this purpose was once as common—probably much more common—than the missionary-box, or hospital-box, now to be found in houses. According to Brand, the Christ-mass Box was a box into which coin was dropped for masses to be said at Christmastide; and servants were allowed to ask for "box money," that they, like their masters, might be enabled to pay the priests, in accordance with the well-known proverb, "No penny, no pater-noster." The custom, however, soon came to have another purpose. We are told that towards the end of the sixteenth century apprentices procured earthen boxes, into which employers and customers dropped money, and that these were broken at Christmas, and the contents spent in festivities. Thus, one old book speaks of "an apprentice's box of earth," as apt to take all, but to restore nothing till it be broken. Boxes of this sort seem also to have been carried from house to house. Later still, we find the Christmas box described as "the bounty of well-disposed people, who were willing to contribute something towards rewarding the industrious, and supplying them with necessaries." The general spirit of good-will has, however, long since overstepped all such limitations. The rule now seems to be that he that hath shall give to him that hath not, and he that hath little to him that hath less. So wide is the range of Christian charity that few at this season are left wholly without notice. Well would it be if all who received remembered Him "from whom descendeth every good and perfect gift."

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. VI.—p. 622.

Jeremiah xxxii. 14.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. VIII.—p. 720.

I. (1.) Psa. vii. 1. Acts iv. 25.
(2.) Psa. cxviii. 22. Matt. xxi. 42.
(3.) Psa. xxi. Acts ii. 25-31; xiii. 36, 37.
II. (4.) Psa. xlv. 8. Heb. i. 8.
(5.) Psa. lxxii. 10. Matt. ii. 11.
III. (6.) Isa. vii. 14. Matt. i. 23.
(7.) Immanuel, Isa. viii. 8.
(8.) Isa. xi. 1. Rev. xxii. 16.

ANSWER TO HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. XI.—p. 736.

He that walketh uprightly walketh surely.—Prov. x. 9.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMAS.

NO. XXI.—p. 736.—"OUR GOD SHALL FIGHT FOR US."—Neh. iv. 20.

O-ram . . . . . 1 Chron. xxi. 23.
U-riah . . . . . 2 Sam. xi. 11.
R-uth . . . . . Ruth ii. 10.
G-oliath . . . . . 1 Sam. xvii. 10.
O-badiah . . . . . Obadiah 21.
D-avid . . . . . 2 Sam. xxiv. 14.
S-aul . . . . . 1 Sam. xix. 17.
H-annah . . . . . 1 Sam. ii. 1, 6.
A-chan . . . . . Joshua vii. 21.
L-ot . . . . . Gen. xix. 19.
L-aban . . . . . Gen. xxiv. 31.
F-elix . . . . . Acts xxiv. 25.
I-srael . . . . . Gen. xlviii. 11.
G-abriel . . . . . Daniel ix. 22.
H-erod . . . . . Matt. xiv. 1, 2.
T-ertullus . . . . . Acts xxiv. 5.
F-estus . . . . . Acts xxv. 17.
O-badiah . . . . . 1 Kings xviii. 10.
R-abshakeh . . . . . 2 Kings xviii. 19-21.
U-riah . . . . . 2 Sam. xi. 11.
S-amuel . . . . . 1 Sam. xv. 23.

NO. XXII.—p. 784.—DEBORAH.

1. D-arius . . . . . Dan. v. 31.
2. E-bedmelech . . . Jer. xxxviii. 7-13; xxxix. 15-18.
3. B-ethlehem . . . . Matt. ii. 1-9.
4. O-thniel . . . . . Judges i. 12, 13.
5. R-ose . . . . . Song of Sol. ii. 1.
6. A-bijah . . . . . 1 Kings xiv. 1-17.
7. H-oney . . . . . Judges xiv. 1-14.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

"CALMEST, BRIGHTEST WHEN THE SUN GOES DOWN."

Thrice happy age, whose years serenely close,
Crowned with the radiance of a faith assured.

No. 1809.—DECEMBER 29, 1888.

IN TIME OF NEED.

CHAPTER I.—ALL OVER!

"IT'S all over, Nannie!" said Joe Warrender, as he entered his little sitting-room in one of the suburbs of Birmingham, one dull drizzling March evening.

So full was he of his trouble that though he had remembered to take off his overcoat and hang it up in the entrance hall, he had forgotten to change the shiny threadbare garment he dignified with the name of business coat for a still more threadbare and, indeed, ragged jacket in which he was accustomed to lounge about at home. Indeed, so absorbed was he with the one idea he had given utterance to, that he had omitted to remove the sheet of foolscap, which he—careful soul!—always placed over his ample shirt-front to protect it from being soiled by the outer garment: and he was not recalled to his omission until his three-year-old Nannie had climbed his knee and begun tracing straight-strokes and pot-hooks on the paper.

"Yes;—it's all over!" he said again, as he took his seat after changing his coat, and with a despairing gesture he pushed his fingers through his somewhat scanty auburn hair, and looked steadily into his tea-cup with so fixed a gaze that the child, thinking the remark applied to his tea, and remembering her own frequent mishaps with tea-cups, said reassuringly—

"It aint over, papa. You aint naughty."

If poor Joe had not been so completely absorbed with his own trouble, he must have noticed that his neat little wife gave a momentary start at his words, and involuntarily put her hand to her side, as if to relieve a sudden pain. But we would defy either him, or a more practised observer, to have found anything but cheery confidence in the tone with which she said—

"Never mind, Joe, dear, it'll all come right, you'll see."

And having set his tea before him hot and fragrant, and a round of crisp buttered toast, she took the child from him, and began giving her rides to Banbury Cross, pretending to be thinking of nothing but baby, though scarcely a minute passed in which she did not glance anxiously at her husband's face, eager to read there, if possible, what she had resolved not to ask until tea was over.

A shrewd little woman was Nancy Warrender. She knew that when she felt low and miserable a cup of good strong tea acted like magic. She believed her Joe to be the cleverest, wisest, and best man in all Birmingham borough, but she had learned by experience that he was just the man whom a great trouble seems to crush at the onset, and this was not the first time she—timid retiring woman as she was—had had to be a helpmeet for him.

