UNTO THE UPRIGHT
THERE ARISETH
LIGHT IN THE DARKNESS.
Psalm cxii. 4

THE SUNDAY AT HOME.
A FAMILY MAGAZINE
FOR SABBATH READING
1888
LONDON
RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY
PATERNOSTER ROW 164 PICCADILLY.

Illustrations Coloured or on Toned Paper.

"Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness" . . . . . Frontispiece.
Sick Child . . . . . To face p. 126
"Come unto Me" . . . . . ,, 190
Meditation . . . . . ,, 268
Christ Preaching on the Lake . . . . . ,, 300
"For as the earth bringeth forth her bud" . . ,, 372
Three Hundred Years Ago—Lighting the Beacon Fire . . . . . To face p. 398
News of the Armada, 1588 . . . . . ,, 534
"Thy sun shall no more go down" . . . . ,, 588
Sunset on Tintern . . . . . ,, 646
The Blessing . . . . . ,, 689
Frieze from the Arch of Titus . . . . . ,, 753

LONDON: PRINTED BY WILLIAM CLOWES AND SONS, LIMITED, STAMFORD STREET AND CHARING CROSS.

Index.

PAGE

Alexander, Bishop and Mrs. 213
Amoy, Recent Explosion at 264
Ancestral Names 113
André-Walther, Madame, Some Recollections of 77
Anecdotes of John Welsh of Irongray . . 510
Arch of Titus at Rome 797
Armada, Danger from, in 1588 . . . 453
Armada Thanksgiving 533

Backwoods Preacher—Peter Cartwright . 149, 165, 180, 202
Bertie Danby's Training 495, 511, 526, 540, 559, 574, 591, 607, 621, 639
Bible Notes and Queries 60, 125, 141, 238, 253, 318, 407, 619, 669, 810, 815
Biography:—
Alexander, Bishop and Mrs. . . . 213
André-Walther, Madame . . . 77
Cartwright, Peter . . 149, 165, 180, 202
Drury, Rev. M. 251
Edwardes, Sir Herbert . . . 283, 298
Falconer, Ion Keith 709
Griffiths, Ann 762
Handel, George Frederick . . . 410
Hemans, Mrs.. . . . . 522, 614
Lasserre, Henri 508
Morley, Samuel 117
"Blessing" of Charles de Groux . . . 696
Blind, Library for the 380, 590
Buddhist Sermons, Stories from . . . 567
Bunyan Characteristics 549
Bunyan's Pulpits 537

Calm Sunday in the North Sea . . . 248
"Calmest, brightest when the sun goes down" 817
Canton, Day at 473
Cartwright, Peter, the Backwoods Preacher 149, 165, 180, 202
Chautauqua Summer Assembly . . . 772
Children's Prayer 61
Christian Angareion 197
Christmas Box in the Olden Time . . . 809
Christmas Boxes 816

Church History:—
Coptic Church. 44, 53
Paris at the Time of the Reformation 40, 104, 167, 257, 311, 369
Congo and its Missions 504, 521
Coptic Church 44, 53
Cornish Story 491
Cromwell, Deathbed of 393

Danger in 1588 453
Day at Canton 473
Day Dreams 472
Deathbed of Cromwell 393
Derry, Bishop of, and Mrs. Alexander . 213
"Docky" 428
Downs, Mission Work in the 530
Duchess in a Sunday School 655
Dying Hours of the Emperor William . 330

Early Life of St. John 325
Early Mission Work in Ireland . 293, 357, 426
East, Letters to my Children from the . 618, 648 701, 717, 749, 764, 799, 813, 827
Edinburgh House of Refuge 557
Edinburgh Industrial Brigade . . . 219
Edinburgh, Miss Stirling's Home . . . 444
Edinburgh, New Guthrie School . . . 304
Edinburgh, Vennel School 306
Edwardes, Sir Herbert 283, 298
Emperor William, Dying Hours of the . . 330
Enigma, New Year's 16, 96
Explosion at Amoy, Recent 264

PAGE

Faith, Impossibility of pleasing God without . 70
Falconer, Ion Keith 709
Fear, Mortality from 568
Falls of St. Fereol, on the St. Lawrence . . 329
First Sheaf 489
First Sunday School in London . . . 333
Firstling of the Flock 345
Flying Fay 254
For Better, for Worse . . . 90, 108, 139
For God and my Neighbour 138
For Thirty Years; A Reminiscence of the Young Women's Christian Association . 747 French in the Pacific 8

Gamut of Graces 757
Gethsemane and its Teachings . . . 172
Glasgow Boys' Brigade 188
Glasgow Foundry Boys 74
"Grotte de Ham": a Parable of Nature . 360

"Ham, Grotte de": a Parable of Nature . 360
Handel, Last Days of 410
Harvest, Lesson of the 605
"Heaven is as near by sea as by land" . . 529
Heights of the Himalaya 440
Hemans, Mrs. 522, 614
Henry III. and the Duke of Guise . . . 377
Hidden Texts 48, 144, 160, 176, 224, 334, 368, 400, 432, 448, 464, 494, 576, 672, 704, 736, 816
Himalaya, Heights of 440
Holden Eyes 216
Hope that is in us, and the reason of it . . 300
Hospital Nurses in London and on the Continent . . 346, 458, 596, 682, 698, 822
How Mary came Home 785
Huguenot Family Life 583
Hymn, Story of a—"Nun danket alle Gott" . 539
Hymns on the New Jerusalem 266

"I am but a little Child" 463
Impossibility of pleasing God without Faith . 70
India, Mission Work amongst the Mohammedans in 613
Indian Recollection 461
"In the days of our Fathers" 114
In the Days of the Great Armada 351, 367, 382, 397, 412, 430, 446
In Time of Need 818
Ireland, Early Mission Work in . 293, 357, 426
Iron in the Soul 628
Islamism 85, 177, 203
"It was the time of roses" 401

Janet's Macfarlane's Prayer . . 641, 658, 673
Japan, Sail through Inland Sea of . 145, 255, 280
"Jenny Wren's Mite" 15, 31, 47
Jewish Synagogue, Visit to a 493

Jottings from the South Pacific:—
Church Kites 397
Help for New Guinea 397
Respect to the Aged 634
Sea Snips 781
Triumph over Cannibalism . . . 396
"Just Enough" 305

Kirk-Braddan and its Vicar 251

Lasserre, Henri 508
Last Days of Handel 410
Last Hours 392
Lay Preacher 295
Leaving Behind, On 245
Lesson of the Harvest 605
Lesson of the Pride of Life 490
Lesson of the Roses 402

PAGE

Lesson of the Spring Flowers. 234
Letter Missions 749

Letters to my Children from the East—
Introductory 618
House or Chamber on the Wall . . 827
Memphis 764
Mirage 749
Obelisk of Heliopolis 717
Pillars or Heaps 701
Pyramids 813
Simoom 648
Thebes 799
Library for the Blind 380, 590
Life Work of Samuel Morley 117
Little Meg and the Lodger . . . 767, 782
London, Coming to 728
London, First Sunday School in . . . 333

"Man goeth forth" 593
Manners, Old and New 349
March of Islam 177, 203

Marcus Stratford's Charge: or, Rot's Temptation 1, 25, 33, 49, 65, 81, 97, 121, 129, 153, 161, 185, 193, 209, 226, 241, 260, 273, 289, 307, 321, 337, 353, 373, 385, 403
Maré Mission, Story of the 733
Margareta Colberg: a Tale of the Reformation 417, 433, 449, 469, 481, 497, 513
Marguerite Leroy: a Leaf from the Journal of a French Pastor 236

Mission Work, Home and Foreign:—
Amongst the Mohammedans in India . 613
Early Mission Work in Ireland 293, 357, 426
In Edinburgh. . 219, 306, 364, 444, 557, 653
In Glasgow 18, 74, 188
In the Downs 530
In the North Sea 248
Jottings from the South Pacific . 396, 634
Letter Missions 789
Maré Mission 733
Missionary Ships 634, 667
On the Congo 504, 520
Missionary Ships 634, 667
Missy 79, 95, 111
Modern Islam 85

Monthly Religious Record 63, 127, 207, 271, 335, 415, 478, 542, 623, 687, 751, 829
Morley, Samuel, Life Work of 117
Mortality from Fear 568
Mount Tabor, Slopes of 761
My Share; What is it? 21

Naaman's Wife 697
Nesta and Phyllis 287, 303, 319
New Jerusalem, Hymns on the . . . 266
New Year's Enigma 16, 96
New Year's Word of Cheer 5
Night and Morning 89
Night in Trafalgar Square 57
"Night Thoughts" of Young. 421
North Sea, Calm Sunday in 248
Not out. 475

Old Gwen 689, 705, 722, 737, 753, 769, 794, 801
Old Manners and New 349
Old Nanny 636
On Coming to London 728
On Leaving Behind 245
On Tact 315
On Uncongenial Circumstances . . . 138
"One Another" 277
Our Eben-ezers and our Naphtalis . . . 825

PAGE

Pacific, French in the 8
Painter's Model 222, 239
Parable of Nature—The "Grotte de Ham" . 360

PARABLES OF OUR LORD:—
Introductory 29
Sower 92
Tares and Wheat 157
Few Short Parables. 269
Paris at the Time of the Reformation 40, 104, 167, 257, 311, 369
Perfection, Talk with Cousin Mabel about 501, 587
Peter Cartwright, the Backwoods Preacher 149, 165, 180, 202
Pilgrim Father's Pulpit 666

POETRY:—
Alpine Cattle Bells 720
Armada 457
Beacon Light 443
"Brook in the Way" 676
By the Way 578
Children's Hymn 492
Convalescent 233
Crosswort 366
Difference, The 124
From the Spring to the Sea . . . 328
God's Forge 654
His Evening Portion 722
Home Fireside 184
How the World can Change in a Year . 60
Hymn for Nightfall 409
"I will not let Thee go". 94
In June Time 344
In Newness of Life 78
In Perils of Waters. 136
Lettice and Kate 473
Long Sermon 152
Message "So Loved" 333
My Grandchildren at Church . . . 73
New Year Reverie 14
New Year's Eve 828
On a Foxglove 606
Only Begun 680
Peace 222
Pictures from the Poets . . 120, 297, 569
Playhouses 578
Poor of the Flock 18
Pot of Mignonette 56
Prayer Meetin' 13
Redbreast 24
Rest at Nightfall 201
Royal Gifts 372
Secret Chamber 815
Skylark 720
Song of the Mountains 622
Step Outside 658
Summer 426
Sweetest Song. 815
Tempted like as we are 727
"The Earth is the Lord's" 760
"The Lord is thy Sun" 477
Tranquil Days 536
Under Mara's Ripples 638
"We praise Thee" (With Music) . . 600
Widowhood 558
Writing on the Ground 617
Pride of Life, Lesson of the 490

PROBLEM OF THE POOR:—
Edinburgh . . . 219, 306, 364, 444, 557, 653
Glasgow. 18, 74, 188
Pulpits, Some Notable 537, 666
Puritan Preaching, A 713

PAGE

RALPH ELLISON'S OPPORTUNITY 545, 561, 578, 594, 609, 625, 650
Recent Explosion at Amoy 264
Recollection, an Indian 461
Reformation, Paris at the Time of the 40, 104, 167, 257, 311, 369
Religion in Russia—Peasantry . . 485, 554
Reminiscences of Swiss Travel . . . 286
Revolution of 1688 on its Religious Side. Some Illustrative Incidents . 661, 714, 742, 776, 792, 810
Rome, Arch of Titus at 797
Roses, Lesson of the 402

SABBATH THOUGHTS (see also "Sermons in the Family"):—
"Blessed be the Lord!" 14
Love to God 606
Night and Morning. 89
Sail through the Inland Sea of Japan 145, 225, 280

SAINT JOHN: APOSTLE, EVANGELIST, AND SEER:—
Early Life and Discipleship . . . 325
Apostolic Call: "Boanerges". . . . 389
Disciple whom Jesus loved 437
Apostles in Jerusalem: "Their Departure" 517
Ephesus: Records and Legends . . 570
Writings of the Apostle—The Apocalypse 677
Fourth Gospel and the Three Epistles 693, 725, 805
Santa Lucia: a Story of Corsica 143, 159, 175, 191, 205
Shepherd's Widow. 553
Scripture Characters 240, 288, 334, 368, 432, 464, 512, 528, 560, 576, 622, 672
Scripture Enigmas 16, 32, 48, 80, 144, 160, 192, 206, 224, 288, 302, 320, 334, 368, 414, 432, 448, 494, 528, 560, 592, 608, 622, 656, 736, 816
Scripture Questions 62, 96, 192, 206, 270, 320, 352, 368, 448, 464, 560, 672, 720, 816
Scripture Verses . 16, 144, 206, 270, 368, 384, 437, 494, 622, 686, 816
Seafarers' Home 137

SERMONS IN THE FAMILY:—
Christian Angareion 197
Gamut of Graces 757
Gethsemane and its Teachings . . 172
Holden Eyes 216
Hope that is in us, and the reason of it . 300
"I am but a little Child" 463
Impossibility of pleasing God without Faith 70
Iron in the Soul 628
New Year's Word of Cheer 5
"One Another" 277
Our Eben-ezers and our Naphtalis . . 625
Steward 37
Talitha Cumi 341
Worries of Daily Work 101
Serpent, Tales of the 376
Shepherd's Widow 553
Sick Child 126
Simon Magus: a Study in Apostolic History . 465
Slopes of Mount Tabor 761

SOME NOTABLE PULPITS:—
Bunyan's 537
Pilgrim Father's 666
South Pacific, Jottings from the . . 396, 684
Sower 92
Spanish Captain and the Scotch Minister . 573
Spring Flowers, Lesson of the . . . 234
Step Outside 657

PAGE

Steward 37
Story, a Cornish 491
Story of a Hymn—"Nun danket alle Gott" . 539
Story of the Maré Mission 733 Stories from Buddhist Sermons . . . 567
Summer 426
Summer Assembly at Chautauqua . . . 772
Sunday School, Duchess in a 656
Sunday School in London, First . . . 333
Sunset at Tintern 645
Swiss Travel, Reminiscence of . . . 286

Tact 315

TALES:—
Bertie Danby's Training 495, 511, 526, 540, 559, 574, 591, 607, 621, 639
Cornish Story 491
"Docky" 428
Flying Fay 254
How Mary came Home 785
In the Days of the Great Armada 351, 367, 382, 397, 412, 430, 446
In Time of Need 818
Janet Macfarlane's Prayer . 641, 658, 673
"Jenny Wren's Mite" . . . 15, 31, 47
Little Meg and the Lodger . . 767, 782
Marcus Stratford's Charge; or, Roy's Temptation 1, 25, 33, 49, 65, 81, 97, 121, 129, 153, 161, 185, 193, 209, 230, 241, 260, 273, 289, 307, 321, 337, 353, 373, 385, 403
Margareta Colberg: a Tale of the Reformation . . 417, 433, 449, 469, 481, 497, 513
Marguerite Leroy: a Leaf from the Journal of a French Pastor 236
Missy 79, 95, 111
My Share: What is it? 21
Nesta and Phyllis 287, 303, 319
Not out 475
Old Gwen 689, 705, 722, 737, 753, 769, 794, 801
Old Nanny 636
Painter's Model 222, 239
Ralph Ellison's Opportunity 545, 561, 578, 594, 609, 625, 650
Santa Lucia: a Story of Corsica 143, 159, 175, 191, 205
Willie Wills' Wings 671, 685, 703, 719, 735
Tales of the Serpent 376
Talitha Cumi 341
Talk with Cousin Mabel about Perfection 501, 587
Tares and Wheat 157
Thanksgiving, Armada 533
Trafalgar Square, Night in 57
True Mother of Charity—Some Recollections of Madame André-Walther . . . 77

Uncongenial Circumstances 133

Vicar of Kirk-Braddan 252
Visit to a Jewish Synagogue 493

Waiting for the Ferry 577
Welsh of Irongray, John, Anecdote of . . 510
Willie Wills' Wings . 671, 685, 703, 719, 735
Winter Gleaners 17
Worries of Daily Work 101

Young Christian Singer (Ann Griffiths) and her Letters 762
Young Women's Christian Association, Reminiscences of 747
Young's "Night Thoughts" 421

Things New and Old.

PAGE

Arab Tale from Zanzibar 590

Bethlehem, Star of. 110
Bible, Diseases of the 46
Books for the Blind 380, 590
Bush Negroes of Surinam 221

Diseases of the Bible 46
Duke of Kent and Legh Richmond. . . 525

Early Tracts 638

Faith Healing 350
Figurative Language of the South Seas . . 477

Garrison of Khartoum 732
George III. and the Sabbath . . . 350

PAGE

Hardening of Pharaoh's Heart . . . 221
Healing by Faith 350
Hospital Children 526

Indian Marriage Reforms 732

Khartoum, Garrison of 732

Legh Richmond and the Duke of Kent . . 525
Letters from General Gordon. . . . 638

McCall Mission 732

Nazareth, Orphans at 366
Negroes of Surinam, Bush 221

Orphans at Nazareth 366

PAGE

Pharaoh's Heart, Hardening of . . . 221
Progress and its Responsibilities . . . 366
Putting the Cart before the Horse . . . 350

Responsibilities of Progress 366

Sabbath, George III. and the 350
South Seas, Figurative Language of . . 477
Star of Bethlehem 110
Surinam, Bush Negroes of 221

Talitha Cumi 341
Tracts, Early 638

Word to the Wise 350

Zanzibar, Arab Tale from 590

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

BY EVELYN E. GREEN, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S BROTHERS," ETC.

A TALK ABOUT THE FUTURE.

CHAPTER I.—INTRODUCTORY.

"AND is Marcus really coming home next week?" asked Muriel looking up from her book, as the sense of the eager talk of the little knot of brothers and sisters gathered about on the lawn, penetrated to her understanding. "Is not that rather sudden, Roy? I thought he was not going to settle at home till the autumn?"

"So he always said before," answered Roy, a bright-faced, graceful lad of seventeen, detaching himself a little from the group and advancing a step nearer to Muriel, "but mother and he have been corresponding rather vigorously of late, I don't quite know what about, and to-day there came a letter to say that he had definitely resigned his post at the embassy, and would leave St. Petersburg at once. He will be here by the end of next week."

Muriel Kynaston glanced quickly at Roy, as if to read from his face the answer to her unspoken question. Did the lad know in how precarious a state was his mother's health, and what all her friends were saying so sadly about her? Had he no suspicions as to the reason for the sudden return home of Marcus Stratford, her step-son, whose property was the house she inhabited with the large surrounding estates? Could it be that he was blind to what was so patent to the rest of the world?

Roy's face was bright, with the light-hearted buoyant look that was its characteristic expression; his brilliant hazel eyes, that gave peculiar archness and beauty to a very attractive countenance, were dancing with the eager light of anticipation; it was plain that he had not a fear in the world.

Muriel changed the form of her question. It was not for her to suggest anxious fears.

"Are you glad he is coming?"

"Oh, yes," answered Roy quickly, "I think it will be delightful. I always liked Marcus. He's just as good as a real brother to me."

"I don't remember Marcus," said a little fair-haired sister who was leaning against Muriel's knee. "Is he nice, Roy?"

"I think so, Lilias; but he's been three years away, so perhaps he's grown cantankerous and cross—who knows? He'll have lots of stories to tell us about sledging and ice-yachting, and bear-hunts and wolves. I wish I could go out and see the world as he has done."

Roy's bright face glowed, and Sydney and Joyce cried simultaneously:

"Ah, wouldn't it be fine! I want to see the world too!"

Muriel's eyes took a dreamy far-away look, as they often did when a new idea had struck her.

She was the eldest of a large family of brothers and sisters, and her next brother was away at sea, so that there seemed a good gap between her and the five gathered about her on the lawn, —impetuous Syd and his shadow, Joyce; the irrepressible twins known as Topsy and Jacko, and little golden-haired Lilias. She seemed a great deal older than any of these, and they all looked up to her with a sort of loving admiration that was very pretty to see.

She was a gentle, graceful maiden of some twenty summers, with a good deal of quiet individuality and force of character, and an independence of mind not common at her age. She was generally silent and reserved and rather difficult of access, but when she did give her confidence she gave it frankly and fully, and her clear, thoughtful judgments, when once formed, seldom changed, and had a value of their own for those who sought her counsel.

Roy placed very great faith in Muriel's judgment and opinions. He had a boyish love and admiration for her, dashed with a reverence that gave it a peculiar character of its own. She had always been very fond of him. He had been something like another brother in that house ever since the marriage of his mother with Mr. Stratford had brought her and her little son to the pleasant parish of Drayton. Roy had been educated by Mr. Kynaston with his own sons, instead of going to school and college as his step-brother Marcus had done, and he was therefore much more intimate with the whole neighbourhood and its inhabitants than the son of the house, who had been born among them.

Muriel had always been his chief confidant and friend, save perhaps Vincent, the absent sailor, and now he turned towards her and asked:—

"Don't you want to see the world, too, Muriel?"

"I am not sure if I do," she answered thoughtfully. "I think I should find it too big for me."

Roy laughed, studying her face the while.

"People who go about say just the other thing —that it is quite a little world after all."

"Not in the way I was thinking of."

"And what way is that?"

"I don't know if I can explain. I was thinking of all the sin and misery, and striving and bitterness. I don't know much about it all in this little quiet corner; but I often think the world must be a cruel, terrible place, and I do not think I ever wish to leave my sweet, sheltered home."

"Ah, that is because you are a girl. You wouldn't feel so if you were a man. You can't think how I long sometimes to get away and see other places and learn what real life is like. Fancy, I have been at the Hermitage ever since I was four—thirteen whole long years, and I have never been anywhere, except once or twice to London or the sea with mother! Doesn't it seem absurd?"

"I don't know," answered Muriel thoughtfully. "I have always been at home, too."

"When Marcus comes to settle at home and take care of mother, I shall be freer," said the boy eagerly. "I shall talk to him the first time I have a chance, and see what he thinks. I want to take to the diplomatic service as he did, but I think I ought to have a University education first. I must get him to talk mother out of her queer prejudice against sending me to Oxford or Cambridge. It's quite time I began to think about it in earnest."

"You would not like to go if she objected?"

"Oh, but she won't object, if Marcus advocates it," cried Roy gaily. "You don't know what a lot she thinks of old Marcus and his opinions. It's all bosh what books say about step-mothers and step-sons being at daggers drawn. Marcus and mother are just as fond of one another as if he were her own son. You can't think how glad she is that he is coming home so soon."

"I dare say she feels the care of that large property rather an anxiety."

"Well, perhaps she does; but she is used to it, for she managed it for father—my step-father, I mean, you know—ever so many years before he died. I suppose if it hadn't been for that, Marcus would have had to give up his appointment then, and settle at home, as he says he is going to do now. Do you know Marcus well, Muriel? Do you think it will make things nicer having him back?"

"I know him in one way very well, and in one way very little," answered Muriel smiling. "I can remember him as long as I can remember anything. He seemed a big boy when I was little, and he used to be very good to me always, take me nutting and blackberrying with him, and bring me home on his back when I was tired; and he used to row me about in his boat on your lake and get me water-lilies. Marcus was quite my hero and big playfellow all the time I was little. But afterwards when he grew up and went to Eton and Oxford, and then abroad, I saw less and less of him. Often in vacation time he had his own friends with him, and did not come very much here, and for three years he has been away altogether, and it seems as if he might be very much changed in so long a time. But we all of us always liked him, and he is quite an old friend here. I think people will be pleased to think that he is coming home."

"I am," said Roy; "I think it will be jolly! The Hermitage is just a little bit dull sometimes. It will wake it up to have the master at home. Then I shan't be quite so much tied when mother has some one else to keep her company. I do want to get away sometimes, and see a little more of life."

"I wonder if you will like it when you do?" said Muriel with a grave smile. "But, Roy, ought you not to be going home? Your mother will be wondering what has become of you. It is long past five."

"Why, so it is! Well, good-bye; I suppose I must be going now," and Roy bounded off with the swift, elastic step of a young deer, whilst Muriel was left alone with little Lilias, the other brothers and sisters having wandered away to their favourite haunts farther afield.

Mr. Kynaston was a retired medical man, who had been obliged to give up practice in middle life on account of ill-health. He had been glad then to augment his somewhat slender means by taking pupils, of whom Roy Edington was one; and when, a year or two back, a substantial legacy had enabled him to purchase the property he had hitherto rented and dispense with resident pupils, he had still continued to let Roy share the studies of his sons, which he continued from choice to direct himself. Between the families of Coombe Drayton and the Hermitage a very close intimacy existed, and the obviously failing health of Mrs. Stratford occasioned very serious anxiety and sorrow in the minds of those who were aware of it.

When Mrs. Kynaston came upon her daughter wrapped in a brown study by herself in the garden, she was not surprised at the reason alleged for her grave looks.

"I was thinking about Mrs. Stratford, and her wish for Marcus to come home. Do you think she is going to die?"

"I fear, my love, that her days on earth are numbered."

"I do not think Roy can know."

"No; he is young, and he is too much with her to mark the change that is passing upon her gradually. Poor boy! It will be a great blow to him."

"I think it will be a blow to us all," said Muriel, a look of awe stealing over her face. "Nobody I have known very well has ever died—Mr. Stratford I hardly ever saw for two years before his death, and I was much younger then—and it all seems so sad and strange. Mother, dear, is it wrong to feel so? For Christians, I mean? In one way death doesn't seem sad, in the abstract you know, and when we think of what comes after. But when I think of any one I really know and love, and fancy their having to say good-bye to all the familiar things, and our sweet beautiful world, the birds and the flowers, and the faces they have loved—then it all seems so sad, and I sometimes wonder if it is wrong to feel so."

"Not wrong, I think, my love. It is a natural feeling, and one that belongs to our nature. Change and separation must seem sad to us of necessity, and death speaks of both; but the comfort lies in knowing that the separation is but brief, and that, in the world where our loved ones have gone, we shall some day in God's mercy join them, where there will be no partings any more."

"And all will be more beautiful than this," added Muriel, looking round at the still loveliness of the peaceful evening. "I wonder if Roy will feel that—if it will help to comfort him?"

"I trust so, my love. Dear Roy has been carefully taught by a tender, loving mother."

"Yes, I know he has," answered Muriel; adding after a pause during which her face had grown strangely thoughtful, "but, mother, there are some things that I do not think any one can teach us. We must feel them for ourselves."

"That is true, my love; and perhaps Roy is rather young to have learned lessons of that kind yet."

"Perhaps; but I think it is more that he is so full of other interests he has no time to think. He is a dear boy, but sometimes I fancy there is something a little wanting in him, though I could hardly say what."

Mrs. Kynaston smiled a little at her daughter's words. She did not think it strange that Roy had not quite reached the standard of her own thoughtful, earnest, eldest child.

CHAPTER II.—RETURN.

MEANTIME Roy Edington was racing homewards, light of heart and merry of aspect, towards the grey old house upon the wooded hill-side known by the name of the Hermitage.

He remembered no other home than that quaint, old-fashioned house, with its irregular front, its low elevation, and lichen-covered walls and roofs. He had been brought there as a tiny boy when his mother married again, and of the life that had gone before he retained not the dimmest recollection.

He had been very happy in this quiet retreat with his mother for his constant companion, and pleasant friends and comrades within easy reach. His step-brother Marcus, eight years his senior, had always been very good to him, "just like a real brother," as he sometimes said, and Mr. Stratford had been "father" to the child (who only learned by degrees that such was not his real relationship) as long as he lived.

Roy had a peculiarly bright, winning disposition and a sunny temperament that made petting and love come to him as a sort of right. He had once been addicted to sudden gusts of passion when his will was crossed, but he had appeared to grow out of these as years passed by, and to be wholly loving and loveable. He certainly had few ungratified wishes, for his demands were never unreasonable, and in the easy affluence of his home he could obtain almost as a matter of course every indulgence he really cared for. His wish to follow Marcus to public school had been quickly quenched in the pleasure of sharing the studies of his friends and playfellows at Coombe Drayton: and although he had many vague yearnings after freedom and adventure and world-wide wanderings, yet these dreams had never yet taken definite shape, or prompted him to crave any radical change in the easy flow of events.

After being a child and a mere boy somewhat long, he seemed hovering upon the verge of a stage of more rapid development, and his mother's eyes often rested earnestly upon him as he expounded to her some of his dawning hopes and theories, and she watched with trembling anxiety lest she should find some flaw in the character of her boy, which hitherto seemed to display such brightness and promise. But apprehensive as her anxious love made her, she had not seen in him, so far, one sign to trouble her seriously as to his future. He was bright and loving and frank and truthful as heart could wish. He loved her with his whole heart and gave her his entire confidence.

What could have been more tender and loving than his greeting to-day, after his absence during study hours, spoken between two or three boyish kisses?

"Am I late, little mother? I am so sorry. I stayed to tell Muriel about Marcus. Now I will make the tea; you lie still where you are. You are better, are you not, for this nice hot day? When Marcus comes, you will be quite strong. I want you so much to ride with me again. There are such lots of things I want to show you, in places where the carriage can't come; and then you don't care much for driving now, either. To be sure, a brougham is very dull; but very soon it will be summer, and then we shall have you quite well and strong. Marcus will take all the things that tire and bother you, and you will have nothing to do but amuse yourself, and come about with me."

Mrs. Stratford's eyes had taken rather a wistful look as the boy rattled on in this unconscious fashion of the future and what it held. To anyone not altogether inexperienced, that sweet, pale, wasted face, those hollow brilliant eyes, and the hectic flush upon the waxen cheek told a tale that could not be mistaken or contradicted. But Roy had watched this gradual fading without in the least knowing what it meant, and although he had been anxious sometimes about his mother in the winter months, now that the March winds were safely over, and April had come in hot and bright, he was quite happy, and was fully convinced that she was on the high road to complete recovery. How often it is that the nearest and dearest are least aware of what is really coming upon those they love the best!

But Mrs. Stratford said nothing to the boy of the trouble that she well knew was even now overshadowing him. She had tried once or twice to break to him the coming change, for which she herself was prepared, with quiet, Christian resignation; but, somehow, she had never managed to make him understand the drift of her words, and latterly she had made no further attempts to open his eyes. Everything seemed to wait till Marcus should return. Upon him she leaned in her weakness and helplessness, as upon a tower of strength.

She listened day by day to Roy's glad anticipations of his brother's return, and joined in his eager speculations as to what Marcus would think and do, and say, under all sorts of circumstances; what horses he would ride; whether he would want hunters when the autumn came, and whether he would preserve more rigorously, and have shooting parties in the season.

"For you know, mother, we have been just a little bit dead-alive and dull all these years. I've been rather too young to look after guests, and you've not been strong; but we shall change all that when Marcus comes. He's very rich, I know, everybody says so, and he will be able to do things in proper style. I have been very happy, of course, all this time; but I do begin to want to see a little of life now."

The mother would look anxious as she heard words like these, yet she did not check the boy's eager flow of talk. After all, was it not natural that he should feel so? Did not every young thing long for a wider field of action, when the strength of coming manhood began to overpower the shrinking timidity of childhood?

Roy took infinite pride and pleasure in seeing his brother's rooms put ready for him, in choosing a new carpet for the study, and in helping the footman to burnish the barrels of the guns in the rack, and the spurs, and the tops of the riding-whips hanging against the wall. He wondered what his tastes would be in books and pictures, and made himself very busy, and happy, and tiresome in instituting fresh alterations every day in the arrangements of furniture and ornaments; but by the time the all-important day arrived, he really had contrived to get everything to his satisfaction, and when the carriage came round which was to take him to the station to meet Marcus he was in a state of the most joyous anticipation and delight.

It was three years since his brother had gone away; Roy wondered, as he stood upon the platform watching the train come in, if he would have changed very much in that time. He used to be very tall, but slightly built, and he was very good-looking, with dark hair and grey eyes.

It was not likely that three years had made much difference, and yet when the train stopped, and two or three passengers alighted, no face for the moment struck the boy as belonging to Marcus.

"Roy!" said a voice just behind; a hand was laid upon his shoulder, and, turning quickly, Roy found himself face to face with his brother.

"Why, I never saw you get out!" he cried.

"I was close to the engine. I saw you as we came in. You are not much changed, Roy, only you have grown out of all knowledge. Yes, that is my luggage; it is all right. You have got the carriage waiting? How is your mother?"

"Oh, better to-day—awfully pleased at getting you back; all the place is more or less excited about it. I'm so jolly glad you really are here at last! It'll be twice the fun now you are at home again!"

Roy looked up with his frank, gay smile to meet a somewhat penetrating glance from his brother's keen grey eyes. He wondered that Marcus should look quite so grave; but he was proud of his good looks and commanding presence, and thought it became him to be somewhat stern and reserved. He studied him as he sat opposite to him in the carriage, chatting in easy, unembarrassed fashion, and calling attention to any changes that had taken place during his absence, and came to the conclusion that if Marcus had changed it had been for the better.

His figure had broadened and attained more dignity and grace of proportion by having lost the reedy slimness of his earlier years; and the face had changed in somewhat similar fashion. There were the same handsome regular features, and well opened, resolute eyes, but the expression had grown more manly and self-reliant, and there was a calm look of power and dignity and self-restraint about the lines of the mouth, as well as a penetrating keenness in the glance of the eyes, that was far more striking than any mere physical beauty. The face was pale, with a clear, olive tint, and a good deal tanned by exposure to the weather. The hair was dark brown with a glossy wave in it, and a drooping moustache veiled a little the somewhat stern lines of the mouth. Roy felt an increasing respect and admiration for his brother as he studied his face, and wondered a little what made him so grave and silent.

"I'm sure he's no end of a good fellow; I shall like him awfully," he said to himself; "but I believe he could be a regular tyrant if once one got across him! No fear of that for me, though!"

It was with great pride and pleasure that he watched the sensation produced in the village and the Hermitage grounds as the carriage rolled on bringing the young master home. Marcus returned the salutation of the people with grave courtesy, but he hardly spoke all the way home.

"Mother, mother, here he is; I've brought him home to you!" cried Roy, opening the door and ushering his brother into the drawing-room where his mother was anxiously awaiting them; but next moment the boy withdrew, a little shadow of perplexity upon his face.

"Why, I never knew she cared for Marcus quite so much. She could hardly look at him or speak to him for crying!"

A NEW YEAR'S WORD OF CHEER.

BY THE REV. J. MONRO GIBSON, D.D.

"Let us lift up our heart."—Lam. iii. 41.
"Lift up your heads."—Luke xxi. 28.
"Lift up the hands that hang down."—Heb. xii. 12.

"DEPRESSION, depression, depression!" How sadly familiar the word has been for many years. It is not an unfamiliar word at any time; but lately it almost seems as if it had come, not to visit, but to stay. The depression in agriculture and commerce has been so long continued, that it is almost a weariness to speak of it. And though we may take a hopeful view of the outlook, with the expectation that the clouds may roll away, and the sun appear, there still remain burdens sufficient to weigh heavily on those who are thoughtful enough to vex themselves with "the riddle of this painful earth." We may think that the new "Lockesley Hall" gives quite too dark a picture of the times; but it cannot be denied that the nineteenth-century progress has not fulfilled the expectations of its enthusiastic votaries of sixty years ago.

Steam and electricity have accomplished all, and even more than all, that was expected of them as physical agencies; but is life so very much nobler than it was? Is it so much easier to make a living? Is the living so very much better when it is made? Is the sum of human happiness so much the greater? or of human misery so much the less? Now that Nature does so very much of man's work, and at so high a rate of speed, is man's labour so much the lighter? Is there more leisure to read, to think, to enjoy? Of what great advantage is it to get such a wondrously energetic servant as steam, ready to do anything, everything, for us, in the shortest time, in the most efficient manner, on the largest scale, if the master has only to work all the harder? How many business men are there who find it the most enjoyable thing in life to get out of hearing of the engine's shriek, out of reach of the telegraph wires! Does not this suggest the question, which is the master and which the servant; whether man is lord of steam, or steam the tyrant of man?

It is all very well for men of leisure to sing the praises of this age of progress; it is rather a pleasant thing to sit in a quiet window and see excited crowds rushing past in all directions; but ask those who are in the midst of the press, who have to struggle daily to hold their own, who have to confess that year by year competition gets keener, and there must be closer watching, and faster, and at the same time more cautious driving, even to keep abreast of others—ask these, and they will tell you that even nineteenth-century progress at the best is no great gospel, something quite other than good tidings of great joy to all mankind. They will tell you that if they had nothing better to lift them up, they would have more to tell of weights than of wings. There is still as erst the burden and heat of the day, only the burden gets heavier, and the heat more oppressive as the famous century draws near its end.

Nature brings her compensations, of course. There is something exhilarating in the ceaseless activity. There is no time to mope or be dull. Then, the delights of home are all the sweeter by contrast with the eagerness and hurry of the market and street. And if we had been so constituted that our horizon was bounded by the day, and our outlook by the walls of our places of business and our places of residence, it would be quite enough as a perennial spring of satisfaction that we should be getting on in business and happy at home. But, thank God, we are not so constituted. A wider outlook has been given to us, and a larger sympathy. We have minds that look before and after. We have hearts that beat for others as well as for ourselves; and we cannot shut our eyes to the sorrows around us or the prospects before us. And therefore we need some loftier cheer than comes from the thought that whatever others may fear, we at least are comfortable; that the present moment is bright enough, whatever of darkness the future may bring. If life is harder and more exacting than it was, we desire the more ardently to know what is to become of it all. In what is this toil and press and eager activity to end?

I may lift up my hands for a while for the mere pleasure of doing it, and the thrill of satisfaction which a kind Creator has associated with energetic use of my powers; but as year after year passes on I feel more and more inclined to press the question, what is it all for? I may lift up my heart from the purgatory of the street to my paradise of a home; but when one by one the angels of my paradise fly away, whither then shall I lift up my heart? While I have been lifting up hands and heart, I have been keeping my head down, and shutting my eyes. If that is all the cheer I get, I can enjoy it only when I forbid myself to think.

It was the fashion some time ago to seek refuge in mere thoughtlessness: to say "Begone, dull care," and "No more of idle sorrow," and "Be happy while you may;" but to do our times justice, there is far less of this now. There is far less disposition to shirk the dark and disagreeable in human life, far more honesty in facing the actual and the inevitable. Hence the tone of sadness which pervades the writings of those who have no higher cheer. They feel that they cannot lift up the head, and so they scarcely try it with the heart, while it is only because they cannot help it, that they still continue to lift up the hands. Increase of knowledge has proved increase of sorrow. It may be said that there is an element of hope in the thought of evolution; but, if there be, it works so slowly, puts its golden age so many millions of years after we shall all be dead, that it does not quicken the heart-beat much, or infuse much eagerness into the plodding labours of man's daily life. Far be it from us to despise the encouragement which comes to the thoughtful mind from the evidence of upward development which our students of nature discover in her slowly unfolding processes; only it is a little too vague and far-away to do for a new year's word of cheer. Perhaps it might do for the opening of a millennium; but we want something a little more suitable to our small stature and short span of life, and the brief, but to each of us most important, period of time which we are entering now.

Let us betake ourselves to our Bibles, then, and see if we can get nothing better. And I question if there is any feature in the Bible more outstanding than its constant call to cheerfulness and courage. And this without any blinking of the dark things of human life and history. It not only faces these, it emphasises them. It sets no "fool's paradise" before the eyes of men. It recognises all that is depressing in nature and in circumstance. It does not leave out of sight the law of gravitation, the downward tendency of all earthly things. But over against that downward gravitation, it sets a great sphere of light with a mighty power of heavenward attraction. Above the cold dark earth of man's daily life, it opens heaven and sets the sun in it, to pour light and warmth down, and in the night-time to give promise of the day; and not only so, but to win life upward out of the darkness of earth into the light of heaven. With that sun shining in the heavens it is no mockery to say, "lift up your heart," "lift up your head," "lift up the hands that hang down." You can lift them all up together, and lift them up for evermore.

The heart first: "Let us lift up our heart to God in the heavens." The reason of this is that "out of the heart are the issues of life." God's message to each of us is, "My son, give me thine heart." And when once the heart is opened to the Divine Spirit, life springs up in it, life which responds to the call of God, and, unrestrained by the law of gravitation which keeps all dead things down, grows upward and heavenward as the days and the years pass on. There are those who think they must begin with the head; they must by searching find out God; they must by some grand exercise of their powerful reason get to know and comprehend Him. The result is, they cannot find Him at all. Some people wonder that these things should be hid from the wise and prudent and revealed unto babes; they wonder that that great philosopher towering above his fellows should not have come within reach of God, when this little child or this plain unlettered man feels His presence in his heart. Why should men wonder?

> I know a mount, the gracious sun perceives
> First when he visits—last, too, when he leaves—
> The world; and, vainly favour'd, it repays
> The day-long glory of his steadfast gaze
> By no change of its large calm front of snow.
> And underneath the mount, a flower I know,
> He cannot have perceived, that changes ever
> At his approach. . . .

The great philosopher is the mountain rearing its head high above its fellows, and quite out of sight of the little flowers that bloom around its base. But though it is high enough to catch all the sunlight, it is "vainly favoured"; there is "no change of its large calm front of snow." But the little flower, so small as to attract no notice to itself, thrills at every touch of the sun, lifts its fair face up to the eye of day, catches the colours of the spectrum and weaves them into the tissues of its own substance—and why? Because there is life at the root of it—a life which, tiny as it is, is set in clearest relation to the great throbbing universe-heart of the sun. Look at that stately tree. How has it managed to lift its head so high? It once was a little seed lying on the ground. Look at it now. How has it all happened? It has all come of the upstriving life at the heart of it. In obedience to the law of gravitation it dropped upon the ground, but it had no mind to stay there. God bade it rise, and it rose and grew, and it has been growing ever since into a larger and a fuller life. Look at the great stone in the stream beside it. When the tree was at its smallest, the stone was at its largest. It lies yet where it lay, slowly wasting away by the action of the very same water which is bringing life and refreshment to the other. There is no life at the heart of that stone, nothing to answer to the heavenward summons of the sun. Oh yes, the sun beats on it every day, and the rain falls on it, and the winds breathe over it, and the waters lave it; but these all waste it, only waste it, while they all build the other up, enter into its very life and substance, and so it is lifted up and the stone is worn down. Clearly the main thing is heart life, the yearning within us to look sunward and say, "Let us lift up our heart to God in the heavens." May the Spirit of Life touch hearts that may be dead in unbelief and sin, hearts of stone, irresponsive to the love of God; may He so touch them as to awake the yearning sunward, so that this year at last may be for them a year of true life, with its daily motto, upward, upward, "sursum corda"!—"Nearer, my God, to Thee, nearer to Thee!"

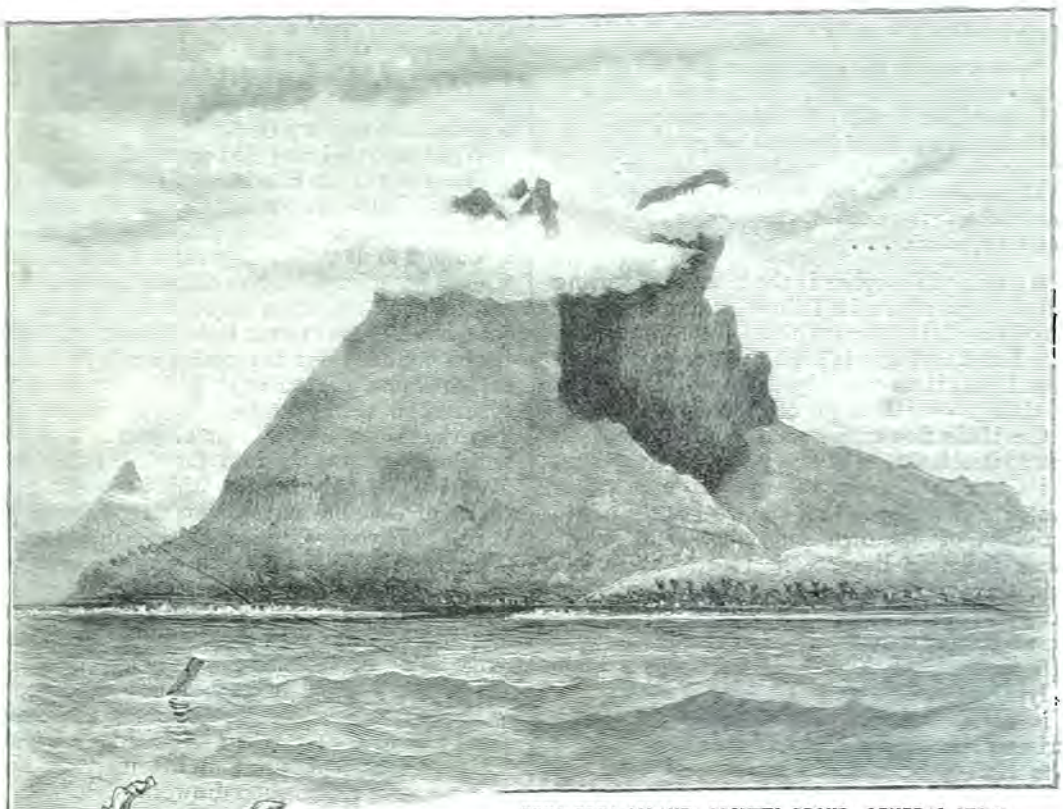
The lifting up of the head is sure to follow. As soon as we are conscious of the up-springing of the Divine life in us, we shall take a very much more hopeful view of men and things. It is a true saying that nature mirrors our life, is grave or gay according to the mood of him who looks at her. To one who is himself going down, everything seems going down; but if it is spring-time in your souls, you will see tokens of spring all around you. And then, even in the darkest hour, you still can say, "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? And why art thou disquieted within me? Hope in God, for I shall yet praise Him, who is the health of my countenance and my God."

When once we know God, we can have confidence that our hopes in Him are not illusive; that the darkest clouds will some day break before the sun. And even the slow processes of time bring a comfort to us which they cannot give to others. The hopes of age-long evolution are a mockery to the creature of a day; but to one who possesses life that never ends, it matters not how far off you may put the goal, I shall be there to see, to know, and to enjoy! Oh, it is so very different a thing to have a life which tends downwards to a few feet of earth, and a life which rises upwards into the illimitable blue! My friend, if only the life which answers to the touch of God be in you, you may lift up your head, and you will always see light in the distance at last; for even in such times as those of which our Lord is speaking in the second text, "times of perplexity for the roaring of the sea and the billows; men fainting for fear, and for expectation of the things which are coming on the world"—even in such times as these, you will hear "a deeper voice across the storm," saying as of old: "When these things begin to come to pass, look up, and lift up your heads, because your redemption draweth nigh."

And with heart and head so lifted up, there need be no fear of the hands hanging down; no fear of even routine work becoming drudgery when we know it is a discipline for a higher sphere of service; no fear of our becoming discouraged for want of appreciation among men, if we remember that with the heart lifted up to God in heaven, all is accepted as done to Him who forgets no work of faith or labour of love. Nor need we even be discouraged by want of immediate success in our efforts for the advancement of the kingdom of God; for we have something better to trust to than the slow process of evolution, with its disappointing reversions. We have God's sure promise; and we know that "in due season we shall reap if we faint not."

Heart up in faith, head up in hope, hands up in loving energy, and we know that our labour shall not be in vain in the Lord. Shall we not then take this for our motto for the year? Let it be Excelsior; but not to snow and ice, not to a frozen death, but up to purer air, brighter light, a warmer clime, a closer walk with God. Oh that we may all have a year of faith and hope and love!—a year of life responsive to the call of God in heaven—growing larger, richer, fairer, and more fruitful, "like the tree planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season."

THE FRENCH IN THE PACIFIC.



BORA-BORA ISLAND, SOCIETY GROUP, GENERAL VIEW.

THE dispute with France as to the occupation of the New Hebrides has been recently settled by her abandoning the claim against which Australia protested, and taking possession of the Leeward Islands, adjacent to Tahiti, of which she already held the sovereignty. The full significance of this change may not be known to all our readers. It is the last indication of a movement which is gradually bringing the Pacific region under European sway.

Towards the close of the last century the story of Captain Cook's voyages to the Pacific, and his death at Hawaii, created an immense sensation in this country, and led to the formation of the London Missionary Society on strictly unsectarian lines. Missionaries were located on the Tahitian, Tongan, and Marquesan groups. The stations on the two latter were soon broken up; but the work on Tahiti, by the Divine blessing, prospered and remains conspicuously successful to this hour.

In 1812, Huahine, one of the Leeward Islands, received the Gospel from Tahiti; but ten years elapsed ere the rest of the group yielded to the influence of Christianity. Raiatea being the cradle of the ancient faith, a most stubborn resistance was offered there to all innovations.

In 1820 the American Board of Foreign Missions started their good work in the Sandwich Islands. In the following year the Wesleyan Missionary Society commenced its mission on Tonga. Cannibal Fiji was subsequently brought within its sphere. In 1848 the Presbyterians initiated their difficult but successful career in the New Hebrides. In 1849 Bishop Selwyn began mission work in Melanesia, since consecrated by the martyrdom of Bishop Patteson.

These various missions have of late years marvellously expanded. The Americans, keeping north of the equator, have evangelised the Caroline and Kingsmill groups. The London Missionary Society has extended its work to the Tuamotu Archipelago, the Austral, Hervey, Samoan, Ellice, Gilbert, and Loyalty groups.

When the first missionaries carried the Gospel to the islands of the Pacific, there was no question of foreign ascendancy. At that period no power dreamt of acquiring territory—either absolutely or under guise of a Protectorate—in the Pacific.

HARBOUR OF BORA-BORA.

When missions were commenced in the Pacific, commerce did not exist. In the eastern groups the inhabitants wore garments made of the inner bark of the paper mulberry; in most of the islands of the western Pacific the men were nude, whilst the women wore merely a petticoat of leaves. Christianity gave these natives a sense of propriety. There also followed a rapid expansion of trade, in order to supply the new wants created. In many of the islands the natives now dress better, live in better houses, and are more intelligent than villagers in some portions of Great Britain, while the commerce of the Pacific is estimated at several millions sterling.

France was the first to covet these fair islands. The Gambier Isles (so famous for their pearls), were its earliest acquisition. Next the whole of the Marquesan group. In 1842, the French established a Protectorate over Tahiti, Moorea, Matea, and Tetuaroa; but, in consequence of the gallant defence of Huahine, and the strong feeling then prevalent in this country, a treaty was concluded in 1847 between France and England, stipulating that the independence of the Leeward group—the same group which has recently been made the subject of negotiation—should be respected, and that France should not encroach to the westward of Moorea. This treaty was strained into admission that they might do what they liked with the Tuamotu or Pearl Archipelago (lying to the east), which was quickly reduced under French authority.

A MAT HUT IN BORA-BORA ISLAND.

Never for a moment did French intrigue cease. After a while the islands of Rapa-iti (once the coaling station of an English line of steamers), and Raivavae and Tupuai (i.e. half the Austral group) were quietly annexed by France. Even solitary Easter Island did not escape. Meanwhile the natives of the Leeward Islands—Raiatea, Tahaa, Porapora (or Bora-Bora), and Huahine—deemed themselves safe under the terms of the treaty of 1847. But many new influences have come into operation since then; and now, at last, these islands are definitely surrendered to France by the recent compact which sets free the New Hebrides.

In 1880, the Protectorate of Tahiti and its dependencies was changed into actual sovereignty. Ever since the establishment of the Protectorate of 1842, it had been the policy of the French in the Pacific to stir up ancient, but expiring, feuds in the neighbouring independent islands, to prove to the world that the natives could not govern themselves. Again and again have French captains, in all the pomp of official costume, asked the native rulers to accept their flag; but in vain. Seven years ago, however, as the result of a well-concocted German scare, the chiefs of Raiatea and Tahaa, in their terror and utter simplicity, were induced to sign a document asking France "to protect them from all external foes;" at the same time stipulating that their islands should be left under the government of their own chiefs and laws, and that their Protestant religion be in no way interfered with. This protectorate was gladly accepted, and since then there has been no attempt to act in contravention to the terms of the arrangements.