When Joe had finished his tea he turned his chair to the fire, and showing a face ten degrees brighter than before, actually tempted his little daughter to come to him, and tossed her and played with her while his wife quietly and quickly cleared away the tea things.

That done, the little woman sat down by her husband's side, took baby on her lap, and yielding to her anxious curiosity, said—

"Now Joe, dear, tell me what has happened."

"The very worst, Nanny! I've got to leave Munton's in a month."

"That's not the worst that may have happened by a long way, Joe," said she, with well-assumed courage. "It's a scandalous shame though, for all that. After being with them for twenty years! They ought to be ashamed of themselves. Do you mean to say they'll turn you adrift altogether?"

"Well, it's in this way. Mr. Munton called me into his private office, and told me (what I very well knew) that trade had been getting worse and worse. He said he should have to curtail expenditure, and, as Master George could now take my place in the office, he should have to reduce me to the position of warehouseman at thirty shillings a week, and he would discharge Will Matthews to make a place for me."

"What a shame!" said Nancy, drawing her chair up nearer her husband, and taking his hand sympathetically; "but never mind, Joe, we must do as well as we can at the lower wages. They'll be better than nothing."

"Of course, I wouldn't hear of such a thing for a minute," continued Joe, extinguishing his wife's last gleam of hope. "If they serve me shabbily, there's no reason why I should do Will a bad turn, and he only just married too; so I told the governor I should look out for a fresh place."

Joe Warrender was quite right in describing his employer's treatment of him as shabby. To show how shabby we must go back a few years.

Perhaps no town in the kingdom presents such opportunities for workmen to start as manufacturers on their own account as does the metropolis of the midlands. Oliver Munton had started business so, some twenty-five years before, in one of the many branches of the metal trade. By fortunate speculative purchases of copper immediately preceding phenomenal advances, he had accumulated a considerable capital. Joe Warrender had joined him as his only clerk in the early humble days when his manufacturing premises consisted of one dimly-lighted range of shopping in a narrow back street. He had grown with the business, and had so controlled all its processes that, at the time of our story, although Oliver Munton had a good business reputation on the Exchange, and personally conducted the financial arrangements of his now extensive and varied business, the practical director of the concern was our modest, painstaking, plodding friend Joe. The business had been long ago removed to spacious and extensive premises, where, one after another, different collateral trades had been added to the original one, in each case as the result of Joe's working out and mastering the details of the new trade.

Joe Warrender was not one of that large class of men one so often meets with in mechanical pursuits, who are content to work on for ever by rule of thumb. He never felt satisfied with any new process or production until he had thoroughly worked out its prime cost, and tabulated its results, which in due course got entered in a capacious pocket-book he always carried, and which, from the comprehensive variety of its contents, its unquestioned authority, and a superstitious exaggeration of its range of information, was called by the workmen "Warrender's almighty book." There was not a question of weight, of cost, of specific gravity, or of alloy, that could not be answered from this wonderful compilation, combining the results of twenty years of calculation, observation, and experience.

About two years before the events we are recording, Mr. Munton's eldest son, George, had left school and entered his father's office. Joe had known Master George from the time when as a child he had visited the works in his holidays, and a kindly feeling towards his master's son had sprung up, increasing as he grew towards manhood. And when the youth came to take a place in the business, Joe welcomed him cordially, and spared no trouble to show him the ins and outs of the trade.

It was not long before Master George saw that the "almighty book" contained the key to the whole concern, and he suggested to his father the idea of borrowing the book for him to take a copy of it, not having the courage to ask Joe for it himself.

The father took an early opportunity of asking Joe to lend George the book in question in the evenings when he was not using it, and asked, apparently as a favour, that Joe would help him all he could in mastering the trade, finishing up with—"Do all you can for him, Joe. I'll make it worth your while. You have been a good trusty fellow, and after Christmas we'll see what can be done about your salary."

For the credit of humanity, let us hope Mr. Munton meant all he said. Certainly he kept his word at Christmas to the extent of increasing Joe's wages by twenty pounds a year.

On the strength of this, Joe and Nancy had carried out a long cherished ambition to move from the town-house they had hitherto occupied to a small but pretty villa in the nearest suburb. They had now two children, a boy of about ten and the little three-year-old Nannie, and both father and mother were desirous of getting them away if possible from the deteriorating surroundings of a Birmingham back street.

Besides, Joe, like most busy men, had a hobby. He was fond of flowers. Town-born and town-bred as he was, this taste for horticulture may at first sight seem strange. But, perhaps, there was nothing so very wonderful in it. He had never in his youth known that familiarity with flowers which brings indifference, if it does not breed contempt, and consequently the simplest flower excited a passing interest in Joe's admiring eyes. And so when he found himself in the possession of a dozen yards of garden ground, he thought he was in Eden. His ambition, however, soon carried him beyond the cultivation of hardy annuals, and he had recently set up a small portable greenhouse and gone in for growing pelargoniums. He had cultivated these with such success, that he had lately exhibited some blooms of his favourite variety—a pure white, zoned with cherry colour—at the Town Hall show; and he had now struck some plants which he had every reason to believe would carry off one of the prizes in the very next competition.

But, unfortunately, the tide of prosperity in the hardware trades had slowly but persistently ebbed. Speculative purchases in copper which had at first been one of the principal factors in Mr. Munton's early successes, now proved in every instance a loss; and at the same time keen competition kept the profits on manufacturing at a vanishing point. And so, as soon as George Munton had got a complete copy of Joe's "almighty book," and felt competent with his father and the subordinate foremen to manage the concern, the temptation to economise by saving Joe's salary was too strong to be long resisted, and, as we have seen, he was offered a post as warehouseman, which he indignantly declined.

When a great bewildering trouble befalls us, it is often some inconsiderable detail which for a time absorbs our attention, as if the mind found relief in considering that instead of exhausting its energies in trying to comprehend the vague vastness of the disaster. So with poor Joe Warrender and his wife. The one tangible feature of their trouble was the fact that, whatever else it might or might not mean, it was certain they would have to leave their pretty home, which they had begun to love so much—with its pure air and bright sunshine, its flowers and trees—and to return to the dingy smoky town streets, rendered more squalid than ever by their short experience of the comparative paradise of a suburb. And to Joe's mind came, with absurd disproportion, the thought of his choice pelargoniums, which it would be so utterly impossible to grow in town.

And so the two sat, sad and silent, picturing a dark future, and counting one by one the many pleasant things they would soon have to forego, until they were roused from their gloomy reverie by the return of little John, who was brimful of the wonders of some dissolving views he had been witnessing at a school entertainment.

Joe Warrender was happily not without the consolation of religion, and in the case of another's trouble would have promptly pointed out sources of comfort and hope. But at present the future seemed as black to him as if he had been brought up in an atheist creed and had never been able to catch a glimpse of the loving face of "our Father which art in heaven."

He had long been in the habit of having family prayer, but to-night he suggested it should be dispensed with. He felt that the heavens were as brass. The suggestion was a great grief to Nancy. Again she came to his help.

"Don't say that, Joe, dear! That would be a bad start. Let me read to-night."

And when John had brought to his mother's knee the old family Bible, the little woman hesitated but a moment, and then, turning quickly to the thirty-seventh Psalm, she read in a clear voice, that seemed the very articulation of confident faith, the words that have been the comfort of so many a downcast spirit.

"Fret not thyself because of evildoers."

"Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed."

"Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in Him; and He shall bring it to pass."

"Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him."

"A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked."

"The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord: and He delighteth in his way."

"Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down: for the Lord upholdeth him with His hand."

And so the grand old promises came pealing forth in his wife's clear ringing tones, like shore-bells guiding a fog-bound mariner into a haven of safety. When the Psalm ended with its triumphant burst of confidence in God, Joe had not only lost his gloom and bitterness, but was actually smiling through dimmed eyes at his dear wife. And when he knelt down he was able to pour forth his trouble in a few earnest petitions, and then confiding himself and his dear ones, his present and his future, to his loving Father, who knew all and could do all, the fond pair sought their couch in cheerful resignation, and hopeful expectation of deliverance.

But, alas! this hopeful feeling did not abide. It was much easier to be sanguine of a possible opening before any attempt had been made to find one, than to be hopeful after weeks of eager inquiry, and anxious canvassing among all his acquaintances, and in every kindred trade, had failed to offer anything better than a vague promise to remember him if anything dropped out.

CHAPTER II.—ALL OVER AGAIN.

THE last week at Munton's had come and gone, and Joe Warrender had heard of nothing likely to suit him. As a special favour, his landlord had arranged to let him off at only three months' notice, and he was in treaty with an acquaintance for the sale, at a ridiculously low figure, of his little green-house. His choice plants he had promised to several amateur florists. He had visited every likely place and yet could hear of nothing to his advantage. Day after day he started out on his weary search after employment, and returned heart-sick, as well as tired from his fruitless perambulations.

His wife tried her best to be cheerful and bright, but her face was fast becoming sharpened with care and apprehension. As all sources of income were now closed, she jealously watched every penny of expenditure, and practised the anxious economy of fear, instead of the pleasant thrift of voluntary carefulness.

She was one morning at work in her trim kitchen, making an apple-pudding for dinner, and brooding over her troubles in silent hopelessness. Little John was at school, and Nannie, after several fruitless attempts to interest her mother in her play, had given up the attempt, and was "making believe" with an all-absorbing interest.

Nancy had just rolled her paste into a lump, and was stooping over her paste-board to hide from the child the tears which were actually falling into the flour, when she heard the familiar click of Joe's latch-key in the front door, and in a second more she heard him close the door behind him with a bang, and shout with a voice like a bugle—

"It's all over, Nannie!"

In less time than it takes to tell it she was by his side in the little hall, with her arms round his neck, and sobbing for joy as she asked him what he meant.

What mattered it that Joe's overcoat was marked with an Ulster badge of white flour; or that the pot boiled dry waiting for the pudding, which never got made; or that Nannie, missing her mother from the kitchen, had tried her hand on the paste with such success that she was dusted from head to foot like a miller's apprentice? Sorrow could afford to wait. No danger of its bitter fruit spoiling by keeping. But joy's exquisite clusters must be shared with the bloom on.

"Yes, our anxiety is all over at last, love."

"How?"

"Why, I am to start in business on my own account!"

"Joe?" responded his wife, with an inflexion of voice expressive of surprise, wonder, and fear.

"It's all right, Nannie. Never fear. I'm to find the brains and experience, and a gentleman friend is to provide the capital. Hurrah!"—and the sedate old-fashioned Joe, who had never learned a step in his life, actually attempted a pas seul which was so utterly ridiculous, that his wife began to wonder if he had lost his mental balance, and to question if the good luck he had reported were really true.

"And who is the friend, Joe?"

"Walter Birchall, Esq., Metal Broker, of Cannon Street, London, and New Street, Birmingham!" answered he with boastful pomposity, while he watched with great amusement the growing wonder expressed in his wife's face.

"Mr. Birchall!" said she, and well she might. That name had been for years in her thoughts a synonym for all that was respectable, substantial and wealthy. She had of course never had the honour of an introduction to so great a man, but she had seen him on two occasions supporting the mayor on the platform at Town Hall meetings, and when Joe had pointed him out as a great citizen with whom he had a speaking acquaintance, she had felt that some measure of his dignity and importance were reflected on them. He was a tall, square-shouldered man, of near upon sixty, whose well-set head was adorned with an abundance of almost snowy hair; and it seemed to Nancy Warrender that he was the very model for a perfectly honest and upright millionaire.

It appears that Mr. Birchall happened to call at Oliver Munton's works that week after Joe had left, and missing the busy clerk, enquired if he were away ill.

"No," said Mr. Munton, "he's not ill—he has—in fact, he has left."

"Left you?" said the old gentleman. "Nothing the matter, I trust?"

"Nothing at all, except that—well, the fact is, trade is so bad, we were obliged to cut down expenses. We offered him, as an alternative, the chief place in the warehouse, but he refused, and chose to leave."

"He was a rare fellow," said Mr. Birchall quietly, as if talking to himself rather than to Mr. Munton. "I should have thought you could ill-spare a man like him. How long had he been with you, now? Ever since I knew you certainly."