It is easy to understand the pertinacity shown in the proposals recently preferred by France. It is not so easy to understand why the treaty of 1847 has been abrogated by Great Britain without inquiry as to the feeling of the natives of these islands. How great will be their surprise to learn that they have been abandoned by their old protectors!

In 1854 France took possession of New Caledonia, and the Loyalty Islands in Western Polynesia, as a penal settlement. The Australian colonies took alarm, and have since had abundant reason to justify their protests against the approach of the French nearer to their shores.

Every one knows how persistent have been the efforts of France to retain the New Hebrides, in the teeth of the assurances given in 1878. She has now agreed to evacuate them; but, by the terms of the convention, she is still allowed to protect her commercial interests there. As the New Hebrides' Colonisation Company—which is French—was the excuse for the military occupation, if further complications are avoided, it will be due simply to the vigilance of the Australian colonies.

Few people in this country are aware that some years ago the natives of Wallis' Island (Wesleyan) were coerced into subjection to Rome directly or indirectly by the priests, acting through native chiefs. A cathedral and a French bishop have risen on the ashes of Protestantism there. Wallis' Island lies a little to the west of Samoa, in Central Polynesia.

French intrigue in Samoa proceeded most prosperously until effectually checked by the advent of the Germans, who are now evidently aiming at the annexation of that large and fertile group, having already acquired the greater portion of the Salomon Islands (rich in copper ore, etc.), as well as a good harbour in Vavau for their fleet.

In the North Pacific the Sandwich Islands still remain independent, probably just because it is perfectly well understood that the United States would at once resent the interference of any foreign power in that quarter. Lately, Spain has taken possession of the Caroline Islands, in the North-West Pacific, and, as the first step to the consolidation of their power, expelled the American Protestant missionary, the Rev. Mr. Doane. The Madrid Government, however, has disavowed the action of its subordinates in this matter.

Returning again to the South Pacific, we may state that the only remaining independent group in Eastern Polynesia is the Hervey, or Cook's Islands; but the islands of Rurutu and Rimtara (i.e., half the Austral group) also retain their independence, and four low coral islands lying between the Hervey group and Samoa. In all likelihood France will now attempt to annex these, unless, perchance, New Zealand should interfere, on the ground of her close commercial relations with them.

It is an interesting fact that all along an English protectorate has been greatly desired by the natives of the Eastern Pacific, so popular are the English in those remote seas; but it has steadily been refused by Great Britain.

In this discreditable scramble for the birthright of an unoffending and industrious native population, Great Britain has only acquired the sovereignty of the Fiji group and the solitary island of Rotumah, because it was forced upon her.

We are assured by M. de Lesseps that in February, 1890, the Panama Canal will be opened, and will be capable of giving passage to twenty vessels per day. This will be the wonder of the age, and will change the history of the southern hemisphere. When the canal is open, the shortest route to London from Auckland, Sydney, and Brisbane (to say nothing of China and Japan), will be through Panama. The captain of a French man-of-war once told the writer that it was with a view to that event, France was resolved to get possession of the whole of the South Pacific Islands. We need not discuss that contingency; but in the event of war (which, God forbid!) Great Britain would have no harbour of refuge and no coaling station for her great ocean-steamers between Fiji and South America—a distance of 6000 miles. The island of Porapora (referred to in the following paper), or, better still, Raiatea, would have been invaluable for such a purpose. Each is possessed of an admirable harbour; the Raiatean has two entrances, whilst the Poraporan has one only; but then it would be easy to make Porapora impregnable.

To the Christian there is one ray of hope in connection with these changes. For years past the Paris Missionary Society has been sending out noble men to take the oversight of the native Protestant churches of Tahiti and Moorea. No doubt they will ere long have to extend the sphere of their operations to the Leeward Islands. Let English Protestants resident in France do what they can to aid in this work. With a well-translated Bible in their hands, let us hope that these converts from a cruel heathenism will be faithful to their vows.

The following notes of a visit to Bora-Bora, one of the ceded islands, with the sketches by Mr. R. T. Pritchett, belong to a somewhat earlier date, but will have peculiar interest at the present time.

A SUNDAY IN BORA-BORA.

The "Society" Islands derive special interest from the fact that missionary work has there been so successful. The good seed sown by those who have passed away is still bearing fruit to the happiness of those who at the present time are acting as faithful stewards, and who are handing down their privileges to their children. The name of this group of islands, especially Tahiti (or Otaheite, as it was once erroneously spelt), recalls to the English mind the name of Pritchard, an English missionary, and the martyr Williams also.

Four of the islands, which are also named Leeward Islands—because the trade wind blows from the south-east, and these lie to the north-west of Tahiti—bear the following names—Bora-Bora, Raiatea, Tahaa, and Huahine. Bora-Bora is about 170 miles from Tahiti. Leaving Raiatea on the port hand we approach it, and the first impression is not likely to be effaced. The volcanic formation, most clearly defined, is unmistakable as soon as it looms in the distance. The centre of the island is a vast extinct crater about 4000 feet high, and on the west side of the island is the harbour, snugly sheltered, and well inside the barrier reef.

As we passed out from the barrier reef of Raiatea (the Ulietea of Captain Cook), through the narrow opening, the beauty and grandeur of coral reef formation were seen to perfection. The colour of the ocean water, an intensely deep lapis lazuli—then the huge heave and the rise before cresting—the running break of the roller after the heavy thud on the coral—and the prismatized spoon-drift, all combined to impress deeply on us the glorious and yet delicately subtle beauty of the ocean in the South Pacific. Then the varieties of coral are so many, and the marine garden is illumined with the most brilliant of fish, strangely marked, and most quaintly formed.

At Bora-Bora missionary work has left a legacy which we rejoiced to find, and we are thankful for the opportunity of recording our impressions for the encouragement of others. As we came into the harbour, the extinct crater, and the lofty mountain shrouded in mist, lowered over us. The shore was beautifully rich in foliage, with the bread fruit, which is perhaps the finest in the world, with its shining serrated leaves of cherry-green. There, too, were the sweeping showering palms, yielding cocoa-nuts in abundance, bananas, oranges, guavas, yams, plantains, and limes; and last, not least, the pandanus, or screw pine, the stilted monarchs of the forest. The mist above shaded us, and the temperature was pleasant at 80°. The day was Saturday, and we looked forward to the Sunday here.

This was a peaceful spot indeed: no health-boat coming off, no chance of quarantine, no rush of canoes alongside with native productions or fruits. Here things are done differently. The proper etiquette at Bora-Bora is to send on shore and report to her Majesty the Queen, a little lady of about twelve years, that you have arrived in harbour, and her Majesty sends back to say you are welcome.

The next thing is to go on shore and pay respects to her Majesty, who is generally attended by her uncle as prime minister. As we approached the mole, which is small for that name, and is rather a landing-place, a large building was the prominent feature, and naturally attracted our attention. Was it the palace of the queen? No. We soon found it to be the church, and behind it lived the little queen. As it was not the rainy season, it is superfluous to say that, on a bright Sunday morning we landed, much welcomed with "Ia ora na" from all who met us, and on our reaching the shore it was as a volley. As it was near ten o'clock, they knew we were coming to church, and were glad. "Ia ora na" is the native salutation; "May you live!"—a phrase which seems to embody in one word all kindly feelings.

We found the church large, built of wood, and holding about 500 people, a really cheerful sight. The women were all dressed in their gay-coloured sacques; their hair—which is of luxuriant growth—generally in two plaits down the back, was brightened by cocoanut oil. The hat generally worn was plaited like straw hats in England; but made of the stems of maidenhair fern, and all sorts of curious vegetable fibres, the whole ornamented with fresh flowers. The service was given in the native language, and, after prayer, the hymns—which are called in the Society Islands "Himane" (from the English)—were admirably sung. A few begin at first, and soon the "Himane" is taken up by the female voices; then the men join in with a rumbling undercurrent. Now and then a prima donna comes in with especially fine high notes. The whole thing was heartily done. Some seats were in the church, but many preferred sitting on the mats, upon which little chubby, smiling children rolled and tumbled about, so plump and happy that they made no noise.

The temperature of the building was much relieved by the arrival of the Doctor, the name generally given to the sea breeze which comes in towards mid-day, and is generally very punctual in its arrival. After the "Himane" came the sermon. This was the most curious part of the service. A great rustling of pieces of paper—pieces of all kinds and colours and sizes, and pencils ditto—announced to us the fact that at Bora-Bora notes were taken; and it was accounted for in this way, that the congregation are examined on the subject of the sermon during the following week, and the notes are carefully preserved for reference.

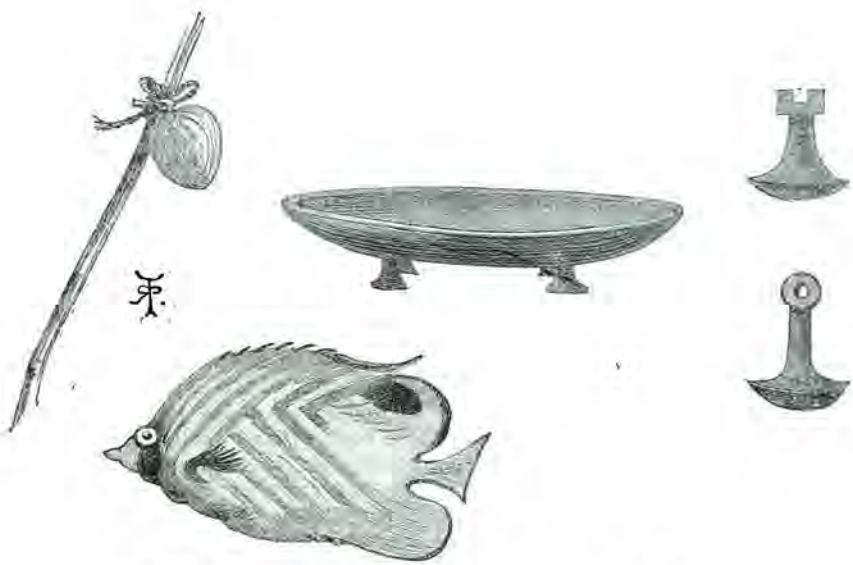
As we returned from the church, the people seemed very pleased that we had attended the service, and many were the "Ia ora nas" again said to us by the young and old, in varied tone according to the age of the speaker.

The feeling against foreign interference was strong. We were assured by many that the reason why a foreign protectorate had been declined, was because they all felt assured that the happy state of the island was solely attributable to the English missionaries who had brought the Bible to them and explained it to them, and had, by their own example in everyday life, shown them practically how to carry out its teaching to their own happiness and the peace of their neighbours. Their influence had certainly wrought wonders amongst the natives, for their Sunday was an example to us here in our own country.



ROCK-FISH, BREAD-FRUIT DISH, PESTLES, COCOA-NUT AND STICK.

In Bora-Bora at 8 P.M. a curfew bell is rung for the people to return home, and at 9 P.M. a second, after which no one is allowed out. This is done every day. On Sunday, no trading is allowed, no canoe leaves the shore, no fishing canoe comes off, and when you land all is quiet, peaceful, and happy, the cheerful prattle of the little children giving life to the scene. No spirits or strong drinks are allowed on the island, and a heavy fine is inflicted on any native found possessing any, while the fine for a chief found drunk is double. Now this state of things would not last long under a French Protectorate, judging from what exists in other places. Many told us that they all wished Bora-Bora belonged to Queen Victoria, whom they believed to be a good Protestant queen. The civility of the people was charming, refreshing, and genuine, and a general sweetness of expression pervaded their faces, young or old.

Their dwellings in these islands are of cunning handiwork, intended for ventilation, and much cocoa-nut plaiting is used. It is made by plaiting up and down the alternate frond of the palm leaves, which form a beautiful pattern, while strength from the counter tension gives strength. The wood of the palm tree is very liable to split: this may be noticed in spears, staffs, and walking-sticks, and is quite a contrast to the dense, heavy ironwood, which is close-grained, and takes a beautiful hard polish. The hibiscus wood is very light, and much used in the huts, as well as for the outriggers of canoes. The pestles shown in the illustrations are found in every household, and are used for pounding the bread-fruit. They are very beautifully made out of lava, of which the island is composed.

Another lava implement is used for opening cocoa-nuts, previously to getting the cool milk. How refreshing it sounds in a warm climate: it reminds me of a native's answer one day when travelling in the interior. "Good boy, you are looking very happy this morning." "Happy? why not? I want nothing more than I have—plenty to eat by going out to get it, plenty sunshine, bananas, wild plantains, plenty house and mats when we choose make them. What more?" Is not this contentment?

The stick and cocoa-nut show that they have a keen sense of meum and tuum. Where these are put up it is "tabu," or, as we should say, "tabooed," and it is always respected.

As good doctors endeavour to assist nature, and are successful when violent remedies would fail, so the early missionaries have succeeded by moderate treatment, without trying to transform the people suddenly from Bora-Borans into Europeans, extern men with black coats and tall hats. It is the inner man that wants to be changed, and Christian love, as applied consistently, is sure to do good in time. Why should the poor South Sea Islander, who is accustomed to wear a thin "pareu" round his waist, and green leaves on his head, and green leaves round his neck, take to European garments? The moment he is discomfited by the latter, his mind is so taken up and absorbed in outer appearance that he feels it is enough, and it is impossible for him to give his whole heart to the essence and spirit of the thing. Everything depends on keeping him bent on a pure inner life, and not over Europeanising him. Let him retain his native extern and "pareu;" he will have more confidence if the change be not too sudden. When he sees we respect his good points, let him continue all his harmless climatial non-essentials. The change of the old man in him is what is wanted, and no external revolution will accomplish that. It may be an uncomfortable fact, but civilisation creates wants; the Bible simplifies and sanctifies them.

Such was "Bora-Bora," as sketched before the French assumed the protectorate of the Leeward Islands. One would like to know whether there is a clause in the recent treaty guaranteeing to the natives the full enjoyment of their Protestant faith.

The Prayer Meetin'.

I WAS awfully tired an' worried,
  The week had been full o' care;
So, over my work I hurried
  An' went to the house o' prayer.

My poor husband's health was failin';
  It was little that he could earn:
An' young Jackie, in climbin' a palin',
  Had given his ankle a turn.

The weather was hot an' broilin':
  It was washin'-week with me too:
An' I guess my temper was boilin',
  For it rose as seldom it do.

I'd spoke sharp to my daughter Mary,
  Who'd tried all my labours to share.
So, although I was tired an' weary,
  I crept to the house o' prayer.

'Twas the regular week-end meetin',
  An' old Deacon Weston led.
(He mostly did the leadin',
  An' was looked up to as the head.)

He read a long psalm o' rejoicin'
  By David o'er vanquished foes.
(But that I felt I'd no voice in, Though 'twas all very good, I suppose.)

An' then the good Deacon he led us
  In prayer in his usual way—
Thankin' God that His wisdom had made us,
  An' guided us up to that day.

He thanked Him for "peace like a river,"
  For "grace given," by which we'd "been kept."
(An' I sighed as I thought, with a quiver,
  How my anger o'er reason had leapt.)

He praised Him for "store above measure,"
  For "bounties that strewed all the way."
(The Deacon, they say, at his pleasure,
  Could buy half the town any day.)

He prayed a long spell for the Pastor,
  For "souls as his hire an' seal,"
An' that "he, in the steps o' his Master,"
  "Might press on" with courage an' zeal.

He prayed that the Church an' its members
  May be "knit like the heart o' one man";
That their love might leap up from dull embers,
  Like a fire under breath from a fan.

He prayed that the Sunday School also,
  Might "Marys" an' "Timothys" train.
(But, ashamed as I felt that it was so,
  I thought only of Jackie's bad sprain.)

He prayed for "the world altogether
  In the arms o' the wicked one lain."
(An' I found myself wonderin' whether God couldn't the evil restrain.)

He prayed for the Queen, an' the Missions,
  For "all sorts an' conditions o' men":
An' endin' his num'rous petitions,
  Finished off with a double "Amen!"

We'd more singin', an' then Deacon Warren,
  An' several more brethren prayed.
(But the words so familiar seemed barren:
  I was quite out o' tune, I'm afraid.)

We'd to "draw from the wells o' salvation";
  The Scriptures "search line upon line";
An' overcome "strong bulls of Bashan,"
  "Like giants refreshed with new wine."

We'd to "mount up on wings like the eagle,"
  "An' never grow weary or faint";
"Our high callin'" was priestly an' regal,
  Nought less was "becomin' a saint."

An' now the last singin' was finished,
  An' shortly the meetin' must close:
An' my troubles an' care undiminished
  Forbade hopes of peaceful repose.

I had eagerly watched for some token,
  But nought seemed just suited to me;
An' I felt sad an' almost heart-broken,
  An' as wretched as wretched could be.

I felt I'd been hard on dear Mary:
  An' yet, somehow,—I couldn't say why—
It was things goin' cross an' contrary,
  Seemed to more deserve blamin' than I.

The good Deacon stood up for the blessin';
An' I sadly half rose from my knees,
When a voice (it was old Widow Lessing)
Broke the silence with passionate pleas—

(She'd a son in the 'sylum at Ryall,
Another bedridden at home,
An' a daughter—her bitterest trial—
Gay, dressy, and given to roam.)

"Oh, Lord,—our Great Father!"—she started,
Then she paused, as if troubles pressed sore—
"Thou knowest——" the words through me darted,
An' I heard scarcely anything more.

Yes, there was the message I'd waited:
"Thou knowest!"—that's all we can say,
At times when, with cares overweighted,
We neither can worship nor pray.

"Thou knowest" my cares? Then I'll bear them.
My strength? Then right onward I'll press.
My few joys? Then if need be, I'll spare them.
My failings? I'll freely confess!

Yes,—my blessing had come, though it tarried;
I'd surely not "waited in vain."
Small now seemed the burden I carried,
An' "light" my afflictions an' pain.

A warm kiss "made it up" with dear Mary,
An' I soothed little Jack for the night,
E'en my husband grew hopeful an' cheery,
Seein' me look so happy an' bright.

"TOM BROWN."

Sabbath Thoughts.

TAKEN FROM THE "REVISED VERSION."

"Blessed be the Lord, who daily beareth our burden, even the God who is our salvation."—Psa. lxviii. 19, 20, R.V.

A BEAUTIFUL thought for the new year is brought before us in these words. We need not stop to compare them with other versions, but, receiving them as the result of much research and learning, let us seek to realize all they are meant to teach us.

First then, let us at this beginning of a new portion of our lives, join with the Psalmist in blessing the Lord,—the mighty God of Jacob, to whom this sublime ode is addressed,—for the condescending care with which He stoops to us in our weakness, and "daily beareth our burdens." Sometimes these burdens seem more than enough for us; we look at the coming year with all its days and perhaps we tremble to meet its unknown events, its heavy possible burdens. But, Christian pilgrim, if you have cast the one great burden of your sins at the foot of the Cross, why should other burdens alarm you? He who is "the God of our own salvation" daily beareth them. They come not upon you all at once, they come day by day, and daily strength will be no less granted than daily bread.

Those who sang this ancient song of victory in marching through the wilderness, bore glad witness to what God had done for them. We, too, in looking back can tell of many a mercy granted, many a burden removed, and shall not we also bless the Lord, and take courage for the future? Only let us beware of making burdens for ourselves, burdens of follies and vanities, which we can neither bear ourselves, nor cast on the Lord.

A New Year Reverie.

IN the still hour of midnight overthrown,
The old year dies; and in its strength sublime,
Like some far-travelling wave from shores unknown,
The New Year breaks upon the strand of time.

Once more the tide has turned, and days and hours,
Crested with promise, speed across the sea:
Their voice—a call to flagging aims and powers:
Their march—an echo of eternity.

And some will bring from ocean depths afar
A freight of gladness, all unknown as yet;
And some must leave on memory's harbour bar
The wreckage lost in anguish and regret.

Some mornings, luminous with hope, shall make
For sad and straitened souls a shining way;
And some in clouds and tearfulness shall break,
And dark with desolation pass away.

And none may stay their swift resistless course,
Or know beforehand how their stroke shall fall;
But God Himself, their Giver and their Source,
Hath His own plan of love for each and all.

If earthly joy shall crown this year with good,
And make it dearer than all years gone by,
Or if His chastenings gather like a flood,
All shall be well, if He, our Strength, be nigh.

And if, some nightfall, o'er the waves asleep,
There come to us the strange and shadowy Form—
At Whose behest we launch into the deep,
To sail beyond the sunlight and the storm—

His voice of love shall calm the depths below,
His mercy guide our lonely barque aright,
Till we shall see, o'er hills that angels know,
The New Year break in everlasting light!

MARY ROWLES.

"JENNY WREN'S MITE."

CHAPTER I.—WHAT MOTHER USED TO SAY.

THE livelong autumn day Jenny and her toy had been keeping house together.

It was not much of a house to keep—only one second floor back room in a small London street; and not much of a toy—the body of a doll that had once had wax arms and legs and head, but had lost them all long before it came into small Jenny's eager hands. The wool-stuffed stumps of its limbs remained, and for head there was a reel covered with rag, and threaded on to the body with a piece of string.

It is said sometimes that children with a nursery full of fine toys, like the broken and shabby ones best. May be so; but little tidy-natured Jenny would certainly have known how to admire a beautiful flaxen-haired, rosy-cheeked, prettily-dressed doll, better than the poor dingy, dilapidated thing she now had.

But then—what would you? Where was the "Dust-ho" man to get his little girl beautiful new dolls, with good clothes? It was difficult enough work to keep her in neat clothes herself, since her mother died two years ago.

The dustman had been thankful enough when the mutilated toy came up, one morning, on the top of a basket of refuse he had just shovelled out of a dusthole.

"What are ye a pocketin' of there?" sharply asked his companion, as Tom Silver hastily picked off the dingy treasure, gave it a shake, and thrust it inside his shirt for safe keeping.

There was something of a flush on his face, and a moisture in his eyes as he pulled it forth again.

"There," he said, with a husky laugh; "do you think you or the master will grudge that to my little wren?"

"No, nor to a cock-robin nor a tom-tit, nather," was the reply, with a hoarse laugh. "To seen you hustle away that bit o 'rubbish out o' sight, any another besides me would ha' thought as you'd come upon a some'at to match yer name, Silver."

And with another laugh at his attempt at a joke, Bill lurched on with his own load up to the cart, and flung another basket of ashes on to the unsavoury heap collected there already.

Tom continued his day's business diligently enough, but, truth to tell, his thoughts wandered away from it even more than usual, to a little five-year-old girlie, shut into a second-floor back room, where she was spending that long day, as she had spent many and many another long day, all alone.

Tom Silver had provided his little lonely girl with a kitten once, by way of some company to cheer her solitude, but when work was slack for a few weeks he could not help grudging the small pet the milk its mistress insisted upon its sharing with herself. Soon after that it developed a decidedly spiteful disposition, and, having scratched Jennie badly, he got rid of it.

"If only I could keep ye in toys, my dearie!" he sighed.

But wishes of that sort were useless. It was almost impossibly difficult to find pennies enough to feed her and clothe her sufficiently, and provide firing to keep her warm in the long winter time. There were no pennies to spare for toys.

And Tom was not a genius. He had none of what is called the inventive faculty. He was a kind, tender, most loving father; but he had no notion of making playthings for his toyless little daughter, or doing anything but pity her for being so much alone.

"Working times is rougher upon ye nor slack times, my wee wren," he would say, pityingly, as he kissed her good-bye in the dull dark winter mornings, or the bright ones of midsummer, and left her to spend the lengthy hours with only the companionship of her own thoughts, and with no occupation but what a child of four or five years of age could invent for herself.

The remainder of the house was occupied by Silver's landlord and landlady, and their nearly grown-up children, and they all held themselves much too high to have anything to do with a dustman's child.

Silver, on his side, although humble almost to a fault, as far as the estimation of himself was concerned, thought his Jenny Wren much too precious and sacred a little creature to run about and make friends with the rough children in the street, and as he had neither time, nor opportunity, nor courage to make fitter friends for her, she had to put up with loneliness.

"If only your mother had lived, for your sake, my poor lassie!" ejaculated her father. But the spirit of Jenny's young mother had flown to the bright home above, and her body lay in that dingy, dilapidated-looking corner of the big churchyard, and Jenny and her father had to make the best of circumstances.

Little Jenny was a wonderfully contented little creature, and clever in her quiet way. In the cold, biting winter-time she would bustle about the room "tidying up" in a funny baby fashion of her own, so long as the fire lasted which father made up before he left in the morning.

And when the fire had died out, and the last lingering warmth it left had faded before the icy weather, she would slip off her frock and shoes and go to bed, as father had bidden, till he returned.

It was almost worth while to endure the dreariness of those terribly long hours of loneliness for the joy of that return-time.

"Father, and fire, and light, and talk, and tea—all the nice things heaped up together," murmured wee Jenny many a time, with an utterness of contentment that few children know who have the comfort of bright, happy, cheerful homes all day long.

"Father," she asked one evening, as she sat on his knee, her calm peaceful little face resting against his shoulder. "Father, seems I remember one day you saying mother used to say something always when she was happy, like you and me are together of evenings."

Silver put down his tea-cup, and smoothed his child's hair.

"Aye, my Jenny, ye're right there; I did tell ye one day last spring—it were two years to the hour since she were took away from me an' you; and the thought o' her, and her pretty ways, and her angel-tongue were strong upon me that night, and I telled ye a bit or two o' the pretty sayings she had."

"I like the one she said when she were happy," murmured Jenny softly. "Wish I could remember it."

"If I say it again, perhaps little Wren can," answered Silver rather eagerly. It suddenly seemed to him as though it would be a very meet and pleasant thing for him to hear his little daughter repeat the favourite sayings of her mother.

Quite unconsciously he took the two small hands, and clasped them together in one of his own, as the mother had done with the baby hands before, and repeated gravely: "Bless the Lord for His loving mercies. May He give us grateful hearts."

"That's pretty," whispered Jenny. "I thought I bemembered it was." More aloud she added—"Don't you never say 'Bless the loving Lord,' father?"

Tom Silver passed his haud up over his forehead and shook his head.

"Not I, child. I never had rightly no learning that way. I did begin to catch a sort o' kind of sight of it from your mother, but she were took, and so there were the end of it all. I'm too took up now with seeing you, to give thoughts to aught else."

Silence for a few moments, then the little face turned round enough for the soft lips to be pressed to the rough face.

"I do love you, oh, so much, father, and I should like to say 'Bless the loving Lord for His mercies,' when you come home and light the lamp, and make the fire, and we have our tea. Is it then that mother would have said it?"

"Ah! I expect so," was the quiet answer, and then he said not another word, until tea was finished. Tom Silver had a slow brain. He was neither clever, talented, nor learned, but he had one grand possession, the power of an enduring love. He had loved and reverenced Jenny's mother in the past, and, although it was more than two years since he lost her, he still loved her as deeply as when they lived together in their simple home on earth. It gave him a strange thrill of mingled pain and pleasure henceforth, as evening by evening, Jenny's prelude to their favourite meal would be her mother's oft-repeated thanksgiving prayer.

The fire burning up cheerfully, the lamp lighted, the tea all prepared, and Jenny established according to custom, on her father's knee, she would fold her hands together as her father had folded them that night, and repeat in her clear, earnest voice, "Bless the Lord for His loving mercies, and give us grateful hearts."

It was the only prayer said in that one-roomed home, and neither father nor child had any very distinct thought or understanding as to the meaning of that. But there was at least this—that it was said with reverence, and from a heart full of thankfulness.

The days were sad and oppressive enough to the child, but she had her happy evenings with her father, and you know the text, do you not, dear readers—"Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, Thou hast perfected praise."

NEW YEAR'S ENIGMA.

New hopes, new promises, new blessings cheer
Our hearts while entering on the opening year;
Come, search out all the Holy Scriptures say
About "new" things this happy New Year's Day.

At Pentecost the pious Hebrew brings
A new meat offering to the King of kings.
New wine, in bottles new for safety stored,
Furnished a parable for Christ the Lord,
And none, says He, will put new cloth to old,
(Find where St. Matthew has the story told).
The Lord's compassions every day are new—
"A new commandment give I unto you"—
From a new cruse a holy prophet's hand
Took salt to heal a waste and barren land.
A giant wore a new and mighty sword;
The tomb was new wherein they laid the Lord;
New tongues were promised for the preacher's aid;
A new and living way has Jesus made—
"This cup shall be a covenant ever new;
My blood," said Jesus, "which is shed for you!"
From Samson's arms new ropes were snapped like thread.
"They chose new gods," the mighty Deborah said.
"There rose a new king over Egypt's land
That knew not Joseph." Heathen priests command
The Philistines, the Ark of God to take,
On a new cart which they were told to make.
Solomon writes of fruits both new and old,
New heaven and earth did captive John behold;
New things to Israel does Isaiah show,
Things which were hidden "which thou didst not know."
"Purge out old leaven, let the lump be new."
Writes Paul, "for Christ is sacrificed for you!"
John saw a new Jerusalem come down,
Jesus' "new doctrine" gained a wide renown.
Who dwell in Christ, and all His words obey,
New creatures are, "old things are passed away";
Put off the old man and put on the new,
A nature which is righteous, pure and true.
A new name, written on a pure white stone,
May we receive from Jesus as our own;
And join in heaven's new song with holy mirth,
Which those may learn who are redeemed from earth.

Find out each reference now, till, one by one,
The twenty-four are all correctly done;
Set in a long and nicely even row,
Each chapter, book and verse must clearly show;
And if this strange enigma has perplex'd,
Then add up all the chapter numbers next,— Subtract thirteen, and then divide by eight,
And now the figures left behind will state
In which long chapter you must closely look
Among the pages of Ezekiel's book,
For two "new" things for which we all should pray
That God will give us on this New Year's Day.

L. T.

SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. I.

1. It records words spoken by an idolater.

2. It contains a word only mentioned in two other places in the Bible, once in Ecclesiastes, and once in Romans.

3. It bears reference to Jehovah and His power to give earthly prosperity.

4. It is an appeal to one far from his home.

5. The younger daughter of the speaker is mentioned by Jeremiah.

6. The eldest son of the hearer put the lives of his own children in danger.

7. The speaker had thirteen grandchildren.

8. Of one of them it is said that he "became a servant unto tribute."

9. One of the two men mentioned in the verse afterwards said to the other, "What is my trespass? what is my sin?"

10. The one was servant to the other, but the name of the servant is the more honoured.

11. It contains an earnest request, and an acknowledgment of benefits received.

12. It consists of 32 words, and is in a chapter containing more than 32 verses.

L. T.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

WINTER GLEANERS

No. 1759.—JANUARY 14, 1868.

The Poor of the Flock.

GOD only knows the sorrows of the poor,
The dull monotony of care and pain,
The heavy hours of toil for scanty gain,
The weariness that slumber cannot cure.
Behold, we count them happy which endure!
But oh, the tension of the life-long strain,
The sad, pathetic striving to attain
Some foothold for the future, safe and sure!
God knows it all—their labour unto death,
Their patience when by chastening tried and proved;
Their kindness to each other freely given.
And in the poor of this world, rich in faith,
He hath a people chosen and beloved,
Heirs of a kingdom kept for them in heaven.
The discipline of care and poverty,
Even here shall bring them blessing in disguise,
And well prepare them for the glad surprise
Of rest and riches where no want can be.
From furrowed field or narrow street set free—
Through humble paths of toil they shall arise,
To tread the golden highways of the skies;
Eyes that once feared the morrow's need, shall see
The gracious plenty of the marriage feast;
The toil-worn hands, long used to spade and loom,
Shall clasp a sceptre years may not destroy.
And for the true brave souls earth reckoned "least,"
The King at His own table shall make room,
And bid them share His everlasting joy!

MARY ROWLES.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR.

I.—THE DESTITUTE OF GLASGOW.

THE problem of the poor is ever with us, and our efforts to solve it meet with such scant success that many fear we are ill-advised. We are told, notwithstanding, that destitution is proportionately less than it used to be. It may be so. There is much in the view that so long as we restrict our studies to the doings of our monarchs, and the records of the battles in the struggle of nation against nation, we skim the past at its best; and that when we explore below the smiling surface of the school-book, and learn how our forefathers lived, the misery of merry England is manifest. It is probably true that the misery has been reduced by a percentage; but there is little comfort in percentages when the bulk increases. Ten in a thousand may be less than two in a hundred, but the average mind sees only the fivefold increase, and refuses to reduce it to its statistical value.

And no friend of his race is likely to be satisfied with this percentage balm. If the misery has been reduced, let us reduce it faster; if the reduction is at the rate of arithmetical progression, let us increase the rate to that of geometrical progression! Whether it be better than it used to be or not, the present state of the poor, physically, mentally, morally, is appalling. It cries out to us; it is a scandal to us. What is to be done?

We hear much of the efforts made in London; but is there nothing we can learn from other great cities? Take Glasgow, for instance, the second city in the Empire. Those who know best, speak with praise of the work going on there in ameliorating the condition of the youthful poor. "Religion and charity go hand in hand; the physical and spiritual needs are in due order ministered unto." Is there no detail here worthy of adoption?

Let us see. "The most striking thing in Glasgow is the poor children's dinner; it is the key of the position." Free meals are not peculiar to Glasgow; but they may have different developments. Let us go to the Sunday afternoon dinner and judge for ourselves. There is not much difficulty in finding the way to that thickly-populated neighbourhood into which the railway to St. Enoch's lets so much beneficent daylight. The main road is clean and clear enough, but the wynds and closes on either hand teem with the dirty, the callous, and the miserable. Past the Tron kirk, we turn into the Saltmarket, and are but a few steps from the Green, when we reach the handsome new hall in James Morrison Street. There is a crowd at the doors and in the road; but this we avoid as we make our way at once to the kitchen.

Around us are preparations for feeding on a large scale, and all is quiet and orderly. Three huge cauldrons there are, each holding about ninety gallons, and full of simmering rice and milk. A table is pushed close to them, and at one end of it is a well-cleaned wooden washing tub. Some half dozen young fellows are bringing in scores of quart mugs, and stacking them round the tub.

The lid of the cauldron is taken off, and one of the lads dips a huge ladle as big as a hand bowl into the thin white pudding and transfers it steaming to the tub. At the same time two others seize the mugs one in each hand, and dip them into the tub and fill them. Two others seize the hot filled mugs and lay them side by side in deep wooden waggons. Twenty-four mugs go to a layer. When the layer is complete, another lad standing ready with a sheaf of spoons drops one into each mug with such dexterity that there is no pause in the packing. The work goes on like clockwork; the ladling from the copper into the tub, the dipping of the mugs, the stacking in layers, four layers in each waggon. The full waggon is wheeled away and another is ready by its side, and soon the three cauldrons are empty, and a dozen waggons are full. On the top of each waggon a thin iron cover is placed, and on this is put a large basket of bread, a piece of bread for each mug. The loaded waggons all stand in a row ready to be run into the meeting.

The hall is under repair to-day, and the children are in the so-called tent, whose wooden roof and silent earthen floor give every help to the sound of speech and song. The area is crowded with seated children. As seen from the platform, the girls are to the left, the boys to the right. There are three columns of forms; the centre is double the width of the wings. These long forms have each eight boys and eight girls, and at each of their ends is a "monitor." At the end of each other form is also a monitor, so that the monitors line the gangways, with small classes of eight to the right or left of them.

As we enter the children are singing—

Come to the Saviour, make no delay:
Here in His Word He has shown us the way;
Here, in our midst, He is standing to-day,
Tenderly saying, "Come."

"Suffer the children!" Oh, hear His voice!
Let every heart leap forth and rejoice;
And let us freely make Him our choice:
Do not delay, but come.

Timid and silvery sound the girls' voices as they softly sing the third verse—

Think once again, He's with us to-day
Heed now His blessed command and obey;
Hear now His accents tenderly say,
"Will you, my children, come?"

And with their full strength, the boys join in with just a touch of defiance in their tone; and the chorus swings out with vigour—

Joyful, joyful, will the meeting be,
When from sin our hearts are pure and free,
And we shall gather, Saviour, with Thee,
In our eternal home.

The sight is an affecting one, especially to those who see it for the first time. There is always a spell in the voice of numbers be it in panic or praise, in joy or sorrow; but beyond this there is here something purer, deeper, more precious. The heart thrills in sympathy with the little people so eagerly expectant and so determined to sing their best to please their leader and enjoy themselves in his way; and the thought comes to us that in but a little our children differ from these, and may at any time become as they are. How have these come to this? What can be done to lift them from it? The book of poverty lies open; the faces are its pages. Many there are sickly and weak; some even with the hollow cheek and bluish bones showing through the thin flesh, and telling the bitter tale of starvation. Some there are with delicate features refined by suffering; a few are coarse and aggressive, telling unmistakably that the failure cannot be entirely charged to others. Many would be beautiful were it not for the shifty look of the outcast. Many have good faces, pure and true, such are safe to keep to the right road if only the chance be given them. A few are in rags, openly and boastingly; but most have their shawls or jackets held or pinned tight, so as to make the best show they can. Bare-headed are most of the girls, and barefooted are many of them, though not from choice, for the crippled toes tell of ill-fitting boots. There sit the children, a thousand and one odd possibilities, samples of thousands more amongst us. What are you going to do with them? Are they to be your friends or your enemies? If you cannot lift them all, how are you to sift them?

Now they are thinking but of the moment, carried away by the music of their own voices, with eyes keenly watching Mr. Mackeith as he times and leads them; and when the hymn ends, listen as the voices follow his to the Lord's Prayer, "every eye closed, every head bowed." It is not often that the petitions so strike home.

Then there is another hymn sung with as much vigour as the last; but in the middle the boys get ahead, and have to be pulled up. Another start is made, and all goes smoothly; then, for a few minutes, Mr. Mackeith talks to his little folks of their last Sabbath lesson, which they are supposed to have remembered, and cheerily come the answers back from dozens at a time, though most of the correct ones hail from the girls. Sometimes there are over two thousand children—a large class to manage; and yet it is done in a style that is truly masterly. For an example of unfailing tact and quiet power, let the student go to the United Evangelistic Hall, James Morrison Street, on a Sabbath afternoon, and see how Mr. Mackeith, without apparent effort, keeps in hand the roughest of the waifs and strays of Glasgow.

After the address, of which we will say more anon, another hymn is sung, a one-verse hymn suiting well the little voices in words and air.

Two little eyes to look to God,
Two little ears to hear His Word;
Two little feet to run in His way,
Two little hands at His work every day;
One little tongue to speak His truth,
One little heart to trust Him in youth.
Take them, my Lord, and let them be Always obedient and true to Thee.

And while this is being sung each monitor has an apron given her, which she unrolls and ties on; and the waggons appear from the back, and are wheeled up each gangway, six in Indian file, one behind the other, for the girls; six, in a similar way, for the boys. As they advance many are the wistful glances from the children. Then grace is said by all, short but fervid, and evidently meant: and the monitors take into their aprons a piece of bread for each of their charges, the covers are removed, and the mugs passed along. So good is the organisation that in half a minute from the saying of the grace the waggons are empty, and every child in the hall is deep in what in many cases is the only sure meal of the week. Most of them eat ravenously; but one little girl in front of us has a sick brother on her knee, and though she looks hungry enough herself, she feeds him first and leaves her share untouched for a while. And there are others like her. Some of the girls have brought babies in arms with them; and such of these as have become restive have been taken out and had their meal at once. It is difficult to guess the ages; poverty makes some children so small for age, while others it makes look older than they really are; but few of the children can be more than twelve.

Quickly the mugs are emptied and replaced in the waggons. At the end of a quarter of an hour a hymn is sung, during which the waggons are drawn back. Then comes a short prayer, and at three o'clock precisely, an hour from the commencement, the dismissal takes place. Seat by seat from the rear the children leave, the monitors stepping into the empty seat behind and sitting down with any of the children who wish to remain for conversation. And some do remain, often some who have been driven out to starve, and will never see home again, and often boys and girls who have run away from home in search of liberty and have come here starving, asking to be sent back. To-day, as if to complete the picture, there is a "prisoner" brought to Mr. Mackeith, a boy who has been detained for fighting during the meal. A typical Arab he crouches at the foot of the platform wondering what is going to happen to him; a good-looking ne'er-do-well if there ever was one; gipsy-like in face, with brilliant dark eyes, restless and alert in search for a means of escape; bare-headed, barefooted; in rags, with a bit of a shirt torn open down the chest; an untamed animal with the makings in him of a handsome man. "Fighting, were you?" No answer. "What good did it do you?" No answer. "Will you fight if you come here again?" "No," says the culprit, looking at the ground. "Then you can come again. Go!" The boy is off like a flash; not till he is out of the tent does he stand upright.

In the winter the attendance is much larger than it has been to-day. Then broth or soup is given instead of rice and milk, though rice and milk is the most popular food. To-day, too, we are out in the tent. To see the service complete we should have been in the great hall, and heard the blackboard lesson. An interesting educational feature is this, here originated, and hence adapted freely elsewhere. On the platform is a huge map of Palestine. The map begins with the tracing of the coast line. Then Sabbath after Sabbath Mr. Mackeith builds it up before the eyes of his audience. As he tells the story of the Saviour he marks on the map the towns and the villages, and the hills and rivers. The children see the map grow before their eyes, and remember all its steps. The lesson for the day is but a short one, and few additions are made to the map. But the map is not the only means adopted for securing the attention of the children. Each lesson is illustrated by a drawing on a sheet of glass, eight feet square, in coloured crayons, done by Mr. David Pratt, sometimes before the meeting, sometimes in the presence of the children. The map gives the locality, the diagram pictures the scene, the lecturer tells the story, and the children with their memories aided in this way rarely forget. What the lessons and pictures are like can be seen in "The Story of Jesus," published a short time ago.[1]

In the year 100,000 children are fed at this Sabbath afternoon dinner, the cost being about seven shillings per hundred. Although the most striking features in the work of the United Evangelistic Association, it is but the stepping-stone towards helping the parents and child. The year's work runs into large figures. There is a free breakfast for adults on the Sunday morning, and in twelve months this brings in 67,876 attendances. There are daily meetings, and these are attended by 196,640 people. There are Gospel Temperance Meetings attended by 33,650 people. All the week through the work goes on. The child is looked after by the monitor, and its circumstances inquired into and reported to the committee, and help is given in every urgent case. How miscellaneous the inquiry work becomes can be seen from the following list, which deals only with what has been done since the statistics have been kept on the new plan. To Convalescent and Seaside Homes the Society has sent 392 cases; to Infirmaries, 329; to Training Ships, 42; to Industrial Schools, 76; to School Board evening classes (paying half the fees), 782; to Work, 722; to the Servants' Home, 59; to Houses of Shelter, 167; to Children's Hospitals, 11; to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, 26; to the country for a Fortnight's Holiday, 146; to parents there have been restored, 764; 194 have had Clothing and Home help; 2364 have had Medicine and Medical advice, and 2823 have been sent to the Day Refuges.

These Day Refuges are worth more than a passing allusion. Into them children are admitted from the most poverty-stricken homes after thorough investigation. And a systematic visitation of these homes is maintained while they remain in the Refuge. There are four Refuges: the Central, in Steel Street; the Western, in Clyde Street, Anderston; the Eastern, in London Road, Bridgeton; and a new one in the South. During the last twelve years there have been passed through these Refuges some three thousand children. The object is to provide a temporary home during the day. The Education Act says every child must be at school, but in not a few large cities the compulsory clause is a dead letter owing to the straitened circumstances of the parents. It is worthy of note that the bulk of the parents pay the school fees while the children are in the Refuges, and as soon as their circumstances improve the children are withdrawn. The Scotch have not lost the lead in their faith in education, and even the poorest of the honest poor will go in want themselves that their children may have a chance.

[1] "The Story of Jesus." Illustrated Lessons for Lord's Day use, by Alexander Mackeith. Obtainable of the Treasurer, Mr. J. H. N. Graham, 57 Cathedral Street, Glasgow.

In all the Refuges after "family worship" the children get a substantial breakfast of porridge and milk, and are then marched to the Board Schools in the neighbourhood, returning at midday for dinner. In the afternoon they go back to school, and once more re-assemble in the refuges when school is over, for a Bible lesson and a supper of porridge and milk. At half-past six they are sent home. All have some kind of home to go to, but many of them are so poor, through the death, sickness, crime, carelessness, and misfortune of their natural guardians, that they have neither sufficient food nor clothing, and their education would be entirely neglected were it not for some such charity.

On much the same lines, but a larger scale, is the work of the Poor Children's Dinner-Table Society, originated in 1868. In twelve different districts it spreads a table on five days a week. The dinner, consisting of soup and bread, is brought from a central station, and about noon each day there may be seen converging towards the twelve centres of attraction a number of hungry scholars of all ages and conditions. Tickets admitting the children are distributed by the Society's agents, and a supply is always in the hands of the School Board officers, who have discretionary power to at once send on any hungry or destitute child. The name and address of the child is given on the ticket, and thus the superintendents are enabled to follow up the child, and in many cases help with clothing and boots. They also can keep a look-out on the children that they attend school, and thus kill two birds with one stone. And the number so under observation exceeds two thousand a day.

Miss Clugston's Homes for Convalescents and Incurables hardly come within our limits, but Mr. Quarrier's Orphan Homes are on the same ground exactly. In dealing with the orphan, Mr. Quarrier has a great advantage; the difficulty is not with the child but with its parents. A child whose parents are dead is much more likely to do credit to his training than one whose parents look upon him as a profitable investment. Mr. Quarrier's work has been immense, and his fame is world-wide. He has no endowment, but much prayer, and the money, like that to Mr. Mueller at Bristol, has never failed to come in day by day as required. The work is carried on in deep dependence upon God, and no one is asked, or called upon, for a subscription. Since 1871 over £120 000 has been received, and of this over £53,000 has been disbursed on buildings. A strong, loving hand is stretched out to children of all ages, to the infant of a few months, to the boy or girl of thirteen. They are placed in cottage family groups of thirty each, and of varying ages, amidst surroundings that speak to them of a promising future. A competent married couple is placed in charge of each boys' home, and a "mother" in each girls' home—with a baby in all of them as a central figure. Mr. Quarrier provides for them every moderate home comfort, lodging, clothing, moral and religious training, a plain, ordinary education, and a knowledge of indoor and outdoor industrial work of some sort, suited to age, sex, and capacity; he provides for the future of a large proportion of them either at home or in Canada, where over two thousand have been placed; he devotes his life to the work in patriarchal fashion; he lets his needs be known by appeals which cost him little, and without ever laying up in store for the future, he has always had his needs supplied without running into debt, and without superfluity, for he finds abundant use for every additional pound that a generous and largely anonymous public entrusts to him. He and Mr. Mackeith touch the lowest stratum of Glasgow poverty; their ladders go furthest into the well.

W. J. GORDON.

MY SHARE: WHAT IS IT?

EVERY morning throughout the year we have a breakfast party, our visitors assembling on the grass in front of our windows. In summer they are few in number, in winter many, and some come from a distance. All bring with them good appetites, and a few, a manifest determination to secure an unfair share of the good things spread for their use.

Perhaps our green, summer breakfast-table, might be dispensed with; but we are afraid of getting out of the way of caring for our feathered friends, so we spread it, though less bountifully, even during the fine weather.

Sparrows innumerable, starlings by scores, rooks that come a couple of miles, about thirty or more at once, are our regular guests. Irregular ones include thrushes, robins, a couple of jackdaws, and a single water wagtail. These are all on our visiting list, but only come during the coldest weather.

In watching the behaviour of our feathered guests, we note much that is instructive as well as amusing, for they reflect the failings of the unfeathered bipeds around us.

As a rule, the birds behave fairly well to each other. A sentinel rook stations himself on a convenient bough, and the instant breakfast is carried out, he gives a "caw" and down flap the rest, from unseen perches, shouting a joyful chorus.

These birds fill their beaks and fly off into the neighbouring field to consume their portion. Then the starlings eat some food and carry off more. Lastly the sparrows take their turn in silence. They cannot chirp and eat.

If there should be a tumult of bird voices, it is a sign that a greedy guest has been trying to monopolise all the best bits, and the rest are protesting against his selfishness, and combining to disappoint it.

There must be some choice morsels amongst the odds and ends saved for the birds, and equally must there be some of these creatures who would like to secure them, so beaks are stretched in all directions, and bits snatched by one from another, without ceremony or disguise. Mostly the disappointed ones hasten to appropriate the next best, instead of squabbling about what has already disappeared down their neighbours' throats. Perhaps the birds are wise enough to realise that if they began to quarrel, they would get nothing, for the peaceable ones would, in the meanwhile, clear the grassy table.

Sometimes the conduct of one bird is quite too bad to be endured, as we saw a few mornings ago.

A little heap of tit-bits had been dropped close together, and, over against these, a pugnacious starling had planted himself, and alternately gobled and pecked at every other bird that put in a claim to share the feast. He showed a degree of courage worthy of a better cause, and succeeded in keeping off all who approached him singly.

Fair means were useless, so the birds drew aside, evidently in consultation. A decision was soon arrived at. Back they came, chattering and scolding, and drove Mr. Greedysides to take shelter in a neighbouring chimney, whence he dared not return. Then they gathered in peace and harmony to finish the meal, which his selfishness had interrupted.

This bird-picture is but a reflex of what is continually going on amongst men and women in the world. Each tries to get more than a fair share of the good things which a good and gracious God has strewn broadcast, for the comfort, sustenance, and enjoyment of His creatures. Probably if each of us were asked to define what we consider to be our proper share of these gifts, we should hesitate to reveal the thoughts of our hearts.

There is a voice within that speaks to us, but does not speak out to the world at large. It says, "Take care of self. Let your neighbour look after his share, but mind that yours is more and better. Never mind if, in springing up the ladder which is to raise you, a chance push lands some one else lower down than he was, with less strength, time and courage to begin the ascent again. What concerns you is to make your own footing sure, to grasp a large handful and keep hold."

Self—that is the hidden part of us—speaks in these terms, to that outer part of us which the world sees and notes.

It is the most persistent prompter we have, for we are compelled to carry it with us wherever we go. We profess that it is an enemy to be vanquished, and that it is the most stubborn one we have to battle with; and yet we are always thinking how we may come to terms with it, and seize from others what conscience pleads we should neither touch, taste, nor handle.

This inner self is like the greedy starling. At the board it likes to secure the best place, the largest share of dainties, the costliest wine. It pushes others aside so as to come in contact with guests of the highest rank, or persons who may be useful in advancing its interests at some future time.

However abundant may be the supply of good things, it cannot be happy, or even contented, without having more and better than its neighbours.

"Love my neighbour as myself," it whispers in the heart, though not in the hearing of the world. "Not so. What! Place any other being on the same level as that on which I stand? Be content to see all equally well cared for? A thousand times, No! These others must have something, of course, but I must secure what I deem my rightful share, let who may fall short."

But, while Self confesses its aims and longings, and forms such an estimate of its deservings in that part of its being which can be looked into only by Him who is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart, it has another voice and expresses widely differing sentiments from these, when the world is listening. It is the loudest in its condemnation of selfishness, the readiest in pointing out any neighbour who is advancing his own claims or boldly pushing his own interests, without consideration for those of other people.

Perhaps Self is occasionally deceived as to what is its fair share. It estimates its own merits so highly, that at last it is persuaded that what it claims is what it merits. Its demands are in accordance with this inner estimate, and are so persistently urged in action, not in words, that at length the outside world yields, and accords the best places rather than contest the right to take them.

As I write, a little picture comes before my eyes of an individual whom I knew many years ago. He was an apt illustration of those who get because they will have, who seize the best share as if it were theirs by right and not by favour of their fellows.