"Yes, he has been with us over twenty years."

"Has he got into anything yet?"

"He hadn't on Saturday, but he still refused to fall in with our offer, though he looked downhearted enough."

"Well, you have surprised me," said Mr. Birchall, rising and putting on his hat, "I certainly thought him quite a fixture here."

It was evident the old gentleman had some absorbing idea in his head as he went out, for he neither acknowledged nor saw the deferential bows of the junior clerks as he passed through the general office.

Arrived at the street entrance, he asked the porter if he had any idea where Mr. Warrender might be found, and hearing from the old pensioner that he was intending to call at the old place that morning, Mr. Birchall took out a card, and hurriedly pencilling on the back, "Meet me at my office at earliest convenience," stepped into his brougham and drove off.

Thus it was that Joe Warrender, having dejectedly gone to the scene of his former labours, with the intention of clearing up a few matters with the foremen, was induced by the bit of pasteboard to proceed hastily and anxiously to Mr. Birchall's office, where in less than an hour all the preliminaries of a partnership were arranged.

Joe learned that the old gentleman had long intended adding manufacturing to his merchant business, and having some large and convenient premises idle, he only wanted to put his hand on a trustworthy competent manager to decide about starting. The thought had often crossed his mind that Mr. Munton's manager was just the fellow he wanted, but concluding that he and his employer suited each other, he had given up all hope of securing him. But now that Mr. Munton had treated Joe in a way he could not help characterising as shabby, he felt no scruples about doing himself and Joe a good turn by enlisting his interest in the new venture.

We may be quite sure Joe felt no disinclination for family prayer that evening. When at the appointed time little Johnnie brought his father the well-worn Bible, Joe asked—

"Where shall I read to-night, love?"

"Wherever you like, Joe," said she absently, for her mind was otherwhere, and then, seeing a suggestive smile on her husband's face, she added, "I don't think you can improve on the thirty-seventh Psalm. Do you?"

Joe was amazed to find how sweet the old Psalm was in his new experiences. He thought he had exhausted all its comfort at the last reading of it, but now it was like looking over a familiar landscape bright with new and glorious sunshine.

After the children were in bed, Joe and his wife had a long delightful chat, and laughed and cried together over their bright prospects, with as charming an interest as ever they did over their first house furnishing projects.

Joe had, of course, already sent a note to his landlord withdrawing his notice to leave, and informing him he hoped to occupy the house for some years. Equally, of course, Joe did not sell his little greenhouse at the ruinous sacrifice anticipated, nor did he sell it at all, but indulged his horticultural predilections to his heart's content. And, of course, he did not distribute his choice collection of pelargoniums, but actually took the first prize at the Town Hall for his wonderfully pretty pink and white bloom.

The business of Birchall and Warrender proved a great success. They started in the tube drawing branch; but before two years had gone, they added rolling machinery and wire drawing. Mr. Warrender brought out several patented processes of great utility, and in five years the business had developed into a larger concern than the older firm of Munton and Sons. In fact, that firm gradually receded. Even the "almighty book" was found not to be omnipotent apart from its author's brains, and Joe's old employer was driven to the necessity of paying him a royalty on the adoption of some of his patented processes.

Joseph Warrender, Esq., is now a prominent man in his native town. He might long ago have been a member of its town council had he desired the honour; but he preferred less prominent though not less useful spheres. He is a leading man in all religious works, a Sunday-school superintendent, and director of many social and commercial undertakings.

He still grows pelargoniums for exhibition, though declining to compete for prizes.

In all his prosperity he never forgets the day of adversity. Over the fireplace in his breakfast room there hangs, in a splendid gilt frame, a large illuminated text, prettily painted by his eldest daughter Nannie—

"Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in Him; and He shall bring it to pass."

"TOM BROWN."

HOSPITAL NURSES

IN LONDON AND ON THE CONTINENT.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER VI.—BUDA-PESTH AND MILAN.

WE were anxious to see the hospitals and system of nursing at Buda-Pesth, and therefore on leaving Vienna took that route to Italy rather than either of the others.

Pesth is barely six hours' distance by rail from Vienna, yet how wonderfully different are the cities and the peoples.

On our way through the streets of Pesth to the hospital we were much interested in the chemists' shops, over each of which hung a sign "To the Saviour," "To the Holy Trinity," etc., bearing witness to the fact that the Hungarians regard the art of healing as sacred.

The large hospital in Pesth is more like the general hospital in Vienna, and what we saw of it distressed us equally. There seemed no order or cleanliness about it, and it was impossible to find any person of authority. For more than an hour we marched round and round dirty, cheerless corridors, in search of some one who would give us permission to go over it, but without effect, meeting on our way, however, unattractive nurses, convalescents in greasy soiled dressing-gowns, and helpers equally unkempt, carrying the unappetising food from the kitchens to the wards.

We were not successful in getting into the wards or kitchens, so we can say little or nothing of this hospital, except that it adheres to the old style of nursing and administration, which we are striving so hard to get rid of.

We were more successful in our visit to the Elisabeth Hospital on the Buda side of the Danube, across which we went by the magnificent suspension bridge known as Clarke's Bridge.

This hospital standing out of the town on a hill is built on the Pavilion principle, and nursed and managed by Red Cross Sisters.

In time of war it would be wholly devoted to wounded soldiers; but in time of peace it is used as a general hospital for the people of Buda-Pesth.

It consists of four pavilions and nine barracks, and when in full use would accommodate eight hundred wounded soldiers. In time of peace, however, the four pavilions alone are used, and enable the authorities to receive a hundred and twenty patients.

Two of these are devoted to separate or paying patients, and two to the non-paying.

Each pavilion is provided with four good large bathrooms and supplied with every conceivable necessary and comfort.

A first-class separate room costs six guldens a day (about 10*s.*), which includes everything. One could not desire anything better—the rooms are light, airy and cheerful—good spring mattresses on the beds, and an air of cleanliness and neatness everywhere.

The second class room costs three guldens a day, and seemed little if anything inferior to the first class.

Attached to the paying pavilions is a large cheerful room where patients can sit, if well enough to rise, while their rooms are being aired and cleansed.

We saw several women patients walking about looking cheerful and clean, and one dear little girl who seemed to be everyone's pet.

We next went to the common or third-class pavilions, common, only, inasmuch as eight persons sleep in one room, and third class simply to distinguish it from the other two classes.

Another difference is that first and second class patients may wear clothes and linen of their own providing, while the third class are obliged to wear those supplied by the hospital.

On an average, the daily cost of a bed to the hospital is three guldens, sixty kreuzers (about 5*s.* 7*d.*).

No infectious case is taken here, but should any infectious disease occur among the nurses or patients while in the hospital, they are placed in an isolated pavilion reserved for such.

The matron or superintendent is a baroness, Sister of the Red Cross and devoted to her work. Both she and the doctor took us into every corner of the hospital, anxious that we should see thoroughly the working of each department.

Every six months twelve probationers are received here, learning, both by daily work in the wards and by lectures, the work of nursing. They must remain two years, at the end of which, if they pass their final examination with credit and bear a high character, they are received as Red Cross Sisters, and their badge, a brooch with a red cross, is bestowed upon them. The Red Cross Sisters hold themselves ready for private nursing in the town if required.

On leaving the wards we were taken into the washing or laundry pavilion; the most perfect we have seen anywhere, at home or abroad. All the laundry work of the hospital is done here. As many as four or five thousand pieces a week passing through the hands.

They have all the best machines for washing and rinsing—huge coppers where the linen soaks—all of which are in one immense room. Passing out of this to one on the same floor, we see the linen sorted and packed in large baskets, and a few steps leading up out of this room brings us to a small one where the drying closets, such as are to be seen in all our London hospitals, are situated.

We were called on to admire the quality of the sheets and other bed linen, which is certainly excellent.

Leaving this department we next visited the kitchen which cooks for all the pavilions. The cooking is done by steam, and extremely well done, but we were surprised to hear that no broken or left food is allowed to be given away as in our hospitals. There are six cooks.

The method of conveying the food from the kitchen to the various pavilions is admirable. It is by little covered hand-carts fitted with trays; the food reaching the patients warm and nice looking.

Of course the probationers learn the work of every department under the sisters. In every particular this may rightly be regarded as a model Red Cross hospital, and it would be worth visiting by any one interested in hospital work.

I noticed the absence of flowers and plants in the wards, and was surprised to hear from the lady superintendent that she disapproved of them altogether in hospitals. I could not help remembering how they cheered the sick in our London hospitals.

As this is the last hospital we shall see at present under the care of the Red Cross Sisters, it may not be out of place to say how thoroughly appreciated and recognised is the work performed by women under the banner of the Red Cross. How marvellously successful they are in their work of love; whether it be in taking comfort to the battle-field, performing heroic deeds by the sick bed, or in introducing order and cleanliness into the homes of the poor, one must watch them to know. May they go on nursing, saving, and strengthening the lives of the people, and using their opportunities to bring the sick to the True Physician!

THE HOSPITAL IN MILAN.

The L' Ospedale Maggiore di Milano, which stands near the church of San Nazaro in Broglio, was formerly the palace of the Sforzas, and retains many traces of its former grandeur.

It was the gift of Francesco Sforza, who expressed his wish that it should be a grand and solemn hospital, worthy of his dukedom and of the illustrious city of Milan.

It has been in existence as a hospital since 1456, and not a hospital we have visited, either at home or abroad, exceeds it in order, cleanliness, quiet and regularity.

All cases of sickness are taken in, and the size of the building may be imagined, when I say there were 2600 patients within its walls the day we were there, and that in times of epidemic they can accommodate 4000.

Large as it is, however, and notwithstanding its six branches in other parts of Milan, it is yet insufficient for the ever-increasing population.

Sixty sisters, 250 women-nurses, and 112 men are employed in the wards. There are also 115 doctors and 20 chemists.

Each ward contains sixty patients, and is under the care of one sister, four lay nurses, and one man.

We began our inspection of the hospital by entering the "Santa Corona" department, where very poor people from outside, taking with them an order from a doctor, can get medicine and advice gratis. Four to five thousand avail themselves of this free dispensary daily, and are attended to by thirty to forty medical men.

We entered the cavern-like dispensary where the chemists were busily engaged in making up and sending away the different medicines.

Leading out of this was another similar room, in the centre of which stood a row of copper cauldrons, each with the name of the concoction within written above, such as solution of arnica, so as to prevent any mistake.

In one of the side walls was a trap door, opening into the outer corridor, through which empty trays were received, and returned filled with the made-up prescriptions.

We mounted some stairs and found ourselves in the infants' ward, at the entrance of which was a porteress in a little box, whose duty it is to see that the visitors convey no food or prohibited articles to the patients whom they come to see.

Every ward in the hospital has such a porter or porteress—visitors may give oranges and lemons and grated cheese to the patients, but no meat, bread, wine, or spirituous liquors.

This rule the contadini, or country people, are always attempting to break, and they would succeed but for the vigilance of these officers at the entrance.

The children looked happy and pretty in their little white beds, which were arranged down each side and along the centre. This last was a single row, but in the larger wards a double row of beds is arranged down the middle back to back.

There was a table in this ward for small operations, the more important ones being performed in the theatre close by.

The theatre possesses a good light, an operating table, and an extra table close to it with all necessary apparatus, and a machine with tubing attached, through which water can be directed on to the patient when needed.

There are two surgical wards for women and four for men. These wards are enormous, more like churches, running the height of the hospital, and on looking upon them from above, we were astonished at their proportions. A glass screen in the centre divides them in two—formerly from their size they were too draughty.

Throughout the whole hospital the beds are excellent, and the nurses are proud of the wire mattresses.

The kitchen is a most tempting place. It is under the direction of three sisters, seven women, and four men cooks. Here the food is prepared for the sick alone, not for the sisters or nurses.

As we entered, all were busy ladling out the soup, meat, and vegetables into various pails and pans, as carefully cooked and served as though for a private table.

There is a crane to lift the huge coppers from off the fire. Outside is an electric board which notifies how much coffee and milk mixed, and coffee alone is required.

Everything connected with the food, whether of quantity, quality, or kind, is clearly noted down, together with the date and special patient to whom it is sent.