This man was a member of a public body, and at every great gathering of citizens, he succeeded in obtaining for himself and those belonging to him, places in the front rank or at the chief table. Another member, of greater age, longer service, more real claims to notice and to gratitude, was almost as invariably found occupying one of the least conspicuous positions, giving up the place to which he was entitled, and in honour preferring another to it. And he found real enjoyment in the pleasure he was enabled to give, though at the expense of Self, and by dint of refusing to listen to its inner pleadings.

On a single occasion, however, he was not permitted to indulge his modest, unselfish spirit. Contrary to his own wish, he and his were put in the front rank, and beside the most distinguished guests.

Something—probably a matter of gain—had kept the other away until all the chief places were filled, but by persons with claims to them at least equal to his own, and, for this once, he had to content himself with an inferior position. Did he take it in silence?

No. Self made its voice heard by one individual—the man who had ever been ready to make way for others, and who would have cheerfully done it for him at that moment, had he been permitted, because in him was the charity "which seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked," but "suffereth long and is kind."

This was the only man to whom Self dared to utter the expression of disappointed pride, mortification, and anger, and to him he said, as he passed, "Trust you for getting a good place"!

One or two others overheard the remark, and understood the feeling that prompted it. He to whom it was addressed answered with a kindly look, and in words befitting a disciple of Him who "when he was reviled, reviled not again"—

"I would gladly give it to you, if I could," he said. "It is of far more value to you than it is to me."

This determination to seize on more than a fair share seems comparatively excusable amongst those who have so little of the world's goods that the most they can hope to obtain is bare sustenance. It is not, however, amongst these that Self is most conspicuous. On the contrary, the poor are famous for the largeness of their hearts when compared with the smallness of their means. In the struggle for a few hours' work at the East-end, the strong have been known to give place to the weak amongst the far too numerous applicants. And yet, surely the pinch of hunger must have been even more keenly felt by the able-bodied and strong men than by the feeble.

One evening, a crowd of ladies and gentlemen were outside the entrance to a great concert-room. A noted singer was expected, and many of the intended audience had come very early, and stood outside awaiting the opening of the doors. All the seats were subscribed for beforehand, on equal terms, and none were reserved, so that the best were certain to be secured by those who were first on the spot.

As usual, there was quite a crowd outside the railings. Those who cannot wear costly apparel like to see it, and all who came to these concerts were in evening dress. When the doors were opened there was a rush to obtain a speedy entrance, and the pushing and elbowing which followed caused no little amusement amongst the humbler lookers-on. One of these shouted to a comrade who was standing aloof, "Bill, come here, and see how these gentlefolks can shove one another."

The speaker regarded the spectacle with astonishment. He was evidently new to such scenes and perhaps had the notion that of "shoving," as he called it, the lower class held the monopoly. He learned however, that selfishness is confined to no class, and that the same inner voice speaks alike beneath velvet bodice and fustian waistcoat.

Let me quote another incident which fell under my own notice, and is of a kind which daily repeats itself. I was present when several gentlemen were discussing the rise and fall in the value of certain investments. It was a short time after the introduction of the electric light had caused the formation of so many companies, and so much speculation in connection with them.

One of the gentlemen, with a self-complacent smile, was giving his experience for the benefit of the rest.

"I bought a number of shares," he said, "at par, and within a short time I received more than my money back again in the shape of dividends. Not that these were earned. The profit came through royalties paid to us by other companies. Of course, the shares went up enormously. I put two and two together, and decided on selling, feeling convinced that they would soon be down with a run."

"And you got clear out," said an excited listener.

"I did, and netted the price of my shares and fifty per cent. in addition, when I sold out."

"That was clear gain of a hundred and fifty per cent. then, for you had previously got back the original money."

"You lucky fellow!" exclaimed the other, with a sigh, which said as plainly as possible, "I wish I had done likewise."

A little shadow crossed the face of the lucky fellow, and he replied in a regretful tone: "Yes I did fairly well, but I have always felt sorry for one thing."

I, in my ignorance of such subjects and transactions, thought that the fortunate man was going to express some regret for the purchaser of the shares, whose loss must have been terrible—possibly ruinous. Not so, however, for the speaker continued. "If I had sold three days later, I should have done better still. They went up five per cent. beyond the price I actually got, so that I lost some hundreds of pounds by being in too great a hurry."

"But you might have waited too long," said the other.

"True, and I really did very well, but it is always annoying to know that one might have done better."

The expression of this "lucky fellow's" face alternated between a self-satisfied smirk at his large gain, and a half-pettish frown at the thought that it was somewhat less than came within the bounds of possiblity.

To a Red-Breast

Little Bird, with bosom Red,
Welcome to my Humble Shed!
Courtly Domes of High Degree
Have no room for Thee and Me:
Pride and Pleasure's fickle Throng
Nothing mind an Idle Song.
Daily near my Table steal,
While I pick my scanty meal.
Doubt not, little though there be,
But I'll cast a Crumb to Thee;
Well rewarded, if I spy
Pleasure in Thy Glancing Eye.
See thee, when thou'st eat thy fill
Plume Thy Breast, and wipe thy Bill

It is sad to think that such things are of hourly occurrence and that the voice which pleads for Self, its luxuries, aggrandisement, gain, no matter at what cost, overpowers every other. That there is absolutely no thought as to the effect upon our neighbour, or as to what may have been the price he has paid for that which we have gained and now gloat over, saying "this is mine, this the prize of my business tact and foresight." Or at best there is a contemptuous pity felt for those who, wanting these qualities, have gone down, like the shares, with a run.

Self, like verbs, has two voices, an active and a passive one. In this paper I have dealt with the former, the selfishness which is aggressive, grasping, which boldy pushes aside its neighbour, seizes and keeps all it can, yet, in words, rails against all who act in a similar manner: passive selfishness is all-absorbing without being absolutely aggressive, and manifests itself rather by clinging to everything it calls "mine," and shutting out others from any participation therein, than by elbowing these aside and boldly seizing the best of every kind.

My share: what is it?

Passive Selfishness says, "What I have and intend to keep. Withdraw the hand stretched out to me for help, no use waiting; it will go back empty. Turn your feet in another direction, for you vainly seek assistance or service from me."

Active Selfishness proves by hourly practice, that its estimate of the share that should come to it, is, "All I can possibly get."

Neither voice has any ring of pity in it. Both kinds are merciless: one by withholding what would carry joy and comfort with it in the giving, the other by depriving its neighbour of a fair share in order to get an unfair one.

What is the remedy? What can alone silence the voice of Self, or stay the action which indulges it at the cost of mercy, loving-kindness, pity, even common courtesy?

There is only one, and it meets both cases: Love to God, from which as a necessary consequence, follows love for one's neighbour, a desire to do good unto all men, and self-forgetfulness. It is best summed up in the very words of our Lord and Master, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On these two commandments, hang all the law and the prophets."

"If a man love Me he will keep My words. This is My commandment, that ye love one another, as I have loved you."

RUTH LAMB.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER III.—A WARNING.

"A VERY distinguished looking man,"—"Most cultivated and intellectual,"—"Quite an addition to the county,"—"A man it is a pleasure and satisfaction to know."

Such were the comments passed upon Marcus Stratford by the neighbouring land-owners and gentry who called to renew acquaintance with him, and the young Kynastons were almost inclined to turn into an object of mirthful ridicule this new paragon, before ever they had seen him. Except for a glimpse of a tall figure and bronzed face in the Stratford family pew at church on Sunday, five days passed by without any visit from him. Roy came daily, Easter holidays notwithstanding, and every day he had more to say in praise of Marcus and his considerate kindness. The boy felt certain of his support with regard to his Oxford scheme, which had been several times discussed between them, and in fact he seemed to think that a vista of glorious possibilities had opened before him, and that his brother's return heralded the realisation of all his most cherished dreams.

Muriel was making tea for the noisy schoolroom party in the warm and sheltered bowling-alley of their sunny south garden, when a tumultuous shout and rush caused her to raise her eyes, and she saw that Roy was walking towards them, a glad, proud look upon his face, and his tall brother at his side.

The Kynastons, as a family, were not shy, and despite his lengthened absence, Marcus was an old friend. They had all known him all their lives. There was a clamour of eager voices loud enough to deafen unaccustomed ears, and it was difficult to say whether Syd or Joyce, Topsy or Jacko talked the loudest or most fast. Only Muriel and little Lilias remained where they were, one from infantile shyness of a strange face, the other from an amused sense of hopelessness at getting so much as a word in edge-ways. But in a few minutes Marcus had shaken himself free of the noisy troop that surrounded him, and was approaching Muriel, taking off his hat as he did so.

"And this, I suppose, is the Muriel of old days," he said, a peculiarly sweet smile softening for a moment the somewhat severe lines of eyes and mouth. "The Muriel whom I left almost a little girl grown to be a young lady. Must I say Miss Kynaston now?"

"You need not," answered Muriel simply, as she laid her hand in his, and looked up at him with a frankness that had something childlike in it. "I am not very different from what I was three years ago, I think. I am not even 'out' yet," and she met his smile with an answering expression.

"You would be if there was anything to come out at," cried Syd, "but nobody ever gives anything but garden parties and things here, and even Lilias can go to them. Marcus, you must wake us up, and give something or other to do honour to the neighbourhood, when they have all called upon you, and invited you to their dull old dinners. Come now, it's the least you can do—and then Muriel can come out."

"Oh, do! Marcus, do!" cried Joyce, "and we'll all come, because we're such old friends, you know, and we children can play games in the hall, and have a table of our own at supper."

"Oh, do! do! do!" shouted Topsy and Jacko in a breath, and another hubbub arose, which brought for a moment a flush of pain to Muriel's face, for she knew only too well why it was that Marcus had been summoned home, and feared that this eager demand for gaiety, innocently made as it was, would seem to him unfeeling.

She raised her eyes to his to see if he were vexed or saddened, and she met his earnest glance fixed upon her in a way that told her he had read her thought. She coloured up again, half frightened at having been so quickly understood, and bent down over the child who stood clasping closely her disengaged hand.

"Won't you speak to Marcus, Lilias?" she said gently. "You said you wanted to see him, because you had forgotten him."

Marcus held out his hand kindly, and the little one placed her's timidly in it.

"So you have forgotten me, Lilias, have you? Have you got a kiss for me? Ah I thought so—we shall be friends again soon, shan't we? I've not forgotten you, pussy. Some day you must all come up to tea with Roy, and you will see what funny things little people in Russia play with."

Roy made pantomimic gestures which made it plain to his friends that the contents of his brother's boxes were of a first-class description, and had something to do with each one of them. Marcus at once became a doubly popular person, and as the merry informal meal progressed, the fun grew fast and furious, and the garden echoed to the sound of merry voices and light-hearted laughter.

Muriel did not contribute much to the gay tumult, nor, for that matter, did Marcus either. She wondered if she were right in thinking that it was something of an effort to him to smile a response to the eager questions pressed upon him, and that he was in reality suffering somewhat from depression of mind.

Later on, when the mercurial spirits of the juniors had carried them all farther afield for a time, and Muriel found herself alone with Marcus, she ventured to ask a direct question, less difficult to frame from the inward consciousness that he knew pretty well of what she was thinking. His penetration was a little disconcerting, but in some ways it made speech easier.

"I am afraid," she said, "that you think very badly of Mrs. Stratford's health."

"I do," he answered very seriously. "I had no idea, in spite of what she had told me, that I should find her so terribly changed. I wish I had come home before. I would have done so long ago, had I had any idea of the true state of the case."

"But will not the warm weather make her better?"

"I fear she is past reaping the benefit of summer heat. I fear it may even tell unfavourably upon her."

"I thought she looked a little better when I saw her last."

"Possibly: yet I am not sure that I like this sudden access of strength. It reminds me too forcibly of the last flicker of an expiring lamp."

Muriel looked very grave. She was sure Marcus would not speak thus without good reason.

"Roy does not know, does he?"

"No; it seems to me that the boy is blind." Muriel's face had put on its very thoughtful look.

"Do you know, Marcus," she said, looking straight out before her, "I sometimes think Roy has a curious faculty of blinding himself, or letting himself be blinded to anything he does not want to see. I do not know if I make my meaning clear."

"I believe I understand you," answered Marcus, somewhat struck by the girl's words and look. "I have not had very much time in which to study Roy since I got home, and before I left he was a mere boy. He is very affectionate and winning, and devoted to his mother, which makes his strange blindness as to her precarious state the more strange."

"It will be a great shock to him when the truth does come upon him," said Muriel, and Marcus made a sign of assent.

"You will stay at home always now, I suppose?" she said, and he answered in the affirmative.

Soon after this the brothers took their leave and walked homewards across the field path.

"Aren't they all jolly?" asked Roy eagerly. "You can't think what a pleasant house their's always is. Those fellows are almost like brothers, and the girls quite as good as sisters."

"I am very glad you have such pleasant friends and neighbours. You could not be more fortunately situated."

"No; though it's rather a bore that Vincent is so much away. He's my own age and my great chum, but he's at sea nearly all his time. However, when I go to Oxford, I shall have plenty of fellows my own age to chum with. Have you spoken to mother about it yet? It's quite time to be thinking about it. I shall be eighteen in July."

"I did say something to your mother the other day; but I cannot say she seemed to enter into the plan; but we have had too much else to discuss to have given the matter much thought."

Roy's bright face suddenly clouded.

"Oh, but I must go," he said quickly; "it's absurd for a fellow to be brought up altogether at home. I didn't make a fuss at not going to school, because mother wanted some one to be with her at home, and father was too ill to go about and help her to look after things. But now that you are here she can quite well spare me to go to college. I must talk to her about it, and you must back me. You know quite well that a fellow ought to see something of life when he gets to my age."

"You must not trouble your mother about anything, Roy. She and I will both do our best for your welfare and happiness; but she must be kept very quiet just now, and not be worried."

"Why?"

"Because she is very unwell, and we are exceedingly anxious about her."

"She is ever so much better than she was in the winter, though," answered Roy confidently. "If you'd seen her then, you would not think anything of this. Why she was in bed then for weeks at a time, and now she is up and about every day and almost all day long."

"Nevertheless, Roy, she is in a most precarious state, and we must neither of us do or say anything to cause her distress or anxiety."

"There is nothing in my wanting to go to college to distress her," said Roy quickly. "And time gets on so fast that I can't help feeling something ought to be decided."

"We will neither of us forget your interest or your wishes, Roy," answered the elder brother kindly yet gravely, "but you must be content for a little while to be patient. Your mother evidently has some objection to your leaving home, and it will not do to distress her by insisting too much upon your own wish."

Roy looked as much put out as it was in his nature to be.

"Why are all women so ——?" he began, but Marcus lifted his hand and stopped him by a gesture.

"Do not say anything of your mother, Roy, that you may be sorry for later," said the elder brother with a gravity that struck the lad as being rather overdone.

"Why, Marcus," he said half laughing, "you talk as if——"

"In this world of death and change, Roy, we never know what will happen; and idle words once spoken hastily, sometimes leave a sting behind that nothing can afterwards remove."

Roy looked suddenly grave, and said no more all the way home.

CHAPTER IV.—ROY'S STORY.

It sometimes seems as if a strong motive to live till a certain thing is done gives to a dying person a sort of fictitious strength, sufficient to carry them over the anticipated crisis. When, however, this has passed and the duty is faithfully discharged, a sort of reaction sets in, and strength ebbs away with alarming rapidity, heralding the approach of death.

So at least it appeared to be in Mrs. Stratford's case. She had set her whole heart on seeing Marcus again, and in handing over to him in perfect order the matters relating to the management of the fine property he had inherited from his father several years ago, but which she had continued to administrate for him (as she had done for her husband during a long illness) so that he could continue to occupy his post in the diplomatic service which he was most anxious not to resign just then.

When, however, rapidly failing health had warned her that her end must be approaching, she had summoned him home a few months earlier than the time previously arranged for his resignation of his post in the Russian Embassy; and, buoyed by the anticipation of his speedy return, she had seemed to gather strength with the advance of spring, and even after she had him home she was able to transact business with unusual ease, and to go about with an energy she had not known for many years.

But when all was accomplished, came a sudden collapse. Mrs. Stratford took to her bed, and those about her well knew that she would not rise from it again.

Yet there was still something on her mind—some words had to be spoken to Marcus before she could close her eyes in peace—yet it was not till death had almost set his seal upon her brow that the secret so long and jealously guarded passed her lips.

Marcus, at her request, had taken the night watch. He was sitting beside her in the still quiet hour that heralds the approach of a new day. The faint sleepy twitterings of the earliest birds had just begun, when the dying woman opened her eyes and roused herself from the state of lethargy that had been almost sleep.

"Marcus," she said, "are we alone?"

"Quite alone," he answered, bending over her and holding a glass to her lips. She drank and spoke more firmly.

"Marcus, I have something to say to you—a charge to give you. Will you accept it?"

"Willingly, and execute it to the best of my ability."

"I believe you, Marcus, I trust you implicitly. The charge I have to give you concerns Roy. I have appointed you his guardian."

Marcus bent his head in token of acceptance of the office; but Mrs. Stratford, with slowly brigtening eyes, proceeded to speak in low clear tones, and to speak words that filled her listener with astonishment.

"I have appointed you guardian to the boy in my will, and yet in one sense I have no right to do so, for Roy is not my son, and he has a guardian living, who could claim his rights at any time if he chose to do so."

For a moment Marcus thought his step-mother was wandering in mind, but the steady gaze of the hollow eyes had nothing feverish or unnatural in it. She even smiled a wan, sad smile as if aware how strangely her words must strike him.

"I know what I am saying, Marcus, I am not delirious. Roy is my nephew, and my adopted son, and for reasons I will explain to you now, I have kept his true parentage a secret from all the world and from himself. Only your father knew the whole story, and it was his wish, as well as mine, that it should be kept as a secret from all."

She paused for a moment to take nourishment and gather strength for the telling of the tale. Marcus sat beside her holding the wasted hand in his.

"I must begin by telling you something of my first husband and his family. Charles Edington's father was the eldest of three brothers, one of whom, Robert, was two years his junior and the youngest, Andrew, ten. Each of these brothers married. My husband was an only child, and so was Hubert, Roy's father, the son of Robert Edington. Andrew, the youngest brother, married later. He is living still, not so very far away from here, not more than forty miles, at least, with his son and daughter, Roger and Joan. John and Robert Edington and their wives died whilst their sons were still young. Andrew, the youngest brother, took an interest in the youths, and there was considerable intimacy throughout the family. When I married Charles, we saw a great deal both of Hubert and his wife, our cousins, and of our Uncle Andrew. A common bond of interest drew all the Edingtons closely together. It is difficult and painful for me, even after all these years, to speak of the sad failing that seemed to attach to each member of that race, and yet without doing so I cannot really make you understand or appreciate the motives for my conduct, or the possible danger, even now, that Roy has to apprehend from his kinsmen. To a greater or less extent each one of them was tainted by it, and though my husband was far less the slave of it than any of the others, he was not quite free. It was the vice of avarice that seemed to permeate the family like a hereditary disease—the love of money for its own sake—the instinct of hoarding and amassing wealth, as if that, and that alone, were the aim and object of life. Let me pass lightly over this and proceed to facts.

"Hubert was the financier of the family. He had a clear head, a shrewd judgment, and he became one of the most successful speculators upon the Stock Exchange, His name for a time had quite a reputation of its own, and his fortune was reported something colossal. My husband intrusted some of his money to his cousin's care, and by degrees our Uncle Andrew gave all his fortune into the hands of his successful nephew, to be returned to him augmented to twenty-fold its original value by the time he had worked his will upon it.

"Meantime, Hubert's wife died, leaving little Roy a mere infant; and I, who had no children of my own, took a very deep interest in the poor little mite, left to the care of a father who was too deeply engrossed in money-making to pay any heed to the well-being of his child. When my own husband died shortly before the crash came, I began seriously to consider whether my cousin would allow me to take the care and responsibility of the boy.

"I have used the word crash, and nothing can better express the utter collapse of the huge fabric of wealth and greatness that brought the once successful speculator to insolvency and ruin. I do not understand even now how and why it happened. I only know that some convulsion on the continent produced a panic on the money-market, and that in twenty-four hours Hubert Edington was a ruined man, and his Uncle Andrew was involved in his ruin. I am afraid too, that Hubert, at least, cannot be acquitted of blame in the matter. There were dark rumours afloat about him at the time, and I fear that had not death intervened, he would have stood openly disgraced in the eyes of the world,"

"Death!" repeated Marcus; "did he——"

"The verdict was accidental death—an overdose of a sleeping mixture taken by inadvertence. Let us hope it was so. There is no evidence to show that it was otherwise, though dark hints were dropped, of course, as is inevitable at such a time. Let us pass on now to the case of poor little unconscious Roy.

"By his father's will made a year or two back, my husband and Andrew Edington were appointed guardians to the boy, so that the great-uncle had now sole right to the charge of him. But as the child's fortune had been swept away in the universal ruin, no objection was made to my keeping him and bringing him up as a son. Andrew Edington has never claimed control over his ward, and sometimes I hope he never will; but of this I cannot feel confident. Let me tell you something more of these kinsfolk of Roy's, of whose very existence he is at present ignorant. His great-uncle and guardian has always been somewhat of an enigma to me—a man difficult to know, reserved, peculiar, misanthropic, yet not entirely unloveable. Ambitious of wealth, he was much embittered by the loss that fell so heavily upon him; yet I have often felt that there were capabilities for good in his nature had there been any power to draw them out. Were he alone concerned, I should have little anxiety for Roy's future; but I have a far greater fear of the son Roger and Roger's wife."

Pausing a moment to gather strength she went on with increasing earnestness.

"Andrew Edington has two children, a son and a daughter; the girl was a strange wayward child as I remember her, unloving, passionate, incomprehensible, yet I was fond of her and interested in her, and sometimes I used to fancy that in her cold, strange way she was fond of me too; but I have not seen her since she was ten years old; I dare say she has forgotten me by this time. The son, many years older than his sister, had married shortly before the crash came; married a godless, scheming, worldly woman (God forgive me if I speak unjustly, but I fear it is only too true), who had allied herself to him from motives of ambition and self-seeking, and was as much embittered by loss of fortune as he could be himself. When their golden dreams were dissipated, the whole family migrated to a lonely house, the property of Mrs. Andrew Edington, I believe, situated in the next county.

It was a temporary arrangement in the first instance; but it has been the home of the whole family ever since. Mrs. Andrew Edington died soon after they arrived there, and Roger's wife became mistress of the house. Joan, unless she has married, is there still; but I have gradually ceased to hold any communication with the family. I have hoped that they would learn at last to forget alike my existence and that of Roy."

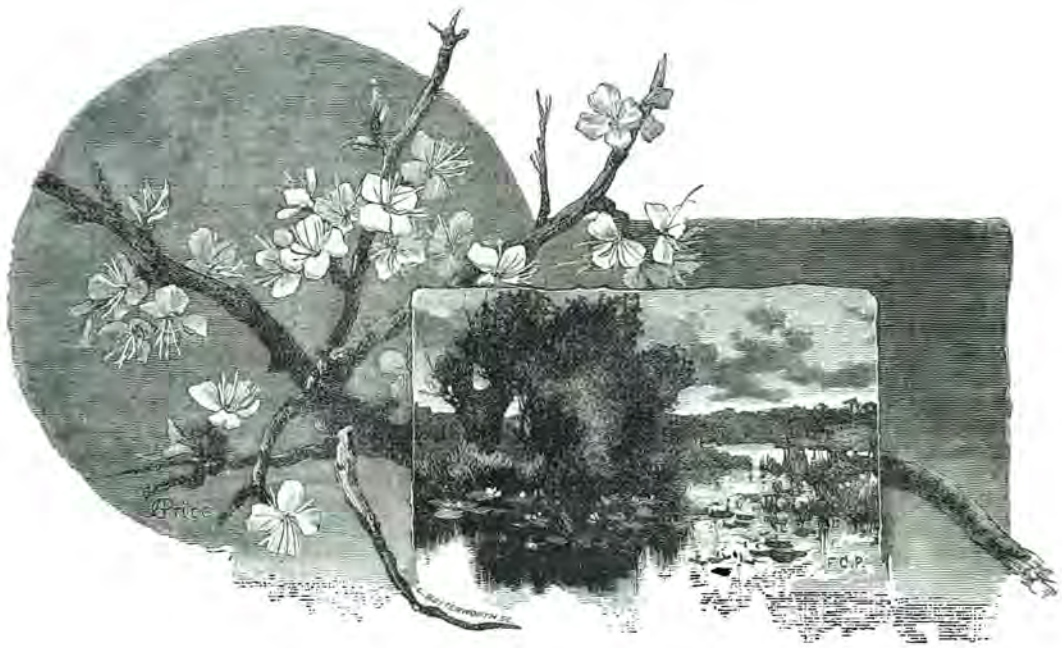
"You have practically tried to sever the connection?"

"I have; I will tell you why. I do not say it in any spirit of uncharitableness, but there is something terribly godless in that household, Marcus. You know how truly it has been said, 'Ye cannot serve God and mammon.' I cannot bear to think that Roy should ever be led into temptation. He is susceptible, impressionable, quick to see and quick to feel, and I shrink more than I can say from exposing him to influences that seem to me to have worked the moral downfall of so many that have borne his name. He has always been as a son to me, and I am the only mother he has ever known. I have wished, and I still wish, that he may never know he is not my child. I hope the shadow hanging over his father's name may never cloud the sunshine of his life. Did I permit him to mix with his relations, could my secret be kept? But they have given him up, as it seems, and I think only one motive would lead them to set up any claim to the care of him after my death—that motive would be—self interest."

Marcus began to have a dim perception of her meaning, but he was fearful lest she should do herself injury by too much talking.

"Rest a little now," he said. "Tell me the remainder later."

"It must be soon," answered the dying woman gently, "for I have one charge to give you yet."



THE PARABLES OF OUR LORD.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

I.

BEFORE beginning to learn anything about the parables of our Lord, it would be well to find out as clearly as we can what a parable is, and how it differs from a fable or an allegory. What then is a parable?

It is, in the first place, a short story, with only a few incidents in it, or it may be no story at all, only the narration of one circumstance, such as a woman taking leaven, and putting it into some meal, or a man sowing a grain of mustard seed. But it is always a story in which things that are not seen are compared with things that are seen. Our inner and spiritual life is made plainer to us by using the facts of our outer and earthly life to explain it. The parable is not literally true, but it is the reflection of the truth. Just as when we are looking down into a pool of clear and limpid water we see the trees and the hedges growing round it, and the clouds that are floating across the sky overhead, these forms we see are not the real trees and hedges, and clouds; but we know they must be above us, and around us, or they could not be reflected in the pool. So the realities of the spiritual life are reflected in the parable, which speaks only of this temporal life; and it would not be possible for any of us to learn much heavenly truth, except through seeing its likeness to some earthly fact with which we are familiar. Thus when we speak of God as our Father, we should not know what that meant, if we did not compare Him with our idea of a good earthly father, who toils and cares for his children, and loves them dearly; looking at such a father, we say God is like him, only infinitely wiser, stronger, and more loving. Heaven is our home; but that would say nothing to us if we could not think of some peaceful and pleasant home, where those live who love us—a place that no other place is like; and we think of heaven as being infinitely safer and happier, where those who love us will live with us for ever. It is in this way we take earthly things to make us understand in some measure heavenly realities. A parable is, then, a short story containing a few often common-place incidents, in which are reflected important and eternal truths. Most of our Lord's parables begin with the words, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto," and then follows the story.

But how is a parable different from a fable? Any one who has read Æsop's Fables, or any other collection of real fables, will see the difference at once. In a fable you will find that the actors and speakers are usually the lower animals, or even things without life, such as trees and rocks, or manufactured articles: the country mouse visits the city mouse; the earthen pot speaks to the brass pot; the reed and the oak talk together. Even when the fable is about human beings, we shall find that there is no attempt to teach any spiritual truth in it. It generally conveys some moral, or perhaps crafty lesson, which will help us to get on in this world, and which would be quite as useful if there was no other world than this. A fable is full of worldly wisdom; a parable is full of heavenly wisdom.[1]

There are no fables in the New Testament; but there are two in the Old Testament. In Judges ix. 7–15, we find the fable of the trees desiring to have a king to reign over them; the olive-tree, the fig-tree, and the vine refuse to become king, but the bramble accepts the office, and calls upon all the trees to come and put their trust in its shadow. The author of this fable is Jotham, who ridicules the men of Shechem for their folly in choosing Abimelech for their king; he does not intend to teach them any spiritual lesson. There is another fable in 2 Kings xiv. 9. "The thistle that was in Lebanon sent to the cedar that was in Lebanon, saying, 'Give thy daughter to my son to wife'; and there passed by a wild beast that was in Lebanon, and trod down the thistle." Here again, Jehoash, who speaks the fable, speaks it only as an insult to his enemy, Amaziah. In a fable we may have insult, ridicule, derision, cunning, worldly wisdom of every kind, as its moral; but never in a parable. A parable is the likeness between things eternal and things temporal, and it is always intended to teach and train our spirits.

An allegory differs from a parable chiefly because it is a much longer story, and deals with many more incidents and characters. The finest and most complete allegory in the world is the Pilgrim's Progress, which leads us through a long series of events; many of which might be taken as separate parables, such as the passage of Christian through the Valley of the Shadow of Death. Yet, more than this, an allegory is not a simple comparing of things spiritual with things temporal. Our Lord uses short allegorical sayings when He says, "I am the true vine," and "I am the good shepherd; the good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." We feel that it would make a great difference if He said only, "I am like the true vine," or "I am like a good shepherd." There is something more than a mere likeness; something deeper than a similarity. These words of His, and those that follow them, do not form a parable; they begin an allegory, and might be, and have often been carried out to a great length, and into minute circumstances, forming beautiful and instructive allegories. Especially have the many incidents which might befall a shepherd with his flock, been used as setting forth the relationship between Jesus Christ and His disciples. These allegorical sayings, which show the actual relationship, not the mere likeness, between our Lord and those who believe in Him, are to be found frequently in the epistles of the New Testament, which contain no parables.

But why did the Lord teach so much by parables? Why did He not speak like the old prophets, or like the wise men among the heathen? First of all, we must remember that we have only a very few of the lessons He must have taught to His disciples. During the three years He was with them He must have taught them innumerable lessons, of which we have no record: for there was no one to write them down at the time. So we have only got such words as remained most clearly, and most deeply in the memories of His disciples. And what kind of teaching is most easily remembered by ordinary people? That which is conveyed by means of a story. The story takes hold of the imagination, and the imagination ponders over it, until it is imprinted on the memory. It may be a long time before the understanding finds out its true meaning; and the memory keeps it like a treasure till the moment comes for understanding it. The people our Lord taught were the common people, who heard him gladly; but they would not have heard him gladly if he had spoken to them as though they had been learned scribes and priests. He spoke to them in a way which would interest them, and which would be easily repeated, and remembered among them. When he wished to teach them to forgive one another, He not only bade them pray, "Forgive us our sins, as we forgive them that sin against us"; but He told them the story of a king who forgave his servant a great debt freely; but how this servant threw a fellow-servant into prison, till he should pay a small debt to himself. When Jesus tried to press home to their hearts the great commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," He spoke the parable of the Good Samaritan. We can imagine how the common people, going home to their farms and their vineyards, and their houses, where their families and servants lived, those who could not hear Jesus for themselves, would repeat these parables to them, as they could not have repeated some long sermon. "Tell us one of the parables of Jesus," would often be said to those who had listened to Him.

Perhaps one thing our Lord wished to teach us is that all our life, with its common, daily events, is but a parable; a likeness of the other world; and in how many ways those unseen things can be compared with the things we see. There are three lines of Milton's which express this:

> "What if earth
> Be but the shadow of heaven, and things therein
> Each to other like, more than on earth is thought?"

We close our eyelids at night, and sight goes from us, and hearing, and the consciousness of all that is happening in the great earth on which we live; and we call it sleep, because we awake again to familiar sights and sounds; but is it not the symbol of death, which will make us blind and deaf, and unconscious of all that interests us here? And when we awake in the morning, refreshed and glad, and strong for work again, all our weariness gone; it is but the symbol of our rising again from the sleep of death, refreshed, and glad, and strong for other work in other worlds? When food strengthens us, and gives us vigour for our appointed toil, does not that set forth the strengthening of the soul that feeds on the thought of Christ's life and death, and so makes Him to be to us the Bread of Life? We are scholars in a school; so are we scholars in Christ's school. We are brothers one to another; and we are all brothers to Christ. The kingdom of God is full of likenesses to our life here on earth.

[1] The most complete and the longest fable in literature is the German story of "Reynard the Fox."

The one truth in all the parables of our Lord is that the kingdom of heaven is shadowed forth by everything in this world that is good, and pure, and true. Not a single day can pass over us without bringing to us the likeness of heavenly things; if we were only wise enough to see them.

"JENNY WREN'S MITE."

CHAPTER II.—THE TREASURE BROUGHT HOME.

POOR Tom Silver was very ignorant, and so was Jenny. How should she be otherwise, with none to teach her! Her father knew scarcely anything, but how to empty dust-holes and make his little child fairly comfortable. And that latter part of his knowledge he had only gained by a very longing, hard effort, because he loved her so much. Of book learning and religious knowledge, he had scarcely more than an Indian in the farthest wilds of North America. He could not even read.

Even if he had known much more than he did, his slow, dull intellect would never have compassed the difficult business of giving his knowledge to any one else, which is a harder task than even clever people sometimes understand.

Then, as for Jenny's mother, she had begun her labour for daily bread in the brickfields, when she was only eight years old, and although the earnest, hard-working clergyman of the district and his wife had taken anxious pains that the brickfield labourer and her companions should learn the truths of the Christian religion, to which so many of them only nominally belonged, Jane Phelps's brains had not grown wise enough to make her much of a teacher for others. Besides, she died of the tiredness of nursing her little Jenny through a long illness, when Jenny was only three years old. And folks have not generally learnt much by the time they are about two and a half!

No doubt the new School Board people would find Jenny out soon, and insist upon her going to school, where she would learn fast enough, if she were treated gently, and did not get frightened with the numbers around, and the general school whirr and stir.

But meantime, she was such a wee, hidden-out-of-sight-small atom, that she had escaped notice, and her father was very thankful to have it thus. He so dreaded to have his timid, delicate little Jenny Wren going backwards and forwards through the streets alone.

And then, only to think of her coming back to the dark, cold, lonely room in the dark, dreary winter-time, made him gasp. It was bad enough to know that she was remaining in it, getting accustomed, day by day, to the darkness as hour by hour it drew on gradually; when she was smuggled up cosily in her little cot, perhaps falling into a peaceful doze, out of which his own home-coming would sometimes waken her. But to think of her coming wide-eyed, and trembling-limbed, pounce into the grim desolateness; but no, he could not think of it, and so he hid up his Jenny Wren in her cage as much as possible, with no notion that his little treasure needed any pity for her ignorance, although he felt such pleasure in the one little bit of knowledge she had gained, as evening by evening the little hands were folded, and she murmured reverently: "Bless the Lord for His loving mercies, and give us grateful hearts."

Will you laugh, or will you feel inclined to give a little sob for sympathy, when you hear that the words were repeated a second time, the night that the dusthole remnant of a doll was brought home.

"What will little Wren give father, if he has brought her something home to-night?" asked Silver, when, the lamp lighted, the fire burning up, and the tea-things placed on the table, there was a minute's waiting-time for the kettle to boil.

"What will father's little own give him, eh?"

Jenny sprang up on to his knees, put her arms round his neck, and kissed him.

"I'll give you that, father, for bringing yourself home," she said with a soft laugh. "You're the bestest best thing that you can bring me home."

"Father's own little Wren," muttered Tom Silver huskily, as he returned the kiss with interest. "But father is away all day, my pet, so he has brought another little wren to keep his little Wren company."

Jenny laughed again merrily, and her eyes shone.

"Wherever can she be hided up then? I'm not very big, but she must be a deal littler."

Her father laughed too, as he said, "Well, maybe, she be. Ye wouldn't want your baby as big as yourself. She'd be a bit heavy for you to carry. But see, now, what have ye got to say to make her feel at home like?"

And so saying, Tom put his hand inside his old coat, and drew forth the half of a doll, embellished with the rag head, and a medley dress of old ribbons and scraps of coloured calico that his watchful eyes had discovered since the first find, earlier in the day, taught him to think these odds and ends valuable.

Such a shabby, dingy thing, after all. Only fit to go back into the dusthole, but it was a good size, and womanly mite of a Jenny knew that the dirty scraps it was dressed in would wash. Besides, she never remembered to have had a toy of any kind before.

"Oh! father, father!" she gasped, and her eyes sparkled and her breath came with a sob of delight as she clasped father and doll in one warm embrace.

A short silence followed, as was not unusual between Tom Silver and his small daughter. They neither of them had a great many words at their disposal. But of course, wee Jenny's tongue was the readier of the two.

"Father," she whispered at last, "don't you think, father, this is one of the times when mother would have said, 'Bless the Lord for His loving mercies, and give us grateful hearts?'"

Tom Silver laid his face down a moment upon the silky fair hair.

"Eh, dearie, what is it ye ask? Well, yes, to be sure, I doubt ye're in the right. Your mother most times said it when you looked bright and happy. And she blessed the Lord for little things as well as big uns. You see, she was always for remembering as He's our Father."

Jenny's eyes opened wide with a strange wondering gaze of inquiry.

"Who is our Father, daddy dear?"

"Why, the Lord, for sure, my wee Wren. Don't you know 'Our Father.'?"

But, no; Jenny did not know. She had no idea even that her father was quoting the opening address of the Lord's Prayer. How should she? she had never been taught. But she repeated the two words now in a soft, low, glad tone.

"'Our Father.' O, father, I know now why He is a loving Lord. If He is our Father, of course He must be. You never told me before that you and me had another father besides you."

Silence again, broken by the soft murmur: "Bless the Lord, our Father. Has mother gone to our Father, daddy?"

"Aye, dearie, certain, sure. She loved Him as you love me."

"Then," said the child, drawing a deep breath, "Then, she did love Him, love Him, lots! And so do I now. I set the teacups for you, father, can't I do something for this other Father, who gives us all our little and big things?"

Tom stared at his little girl.

"Why, you are a queer wee Wren? Seems as ye've got the grateful heart ye ask for. Mother used to set some store by going to church, perhaps by way of doing something to please the Lord. If ye like, I'll take ye next Sunday afternoon to the church round the corner."

The promise once given, Jenny had it, as well as her new old doll, to keep her company during the next four days, for it was a certain fulfilment as far as her father was concerned. He never broke his word to her if he had the power to keep it.

But somewhat unfortunately, as far as Tom Silver was concerned, that Sunday afternoon was a special afternoon for christenings, and the babies cried a great deal, and the thin congregation turned and twisted about a good deal more than usual, and looked at each and everybody; and poor Tom felt convinced that he and his dingy old garments came in for much the larger share of everybody's notice, and grew nervous and wretched in consequence.

"We'll go again, daddy, won't we?" said Jenny, as she tripped along by her father's side home again. For her part she felt that the Lord more than ever showed His lovingness if He let the things that should be done to please Him be as pleasant as those of that afternoon. She had been in a wonder of awe and rapt delight the whole time. Many pairs of eyes certainly had bestowed a good deal of attention upon the sweet, earnest child face, but she was far too interested in the novel sights and words to be aware of the fact.

"Our Father which art in heaven." Those words caught her quick ears instantly. "Oh, father, did you hear?" she whispered, almost audibly in her excitement. "Did you hear that? Our Father's in heaven, so of course mother really is with Him, for Mrs. Snell told me that she had gone to heaven."

"Aye, dearie," muttered her father.

"Aye, my bonny," said a kindly-hearted woman on the other side of Jenny, who had caught the whisper. "Our Father is the Lord of heaven and earth and all of us. Give your heart to Him, little one, and pray to Him to keep His little lamb safe here till He carries her, too, to her dear mother in the happy beautiful world above."

"Pray to Him," meditated small Jenny. She did not know what the word meant, but she would ask father.

First though, naturally, came the important question—"We'll go again, won't we, daddy?"

Daddy shook his head. Not even for his Jenny Wren could he promise, as yet, to undergo another hour of such misery as he had just endured. And so he temporised.

"Father 'ull see if maybe he can't get a bit of extra work by-and-by, to pay for a new coat, and then, maybe, he and his Jenny Wren will go reg'lar, if so be she likes."

Jenny felt very sure that she should like. And meantime she had many a long conversation with her inseparable companion, the dusthole doll, upon the interesting topic.

"Mother," the strange little girl had named her doll, and she and "mother" kept house together, and dusted the room together, and held almost interminable one-sided chats together, and the days no longer seemed so lonely or so dull.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

DOUBLE ACROSTIC.

NO. II.

A wicked city buried in a sea
Where nothing living can supported be.

On what fair country did the sentence fall
It shall be desolated, "even all"?

A nation to whose idols turned aside
A king, obeying God in all beside.

Mysterious country, from thy shores came out
A sacred nation, though in fear and doubt.

To her own kin she many sorrows brought
When the first lesson in deceit she taught.

In making tents his working time was spent,
But with St. Paul his soul on good was bent.

A helpless victim of a treacherous plot,—
Yet still our sympathy with him is not,
But rather with the doer of the deed
That with weak weapons made the hero bleed.

To her more saintly sister oft compared
She suffers by the contrast; yet had fared
But ill in Bethany its holy Guest
If she had let her busy fingers rest.

To find these names first the initials place,
And then the finals, and the two you brace.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. III.

The words in italics show what were the original meanings of the names to be sought for. When found the initials of these names will give the name of a man who was the founder of a great race.

1. A man of the half tribe of Manasseh, whom God helps.
2. A minion whose name meant son. He was selected by the chief of the Levites by command of David.
3. A son of Cush. His name meant trembling.
4. A son of Jotham whose name meant possessor.
5. Another man whose name meant trembling. Search Joshua xv.
6. A place where Ezra gathered the people together. Its name signifies water.
7. A family who helped to make Abimelech a king and whose name meant a rampart.

H. W.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER V.—THE LAST CHARGE.

ROY SANK DOWN IN A PASSIONATE BURST OF GRIEF.

"MARCUS," said the dying woman when another hour had passed, and the dim light of day was stealing into the room, "let me finish now what I was saying to you about my adopted son, my own dear child, Roy."

"I am listening. I have been considering all you have told me. I will stand by the boy staunchly during his minority. I do not think his guardian will be likely to claim him; if he does so, I will do my utmost to arrange a compromise. I think, in all probability, it could be managed."

A look of relief crossed the wan face.

"Thank you for that assurance, Marcus; I thought you would be my true friend and Roy's, and I have such confidence in your strength. May I ask one favour more for the boy who is in reality no child of mine, no brother of yours, in any sense of the word?"

Marcus smiled, and took one of the wasted hands in his.

"I love Roy for your sake and his own. I will do anything for him in my power."

"Will you keep him here with you till his majority, Marcus? Will you let the Hermitage be still his home?"

"Most certainly. Need you even ask? I suppose you have no objection to his pet wish of going to Oxford? He is set upon a University education."

"I want to speak to you about that," said Mrs. Stratford, a look of pain crossing her face. "I do not like to thwart his hopes, yet I cannot consent to his leaving home for that purpose. I have studied his character and disposition, and I am certain he will do better with a tutor at home. Oxford is full of snares for an inexperienced lad, and Roy's training has not fitted him to withstand them. Besides, there are other reasons; the name of Edington is somewhat widely known; and known by its unenviable distinction. The world is proverbially small. He would be certain to meet those who would ask questions. The story of his true parentage would be revived. Some of the odium that rested upon his father's memory would descend upon him, and it would be cast in his teeth, tacitly, if not in actual words, that, whilst many victims of his father's—fraud, it would be called, though I do not believe that is the right word—were still enduring penury and privation, he, the son, was gratifying every taste and indulgence as a well-to-do University student. At Roy's age, which as you know is peculiarly susceptible, shafts like these strike home, and cloud life as they do not do later, when a wider field of vision is opened. Whilst, if his life has been spent here, beneath the roof of step-father and step-brother, he cannot feel that he has been the recipient of undue indulgence. He has not been exactly a free agent in the matter: and there is still another reason."

"And that is?"

"That I think the Edingtons will be far more likely to let him alone if he remains here than they would do if they heard of him as leading a more independent life, a life that should of necessity give him command of an income or allowance of his own. My death would give them an excellent excuse for assuming the guardianship, if they thought it would be, in any way, advantageous to them; and I have explained to you before how anxious I am to keep Roy away from the influence of that godless household. I fear he could learn there nothing but evil, and there must be much of pain for him in the revival of the connection. It is possible, too, that they might work upon his feelings in a way that would be injurious to his future advancement in life. I cannot bear to think of his being with them. I long to feel that he will be under your care."

Marcus stood in thoughtful silence, pondering these words, wondering how much was the result of deliberate reflection, and how much the effect of a weakened, anxious mind. She seemed to divine his thoughts, and answered with a smile pathetic in its trustful sadness: "Ah, Marcus, I hardly know myself. I may be foolish and weak; but if you would only promise!"

"I will gladly promise to keep Roy at home, if such is really your deliberate wish, so long as he is a minor. It will be a disappointment to him, but he must yield his own wishes to yours, and to my authority. If, however, Mr. Andrew Edington should claim him as a ward, my power, as you know, will come to an end."

An anxious light was in the hollow eyes, but her voice was calm and steady.

"I do not believe Andrew Edington will claim him. If any mischief is to be apprehended, it is from Roger and his wife—their influence upon the old man. But I have done what I can to ensure his safety. It will not be much good to them to claim the wardship of a penniless lad; and such Roy will be."

"But surely you have made the boy your heir?"

"Not in the eyes of the law, Marcus. Legally, he is a beggar. I have left everything I possess in the world unreservedly to you."

"To me?"

"Yes, to you, because by so doing I have secured it from the possible designs of the Edingtons, and I know that you will never let Roy feel the want of any advantage that its possession would entitle him to. I trust him in fact to your honour and generosity, and I do it without a single misgiving."

"Your trust shall be sacred," answered Marcus, "and every penny of your fortune shall be used for his benefit; but I wish you had left it to him, and appointed me trustee. Your point would equally have been gained, and Roy might have been spared the inevitable wonder and perplexity which must assail him if ever he becomes acquainted with the precise terms of your will."

"Ah, well, I did not think of that, and it is too late to change now. Indeed, I think I feel safer to leave it as it is. I have a strange fear of those Edingtons. And Marcus, though I have never seen any sign of it, I tremble sometimes lest some seeds of that fatal love of money that has been the curse of his race, should be lying dormant in the heart of my boy. Perhaps it will be safer for him to be dependent and poor than to own an independent fortune of his own, and I know you will be wise and just and kind towards him. Ah, how I have watched to see if that fatal avarice ever seemed to cloud his generous impulses and check his boyish liberality. Thank God, I have never seen one glimpse of the hated sin. He lives in the midst of affluence without seeming to give a moment's thought to it. He gives and spends freely, yet not recklessly, and has never asked even a natural question as to his future prospects. Perhaps he takes it for granted that he will always be rich, but I cannot think if the vice were in him, that he would be so carelessly gay and insouciant as he has ever been, without one thought for his future."

"I am sure Roy has shown no sign of avarice or covetousness so far," answered Marcus with a grave smile. "If anything, I think he errs on the side of too great carelessness and easiness: but he is a very dear fellow and always will be a brother to me."

"God bless and reward you for that word, Marcus, and for the charge you have undertaken and the promise you have made! I know you will do all for him that a wise, kind elder brother can do; but, oh, Marcus, who can implant in his heart that love and faith and reverence that alone can be his safeguard in the battle of life? He is a dear, good boy, dutiful, affectionate—almost all that I could wish him to be. He has hardly caused me one tear of real sorrow and anxiety all his life, and he has listened to my teaching all these years with willing credence and readiness; and yet I fear it has been heard too easily, too lightly, accepted too unthinkingly and readily. That one thing needful—the jewel of great price—I cannot think that my dear boy with all his gentleness and winning goodness has really found this."

Marcus looked away out of the eastern window uncurtained to the dawn, and his fine face wore a look of deep thought and purpose.

"He is young yet—" he began, but the mother interrupted quickly.

"Surely not too young to be a Christian."

"In one sense of the word, no—none are too young to bear that name, and even to be worthy of it—and yet speaking from my own experience, and from what I have seen of life, a harder battle than Roy has ever been called upon to fight is needed to teach a man the strength of his cause, the invincible power of the creed in which he puts his trust. A soldier who has seen active service is of more value in the ranks than one who has always stayed at home at ease. Nothing like fierce contest for teaching a man the strength of his weapons, and giving him devotion to his cause. Until Roy has been tried, who can tell what stuff may be in him? He believes now what he is told—all too readily, you fear. When the time comes, perhaps he will prove that what he has accepted he can also live up to. I often think that in Roy's nature there are possibilities of great good. When he comes to face the battle of life he may prove less easy-going than we have fancied. I think there is a vein of quiet determination in his nature that once directed into the right channel might stand him in good stead."

Mrs. Stratford lay still, with shining eyes, listening eagerly, gratefully to these words.

"You give me hope and courage, Marcus; and I see that you love him, or you would not speak of him so tenderly. You will cherish and protect him, will you not? You will not let him know the shadow that clouds his father's name? You do not think he need ever know that he is not my own child?"

"No, I do not, at least, not for years to come, and I will keep the secret faithfully, unless circumstances should arise which should make it necessary to divulge it; but without very sufficient cause, I shall be slow to tell him the history you have told to me."

"Thank you once again, Marcus. God bless you for your unfailing goodness to me and mine. In His good time I trust you will reap your reward. Now I can die happy and in peace."

And in effect before that rising sun had set in the western sky, Mrs. Stratford had closed her eyes for ever upon this world, and had gently breathed her last, with Marcus and Roy beside her.

CHAPTER VI.—BROTHERS.

Roy's grief for his mother's death was passionate in its intensity. Nothing that had been said to him had really prepared him for the shock, for he had been confident she was really better and stronger than she had been for months; and even when she took to her bed and was seriously ill he felt sure it would prove only an attack similar to those many others from which she had always rallied. His buoyant temperament rose above any kind of prolonged anxiety, and when the blow really fell he was proportionately stunned.

Marcus was himself plunged in very sincere sorrow, for he had been tenderly attached to his stepmother, who had ever been full of loving consideration for him; the house seemed strangely desolate without her, and he missed her counsel and companionship every hour of the day.

But he put aside his own sorrow to comfort his young brother (for as such he still regarded Roy, despite all he had heard), and they drew very close together in this time of common grief, nearer perhaps than they had ever done before.

But the passionate, violent character of Roy's grief wore itself out more quickly than the more quiet, self-restrained sorrow of Marcus. By the time the funeral was over and the house had resumed its ordinary aspect, the boy had begun to feel the natural reaction that is the merciful prerogative of youth. He was in no wise unfeeling or forgetful, and still prone to bursts of vehement distress; but the leaden weight akin to despair was being slowly lifted from his heart, and he began to think once again of the future, and to re-erect in fancy the airy castles of imaginative youth.

He had never asked a single question as to the disposition of his mother's property. There had been no reading of the will, and people were hardly aware whether or no she had anything to bequeath to her only son. Of course what she had would in time be Roy's, and the thing was so straightforward and simple that no questions were ever asked. It was vaguely understood that Marcus was sole executor and guardian and trustee for his young brother, and everything seemed perfectly right and natural.

Marcus dreaded sometimes lest Roy should ask to look at the will, or question him as to its contents, but he never did. His characteristic light-hearted carelessness prompted him to take life as it came, without question or comment, and his insouciance at this particular juncture was a distinct relief to his brother; for what could he have said to him did it come to his knowledge that his name (save in the matter of guardianship) never so much as appeared in his mother's will?

Days flow quickly by, and Sunday came round again in due course, the second Sunday since Mrs.