The dispensing of the food is entrusted to three sisters and one servant.

The time for patients' meals is eight o'clock breakfast, one o'clock dinner, and seven o'clock supper; and the doctors' visits are at seven o'clock and eight o'clock in the morning, and at half-past seven in the evening.

The laundry is fitted up with the most perfect machinery, and the whole work performed by twenty men and twenty-four women under the supervision of two sisters.

Fifteen hundred to two thousand sheets are washed every day, and the average weight of linen washed in a year is 1,934,385 kilos.

The amount of Cardiff coal used in the laundry in the year, was 2993 cwt.; of coke, 1809; of wood, 1181; of soda, 176.

The linen from the infectious wards is washed in a separate place.

All linen is found by the hospital, and is given to the poor women of Milan to make up.

We were shown into the book-keeping rooms, which greatly interested me. The books are huge and kept in a most methodical manner.

A daily register is kept of every ounce of food, whether of meat, meal, vegetable, or bread, and of every drop of drink, whether of wine, milk, coffee, or tea consumed. Each book lasts a year, and without the least difficulty one can ascertain the year's consumption.

We next went to the coach-house and saw the four carriages, or ambulances, in use. One is for fetching the sick from their homes to the hospital. It is provided with cushions, curtains, and every comfort.

A separate one, and equally comfortable, is used only to take convalescents from the hospital: a practice we thought good and prudent.

A third is for bringing and taking insane people who are received here until they can be taken to proper houses.

There is yet a fourth, which is used for infectious cases, and kept in a separate house.

Some of the patients who can afford it pay two lire a day, but are treated in no wise different to those who pay nothing, nor have they separate rooms.

There is no department in this large hospital but bears the stamp of forethought and cleanliness, and the question naturally arises as to what is the secret of its efficiency. One need only pay a visit into every corner of it, as we did, to recognise that the skill of the doctors and the beneficent desires of the directors are followed up by the most skilful nursing and careful supervision. Nothing is too small or too insignificant to come within the range of discipline.

This and indeed nearly all the hospitals in Italy are nursed and superintended by the sisters of St. Vincent de Paul.

In consequence of the law suppressing religious orders, the existence of these sisters cannot be legally recognised—they are therefore called sorveglianti, or superintendents; but, whatever the name, it does not alter the character of their work; and, in spite of all, they continue to be called Sisters.

Every department of the hospital, whether wards, kitchens, laundry, wardrobes, dispensaries, or clerks' offices, is under their superintendence; so also are the nurses and helpers.

The sisters and nurses are lodged in the hospital; the pay of the first is one lira fifty cents. a day (about 1*s.* 3*d.*) and food, with the privilege of having it in kind or money.

The nurses, besides their board and lodging, are provided with one uniform a year, blue and white striped, and a daily wage of from sixty to ninety cents. While the probationer is on her trials she receives only thirty cents. a day.

While the nurses are in attendance upon the insane and infectious patients they have an increase of twenty cents. daily in their wage.

Although there is no definite assurance of pensions to those who work long and faithfully, yet the Council never permits such workers to go without annuities.

In 1861 a friend of the hospital, Ignazio Risnati, left all his means to this hospital, with the injunction that it was to be applied towards augmenting the salaries of the nurses, and for rewarding good and faithful service, so as to make the pay more in accordance with the needs of life, and to give them some sign of favour in the shape of silver and bronze medals.

The ceremony of giving these rewards is one of pomp and solemnity; with the highest medal one hundred lire are also bestowed; with each of the next three, which are simple silver medals, fifty lire are given, and with each of the four bronze medals twenty-five lire are given.

Other benefactors have since followed in his steps.

There is a large stone placed in a prominent position on which are written the names of those nurses who have fallen victims to contagion while working in the infectious wards; it is impossible to say how much the living nurses think of this.

A great point is to secure vigilance at night in the nurses whose turn it is to watch. Two sisters take it in turn the whole night through, going from ward to ward, cheering and helping the nurses and the sick alike.

Those who have seen these ladies at work must admire them; they are so skilful in assisting the sick, so thoughtful over their needs, so ready and gentle in wiping away tears, so comforting to the sorrowful; and they so entirely devote their lives without a thought of self to the inmates of those abodes of pain in which they have chosen to dwell.

Public sick nursing is a work of Christ-like love and compassion, whether it be undertaken by our hospital sisters at home, or by the Albertinerins, the Red Cross Sisters, or the Deaconesses and the Sisters of St. Vincent de Paul on the Continent. It is a work which will make the nineteenth century remembered as the one in which women found their vocation and followed it even to the sacrifice of their lives.

OUR EBEN-EZERS AND OUR NAPHTALIS.

"Then Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us."—1 Samuel vii. 12.

"O Naphtali, satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord."—Deut. xxxiii. 23.

IF the setting up of this pillar memorialising the Divine help was typical of marked epochs of deliverance in the lives of God's children through all the various tracks of time, just as typical were the circumstances under which it came to be raised.

The Israelites had been in difficulties that threatened to overwhelm them, and their difficulties came upon them when it might appear that they had least reason to expect them.

Had not the ark of the Lord, for which the hearts of the fathers of the congregation trembled, been brought from Bethshemesh and placed in the jealous guardianship of Abinadab's consecrated son?

Had not the hearts of all the House of Israel been lamenting long after Him who was known to them as the great I AM, and who had promised by many a holy covenant, and by many a comfortable word spoken in the wilderness, to be a rewarder of all them that diligently seek Him?

And to the mind of these Hebrew children, whose spiritual education was yet incomplete, awaiting the fulness of the time, temporal blessings did not lie outside the circle of the Divine blessing as a kind of happy accident unworthy their desire or care; they were included within it, an inheritance for their posterity, a pledge of present favour, an earnest of better things to come.

And yet after mourning long over their sins, and lamenting after the Lord, as a child becoming conscious of loneliness cries after the father—whom a turn in the road has hidden from his sight—after pouring out their penitent hearts like water before God, the only effect of their gathering together seems to be that those remorseless lords of the Philistines, are swooping down upon them, and soon there will be an utter rout.

"Oh, pray! pray!" they say unto Samuel. "Cease not to cry unto the Lord our God for us, that He will save us out of the hands of the Philistines."

The answer to prayer was to the eye of sense delayed, and yet the very circumstances that were so trying to their faith, were "working together for their good."

The on-moving Philistines came down full charge, but their war was with the elements. For battle dust and din, there was the roar of thunder, while like a destroying angel the swift forked lightning glanced hither and thither, and death and destruction were the consequences of its terrible play.

So signal was the defeat of the haughty Philistines that they came no more into the coasts of these people for whom the very heavens contended.

The extremity of the Israelites had been God's opportunity—no human help could have availed them. So they would see it looking back, and in all the joy of this fresh deliverance, Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying, "Hitherto hath the Lord helped us."

"Hitherto." Yes, whether they looked back on as much of the past as was included in their own brief lives, or in the lives of their fathers since the time of the Exodus, they were bound to acknowledge that the Lord had helped them. Their fathers had trusted in Him, they had trusted, and were not confounded. The children also had the sanction of a very rich and varied experience.

So it is, that that emphatic pregnant word "Eben-ezer" has come down from them to us, and thousands of believers in every generation have given it their happy and thankful endorsement. Eben-ezer—the word stands above many a humble house of prayer that the contributions of the poor have raised. We have seen it cleanly-carved above the door of the modest home that thrift and the blessing of the Lord on the diligent hand had given to old age. The venerable saint, nearing the end of the earthly pilgrimage, breathes it in the ear of children and of children's children. The earnest man, the timid woman entangled in the worldly snare, says it with backward look upon the past and wistful believing gaze into the future.

Yes: hitherto hath the Lord helped us. Let us thank Him for having cared for us and kept us thus far, before we commit the perplexed present, the future behind curtains, to His care.

Never does the period draw near when the old year retires into the eternal past and the new one steps out from the eternal future, that a thousand hearts and minds are not engaged in recalling the events which the last twelve months have brought to them, that after the retrospect they may erect Eben-ezers, the full signification of which is oftentimes between themselves and God. Sicknesses cured, calamities averted, beloved wanderers brought into the fold, family breaches healed, property saved. Oh! with how many the position has seemed as desperate as it did to the Israelites when the Philistines were sweeping down upon them, but somehow deliverance came. Perhaps not so signally as to the Hebrew children, but still just as certainly.

Faith has said: "It is the Lord. He sent from above, He took me, He drew me out of many waters." We need to encourage ourselves by remembering the past, that we may go forward to meet the future. How many glance furtively with feelings of sick apprehension to the year that is coming. They dare not look it in the face; they feel so sure that in the secret scroll it carries there are dark portents for them, and for their father's house, or for their little ones. Their hearts fail them, considering the signs of the times, depression in trade, symptoms of disease, sounds of the Philistines preparing for attack. They do not know what is written in that scroll, but they know full well what is likely to be, so far as they are concerned.

Ah! a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. Did they know all that would be before they wrote their last Eben-ezer, and Eben-ezer before that again?

If this year is like the years beyond the flood, must not Eben-ezer once more be the Finis?

Has God used up all His means of deliverance? Have we come to the end of our faith and gratitude, of our stones of help? Where the way of deliverance has been manifest to us once, has not the danger risen before us a hundred times, magnified by the mist, till it loomed upon us like a tall son of Anak, with whom we were not able to contend?

"Let us forward," cried a voice from the deep, a voice whose dying accents were "How beautiful is God!"[1]

"Let us forward: God leads us; though blind, shall we be afraid to follow? I do not see my way; I do not care to; but I know that He sees His way, and that I see Him, and I cannot believe that, in spite of all one's sins, He will forget His gracious promises."

"They looked unto Him and were lightened, and their faces were not ashamed."

Yet while we lay our hands on our stones of help, and bend our heads reverently over them, making these stones an altar for the renewal of self-dedication, does not something whisper to us of more blessed experiences, which we have coveted all too languidly, and only sought fitfully to possess?

"Eben-ezer; Hitherto hath the Lord helped us!" The word is good, but it speaks perhaps of ever-recurring pain, and need and conflict. Is our life here to be all made up of the contest with flesh and blood, and a weary world, with brief moments of exultation and occasional notes of praise? Do those of us who believe, not enter into rest, until Death has laid his cold hand on our heart's tumultuous beatings?

Like a burst of jubilant music, sweeps through the heart the memory of these words of benediction on the Patriarch's son:—"Satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord."

What must it be to be satisfied? Oh, happy Naphtali, and seven times enriched! Can such a fulness of blessing, temporal and spirtual, be the portion of any beside thee? Can the heirs of God's spiritual Israel ask for, believe for, hope for, so much except on the hither side of Jordan?

We look to be satisfied, when we behold His face in righteousness, when we "awake with His likeness," but can we, even in this cold, hard, mutable world, be "satisfied with favour"?

To the law and to the testimony.

"The promise is to you and your children," says the Holy Book, and we see the verification of it in lives that, like our own, were full of trial, in hearts that sometimes knew dismay.

"In His presence is fulness of joy," is true of this world as well as of that which is to come.

The earnest of His Spirit in our hearts must be a rich foretaste of the inheritance which waits upon the final manifestation of the sons of God; for what is the kingdom of God but righteousness and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost?

"Satisfied with favour." Paul the Aged makes heathen Nero welcome to his head. His soul is in other keeping; he is persuaded all is well.

And have we not had Naphtalis in our midst, of whom we may think lovingly and reverently as "satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord?"

There are young Naphtalis to call to mind as well as aged ones; but more naturally we recall the veteran, reposing in a green old age, in the light of a glorious, setting sun.

As we write, we think upon the stately passage to the grave of one, who for many years had been an overseer of Christ's flock.

His last wish had been gratified, for he had lived to see his ninetieth year. On his eighty-ninth birthday his children, and his children's children, and their children again, received from his hand their tokens of his love, and felt it laid upon their heads, while words of patriarchal blessing flowed from his lips.

When a few months afterwards he was laid upon his bed of death, beatific brightness beamed upon his countenance.

"Satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the Lord?" enquired a friend, who had just been ushered into his presence; but he lay in a repose so deep, it was doubtful whether the words reached his consciousness.