Stratford's death, the first upon which the brothers had resumed their usual habits and appeared at church. Up till this time they had kept entirely to the Hermitage, only seeing a few most intimate friends; but to-day, after the evening service they stopped to exchange greetings with several of the neighbours, and held a more lengthened conversation at the gate with the Kynaston family, who were glad to get the first meeting over in this informal fashion.

But when the last of the congregation had dispersed and the brothers found themselves alone, they turned, by mutual consent back to the churchyard, and in another moment were standing bareheaded beside a quiet grave, that showed traces of having been recently disturbed. At its head stood a marble cross with the name of Marcus Stratford upon it. Many other stones bearing the name of Stratford stood grouped around. It was rather a solemn thing to stand in the declining daylight amid the monuments of those now dead and gone, who once had lived in this familiar place, and had been sheltered by the walls of the very house from which the brothers had lately come.

Strange earnest thoughts passed through Marcus's head as he stood amid the graves of his forefathers, but Roy sank down upon his knees in a passionate burst of grief, and the elder brother had some difficulty in calming and soothing him.

"It is not as if the separation were eternal, Roy," he said presently. "She would not have you mourn as without hope."

"I know, but there doesn't seem any real comfort in all that. It seems all words when trouble really comes."

"Not quite that, I think, Roy, but a first sorrow is always hard to bear. You must try, now that you have not her advice and counsel to guide you, to act always in the spirit of her teaching. That will make the best link between you and help to take the sorrow away."

Roy shook his head as if he hardly entered into this idea.

"Nothing seems any good without her. Home is quite spoiled now."

"I'm afraid it will be a sad home for both of us for awhile, Roy, but we must do our best to cheer up one another. We have health and strength and many things to be thankful for. We must try what we can do to take up life together and make something of it. There is plenty waiting for me to do, I know, and I shall be glad of all the help you can give me. Your mother showed me many ways in which work wanted doing. I dare say she told you of her wish to establish a new school and mission-room over at Crossway Corner where the people are so far away from any church or school. I was thinking that it would be a very suitable thing to erect some building of that kind to her memory. We should like to feel that her name would not be forgotten by the people amongst whom she has lived so long."

For a few minutes Roy entered eagerly into the plan and discussed it with keen interest as they turned their steps homewards: but perhaps the associations of the familiar lane were too strong for him, for he lapsed into silence presently, and seemed hardly to listen to what Marcus was saying.

"I dare say it will be very nice; I know mother thought a good deal about it, and wanted you to take it up when you got home. No doubt it will be very valuable; but somehow I don't feel able to care for things as I did—and then I shall not be much at home these next few years."

Marcus was not surprised to hear words like these. He had been half expecting some such allusion ever since the first burst of grief had passed. All the same, he was sorry to hear Roy speak with so much assurance, for he felt that some inevitable trouble was at hand.

"We must see about that," he answered kindly and quietly. "It is too early to make plans yet."

"Is it? Well, I don't know. I was thinking I ought to be going up for matriculation pretty soon. I'll ask Mr. Kynaston about it next time I go there."

"No, don't do that yet, Roy. We must think more about this plan of yours before deciding on anything."

"Oh, but practically it is all decided; and now that home is so changed, I want to get away more than ever."

"And leave me all alone in that rambling old house?" questioned Marcus, turning towards the lad with his rare, expressive smile. "Surely, Roy, you are not going to desert me like that? Think what a dismal solitary confinement you would condemn me to!"

Roy began to disclaim in his eager, impetuous way.

"You can get friends to stay with you, of course. Lots of fellows would be awfully pleased to have the run of a house like the Hermitage. Then I shall only be away about ten weeks at a time, and you will want to be in town sometimes, and with one thing or another you won't miss me much. One of these fine days you will be getting married, and then you will find my room pleasanter than my company."

Marcus smiled at this sally, but there was no acquiescence in his face, and Roy glancing at him began to feel conscious of a little irritation and pique. He remained master of himself, however, and presently his brother spoke.

"I have been too long out of England to be well off for friends, and even if I could get them to come, their companionship would not be like yours, Roy."

"No, much better. I am too young to be a real companion for you."

"That is a matter of opinion; however, what I wish to say is that I would never let my personal feelings stand in the way of your welfare and happiness; but, in this case, there is a good deal to be thought of."

"What?"

"Your mother's wishes in the first instance. Do you remember how much set against the idea she always was?"

"That was because she did not like to loose me from home," was the quick response. "I always felt pretty certain that she would give in when she had you home again. She did not like being left alone here."

"Possibly not; but your mother was a peculiarly unselfish woman. She would never have denied you anything she believed was for your good, had she no reason beyond personal reluctance to part with you. There must have been more in her objection than that."

"I am sure there was not."

"I think you make a mistake there, Roy. Now, my dear boy, do not let us get vexed with one another so soon after——"

"No, no, Marcus, I will not be vexed. I know you are the best fellow in the world. Of course, I want just as much as you do to do everything she would wish. We won't talk any more about it now. We will see how we feel by-and-by, when time has passed, and we can see more clearly. Only you know she was the kindest and best of mothers—and—and I don't believe she would have done anything to disappoint me very much."

"Not willingly, I am sure, Roy; but we must keep in mind that disappointment is sometimes the best discipline in life."

Roy laughed suddenly in his light-hearted fashion.

"Don't preach too much, old Marcus. It doesn't become you to talk too much like a book. I don't believe you ever had a real disappointment in your life. You always seem to me a fellow who has always done exactly what you liked best."

Marcus made no direct response to this rather ungrammatical remark. He looked straight out ahead with a curious light in his eyes. Roy glanced at him with a certain vague sense of admiration and reverence.

"I'll do just as you like about everything, Marcus," he said impulsively. "I am sure you know best about things, and you'll let me go if you can."

Marcus turned towards him with a look that was brighter than a smile.

"Thank you for that confidence, Roy. I will not abuse it."

"I know you won't," answered Roy heartily, and then rather a droll look stealing into his eyes, he added, "I suppose it's a pretty safe promise to give, seeing I have no option in the matter. You are my guardian, are you not? I have no choice but to obey."

THE STEWARD.

BY THE REV. R. F. HORTON, M.A.

"Moreover it is required in stewards that a man be found faithful."—1 Cor. iv. 2.

A STEWARD is one who is employed by a wealthy man to manage his estate. It is his duty to collect the revenues, to pay those who are employed, and to keep the property in order. It is a position of trust, a position of honour. All his master's property is virtually in his hands, yet it is not his property but the master's. It is his place to deal with it just as if he were going to reap all the benefit for himself, and yet he must have entirely got rid of all desire that the benefit should be his. In a word, he identifies himself with his master; his master's interests are his own, and in maintaining them successfully he finds his pride and satisfaction.

The peculiar dignity of such a position is in the trust and confidence which his employer reposes in him. To turn it to his own advantage would be to forfeit the trust, and so, whatever might be his material gain, to lose his honour, which is the joy of his life. He cannot therefore think of being honoured by others, except so far as his honour stands in his master's honour; and especially to seek for honour and popularity among the tenants or employés of the estate might easily become very dangerous. All he can safely think of is standing high in his master's esteem. His master's approval atones for all the unpopularity he has to incur in the discharge of his duty; his master's disapproval would make the praise of others barren and distasteful to him. He is bound up in his master.

St. Paul, following perhaps the suggestion of the Lord's own language, employs this image to illustrate the relations between God and the human soul. Every Christian is a steward. We must not limit the thought to apostles, or to clergymen. We make too much of the distinction between lay and clerical; it is not a distinction known to the New Testament. The New Testament, it is true, distinguishes between the gifts of the One Spirit, but always maintains that every Christian has some gift or other from that one and the self-same Spirit.

And if there is a difference of function for ministers of the gospel, as compared with their fellow believers, that does not imply that they are stewards and the rest are not; it only implies that, all being stewards, they are entrusted with a special part of the Lord's property, while the rest are entrusted with other parts. Yes, we all, as Christians, are stewards, though to some of us comes a high and honourable trust, to others of us only a lowly and obscure one; though some of us are richly endowed with ten pounds, and others of us are endowed with only one.

And I speak to you all as Christians. Ah! I know that some of you are not. But you might be and you ought to be. When I remember how often you have been reminded of the claim of your Lord; when I remember how often Christ crucified has been presented to your hearts; when I remember how powerfully the Spirit of God has again and again pleaded with you, until at times it has been all your stubborn will could do to resist the appeal and to stave off your surrender to Him,—then I feel that you do not differ from real believers in this point, that they are stewards and you are not, but only in this, that they are faithful, and you are unfaithful stewards; yes, you are hiding the talent the Lord gave you in a napkin, and are meditating the excuse you will urge to Him for all your wasted opportunities.

I speak therefore to all, advisedly. Ministers of Christ, stewards of the mysteries of God, do you know it is required of a steward that he be found faithful? It is not required that he be found gifted, or powerful, or influential, or even successful, but indeed it is required that he be found faithful. Are you faithful? Have you been in the past? No? O dishonest stewards, idle stewards, consider your ways! Let us together try to find out what is meant by this faithfulness, and then urge home upon our own hearts, "Am I faithful?" until, searched and tried and approved of by our Master, we may be strengthened for His use.

How we need such a searching! For the least unfaithfulness even in tiny things renders all our service vain. If we have faithfully invested the thousands, bearing a good interest, and are yet spending the petty cash on our own gratification and lust, a taint comes upon the larger sums, and the offering cannot be accepted. It is required that a steward be found faithful, that is faithful all through, faithful in that which is least as well as in that which is great: faithful at the outset, faithful as the years run, faithful unto death, faithful at the bar of the Master.

The First Point in faithfulness is not to think that the property is ours, or may be rightly turned to our own uses. Look at this in the matter of the chief piece of our Lord's property which we have to administer. You all know what that is; it is the Great Mystery of Him, who was manifested in the flesh, the Mystery of Christ and of Christ Crucified. Every steward of God is called upon in his degree, according to opportunity, to set forth Christ to the world. Some of us try to do it in pulpits, some of us in private conversations, some of us in books and magazines, all of us in our walk and conversation. A main part of our stewardship is to communicate the things of our Saviour to the world. If we are to be faithful we must remember these are not our things; we may not turn them to our own account. We may not seek to commend ourselves in the matter. The very nature of the trust requires that we should lose sight of ourselves, just as a picture dealer wishing to commend a picture, might hold it up to the light in such a way that he is himself hidden behind it. We have to commend our Saviour and His work; we have to exalt His dear name; and what care we have to take that we do not by any fussiness or self-importance, by any restless vanity or longing for distinction in the dispensing of this mystery, hide the Person of Our Lord!

Sometimes in presenting Him to the world we become aware of the way in which we are doing it, and we are mightily pleased; we are struck with our own learning and knowledge of the Scriptures; we are dazzled with our own eloquence and brilliance of argument; we are even excited by a sense of our own zeal and devotion. And then immediately we become unfaithful stewards; we are directing attention to ourselves and not to Him, we are seeking admiration for ourselves and not acceptance for our message.

Oh Christian, realize that your business is to make the light of Christ's truth shine in you. He is the light, you are the mirror, and though the mirror must be kept scrupulously clean in order that it may reflect truly, yet it is not the mirror, but the Light, that people want; the mirror may amuse them, the Light saves them. Yes, make your light shine before men, but remember that it is "that men may glorify," not you, but "your Father which is in Heaven." Let it become a constant maxim with you, The rising of Self is the beginning of Unfaithfulness.

Now what applies to the Great Mystery which we have to dispense, applies equally to all the other things—certainly property of our Lord—with which we are entrusted. It applies to natural gifts, like intellectual power, it applies to worldly possessions, like money or estates, and it applies to the less tangible but still unmistakable gifts, like social advantages. All these things as gifts entrusted to us by our Lord, and used wholly for Him, are rich in blessing to ourselves and to the world; but any one of them, used for our own purposes, treated as our own property, and so stolen from Him, becomes a veritable curse, not only to the possessor, but even to the receiver of the stolen property. Just see how it works. Take, for instance, a brilliant intellect. As the owner of it becomes aware of his innate powers, he is sorely tempted to think, "This is my peculiar possession; I may use it for my own exaltation." As that purpose grows in the mind he quite loses sight of the truth that this rare gift is the possession of Another and only entrusted to him. And so he falls; yes, he falls. And thus highly gifted minds and men of genius are too often found standing outside the Kingdom of Heaven.

It is much the same with rich people. Their property comes to them by their ability, skill, or industry, or perhaps it comes to them as an heirloom. Surely what is mine is mine, is the inward thought; and with that evil thought comes the act of robbery, the steward uses his master's goods for himself. Thus it is hard for the rich to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven. And so with the socially great; they use that rare opportunity for self-aggandisement, forgetting that it is entirely their Lord's gift, and they stand convicted as manifest thieves.

Do you not see, all these things are as much trusts from the Master to His stewards, as, for example, the gift of preaching is? You have no more right to appropriate them for your own use than the preacher has to turn his talent of preaching to the service of his private gain or public estimation. Steward, are you daring to use your Lord's wealth so? Think, what manner of imprisonment can punish such a fraud? It is required in a steward, which you are, that he be found faithful.

The Second Point of faithfulness is to employ all that is put into your hands to the best advantage for the Lord's service. Sometimes a steward is not dishonest enough to use his master's property for his own advantage, but because he may not do that he loses interest in it, and does not use it at all. It is owing to this well-known infirmity of stewards that so much of the Lord's property is at this moment lying idle.

Dear stewards of Christ, will you make an inquiry, will you take an inventory, will you go through the store-house just now, and ask "Is all being used, absolutely all, and to the best advantage too?" Oh, what wealth is lying by unused! I do not mean only silver and gold, though it is sad to think how you are throwing that away in worthless investments when your Lord wants it for His work. I do not speak of that. But think of all the gifts of speech and of knowledge, all the gifts of sympathy and love, just the very things of which the Lord stands in need; and all idle! There are dark souls which might be at once enlightened by one true and faithful word from you. There are hearts hungry for sympathy, perishing for a warm spiritual love, which you could give. To think of all the unused gifts of the Master, and all the need of their use in the great city, in the country side, in the regions beyond, it is like going out into the fields and seeing them fallow and covered with weeds, and then going into the barns and the farm buildings to see the seed rotting because it is not sown, the ploughshare and the harrow rusting because they are not used.

Are you waiting for the Lord's command to employ this property of His? Does not the question answer itself? If it is property of His, then the possession of it is the command to use it.

Do you think the reason of your inactivity is that your love is grown cold, and the fire of your zeal has burned low? May the Lord Himself awake the love within you, bring you to contrition of heart and devotion of spirit! Listen to this language of faithful stewards, speaking to unfaithful ones: "We are fools for Christ's sake, but ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, but ye are strong; ye have glory, but we have dishonour. Even unto this present hour we both hunger, and thirst, and are naked, and are buffetted and have no certain dwelling-place; and we toil working with our own hands: being reviled, we bless . . . we are made as the filth of the world, the off-scouring of all things" (v. 10–13). What zeal! what devotion! In that spirit must every steward spend and be spent to the uttermost. And will not this wake you from your lethargy? It is not matter of choice whether we will toil or no. It is at our peril that we refuse to launch forth at His word because we shrink from the toil of the deep,—at our peril that we refuse to buckle on our armour and enter the field under His command because our heart quails before the foe.

Every inducement is at hand, honour and love, and duty; there is the promise of the reward, there is the penalty of unfaithfulness. May God's Holy Spirit so touch you that all hesitation, doubt, indifference may vanish! Can it be that you are standing idle because you are entrusted with so little? Do you say, if I had great gifts like others I would employ them? Is your vanity hurt because your gift is so very small? Now that might go for something if we were really owners of the property, but such an argument goes for nothing when we are only stewards, and shows indeed that you have been taking a wrong view of the position. To a steward it is of no moment whether his trust is large or small. As the gain can in no case be his, as the goods are not to be used for his benefit, as the honour which comes in their employment all goes to his Lord, surely it does not come within his province to consider the question of much or little. With the Lord it rests to determine how much He shall entrust you with. It rests only with you to employ it all to the full. While it would indeed be shame, if we had large gifts, to employ only the smaller ones for Him, it is even more shame, if we have only small gifts, to refuse to use them at His word. See what you have, and if the inventory prove that the stock is small use it the more diligently. Be glad in humble work. As one of His servants puts it:

> It is not mine to bear His heavy cross,
> Or suffer for His sake all pain and loss.
> It is not mine to walk through valleys dim,
> Or climb far mountain heights alone with Him.
> He hath no need of me in grand affairs,
> Where fields are lost, or crowns won unawares.
> Yet, Master, if I may make one pale flower
> Bloom brighter for Thy sake for one short hour:
> May speak one quiet word when all is still,
> Helping some fainting heart to bear Thy will:
> Or sing one high clear song on which may soar
> One glad soul heavenward, I ask no more.

It is required in a steward that he be found faithful, using to the uttermost all his master's property that is entrusted to him.

Then the Third Point in faithfulness is to be rid as far as may be of men's opinions, whether good or bad, and to bear constantly in mind that you are accountable to your Lord and to Him alone. It is a great danger when we begin to reckon with human praise or censure. A Christian, like a steward, may be popular; then he has to quietly divert the popularity from himself to his Master. But it is far more likely that He will not be popular; then he has to find in his Master's smile enough to counterbalance the frowns of all the world.

There are things in which we desire rightly men's good opinion, and tremble rightly under their censure. To shake off all the wholesome restraints of our social life would be not serving God at all, but directly declining one of the ways by which His will reveals itself to us. But in the matter of our stewardship we cannot allow our conduct to be determined by men's approval or disapproval. We have to set aside public opinion not in order to listen to the dictates of our own desires, or of our own wilfulness, but in order to let our Master's desires and our Master's will have free play with us.

We are all of us constantly led to do things which the Lord does not approve, in order to win men's favour, and to hold back from our Lord's service in order to escape their ridicule or condemnation. "It is required in a steward that he be found faithful," not to the world, but to his master. Look at Paul's attitude. "With me it is a very small thing that I should be judged of you or of men's judgment." He sets aside almost brusquely the whole question of popularity. His object is not to justify himself or win his own approval. Not at all. Though his conscience does not accuse him of unfaithfulness, yet that gives him little satisfaction. All the time he abides in the sense of stewardship and is concerned only with the approval of the Lord. And the only way for us is to live and do our work without fear of men, vividly realising that we are in the presence of the Lord to whom we shall give account. For, as Paul says, "He will come and bring to light the hidden things of darkness." Yes, all the shameful ways in which we have been employing His wealth, all the prostituted talent and unhallowed affections of the heart, all the money squandered on our own selfish enjoyment, all the deliberate neglect of the gifts with which He entrusted us. All this will be clear as the day. "And make manifest the counsels of our hearts." Yes, apart from all judgments and misjudgments of men, apart from our own morbid self-condemnation, He will accurately weigh all our motives. He will know with what humble earnest purpose you sought to use the gift which never attracted the notice of your fellow men. He will know with what sincere love you spoke the little word for Him which seemed utterly to fail. He will know with what silent agony of intercession you pleaded for His Kingdom to come in the secret chambers of your heart, when others marked you as a useless idler in the vineyard of the Lord. From how many humble lives will He bring forth hidden tendrils, watered with many tears and tended with many prayers, unknown to all except the soul and the Saviour; while many a loud and ostentatious ministry will be revealed in naked ugliness as a shameless form of self-seeking, a stewardship unfaithful, and all the more unfaithful because the Great Mystery itself has been employed by the steward merely to swell his importance, to gratify his pride, or to increase his possessions.

Evidently Paul lived constantly in presence of that day, when "each man shall have his praise of God." And if we would be kept faithful too, we must always look to the end. In the prospect of that unveiling, that exposure, of the secrets of the heart, shall we not remember that we are stewards, shall we not seek to be faithful, recognising that all our gifts belong to our Lord, that we are bound to use them all for His service to the full, and that His approval is to be the only approval we desire, His censure the only censure we fear?

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE REFORMATION.

I.

TO recall Paris as it was at the time of the Reformation, we must begin with a clear idea of its geography. It consisted then, as now, of two unequal arcs, north and south of the Seine, with an island in the middle of the river between them. The germ of Paris, this island, was called the City, and was the seat of authority, ecclesiastical and legal. Here the bishop resided, and here the Parliament: a body composed entirely of lawyers—Rabelais' Chats fourrés—performed its various functions. Religion and Law in Paris had, as they still have, their headquarters in the Ile de la Cité.

As the island was emphatically la Cité, the northern arc was emphatically la Ville, indicating that it originated in the villas or manor-houses and farms which existed there from remote times. In the days of which we are speaking its streets were wider and newer-looking than the mediæval lanes of the City; they were, nevertheless, compared with those of any modern town, narrow beyond conception.

All parts of Paris were filled with prisons, but in this northern arc, the region of trade and commerce, stood the terrible-looking Bastille and the Grand Chatelet. Perhaps this was due to the fact that the King resided in this part, and felt the necessity of those frowning reminders of his authority. The royal residence was called the Château of the Louvre; but a new renascence palace, the Tuileries, was building.

The fame of Paris was great in mediæval Christendom; but it was not the City nor the Town, but the University of Paris which really interested the world. On the declivity of Mont Sainte-Geneviève stood various colleges, in which were congregated students of so many nations and tongues that Latin had to be their common language.

As the bishop and the Parliament reigned in the City, the king and the provost of the trades in the Town, so in the University the rector and the Sorbonne were the actual authorities. The mutual jealousies of these divers authorities were not altogether to the disadvantage of the people, since they prevented any consistent despotism.

however they had to suffer in exchange the minor ill of a very unequally repressed turbulence.

The three portions of Paris were united by bridges; the City and the Town by the Pont Notre-Dame and the Pont au Change, the City and the University by the Pont Saint-Michel and the Petit Pont; while City, Town, and University had a common link in the Pont Neuf, the only bridge not loaded with houses and available for horses. This habit of building on the bridges proved disastrous in 1499, when the Pont Notre-Dame fell in, several persons being drowned.

It arose no doubt in mediæval cities from the necessity of economising space, the area available for building being limited by the walls, which at this time confined Paris into a space about one-sixth its present size. The result was that though during the whole of the sixteenth century the population was gradually declining, the streets swarmed with people and were choked by vehicles. The population, a quarter of a million at the beginning of the fourteenth century, had sunk to two hundred thousand by 1590.

After the Rue Saint-Denis, the bridges were the places to find the best shops. If a man wanted medicine he went to the Petit Pont, given up to the apothecaries; if he was in want of cash he went to the Pont au Change, where one of the generous craft would perchance, "for a consideration," assist his necessities.

The houses—four, and even six stories high—had glazed windows, and frequently presented signs of comfort and even luxury. Silver cups, plates, spoons, and basins were in common use, and Turkey carpets occasionally covered the floors. Furnished lodgings were to be found in every variety, from the most costly to those at two or three crowns a month (six to nine shillings). A stranger could in fact live in Paris for 150 crowns a year; provisions were so good and abundant, and the social arrangements already so well organised.

Even the necessitous poor were materially well off in Paris. Thirty-three persons were commissioned to collect alms and to act as relieving officers in the sixteen districts into which Paris was divided. They visited the poor at their houses, acquainted themselves with their wants, and relieved them. The aged and infirm were sent to the Hôpital des Petites Maisons at St. Germain; destitute children to the Hôpital de la Trinité in the Rue St. Denis, where they were taught some handicraft. The sick poor were visited either by a doctor or a surgeon, annually appointed for that purpose.

All this seems admirable, and to suggest a very considerable degree of civilisation. But there was another side to the picture. It was one thing to send people to hospitals, and another to provide for them properly when there. The Hôtel Dieu was the hospital for the sick, but it was so badly managed that children sent there died in hecatombs. Six and even nine sufferers were put into one bed; the plague-stricken mixed with those ill of other diseases.

NOTRE-DAME AND THE CITY.

Though plague and pestilence were periodical the sanitary condition of the city was little heeded. Filth and mud lined the streets, and were heaped up against the gates of the churches; sewers there were, but they seem to have been open ditches. As to the cemeteries they were a disgrace to humanity. That of Saint-Innocens was perfectly revolting. The earth had become so rotting that it was said a body buried in it would be consumed in nine days. This doubtless was hyperbole: a grave-digger's fiction to account for coffins which were continually being removed to make room for newcomers. These pitiable remains were piled up in open lofts built over the arcades which surrounded the cemetery, under which the milliners exhibited their wares and women came to dictate their love letters.

This Aceldama was only separated from the Markets of Paris—the famous Halles—by a narrow street devoted to the sale of ready-made linen. The first of these markets was built towards the latter part of the twelfth century; the two fish markets were erected by Saint Louis, and those of the shoemakers and skinners by Philip the Bold. In 1323 they had become a great bazaar, the upper part being an immense gallery, where all kinds of wearing apparel were sold, crowns or wreaths, bonnets, ivory combs, mirrors, waistbands, purses, gloves, &c., &c., A century later (1434) the markets of cloth, skin, haberdashery, leather, bread, fruit, &c., had become quite a town. Later on the Halles multiplied, so that there was hardly a trade that was not represented. Eggs, butter, meat, grain, wine, everything, in fact, was sold at the Halles.

Rebuilt under Francis I. and Henry II., the Halles continued almost unaltered until the beginning of the present century. They were the real centre of the life of the northern portion of Paris. There was no exchange, dealers in money meeting on the Pont au Change; and though the Louvre occupied considerable room, the influence of the Court was by no means overwhelming.

Thus cheek by jowl lay pestiferous charnel houses and the markets where slaughtered beasts, strangled fowls, and suffocated fish, awaited distribution to countless eating-houses, refectories and dining-halls, to be daily devoured by the voracious giant Gargantua. For Rabelais' coarse, mischievous monster, droll, amiable, lewd, and careless of human life, yet ever ready to obey parents and teachers, and to model his behaviour according to their precept and example, was a true type of the Paris of the Reformation.

One trait was wanting, but perhaps the humorist did not believe it really so characteristic of the people, as of those who exercised authority—it was the element of cruelty which here in these shambles came out with revolting distinctness as the presiding genius of the place. In the midst of the Halles stood the pillory, and not only the pillory, but by a touch of humour worthy of a court-jester, authority had made here a shambles not only for beasts but for men. The scaffold was constantly erected in the Halles to decapitate human beings. In the Place de la Pilori the executioner had his permanent abode, and for his perquisites he had the right to erect the shops and stalls in that portion of the market, and generally to claim a small due on all goods exposed for sale. Another rite in this Temple dedicated to the Flesh, was the ceremony to which persons compelled to compound with their creditors had to submit. The unhappy bankrupt was taken before a great stone cross, and there having declared that he gave up all to his assignees, a green hat was placed on his head as a mark of obloquy by the Public Executioner.

Paris, as Rabelais has remarked, was a good city to live in, but not the place where one would choose to die. Nowhere in the world, and perhaps at no period in its history, was life more easy in Paris than in the sixteenth century. Food was ordinarily most plentiful, and the workman's wages being good, he was able to feed on mutton, roebuck, and partridge and to fast on whale, salmon, and red-herrings. The well-to-do tradesmen's wives and daughters dressed well, and either broke or defeated the sumptuary laws. Every lackey, it was said, went about apparelled in silk, while a young courtier's wardrobe often contained five and twenty to thirty different suits. Besides the laws with reference to dress, efforts were made to prevent people riding about in coaches, which were then coming into fashion.

Luxury and all the lighter amusements could hardly fail to come where everybody was making money easily. There were 1800 racket-courts in Paris, and 1000 crowns daily were spent on tennis-balls. To a racket-court in the neighbourhood of the Halles Charles IX. frequently came to play. As to the theatre it was such a passion with the Parisians that for it they forsook everything. The actors at the Hôtel de Bourgogne went on the stage at eight o'clock in the morning, and, except when they stopped to rest and dine, from twelve to two, they were performing until evening. Bands of strolling players, jugglers, mountebanks, were ever in the streets drawing great crowds. The comedians occasionally played in the Palais de Justice, burlesquing eminent personages, who for their part entered heartily into the humour of the thing and encouraged all this roystering. At St. Germain, every year, a great fair was held, where nine streets of small shops, built of wood, were erected all under one large roof. It lasted eight days and was a scene of endless riot, but much profit to the Abbot of St. Germain. In 1556 the rector of the university, some masters of arts and other dignitaries went to the merry-making clad in dissolute and indecent fashion and armed with swords and sticks. Squibs against the authorities and satirical songs on their infamies were all over the town, but the rulers laughed as boisterously as the rest. One day, Catherine de' Medici, standing with the King of Navarre in a window of one of the lower rooms of the palace, overheard two people in the street who were cooking a goose, sing a number of ribald verses about the queen-mother. The song concluded they began to curse the subject of their song. The King of Navarre begged Catherine to let him go and have them hanged. But she, like a true Medici, had a mind to have a round with them herself. "Eh!" she cried, "what has she done to you? It's owing to her that you have that goose to eat." Then turning to Navarre, she said, laughing: "My cousin, our wrath need not descend so low as that. That's not game for us."

THE PLACE DE GRÈVE, 1583.

Yes, undoubtedly, with occasional periods of starvation, the people led at this time a jovial life. To describe the revelling and drunkenness, the chambering and wantonness, is impossible. Any attempt would have to be so guarded that it would convey an untrue impression. And yet it is the secret of the history, which not understood, renders the witness of the martyrs and the sufferings they endured so inexplicable, so monstrous, such an outrage on humanity, that we toss the records away in despair and refuse to know anything more about it. If we knew the truth we should see it was simple enough and only a phase of the eternal war between the flesh and the spirit.

The Court set the example, and the Parisians followed suit. It was not any excessive religiousness that made them arm so readily for the Church, and profess such devotion to the orthodox cause. The Church fell in with all their ways, did not interfere with their jovial life, beyond exacting certain easy changes in diet, when salmon could be eaten instead of venison, and salt herrings in place of tripe. All was agreeable, and Friday's and Saturday's meagre repasts gave zest to Sunday's feast. But the Parisian was by nature an artist and an actor; the Church gratified these mental qualities by her services and her processions. To see thousands of little candles sparkling in the dark church, to listen to the roll of the music, and the sweet strains of the choir, rising and echoing through the vaulted aisles, to be stirred into passion in favour of this party or that party by some eloquent monk or fiery partisan priest; this was delightful, but most of all did the people enjoy the sight of a grand procession winding its way through the sombre tortuous streets. It was brave to see the banners of the confraternities, trade and religious, waving in the sunshine; to smell the incense, and, for a moment, to lose the stench of the pestiferous alley in its odoriferousness. Still more charming to watch and to listen to the long line of processionists, each bearing a taper in his hand, and arrayed in the costume appropriate to his or her age, sex and rank, all chanting in unison. There, not unfrequently, was his very Christian Majesty, humbly walking bareheaded, taper in hand, followed by the royal princes, the queen-mother, and all that was illustrious by birth or office, the judges and councillors in scarlet robes and tall mortar caps, endless soldiers, endless priests, nuns, monks, all the religion of Paris, lay and cleric, following the right reverend the Bishop, who, accompanied by the most reverend the Legate, held aloft a silver gilt image of her whom they styled "Our Lady."

As in all ages which are revolutionary, the dark arts of necromancy and witchcraft were much practised. In 1560 Jean Bodin relates that he saw in one of the best houses in Paris a young man make a sieve move by merely uttering certain words. In the reign of Charles IX. a man found able to do extraordinary things, confessed to having had the aid of Satan. Pardon was promised if he would reveal the names of his associates, whereupon he named such a number who he had met at the devil's sabbaths, and among them persons who had never been dreamt of in such a connection, that it was deemed advisable to suppress further inquiry, and let the matter fall into oblivion. The fact was that the heads of the State were themselves deeply infected. In 1573 it is stated that there were no less than 30,000 persons in Paris who dabbled in the Black Art. They were spoken of at Court as philosophers and astrologers, and Catherine de' Medici is stated to have believed more in astrology than in Catholicism, while her son, Henri III., was accused of worshipping the devil in the wood of Vincennes, near Paris. A finely printed little volume of 1589 gives the details, and in a woodcut represents the silver gilt satyrs, each of whom held a vase of pure crystal, in which were put unknown drugs, also the golden cross in their midst, containing a piece of the true cross. But Henri III. and his enemies vied with each other in degrading superstition. In this same year 1589 there were placed on the altars of several parishes in Paris, wax figures of the King, which were pricked during each of the forty masses said during forty hours, and at the last, the images were pricked in the heart, some one saying a magical word, the object being to kill the King. With the same end, processions were formed, in which they carried magical tapers, which they extinguished by turning them upside down, at the same time uttering magical words.

After this it is not surprising to hear that poisoning had become familiar and common at the Court of Henri III., and that, even earlier, a certain Italian performer on the Pont Saint-Michel was called the Queen's poisoner.

RICHARD HEATH.

THE COPTIC CHURCH.

BY THE REV. HOWARD HOPLEY.

I.

DAIR ABU-'S-SIFAIN, OLD CAIRO, FROM THE SOUTH.

THE Copts are a distinct nationality, living side by side in Egypt with their Mussulman countrymen, in the proportion of about one to eight—never mingling with them, either by marriage or in the associations of domestic life, but outwardly fraternizing together for the sake of trade and otherwise, much as the Jew does with the Christian in Europe. It is very important to bear this in mind, as will appear by-and-by. The Copts are in fact the lineal descendants of the ancient Egyptians, and the faces pourtrayed on the walls of the old temples and tombs along the Nile Valley furnish sometimes startlingly exact portraits of the Copts of to-day. For at the time of the invasion of Egypt by Amrou, in A.D. 650, when the other Egyptians intermarried with the Saracens and other nationalities that the invader brought into Egypt, the Copts kept themselves religiously apart. And they still continue to do so.

The Coptic language was the colloquial speech of the Egyptians of the time of our Lord, and bears about the same relationship to the common language of the ancient Egypt of Joseph's time, as modern Greek does to the language of Homer, or modern English to the speech of Chaucer. All the Coptic that has come down to us is confined to the Liturgies and one or two fragmentary gospels, so the vocabulary is very limited. Of course Coptic is never spoken, and is understood by perhaps one out of every fifty of the priests who read the service. Modern Copts speak Arabic.

Let us look now at the Coptic Church historically. It will be remembered what kind of place Alexandria was in the time of our Lord—a gathering-place of all manner of notabilities and nationalities, and the centre of the intelligence of the whole world. It was the greatest trading city in the Mediterranean, and at the same time a hotbed of all manner of sects of philosophy, heathen and Jewish. The Jews had a colony not far off, and among them were to be found Pharisees, Sadducees, Essenes, and Theraputæ—the Ascetics whose normal home was in the hermitages of the desert, but who came to Alexandria to wrangle. Here also dwelt Philo the Jew, whose philosophy we seem to see traces of in the writings of St. John. Well, it was in this intellectual hotbed that the Christian Church in Egypt was first planted. Christianity must always to a certain extent take a colouring from its environments, and be modified by them. And so we see in the progress of the Alexandrian Church that the various phases which it passed through were, in a way, the reflection of the developments of the strange ferment of intellectual turbulence which for long years leavened the society of that strange city. Merely to mention such names as Clement, Justin Martyr, Origen, and later on Arius and Athanasius, Cyril and Anthony of the Desert, is sufficient to call into view what stormy times these great men lived in, and how great a power in the Church and world the Egyptian Church has been. The Alexandrian Church developed into the Egyptian Church soon after Christianity spread throughout Egypt and Nubia. One cannot stay to speak of it here, but the extraordinary spread of Christianity in the great cities of Upper Egypt in the fourth century, is so marvellous that it reads more like a romance than sober history.

St. Mark is supposed to have been the apostolic founder of the Church. He was martyred at Alexandria in 68. From thence until the time of Dioscurus, who was condemned by the Council of Chalcedon in 450, there were a succession of twenty-eight patriarchs, including some of the illustrious worthies aforementioned.

Dioscurus, who succeeded St. Cyril, is said to have supported Eutyches in his heresy; but he so far modified the Eutychian doctrine that he affirmed the belief that in the Incarnation the natures of God and man were so blended that the result was one nature human and divine; whereas Eutyches had taught that the human nature was swallowed up in the divine.

Dioscurus, however, was deposed by the Council of Chalcedon, and the result of this unhappy controversy was the banishment of the patriarch and a schism in the church; thus the church has laboured under the suspicion of heresy ever since.

The Egyptian Church sided with their patriarch in this controversy, accused the Council of haste and unfairness, and went on as before.

Of course, practical and social Christianity suffered much in all this confusion, but a revival took place in 551 through the instrumentality of James Baradœus, the missionary bishop of Edessa, whose zeal and genius put fresh life into the Monophysite churches, both of Egypt and elsewhere. He was so great a power that he came to be looked upon as their founder; and they all go by the name Jacobites in consequence until this day.

This state of things lasted from the death of Dioscurus until the invasion of Egypt by the Saracens in 650. Amrou, officer of the Caliph Omar, conquered Alexandria, and the supremacy of the Mohammedan power was then established in Egypt. The important thing to remember as regards the Copts is this—that Amrou was greatly helped by the Jacobite Christians, for, seeing how things were going, they made a contract with the conqueror. We are told that the Saracens were received as the deliverers of the Jacobite Church, and that a secret and effectual treaty was opened between the victorious army and them.

The conqueror was addressed in these words by a rich and powerful member of the church: "For myself and brethren we are resolved to live and die in the profession of the gospel and the unity of Christ. It is impossible for us to embrace the revelations of your prophet, but we are desirous of peace, and we cheerfully submit to pay tribute and obedience to his temporal successors."

The Mohammedans removed the seat of government from Alexandria to Cairo, where Amrou built his great mosque (contemporary with the mosque of Omar at Jerusalem), and soon after the patriarchate was also removed to Cairo, which has been the seat of ecclesiastical government ever since. Cairo from those days has been the centre of all church life and administration, both for Egypt and for the churches in Abyssinia and Nubia, which own allegiance to the Coptic patriarch.

For long years Egypt continued under Arab rule; then came under the dominion of the Turks, which has proved the greater tyranny of the two. Still there have been many great and historical patriarchs under the Mohammedans—men who have made a mark, men in earnest for the spiritual improvement of the church. The Turks, however, have invariably robbed and ill-treated the church, and the patriarchs in particular, so that poverty has always been a distinctive mark of the church, and is so still.

During all those dark ages, however, the church continued intact. Through centuries of persecution it has still held together—the same society of Christians in unbroken succession.

The Egyptian church that weathered the persecutions under Valerian and Diocletian and the Cæsars of the decadence, has through a thousand years endured the unremitting hostility of the Mohammedan powers; and there it is in Egypt still—outwardly, as to its organisation and machinery, very little changed, but, alas! as to its spiritual life, asleep and dreaming.

And now for the modern Copts—the Copts of to-day. They number about one-tenth part of the population of Egypt, and are found in most of the towns and villages through the length of the land, living side by side with the Mussulman. But socially and politically they are a down-trodden people, in spite of their superior intelligence.

The faithful Mussulman thinks it a virtue to treat the Copt as a dog: thus in the cities and towns they form societies and inhabit quarters of their own, so that in any sudden fanatical outbreak they may be the more protected and able to offer a defence. There is a Coptic quarter in Cairo, just as there is a Jew's quarter in Rome. Physically the Copts have the advantage over the Mussulmans, for they belong to a purer race. There has been no intermarrying to destroy the distinctly Egyptian type. The features of the Copt are finer, and his look more intelligent than that of his neighbour, though it is not free from a servile cast, which servility is noticeable also in his expression and manner—a look as of one long kept in subjection. The Copt dresses very much like the Mussulman, only he wears a black turban, except when he is employed under government, then he may cap himself in white. Red and green are the privilege of the true believer. Coptic women differ in dress, I believe, very little from their sisters; they are veiled and coiffed in the same detestable manner, but of course green, the prophet's colour, is forbidden. As aforesaid, the Copt is far more intelligent than his compatriot; this is why most of the minor offices under government and municipal clerkships are held by Copts. Whenever there is any literary work to be done, the Copt is called in to do it; whenever there is writing to be done the Copt is called in to do it. You see him squatting as a scribe at his stall in the corners of the streets and bazaars with his black robe and papers and his brass ink-horn stuck in his girdle, ready to write a letter for any one, man or woman, who will put a penny into his purse.

There are more Copts in the towns of Upper Egypt than in Cairo, and 500 miles up the Nile they are almost the exclusive teachers of the young. In walking through the Coptic quarter of any big town in the Thebaid, by the side of the narrow street you come here and there upon a court-yard open to the air when the sunlight filters in through the golden palms above. And as you pass, your ears are greeted with the hum of children's voices at school. If you go in, which you are quite welcome to do, you will find a gathering of half-naked little boys with little red caps on their heads, learning to read and write. A much-enduring and terrible Copt with a swish in his hand stands over them, ever ready to prompt them. There are no forms, but they squat in rows on the ground like flowers in a flower-garden. Slates and ear-splitting slate-pencil are happily unknown in Egypt; but each boy holds in his lap a square of sheet zinc, and he writes on it with a reed pen and ink, beginning at the top right-hand corner and working his way down from right to left. I believe that now in many of their schools English is taught, so there will be soon a large English-speaking population in Egypt—a providential help to the spread of the Gospel.

Things New and Old.

THE DISEASES OF THE BIBLE.—Some of the diseases mentioned in the Bible are simply named, or so briefly described, that we can only surmise what they were. With regard to others the most learned physicians of the present day find it difficult to identify them with any particular forms of disease with which they are familiar. Nor can this be matter of surprise, both because the diseases in question were described, in the Old Testament at least, by non-professional writers, and at a time when nothing deserving the name of medical science existed; and also because diseases alter much in their characteristics with lapse of time and change of climate and environment, some, there is reason to believe, disappearing altogether. In Egypt the priests acted as physicians, and appear to have had special diseases, as well as special duties, assigned to them. Some, for example, had diseases of the eye, and some those of the ear, allotted to them, and some the duties of embalming. Thus we are told that "the physicians embalmed Israel." They were a very numerous body, and formed part of the retinue of the great. They must certainly have acquired some knowledge of anatomy, if only from the process of embalming, together with some experience of diseases and the use of surgical instruments. The Egyptian priests had their canons of practice, as laid down in their sacred books, which they were bound to obey. But such rules of practice consisted largely of superstitious and ceremonial observances. The chief priest-physicians, the Magi, the wise men and magicians of whom Moses speaks, claimed superhuman powers in the control of diseases. That the Hebrews obtained what knowledge of disease they had mainly from the Egyptians there can be no doubt, and this would appear to have fallen naturally to their own priesthood. But it is deserving of notice that neither in the Levitical laws, nor elsewhere in the Old Testament, is there any mixing up of cures and curative means with the necromantic or superstitious observances which form so prominent a feature in the medical practice of all other people in primitive times.—[From a valuable little volume by Sir Risdon Bennett, late President of the College of Physicians, in which the various forms of disease mentioned in Scripture are examined in the light of modern science, issued by the Religious Tract Society.]

"JENNY WREN'S MITE."

CHAPTER III.—THE CHILDREN'S SERVICE.

IT was Sunday afternoon, and a number of children and ladies were hurrying with bright faces into a church. On the top of the steps, peeping in at one of the doors, stood a little, gentle-faced girl.

A lady passing in caught sight of her, and paused a minute to speak a few words of kind encouragement.

"Are you afraid to walk in alone, little one? Will you like to come in with me?"

The blue, earnest eyes were lifted with an expression in them, half of wistfulness, half of doubt.

"Please, is it a big christening there's going to be in there?"

The lady smiled.

"No, dear, a service especially for little children is going to be held. My children like these services so much; the clergyman is so kind and pleasant. Suppose you come in with us and see if you like this one, too?"

The small head nodded consent.

"But I won't come far in," said the child, with quaint, sedate gravity; "because the service may be longer than I'll feel like leaving father."

The lady smiled again.

"Don't you think that mother will be enough to take care of father while you are away?"

There was another quick lifting of the sweet, innocent eyes, accompanied by a shake of the head.

"Mother's been one of the Lord's own blessed angels ever so long, and waiting for us; but we ain't fit to join her yet—leastways father says he isn't, and if he isn't, of course, I know, I can't be."

The first part of this speech was a word for word repetition of what she had often heard her father say. The latter part came from the speaker's own thoughts. Once she had expressed this belief to her father himself as to her own unreadiness; and poor, loving, ignorant Tom Silver had snatched his little daughter to his breast hastily, exclaiming in tones that trembled with fear of losing her:

"The Lord forbid! And for certain sure He'd never go for to let you be, and me with none but my little Wren left in the world to love. Not but what—not but what——"

He clasped her closer, and, lifting the small hands to his lips, kissed them fervently. Although his lips would not finish the sentence, his heart asserted positively, "Not but what he did believe, all the same, that his Jenny Wren was as ready for flight from this world to the brighter home, as any of the Lord's lambs ever were."

But to return to little Jenny standing in the porch, out, almost for the first time in her life, with no father by her side.

The thought had taken fast hold upon the little girl's mind—that if mother had thought this church-going a thing to please Our Father, it surely was so. Jenny felt she wished to please the loving Lord, and so she, and "mother" the doll, had arrived at the conclusion that till father got his coat, and could go too, Jenny at least had better not stay away.

At any rate Jenny came to this decision, and certainly the dusthole treasure-trove did not say anything against it.

Tom Silver was much more inclined to say No when his little daughter put up her most unexpected petition to be allowed to run round the corner to the church one Sunday afternoon when the bells began to ring, some few weeks after he had taken her there.

Tom looked at the pleading face, and then at his very shabby coat, and shook his head. Then he looked back at the wistful eyes once more, and finally he tied on the hat, and buttoned up the jacket, and despatched her with a kiss.

"I won't stay away from you very long, daddy dear," said small Jenny, as she went off.

But when that bright, wonderful, friendly service began, Jenny was swiftly wrapt away into a strange new wonderland of learning; and time was forgotten.

Question and answer passed rapidly between the clergyman and most of his young congregation, until at length it gradually came about that the talking fell all to the clergyman's own share; and he spoke of the dear Lord's loving mercy in a way that thrilled the depths of the heart of one little intent listener standing unseen just within the door.

"And now, dear children," he said in conclusion, "do you remember what our Saviour asks of us, in return for His love?"

There were many voices to reply, and one small pair of ears to listen very eagerly for instruction.

"He asks us to love Him, and to love our neighbour as ourselves."

"Quite right," was the kind-voiced, smiling answer; "and now I am going to ask you all if you will kindly give me a proof of your loving your neighbour as yourself. I belong to an orphanage for little children; the supply of toys there, and picture books has lately been very, very poor and small, and I want you all to help me to make it better. Most of you have some toy, I expect, or picture book, or pretty card you can spare for these little orphans, who have neither father nor mother on earth; and you know if you show love to them you are doing something to show love to the dear Lord who has done so much to show His love for us."

There were a few more words, and then Jenny turned out of the door as the blessing was being given—the solemn beauty of which she knew nothing, and she flew home fast as her feet would carry her.

"O, father, father!" she exclaimed, as she darted into the room and threw herself into her father's arms.

She could say no more for the present, for sobs choked her voice, and Tom felt frightened for her, and sorry that he had yielded to her wish to go.

"Has any one been frighting my dearie?" he asked, anxiously.

But Jenny looked up then with a reassuring smile—

"O, no, daddy, dear; it has been beautifullest beautiful! Such a many little boys and girls, big as me and bigger! and lots of talking, and no crying, and no water. And I know lots more now about our loving Lord, our Father; and He wants me to show I love Him, by giving 'mother' to the children that haven't got any fathers here, no more than any mothers. And—and"—little sob—"I do like—like"—another little sob—"to give her to show I love Him, but I'll be a lit"—sob again—"a lit—little sorry not to have her when I'm all alone."

CHAPTER IV.—HAPPY DAYS FOR JENNY WREN.

"WELL, dearie, you may have your way, though I'm beat if I understand head or tail o' the business."

So spake Tom Silver, as puzzled on Monday morning as he had been on Sunday evening, both by his little girl's positive statement as to the dear Lord's wish for her doll, and her own willingness to give up her one treasure, although she could not help crying over the sacrifice.

Jenny slept very restlessly all night with the doll hugged up tight in her arm; and when her father began moving about the room, lighting the fire, and setting the cups and plates, she awoke quickly, in spite of the early hour, and repeated her yesterday's request.

The clergyman had said that any little boy or girl who liked might carry a book or toy, or whatever they could spare for the little orphans, to his house, next to the church, on Monday morning at twelve o'clock, and he would have all packed in a box, and take them to the home himself.

Jenny pleaded with her father that she, at any rate, might be one to go to the gentleman at the hour named, and give him "mother."

"But father 's afeerd to have his little Wren runnin' about the streets alone," remonstrated her father again. "She may get run over."

Jenny shook her head.

"I didn't yesterday, father. And there's only one crossing, and I'll take ever such care, and come back again directly minute."

"That's a good little dearie," said Tom Silver; but he still tried to change her wish.

"If ye give away this pet o' yours, dearie, I don't know whenever father's little Wren will get another. I dunnow as I ever seen another, not since I began dustholing."

"And it wouldn't be 'mother,' even if you did, would it, dadda?" sighed Jenny, once more clasping her treasured companion of her solitude closely in her arms.

Jenny had passed many a happy hour, making her doll into almost a presentable member of society. The scraps and stuff had been washed and rewashed into a state of faded cleanliness, and manufactured into some semblance of real garments. The rag head was covered with a strip of blue ribbon by way of hood.

The trouble her solitary toy had caused her had given it all the greater hold upon her affections. But still it must go.

"The dear Lord has given me everything, you see, dadda. You, and dear mother up in Heaven waiting for me, and tea with you every day, and Sundays, and dolly all this time, and my comforble cot, and everything. And I must give Him this for the other little children, please, because He is such a good Father, and I do love Him so."

Silver stared at his child. "Seems like as if your mother had been able to make ye see things bettern she could me, little Wren. I reckon ye're right to love Him. And it's not your father as 'ull stand again your doing as you feel any more."

And so it came to pass that the little child, taught of the Holy Spirit of her Heavenly Father, presented herself with her dusthole dolly to the clergyman and his wife in the vicarage library.

Within the next half hour Jenny's history and "mother's" history, and father's history were all learnt, and little Jenny's offering was accepted. And there were tears in the clergyman's eyes as he stooped and kissed the child.

"The dear Lord is surely pleased with your grateful heart, dear child. You have prayed for it, and it has been granted you."

Not many days after wee Jenny found greater cause than ever for her thanksgiving, the full meaning of which she was beginning to understand, and many another beautiful truth besides.

The clergyman found a new home for Tom Silver and his little Wren with the Bible-woman and her carpenter husband. Jenny shared a tidy little room with the Bible-woman's daughter, kind-hearted Nelly Shaw, pupil teacher in the neighbouring school, and under the shelter of her wing even Tom Silver made no objection to his little one gaining the advantages of more learning than he had himself.

Although dear wee Jenny was no more condemned to long days of loneliness, the evenings which they spent in their own cosy little private sitting-room lost none of their preciousness to Tom Silver and his child; and as the clear light of the gospel of glad tidings dawned ever more fully upon them, they grew even happier than when in their dim feeling after the truth they had blessed God and prayed for grateful hearts.

GRACE STEDBING.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. IV.

1. The queen of this far-off land came to see and hear the king of Israel, and was astonished at his greatness and wisdom.

2. One of the greatest of the prophets who came to a king of Judah, saying, "Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die, and not live."

3. A term of contempt (meaning really a piece of brass), which king Hezekiah applied to the brazen serpent Moses had made, and which the Jews had been worshipping.

4. A prophet who gave the Lord's message to Jeroboam, tearing a garment into twelve pieces, and telling him to take ten, in token that he should be king over ten tribes.

5. The father of a prophet who was called to give counsel to Ahab and Jehoshaphat as to going up to Ramoth-gilead. His answer was not favourable, and the king of Israel ordered him to be fed on bread and water till his return.

The whole is the mountain in which the great Lawgiver remained forty days and nights, and where the laws written on the two tables of stone were given.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. I.

Write out these texts and then mark one word in each to form another text relating to the Creator.

1. In Him was life; and the life was the light of men.—John i. 4.

2. In the beginning was the Word . . . and the Word was God.—John i. 1.

3. The same was in the beginning with God.—John i. 2.

4. As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God.—John i. 12.

5. God created man in His own image.—Gen. i. 27.

6. The world was made by Him.—John i. 10.

7. And, behold, a throne was set in heaven, and One sat on the throne.—Rev. iv. 2.

8. Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honour and power: for Thou hast created all things.—Rev. iv. 11.

9. Blessing, and honour, and glory, and power, be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne.—Rev. v. 13.

10. The earth is full of the goodness of the Lord.—Psa. xxxiii. 5.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;
OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER VII.—QUESTIONS.

COUNSELS OF DESPAIR.

"MARCUS, haven't I any relations?"

The question was put suddenly by Roy, as he and his brother sat over their dessert one evening not many days after the funeral.

"You ought to know that better than I, Roy. Did your mother never tell you of any?"

"No, never. It never occurred to me before, as long as I had her; but I have thought since that I am very much alone in the world. If it wasn't for you I should have nobody, and you're not really a relation, though we call ourselves, and feel like, brothers. Not a single relation came to my mother's funeral, or wrote, or anything. It does seem odd, does it not? I wonder I never thought of it before."

"I am not much better off in that respect than you," answered Marcus. "I have hardly a relation in the world; but we have one another, and must make the best of that."

Roy smiled, and said no more just then, but he began to think more seriously of his position, and of life in general, than he had ever done before.

The first time that death really enters our special world, and takes away our nearest and dearest, cannot but be a somewhat solemn epoch. At Roy's age, just when childhood and manhood are approaching a junction, such times have a peculiar significance, and bring with them thoughts and feelings that are often entirely new; and in his case this was more markedly so, from the character of his temperament, which had prompted him hitherto to live in the present and take life in the careless fashion of a child.

But after Roy had stood beside his mother's dying bed, had listened to her last charge to him, and promised, holding her hands in his, to try and live as she would wish him live, so that they might meet again on the golden shore of the great eternal home beyond the grave—after all that had happened to him he felt that he could never be quite the same careless, light-hearted lad again, and each succeeding impression as it came, forced upon him the conclusion that life was not quite the simple easy thing he had always fancied it.

Roy began to think somewhat seriously now of his own future and of the position he occupied in the world. He had been deeply disappointed at his brother's decision in regard to keeping him still at home, when his heart was so set upon a University education; but as it was not a subject upon which he felt he could talk any further to Marcus, he brooded over it by himself, pondering in vain for a solution of the puzzle. He had other matters to think of too, for with the laying aside of childish things came the aspiration of youthful manhood with its golden dreams and lofty ambitions, and its resolute determination to make a mark in the world.

Roy had his brother always before his eyes as a sort of model. He admired Marcus immensely, and felt that he could be quite content if he could grow up like him. Marcus had not been at home very long; yet already he had become a sort of power in the place: already he had made many plans and projects which showed the bent of his mind and the way in which he viewed the responsibilities of his position. His wealth he held as a sacred trust, not to be wasted in idle extravagance or expended in mere luxuries; but it was to do a work in the world that should benefit others beside himself. Whilst keeping up his position in befitting style, he studied, therefore, the needs of those about him, and set about to meet those needs in the wisest and most considerate way. All plans were discussed with Roy, and the boy entered into them with zeal and interest. He wished he could act as Marcus was acting then, and wondered if it would ever be in his power to follow in his brother's footsteps. Perhaps it was these very thoughts and speculations that first started in his mind the wish to know whether he should ever be a rich man. He had never thought much about money before, but he began to understand its value now in seeing how much good could be done with it.

Sometimes he thought of asking Marcus about it, but he never knew quite how to frame the question; besides he had many other thoughts in his mind at that time, and this curiosity was by no means the dominant feeling.

His great wish was really to be in all points what his mother wished him to be—a Christian—not in name only but in deed and in truth. Roy was conscious of much that was evil in his nature, weakness, self-will, passion and pride, latent faults that he felt ready to spring up within him if the provocation should arise. But he was sincere in his wish to conquer these faults and failings, and perhaps the best test of his sincerity had been his ready submission to Marcus, when he had decided on keeping him at home. He had really striven hard to be patient under disappointment, to conquer his natural feeling of rebellion and indignation, and his brother had been not a little grateful that he had shown himself so amenable and manageable. But there were other of Roy's friends who were highly indignant at the "way he was treated" as they called it. The Kynastons had made up their minds that of course he would be sent to Oxford now, as a matter almost of right, and they could hardly believe the news that Roy brought with him in due course.

Syd and Joyce, Roy's particular friends, those at least who knew most about his wish to go to Oxford and sympathised most completely with it, were very angry indeed with Marcus, and did their utmost in their foolish, hot-headed youthful fashion to stir up Roy's rebellious feelings and set aside all his good resolutions.

They talked the matter over together and came to the conclusion that the only solution to the mystery lay in the probability that money was the difficulty. Either Roy had not enough of his own to defray the cost of a University course, or else it could not be touched until he was twenty-one, and Marcus did not care to advance the necessary funds.

The Kynastons had known something of poverty in their day, and had had some rather hard experiences as to the reluctance of people to part with their money. It did not seem at all an out-of-the-way reason by which to account for the decision of Marcus.

Roy was very indignant when first his companions spoke of their convictions to him, and pointed out how unjust they were to a man who was so open-handed and liberal and so anxious to do good. But Syd replied with a sort of boyish cynicism that it was all very fine to be generous in a way that all the world applauded, but it was quite another to be liberal at home. Possibly Marcus might feel that some of his schemes might be crippled if he had to find funds for Roy's University education, in which case it would be easy to persuade himself that philanthropy should come before his step-brother's interests. Or perhaps he meant to show him by degrees that he was only a poor relation, for it was an open question whether he had any fortune of his own, although it seemed probable his mother had left him something. But the appearance of the elder sister upon the scene at this moment checked Syd in his flow of indignation, though he still spoke out very strongly his opinion that it was a great shame for Roy to be treated so, or any other fellow. He ought to know exactly how things stood with him.

"It is much better not to think about those things at our age," said Muriel, gently interposing. "Our parents and guardians take care of us and our interests much better than we can do ourselves."

"I don't know," said Syd, quickly; "a man ought to have his rights. It's absurd for Roy to be kept at home like this when there is plenty of money somewhere to take him to Oxford."

"We know nothing at all about what we are talking of, Syd," she answered, gravely. "Mother would be very grieved to hear you say such things; you may be quite sure that Marcus will look after Roy and his interests just as he would after his own."

"Well, that remains to be proved," answered Syd, rising leisurely, and wandering slowly down the walk. "I hope you may be right; but if he won't let him have a University education, I shall always call it a horrid shame."

Joyce followed her brother, echoing his words. Muriel and Roy were left alone together.

"You must not let Syd's reckless talk disturb you, Roy," said Muriel, glancing into his face with a sort of vague uneasiness, for it wore a look she had never seen upon it before, and which she did not understand.

"I do not know that they have disturbed me, exactly," answered Roy, "but they have given me some new ideas."

"Syd's judgment is not to be trusted too far. You have Marcus to rely upon, and I think you need not be afraid of any unkindness or injustice from him."

"I promised I would trust him," said Roy, half reluctantly; "but I'm not sure if I can keep my promise always."

"You had better try," counselled Muriel. "It is much better to trust than to suspect."

"If one's confidence is not betrayed."

"And Roy," continued the girl, in the same quiet gentle way, "I don't think it is quite wise or right to rebel too much against a disappointment. I don't think any life that is all pleasure, and has no troubles or crosses, can be quite a healthy or a useful one—not a Christ-like one, at least. I do not mean that we ought not to be glad and grateful for our happiness, or that we ought to go about trying to look for trials and troubles; but if they do come to us, I think we ought to try and be patient and submissive. You know some of the things that seem hard to us at the time, are really all for our good, and when time has passed by, and we have grown older and wiser, we are able to see it for ourselves."

Roy gazed at her earnestly, the dark look fading from his face. Muriel spoke very simply and quietly, but it was plain that she believed all she said.

"Where do you learn that philosophy?" he asked with a smile that had in it a good deal of the old sunshine. "It sounds very deep."

"Does it? I do not mean to lecture you, Roy. I do not know much more than you do, but I feel some things, and I think that what I have said is true."

"Well, so do I when I am with you and hear you say it. Good-bye, Muriel. I will try not to forget. I will be as patient as I can; and, after all, Marcus is a capital fellow. I don't really believe he would be ungenerous to me, only—"

"Now don't spoil it all by that 'only,' Roy. I am sure Marcus is your best friend."

"So he is, I do believe. He is just like a real brother to me."

CHAPTER VIII.—ABBOT'S HEATH.

ABBOT'S HEATH was as desolate a spot as the imagination could easily picture. No matter what the season of the year, it always wore an air of dismal, barren desolation, stretching away as it did in all directions, a dead level, unbroken even by a single tree or shrub of any growth, and only sparsely covered with stunted gorse and bushy heather that never bloomed with real freedom, seeming too much bitten by keen winter frosts and spring winds, and burnt up by summer sun, ever to enjoy life or attain any grace or beauty.

This wide, wild heath was traversed and intersected by two white roads, that ran at right angles to one another and crossed about the middle of the plain. There had once been a gallows erected at this junction, and the name of "Hangman's Corner" still clung about the spot. There had been an attempt to put in a clump of trees when the gallows had been removed, but these had all been killed by lightning before they had attained any considerable size, and the bare blasted trunks and arms stood there as if in a sort of ghastly mockery, pointing this way and that with spectral fingers, and giving out a faint dismal moaning as the wind swept by.

The few country people whose way led across the Abbot's Heath always avoided that sinister spot after nightfall, and hurried by, even in broad daylight, with a feeling of superstitious awe. There were strange stories told of what had been seen and heard there, and tradition magnified the horrors that had once been enacted on that wild waste.

From its exposed position the Abbot's Heath was subject to all the extremes of heat and cold to which our climate is prone. Snow lay longer upon this plain than in the surrounding lowlands, and the tempestuous winds swept over it with absolutely unbroken violence. In summer the sun beat down upon it with scorching, fervid heat, until the baked earth cracked into great fissures and rents that were long in closing again. Travellers looked with wondering distaste at so bare and desolate a region, and were glad when they had crossed the inhospitable waste and had reached an area of civilisation again.

Whatever had prompted any human being to build a house upon Abbot's Heath was a problem that perplexed many, and one to which an answer was never forthcoming; but the fact remained indisputably attested by the existence of a large building—it was difficult to designate it as a mansion or gentleman's residence, and yet it was in no sense of the word a cottage—which stood in a sort of wild unkept garden of its own about half a mile from the cross roads, and was known by the appellation of the Windmill House. Whether it had ever been the site of a windmill in past days was quite an open question, but there was a sort of gaunt-looking tower that in the distance looked something like that of a disused mill, and was probably the origin of the name.

A rough road led up to the house, which was surrounded by about four acres of garden ground, most of which was of the character of kitchen garden.

There were some flower borders and some lawns (if the rough grass deserved such an appellation), in front of the house, but they looked untidy and neglected, as if the inhabitants cared little for grace or beauty. A fairly well-stocked orchard in the rear of the building was the most agreeable feature about the place, and on this hot day in May four children were playing there in a sort of desultory, idle fashion.

It seemed an odd kind of abode for children, but then, as the inhabitants of Thorne (the little town beyond the ridge, two miles away) could have told, the Edingtons were an odd family, and not much liked in the neighbourhood. The old man, to whom the house nominally belonged, was harmless enough—not often seen in fact, living much shut up in his own rooms; but Mr. Roger Edington was well-known in Thorne as a sharp-witted, not over-scrupulous attorney, with a business of a nondescript character that gave him something of ill-repute, though nobody had ever brought to his charge anything of a serious nature. His wife, an excellent manager, and the terror of all the small tradespeople who served her, was liked even less than her husband. She had a way, it was reported, of getting the best of it with everybody simply by the power of her hard eyes and harsh voice. She drove bargains that nobody else in the world could do, and never kept a servant longer than a few months. She hardly ever went into even such society as was open to her, and was little liked when she did. Yet it was said that she had good blood in her veins, and she certainly carried herself with an air that encouraged the assumption. The family had appeared suddenly upon the scene some fourteen or fifteen years ago, and it was currently reported that they intended to remain isolated there, living at small expense until their fortune was made, and afterwards to disappear again to enjoy, in a place where they were not known, the results of their years of hard work and saving. Whether there was any foundation in this rumour no one knew, but it had got about in this neighbourhood where the inhabitants of Windmill House were neither much known nor much beloved.

There was another member of the household, the old man's daughter Joan, who was better spoken of than the rest, perhaps because she was sometimes seen at church, perhaps because she was reported to have her life made a burden to her by her sister-in-law. But, as a matter of fact, very little was known about the Edingtons, and it was sometimes said in the neighbourhood that the children were brought up "little better than heathens."

They certainly looked rather wild as they ran about the orchard in a sort of aimless play; yet they were not ugly children, and had they been neatly dressed and gentle-mannered would have been decidedly attractive. The eldest was a girl, with an abundance of reddish yellow hair, knotted up carelessly to keep it out of the way, and she was laying down the law in somewhat vehement fashion to two boys of ten and twelve who answered defiantly and seemed in no wise amenable to her authority. Hot words were followed by pushes and even by blows, but the game went on nevertheless in a tempestuous sort of way, as if the players were pretty well used to interludes of the kind.

At a little distance, upon a rude stone seat, sat the youngest of the group, a pale bent child of eight, with big grey eyes, flaxen hair, and the pinched, wan look that accompanies spinal disease. She had never been strong or well all her life, but she suffered little pain, and was too well used to sitting still to envy the others their rougher play. Indeed it was almost too rough to attract her. Presently the big girl came and flung herself down on the grass in an access of passionate anger.

"How I do hate those boys!"

"So do I, very often," answered Nellie indifferently.

"They always want everything themselves, and league together against me. They found out where my hen was laying and took all the eggs away; and I was going to let her sit and bring up the chickens, and sell them when they got fit for table. I should have got quite a lot of money, and they only got a shilling for the eggs. I shall tell mamma. I hope she'll punish them well. I hope she'll make them give me the shilling—it's better than nothing. But I do hate having my things interfered with, and those boys are detestable!"

"So they are. They tear all the books, and papa won't get us fresh ones. I wish there were no boys in the world. I'm sure it would be much nicer."

"Well, I shall go in now. I won't play any more," said Mildred rising slowly to her feet. "I'll pay out those boys one day or another. You see if I don't," and she walked angrily into the house, up a wide carpetless stone staircase, and the banging of a distant door told that her resentment was still far from being appeased.

The interior of the house corresponded tolerably well with the aspect of the garden. It wore a look of discomfort and neglect, as a house soon does that is too large for the number of servants kept to take care of it. The oil-cloth in the bare hall was soiled and torn, the windows were not properly cleaned, and there was dust in the corners and under the stairs. Traces of the presence of children were evident in more than one broken toy and a row of garden caps and coats on a rail nailed up for the purpose, but there was nothing home-like in these traces, they only added to the comfortless untidiness of all. The house was gloomy too, facing north, and little sunlight ever found its way through the narrow windows of the living-rooms. It was solidly built and rather finely proportioned, but in its present condition essentially uncomfortable and unhomelike. The pervading impression was one of chill, bare emptiness, oddly combined with a good deal of untidiness. It was a house that would be the despair of a careful or fastidious mistress, it spoke so plainly of slovenly neglect and careless work.

At an upper window above the stone staircase one of the inhabitants of the house was absently standing, looking out over the wide sunny heath with an air and manner at once abstracted and indifferent, singularly devoid of any interest.

Joan Edington, though barely five and twenty years of age, seemed already to have entirely passed beyond the region of girlhood, and it would have been difficult to hazard an opinion as to what her age really was. She was tall and thin, yet not without a certain grace and dignity of her own, though of a kind difficult to describe. She was very plainly dressed in a gown of grey lindsey, made like a servant's, without a trace of trimming or an attempt at style. Its plain straight folds gave an additional height to her tall slim figure and accentuated somewhat its sharpness of outline. The features were not in any way striking, but the brow was full and broad and the lips were calm and firm in their lines, without the thinness that sometimes gives an unpleasing look of rapacity to a countenance otherwise good. The eyes were clear and steady if a little hard in expression, and there was a touch of stern scorn in the face that gave it an individuality of its own.

Joan stood long at the window with an air of indifference and abstraction. She was quiet, with the quietude of one who has no special interest or occupation in life, and to whom time is of no particular value. But when she became aware of a tall figure striding towards the house over the sunny moor, she moved away and slowly descended the wide staircase of uncarpeted stone.

"Here comes Roger," she said half aloud, "and from his energetic air one would imagine he brought news—if indeed any news could be of the smallest value to us. It is strange to see him home so early. He must have some object for facing a walk across the moor such a blazing afternoon."

THE COPTIC CHURCH.

BY THE REV. HOWARD HOPLEY.

II.

THE Coptic Church in Egypt is not dead, but is spiritually asleep. There is a vast organization of bishops, priests, and monks; and an ecclesiastical framework of churches and monasteries existing through the whole length of Egypt. The patriarch is still elected as Athanasius was by the great body of the clergy and people, and is everywhere implicitly obeyed. There are provinces, dioceses, chapelries, all very interesting archæologically, but, alas! over all these things is spread the spirit of slumber. The church is asleep. Everything seems waiting for some great advent which is to touch it all into life. Yet there are individual members of it (perhaps not a few) who in their life and conversation adorn the doctrine of Christ. There are Copts in high station too, of simple and earnest piety, only yearning and praying for better things. Herein is hope; for the church is not forsaken of the Holy Spirit. I do not personally know the present patriarch, though I have heard a good deal about him. But the patriarch whom I know in years gone by, was, in the true sense of the word, a godly man—a spiritually-minded Christian. I know well that his greatest sorrow was the deadness of his church, and his greatest hope and pleasantest dream that some day, and, perhaps soon, the awakening would come, and the church again flourish spiritually as in the glorious days of old. He, and the then Archbishop of Canterbury, had negotiations together for the formation of a school for Coptic clergy, which was finally a failure, owing to lack of funds; but he did not live long after that, and, as I was present at his funeral, perhaps a brief account of it may be interesting.

I had made the acquaintance of Archdeacon Tatton, a great Coptic scholar, who was one of the intermediaries in the negotiations I have spoken of between Canterbury and Cairo, and he, on the sudden death of the Coptic patriarch, invited me to accompany him to the funeral.

This elaborate ceremony took place in a temporary building used during the construction of the new church. It was a great upper room as big as a barn, approached by a broad wooden stairway from an outer court, like the court-yard of an old English inn surrounded with balconies. This court-yard was thronged with men and women in every variety and colour of dress that could be worn by Armenians, Syrians, Greeks, Maronites or Ethiopian Christians, but of course no Mussulmans were there. We pushed our way through the crowd to the foot of the stairway, which was likewise overflowing with people. Easterns are always boisterous and noisy, even in their worship, but in this place the usual hubbub was somewhat subdued, and an air of solemnity and sorrow seemed to prevail, for the patriarch had been universally respected and loved. My companion was known, so we were let to pass through the crowd up the before-mentioned stairway. At the top we stepped on a broad landing, from whence we could look down on the swaying multitude below. But entrance was immediately given into the great chamber or church, where at first we could see nothing but a surging sea of turbaned heads, and a forest of coloured banners and crosses rising out of the crowd at the far end of the church, in the vicinity of the place where the dull chanting of priests and shrill voices of choristers was going on. There seemed to be about 400 people present. The room was choke-full, and the sound of the chanted psalms was almost drowned by the babble of the crowd, and the shrieks of the janissaries, who, with whips in their hands, were energetically professing to keep order. The first part of the service was soon over, and a procession of choristers and priests passed out of the place, chanting and carrying banners and candles. We were now conducted up to what in a church would be the choir.

THE PATRIARCH'S CROWN.

Here, in a kind of circle, stood a number of priests and bishops in full pontificals. The Greek Archbishop was there, the Armenian patriarch also, and Maronite and Syrian Bishops, and room was made for us to enter the circle that we might see. And a strange sight it was.

There were two chairs or thrones set some four paces apart, face to face. In one of them was an ancient Coptic manuscript of the gospels and liturgies bound in a jewelled case; and in the other, as in calm sleep, sat the venerable form of the dead patriarch. They had dressed him in his robes of office, and a gorgeous mitre was on his head, and a ghastly object he looked. The circle of bishops and monks kept up a monotonous chant, while a greater part of the assembly, men and women, one by one passed through the circle and between these chairs, each kneeling down and kissing the dead man's feet and passing on. Had it not been for the solemnity of death actually present, the whole function would have appeared ludicrous, spite of the high ecclesiastical dignitaries present, and of their marvellously gorgeous vestments. There was nothing of sober dignity about the ceremony at all, but then Easterns do not seem to have a sense of the solemn as we take it; and here, in the presence of the dead, the crowd was elbowing the priests, and the priests were pushing the crowd, and the janissaries were fighting and hallooing and swearing as if it had been a fair. By-and-by a procession was formed, the higher ecclesiastics closed round, and six priests took up the dead man in their arms, and with a long array of candle-bearers, choristers chanting, and thurifers tossing up incense, the patriarch was carried off. The passage of the procession down the broad stairway into the court-yard was very striking. What with the candles and banners and sumptuous dresses, it was dazzling to the eyes, like a river of light flowing down into the court.

Immediately in front of the dead man walked the archbishops and bishops.

The Armenian patriarch, a venerable old man, with a long white beard, had to be held by two people as he tottered down the stairway, step by step, falteringly, carrying cross and crozier, clothed from head to foot in gold embroidery.

The dead man came last; his glittering cope was wrapped tightly round him, and his gorgeous mitre flashed in the sun. Looking at him from a window as he was borne down, I was struck with the thought how exactly the resemblance in form of this dead patriarch in his pontificals was to that of the robed and mitred Osiris as seen in the ancient temples. They bore this dead patriarch down, so I was told, to a great subterranean cavern where, side by side, century after century, his predecessors are seated mouldering in their chairs.

The great manuscripts of the gospels and liturgy in the throne opposite the dead man are a sign of the reverence the Copts pay to the Bible. With regard to their liturgy now in use, it is generally free from any thing that we should term objectionable. It does not differ much from the ancient liturgies of St. Mark. In reality, so far as those who have lately visited the church can tell—the Copts do not hold the heresy of Eutychianism—their words for expressing the two natures of Christ are different from ours, but they express much the same thing.

The Copts do not accept transubstantiation, yet they believe in a mysterious conversion of the elements. In celebrating, they always consecrate one loaf, usually about as big as a bun, and it is divided among the communicants, many or few. This seems to be the Pauline idea in 1 Cor. x. 17: "For we being many are one loaf, for we are all partakers of that one loaf." As a rule the Copts use a wooden table for the Eucharist, like as in the primitive times—but sometimes in modern days it has been encased in stone—as the Roman Church encased long ago the altar of St. John Lateran.

Baptism of infants is held to be lawful, but is not usual; the usual age for baptism is about twelve, in order that they who are baptised may, in their own person, confess the faith of Christ and renounce the things that are contrary to Christ. They baptise usually by immersion.

The Coptic clergy is a married clergy, only, of course, the monks are celebate. I am not sure about the bishops, but the patriarch is chosen from one of the four great monasteries, and is consequently celebate.

Some of the monasteries in Egypt are of exceedingly ancient date. The four spoken of are in the desert, and that of St. Anthony dates back from the very early centuries; but all along the Nile valley there is a succession of monasteries which are usually perched up high among the crags of some almost inaccessible cliff, or else caverned into the very heart of the mountains. This was necessary in the old time for the safety of life and store. Very often the monastery indicates the place where, in early centuries, were the Lauras, or Christian colonies, spoken of by Augustine and Jerome. These monasteries have seldom any endowment, save a few acres of the fertile fields below. In many of them the only means of access is by being hauled up in a basket from some ledge or shelf of the rock immediately below; or you may climb up a knotted rope, steadying yourself by gashes cut in the cliff.

I remember our coming upon one of these monasteries quite unexpectedly. We were some four or five hundred feet above the valley climbing among the rocks in search of tombs. Looking up high overhead we saw a trace of masonry in a scarped angle of the cliff perpendicularly above us. We made a circuit, and getting to a ledge within hail, found it to be a monastery partly caverned into the heart of the rock, partly built on this dizzy terrace, where a cross in plaster had been set on a wall which was high enough to prevent people from tumbling over. We hallooed, and after a time the monks looked over the wall and invited us to climb up into their impregnable fortress. The monk who received us took the hand of each of us in turn to kiss it; then lighting a candle, he plunged into a hole in the rock and led the way up a dark stair cut through the mountain to the platform overhead.

Several caverns opened into these stairs, each being a dormitory with a loop-hole through the rock for a glimmer of light. On the terrace above, overlooking the Nile valley, the superior received us most graciously, after which, plunging again into the dark stairway, we went up to a higher platform still. I may say that all this was on the face of what looked to be a perpendicular cliff. Here was one enormous cavern going far back into the mountain, but which was also projected outwards, so to speak, by masonry built upon the platform. The roof of the cavern was all rock-hewn and blackened by the smoke and dust of ages. In this region we found a number of monks sprawling about on the rock floor, some asleep, some smoking: all got up and graciously saluted us; and then we were taken in hand and shown over all this strange dwelling. The chapel was built up in the cavern, like a card castle, about nine feet from the floor, but not reaching the ceiling, and constructed with fretted wood-work through which the light came in from the terrace outside. A panelled screen was before the sanctuary, and this, with a wooden reading desk, was about all the furniture that the chapel contained, save that behind the screen there was a kind of apse, rough caverned into the rock. In this stood the wooden communion table with a cloth upon it, and a silver thurible with incense in it, and from the blackened rock ceiling above there hung a glimmering lamp. The monks wore no distinctive dress; a turban and black robe as usual. They brought out their treasures for us to see; an illuminated prayer-book in manuscript; some vestments and a showy picture of St. Michael. One of them said a part of the service of vespers, I think, for our edification, swaying his body to and fro as is the manner of Easterns when they are reading. Curiously enough, on the terrace outside, the monks had made a little garden with earth brought up in sacks from the valley below. This must have been a wonderful undertaking for people so essentially lazy—perhaps, in the better days gone by, they did it by way of penance. We looked over the projecting wall, breast high, down an awful precipice of rock. We gave the monks a Bible in Arabic, which they accepted with an eagerness quite refreshing, crowding round to read it over one another's shoulders like children.

It was from the ledge of one of these monasteries on the Arabian hills one day, that, standing side by side with the superior, in the sunset evening, we looked down far below on the green valley, stretching away and away with its corn-fields four miles to the river side.

On this plain, each in its own circle of palms were mapped (a mile or two apart) populous villages swarming with Copts. I asked the superior, "Is there any priest or minister in those towns?" "No," said the monk, "but I go once a fortnight and take a service." "Is that all the pastoral care they get?" "Yes," said he, "that is all."

Thus, for 1800 years, with varying fortunes, always militant, always persecuted, the Coptic Church has lived on until now, and there it is in Egypt still, a protest and a sign.

A protest: for although outnumbered and surrounded, and enveloped in a hostile Mohammedan society, the powers of Islam have never been able to crush it, nor absorb it, nor silence its cry.

A sign: the continued existence of the Jews as a nation, spite of their having been scattered to the four winds of heaven, is generally held to be a sign that Providence is reserving them for some important and destined end; and may we not

A Pot of Mignonette.

IT stood the whole of one wild winter through,
A tiny pot, in which some seed was set;
With care embedded in the soft, brown earth,
Sleeping and still reposed the mignonette.

The snowdrifts lingered and the cold winds wailed.
The frosts bit deep through nights as black as jet,
But in its deeper bed there lay in peace
The tiny life-germs of the mignonette.

Spring came at last, and warmth was in the air;
An impulse from on high the hid seeds met—
Some mystic message came—some soft touch thrilled—
And then, at last, awoke the mignonette.

It woke and stirred. The tender stalk upreared Above the soil. And so—as it was let—
It put forth blossoms. Oh, what perfume poured
From the bossed pillarings of the mignonette!

And day and night it grew; and patient gave
Its wealth of perfume through days dry or wet—
Were people present—or were no one there—
This ceaseless treasure of the mignonette.

* * * *

Now let the flower be emblem of the heart.
Within is Love seed. But Love sleepeth yet—
Still capable of waking when there comes
A warmth like that which woke the mignonette.

What matters losses, sorrow, solitude or care!
All these vicissitudes can cause no fret;
They do but keep Love till Love bears to blow—
After the winter showed the mignonette.

And then the wealth and wonder that makes glad
All who approach it—Love's sweet lavish debt,
Paid without waiting, not a stint nor stay,
An all-time fragrance like the mignonette.

Till at the last it sends its offering up
Where on high throne the Lord of Love is set,
And is accepted. Lesson worth the world
Is learned from this small pot of mignonette.

ALFRED NORRIS.

believe that God has something analogous in store for this church? The prophet (Isaiah xix. 21) speaks of a day when the Lord shall be known in Egypt, a day when the Egyptians shall return unto the Lord, and He shall have mercy on them—when the Lord of hosts shall bless them, saying, "Blessed be Egypt, my people." Leaven works very quickly in the East. There are certain signs in this slumbering church which give promise of awakening. There are signs which seem to indicate that the Holy Spirit is actively at work. One sign of promise lies in this, that among the pastors and teachers of the church, there are some, perhaps more than a few, who are thrusting out eager hands in the dark to feel after some friendly touch of Christian sympathy from other bodies. May God direct the touch! Under certain conditions the Coptic mind is entirely plastic and sensitive to impressions or even gentle force coming from outside. If God in His providence should bring about an awakening, and a reformation in this historic church, who could tell what tremendous results might follow?

The Coptic Church appears to me to be the key of the whole East, so far as Christianity is concerned. I know of no other way, humanly speaking, by which Mohammedans can be Christianized but through the Eastern Churches with whom they are in contact, and who speak the same language. If the fire of God's Spirit once more burns bright in the Coptic Church, it will be a beacon fire—the first signal of the Christianizing of the East. For in Egypt, Copts and Mussulmans live side by side. In virtue of that treaty made to Amrou in the seventh century, closer relations were established between the native Christians and their Mohammedan conquerors, than obtained in any other part of the East, and the shadow of this is in Egypt still. A Copt in good position may not only have Mohammedan friends, but he may be the steward or secretary of Mussulmans in the highest rank; and so all through the towns along the Nile Valley there is a truce between Moslem and Christian, which exists nowhere else. Now the great significance of this lies here: that whereas a foreign missionary can only with very great difficulty get at the ear of a Mussulman and will always excite his fanaticism, the missionary if he were a Copt, or a man in Coptic orders, would at once command the Mussulman's attention. Moreover, the very life of a spiritually minded man thus in constant contact with his Mussulman neighbours could not fail with God's blessing to show forth Christ.

Furthermore, Egypt is a land long and narrow. The banks of the Nile for seven hundred miles are populous with towns and villages; many of them are centres of traffic, thronged with a gathering of all Mussulman nationalities by reason of caravans starting to Arabia, Central Africa, and all parts of the Moslem world. And if there were a pentecostal awakening among the Christians in Egypt, it would necessarily spread all over the East. Thus Egypt long and narrow [1] is like a sword driven into the very heart of Islam, and if this Egyptian Church were once more aflame with the Holy Spirit's fire, it would be a flaming sword to subdue Islam to the knowledge of Christ. All this may be a dream, but it is a glorious dream. If we English Christians can do nothing more, let us offer up our earnest prayers to God for the furtherance of Christianity in Egypt, and for the awakening and reformation of this great historic church.[2]

A NIGHT IN TRAFALGAR-SQUARE.

A DAY or two before the recent gatherings of the Unemployed, I had determined to see for myself the state of those who were then passing the night in Trafalgar-square. What I saw makes me rejoice that definite action has been taken to do away with a state of things which was a scandal to our Christian name.

It was half-past nine o'clock when I found myself standing under the shadow of Nelson's monument. I saw only one man stretched on the benches of the terrace; but leaning over the massive parapet, I could see—what has been described by others—a number of men and women already seeking repose on the hard stone ledge. It was warmer down there, as the base of a great equestrian statue somewhat sheltered them from the keen easterly wind. They were lying singly in some places, or in couples, or huddled in an indiscriminate heap in the corner, reached only by crawling beneath the sharp spikes of the curving rail. For a mattress some had simply the bare stone, but generally a newspaper. For a coverlet they had a bit of sacking, or bass, or newspaper. The waste placards of the newspapers become most useful to the bedless poor. One could read by the gas-light the titles of several well-known papers. Startling and sensational announcements that were already as matters of ancient history, though but a few days old, were the labels over some of the homeless. Individuals among them were not asleep, but were engaged in taking a scant supper of crusts, or in smoking to pass away the time. One couple were enjoying together one pipe, the man and woman having alternate "draws." There a group of men were discussing some question evidently of great import to them. I could distinguish among them an old soldier. I had met him before. He has a powerful frame and strong voice; and expresses a deep sense of the humiliation of having to pass his nights on the bare stones of the square, after having exposed himself to death in his country's service on the sands of Egypt. He is speaking of what he conceives to be his wrongs.

[1] Seven hundred miles long, by about twelve miles wide.

[2] We are indebted for the illustrations which accompany this paper to the Rev. Alfred J. Butler's valuable work, "Ancient Coptic Churches of Egypt." (Clarendon Press.)

As I stroll round I witness a struggle between an old woman and two men. They had one broom between them, and had taken possession of a crossing the old lady had left for a couple of hours. She was evidently the worse for a visit to the public-house, and her long tongue and abusiveness were more than a match for the two men. She thrust the dirty broom in the face of one of them and called him a "a thief," in a way that made me tremble for her safety; but the man retained his self-control. Just then the woman's "pal" came up, and taking her part, was met by the word, "Now you come somewhere with me, and I will talk to you with some effect, but I am not a goin' to touch her."

"Not I," said the burly new-comer; "the old woman is game to fight her own battles." He was right; she remained to crow on that crossing.

On I strolled, nearly stumbling over human forms sprawling on the cold flags, close to the east wall, or under the shelter of the fountains. Here is a man picking out some women to give them a cup of coffee. I go with him, and am glad to share the pleasure. To one he gave sixpence to get a bed. Probably that sixpence went for alcoholic warmth rather than blankets. But what an amount of pleasure can be given, in the way of coffee and bread and butter, for a very small sum! How thankful seemed the poor shivering women! How readily too they listened to the few words of sympathy and guidance spoken! They sang with meaning, "Praise God from whom all blessings flow."

"I have been a schoolmistress in Monmouthshire," said one; "but, as I was not certificated, I lost my situation. The School Board ruined me." Some dirty creased papers which the old lady retains as most precious documents, seeing they testify to her former respectability, were produced. Others had been servants, factory hands, laundry women, housekeepers, and slop hands.

Back again into the Square. A missionary is talking to the people, and very plainly. He is telling them that drink is the source of much of their misery. None deny it; some assent to it reluctantly. He speaks, however, of the parable of Dives and Lazarus. I cannot say that all his words were wise, but they listened with eagerness. "There will be a turning round of things one day," was his conclusion. "Dives may know hunger and thirst, and Lazarus be full of joy."

Here there is a rush for a man who is giving a small loaf to every one who will take it. A great many contrive by going out of the crowd and by hiding the loaf, to return again and again and get more. I saw a man with a cigar come up and receive a piece. One who told me he had been for many years engaged in philanthropic work, said that he had given away that evening sixteen hundred pieces of bread.

Several boys were picked out and put into a waggon to be taken to a home. Sixteen were taken by the consent of their parents. The inspector of police took great pains in arranging this matter.

The selected children were seated on a bench; a crowd gathered round. One mother readily gave up her boy. "You seem glad to get rid of him," I said. "Well, yes, I am glad. It is better for him. No more hunger and cold nights in the streets."

One woman who rejoiced in the possession of a thin mackintosh, was quietly persuading one and another not to go; but another woman tried to silence her, "You hold your tongue, my lady Red-haired Mackintosh, and let the boys go." Lady R. M. quietly slinks away, and I see her afterwards sharing her mackintosh with a young man as the covering for the night.

A man comes along and shouts repeatedly, "This isn't parliamentary." Up and down he struts, shouting. "We don't take no notice of him," says another; "he's had a pint of Double X." He was soon gone to seek a further unknown quantity of "Double X."

"Hey, give us a paper," cries another to a boy who has several sheets of waste notices. He hands several to his friends and then vanishes. His pals had clean paper sheets for the night.

The cabs rush by rapidly, bearing theatre-goers to home and bed. Excitement also still rises in the Square, although the clock of St. Martin sounded out midnight half-an-hour ago. The waggon with the children starts at length. "Now," shouted one fellow who was in rags, and probably in beer, "I should like half a pound of dynamite, and then gee-whoa!"

I follow the waggon to Covent-garden Market. No boys are there to be found who want to go. One boy is lying close to a column sound asleep. He is with difficulty awakened. After realising the position of things he declines to go. "Had already been in a home, but had run away." He suddenly breaks away from a kindly hand and runs off again.

On to Smithfield and the Holborn Viaduct steps. Up and down, but no sleepers are out to-night in these places. I return, viâ Fetter-lane, down along the Strand, and at half-past three I am leaning over the parapet of the Square again.

Two policemen are marching slowly up and down, not so much to guard the sleepers as to prevent any outbreak. The silence is deep. The city roar is hushed, shops are shut, the public-houses are closed. The great hotels are all in darkness. Not a light shines from a window. The lines of gas in the street are already defined. The cab-rank with its line of red lights gives some sort of brilliancy to the scene, while the clock and Victoria towers of our legislative halls loom up plainly and grandly.

I lean in a corner watching the scene and meditating on the problems presented in the misery below me. Then I descend and have a trudge up and down with the police. It would have been a rest to have sat down on one of the seats, and I might have fallen asleep like these other unconscious mortals; but one of the police warned me emphatically against doing so. "I would not sit down there for a sovereign. I have had reminders several times of the danger of contact. Even those slabs 'swarm with vermin.'"

Just at this point two Frenchmen came round. They had been smitten with the sight of misery, and had provided themselves with abundant sixpences. Every sleeper was awakened one by one to receive a sixpence.

"Here, Bill, wake up, wake up, will you? Here's a fellow a-giving something away."

Bill slowly awakes and gets his sixpence and is soon back and asleep. He was evidently accustomed to such visitations.

Up and down I pace chatting to the police. I hear of how sometimes they have to put a stop to rows and even to quell outbreaks. "One big fellow, that fellow lying in the midst of that heap in the corner, was the ringleader. The vagrants even pitched the seats over the parapet, and one officer had his face cut by the iron foot. They are easily put down for they have not much spirit."

"One morning, sir, a woman plunged before everybody into one of the fountains. We had to take her into custody. We don't say much to them if they only dip their handkerchiefs in or wash their faces. They must clean themselves in some way. They are filthy enough."

I had evidence of this as I strolled along, and as I looked in their faces by the light of the bull's eye. What peculiar expressions too are in the faces where they are visible from under newspaper, bass, or sacking! In some cases the eyes are open, but the senses seem shut.

Again I trudge up and down. The morning will come in time. The hours have passed slowly. People must be cold. Here is one rubbing his hands. Another wakes up and lights his pipe to warm up. Another walks up and down stamping with his stockingless feet, covered only by thin shoes that go very softly over the pavement. One man declared he had not been in bed for three years, and another that he had not slept in a bed for five years and a half. His fellow-lodgers could not bear his loud snoring, and tormented him so much that he felt more at home in Trafalgar-square than in a lodging-house.

Here comes the dawn. How clear is the air! A soft yellowish tinge is discernible behind St. Martin's Church. How the equestrian statue begins to stand out! The yellow sky changes to a rosy, then to a bluish tint. The houses of the Square and the distant towers and halls assume a continental air. More passengers are astir. Carts are on the move—those that have been early to Covent-garden, or others that carry the dust from the streets. The people begin to rise from their cold couches. I must count them ere they are all astir.

One hundred and forty-seven souls slept in the Square that night. I saw others on the benches above, and some asleep on St. Martin's steps. Sometimes three or four hundred have passed the night there. But it was very cold and those who could anyhow muster the money found a shelter.

The police are very kind, and allow many things out of pity that might not be consistent with their duty. I heard no harsh word or rebuke spoken by them the whole of the nine hours I spent under the shadow of Nelson's monument.

As the morning breaks, a woman goes to the fountain, washes herself, combs out her hair, and makes herself presentable. She afterwards hangs out the rag that served for a towel to dry. And now large cans or old meat tins are sent to get quarts of tea or coffee. This is served round in disused condensed milk tins. Handkerchiefs are untied and all have some scraps or bread to eat. Some go off to the houses round about and ask the servants to give them hot water, and into this they put their tea and sugar. The whole of the space under the terrace becomes an early-morning picnic. The people shiveringly enjoy themselves, and prepare for another day's battle for life.

All do not wake up at once. It needs much effort to get them awake sometimes. On another morning when I was there the hose was shooting the water into every corner, and one old lady could hardly be persuaded to move from the seat on which she had curled herself. I expect the spray from the hose really at last awakened her. Friday is cleaning day. The place would have been unbearable but for the weekly cleansing.

Two fires are now made of the paper that has served for mattress and coverlet. Round these almost heatless fires the people gather. The flames look cheerful if they send out but little heat.

"Yes, sir, it is cold at times," said one. "I mind when that poor girl came, who had been turned out of her home by her father, because she could not please her stepmother. She war'nt used to it. Her face was black and blue. I thought she would have died. She got through one night; but the next, though I chafed her hands, and did my best for her, she had to be taken to the hospital by the police. A gentleman gave me, as we were going, some money to get her some tea and sugar; but, poor thing, she never wanted anything more. The cold had seized her, and she was dead in two hours after her admission. How she did shiver, the young thing!"

One cannot but be thankful that means have been devised to save other poor mortals from such a fate.

Presently more people are washing a few rags and hanging them out to dry. Daylight is now full upon us. The streets are being filled with toilers hurrying to their work. Six o'clock strikes out from the tower of St. Martin's, and soon afterwards I start for home.

The action of the authorities, aided by the kindly and energetic charity of others, has succeeded at last in clearing Trafalgar-square. It cannot be questioned that promiscuous charity under such circumstances as I have described has its attendant evils. The warning words of the Chief Commissioner of Police against wholesale, indiscriminate almsgiving to the habitual vagrants, came not one day too soon. But although the Square may be cleared, there will be still many who, as heretofore, will walk the streets, sit on door steps, seize the benches placed near the stations, or shudder in alcoves of bridges, and on the stone ledges of the embankment. After weary walking all night, such wanderers are glad to get into the parks as soon as they are open, for there, as one said to me, "A man may get a nap without a nudge, and without an order to 'move on.'"

The incidents which I have narrated represent a phase of city life which it would be folly to ignore. More recent events have given emphasis to them. If, as it has been said, it is good for Dives to see the sores of Lazarus, it must surely be good for society to ponder the unsolved problems by which it is surrounded, and it is well that the Christian church should hear the call to new activities which comes to it from these dark depths of sin and suffering.

The French provide night shelters, with a fire at each end, benches, and a custodian to keep order. If such resting-places cannot be provided in our own cities, might not more be done in the casual wards to shield the unfortunate and despairing, the weak and the aged, without detriment to discipline? Many of these houseless wanderers suffer, doubtless, through their own wrong-doing, but many also suffer through the fierce competitions in our cheapening civilisation. The sharp edge of poverty might be taken off in some way that would not foster pauperism, or lead to more loafing.

From time immemorial London has had its houseless wanderers. We must not forget the exertions of Lord Shaftesbury and his coadjutors in providing the Field Lane Refuges, and other remedial agencies. As new emergencies arise with the growing population, the experience won in these earlier endeavours will doubtless be applied on a larger scale. But, above all, Society needs to be baptised anew with the Spirit of Him who came "to seek and to save that which was lost."

FREDERICK HASTINGS.

How the World can Change in a Year!

HOW the world can change in a year!
The phantom fear of an idle day
May turn to a stern reality,
And what seemed real may fade away.
How the world can change in a year!

How the world can change in a year!
The faithful may fail us at our need,
The trusted prove but a broken reed,
And those who led, we may have to lead.
How the world can change in a year!

How the world can change in a year!
The heart from turmoil may pass to rest
As the vane that veers from east to west; [best.
What was deemed most worthless may prove the
How the world can change in a year!

MARY FRASER.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

A correspondent ("A. S. M.") wishes to know what is the symbolical meaning of the expression, "Thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head."—Proverbs xxv. 22.

THE passage is quoted by St. Paul, Romans xii. 20, as an illustration of overcoming evil with good. In the Proverbs, too, the words are added: "Jehovah shall reward thee." The connection thus seems to show that the metaphor can scarcely mean the infliction of pain, whether of mortification or of burning shame, as it might otherwise be naturally interpreted. The picture is rather that of softening metal by heaping upon it burning embers. By undeserved kindness an enemy's hard heart is softened. The Speaker's Commentary finds in the passage an allusion to the burning of incense by placing it on "hot coals," so that the fragrant smoke ascended to heaven. Lev. xvi. 12, 13. "The heart (of the enemy) will burn, and prayer and confession and thanksgiving ascend to the throne of God." This is ingenious, but seems a little far-fetched.

Mysteries.

"A reader of The Sunday at Home wishes to have an insight into the true meaning of one of the 'mysteries of the Gospel' spoken of by St. Paul: Rom. xi. 25, 26. Do the words imply that when the fulness of the Gentiles has come in, the Jews, by a remarkable interposition of God, will be converted to the true faith of Christ, the veil being taken from their hearts; and that their conversion to God will be productive of great spiritual blessings to all Christian nations? For 'if the casting away of them be the reconciling of the world, what shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?' Rom. xi. 15."

Our correspondent has no doubt intimated the true sense of the passage. Only, to the "spiritual blessings to all professedly Christian nations" we would add the forecast of such blessings to the Gentile world at large. Who so fitted to be missionaries of Christ through all lands as the children of Israel, when converted to Him?

A remark may be added on the New Testament meaning of mystery. It is often taken by readers to denote something hard to understand, either as transcending reason, or intrinsically obscure. The harmony of human freedom with Divine Omnipotence would be such a mystery. This however is by no means the Scriptural application of the term. A mystery is a secret, and generally a secret disclosed. Thus the truth of the calling of Gentiles to an equal place with Jews in the family of God was a mystery hidden from ages and from generations. Ephesians iii. 3–6. Formerly, in the dispensations of God, this truth was hidden, but it is now made known. Another great secret disclosed is that of the Resurrection: another, as our correspondent shows, is the Conversion of the Jews. Slightly different is the use of the word in such phrases as "the Mystery of iniquity," but the idea is still that of the revelation of the secret depths of evil. Compare, again, THE MYSTERY OF GODLINESS: 1 Timothy iii. 16. This is the secret—the revealed secret, of true piety: and this secret (according to the now generally accepted reading of the passage) is personal: is "He who was manifested in the flesh." That is, Christ Himself is the secret of religion in the soul. So, according to the best critical reading of Colossians i. 2, "the mystery of God" is defined as "Christ, in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden." (R. V.)

THE SANCTUARY IN THE DAYS OF THE JUDGES.

"W. T. L." asks: "Was this literally only a tent, 'within curtains,' 2 Samuel vii. 2: if so, what are we to understand by its being called a Temple, 1 Samuel i. 9, with sleeping chambers, iii. 9, and 'doors,' iii. 15?"

The passages in 1 Samuel i. 9, iii. 3, are the only ones in the history where the tabernacle is called a "temple." The structure at Shiloh was probably of a more fixed and durable character than that on Zion of which David speaks in 2 Sam. vii. 2. The ark was in Shiloh for nearly 300 years, and during that time the tabernacle had become surrounded with priests' dwellings and offices. There is, therefore, no incongruity in calling it "temple" ("great house" or "palace"). As constructed on a framework of wood, it would naturally have "doors" (a different word, it should be noted, from the "door"—probably "entrance"—of the tabernacle, in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers). After the destruction of this tabernacle, the dwelling-place of the ark was more decidedly a temporary one (but see Psalm v. 7), and even with regard to its comparatively substantial abode, Shiloh, the words of 2 Samuel vii. 6 held good: "I have not dwelt in a house since the day that I brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt even to this day, but have walked in a tent and in a tabernacle."

FORGIVENESS.

AN ENQUIRER AFTER TRUTH asks: "'If thy brother trespass against thee, rebuke him; and if he repent, forgive him; and if he trespass against thee seven times in a day, and seven times in a day turn again to thee, saying, I repent; thou shalt forgive him.' Luke xvii. 3, 4. This text teaches us to forgive those who have injured us, if they repent and come to us for forgiveness, but does not call upon us to forgive them until they have asked for forgiveness, and this view is supported by the fact that God only grants pardon after repentance. How can the universally preached doctrine, that Christians must forgive their enemies under any and all circumstances, be reconciled with this plain text, and God's method of dealing with sinners?"

We would rather say, Cherish a forgiving spirit. Forgive, of course, if your offending brother repents and asks for pardon, but do not think it necessary to wait for this. Be ready to offer forgiveness. If it is not accepted, i.e., if there is no repentance, the act of forgiveness cannot be complete, although the forgiving disposition remains. Our correspondent usefully draws attention to the loose way in which the subject is sometimes spoken of, in forgetfulness that all complete forgiveness implies two parties, one who bestows, the other who receives. To forgive is more than to abstain from punishment: it implies reconciliation. "Holiness," says Professor Godet on the above passage, "begins with rebuking: then, when the rebuke has once been taken, love pardons. The pardon to be granted to our brethren has no other limit than their repenting and the confession by which it is expressed."

THE CHILDREN'S PRAYER.

NOW, little boys and girls, I am going to tell you about something that happened just a few weeks ago to three children living with a friend of mine.

I must first tell you that they were born in China, and that their parents are there now; but the children have come across the sea to England to be brought up here instead of in the Chinese climate, which would make them so delicate, that if they stayed out there they would never grow up to be strong men.

Peveril, the eldest, is nine. He was named after Mount Peveril, near Hong-Kong, because he was the first English child ever born there. Armine is eight, and Pelham five. These three children went to church a few Sundays ago, and listened very attentively to the sermon, which was so simply explained, that even little Pelham could understand every word. The preacher chose the story of Sennacherib and Hezekiah. You will find it in the xix. and xx. chapters of the II. Kings. He told how the king of Assyria came down with his host to fight against the king of Judah, and that Hezekiah, trusting in God, was saved, both he and his people; while an angel slew the enemies in their own camp.

Peveril was deeply interested in all this. He had learnt the poem beginning—

"The Assyrian came down like a wolf on the fold," and had often said it to his younger brothers. He then heard about Hezekiah laying Sennacherib's letter before the Lord in the temple; and the preacher asked all the congregation to take this thought home, and each, knowing his own secret need or care, to lay it before the Father in Heaven, and await His answer. He did not say we always get just the answer we think best, because it often happens that the prayer we make, if granted in our way, would not really turn out to be a blessing, but God, who can see the end of all things, will, if we trust Him, send the right and best to us.

The children thought over what they had heard; and that night, when the lady who takes care of them went up to hear them say their prayers, she was greeted with a cry from the three little boys.

"Oh, Sissy!" said Armine, "we have thought of such a jolly plan. We have been laying our wants before the Lord, as the clergyman told us; and look, we have hung up our stockings to hold what we have asked for. Peveril wants some stamps for his collection; I want a paint-box to paint some pictures for father and mother, and Pelham wants a box of soldiers."

Sissy sat down on one of the beds.

"My dear boys," she said, "I am very glad you understood the meaning of the sermon; but there is something deeper in it you did not quite understand. If we ask Him, God will send what we need in life, not what we want in the way of pleasure. If He does not give us what we wish, it is not because He turns away from us, but because we can do without these things. He does not always consider them necessary to our happiness. We may be better without them. However, Christmas is near, and who knows but that on that morning I may not fill the stockings with what you desire?"

For a moment the children were silent, then Pelham cried—

"Sissy, I am sure the soldiers will come."

The next morning the Chinese mail brought a letter for Peveril. This was always a great delight to the children, for their mother, who was a very clever artist, used to enclose all kinds of sketches she had made during the week to amuse her dear boys, separated from her by a distance of 12,000 miles. As Peveril opened the letter a hundred-and-twenty-seven rare stamps from all countries fell out, addressed to him. And then fell out a cheque for 10*s*. from their father, who said in the letter, "This 10*s*. is to buy the playthings my little boys like best."

"God heard us!" cried the children; "we can get our toys after all."

It was a most remarkable fact, that this was the first time their father had sent them any money, or stamps; and that that letter, although written in Hong-Kong six weeks previously, should have arrived by the first post after the offering up of their simple prayer.

Now I am not telling you this, so that every time you want a toy you may pray for it; and perhaps, not receiving it, imagine that God will not hear you; but because it shows that even very little children can understand what it is to lay their wants before God, and to ask Him to bless them. You may not require paint-boxes or stamps, but something quite different—something much more important—for the life of the soul; then just do as these boys did, and ask God for it. And if it is really needful, though you may have to wait a long time for it, God whose will hearken to you, as he did to Hezekiah.

"Good is better than our best,"

EDITH PRINCE.

EXPECTED GIFTS.

SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

1. To what circumstances do the Scriptures trace the origin of the Sabbath?

2. What is the first instance of a difference made between the Sabbath and other days?

3. Besides the Fourth Commandment, what express law forbids work on the Sabbath?

4. What example is there of its violation being punished?

5. In the institution of the Sabbath was there any other object than securing time for the worship of God?

6. What exception was there to the law referred to in question 3, and what allusion does our Saviour make to it?

7. Is there any example of our Lord being present at a feast on the Sabbath day?

8. Give examples showing how the Pharisees strained the law with regard to the Sabbath?

9. What was Jesus' general answer to these restrictions?

10. Mention passages in the prophets in which the Israelites are encouraged to observe the Sabbath, and threatened with severe penalties for violating it.

11. Find an instance in which a prince of Israel took great pains to enforce the observance of the Sabbath.

12. Show from the Scriptures that the Jews assembled for worship on the Sabbath, both in Judæa and in other countries.

13. For what great reason did Christians begin to observe the first day of the week?

14. Is it likely that Jewish Christians gave up at once the observance of the seventh day?

15. Show from the Scriptures that Christians assembled for worship on the first day of the week, or in other ways kept the day holy.

Monthly Religious Record.

CANON TAYLOR'S paper on Mohammedanism, read at the last Church Congress, has given rise to a long and animated controversy. The statistical question is of far subordinate moment to the moral one. Christianity does not become stronger by magnifying its own successes, or by declining to recognise the force of the powers arrayed against it. On the same ground, if there be any virtue in Islam, by all means let us know it; but let us not fall into the fatal error of tolerating evil that good may come. Mr. Joseph Thomson, whose travels give him some claim to be heard, asserts that the advantage is on the side of Mohammedanism in East Africa, on the ground that it imposes a check on the accursed traffic in ardent spirits. Of Western Africa and the Central Soudan he draws a more vigorous picture: "Here we have Islam as a living, active force, full of the fire and energy of its early days, proselytizing too with much of the marvellous success which characterized its early days. Here we have it preached equally in the streets of Sierra Leone and among the debased cannibal tribes of the Niger basin. With the disingenuousness which makes them attempt to fasten the evils of the slave trade upon Islam, the defenders of the Christian faith seek with might and main to minimize and distort the facts about the success of Islam in Western Central Africa. Unable to recognize any good except it comes through orthodox channels, they seek to describe its advance as a terrible calamity and unmixed evil to the African." Mr. Thomson accordingly protests against the notion that it is propagated only by fire and sword. "In these latter years," he says, "the chief agent in the spread of Islam has been, as I have already remarked, the Hausa or Nupé trader. Protected by the sanctity of his business, the negro merchant penetrates into every tribe within hundreds of miles of his own home. He mixes with the barbarous pagan as one of like blood with himself; he sleeps in the same house, he eats the same food. Everywhere he carries his religion with him, its great central features unobscured by unthinkable and transcendental dogmas. He has just so much of doctrine as his pagan brother can understand and assimilate. The trader remains a month, or it may be six months, or a year. During that time he is admired for his fine clothes, and the people around begin to ape him. They see nothing which they may not hope to aspire to; there is nothing in his religion they do not understand. In this manner have the seeds of civilization and Islam been scattered broadcast among numerous savage tribes, till the land resounds with the inspiring din of a hundred industries, and morning, noon, and evening rises the watchword of Islam, and knees which were formerly bent to stocks and stones now bend before the One God, and lips which have quivered with enjoyment over the flesh of a brother man are employed to acknowledge His greatness and compassionateness."

It would add to the weight of Mr. Thomson's argument if he would specify localities where these changes have been wrought. As to his own view: "It may appear," he says, "that I think Mohammedanism is a more suitable religion for the African than Christianity. Far be from me the thought. I am prepared to say, however, that it is more suited to the African than Christianity as taught. 'By their fruits ye shall know them.' Applying that rule to Africa, there can be no denying the fact that Mohammedanism has immeasurably the best of it. What are the petty results of over three hundred years of Christian contact, as shown on the West Coast of Africa, compared with the immense civilizing work of the reviled religion in the Central and Western Soudan? . . . Till the missionary learns the necessity of not preaching from his level, but of getting down to the savage's, he will never make any permanent headway; he can but produce a veneer. No one is a more sincere admirer of the missionary than I; no one knows better the noble lives of many, the singleness of purpose with which they pursue the course they think the only true one. They seem to me the best and truest heroes which this nineteenth century has produced. Nobody has more reason to speak well of them than I, and rejoice that they have spread over the waste places of the earth. In the heart of the Dark Continent I have been received as a brother. I have been relieved when I was destitute, I have been nursed when I was half dead, and time after time I have been sent on my weary way rejoicing that there is such a profession of men as Christian missionaries. I have not a word to say against the men; I simply attack their methods, believing that they might yet not only rival the success of Mohammedanism, but far exceed it." So far Mr. Thomson. It is well sometimes to see with another's eyes. But it must not be forgotten that his experience does not count more than a tithe of the years of other men who have testified to the blighting influences of the Mohammedan's fatalistic creed, and the degradation and cruelty to which it ministers. We hope to return to this subject in a future month.

MEANWHILE, Mr. Eugene Stock has published a comprehensive reply on points raised in this controversy, touching the action of the missionary societies. As to the character of Mohammedanism, he quotes Mr. Palgrave as "facile princeps among authorities on Arabia." That accomplished traveller says: "Results are the test of systems, and narrowness of mind, frightful corruption, or rather extinction of morality, cruel or desolating wars on the frontiers,—within, endless discord in all its forms, family social and civil; convulsive fanaticism, alternating with lethargic torpor; transient vigour, followed by long and irremediable decay. Such is the general history of Mohammedan Governments and races." Again: "When the Koran and Mecca shall have disappeared from Arabia, then and then only, can we seriously expect to see the Arabs assume that place in the work of civilisation, from which Mahomed and his book have more than any other individual cause long held men back."

MR. WALTER, M.P., speaking at Reading, at a meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, said it would be a petty and unstatesmanlike ambition that desired the daughter churches, which shall grow up in other lands, to be exact counterparts of their mother. "The future of Christendom," he said, "may well be left to the moulding of the Divine Spirit which animates it, and it is ours to believe that while many of the standards to which we cling, bearing as they do on their front the stamp of local controversies long ago composed, will find no place in the system of younger churches. The very diversities of creed which now separate Christians may, in the nations which are not yet converted, find their solution in a Christianity containing all that is necessary for Catholic unity, and while bearing abundant signs of its origin, will be adapted to the thoughts and yearnings of the people who cling to it."

DURING the closing months of the year several batches of missionaries sailed for remote spheres of labour. The usual valedictory services were held, but the missionary's outgoing is now very different to what it was in earlier days. Here is a passage from a letter penned near Port Said:—"Our ship's company is in itself a 'sign of the times.' It is certainly most remarkable, probably quite unique. Out of 150 passengers in the saloons, no less than fifty—one full third—are leaving home in the service of the King. Of these, twenty-four are going to India, twenty-three to China, and three to Palestine. Arranged according to societies, the list stands thus:—C. M. S., including 'Winter Mission,' 22; China Inland, 10; English Presbyterian, 5; American Presbyterian, 2; Free Church of Scotland, 2; S. P. G., 3; Baptist Missionary Society, 2; British and Foreign Bible Society, 2; Mildmay, 1; Private, 1. From the first moment of sailing it was manifest that a deep spirit of union and communion pervaded the missionary band, and our excellent commander has most kindly arranged that we may have frequent opportunities of meeting together for conference and prayer. Twice every day we assemble by regular appointment: each morning at 11 o'clock for the shortened Church of England service in the larger saloon; and each evening at 8.15 for a prayer meeting, at which any present heartily unite: and never surely were Sunday services more blessed or more truly means of grace than those which we have been permitted to enjoy. And, besides all this, there are frequent little gatherings of four or five together, just as many as one cabin will hold."

THE consecration of Truro Cathedral was an event which attracted attention far beyond the boundaries of Cornwall. It was signalised by the presence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and a goodly array of bishops; and the Prince of Wales, as Duke of Cornwall, was one of the great gathering that celebrated the occasion. Not less significant is the fact, that in a diocese so remote, more than 100,000*l.* has already been expended on the building.

THE Wesleyan Mission, now in full operation in Regent Street and its neighbourhood, is a striking indication of the disposition to adopt new and more aggressive methods of evangelisation. In Manchester the transformation of one of the old chapels into a new centre of activity has been productive of great good. In London this effort to establish a mission in the heart of the west has long been a subject of anxious consideration. A commencement was made by securing St. James's Hall for Sunday services, under the direction of the Rev. Mark Guy Pearse and the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes. The innovations include both string and brass bands. The sermons and addresses given have varied in style and subject, and included topics of present day interest, with the aim to present the teachings of Christ in their application to social as well as personal needs. Large assemblies have gathered, including many who might otherwise have attended no place of worship, and every Sunday many have come forward professing their desire to begin a religious life. During the week the adjacent Wardour Hall is utilised, by the concurrence of the Congregationalists, for various religious meetings. Every Saturday evening there is a free concert. The schoolroom beneath is now opened as a dining-room for working-men. In addition, a house has been taken as a home for the lady workers; another is to be set apart for the men engaged in the mission. A vigorous organisation is being prepared; and it will be used in patient and prayerful effort, not only to arouse the thousands from indifference, but to grapple with the vices which make this district their headquarters.

THE Bishop of Liverpool, at a recent Diocesan Conference, said the clergy would do well to press on their people the immense harm which is being done by the betting habits of the present day. "I might say something," he went on, "about the subject of lotteries and raffles at bazaars. I doubt alike their legality and propriety; but I spare you. The evil that I have in view is far more serious. I refer to betting on horse races. No man can take up a newspaper in this age without noticing the large amount of space and good type which betting occupies. It is a bad sign; and the constant increase of it bodes mischief. Whether racing is abstractly wicked, and whether it encourages the breed of horses, are questions which I shall not stop to discuss. But I am quite certain that thousands bet on races who hardly know a horse's head from its tail, from a gambling spirit, and a morbid, restless love of excitement, and a secret hope that they may suddenly make a fortune without steady, quiet working. I charge my clergy to remember this matter in their sermons. I ask the laity to assist them by sternly discouraging betting and gambling among their servants, clerks, assistants, or employés of any kind. I could not blame any merchant, banker, or tradesman, if he laid down a rule never to keep a betting man in his establishment. I believe the last day will show that to many a young man betting has been the first downward step to loss of character, loss of place, loss of happiness, and loss of soul."

AN International Convention has been signed at the Hague by the delegates of England, France, Belgium, Denmark, Germany, and Holland, which prohibits the sale or barter of spirits to fishermen and other persons on board fishing vessels. Other boats will have in future to be licensed by the Government of their own country for the sale of other articles. Thus an effectual check will be put on the "copers," which have so long been a source of deadly mischief in the North Sea. We may hope that this change will remove many temptations, and strengthen the hands of those who are labouring for the spiritual good of the men.

DR. BARNARDO, returning from Canada, reports strongly in favour of emigration. In an address giving some account of his experiences, he said, they had now sent out 2683 boys and girls to Canada, and they were nearly all doing well. Only 19 had failed, which meant that 99½ out of every 100 had succeeded. They sent no children that were not, by their conduct, character, and physique, calculated to become good and useful citizens of the country of their adoption. When he thought of Canada with its millions of fair acres, and of London with its thousands of destitute, he could only ask in astonishment, what can the nation be about not to help in a downright noble fashion the work of emigration? As an illustration of the large number of waifs in London, he mentioned that from January 1st last year to the 7th November, 4861 made applications to be admitted into the homes. Of this number 1458 only could be taken in. Returning to the emigration question, he said that one of the developments of their scheme involved the obtaining of a large tract of country in Manitoba. They had secured 4700 acres of the fairest land in Canada for their industrial farm. That was to be their new settlement-colony—Victoria Regina. As illustrations of what can be done by men who will really work, he instanced two very remarkable cases. The first was of the Prime Minister of Manitoba, who began life there as a boy to do odd jobs in a bishop's house, and the other was one of his own lads, who went out in 1878, and has now, or will have by the end of the year, a homestead of 320 acres, several droves of cattle, a team of horses, and the necessary agricultural implements. After meeting persons of all shades of social condition, he found that the only persons opposed to emigration were the mechanics and labourers in the large cities. A large amount of injudicious emigration had taken place that caused great dissatisfaction.

THE Salvation Army appealed recently for volunteers. In response no fewer than 2124 young men and women offered themselves, of whom 1194 were willing to go on foreign service. General Booth explained that service abroad meant "begging their bread, going barefoot, and enduring all manner of dangers." He told the story of a captain sent to open up a new town to the Army. Each "corps" is expected to be self-supporting, by the contributions of its members towards the general expenses and the maintenance of the officers. This young woman was not immediately successful, and being firmly determined not to apply to any fellow officers or to headquarters for financial aid, she was in danger of starvation. In this extremity she went daily into the fields, cut a supply of grass, took it to her humble lodging, boiled it, and, eked out with a very small modicum of bread, existed on this diet only for five weeks! Success came at last.

A CALEDONIAN Christian Club has been founded in London (in Southampton Street), as the headquarters of a permanent mission to Scotchmen in London. Gaelic and English services are held for Highlanders, and every facility provided for social intercourse and co-operation in Christian work.

THE sudden death of Sir William McArthur, while travelling on the Metropolitan Railway, has removed a layman of conspicuous worth. His year of mayoralty was remarkable for the Christian and philanthropic influence exerted from the Mansion House. Dr. Rigg, in the course of a funeral address, said that in Parliament Sir William was known and esteemed for twenty years as a Christian man. But he never merged his Christianity in his party. It ought not to be forgotten that it was through his advocacy that Fiji was saved from being a prey to anarchy and annexed to the English nation. He referred to his work among the Methodists of Ireland; his labours on behalf of the College at Belfast; for the work of Methodist Union; for the Thanksgiving Fund; and for the provision for worn-out ministers. To the William McArthur Hall, in Belfast, for the superior education of girls, he had contributed 10,000*l.*, besides 5000*l.* as a provision in aid of ministers' daughters. In many other ways his zeal and generosity rendered abiding service. Speaking of his many engagements, Dr. Rigg remarked that he had often wondered how he had been enabled to keep himself, amidst all, in touch with His Father in heaven. He ascribed it in a great measure to the calm, peaceful, and quiet Sabbath days that he spent in his home.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

BY EVELYN E. GREEN, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S BROTHERS," ETC.

ROGER POINTED TO A PASSAGE MARKED BY A PENCIL LINE.

CHAPTER IX.—BROTHER AND SISTER.

"YOU have had a hot walk, Roger," said Joan, standing in the shadows of the cool hall as her brother came in from the sunny glare without.

"Yes," he answered rather shortly, "I suppose it is hot."

This shortness of manner was habitual. It did not imply any particular irritation at the moment. He had a very different countenance from his sister, although there was a considerable similarity of feature. His was a saturnine face, full of hard cynicism, not unmixed with covetous rapacity: an unpleasant face, despite many traces of latent intellect and power. Just now, perhaps, it was more unprepossessing than was its wont, for its owner had considerable command of countenance and could smooth his face to a very different expression if he desired to do so; but at this moment he was moved by feelings of a somewhat malevolent character. The train of thought in which he had been indulging had been one to stir up the worst side of his nature. Joan looked at him steadily and saw at once that something had occurred to excite him. He was too self-contained to be visibly roused for no adequate cause.

"Something has happened," she said.

"Yes," was the laconic rejoinder.

"What is it?"

"You shall see for yourself."

He took from his pocket a newspaper, already many days old, and pointed with a thin finger to a passage marked by a pencil line.

Joan read the following words:

"On the 6th inst., at the Hermitage, Market Drayton, Alicia Maud, widow of the late Marcus Stratford, aged 48."

Joan looked up quickly.

"Cousin Alicia!" she said, and lapsed into silence.

It was fifteen years since she had seen this relative of hers, and she had been but a child when cousin Alicia had been to her as a beneficent fairy, as well as a friend and confidante to her mother, yet her tenacious mind retained all these early impressions with peculiar accuracy, and a tear gathered very slowly in her eyes, startling her into a sort of surprise. It was so very, very long since she had known what it was to be moved to tears, and even now, though the drops gathered, they did not fall. She kept her eyes bent on the paper that Roger should not see.

"How did you find it out?"

"I saw it accidentally in the paper."

Joan looked at him with a sort of questioning, intentness. She knew his face well, and saw that he had some purpose in his mind that she did not fathom. There was a subdued excitement and exultation, not unmixed with malignity in his look, that she was certain sprang from some settled purpose the nature of which she could not at present understand.

"What is it, Roger?" she asked.

He looked at her with a subdued smile.

"What is what?" he asked with an enigmatic expression, anything but beautiful to see.

"You seem pleased and elated by cousin Alicia's death. What possible advantage can you hope to reap from it?"

Still the same look, half of exultation, half of malignant triumph.

"That remains to be proved," he said quietly, "possibly none."

Joan pondered a moment. She knew her brother well, and soon leaped to a conclusion.

"I suppose you think it possible that she has left some money to father or to you?"

Roger shook his head, the gloom and scorn deepening on his face.

"I know better than that," he said.

"Ah, I remember!" said Joan, clearly and distinctly. "Cousin Alicia surrendered in her lifetime to father such of her husband's fortune as remained to her after the crash. Not one in a thousand would have been so generous, so high-minded."

"She behaved well then, I admit—very well; but what has been her attitude towards us since?"

"We have seen nothing of her—she married again soon afterwards, did she not?"

"Yes, and cut the connection with us entirely. I presume we were not grand enough for her when she got into 'county society';" and Roger sneered. "I often think we made a great mistake in letting go our hold upon her so easily."

"I do not see how you could have helped it, if cousin Alicia ceased to care for our acquaintance."

"We might have kept a hold on her nevertheless, and I wish now that we had done so. An acquaintance with the Stratfords, of Drayton, might be of great value to me. The boy would have been the connecting link, for our father is his guardian, although she adopted him as her own son. When she married again, we were so afraid of having the boy cast upon our hands, that we were glad enough to let the matter slide; but I am sorry now we did so, for she never had a child of her own, and this boy has been brought up, I hear, as her son and heir—a brat who ought to have been turned over to the workhouse!"

"You mean little Roy," said Joan calmly; "a child barely three years old when ruin and disgrace fell upon his father. What had he done that he should suffer for it?"

"What have we done ourselves? Yet do we not suffer for it every hour of the day? I like to see some kind of justice. If Alicia wished to befriend the deserving, why has she done nothing for our poor children?"

The contrast between the expression of brother and sister at this moment was very marked. The man's face looked bitter, harsh, full of greed and hatred, as if the hidden secrets of a soul, stained and tainted with one of the most degrading sins, were looking out from his narrow, eager eyes. Joan gazed at him with a calm steadiness, not without a touch of scorn, and there was something lofty in her glance, and in the pose of her head, and perfect tranquillity of manner, that seemed to raise her to a level unspeakably higher than his.

"If you and your wife had a hundred thousand pounds left you to-morrow, do you suppose it would make any single alteration in the manner of our life? I doubt it."

Roger was silent; but his eyes glistened at the bare mention of such a sum of money.

"If we had a hundred thousand pounds," he repeated slowly, dwelling with a curious satisfaction on the words, "it would not matter how we lived. We should know that we had power and happiness in our hands. What more should we want than that?"

"Knowledge would doubtless be enough for you," answered Joan. "Starvation itself would become palatable in the consciousness that you could afford to eat gold if you had a mind to do so."

He did not detect the covert satire of the tone.

"And to feel that it was growing—growing—growing all the time—increasing year by year! That in time it would become a colossal fortune—something fabulous, unheard of! Ah, life would be worth the living then!"

The curve of Joan's lips became a little more pronounced; but she said nothing. Roger came back from the region of dreams to that of realities with a darkening and contraction of his whole face.

"Why are we wasting time in idle talk?" he said impatiently. "I must go and speak about this to my wife. I must tell our father too."

"Will you wish to attend the funeral?" asked Joan, with another touch of undetected satire.

Roger started as if struck by a sudden thought, and looked again at the date of the paper.

"Too late," he said, with an air akin to disappointment. "This paper is a week old already. Otherwise it might not have been a bad idea. We might have learned all that way."

"All what?"

Roger was silent for a few minutes, and then he said, as if to himself—"We should have heard the will read. Not but what one pretty well knows its provisions. She has no children of her own."

Joan began to see what he was driving at.

"You mean that she will leave her property to Roy?"

"To the son of the man who worked such ruin to his house and kindred—yes."

"That was no fault of Roy's."

Roger sneered a cruel sneer.

"Possibly not. Yet it does not fall to the lot of every swindler's son to be adopted by a wealthy relative, and live in the lap of luxury. Sometimes the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children."

Joan was silent, turning things over in her mind; when Roger spoke it was more to himself than to her.

"Certainly some inquiry should be set on foot. Now is the time when it would be perfectly natural for my father to come forward. He gave up his guardianship to Alicia, but upon her death it is the most natural thing for him to claim it. I must speak to my wife and talk it over. If it will be to our advantage, the chance should not slip."

He moved slowly away towards one of the rooms opening off the hall, whilst Joan remained standing there wrapt in thought. She remembered her little cousin Roy, as a laughing, prattling child of about three years old, with curly bright hair, and winning ways that made him a favourite wherever he went. By this time he must be nearly eighteen. She wondered what he was like now, whether the pleasant life he had presumably led with the aunt, who had been as a mother to him, had been as bright and free from care as Roger evidently pictured; whether the wealth that seemed to those about her so much to be desired, really brought with it the happiness it was supposed to do. Had Roy's life been cloudless and sunny? Was he altogether ignorant of the sense of care and toil and weariness that often weighed upon her own spirit, till she was ready to loathe the world and all it contained? How was it that his lot was so bright, and theirs so dark? Was there not after all some cruel injustice in it? To his father they owed all their misfortunes. Was it not a little hard, then, that all the suffering and privation should fall upon them, whilst he lived his butterfly life in the midst of luxury and pleasure? She had heard from time to time of him. Her father and brother always kept an eye upon the lad, and she knew that he was living in the next county in his step-father's house, accepted everywhere as Mrs. Stratford's son by a first marriage. She was familiar with the outline of his history, but until to-day it had never occurred to her to contrast his lot with her own, or to think of him as the son of the man to whom they owed all their troubles. He had been her cousin Alicia's adopted child, and she had not thought with any bitterness of his smooth and easy lot in life.

But there was something a little hard in her eyes to-day as she gazed across the sunny moor in the direction where, behind a distant ridge of hills, lay the pleasant place that was Roy's home. She did not wish him ill as her brother did; she even felt a lurking tenderness for him as connected with the only part of her life, so far as she could remember, that had not been altogether hard and sordid; but she felt as if he ought to know that the suffering he had been spared, by the fondness of Mrs. Edington, had fallen upon others, and that they had had to bear a burden from which he had escaped.

"I should like to see him again," she said to herself. "I think I should be glad for him to come here and see what our life is like. I wonder how it would strike him. At least there would be a sort of justice in it. I like justice when one can get it—it is not often."

CHAPTER X.—A CONFERENCE.

It was not very long before Joan followed her brother into the apartment, known by courtesy as the drawing-room, in which his wife was generally to be found at this hour. It was not a badly-proportioned room in itself, and might easily have been made home-like by the exercise of a little taste and the outlay of a little money; but as it was, it shared the general character of the home, both without and within, and was untidy, not too clean, and very distinctly uncomfortable. Mrs. Roger Edington was at work, cutting out some warm blue serge frocks for her daughters, and the carpet was strewn with odds and ends of material and lining. The husband's entrance had interrupted her task, and she stood now with the newspaper in her hand, looking from it to her husband with a good deal of concentration of purpose visible in her aspect. Caroline Edington was rather a handsome woman, yet her face was decidedly unpleasing, hard and cold and unsympathetic. Evidence of a strong will was visible in every line and in every gesture. It was as a saying in the neighbourhood that, however unyielding Roger Edington might show himself abroad, it was the wife who ruled at home.

No notice was taken of Joan on her entrance. She was regarded by brother and sister-in-law as a mere household drudge, very useful in looking after the children, and in giving them such education as was deemed necessary; useful too in waiting upon her father, and saving the time and steps of the hard-worked servant girls; but she was so silent, so apparently indifferent, so submissive and quiet, that they never regarded her presence as any barrier to conversation. It was doubtful, they thought, if she so much as noticed what went on. She took up the scissors her sister-in-law had dropped, and resumed the work of cutting out in quietly mechanical fashion.

"It is just this, Caroline," Roger was saying, "that if, as we have sometimes said, it was a mistake on our part to sever the connection so completely, now is the time to make a change. My father waived his rights in favour of the boy's aunt who had adopted him; but at her death he would, almost as a matter of course, resume his suspended guardianship. I don't know much about the Stratford family, but the chances are they will be glad enough to be quit of the boy; and as Alicia had a very pretty little fortune of her own and no children of her own to leave it to, you may be sure Roy will eventually come into every penny of it. He may be worth cultivating, and—probably there will be a handsome provision for his minority."

"Possibly; but one would like to make sure of it," answered Caroline thoughtfully. "I must consider what would be best. I must say I think it is time we made acquaintance with the boy. In Alicia's lifetime it was impracticable, she was so set against us all, particularly against me; but the connection might be of value later on. If Mildred is ever to get out in the world, we shall have to think, in a few years' time, of introducing her into society and getting her married. If that is ever to be done satisfactorily we must do what we can to get into a somewhat different set. These Stratfords, you say, are county people? Are they well off?"

"I do not know. Birth and wealth do not always go together. I could easily find out, though."

"Roy will have money in any case, and Mildred is going to turn out a handsome girl——"

An impatient, sneering look crossed Roger's face.

"I want to get something more tangible and certain out of this boy's money than a possible love match. His father ruined us, and yet he is to be rich and prosperous. I think of justice—women of nothing but sentiment. I thought you had more sense, Caroline."

Caroline's face was sufficiently scornful.

"I think of full as many things as you do, Roger. You may be quite sure I shall turn to account everything in turn. If this lad comes here, either on a visit or as a permanent resident during his minority, he shall be made very clearly to understand that it is due to his father's fraud that we live a life so different from anything he has known. We all know how Alicia is likely to have brought up the boy; what strained notions of honour he is likely to have if he has at all profited by her instruction and example. She gave up a good slice of her fortune once because she fancied her husband had been slightly involved in responsibility. History sometimes repeats itself. Possibly, if Roy is dexterously handled, he too may make some sacrifice when he comes into his fortune. Or, failing his power to touch capital, he may be ready, if it is cunningly suggested, to do something handsome for one of the boys, or to make himself of use to us in other ways. It is always something to have any sort of claim upon a rich man. If Roy is going to be rich we had better lose no time in making his acquaintance."

Roger looked with some admiration at his wife. Yet he was hardly satisfied yet. He was at once rapacious and vindictive. He longed to reap some immediate gain from the power he possessed, and he hated the boy for his father's sake. His wife saw this very plainly, and smiled with a sort of cool scorn.

"If you do not take care, you will spoil everything, Roger. Nothing will answer if you cannot control yourself and are always showing your hand. You can be clever and crafty enough under ordinary circumstances; why be weak here? I know the thought of that bitter disappointment affects you more than anything else, but we shall never retrieve that. The only thing is now to make the best of what remains."

Roger threw himself half sullenly into a chair.

"What do you wish me to do?"

"I am turning that point over in my mind. I think the best thing will be wait a few weeks, until Alicia's death is a little less recent, and then go over and reconnoitre; make Roy's acquaintance, and see what kind of people the Stratfords are. We must act with a little caution in the first instance."

"The Stratfords may not care to receive me. I do not belong to their world, and for aught I know Alicia may have prejudiced them against me."

"That is true. I think the best thing to do would be to stay a little while at the nearest town, try to meet Roy as it were accidentally, and appear to be taken by surprise at the encounter with an unknown kinsman. You could tell him you knew his mother (I believe he thinks himself her son, and you had better not undeceive him at first), and you will soon see by his manner if he distrusts you or not. If he does, you must conciliate him as far as you can, and be very careful not to breathe a word about the guardianship or anything that might alarm or annoy him; if he does not, you will most likely be admitted to the house and can see what things are like there. But do not seem to have gone on purpose, let all appear in the first instance quite accidental. After your visit, when we can better judge of results, we can decide what will be best for us to do."

"I must make out how the boy has been left?"

"By all means, if you can, but not by any forced demand to see the will. Above all things we must not appear mercenary. You are not the boy's guardian, you know, and as the meeting is professedly accidental, you cannot go charged with your father's authority. Get it quietly out of Roy after you have made friends with him, and mind you do make friends. Do not spoil everything by betraying your irrational antipathy. If we are to get him here, it must be by his own free will."

"That is hardly likely to be possible."

"Why not? He will not know by instinct that this house is what it is. Don't talk much about it, make friends quietly and go quietly away. If, as is very likely, he is not much wanted at his former home after his mother's death, an invitation here later on, and the feeling that he has relations of his own, will be very welcome."

"But, on the other hand, he may be very thick with these Stratfords. He has been brought up amongst them and they may be fond of one another. Of course, if he were an encumbrance, a poor relation, it would be different, but as he has money it is quite likely that they will be more than willing to keep him and make much of him."

"Yes, that is true perhaps, and the way he is treated at home will be a very good index as to his position in the world. If you find him on these affectionate terms with his relatives, you must do what you can to weaken that bond a little. You will see best on the spot what line to take, but I am not afraid of your not finding a way of making mischief when once you have a fair field before you. Try to sow suspicion in his mind; do what you can to weaken the Stratford influence, so that when the time comes to push our claim further, it will not be very unwelcome."

At this point Joan gathered up her work and slowly quitted the room. She went quietly up the stairs, and entered a small low-ceiled room lined with books, tenanted by a silver-haired old man of feeble appearance, who was intent upon a large volume open on the table before him. Ever since the crash that had robbed him of expected wealth, Andrew Edington had ceased to take any active interest in life, and had become a nonentity in his own house. Books were his one resource, the society of his only daughter his one solace. His son and daughter-in-law ruled him with a rod of iron, and he never attempted to dispute their sway. In his time he had been a hard man, consumed by an overmastering desire for wealth. Perhaps it was a sort of retributive justice that now in his old age, when the shock of a terrible disappointment had unhinged his health and broken the force of the ruling passion, that hardness and coldness should be his portion from the hands of his son, and that his own life should be made more dreary and desolate from that very spirit of hoarding and money-loving that had once been his own consuming passion.

Joan came to him now with the story she had just heard. She told him all and asked eagerly: "Shall you ever claim your right over Roy, father? You know Roger can do nothing without you. Shall you let them bring him here to despoil him? Would it not be very cruel?"

"Alicia dead—poor Alicia, I was fond of her once," said the old man absently. "And so she is gone, and Hubert's boy is left, is he? I loved Hubert once, till he deceived me and ruined us all—poor Hubert, he died too. He never got over it. Ah, yes; I remember the boy now—I gave him up to poor Alicia, and now she is dead. I suppose I ought to look after him now. Roger must see to it."

"But if he is happy where he is, why should you trouble about it? Caroline and Roger will not want to make him happy. They only want to get something by it."

"Well, well, my dear, Roger knows best. Roger and Caroline will decide. Hubert did us all a great deal of harm, and if his boy can do us some good, so much the better: I do not quite see how it can be, but Roger understands. We had better leave everything in his hands."

Joan said no more. She did not know what had prompted this half appeal, for she was conscious of a great wish to see Roy again—for some break in the dreary monotony of her life. She had felt nevertheless impelled to make this half intercession, yet she was almost glad it had proved ineffectual.

THE IMPOSSIBILITY OF PLEASING GOD WITHOUT FAITH.

BY THE REV. JOHN MONRO GIBSON, D.D.

"Without faith it is impossible to please God." Heb. xi. 6.

THERE are some who think this is a hard saying. Why should God insist so much on faith (they say) when there are so many other virtues of greater consequence? If a man is honest and sober, temperate, chaste, and generally virtuous, and withal amiable and kind—is not that enough? They feel as if a slight were put on all the standard virtues, by singling out faith as if it were the one thing needful. Notice, however, that it is not said that honesty does not please God, that sobriety does not please Him, that general virtue does not please Him. These things do please Him most decidedly, and He is most deeply displeased with the want of them. But while God is pleased with honesty in a man, He is not pleased with the man simply because he is honest. If a man be sober, God is pleased with that, not necessarily with the man. You may have a watch which is genuine gold, and as such it pleases you. It may be handsome in its general appearance, and there again it pleases you. It may be delicate in its construction; it may be richly jewelled; and in many other ways it may give you satisfaction. But all these good things may be true of it, and yet it may fail to keep good time; and, if so, it is quite reasonable that, while you admire the many excellences that may be discovered in the watch, you are displeased with it upon the whole. Distinguish then, if you please, between things in a man's character and life being pleasing to God, and the man himself being pleasing to God. You will observe from the connection that it is the man himself that is spoken of here, for it is after what is said concerning a man (Enoch), that "he pleased God," that the general statement is made, "without faith it is impossible to please Him."

This is the consistent testimony of Scripture throughout. Sometimes indeed one hears passages quoted to show that faith is not so essential as is generally supposed; but it will always be found that in these passages faith is included, though the word "faith" may not be mentioned. Take for example the oft-quoted passage from Micah: "What doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" Now we admit that a man might "do justly" without faith; he might "love mercy" without faith; but can he "walk humbly with his God" without faith? Certainly not. Even according to the standard here given by the prophet Micah, which is considered as simple as any standard of living to be found in the whole Bible, it remains true that "without faith it is impossible to please God."

As has already been said, there are not a few who regard this as unreasonable. They think that there are so many virtues of so much greater importance than faith, that if these others are present, faith might surely be dispensed with. One of the forms in which this is often put, is: "What does it matter what a man believes, if only his life is right? Morality is what is wanted. Good works are the thing. Let us have these by all means; but as for faith, it is of little consequence." As there are many people who talk in this way, it may not be an unnecessary or unprofitable task to show how reasonable it is that it should be impossible to please God without faith.

This will appear when we think of God as our Maker. When a man undertakes to make a complicated machine, he is not satisfied with partial successes, with making certain parts of it work, if there are other parts which will not work at all, or work very badly. If some of the finest stops in an organ are either silent or completely out of tune, the organ-builder will not be satisfied, though all the rest work perfectly well. In the same way we cannot expect that God would be pleased with His creature man, if in some parts of his complex nature he utterly fails to fulfil the purpose for which he was created, even though in other respects he do pretty well. If God had given man animal nature only, He would have been satisfied with a mere animal life, just as He is satisfied with mere animal life in an oyster. But as He has given him intellect, He expects him to use his intellect; and as He has given him affections, He expects to see those affections in exercise. Still further, He has given him a conscience, and he expects to see it exalted to the place of supremacy which has been assigned it. Above all, He has given him a spiritual nature by which to apprehend the unseen and eternal—a faith faculty by which to reach out towards Himself, and He expects of course to see it in exercise too. Call these five powers we have enumerated, five talents. It will not do to throw aside one of them, and that the best, and say He will be content with the other four. The law against suicide forbids it. Life is sacred in all its departments. It is sacred in the region of the senses. A man has no right to cut off his ears or put out his eyes. It is sacred in the region of the intellect, which it is a sin as well as a shame to allow to run to waste for want of exercise. Its sacredness increases as you ascend until you come to that which is highest in a man, the region of the eternal, the Divine life that is in him; and here it is suicide of the worst description, a crime against God of the deepest dye, to allow the very crown of that glorious nature which God has given to wither and perish. Life physical, life intellectual, life emotional, life moral—all these are great and wonderful, and ought to be preserved and developed and exercised; but greater than all, higher than all, more wonderful than all, is the Life Eternal, which our Saviour thus describes: "This is life eternal, that they may know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent." Can you expect then, that He, who has given us this most wonderful endowment of all, these "thoughts that wander through eternity," these hopes that point forward and upward to better things to come, and this faith that takes hold of Himself and cleaves to Him and trusts in Him—can you expect that He who has given us this endowment will be perfectly satisfied to see it utterly neglected and unused, and left to die for want of nourishment and exercise? Surely not. Seeing He has given us the faith faculty, He expects to see the faith that comes of it—and so, of course, "without faith it is impossible to please God our Maker."

The same thing will appear still more clearly when we think of God as our Father. This is one of the truths which the age, sceptical as it is, seems really unwilling to let die. Many are willing to give up a great many things, who still cling to the delightful and beautiful truth of the Fatherhood of God, so fully and beautifully revealed by Jesus Christ. This is good, but then these same people fail to realise how thoroughly faith is implied in this relation: how necessarily it follows from it that without faith it is impossible to please God. What father is there who would be pleased without faith? Suppose you have a little boy who always speaks the truth, never takes what is not his own, never quarrels with other children, never uses a bad word, never does what you can call a wicked action, but withal does not care a straw for you, his father, pays no attention when you speak to him, does not recognise that you have any claim on him any more than the merest stranger, ignores not only your relation to him, but even your very existence—would you be pleased with that son? Put yourself in God's place, and then see whether you would like your son or daughter to treat you as you treat your Father in heaven. Think of it; and see whether it is not a most reasonable thing that it should be impossible for you or any other of God's children to please Him without faith! We need not dwell on this—it is so very obvious; only let it not be forgotten, or considered of slight consequence, because the stating of it occupies so short a space.

And now let us bring forward yet another consideration. Think of God as our Saviour. In this relation God considers not only what He Himself would expect as our Maker and Father, but what is good and necessary for us. Faith is that which unites to God; and only those who are so united to Him can have eternal life. To be separated from God is to die eternally. Our sins have separated between us and God, and that is the reason why death works in us all; the reason of all that is evil in our lot, and dark in our prospects. Now faith undoes what sin has done. It undoes the separation between us and God; it brings us together again on the common ground of the life, death, resurrection, and ascension to heaven of the Lord Jesus Christ, "Son of God," and "Son of man" as well. And in this union, brought about through this great Mediator, we have, besides the pardon of past sins, a guarantee—first, of complete deliverance from sin, through a course of discipline in which suffering and sorrow must still bear some part; then, of complete deliverance from suffering and sorrow too; and finally, of life eternal in the heavenly glory.

All this comes in the way of faith, and in no other way; for though a man may be able to gain the victory over some of his sins without faith, he never can gain the victory over them all. There must still remain, even in the very best of men, enough to separate them from a God of absolute and perfect holiness; enough to make it impossible to meet with God, except upon the common ground which He in His mercy and love has marked out for the purpose; enough to condemn them, if called to a strict account on the basis of personal deserving.

And so it happens that without faith it is impossible to be saved, impossible to get over the dreadful evil of separation from God, and of the terrible consequences that must necessarily follow from it. This is the reason, the great reason, why it is impossible to please God without faith. It is because "He willeth not that any should perish, but that all should turn to Him and live." It is because He loves us so much, and yearns over us, and cannot bear to see us separated from Him for evermore, and left to the dreadful fate which this entails.

But suppose you have not faith, how are you to get it? Are we not told that "faith is not of ourselves, it is the gift of God"? And how are we then responsible for the want of it? But is not everything else that is good the gift of God? Is not love the gift of God? Faith does not occupy any special or peculiar position in this regard. It just comes in under the general truth, that "every good and perfect gift cometh from above, from the Father of lights, with whom is neither variableness nor shadow of turning." And it is a gift which He has bestowed in some measure upon all. Some may have more and others less by nature of the faith faculty, but all have something of it—all have that which may be educated and trained into a fully-developed faith. If it be allowed to lie unused from year to year, it will become paralysed, just as the arm would become paralysed if treated in the same way; and it may be destroyed, just as digestion may be destroyed by bad treatment. But the faculty was there at first—ay, and is there still, though it may seem almost extinct; and you have only to exercise the little you have, to cry mightily to God, to come to Him with the prayer, contradictory as it may seem, "Lord, I believe, help Thou my unbelief," and that which was almost dead in you will begin to revive, and He who "breaks not the bruised reed, and quenches not the smoking flax," will cherish the feeble spark of life until your faith shall seem to roll away mountains. It is true of faith, as of all other good things of the kingdom of God: "Ask, and ye shall receive; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth, and to him that knocketh it shall be opened."

If we were to analyse the process of seeking for the faith which is necessary to please God, we should mention three things: (1) Exercise what little faith you have, remembering the weighty words in our Saviour's parable: "To him that hath" (i.e. "hath," not in the way of mere possession, but in the way of active employment, in the shape of capital in use, not hidden away in a napkin, "shall more be given, and he shall have abundance; but from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he seemeth to have." (2) Ask for more. It is God's gift, but He is most willing to bestow it. Then ask, and keep asking for more. And (3) finally, put yourself in the way of getting more. Remember that "faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God." You cannot expect faith in the unseen to grow, or even to remain at the point at which it is now, if the mind is not brought into contact with the things that are unseen. "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he," and if a man keeps all the time thinking about material things, he will of course become materialized. If a man neglect the reading of his Bible, or if he read it only in such a thoughtless way that his mind does not really come into contact with its truth, he must suffer in his faith. Be very careful of your reading then, if you would have your faith faculty, the highest faculty that is in you, developed; be diligent first in the reading and study of the Bible, and let your mind dwell on the great things which are there unfolded; and in relation to the rest of your reading, see that a due proportion of it be such as to lift your thoughts to the things above, and familiarize your minds with that great eternity of which unquestionably you are citizens. Do this, and you will be sure to attain to larger and larger measures of that faith without which it is impossible to please God.

And now, may we not abandon the negative form of the truth, and take the positive? We have been considering the impossibility of pleasing God without faith, let us now dwell a little on the delightful thought of the possibility of pleasing Him with it. There are those who think it impossible to please God any how; but manifestly they are wrong. We are told that Enoch "pleased God," and we believe that there are not a few Enochs still. Not that God is pleased with faith alone. The fact indeed is, that true faith is never alone. If it be alone, if it do not lead to good works, it is a mere counterfeit; and, instead of pleasing God, it is an abomination to Him. No amount of faith will dispense in the slightest degree with the need of honesty, truth, purity, magnanimity, and benevolence. No amount of faith will diminish the necessity and duty of doing the very best you can in every other respect, living the purest, noblest, highest life of which you are capable. But faith secures that if you now do the best you can, however imperfect that may be, God will be pleased with you. He knows your frame. He remembers that you are dust. He does not expect more than you are able to do. And as for your imperfections and sins, they are forgiven for the sake of Jesus Christ to whom by faith you are united.

So long as a man rejects Christ and insists on standing on his own merits, he must of course be judged by the law, and nothing short of perfection will do. But when he accepts the Lord Jesus Christ as his representative, his sins and imperfections are all forgiven, and his attempts at service, though feeble, or even blundering and mistaken, are graciously and lovingly accepted. "For if there be first the willing mind, it is accepted according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not;" and in his heart he will have this blessed testimony, that "he pleases God."

One interesting question remains, as to the extent of the faith "without which it is impossible to please God." Some people think that without faith in the Athanasian creed it is impossible to please Him. Some would insist on creeds larger and more formidable, and some would reduce the creed to nothing at all, or to so very little that it amounts to nothing. How are we then to settle the question? On the simple Scripture plan announced by our Lord Himself: "To whom much is given, of them much shall be required." There are circumstances, no doubt, in which God may be pleased with faith in its most rudimentary form, as seems indicated in the text itself: "Without faith it is impossible to please God, for he that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." That is a very simple confession of faith, so simple that it manifestly does not exclude the possibility of even a heathen pleasing God. Who will say that the heathen never get the length of believing that "God is, and that He is the rewarder of them that seek Him"? And who will say that God may not by His good Spirit lead them on still further to such a faith as will secure them an interest in the atonement and resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ? But while we can conceive of God being pleased with just so much in a heathen land, we have no reason to believe that He will be satisfied with just so much in a Christian land. He may be pleased with it in the beginning of a man's way; but if a man's faith lead him so far, it will very speedily lead him further. Believing in God, he will believe also in Christ; and believing in Christ, he will believe in what Christ has revealed. Thus his creed will grow as he himself advances. It may not square in every particular with the creeds of other men, who may be true enough disciples, and he, too, a true enough disciple for all that. But though he may have different ways of looking at the "truth in Jesus" from many other Christians, he will nevertheless agree with them in the great essentials and fundamentals of the teaching of Christ. And so long as he faithfully and candidly uses his faculties in ascertaining what Christ teaches concerning God and the world to come, his Lord will be well pleased with him. Here, too, if the heart be right, the blundering of the head will be forgiven. So long as he has a genuine faith, or confidence in God and in His Son Jesus Christ, his errors, mistakes, and imperfections will all be forgiven, and he himself gladly welcomed to the heart and the home of his Father, and the holy happiness of heaven.

My Grandchildren at Church.

BRIGHT Dorothy with eyes of blue,
And serious Dickie, brave as fair,
Crossing to church you oft may view
When no one but myself is there:
First to the belfry they repair,
And while to the long ropes they cling,
And make believe to call to prayer,
For angels' ears the bells they ring!

Next, seated gravely in a pew,
A pulpit homily they share,
Meet for my little flock of two,
Pointed and plain, as they can bear:
Then venture up the pulpit-stair,
Pray at the desk, or gaily sing:
O sweet child-life without a care—
For angels' ears the bells they ring!

Dear little ones, the early dew
Of holy infancy they wear,
And lift to heaven a face as true
As flowers that breathe the morning air:
Whate'er they do, where'er they fare,
They can command an angel's wing,
Their voices have a music rare;
For angels' ears the bells they ring!

O parents, of your charge beware:
Their angels stand before the King:
In work, play, sleep, and everywhere
For angels' ears the bells they ring!

RICHARD WILTON.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR.

THE GLASGOW FOUNDRY BOYS.

LET us now touch a slightly higher station of poverty. What is being done for the class that lies on the borderland of want? Again, let us see what effort is made to reach them through the children, for it is through the children they can be best approached.

Glasgow is said to possess the most perfect of the Sunday Schools. The description is somewhat wide of the mark. The "Foundry Boys" is much more than a Sunday-school, and its methods only in a degree are school methods. On the one hand it aims at leading the young to live a Christian life, and grow up into the church-fold; and on the other it stretches deep into secular and social matters, and, in a quiet way, is the instrument of much benevolent work. There is nothing exactly like it in any other city. It has a good broad programme, and, owing to the interpretation put upon that programme, its work is too varied and extensive to be disregarded in any consideration of the problem of the poor.

It is not a growth of yesterday—it has reached manhood. The coming of age of the Glasgow Foundry Boys was celebrated at the last annual meeting. The Society has now eighty-eight branches, and on its roll are 24,000 boys and girls. At first it was, in fact as in name, a gathering of real foundry boys, like that started by the late Mr. James Hunter, who for months held Sabbath classes, weekday evening classes, penny bank and flute band, in the hall of a foundry granted by foundry masters, where night after night he met the boys employed in the works. But his effort had died down to feebleness, to be revived when he and Mr. W. P. Hunter, and Mr. Martin, and Mr. Mackeith met on the 21st of November, 1865, to draw up the new scheme that was to succeed so strikingly.

The beginnings were modest enough. A few handbills distributed in the works by the permission of the masters attracted some of the lads together. From the outset the numbers grew. The boys brought their friends, their brothers, and their sisters. Then came a sorting out of the juniors from the seniors, of the boys from the girls; the institution of the peculiar monitorial system; and the gradual building up of the splendid organisation for which Glasgow takes much credit. At first a limit was put to age, or rather size. On the enrolment night each boy was measured to see if he were big enough, and some were sent away disappointed. Their names were taken, and so were particulars as to their family connections. One boy the secretary asked if there were no more at home. "Yes," was the reply, "there's a wee ane no worth countin'." But the wee anes are thought worth counting now, and the Society opens its doors to all.

In the early days the Foundry Boys met in strange places. One class was held in the storeroom of an old mill—"earthen floor, the place cumbered with yarn skips and cop boxes, which, with planks upon them, served for seats, involving at times, to restless members, sudden collapse, the disappearance of half-a-dozen heads, and the upheaval of a dozen heels." Another in an empty house, the thirteen boys standing against the bare wall; the next meeting having to be held in the lane, owing to the house being taken "over their heads." Another in an empty theatre, with a mine below the seats, of which every advantage was taken by the practical joker. Now the unsuitable meeting-places are but few; schoolrooms and halls have been found, among them the City Hall and the Christian Institute, one of the finest of the new buildings of Glasgow.

The object of the Society is the religious, educational, and social elevation of the boys and girls of the city and suburbs; but it is, above all things, a religious society, the Sabbath forenoon meetings being the centre towards which all the week work converges; and this paramount position of the religious element is promoted and secured by union with the churches and missions in the different districts, each branch being specially connected with the congregation from which its workers are drawn, and to which a full report of the work of the branch is rendered. Out of the eighty-eight existing branches there are only thirteen that are not thus attached, and these hold their meetings in such places as the City Hall, the Blackfriars Hall, the Orphan Home Hall, the Victoria Hall, the Lorne Hall, and the Wellington Palace. The churches with which the Society works are of all denominations, provided they do not teach anything contrary to the Nine Articles of the Evangelical Alliance.

For administrative purposes each branch has its chairman; and the branches are grouped into seventeen sections, each with its superintendent. The management of each branch is vested in an Acting Committee composed of two members of the general council, and office-bearers elected from the membership. The general administration of the society is in the hands of eighteen directors. They have the control of the public meetings, of the finance, of the hall accommodation and furniture, and of the negotiations with other societies.

The General Council exists in order to give each branch a voice in the management of the current work of the four departments; the four departments being the religious, the educational, the social reform, and the provident. Under the council, which is composed of the directors, the office-bearers of each department, and the two members from each branch, comes the control of the publications of the society, of the district meetings of the boys and girls or their parents, of the alterations and additions to the society's work, and the reporting on them to the directors, with whom, as representing the society to the public, and being the only board elected by the whole of the members, rests the final decision on all such matters.

The General Council is divided into four departmental committees, each being charged with the management of its own department; and each committee has as office-bearers a general superintendent, sectional superintendents, a secretary and treasurer. The duties of these committees are to institute and promote in each branch the special work of the department, and provide all requisite materials, to tabulate and report the statistics of such work, and to devise or consider improvements on the current work. In addition to the departmental committees there is an extensive committee composed of an office-bearer from each department, who receive and consider all proposals for new branches, or the transfer of old ones.

The opening of a new branch is a very systematic proceeding. The district is regularly surveyed, each street noted, and the number of families ascertained; then the district is divided into portions containing about forty families, and each of these is assigned to a "monitor." These monitors are what in the south we should call teachers, their duties being not only to keep the children orderly in school, but to make friends of them, and take an interest in them on the week-day as well as on the Sunday, visiting the children's homes, ascertaining where help is required, and thus becoming the most important agents in the work of social reform. To each monitor is confided the charge of eight or ten children, all of whose names and addresses must be known, so that absentees can be looked up within a few days of their truancy.

On the morning of the first attack on the stronghold the monitors hold a short prayer-meeting in the hall wherein the society meeting is to be subsequently conducted; and then each is armed with forty handbills, stating plainly the time and place of the forthcoming meeting, and inviting all who do not attend a religious service to be present. They go out to their groups of forty families, and do the best they can to persuade the parents to allow their children to accept the invitation, and come when they are called for next week. Of all that promise, or half promise, they take the name and address—and a Scotch address under such circumstances is a lengthy one, for in the tall whited sepulchres the people live thick as bees, stairway by stairway, flat upon flat, and the address, to be of use, must not only give the number of the street but the landing, the stair, the door, and the right hand, or left hand, or little behind hand to which you must turn to find it. Next Sunday, just before the meeting which always takes place at church time, so as to form the habit of obeying the call of the bell, the monitors go out with the lists, and with such recruits as they can secure, return to the hall where the meeting is held. The names are then registered by the secretary, and the first meeting is opened.

As this forenoon meeting is the main feature of the Foundry Boys' organisation let us also obey the bell-call, and, taking one of the largest branches, find our way to the Springbank Hall in Hopehill Road, leading up into Garscube. The chairman of this branch is Mr. William Martin, the treasurer of the society, who has been a director from the first, having been one of its four founders two-and-twenty years ago.

The service is the same at all the branches; every chairman has a programme from head-quarters, and it is his duty to see it carried out in its entirety.

The most noteworthy thing about the Foundry Boys' Society is the thoroughness of its organisation; everything is provided for, and printed instructions deal with every detail. The service begins at eleven, but "fifteen minutes, at least, before the hour of meeting, the doors of the hall should be open, and the boys and girls as they come in receive a warm welcome, and spend the time in singing hymns together." It is a quarter to eleven when we enter, and the large room is then about half full. The children are just ending a hymn from their own collection, for the society publishes its own "Scripture Text Book and Hymnal." Amid a little stir, as the new-comers stop to have the attendance register in the cover of their text book duly stamped, and then find their way to their seats, the voices are heard.

Little words of kindness, whisper'd soft and low!
With a thrill of gladness to the heart they go;
Lighting up its darkness with a cheering ray—
Changing gloomy sadness to the light of day.

Little words of kindness, whisperings of love!
God's own hand records them in the world above.
They whose words of pity dry the mourner's tears,
Have the Saviour's blessing, through their earthly years.

Little words of kindness seem of little worth—
Yet we cannot buy them with the gold of earth.
Scatter them like sunbeams showing forth His love;
And the Lord of heaven bless you from above!

The room is arranged on the same system as at the Children's Dinner, which was an off-shoot from the Foundry Boys. The boys and girls are separate, and the seniors, consisting of working boys and working girls, are separate from the juniors. At the dinner, however, the monitors were one behind the other; here they are at alternate ends of the forms, so that in no case are there more than eight scholars without a break. At the back of the platform is a diagram, or rather coloured picture, of the scene of the chief incident in the portion of Scripture appointed to be read for the day—in this case the garden over the brook Cedron, in which the betrayal took place. These landscape diagrams are found of great use in fixing the attention of the listeners during the Scripture lesson. There is nothing so difficult to make intelligible as descriptions of scenery. Of persons, all seem to be able to have a mental image, but to figure trees, and rocks, and hills, and valleys, is not so easy a matter. The landscape, however rough or glaring it may be, is always looked for and always appreciated.

At eleven o'clock the hall is full, the monitors are in their places with their eight charges to the right or left of them, and the doors are shut. The chairman, after a few words, calling the audience to attention, repeats the Lord's Prayer, and in it all join. And then the following programme is gone through.

11 o'clock. The Lord's Prayer.
11.3. Intimation of Week Evening Meetings, &c.
11.7. Missionary Intelligence and Collection.
11.12. Praise.
11.17. Scripture Reading and Explanation.
11.37. Prayer.
11.40. Praise.
11.45. Repetition of Memory Text.
11.50. Address by appointed Speaker.
12.10. Praise.
12.15. Prayer.
12.20. Parting Hymn.
12.22. Dismissal, seat by seat, beginning nearest door.
12.24. Prayer Meeting for Office Bearers and Monitors.
12.30. Meeting closed.

For the collection each monitor is brought a little white wood money-box, duly marked with the number and division, the same box being always used by the same group of eight. The boxes are opened once a month, and the proceeds given to missions and local institutions. The idea is to foster the habit of charity. Individually the collections are trifling, but with such numbers they mount to a goodly sum. Last year these pence amounted to 1141*l* 18*s*. 11*d*., whereof 256*l* 9*s*. 7*d*. was given to Home and Foreign Missions, 357*l* 4*s*. 8*d*. went to the Convalescent Homes and Royal and Western Infirmaries, and the rest to the Society, whose general expenses for the year only exceeded the missionary offerings by 33*l* 15*s*. 11*d*. Every year the November offerings are taken for these expenses; those of the other months are given beyond the society. But the gifts to the local charities are merely extensions of the society's work; the value comes back in "lines of admission," or as we should call them letters of recommendation to the Homes and Infirmaries.

The praise consists of hymns from the text-book—in which the music is given in the sol-fa notation—and a psalm from the usual version; the voices being accompanied by a harmonium, and directed by the "leader of praise." The first prayer is by the chairman, the second by the giver of the address. The portion of Scripture is read by the chairman, and explained and enlarged upon by him with constant reference to the diagram. For every Sabbath in the year the selection is given in the text-book, which also contains the short texts that are to be committed to memory.

The special feature in the service is the address—the arrangements for which are elaborate. Three times a year a list is published; the latest contains the names of 219 gentlemen, who have volunteered to give addresses during the four months, such addresses to be on the text appointed for the day, and not to exceed twenty minutes in delivery. There is a list of the branches, and a calendar, and the "duties" of the speakers are so arranged that every branch is supplied.

The calendar gives the number of the speaker on the particular day; the numbered list of speakers gives against the name the number of the branch at which he is to speak. On the Monday previous to the Sabbath on which he is to address a meeting, the speaker receives a post-card from the secretary, reminding him of the engagement, and should he not be able to be present, he has to find a substitute. By this arrangement new life is given to the branches; the members see new faces, and are stimulated to thought by different methods, for on no two successive Sundays do they have the same preacher.

At most branches the one hall serves for all the members, and the seats or pews are arranged in the order of Senior Boys, Junior Boys, Junior Girls, Senior Girls, in four columns, or in two columns with Junior Girls and Junior Boys in front, and Senior Girls and Senior Boys behind; but at Hopehill Road the attendance has overflowed the hall, and the juniors are upstairs; in fact there are rooms full of boys and girls, some of them hardly able to toddle.

The remarkable thing about these youngsters is the number of them that know how to read. Thanks to the day and night schools of the School Board, the advance in education amongst the Glasgow poor has been very great. In the second year of the Foundry Boys, there were 312 lads, and of these 72 were unable to read at all, 88 could only read words of one syllable, and 78 could only read words of two syllables. Things have altered during the twenty years. The Society Educational Department makes a much better return now. In this Educational Department figure School Board Evening Classes, Branch Evening Classes, Mutual Improvement Associations, Literary Societies, Industrial Clubs, Sewing Classes, Cookery Classes, Lantern Exhibitions, Lectures, and a Lending Library, the classes being held from eight to half-past nine o'clock, on two or three nights each week, from October till the end of March. In the Religious Department, besides the forenoon service, there are Sabbath Evening Meetings, Evangelistic Missions, a Bible Reading Union, and Tuesday Evening Praise and Prayer Meetings.

The objects of the Social Reform Department are chiefly the promotion of the Temperance cause, and the meeting of the social wants of the boys and girls by providing rational means of recreation during leisure hours. The work has many phases. There are Singing Classes, Orchestral Classes, Drill Classes, Swimming Clubs, Football Clubs, Athletic Clubs, a Rambling Club, Entertainments, Concerts, Soirées, Flower Shows, Excursions, and, above all, the Fair-week trip with its encampment on Loch Fyne; the work in all of which may be imagined, as likewise its influence in helping on the central idea of the Society, and finding for the young suitable friends, whose example will aid the teaching, and help in resisting the downward pull of family tendencies.

What those tendencies are, the Provident Department knows best. It concerns itself with the relief of the Sick and Destitute, and with the other side of the account in the shape of a Penny Bank, as well as with a Dorcas Society dealing largely in boots. Owing to the monitors making friends of the children, and visiting them at their homes, many a deserving case for charity is discovered, to be reported in the proper quarter. By the yearly donations of the portion of the offerings, the infirmaries and children's hospital are open to the sick, and medical attendance is given at the peoples' homes, by the Glasgow Medical Mission. To the members attending the branches there are open the seaside homes at Kilmun and Dunoon, besides the Lenzie and Saltcoats Mission Homes. The monitors are instructed to take needy children to the Day Refuges, and ill-used children to the Shelter at Garnet Hill, and to deal with cases of sudden destitution by means of Benevolent Tickets. The society, through its head-quarters at the Christian Institute in Bothwell Street, is in connection with all the leading charitable enterprises of Glasgow, and every branch is the centre of a network of well-doing, the distinguishing feature of which is persistent effort.

The good they are specially doing no one can tell. It is impossible to apportion the relative values of simultaneous moral influence. One thing is certain, the institutions in Glasgow for the prevention and repression of juvenile delinquency are all in a languishing condition. "The directors of these legal and restraining institutions," reports the City Chamberlain, "rejoice that their labours are yearly lessening, notwithstanding they feel themselves placed for the time, and from a purely financial point of view, in an unfavourable position, having to maintain establishments which had to be designed to meet the approval of the Secretary of State, and now happily becoming emptied because of the active voluntary benevolence growing more and more potent year by year. In truth, it would appear that the good old philosophy has come back to us, and is not only preached but largely practised, that inculates in the well-to-do personal interest in the poor, and those out of the way, and very specially an interest in the young, whose surroundings are more likely to give to them a wrong than a right start in life."

W. J. GORDON.

A TRUE MOTHER OF CHARITY.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS OF MADAME ANDRÉ-WALTHER.

NOT far from the magnificent palace and gardens of Versailles, is a charming place known as Les Ombrages, the property and residence of the late Madame André-Walther. During the Franco-German war, and during the more terrible time when the Communists had possession of Paris, the town and the neighbourhood of Versailles always presented a scene of busy and anxious excitement. The din of arms, the tramp of troops, the mingled turmoil of military and political life, seemed strangely contrasted with the natural beauty and cheerful gaiety of the French "Court-suburb" in times of peace. The whole country-side was affected by the events of war, and at some seasons was overcast with the gloom of anxiety and trouble. But in the darkest of those times of gloom, and in the most tumultuous of those days of excitement, there was one spot on which the light of heaven appeared always to rest, and where amidst all the strife of war and of tongues the peace of heaven appeared always to prevail. This was Madame André-Walther's home, the Ombrages. It was like a rural "city of refuge," or one of those "sanctuaries" during the Middle Ages, which were respected by the most turbulent spirits, even in times of revolution and war.

It was the character of the proprietor that secured for it this respect and this immunity. There is a story told of Baron James Rothschild, that when his country house was threatened with occupation by soldiers, he sent a quiet message that, if this were done, he would cause the pay of the army to cease, by a telegram to Berlin. More than wealth could do, and more than armed force, was effected by the moral influence of this good lady, who had long been known as the very model and personification of benevolence and charity. The generals and the staff of the army, the municipality of Versailles, the prefects of the police, the railway station-masters, all were in the habit of sending the poor and the helpless to this refuge. Every spare room in the chateau, the greenhouses in the garden, the stables, the tool-sheds, every place that afforded shelter, was crowded with bands of fugitives and the homeless poor, till one day a miserable outcast was heard to say "There is no more room."

A more remarkable fact during the Versailles times has to be mentioned. There are many who have hearts as kind as that of Madame André, but have not the means that were at her command for deeds of beneficence. The singular feature in her position at that time was that, when every part of the place was crowded with the poor recipients of her bounty, each night she received, in her salon, statesmen, ambassadors, cabinet ministers, senators, deputies, generals, and notables of all degrees, civil and military. Debates and disputes, anxieties and sorrows, were forgotten during these few brief hours of quiet and rational enjoyment. Very different was that scene from the idea usually suggested by the salons of Parisian dames of high degree, where rank and fashion, art and literature, wit and talent, are brought together mainly for display and ostentation.

There was a lofty tone and devout feeling pervading the assemblies at the Ombrages. One who valued the privilege of being received there has said that no one who was present will ever forget the impression on the evening when Paris was in flames and the palace of the Tuileries was fired by the Communists. Madame André's son was at the front with the army, yet the mother appeared to her guests as calm and dignified as ever, and thrilled them by intoning with her clear musical voice a prayer and hymn to the Almighty to save the poor people whose crimes had justly exposed them to Divine judgments.

But it is time to tell our readers who this good and noble woman was, for it is possible that her name is little known in England, the scenes at the Ombrages attracting little notice beyond the neighbourhood, when all the world was startled by the events passing at Versailles and Paris.

Madame André was born June 14, 1807. She was the daughter of Count Walther, General of Division, and Commandant of the first Napoleon's Imperial Guard. She was god-daughter of the Emperor and of the Empress Josephine, after whom she was partly named. Her full designation in the baptismal register was Henriette-Joséphine-Napoléone-Frédérique-Walther. At the age of eighteen she was married to M. J. André, receiver-general of revenue at Tours, a man of good reputation and of great wealth. Rich, beautiful, and highly cultured, she was universally admired and flattered; and she lived in a society which offered to her every pleasure and splendour and success which a woman of the world could desire. Yet all this worldly pleasure did not satisfy her heart. Her own sound sense and good disposition made her feel sad amidst the amusements of "Vanity Fair." There was an aching void which the world could not fill, not even in social and domestic life, far less in the frivolous and transient gaieties of fashionable society.

It was when in this frame of mind that a venerable pastor, L. Meyer, paid her a visit. By whom he was asked to call, or whether it was in ordinary routine of a faithful minister's duty, this first interview with the good pastor proved a providential event for her. It was the beginning of a new life. We should like to know more about the spiritual movements and experiences of the young convert. But what every one soon saw was that she took little delight in the mere gaieties of life, but sought and found peace and joy in prayer and in reading the word of God. She gave her heart entirely to God, and resolved to consecrate her life to spreading the knowledge and helping the cause of her beloved Saviour. Never was there a life more wholly or more consistently devoted to the Master's service. Having herself found peace and salvation, her one thought and aim was to show her faith by works of piety and beneficence. She knew she could do this without retiring from her position in society, and without taking on herself any vows and rules of religious life, as some women of similar devotedness had done. She lived in the world, yet was not of the world. And all who came in contact with her, Catholics and Protestants, even sceptics and unbelievers, recognised that influence of beneficence, which in her was the influence of the Spirit of God.

Till her death, in August 1886, she manifested an ever-ripening beauty of character and fruitfulness in good deeds. One of the leading Roman Catholic journals, in an obituary notice, said of her: "This soul was influenced by two powerful passions, faith and goodness. Her faith was superb and triumphant, truly Christian, above all sects and all controversies. Her goodness was bright and sunny, and shone everywhere and on all alike. Stern as regards sin, she was pitiful towards the sinner, and no one better knew how to comfort the mourner, and to cheer the broken-hearted, as well as to relieve the indigent. This goodness was not the result of mere feminine sensibility. Her mind was of lofty, masculine tone. The most tragic events, the calamities of war, the horrors of revolution, did not disturb her calm and resolute courage."

This is a remarkable testimony, but the truth of it was felt by all who knew Madame André. In her courage and her dignity, and in the air of command which appeared in her manner, one could see the daughter of the old soldier who was chief of the Imperial Guard. Yet this air of authority was tempered by gentleness and sweetness, the result of her Christian humility. She was always self-possessed, and before her guests always cheerful. When not far from eighty years of age, she appeared to retain unchanged buoyancy of spirit. On leaving the house to return to Versailles one of the visitors said to his comrade: "She is the youngest of us all!" Ah! it was because she renewed her youth at the source of eternal life. Her conversation was in heaven, and in communion with her God and Saviour. She was ready for the Master's call, and would hear the words, "Well done, thou good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."[1]

In Newness of Life.

THIS firstling snowdrop, given for our delight,
So fragile, yet so brave and full of cheer,
Wears not the self-same robe of stainless white
As the frail bloom that last year faded here.

This crocus, set with clustering spires of gold,
That makes a yearly splendour at our door,
From the old root develops, fold on fold,
New blossoms, never seen on earth before.

The types are old—the flowers, all fresh and new,
In differing glory greet our longing sight,
But as their legions come in order true,
We always know and call their names aright!

So shall it be in that grand waking hour,
When, from the precious dust in weakness sown,
Our loved and lost ones shall be raised in power,
And we shall greet them, recognised and known;

Strong in immortal youth their forms shall move,
Their eyes, all purged of tears, new light shall wear,
But the old smile shall tell the old dear love,
And we shall not mistake them, here or there!

M. R.

[1] A portrait of Madame André, with brief Memoir, is given in the Almanack des Bons Conseils for 1888. Bureau 33 Rue Saints-Pères, Paris.

MISSY.

CHAPTER I.

"CHRIS'FER! Chris'fer!"

"Ay, ay, Missy; now bide a bit, dearie, and old Chris will come."

"But I want you now, Chris'fer; I'm so dull and lonely, and I want to be 'moosed."

"Well, well, Missy, wait till I've fettled up a bit, and then I'll come and take you a-walkin'. Just go round and talk to Zimo a bit; he'll feel hurt like, if you don't take no notice of un."

Christopher went on with his sweeping and tidying, and soon merry laughter testified that Missy had found amusement in her conversation with Zimo—a large blue-faced mandril, one of the principal attractions in the wild-beast show known as Butterwick's Menagerie. Neither was the amusement or conversation all on one side, for Zimo gibbered and chattered in response to Missy's remarks, and showed the most gentlemanly appreciation of her attentions.

Butterwick's Menagerie did not take first rank amongst shows of its kind; in the time of old Butterwick, indeed, it had been a flourishing and paying concern. "The beasts" were the old man's pride and delight, and he boasted that never a smarter lot toured the country; but since his death things had become less flourishing. His only child had inherited the show, as well as her father's savings, and still travelled the country under the same name; but the loss of the keen eye of the master soon began to be felt. Miss Butterwick's temper was none of the sweetest, and old servants would not submit to her voluble outbursts of abuse. Under fresh hands the animals were often neglected, and some of the more delicate died, while the rest showed signs of want of care and attention. Of all the hands employed by her father, only old Christopher remained; he had never held an important position in the menagerie, his lameness being a bar to his taking a part in which great activity was required; but Christopher had not his equal for sweeping and tidying, or, as he termed it, "fettling up and making things ship-shape." Miss Butterwick's wrath made but little impression upon the imperturbable old Yorkshireman, and the only answer her tirades ever called forth, was "Ay, ay, miss! Ay, ay!"

"I hate that old Chris, with his Ay, ay!" she cried one day in a passion to Signor Strudelli, the lion-tamer. "He makes me more angry than any one else; why can't he say something else? It is his impudence; I'll send him away. I won't keep him any longer, and then we'll see what he will say."

"He will only say Ay, ay! you may be sure; but I would not send him away. Old Chris is a handy, useful fellow, always ready at a pinch. What would you have done without him when those others fellows struck and went off when we were at Newcastle? Old Chris almost ran the show single-handed then. No, I wouldn't get rid of him."

The Signor spoke in wonderfully good English, which might be accounted for by the fact that his name was Frank Brooks, and that he had never been out of England in his life; but old Butterwick had great belief in a high-sounding name, and considered that Signor Strudelli would be a far better draw than Frank Brooks.

"Well, if you say so, I can't refuse," answered Miss Butterwick to this remark; "so Christopher shall stay for your sake."

The Signor blushed up to the roots of his hair, and, making some hurried excuse to Miss Butterwick, he walked away. Brave as he was with the lions, he was weak in the hands of his employer. He knew it, and often pondered whether it would not be wise to seek safety in flight.

"He's a soft un," the men would remark, as they discussed the evident partiality of their mistress for the Signor; "he wants to run away, and he can't. He's a soft un."

"He's just like the little birds as I've heard the sarpints looks and looks at till they falls down and can't help theirselves," said Christopher. "She's the sarpint, and won't she let him know when she's caught un."

The remark was prophetic. "She," which was the only term which Christopher ever applied to his mistress, wiled poor soft-hearted Frank Brooks until he made Miss Butterwick into Mrs. Brooks; and then it seemed that having secured her husband, she had also secured a butt for her outbursts of temper; and as the men profited by her change of condition, so her husband suffered. Brave as he was with the animals, poor Frank was, as the men termed him, but "a soft un" in the hands of a woman. Gentle in temper he bowed before the storm; but, nevertheless, when the storm had passed, the traces of it were visible. Constitutionally delicate, his health began to suffer, until, as time went on, his nerves became so shattered that he could no longer follow his calling, and a fresh lion-tamer had to be employed in his room. This brought upon him redoubled taunts and jeers from his wife, who called him a lazy vagabond, who had married her so that he might live on her earnings. One pleasure, and one only, was left to the poor man, and that was the love of his little child, who, from earliest babyhood, had stretched out her little arms to him, and whose first articulate utterance he fondly declared had been Dad. No amount of vituperation could affect him so long as he held Nellie closely in his arms, and her loving eyes were fixed on him; even her soft pats on the cheek, and her baby murmurs of "Poor Dad," seemed to have a charmed effect on him, and would ease his paroxysms of coughing and labouring for breath. But the decree had gone forth, and no love on the side of his baby-daughter, no efforts on his part to live for her sake were of any avail; and soon after Nellie had attained her third year, she was left fatherless.

The child led a strange unchild-like life. Her mother fed and clothed her, it is true, but beyond that bestowed very little notice on her. The animals in the show were her companions and playmates, Zimo occupying the first place in her affections after Christopher, whom she looked upon as much as a part of the menagerie as the lions or the monkeys. Christopher was truly her "mentor, guide, and friend;" he instructed her in the habits of the animals, gave her what he considered sound advice on her conduct both for the present and for that delightful future "when she should be grown up." The two would sit for hours on a truss of hay building castles in the air about that happy time when Missy should have a show of her own, of which Christopher was to be headman and overlooker.

"You shan't have to brush and sweep then, Christ'fer, nor ride in the cold outside the vans; you and me will have a nice warm carriage, and then we can give Zimo a ride for a treat sometimes."

"Ay, ay, Missy; those 'ull be fine times for old Chris, a riding in a nice warm carriage along o' Missy. Ah, 'twill be a fine day then; and old Chris will just walk round with his hands in his pockets and see that the rest brushes up and makes things all ship-shape. And we'll repaint the show and make it smart like 'twas in yer grandfather's time—right-down smart it was in those days; and the brake for the music-men was all red and gold. What would you think to that now, Missy?"

"Oh, wouldn't it be lovely?" cried Missy, clasping her little hands in ecstacy. "Yes, Chris'fer, we'll have it all red and gold again."

"And we'll fill it with music-men, Missy. 'Taint much beside a drum now."

"Oh, yes, we'll fill it, Chris'fer; we'll have lovely music, we will; and then we'll have some more marm'sets. Oh, I should like a whole show full of marm'sets; they're such dears, aren't they, Chris'fer?"

"Yes, Missy, we'll have lots on 'em; and we won't let 'em die nother from cold. We'll have a nice warm box for 'em."

"Oh, yes! and we'll have them in the beautiful warm carriage with us, Chris'fer."

And so the two would talk. Missy was loved by all in the show; the roughest of the men had a kind word for her, or an offering in the shape of peppermints and toffee, which she would share amongst those of her dumb friends who could appreciate such dainties; even the wildest and most savage animals knew her, and seemed to acknowledge the softening power of her presence. Una-like, she exercised a spell over the lions which amazed the men.

"Blest if I don't think she'd go into the cage with the whole lot of them!" said the tamer, as he watched his charges rubbing themselves with evident pleasure against the bars of their cage as Missy talked to them.

"For heaven's sake, don't say that before the missis!" cried Christopher. "If she was only to get the idea, she wouldn't think nothing o' clapping the child in there."

"She would scarcely do that with her own little one."

"Just wouldn't she, though, if she thought it would be a 'traction! What do she care for, 'cept 'tis her supper and her glass o' brandy-and-water, I should like to know? Just you keep a still tongue about that."

"It wouldn't be a bad idea, though," said the tamer musingly. "The show wants a draw precious bad; it's going to the dogs. But a sensation like that would take, if it was properly managed. She's such a mite; she would pass for younger than she is. We could call her The Baby Star, or the Infant Lion-Tamer."

"Shut up, will ye?" cried Christopher angrily. "You h'an't got no more feeling than the missis herself! you'd like to murder the child!"

The idea seemed to have taken the fancy of the lion-tamer; so, in spite of Christopher's adjurations to silence, he mentioned the matter to Mrs. Brooks. As the old man had said, his mistress cared for little, except her supper and her brandy-and-water, of which beverage she partook freely through the day, on the plea that she had no appetite, and felt "such a sinking"; and as her exchequer was often at a very low ebb, she sometimes found a difficulty in providing for her own wants, as well as the expenses of the show.

"Law, now! do you ever think she'd do it? She's such a mite of a thing; she ain't much bigger than a doll," she answered to the suggestion held out that Nellie should take a part in the performance.

"So much the better; the smaller she is, the more the people would come to see her. Just dress her up like a fairy, with a star on her forehead; or darken her skin, stick some feathers in her hair, and put on her a leopard-skin over her shoulder, and she'd draw like mad. I'll undertake to teach her, and to see that no harm comes to her, on conditions."

"Conditions!"

"Yes, Mrs. Brooks, conditions. Now we'll talk business, if you please. Butterwick's show is going to the dogs as fast as it can go; before long you'll have to give it up. But if I take it in hand, and run it along with you—partners, you know; equal shares—I'll undertake to work the thing up so that in a twelvemonth we shall be as flourishing as it was in the old man's time."

"Well, I like your impudence! Partners! equal shares! And what do you intend to put into the business, pray?" asked Mrs. Brooks sarcastically.

"Nothing, ma'am—nothing, except my brains. I'll work the concern up. I think that's enough to undertake, seeing how affairs are now."

"Much obliged to you, I'm sure, sir; but I think I'll keep my show in my own hands."

"Then I'll trouble you, Mrs. Brooks, for the wages you owe me. It is a bit over three months since I or any of the men have had full wages, so, if you please, we will take arrears now, and give you notice to look out for another set at the end of next week."

Mrs. Brooks' face changed. She knew she had not money to pay the arrears of the men's wages, so thought it best to effect a compromise.

"Don't be so sharp, Barnet, with your giving notice," she said; "you don't give me time to take the thing in. Of course, if you want to go, you must go; but I must have time to think over the matter about the child. I can't do things all in a hurry; and I dare say I can get some one else to train her, if you don't."

"You wouldn't get anybody else to do as I would. Who knows the lions and who knows the child as I do? I should advise you to think well over it."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. V.

The initials and finals give two pieces of defensive armour indispensable to the Christian warrior.

1. That which God ordains "out of the mouth of babes and sucklings."

2. A result of tribulation, patience and experience, which "maketh not ashamed."

3. Something to which sacrifice was offered, but which is "Nothing in the world."

4. The feeling to be entertained towards those who are over us in the Lord, "for their work's sake."

5. The first-named of those graces which are called "the fruit of the Spirit."

6. That of which man is made, and to which "he shall return."

M. A. S. M.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XI.—A PROSPECTIVE GUEST.

JOAN SAT VERY STILL AND SILENT.

"AUNT JOAN, is it true that we have a cousin we have never heard of before? And is it true that perhaps he will come and live here some day?"

The speaker was Mildred Edington, and she was sitting at a bare table in a dreary-looking school-room, idly working at a French exercise which should have been finished an hour ago. Nellie was strumming upon a cracked piano, whilst Joan sat at the other end of the table, hard at work on the blue serge frocks. As Mildred tossed her tawny mane out of her eyes to ask this question, Joan paused a moment in her sewing and looked up.

"If you do nothing but talk and idle, Mildred, you will never get your lessons done before dinner."

"Oh, bother! How I do hate lessons, particularly French! And that horrid old piano drives me distracted. I can't think what's the good of learning stupid things like this. What's trade in French? métier? Oh, thanks, so it is. Masculine? Isn't it perfectly ridiculous giving things genders? I don't know how one is ever to remember them. Who wants to know who has the shoemaker's old shoes, I should like to know? I should like to throw them at his head! There! I really have finished at last, and it isn't worth while beginning anything else before dinner. Nellie, do stop that detestable noise, and let's make Aunt Joan tell us what's in the wind."

Nellie gladly turned herself round upon her revolving stool and looked eagerly at her aunt. In a house like that of the Edingtons, where discipline was ignored, and where all the domestic arrangements were confused, and what might be described as "hugger-mugger," things came to the ears of the children with remarkable rapidity. Mildred was in and out of the rooms pretty much at will, and indeed none of the children were kept to school-room or nursery, as in properly conducted establishments; their parents were so well used to their comings and goings as to take scant notice of them, consequently little went on in the house that did not quickly come to the ears of the little pitchers.

"Now, Aunt Joan, don't be tiresome: do tell us all about it."

"I don't think there is anything to tell."

"Oh, yes, there is. Who is this cousin they call Roy? Why don't we know him? and why do they talk as if he might come and see us now?"

"Because he has lost his mother lately; and grandpapa is his guardian; but I think it is very likely he will not come, so do not set your heart upon it."

"Mamma and papa think he will, I am sure. I hope grandpapa will make him. It would be such fun to have somebody here on a visit. We never have visitors."

"I wish he was a girl," said little Nellie, "I don't like boys."

"He isn't quite a boy, is he?" asked Mildred, "he's almost grown up, isn't he, Aunt Joan?"

"He must be almost eighteen by now."

"Have you ever seen him?"

"I used to know him when he was a little tiny boy; but that was fifteen years ago, when we lived in London."

"Before any of us were born," said Mildred, "and when grandpapa and papa were rich. I wish we were rich now. Can you remember what it was like, Aunt Joan? Did you have silk and velvet frocks, and drive about in a carriage, like people in books?"

"No, not quite, but things were different from what they are here."

"I wish you'd tell us some more. Why are you so cross?"

"I'm not cross, Mildred; but I haven't anything to tell. I can't remember very much about life before we came here, and I've never seen Roy since he was three years old. If he comes you will be able to judge for yourself."

"Don't you want him to come?"

"I don't care much either way. For his sake, I hope he won't."

Mildred pushed back her heavy hair and asked: "What do you mean by 'for his sake'?"

"I mean that I don't think he will like this house after what he has been used to: that he would be happier to stay where he is."

"But it might be more amusing for us, if he came?"

"Yes, very possibly."

"Then why should we care about anything else? What does it matter to us what he thinks, if it is nicer for us?"

Mildred asked the question in the frankest possible way, without a vestige of shame.

Joan smiled slightly, and made no reply.

"It's very dull here, generally," continued Mildred, after a pause, "and it would make a variety if somebody came to see us. I want to know how other people live, and what they do, and all about them—rich people, I mean, who can do as they like, and get what they want. I do hope I shall be rich some day. Is Roy rich, Aunt Joan?"

"I don't know."

"I expect he is, or they wouldn't care so much about asking him here. Poor relations are no good—everybody knows that. Has he lived with rich people all his life?"

"I believe so."

"Oh, then I hope he will come. I should so like to see him and to talk to him. Mamma knows about things, but she won't tell me; she says it doesn't matter to me. But, perhaps, it will matter some day. I shan't always stay here in this horrid old house. When I've saved enough money, I shall start off and see the world. I shall buy a horse and go out like Don Quixote in search of adventures. I can't think why you have been content to stick at home here all your life, Aunt Joan."

Joan smiled a little bitterly but said nothing.

"I shall make friends with Roy," continued Mildred. "I shall make him like me the best—he is sure to detest the boys, they are so hateful, and Nellie never says a word to anybody; but I shall be nice to him, and we shall be friends, and perhaps some day something will come of it. People who have rich relations get on a great deal better than those who have none. I can't think why they never had Roy to stay here before."

Joan made no reply, and the dinner bell stayed the eager flow of Mildred's words. Nothing passed at table on the subject of any prospective change; and Joan's young charges spent the afternoon in the orchard as usual, and she saw nothing of them, though she heard their angry voices in more than one quarrel; but as the dusk was beginning to gather, and she was sitting idle beside the school-room window, her work upon her lap, the door opened softly, little Nellie came creeping in, in her mouse-like fashion, to take up her position upon a footstool at her aunt's feet. Joan was not affectionate or demonstrative. She was not much attached to her brother's children, who had helped to make her hard life harder by their constant claims upon her time; but she had a sort of tenderness for this delicate little youngest one, and the fact that her care had been mainly instrumental in saving the fragile life added to her unwonted affection for her. She laid one hand upon the flaxen head in token of acknowledgment of the child's presence, but she did not speak.

"Aunt Joan," said Nellie at length, "was it Roy's mother who gave you your little Bible that you let me read in sometimes?"

"Yes, Nellie," answered Joan, not thinking it necessary to explain that the mother's name was only adopted. To all practical purposes Roy had been Alicia's son.

"Do you think," pursued the child, "that she ever gave him one too? And do you think she told him what it all meant?"

"I dare say she did, Nellie."

"I wonder if he could explain to me. I wonder if he understands. There are such a lot of things I want to know: and you can't tell me, Aunt Joan."

The hard look had come back to Joan's face, she made no reply.

"Mamma doesn't know either," said Nellie presently. "She is vexed with me if I ask. She says all those things are too hard for children to understand, and that I needn't think any more about them. But I can't help thinking—I have such lots of time only to sit and think. I want to know about the country up in the sky, where the throne is, and the rainbow, and the streets all of gold, and the beautiful stones underneath, and the gates of pearl. I don't care about gold and money—not as Mildred does, or the boys; but I should like to live in the place where people have white robes, and harps, and nobody ever cries, or is ill. Aunt Joan, is there really a place like that? or is it only a sort of a fairy-tale like in our other books?"

Joan sat very still and silent.

"I don't know much about it, Nellie. Some people say it is all true."

"Would Roy know, do you think?"

"I don't know."

"It would be nice if he did. Perhaps he would tell me about it.—If it is a real place, Aunt Joan, do you think real people could get there perhaps?"

"I suppose so."

"Only they would have to learn the way."

"Yes."

Nellie sighed, her eyes still bent upon the sky.

"Perhaps it isn't up there after all, because I don't see how anybody could get there anyhow; only it looks like it sometimes when the sun is just going down, or getting up. Sometimes I can't help thinking I can look right in. Who lives there, Joan? Is it God?"

"I suppose so."

The next question came almost in a whisper—"Aunt Joan, who is God?"

There was no answer. The child hardly expected one. She was fond of putting questions, but not by any means successful in eliciting answers. It was no use asking anybody but Aunt Joan, as she well knew; for Aunt Joan was the only person in the house who ever went to church, and Nellie had a vague notion that there was some solution of her puzzles to be obtained by going there; but she could not walk so far, and perhaps it would not be much use if she could, for even Aunt Joan never seemed to get to know much by her visits. Whether she knew more than she wished to tell; whether she did not care to impart her secrets to an insignificant little girl were open questions with Nellie; but at least she was not angry or impatient at being asked for information, and the child was humbly grateful for that.

"If Roy comes, and if he is nice, and if I'm not afraid, I will ask him," said Nellie to herself. "I do hope he will come and see us. Everybody seems to have things to talk to him about."

CHAPTER XII.—MURIEL.

MURIEL KYNASTON had given very good counsel to Roy when she had advised him to be patient and contented, and to trust his brother's goodwill and generosity; her words had produced a beneficial effect on his mind, and had enabled him to return home in his usual serene spirits. But it is often more easy to give good counsel than to follow it ourselves, and when Roy had left her, Muriel found herself anxiously pondering over all she had heard, and wondering whether, after all, there might not be some grain of truth in Syd's surmises.

Syd was a clever boy, with a good deal of shrewd observation and common sense, and he had a way of hitting the right nail on the head, even when he seemed to be talking most at random. Could it be possible that Marcus Stratford was really actuated by some unworthy motive in keeping his brother at home? Was his wish in reality to shirk expense about him? And was he only sheltering himself behind his step-mother's reluctance to part with Roy, making it out to be a feeling altogether different from what it really was? Muriel did not in the least believe that Mrs. Stratford would have kept her son at home much longer, although she had shown a marked reluctance in making up her mind to part with him. It was an accepted doctrine that boys could not always remain at home, that it was better for them to see something of the world as they advanced in life; and for Marcus to take the line that his step-brother was necessary to his comfort seemed just a little far-fetched. Muriel was not by nature prone to harsh judgments, save inasmuch as the judgments of the young are almost inevitably somewhat hardly defined; but she was intensely sincere and upright, and the least suspicion of self-seeking under a false name stirred her whole nature, and evoked feelings of deeply-seated distaste, not unmingled with a sort of lofty scorn. Wrong was wrong to Muriel, black and hideous, devoid of any redeeming feature, and right was right altogether and unquestionably.

She was too young in years, and too inexperienced in the ways of this complex, difficult world of ours to have realised that evil and good are so closely intermixed that they cannot always be wholly dissevered; that men cannot be sorted out into blacks and whites like the puppets of a chess-board, and kept to their colours in the game of life as they are in the game to which life is not unfrequently compared. Had it not been for very deep religious principle, Muriel might have been disposed to a censoriousness of opinion that would have robbed her character of much of its beauty and attractiveness. But Christianity in all its simple majesty and beauty was too much interwoven with her nature to allow her to fall into this snare. She recognised too fully and freely the common brotherhood of humanity to be over-harsh or hasty in her judgments; and when she did see faults and failings, it was with sorrow and compassion, rather than with any sense of complacency or cynical satisfaction.

Still, being but young, and without the sense of perspective that only advancing years and wider experience can give us, she was prone to over-sensitiveness of feeling and to too sharply-defined outlines of right and wrong, and when once grieved or disappointed in any person, it seemed to her then as if confidence could never be re-established.

Muriel knew this herself, and she did not want to distrust Marcus. She had always been fond of him from her childhood upwards. She had admired him for his talent, his mental and physical powers, for his kind gentleness to herself and her brothers and sisters, and for his filial affection towards his step-mother. She always remembered how people used to prophesy that he would resent his father's second marriage in time, and be a thorn in Mrs. Stratford's side; and that if ever his father died she would soon find herself turned out of the Hermitage, which was entailed upon Marcus. The perfect goodwill and affection that always existed between them had been the best refutation to these surmises, and had done very much to raise Marcus in the estimation of others beside Muriel. But Muriel had of late years been very much in Mrs. Stratford's confidence—the widow had the girl as much with her as her own mother could allow, and talked to her almost as if she had been her child.

In this way Muriel had come to know a great deal about Marcus, and all she had heard was in his favour. She had been prepared to like him from the first, and so far everything she had heard and seen had been in his favour. Three years had been a long gap just at that juncture, for it had come at a time when she was developing from a child into a woman, and it had changed him a good deal too, for he had gone away a successful Oxford athlete and graduate, full of a youth's light-hearted ambition and confidence, and he had returned a grave, self-contained man, not saddened by adversity, but versed in knowledge of the ways of the world in a fashion that had left its traces upon a thoughtful observant mind. His seriousness, mingled as it was with a somewhat keen sense of humour, as well as with a chivalrous courtesy and gentleness of demeanour, had been all in his favour with Muriel. He was not in the least like any one she had ever met before, and a curious undefined feeling when in his presence, that he read her thoughts and knew her opinions before they were pronounced, gave her an idea of power that attracted her, whilst she shrank sometimes a little from it. If the transmission of thought had been mutual, she would have minded it less; but she was aware that he was a sealed book to her. She did not know his nature in the least, nor what his view would be on any given subject; whilst he always seemed to divine hers, and to be ready to take the words out of her lips.

So far she had not resented this at all, for she liked him and felt almost curiously at ease in his society; but if this liking should change, and she should begin to distrust him, the power that had unconsciously attracted her, might begin to exercise an opposite effect. If Marcus were to turn out mean or unworthy in any way, she would not at all like his influence.

And whilst she was musing of past, present, and future, and particularly of Roy's future, she was suddenly aware that Marcus was approaching, lifting his hat as he did so with his rare, sweet smile.

"Alone, Muriel? They told me that I should find Roy here."

"He was here a little while ago; but he has gone home now."

"I thought I was sure to catch him, if I came home this way. Did he remember to ask you, 'as many of you as care to do so,' to join us in an expedition of discovery, so to speak, some day soon? We want to fix the site for the new school, and we should like the benefit of the opinions of people who know more of the place than we do."

Muriel flushed a little, and her eyes brightened and deepened. Many years ago, when first she had been roused to the feeling that something should be done by each and all for the benefit of the poor and needy around, the neglected people of the Crossway hamlet had seemed to her to need her services more than any others. It was two miles across the fields to the place, and three by the road, so it was not very much that Muriel, with her many home duties, could accomplish in the way of visiting or teaching; but what she could do that she did, and did it with all her heart. She would gather the children together whenever opportunity served, to teach them the first rudiments of knowledge, and do what she could to prevent their growing up in absolute heathenism. She talked to the mothers and tried to awaken in them a desire after better things, and she had succeeded in getting one or two families to make an effort to attend church when it was possible, and to send some of the elder children to school. But the distance was a fatal barrier to regular attendance, and it seemed nobody's work to look after the hamlet. The families were those of labouring men, whose ideas did not soar above their "beasts," or their dull, mechanical toil. They did not know, many of them, how to read and write, and they could not be brought to understand that it was of any importance for their children to do so either. Muriel had done something towards arousing them to a vague wish for something more; and she was much beloved personally by all the people, who looked upon her as a sort of angel of mercy, especially in cases of sickness or distress. But Muriel's time and resources were very limited; Joyce could not help her materially yet, though eager to educate ignorance and sweep away abuses, and altogether she had begun to feel almost at the end of her tether, and in despair for the future of the place, when this scheme that she had sometimes discussed with Mrs. Stratford as a castle in the air, seemed suddenly to assume a tangible form, by being taken up by Marcus with a quiet, masculine resolution, that put matters at once upon a different footing. But even now she was taken by surprise at his tone. She had not believed things would be settled so soon.

"Roy did not say anything about it," she said, the colour mantling in her cheeks. "Have you really decided?"

"Quite. It was our mother's wish. She mentioned it more than once. I am hurrying matters on because I should like to get the walls up and the roof on before the winter comes to stop the bricklayers."

Muriel clasped her hands together and said nothing. Marcus did not appear to observe her excitement.

"Well, could you come some day this week to see about it? Who is interested in the plan?"

"Syd and Joyce are, and mother. We will come any day you like to fix. But, Marcus doesn't it cost a lot of money to build a schoolhouse?"

"This one will not be so very large, you see I have not had any estimates taken out yet Any way it will not ruin us. I hope Roy will take an interest in it. I think he wants a stimulus of some kind; he is inclined to be moody at times, which is not at all like him Perhaps the building will give him a healthful outlet for his energies. Shall we say Friday then, for the expedition? We will call for you in the big waggonette. I must be going now as Roy has preceded me. Good-bye."

Muriel sat very still when she was left alone her hands clasped, her eyes fixed on vacancy.

"Oh, how glad and thankful I am! I never, never hoped for anything like this. I am sure nobody need ever distrust Marcus again—at least not on the score of generosity."

MODERN ISLAM.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM JOSEPH SMITH, M.A.

WHEN the newspapers announced that Mr. Cook had contracted to convey the Mohammedan pilgrims from Bombay to Jeddah there was an amused smile. Men marvelled at this linking of ancient history with modern enterprise, and ladies shuddered, picturing to themselves those unsavoury passengers. The intimate connection between this ebb and flow of the annual human tide to Mecca, and the safety of our Indian Empire would probably suggest itself to few. There is a complaint that the English House of Commons can scarcely be persuaded to interest itself in Indian affairs, and it is little likely that a section of those concerns should largely excite the general British public. Yet within recent years there would have been a rebellion in India, to which the Indian mutiny would have been insignificant, had the replies received from the three Mohammedan priests at Mecca been other than they were. The question was distinctly placed before them by the Mohammedan doctors in India, whether the Queen's Indian Mohammedan subjects were bound by their religion to rebel against her Majesty or no. The response, a somewhat oracular one, was as follows:—The Mufti of the Hanafi sect, wrote: "As long as even some of the peculiar observances of Islam prevail in it (i.e. in India), it is Dur-ul-Islam" (i.e. a country of Islam). The Mufti of the Shafi sect wrote to the same purpose. The Mufti of the Maliki sect wrote: "It is written in the commentary of Dasoki that a country does not become Dur-ul-Harb (i.e. a country of the enemy) as soon as it passes into the hands of the infidels, but only when all or most of the injunctions of Islam disappear therefrom."

Now the cause of this appeal to Mecca, an appeal transmitted with at least equal seriousness to that from a Romanist community to the Vatican, was that for half a century there had smouldered within the Indian dominions a rebellious spirit, which an earnest and enthusiastic Moslem had first enkindled about 1820. He "traversed our Provinces with a retinue of devoted disciples, converted the populace by thousands to his doctrine, and established a regular system of ecclesiastical taxation, civil government, and apostolical succession."[1] On his death his Caliph successors continued this secret Crescentade, and although it has been scotched, we can never be sure that it is not even now active, and that what may on the surface have the air of Mohammedan preaching is not animated by stealthy political motive. It should not be forgotten that it was one of these fanatics who assassinated Lord Mayo. The wealthier and more educated Mohammedans might hold aloof from it, and, as far as we know, did so, but they were always under severe pricks of conscience so long as it remained doubtful, whether they were not bound by their faith to resist the English usurpation at all hazards. Fortunately these replies from Mecca, and the still more favourable decisions published by the leading Mohammedan doctors of India itself have soothed their compunctions, and been declarations for peace.

[1] "Our Indian Mussulmans," by Sir W. W. Hunter, p. 44.

There have been of late years two currents of public opinion in England on the Mohammedan question. We have either been assured that Islam was a decrepit and dead faith, which however obstinately professed by its votaries, had done its work in the world; or else we have been startled by graphic pictures of its growth and aggressive attitude. The truth lies between these two, as it will be our business to show. Islam is certainly still spreading, its conquests as a faith are not yet all won, although its national victories are probably at an end, except in Africa, for Turkey is losing ground in Europe, and Russia has absorbed everything between herself and Persia.

In Africa, however, at the present moment, we are confronted with a repetition on a smaller scale of the old progress of Islam in its earliest days. Yet even here, a few reflections will temper the general surprise which seems to have astounded travellers like Winwood Reade, Captain Ellis, and Joseph Thomson, and writers like Bosworth Smith, Dr. Blyden, and Canon Taylor. Within a hundred years from the founding of the faith, Islam had subdued the whole of north Africa down to the southern edge of the Sahara. A thousand years afterwards, when Mungo Park, at the end of last century travelled in the west of Africa along the Gambia, the Senegal, and to the Niger river, Mohammedanism had manifestly begun not long before a forward moment, and the kingdoms along his route were partly Mohammedan, partly Pagan. The present advance over West Africa and West Central Africa, particularly over Nigritia, is therefore to be dated from little more than a hundred years back. Nevertheless, it may prove itself formidable, and require to be reckoned with.

Those however who are amazed at it, and prophesying mighty results from it, should not fail to take note of other new facts. The most prominent of these is the astonishing amount of political attention which Africa generally has received of late from Europe. The Belgians, the French, the Italians, and the Germans have all cast greedy eyes upon that continent. The Germans particularly are establishing themselves both east and west. They have arranged a treaty with the Sultan of Zanzibar, which, whilst it has secured to him a sovereignty along the coast, has limited and bounded his ambition inland. They have formed both trading companies and missionary societies for that eastern side of Africa, and are pressing on with the dogged tenacity of their nation. In 1886 a German merchant was murdered at Tabora either by, or at the instigation of Arab traders. This is an early intimation of the jealousy that will arise when commercial adventure from Europe in this and many other districts east or west comes into competition with the Mohammedans, who are at present the leading traffickers, whether in slaves or other merchandise, over very much of the interior of the continent of Africa.

But it is maintained by many that the extension of Mohammedanism will be a boon to Africa. To decide whether this is likely to be so or no, we must be wary of accepting absolutely either the stories of travellers or the reports of missionaries: since the most accurate observer never wholly escapes the bias of his own prepossessions. Then too there is this to be borne in mind, namely, that the missionary will know only a limited range of country, whilst the traveller, though he has scanned a wider horizon, will have passed over his ground very rapidly. What however is of more consequence is that we are dealing with no new religion. We have the past history of Islam before us, and unless distinctly new elements have entered into this later progress, we can hazard a prophecy of its future from our acquaintance with its past. It will therefore be our object to inquire if there be new elements present in the Islam of to-day.

In this investigation we turn naturally in the first instance to that which is the reforming power within Islam, the Wahabi agitation. For though other spirits of reform have appeared, independently of it, as far as we can judge, they have all more or less coalesced ultimately with it, and fundamentally are now upon the same line. Its influence, as we have seen, affected India, since the founder of the Ferazi movement, although he had founded it before his pilgrimage, was during a visit to Mecca drawn into the circle of the Wahabi attraction. To it, again, we owe the Mahdi's success in the Soudan. In short, the apostles of this teaching are countless, and they are moving up and down restlessly through the whole length and breadth of Mohammedanism, preaching in mosques and bazaars, and propagating the creed of the Prophet, wherever they can. Now they have been styled the Puritans of Islam. "Their two great principles are the Unity of God, and the abnegation of self." According to Mr. Palgrave, they are believers in the most naked fatalism. According to Sir William Hunter, one of their tenets is a "constant recognition, both in theory and practice, of the obligation to wage war upon the infidels," and another is a "constant looking for the Prophet (Imam) who will lead the true believers to victory over the infidels." Indeed the general consensus of testimony about them is that they themselves would be the first to repel an insinuation that there was the slightest intention of innovation on their part. Their one fanatical longing is for a revival of the primitive times.

Perhaps we can present no clearer illustration of all this than in the case of the Snoussi, a wonderful order of Mohammedan missionaries established about 1843 or earlier, and having its headquarters at a little town of 7000 or 8000 inhabitants in the oasis of Jerbal, up in the corner of the Libyan Desert, not far from the confines of Egypt and Tripoli. They are said now to number some three millions, and to be in intimate relations with other similar orders. They are bound to abstain, not only from alcohol, but also from coffee and tobacco, and their monks, as we should style them, must hand over the surplus of their capital, beyond a very small figure, to the common chest. Here, then, if anywhere, we shall light upon the new departure, if there be one in the present progress of Islam. Yet of these it is reported that they have "la double mission de résister à l'influence chrétienne et à la civilisation européenne," that they swear each of them "une haine éternelle à tous les ennemis de l'Islam, même aux Musulmans assez faibles et assez imprudents pour admirer la civilisation européenne et consentir à des concessions en sa faveur." [1]

In all this there is manifestly no desire for fresh ideas, but, on the contrary, a dead set against modern notions, and an intense zeal for the older paths. It is doubtful indeed which they hate with more fierce hatred, the Christian or the recreant Mohammedan. For, to their thinking, a Mohammedan is recreant, who favours modern notions, and is infected with European fashions.

But much has been made of the education in the Mohammedan schools, since every mosque has its school, and we are told of a learned professor at Timbuctoo, who has studied Aristotle, and who has had books purchased for him in Europe. Yet this is nothing new, seeing that Aristotle has been translated into Arabic for seven hundred years. Also, according to the old adage, one swallow does not make a summer. There are in India, for example, numbers of educated Mohammedans, who would reject the miraculous and manifestly superstitious in the Koran and in the Commentaries, and who are practically Deists. But these latitudinarians have very little influence with their co-religionists, and are too insignificant in number, to weigh in the general appraisement.

The three bright spots in the past history of Islam were with the Moors in Spain, with the famous Haroun al Raschid at Bagdad and his sons, and in the days of Akbar in India. These, however, were altogether exceptional, and against the genius and instinct of that religion, so much so that the Jaunpore lawyers declared it was lawful to rebel against Akbar, esteeming him no better than an infidel; at the Bagdad Court men were persecuted unless they were freethinkers; and the Spanish Moors, when they recrossed to Africa, quickly retrograded. Education in Mohammedan schools everywhere is strictly religious, which means that there is no natural science, and little secular history, and that everything is founded upon the Koran and the Traditions. It is in truth mainly an exercise of memory, and as purely imitative as the gabbling of the Confucian Classics under a Chinese teacher. One fact alone is sufficient to convict it of a lack of intelligent direction. The Koran has never been translated by its professors into a single vernacular. They would account it sacrilege to pass into another language the sacred syllables of that book whose inspiration is approved by the exquisite purity and excellence of its Arabic sentences. To this article of conscience they still strictly adhere, although according to the highest calculation, barely a third of the total number of Mohammedans can speak Arabic. The Rev. W. R. Blackett, now at Nottingham, and formerly in India and when there a member of the Government Education Commission, writes: "I once had a young man in the Diocesan school a convert from Mohammedanism, the son of a Mollah, fairly educated with a view to becoming a Mollah himself, who once did me a good turn in a discussion by quoting an apt piece of Persian poetry, which he could not translate, but only knew the general drift of. Nor did he, I believe, know the meaning of the daily prayers, though of course he recited them. He is now a Christian and a very useful catechist and an eloquent preacher."

What Mohammedan education is everywhere else not more than that will it be in Africa, if indeed it is not less. Of the much-vaunted cleanliness too we would remark that, although this is strictly enjoined, like many other matters, it becomes in practice frequently a question of locality, temperament and race. For example, Sir J. Risely Griffith, in the official issue of the Sierra Leone Census for 1881, has this paragraph:—"The Fulahs may be said to be descended from the Arab tribes, and their features somewhat resemble those of Europeans. They reside mostly in the country known as Fulah, or the Foulah country, the inhabitants of which were originally Soolimahs. They are Mohammedan in religion, and bring us cattle and hides, gold and beeswax. They are a fine looking race; but, unfortunately, of uncleanly habits, they seem to have a natural aversion to clean clothes. As a race they may be briefly described as dirty but rich." In passing we may observe that there would seem to be amongst Mohammedans generally a liking for the leather trade. We find them in China as sellers of leather, and in India as wholesale leather merchants, whilst the terms Morocco and Persian as applied to classes of leather bookbinding bespeak the same reputation in other countries.

But there is one virtue attributed to the followers of Mohammed, and that is abstinence from intoxicating drinks. This again is not new. The prohibition of strong liquors has existed from the very first, and if there be signs of change in this respect now, it is, we may apprehend, a change slightly for the worse. At the same time, our tribute of praise ought, in this matter, to be always frankly accorded them; and it would be niggardly to minimise it by producing evidence of the exceptions to the rule. There are no doubt even Mohammedans in East Africa who own distilleries, and the evil of drinking has penetrated into Turkey. So too there are Persians in Ispahan who flock into Julfa to drink. Unfortunately these blots where we can trace them are often due to the example or to the temptation of so-called Christians. On the other hand, the Mohammedans very largely smoke strong narcotics, whilst the indulgence of sensual desire under a polygamous system leaves them open to the retort that

[1] Les Missions Musulmanes au dix-neuvième Siècle, by Edouard Montet, in the "Revue de l'histoire des religions" for May-June, 1885.

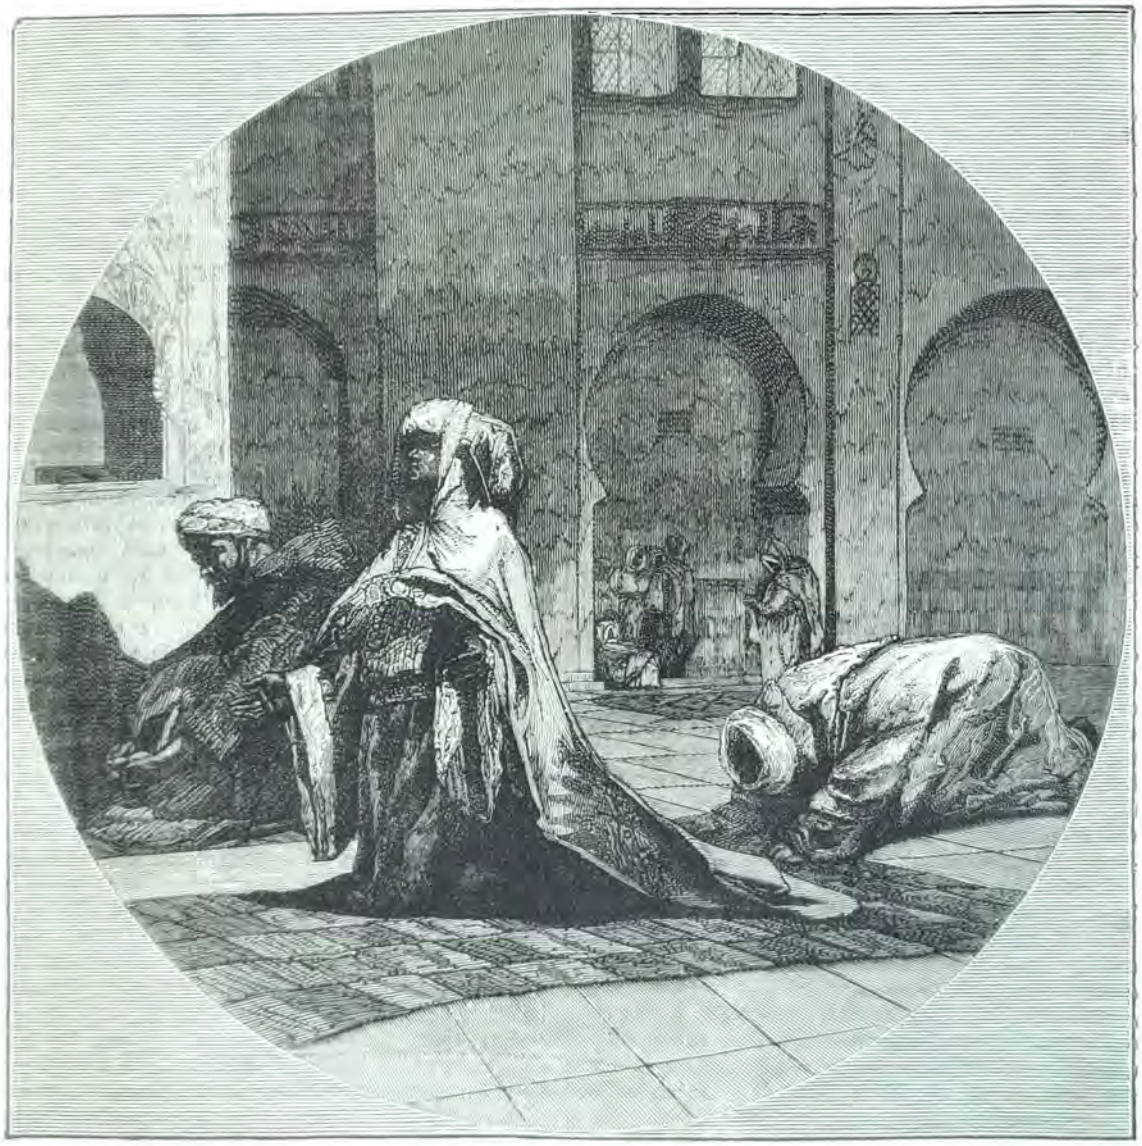
> They compound for sins they are inclined to
> By damning those they have no mind to.

Nevertheless, we would that Christians were guiltless of this baneful traffic, and also that Christians everywhere were as proud of their purer religion as Mohammedans always are of theirs. In these two respects they set us an example which may well make us ashamed of ourselves. The Mohammedan trader and the Mohammedan soldier is always a missionary for the faith of Islam. Of course the demands of that religion upon a man's moral conduct are less severe, and the regulations he has to submit to, such as the daily prayers, and the fast of Ramazan, are those which can be fulfilled without change of heart.

There remains still one urgent topic, and yet one of such delicacy that we can scarcely treat it without employing language that must pain. It is the subject of polygamy. It will perhaps be sufficient to say here that what this evil has been in the past, it is still to-day. Polygamy must ever be degrading to woman, and polygamy accentuated, as it is in the Mohammedan system, by unlimited license of divorce must be infinitely degrading.



THE HOUR OF PRAYER.

Kindred with this is the sore question of slavery. The celebrated Zebehr, in his detention at Gibraltar, delivers his opinion on this head, as follows:—"He could only say with regard to the present time that when the Mussulmans of Cairo and Constantinople spoke with western statesmen of the entire abolition of slavery in those countries, they spoke of what they knew in their hearts to be impossible. They are well aware that the country is not yet prepared for it." "The only branch of the slave trade for which he had no toleration was that which provides the harems with attendants. Of this he spoke in strong terms, as forbidden by the Koran, by far the most cruel, and at the same time unfortunately the most profitable department of human traffic. He condemned it without reserve, while he pointed out that the law of supply and demand, acting upon it, would ensure its continuance so long as the possession of these attendants remained lawful."[1] Of slavery a great authority, the Rev. T. P. Hughes, writes thus: "That Mohammed ameliorated the condition of the slave as it existed under the heathen laws of Arabia we cannot doubt, but it is equally certain that the Arabian legislator intended it to be a perpetual institution." ('Notes on Mohammedanism,' p. 195.) Nevertheless, we are told that in Africa, slavery, which already exists amongst its Pagan races, will, as Mohammedanism advances, become "regulated." That means that, if one great empire stretches across the country, or a confederation of the kingdoms, then within those bounds, predatory raids will cease, and the domestic requirements will depend upon supplies from outside. Thus the price will go up, and the slave be cared for as a costly prize animal, ultimately perhaps obtaining freedom, and merging in the general community.

This all again resolves itself into the point as to whether, as Mr. Joseph Thomson and Canon Taylor contend, this advance of the Mohammedan in West Central Africa is a peaceful march. If it be to any great extent of this character, this certainly would be a novel feature in the history of Islam. Doubtless, in Liberia, Sierra Leone, or Lagos, whatever gains are won to that religion must be obtained by peaceable methods. Probably, too, the superior wealth and trading ability of the Mohammedan merchant commend him to the less prosperous natives, and they are not unwilling to embrace a cult, which offers such material advantages. King Mtesa, of Uganda, on the other side of Africa, frankly admitted to Mr. Stanley that this had been his motive in taking the step, and he was equally ready to adopt Christianity, if it offered higher material inducements. Ultimately, as we know, he died a bigoted heathen. Mungo Park notes the mysterious awe which the faculty of writing inspired in native minds. He himself, when Mohammedans had plundered him, and left him destitute, worked part of his way back to the coast by writing charms, or saphies, as he calls them, which were merely English words scribbled on pieces of paper. These the heathen bought as readily as they did the Mohammedan saphies. In Mungo Park's pages, too, we have graphic pictures of the "Moors" as horse-stealers, cattle-lifters, and missionaries who converted rulers and people very much on the "your money or your life" principle. It is also possible, from Dr. Blyden's book, to glean ample evidence of similar action, as at the capture of towns like Falaba and Fulindiyah. Very little indeed is as yet really known of the details of the Mohammedan progress in those regions. Should it ever be chronicled, we suspect the pages will show a more sanguinary tint than some eulogists of Islam would like to see. Archdeacon Hamilton has spoken of the Sultan of Nupè's use of cannibal troops, and Zebehr boasted with cynical satisfaction that the inhabitants of Darfour in the Soudan were more afraid of the teeth of his soldiers than of their bullets. And yet the folk of Darfour were Mohammedan.

On the whole, we are driven to conclude that this progress of Islam exhibits no essentially new features; that although in some districts, such as Dahomey and Ashantee, it would be a gain for the time if the Mohammedans took them, since the change would at any rate put an end to human sacrifices and other unutterable abominations, yet the strict inference, which all philosophy of history would dictate, is that we have here no new phenomenon, and that consequently we are not without forecast as to its future. That forecast the history of Islam in the past amply supplies, and unfortunately such a forecast cannot be altogether promising.

[1] See the remarkable papers about this man in the Contemporary Review for last September, October, and November.

Sabbath Thoughts.

NIGHT AND MORNING.

"For His anger is but for a moment; in His favour is life; weeping may tarry for the night, but joy cometh in the morning."—Psa. xxx. 5, R.V.

THESE words from the Revised, are almost the same, as those of the Authorised, Version, but in the margin we read, "His favour is for a lifetime," a change which has so commended itself to the American revisers that they have desired that it may exchange places with that of the text. Whichever reading we may adopt, a precious truth is brought before us; but the newer form, joined with the marginal reading of the second clause, brings out some remarkable contrasts. There we find "weeping may come in to lodge at even"; and in the margin of the Revised Version, instead of "joy" we have "singing" cometh in the morning. Anger, for a moment; favour, for a lifetime. Weeping, a wayfarer, coming in to lodge at even; singing, returning in the morning as one at home. Therefore, going back to the fourth verse, "Sing praise unto the Lord, O ye saints of His, and give thanks unto His holy name." Let us remember this when weeping cometh, as come it will, more or less, during our earthly career. It will not remain for ever to embitter our days and nights, like a polar night of death and darkness. This is not the lot our Heavenly Father has appointed for the lifetime of His children; "his favour is for a lifetime"! The sun will return, and with it the songs of the morning: and the dark guest who came in to lodge at even, filling our hearts with anguish, will vanish before the glorious light of day, emblem of that brighter light and that more glorious dawning, when "God will wipe away all tears from their eyes."

FOR BETTER FOR WORSE.

PART I.

"Those whom God hath joined, let no man put asunder."

THESE are solemn words, and calculated to awaken solemn thoughts, even in the most thoughtless, for they are uttered at the most important crisis in human lives.

What can be of greater consequence than the step which unites two lives, "for better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health," until death shall part them?

If the union be a true and godly one, entered into after due consideration and earnest prayer for God's guidance and blessing, what will its future bring? Surely it will mean the bettering of all that is good, the increased strength which comes of unity, the manifestation and steady growth of sympathy, unselfishness, tenderness, forbearance, kindness, and affection.

It will mean that, despite the ills that flesh is heir to, and the troubles from which human nature cannot expect to be exempt, there will be sunshine in heart and home, the wiping away of tears, the doubling of joys, the lightening of sorrows. It will mean the spending of years to come in the closest and sweetest of all earthly relationships, and the influencing for good and God's service, of generations yet unborn.

It will mean that the two who have become one, will walk heavenward, hand in hand, heart to heart, perchance, at times, with an inward dread, hidden by each for the other's sake, of the separation that must come, and again conquered by faith which rests on God's promises and looks with sure and certain hope, for a blessed, eternal re-union in our Father's house above where partings are unknown.

These are the blessings that may be expected to follow in the lives of those whom God has truly joined together. But, as we glance around us, we cannot help thinking that a great proportion of the marriages which take place are not entered into in this spirit. Nay, which of us cannot recall many instances where marriages have been contracted and these solemn responsibilities entered into, after an acquaintance of only a few hours, and when neither of the contracting parties has had any certain knowledge of the character, habits or antecedents of the other? Anything more dangerous than such a joining of lives cannot be imagined. Can it be said of such couples that God has joined them, when He has never entered into their thoughts, His guidance has not been desired, or His blessing asked for?

About a year ago I was speaking on this subject to a Catholic priest, whom I met during an autumn holiday, and he told me the following story:

"I had for a long time been greatly distressed at the reckless manner in which many of the poorer members of my flock entered on the sacred ties of marriage, and I was longing for an opportunity of checking this custom.

"Reasonings and warnings had alike failed hitherto, and I was often called on to join two people as man and wife, who knew almost nothing of each other. Mere street acquaintances, or couples who had met in the most desultory fashion and resolved on a life-long union, without taking the smallest precaution or making any inquiry as to each other's previous character.

"Finding that my serious efforts had been fruitless, I determined to try another plan whenever the opportunity offered itself.

"I was sitting in my study one evening, when I was informed that a woman wished to speak to me, and I at once recognised in my visitor a member of my congregation, named Mary Flynn. She hesitated before telling the object of her call, hung down her head, twisted the corner of her apron around her fingers, and, at last, when questioned, told me that she wished her banns to be declared on the following Sunday.

"'All right,' said I, 'I will enter the names. Yours, Mary Flynn, I know well enough, of course, but what is the man called whom you are going to marry in such a hurry?'

"There was no immediate reply, but after another interval of hesitation and confusion of manner on my visitor's part, she replied, 'Indeed, thin, Father Michael, I don't just remimber me of his name this minute!'

"I guessed how things were, and that the pair had picked each other up in the promiscuous manner so common to their class, so I said: 'Never mind his name just now. That can easily be made right afterwards. You can leave the matter in my hands.'

"Mary went away perfectly contented, and I was no less so, for she had given me the opportunity I had been wishing for, and I promptly decided what to do under these unusual circumstances. You must, however, understand that Mary Flynn was no mere girl, whose youth might have been some excuse for her reckless folly, or I should first have tried other means. She was a grown woman, and by that I mean a person of from thirty to thirty-five years of age, so may be, poor body! she thought it was now or never.

"When Sunday came, Mary was in church and heard her banns published in my clearest tones, and in the following words: 'I declare the banns of marriage, between Mary Flynn and a man whose name I do not know; you do not know; and I am quite sure she does not know, for she told me so herself.'

"As I had foreseen, an audible titter ran through the whole congregation, when I ended this announcement, not a desirable thing in a church and during service, but I thought the end justified the means.

"Mary Flynn was a centre of attraction to all eyes, and very uncomfortable she looked. She had to stand many a joke afterwards, for people would keep on asking her, 'Well, Mary, when's the wedding to be? When will ye be married to the man without a name?'

"During the following week I met her myself, and said, 'How did you feel, Mary, when I declared your banns?'

"'Ah, Father Michael,' she answered, 'I felt awful sore inside.'"

I asked the priest's permission to make use of this story, and he replied, "Write it and welcome. It is strictly true, and I have often told it myself, as an illustration of the matter we have been talking about. My mode of declaring Mary Flynn's banns did more to check reckless marriages amongst my flock, than any amount of sober argument had previously effected."

In repeating the anecdote, I have changed nothing but the surname of the heroine. It has its ludicrous side, but it has also a very sad one. There could, of course, be no legal marriage without the name being given, but the priest's caution was an efficacious word in season. The old proverb, "Marry in haste and rue at leisure," has been dinned into the ears of one generation after another, but with little effect. Persons of all ages marry in haste, and recking nothing of the rueing which, in such unions, must come too late.

It is perhaps hardly possible to influence those of mature years, but when we think how many young lives are blighted, how many bright girls are made old before their time, through being weighted with the care and suffering entailed by reckless marriages, it is surely worth while to try and save these dear, thoughtless young creatures from themselves.

Let us first ask amongst what classes such unions are most frequent, and what circumstances conduce to them? Undoubtedly, people of all ranks make imprudent marriages. But it is our young working men, and maidens employed in factories, or as domestic servants, who are exposed to peculiar temptations, owing to the positions they occupy.

Take the factory girls, for instance, and under this head we include workers employed in very varied industries. Amongst these, early marriages are proverbial. I could give particulars of many such, between working boys and girls not out of their teens. Of young fathers and mothers considerably under twenty, whose own parents did not interfere by a single word, to prevent them from marrying at such an early age and with such insufficient means.

In some cases, perhaps, they were hardly sorry for an event which took away one from the over-crowded home, especially if the youth or girl were living in the independent fashion so common amongst factory hands, paying a trifle for lodgings and "finding themselves," or giving only what covered the bare cost of food, and rendering no help in the household work, however weary and worn-out the mother might be with her family cares.

The girl says, and with some reason, "I have been hard at work since early morning. I have earned my own bread, and am too tired to begin again. I want a quiet place to sit down in, if I stay at home;" or, "I must have some sort of change, between this and bed-time."

Home is not always an inviting place to the tired young worker. It may be that the girl is blessed with good Christian parents, that watch over the welfare of their children, and advise them wisely and lovingly. There may be order and method in the home, and to those who dwell there, it may be the best and most inviting place in which to rest after the day's toil. Thank God! there are many such which it is a delight to enter. But only too often the state of things presents a sorrowful contrast to this bright picture.

The mother may be a slattern, and when the tired girl goes home, she sees the unswept hearth, the table covered with unwashed crockery and scraps from the last meal. The younger children may be crying or clamouring round the fireside, and the mother, unused to any other way of obtaining order, scolding and driving them from it, with hard names and blows. No prospect of a peaceful, orderly tea-table, and a girl may well be sick at heart of such a state of things, and turn anywhere and to any person who offers a chance of a change for the better.

So the young creature snatches a mouthful alone, and hurries out into the streets to choose her own companions, and get through the hours as best she may until bed-time. There she probably meets others similarly situated, and the girls stroll along together in knots, laughing, singing, sometimes bandying jokes with similar knots of youths who may or may not be acquaintances.

Such street meetings are often the beginnings which end in marriages of the kind so much to be deplored. "Who can wonder that girls listen with pleasure to the compliments, and respond to the flattering words and admiring looks even of strangers, when on the home-side there is neither sympathy nor comfort? What sacred bond can there be between mothers and daughters such as these?"

Well might the speaker ask these questions as he passed along the street on a summer evening. A mother had just driven two of her children into the house with fierce words and blows. A girl, evidently a factory worker, rushed past her into the street to escape the storm, and was followed by a torrent of abuse which the mother shrieked after her in impotent rage.

What wonder if the girl lent a willing ear when a neighbour youth spoke honied words, and asked her to turn her back upon the miserable place she called home—once and for all? They were both earning fairly good wages. The amounts added together seemed riches. Why not marry and have a little home of their own? True, they had nothing saved; but they were young, strong, hopeful for the future, and sick at heart of their present surroundings. Would not a single room with the few sticks of furniture that could be scraped together to begin with, be heaven itself in comparison?

They were not going to be satisfied with so little. They would work, save, get more things together by degrees, and be as happy as the day is long.

So the boy and girl become man and wife, and for a little while, think their dreams are going to be realised. But it takes many weeks of saving to add two or three articles to their household goods, and long before the one room has an appearance of comfort, the young wife is unable to work, a new voice is heard there, a babe fills her arms, and has to be sustained on the diminished income earned by the husband alone.

Often the girl-mother goes back to her work before she is fit for it, and pays for so doing by life-long bodily suffering. We all know how the succeeding chapters in the story are filled up in too many cases. There is a growing family, without growing means to meet its wants. Solemn responsibilities increasing from year to year, without increasing fitness to fulfil them. The couple who are linked for life—or ought to be so—find that all is worse for them instead of better. They discover failings in each other that they neither suspected nor troubled their heads about beforehand, and they have not patience to bear and forbear, nor strength to conquer faults in themselves, nor the love that finds excuses for and forgives in the other. In the girl-wife her mother's story is repeated. In the young husband's case, he perhaps reproaches himself for his folly in allowing himself to be deluded by a pretty face, and burdened with a helpless creature who has never been taught how to turn his earnings to good account, or make their dwelling worthy of the name of home.

So these two, who should be one in heart and life, in aims and hopes, working and walking together, drift farther apart day by day. The children who ought to be precious links, binding the parents in closer union, are regarded as fetters which help to imprison them within a narrow round, make bread-winning harder, work more constant, and crowd their parents' rough path with ever-growing cares and anxieties.

The dwelling is a shelter for the family, but no longer a home. The music of kind words is not heard under its roof. The sunshine of a loving look does not steal over one face to be reflected in that of another. Yet, such music and such light must be heard and seen in every true home.

Marriage entered upon without prayer, is not likely to be sanctified by the united petitions of husband and wife in after days. Baby lips are not taught to call upon "Our Father," and these, all unconscious of wrong, will sometimes echo the oath with which the earthly parent profanes that holy name, as he slams the door behind him, and goes to seek brightness, warmth, and cleanliness by the ale-house fire, and, alas! forgetfulness of all beneath his own roof.

These are sorrowful pictures, but they are true to the life, and by no means the worst that could be shown as the result of reckless marriages.

RUTH LAMB.

THE PARABLES OF OUR LORD.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

II.—THE PARABLE OF THE SOWER.

ONE of the first parables spoken by our Lord, is also one of the most familiar, and is so much more easily understood, because our Lord Himself gave the interpretation of it to His disciples: it is called the Parable of the Sower. We find it in the three first gospels; and here let us notice that there are no parables given in the gospel according to St. John. There are a few allegorical sayings, such as "I am the true vine," and "I am the good shepherd"; but there is no real parable.

On the day that Jesus Christ spoke the Parable of the Sower, He had been vehemently rebuking the scribes and Pharisees, who wanted Him to show them a sign from heaven, which He refused to do. We must always remember that the Pharisees were considered the most religious persons of that time; and that the scribes were the men whose whole business was to write out and study the books in the Old Testament. They ought themselves to have been sowers of good seed, teaching the people the truths of the Old Testament and so preparing their hearts to receive the words of Jesus Christ. Instead of this they were always setting themselves against Him, and striving to make Him say or do some wrong or foolish thing. At this time He seems to have grown weary of talking with them, and He left them and went out of the house, down to the shore of the lake, and sat down there to rest Himself, and to find that calm and peace which His strife with the quarrelsome Pharisees had troubled. But the people who had been listening to Him in the house followed Him, and as they passed through the streets of Capernaum, others joined them, eager to hear and see what was likely to happen. For Jesus had spoken very severely to the Pharisees, and some of them no doubt wished to hear Him upbraid them again—it is a common thing for people to take pleasure in hearing others blamed. A great multitude, therefore, soon gathered about Jesus, as He sat resting on the shore. Seeing how thick the crowd was, and how they thronged Him, so that only a few could see and hear Him, Jesus got into a boat, and had it pushed a little way from the shore, so that He could be seen and heard by the multitude. And now, what is Jesus Christ going to say?

All the country round the lake was very beautiful. The soil was very fruitful, and there were oliveyards and vineyards, and orange and date trees growing in rich abundance. The city of Capernaum was the largest place on the lake, but all along the shores lay little hamlets and farm-houses dotted here and there among the oliveyards and vineyards. So clear the air was, and so bright the sunshine, that distant objects could be seen quite plainly. The fishermen, letting down their nets, or drawing them in and out of the sparkling waters, the vine-dressers at work among the spreading vines, the labourers digging in the fields, the boats of merchandise setting sail from the city wharf, the women grinding corn at their doors for the bread they were about to bake; all these things could be seen by the crowd and by Jesus Christ. Possibly it was in the early spring, and there may have been within sight some husbandmen at work sowing their seed broadcast. To sow broadcast is to take the seed up by handfuls, and throw it against the wind, which scatters it hither and thither. The good seed falls at once upon the soil, which has been broken up and ploughed for it; but the lighter seed is carried farther away by the wind, and falls upon the hard-trodden footpath, and the neglected corners where thorns grow, and upon the rocky ground, on which the plough can make no furrows.

THE SOWER.

"Behold!" said Jesus Christ, to the crowd listening eagerly for Him to speak, "the sower went forth to sow, and as he sowed some fell by the way side, and the birds came and devoured them; and others fell upon the rocky places, where they had not much earth, and straightway they sprang up, because they had no deepness of earth; and when the sun was risen they were scorched; and because they had no root they withered away. And others fell upon thorns, and the thorns grew up and choked them, and others fell upon the good ground and yielded fruit, some a hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty. He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

I think the multitude must have been disappointed. They were used to parables, and this seemed a very simple one. Jesus had not taught them in this way before; He had spoken things much more difficult to understand. Even His disciples were surprised, and came to ask Him why He did it. What could He mean, also, by saying "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear"? Were not all these people hearing Him? Had they followed Him for any other purpose? But Jesus knew that only a few of those who were in the crowd were really listening to Him with a wish to learn. For more than a year He had been living in their towns and villages, teaching them about the kingdom of God; He had been doing mighty works among them; He had gone about doing good, yet they did not seem to learn, or understand, or remember. They might have heard, and seen, and understood; but they did not. So now He would speak to them in parables, which would sink into the memories of some of them, and after lying there perhaps many years, as the seed lies for months in the ground, the husk would decay, and the truth Jesus wished to teach would spring up in their hearts. "Why speakest Thou in parables?" asked the disciples. "Because," said Jesus, "they have eyes, but they see not; they have ears, but they hear not, neither do they understand. When they understand they will be converted, and God will heal them."

But the Lord explained the parable to His disciples.

The sower is the Lord Himself, come forth from His Father's house to sow the seed. The seeds are the truths He teaches; the field is the world; the ground on which the truth falls is the hearts of men; the multitude to whom He had just spoken represented all the classes, who in after times should hear His word.

The first class were those who turned a deaf ear to Him, and closed their eyes to His mighty works, and hardened their hearts against Him. They were like the trodden-down pathway, made so hard by constantly passing footsteps, that not even a blade of grass could spring up; when the words of Jesus Christ fell upon their ears, they could penetrate no farther into their nature, and evil thoughts at once devoured them up. It was impossible to them to understand that the poor in spirit, the mourners, the meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peace-makers, were the only ones blessed by God. They thought the rich, and the powerful, and the learned were God's favourites, and they did not believe Jesus that it was not so. They could not comprehend that Jesus was able to deliver them from their sins as He was able to cast out devils from the possessed. They were too hardened, and too dull to know they were sinners. They had not chosen to hear, so now they were deaf; they had not chosen to see, so their eyes were blinded; they had not chosen to understand, and their hearts had grown stupid and foolish. They might live and prosper in this world, be rich, and powerful, and learned; but they could not enter the kingdom of heaven. "When any one heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it not, then cometh the evil one, and snatcheth away that which hath been sown in his heart."

Are we ourselves trying to hear what God says, and to see what He does, and to understand both His words and His works? Are we letting the evil that is within us so harden our hearts against what is good and true, that every day it becomes more difficult to understand truth and goodness? Every wrong thought, and word, and action, is like a heavy foot-step treading down the desire to be good, and in time our hearts will grow as hard as the stones on which we walk. Like the scribes and Pharisees we shall only seek Christ that we may kill Him.

Jesus knew that His words had fallen, like the seeds in the clefts of the rocks, into the hearts of some of the people, and just as the seed grew up quickly, so they had been at once full of joy and eager to become His followers. They were glad to enter into the kingdom of heaven if it was all sunshine and glory, and happiness; they were quite willing to sit down with Him on His throne, and ready to help Him to judge His enemies. But now His enemies were growing many, and the scribes and Pharisees from Jerusalem were persecuting Him; and it was plain that the kingdom of heaven meant something else than joy and triumph. The hot sun of persecution which was beating on His head scorched them up, and the tribulation we all need to thresh away the chaff in us was too bitter for them; they went away, and walked no more with Him. Is it so with any of us? The words of Christ must take a deep root in our souls before we can bear temptation and sorrow. It is no easy thing to enter into the kingdom of heaven; we can only take possession of it by doing violence to our sinful and selfish natures. We must suffer as Christ suffered, and fight as He fought, before we can reign with Him.

The third class of our Lord's listeners were those who had received His words into hearts full of thorns; some were filled with cares of many kinds, which they would not cast away, others were deceived by their riches and possessions, and others desired the things of this world more than the kingdom of heaven. It is true some of the lighter seed had fallen into these hearts, and grew up somehow; but the thorns choked them, and the good seed could not grow at all. The outer forms of religion, and the easier precepts of Christ, found a place in their lives; but there was no real fruit, for the thorns flourished most, and exhausted all that was strong in their hearts. Like the scribes and Pharisees who paid tithe on mint, anise, and cummin, but who neglected judgment, and mercy, and truth, these hearers were ready for the small duties of God's house; but had not time or strength for doing the weighty and the real service.

One of our Lord's own chosen disciples belonged to this class. He heard all His teaching, and to him Jesus showed the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven; yet Judas was so deceived by the love of riches, and the cares of this life, that not one seed could grow up in his heart unchoked. He could wait upon Jesus Christ, and follow Him month after month; but he never had an honest and true heart, which could hear His word and hold it fast, and bring forth fruit with patience.

Of the three classes of hearers, the first rejected Christ, the second forsook Him, the third betrayed Him. Let us pray to God to keep us from belonging to any of them.

But there were other hearers, whose hearts were like the rich soil, turned up by the plough and ready for the good seed to fall into its furrows. Even here there was some difference. The seed was the same, but the fruit varied; some was thirty, some sixty, some a hundredfold, according to the conditions which surrounded it. So the truths taught by Christ produce smaller or greater results, according to our own acceptance of them. If we take them deep down into our hearts, pondering over them, and doing our utmost to understand them, then we shall bring forth more fruit than if we give less thought and less love to them.

I have spoken as if there was lighter seed in distinction to good seed. Let me give you some clue to the meaning of this. The lighter seed are those precepts about our outer conduct, such as in the Sermon on the Mount, about fasting, saying prayers, avenging ourselves, laying up treasure, being careful for the morrow, and such like; all of which are good, and some easy to observe. But the good seed which must sink very deeply into our hearts before they can bring forth fruit, are the profounder truths such as the love of God, the salvation of the soul from sin by Jesus Christ, the necessity of self-sacrifice, and others, which we must all seek out and learn for ourselves. These are the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, which it is given unto His disciples to know.

"I will not let Thee go."

"I WILL not let Thee go, except Thou bless me!"
Rise, drooping heart, and Jacob's courage show;
When sorrow's night is here, and cares oppress thee,
Say to thy God, "I will not let Thee go."

Yes, thou art feeble, and there is none greater Than He Whom thou dost venture to assail;
Thou art the creature, He is the Creator,
Yet, Jacob-like, the weaker shall prevail.

For One, who erst for love of thee dared wrestle
With Heaven's just wrath and Satan's force arrayed,
Yet to Whose gentle heart a child might nestle,
Is with thee still to strengthen and to aid.

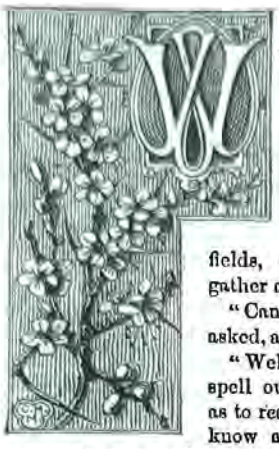
His legacy of love thou dost inherit,
He bids thee follow where His footsteps trod;
And in the might of thy Redeemer's merit,
E'en as a prince thou shalt have power with God.

Then strive till dawn, although the strife distress thee;
Be swift to say of worldly strength laid low,
"It is well lost! But oh, except Thou bless me,
My God, my Hope, I will not let Thee go."

SYDNEY GREY.

MISSY.

CHAPTER II.



HILE this change in the child's life was being talked over by her mother in so cool and business-like a fashion, Missy, with her hand closely clasped in Christopher's horny brown fingers, was walking in the fields, stopping now and then to gather an early primrose or violet.

"Can you read, Chris'fer?" she asked, as she sat arranging her flowers.

"Well, yes, Missy, I can manage to spell out a bit when I want to, but as to reading off fine and smart, I don't know as I could manage that. I was never a prize boy at school."

"I wish you could read nicely, and then you could teach me, Chris'fer. The little girl where we lodge can read; she read beautiful to me. She said she went to Sunday-school and to church, and she read to me out of the book she used there. I asked mother to let me go to Sunday-school and to church, but she said I wasn't to bother."

"I spect she read out o' the Bible, Missy. Can ye tell me what 'twas about?"

"Oh, yes; I 'member all about it. 'Twas about Adam and Eve, and a beautiful garden. Just fancy now, Chris'fer; there wasn't nobody else in the world but those two. Just mustn't it have been funny? It wouldn't have been no use for those two to have a show and go round, 'cause there wouldn't be no one to go to it. It was a pity too, 'cause the animals was all tame then; they didn't eat anybody. And when Adam wanted 'em, he just called 'em up, and gave 'em what names he liked; so it would have been easy to catch 'em and put 'em into their cages, wouldn't it, Chris'fer?"

"That's so, Missy. 'Twould be a deal nicer to be able to walk into old Congo's den without thinking that he'd claw a bit out of you if he got the chance. But what else did the little lass read?"

"Oh, a lot more, Chris'fer, about the garden; it was a beautiful place. I spect it was like that beautiful place you took me to last summer. Don't you 'member the trees and the summer-houses?—and oh! that lovely little river with the fish. Yes, I spect it was very much like that, 'cause the Book said there was rivers in that garden—four rivers; and I 'member there was something about gold in one river. I wonder if that river we saw last summer had any gold in it, Chris'fer? Couldn't we go and look some day, and if there was we'd pick it up. P'r'aps there are sovereigns there, and we could pick 'em up like I did the pretty little shells on the beach, when we were by the sea; and then, Chris'fer, we wouldn't have to wait till I was growed up before we got over our show. We'd pick up the sovereigns—ever so many; we'd fill all our pockets full, and then we'd go and buy the animals, wouldn't we?"

"Ay, ay, Missy, that we would! But I don't spect there's any sovereigns in the river we saw; if they ever was there they'd be gone long afore this. But what else was there in the Book about that garden?"

"There was something about the trees; it said they was 'pleasant to the sight, and good for food.' I 'member the words, 'cause I asked the little girl to read them over again. I liked to hear them. I thought 'pleasant to the eye' must mean all the lilacs and 'burnams, with their beautiful golden chains; and 'good for food' would be apple-trees and orange-trees and pear-trees. Don't you think so, Chris'fer?"

"I spect that's about it, Missy. You be about right there."

"And, oh! I forgot. Just at first Adam was alone—quite, quite alone in this lovely place. But God said it was bad for him, and so He sent him to sleep; and when he woke up there was Eve. I didn't quite understand about that; and when I said so, Mrs. Grace—that's Mary's mother—said there was lots of things in that Book we couldn't understand—no, not when we was growed up; so we couldn't spect little girls to know. And I think that's all, Chris'fer; but Mary said she'd read me a bit more to-night, and then to-morrow I'll tell you all about it, Chris'fer."

The next day, as soon as Christopher had leisure to attend to her, Nellie was ready with the story of the Fall.

"I always did hate those nasty snakes in their glass case," she began, "and now I know why I can't bear 'em. If it hadn't been for a serpent—and that's the same as a snake, you know, Chris'fer—if it hadn't been for a serpent, everybody would have been nice and happy; but a serpent came to Eve—at least Mary said it wasn't quite a serpent, but a kind of bad creature that looked like one—and it told her she might eat some fruit that God said she was not to touch, and she did. She was that silly she listened to the nasty serpent; I can't think how she could be so silly—can you, Chris'fer? But she was; and then she ate that fruit, and gave some to Adam; and when they'd done it they was 'fraid, 'cause they knew they didn't ought; and so they made some clothes out of leaves, 'cause, you know, they hadn't any frocks and coats before. And then God found it out, and He scolded 'em, and He made 'em coats and frocks of skins, and then He said weeds would grow, and they'd have to keep the place tidy. But He wouldn't let 'em stay in the garden; He turned 'em out. I don't think I'd have been so silly as to get turned out of the garden of Eden; do you, Chris'fer? It must have been such a nice place; I'd like to try to find it."

From this time it was a favourite amusement with the child to play that Christopher was Adam, and she Eve. She would dress herself up in some of the skins of animals which were used as rugs, and say—"Now, Chris'fer, you're Adam, you've got to work; you've got to tidy up, you know, and Eve had to work, too, so I'll help; and these are the poor animals that used to be so good in the garden of Eden. When Adam and Eve got turned out, I spect they had to shut 'em all up in cages, 'cause they shouldn't fight and eat one another up."

Great was her delight one day when, upon descending from the elephant upon which in fine weather she always entered fresh towns, dressed in the character of an Indian princess, she was presented with a shilling by a lady who had brought her own little girl to see the sight.

Scarcely waiting to thank the donor, she ran off to Christopher, and showed him the coin.

"Just as soon as you've finished, we'll go and see if we can't get a Bible like Mary Grace's," she said, "and then you'll read to me 'bout that garden again; won't you, Chris'fer?"

"Ay, ay! Missy, we'll see what we can do, but get you gone now, old Chris is busy."

Happy, indeed, were the pair that afternoon when, the first performance being over, they sallied forth to spend the shilling. With the addition of another coin of like value from Christopher, they managed to get a Bible with sufficiently clear type for the old man, and hand-in-hand they returned to the show, and Christopher sat down to read to his eager listener.

Many were the trials before a sentence could be made out clearly. Christopher would spell the longer words, and then Nellie would help with her suggestions. "P'r'aps 'tis this," she would say, substituting some word which they thought would convey the right meaning. It was hard work for both, but they both enjoyed it; and after a short time a coadjutor was found in the shape of Ben, a boy-helper in the show. Ben could read well, and he undertook not only to read aloud occasionally to them, but also to instruct the pair in that accomplishment, so that every spare moment was turned to account, and Christopher in his horn spectacles, and little Nellie, with her serious, pale face, were to be seen poring over the same spelling-book, painfully going through the preliminaries, and learning that a b, spelt ab, and b a, ba. Ben raised an objection at first, to always reading from so sober and solemn a book as the Bible. "A fairy tale, now, Missy," he suggested, "or Old Mother Hubbard, or Jack Sheppard, that's what you ought to hear, 'twould make you laugh and amuse you, that 'twould." But Nellie declared that the Bible was beautiful; she wanted to hear it all first.

At first Christopher had taken up this new study purely for the sake of Nellie, but as he read more the desire to know still more of the wonderful Book grew upon him; and often when alone he would be found spelling over a few verses. From him first came the suggestion that they should go to church together, because he knew they read the Bible there; and when opportunity offered the strange pair might be seen on some seat near the door, listening attentively to the service.

It was in church that Nellie first heard the twenty-third Psalm, and she gave Ben no rest until he had found it for her, and read it so many times that it was imprinted on her memory. The imagery there employed of "green pastures and still waters" seemed to ally itself in her mind with her notions of the garden of Eden; and often when in dingy close lodgings, she would sit and muse over the mental pictures which she could call up.

"The child gets so old-fashioned," her mother would say at times, when Nellie would propound some unanswerable question; and others beside the mother would notice the change in her, and ask if she were not very delicate. The hectic flush, the bright eyes, and the hoarse cough would remind those, who had known her father, of Francis Brooks, and many were the heads that would be shaken ominously.

SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. II.—THE SYNAGOGUE.

1. The earliest mention of the synagogue is in a Psalm composed probably after the destruction of the temple.

2. In the later books of the Old Testament, for instance, in Nehemiah and Zechariah, may be found allusions to solemn assemblies held in other places than the temple.

3. At the upper end of the synagogue was a recess in which was an ark, or chest, containing the rolls or books of the law and prophets. In front of this was the seat of the presiding elder, on a raised platform. A seat on this platform was much coveted; these were the "chief seats" mentioned by our Lord. The Apostle James also makes a reference to both of these.

4. We have mentioned in the Gospels, rulers or elders of the synagogue, and in the Acts a "chief ruler."

5. In the Revelation an officer in the Christian Church is mentioned, whose duties seem to correspond to those of the "chief ruler."

6. Another officer is mentioned, who had charge of the books. He is called the "minister," which is a translation of a Hebrew word meaning servant.

7. To build a synagogue was looked upon as a great favour to the people of a town, as mentioned in the Gospels.

8. In the time of St. Paul, the Jews were widely scattered, and built synagogues in many Greek cities. From several passages of the Acts we find that St. Paul addressed the congregations assembled there.

9. Where there was no building to assemble in they met at some suitable place out of doors, as, by a river's side. This is alluded to in the Psalms and in the Acts.

10. Part of the synagogue service was the reading of passages from the law and the prophets. Of this we have instances in the life of our Saviour, in the history of St. Paul, and an allusion to it in a speech by one of the apostles.

11. A discourse or sermon was delivered, perhaps by one of the "scribes," or by a visitor.

12. There are allusions in the Old Testament which point to men trained as preachers in the synagogues.

13. There were also probably appointed hours for prayer as in the temple.

14. The elders of the synagogue formed a tribunal for the punishment of certain offenders. Their authority was afterwards used to persecute the Christians.

15. The Jews in foreign parts seem to have had separate synagogues of their own at Jerusalem. Give the passages of Scripture, on which this outline is founded.

ANSWER TO NEW YEAR'S ENIGMA—p. 16.

	CHAPS.	VERSES.
Lev.	23	16
Matt.	9	16, 17
Lam.	3	22, 23
John	13	34
2 Kings	2	20, 21
2 Sam.	21	16
Matt.	27	60
Mark	16	17
Heb.	10	20
Luke	22	20
Judges	16	12
Judges	5	8
Exodus	1	8
1 Sam.	5	2, 7, 8
Song of Solomon	7	13
Rev.	21	1
Isa.	48	6
1 Cor.	5	7
Rev.	21	2
Mark	1	27, 28
2 Cor.	5	17
Eph.	4	24
Rev.	2	17
Rev.	14	3
	301
	13
	8)288
	36	Ezekiel 36, 26.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XIII.—MARCUS.

MURIEL LOVED THE LITTLE CREATURES WHO LOVED HER.

FOR the next two days little was talked of or thought about by the Kynaston household but the proposed school for the Crossway hamlet. Jacko declared that Muriel would set up to be the dame, and besought her to invest in a poke bonnet and a birch rod, in order to qualify herself for the part: and Topsy bobbed curtseys to her whenever they met, and asked if she might teach deportment and gymnastics. Syd and Joyce took a more rational interest in the scheme, and hoped to see the rising generation make a serious start in their educational progress. They wondered if they would be able to take occasional duty, and teach their favourite subjects to the rustics, quite irrespective of the hopelessness of instilling their own ideas into the dull minds of the untrained aborigines. Muriel said the least and thought the most. She walked over to the place the very next morning alone, and wondered what would be accomplished by the erection of the building there. She did not visit any of the cottages that day. She was not quite in the vein for conversation, and the people were nearly all busy in the fields. The children were playing about dirty and unkempt, in their customary fashion, in the road and along the ditches. They looked half-smilingly, half-apprehensively at her: pleased to see her, yet were afraid of being called to be taught their letters, or questioned as to what they had last learned. Muriel had learned before now the unsatisfactoriness of the desultory teaching that was all she had been able to accomplish heretofore. As long as it was quite a novelty, like a new kind of game, the children came to her with alacrity, and the mothers seemed pleased; but when the freshness had worn off and the little ones found they were expected to remember what they had been taught, and to add to their slender store of knowledge, then a sort of reaction set in, and they began to regard the pretty young lady rather in the light of a wolf in sheep's clothing. Muriel knew this very well, and felt a little natural discouragement. She had wanted the children to love her, and feel that she was their friend; but unless she was content to lay aside her plans for their good they were much more inclined to regard her as a sort of foe.

Some half-dozen of these little ones had really attached themselves to her, however; and would leave their play of their own free will to gather about her and hear her stories. They did so to-day, when the girl sat down presently upon the low stile beneath the big oak tree, shyly at first, as if not sure that they were wanted, but more confidently as they found themselves received with smiles and encouraging glances. Muriel loved the little creatures who loved her and clung to her as if they felt she came for their good, and it was a real pleasure to her to be asked for the simple Bible stories that she told them in their most literal form, to try and pave the way for an apprehension of their deeper meaning.

However low the intellect of a place may be there will always be a small—possibly a very small—percentage of children slightly superior to their surroundings and endued with some kind of imaginative faculty. To encourage and stimulate these opening minds was a real pleasure to Muriel, and she was so deeply engrossed to-day in trying to make her little pupils understand in their hazy way some little bit of the beauty and pathos of the life and death of their Saviour, that she was quite unaware of the sound of footsteps behind her and started with astonishment at feeling a hand placed upon her shoulder.

Turning round quickly she saw her father and Marcus Stratford standing close behind her, having evidently come across the field.

"Ah, Muriel, at the old thing!" said her father smiling. "Well, if the scholars are always as attentive as that, the new school should flourish—eh, Marcus? We have stolen a march on you, you see. We have been looking about sites already. I told Marcus that a quiet preliminary view would be advisable before the tag-rag and bobtail were admitted to join the discussion. I think we have a pretty clear notion how the land lies, and who are tenants and owners of the different places. Now dispatch those mites, Muriel, and we will walk home together.

Muriel dismissed the children with a smile and a gesture, half ashamed of herself for feeling so discomposed at having been taken thus unawares. She hoped her lesson had not been overheard. There is always something curiously disconcerting in the sense of having been unconscious of the proximity of listeners.

Marcus looked at her in his grave, kind way.

"If our school is to deprive the children of your teaching," he said quietly, "I am afraid it may be a doubtful boon."

He did not speak mockingly or flatteringly, or she would have been annoyed. She saw he was sincere, and though her colour rose, she answered earnestly—"You must not say that; you do not know the place or the people It is so few one can get hold of—only just those few children in all the village care one bit to be taught—and if they did I could hardly do anything for them. You do not know how hard it is to get an idea into their heads, nor how fast it gets out again. I suppose they are worse than town children, because their fathers and forefathers have been quite untaught, and they seem to inherit a legacy of dulness and heaviness. Nothing but regular schooling day by day will drill anything into them, and till now I never saw how they were to get it. You don't know how glad I am!"

"I am pleased that you are, for I suppose it is really all owing to you. Our mother would hardly have thought of it had you not interested her in the place, and I fear it would never have occurred to me had she not mentioned it. It is you who have set the stone rolling, if that is any satisfaction to you."

Muriel pondered a little, and then said: "I am not quite sure that it is. I think I should like better to feel that good deeds for the benefit of others were done for their own sake, because it is right for them to be done, than to feel that they came in a haphazard way as the result of circumstances."

Marcus looked at her with a subdued smile in his eyes. "Cannot both be the cause at one and the same time?" he asked. "Circumstances must mould our lives, yet our motives can still be pure—at least, I hope so."

Muriel could think better than she could argue. She did not find it easy always to clothe her ideas in words. Marcus seemed to put his own interpretation on her silence, for he said presently, in a lower tone, and more seriously, "If any motive can be altogether pure in this world—that, of course, is always open to doubt."

"What do you mean?" asked Muriel, quickly, with a shadow as of reluctant pain in her eyes.

"I mean," he answered, with quiet gravity, not altogether unmixed with sadness, "that the more we see of life and the world, the more we see how closely intertwined are evil and good, and how hard it is to attain to a real purity and simplicity of motive or purpose."

Muriel looked straight out before her, her fair young face expressing a depth of steadfast earnestness not lost upon her companion.

"I am sorry you think that. I think it is a pity that all those who go out into life seem to lose hold of the faith that was sufficient for us in our childhood, and talk as if there were no longer any real goodness left in the world. I hope I shall never feel like that. Christ's words were,

'Blessed are the pure in heart.' Why did He use them, if purity of heart were to become impossible? I do not believe it ever will be, unless Christianity goes first."

"Nor I," answered Marcus in a low voice, but before more could be said they were joined by Mr. Kynaston, who had stepped aside to speak to a passing farmer.

He at once began talking to Marcus about the project in hand, and Muriel, not understanding technicalities, wandered away into the dreamland of her own fancies. She roused up presently by hearing her father say, in tones half of pleasure, half of remonstrance: "