"Shall we say of you, 'O, Naphtali, satisfied with favour?'" was repeated once again.

The dying saint instantly caught what was meant. His left hand was clenched, and his arm energetically extended upwards, and so held for several seconds, in evident reference to the exulting words spoken of all the tribes which shortly after follow: "The eternal God is Thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."

And those everlasting arms are stretched out to us, for us to cast ourselves into and be satisfied. Yes, after all the childish wailing and the long unrest and weariness with the burden which we cannot carry, but which He can carry so easily for us, while we lean it upon Him.

After the disquietude and weeping shall be the sweet hushing and the soft wiping away of tears.

We may come to the peak of our highest experiences by a very painful and difficult path, but His leading will surely bring us to it.

Let the weak in faith, the almost despairing take to heart these words also of a voice that spoke out of the deep, and they will learn how the healing, and rest, and full heart-satisfaction may come.

"Art thou robbed, wounded, deserted, left to die, worsted in the battle of life, and fallen in its rugged road, with no counsel, no strength, no hope, no purpose left? Then remember that there is One, walking to and fro in this world unseen, but ever present, whose form is as the form of the Son of man. . . . He will stablish, strengthen, settle thee; He will bind up thy wounds, and pour in the oil, and the wine of His Spirit—the Holy Ghost, the Comforter—and will carry thee to His own inn, whereof it is written: 'He will hide thee secretly in His own presence from the provoking of men. He will keep thee in His tabernacle from the strife of tongues. He will give His angels charge over thee to keep thee in all thy ways.' And He will give thee rest at last in the bosom of the Father, from which thou like all human souls camest forth at first, and to which thou shalt at last return, with all human souls who have in them the Spirit of God, and of Christ and of eternal life."

[1] Rev. Canon Kingsley.

SARSON C. T. INGHAM.

LETTERS TO MY CHILDREN FROM THE EAST.

BY HENRY A. HARPER, AUTHOR OF "LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND," ETC.

IX.—THE HOUSE OR CHAMBER ON THE WALL.

CHAMBERS ON THE WALL.

YOU remember, children, when we were in Wales, I took you to Conway Castle. You saw the great towers and the high walls which still surround the town, and you know you went out through the gateways, and I told you that all cities at one time had walls round them like Conway. It would not have been safe to have lived as we do now, in the open country with merely a gate which any one can open leading to the gardens and the house. London even once long ago had a wall round it.

Jerusalem has a wall now; you can only leave the city by the gates, and they open at a certain hour in the morning and are closed at night; soldiers keeping watch all night in rooms near the gate.

In the Bible we find "the walls of the city" mentioned many times, and very often also "the gates of the city." Once the people heard that a man they wanted to catch was in a city. So, as they thought to be quite sure of him, they shut the gates and waited about for him, but at midnight when they all slept, Samson went and took the gates and the posts and even the bar and carried them away to the top of a hill far away, and so he escaped from his enemies. He, you know, was a very strong man.

When the Israelites first crossed the Jordan, and entered into the Holy Land, they found a strong city, Jericho, with walls and towers which stopped their way. It protected and closed the great road into the Holy Land, so they were obliged to stop. Joshua, who was now their leader, wished to find out how strong his enemies were, so he sent out two men as spies, that is, they were to pretend to be people of the country. They were to look about and find out where the soldiers were, and how many of them; if there were any weak places in the walls, or anything of that sort, and then go back and tell him. They got inside this city Jericho by the gates, but they had not long been there when the king heard of them and sent men to seize them; but a woman, out of kindness to them and fear of God, hid them under some flax on her roof, and at night when it was dark (Josh. ii. 15), "she let them down by a cord through the window, for her house was upon the town wall, and she dwelt upon the wall," and so they got away.

In the Second Book of Kings (ch. iv. ver. 10), we also read of a good woman who wished to be kind to a prophet of God. His name was Elisha. This woman lived in a little town or village on the plain of Esdraelon—Shunen. There is a little village there now, and I think many of the houses there are built just as they might have been in the days of this prophet, at least I thought so when I was there. This good woman asked her husband to let her build "a little chamber on the wall," for the good man. She put a bed, a table and a stool in it, so now whenever he passed that way he had his own little room always ready. And another time when David, who afterwards became king, was in danger of his life from Saul, his wife Michal (1 Samuel xix. 12), "let David down through the window" and so he got away. And we read again, of St. Paul, when he was at Damascus, the Jews hated him, because he was so good. They wished to kill him (Acts ix. 23, 25). They watched the gates day and night, so that if he attempted to go out they would kill him. But the other disciples "took him by night and let him down through the wall, lowering him in a basket." Paul himself says he was let down by a "rope," and so he got away. This little picture will show how all these things could happen. In Jerusalem, I once saw a woman let down a bucket by a rope that another woman outside might give her a pail of water; so then I saw how it was that David and Paul and the others could get away.

My sketch was made in the great convent of "Mar Saba," and here there were many "little chambers" built into "the wall," and people lived in them. In many Eastern cities I have seen lots of these little rooms. At Constantinople on the old walls I sketched several. And so, children, I think you will now be able to understand what these "little" rooms on walls were like. You see God used these "little rooms" to save those who loved and served Him

New Year's Eve.

OH God, my life has run to waste,
And I have nought to bring;
No fruits that seem a worthy gift
To offer to my King.

Through mingled motives, selfish aims,
Through fears, and doubts, and strife,
I scarce discern the love and praise,
The sap which is the life.

'Tis useless—I give up the quest,
From all the past I flee;
From all my failures and my sins
My refuge is in Thee.

In Thee—what peace those words contain!
Can Thy pure life be mine?
Thy death hath won that life for me,
And righteousness divine.

And if from out my wasted life
Some plants of beauty spring
To bloom in Paradise for Thee,
Fit for my Lord and King;

Then freed from pride and thoughts of self,
My greatest joy shall be,
That Thou art glorified, and not
That aught has come from me:

Then shall I never cease to praise
The wond'rous love and power
Which from such refuse soil could make
To bloom one heavenly flower.

LYDIA EWBANK.

LONDON: PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, LIMITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS.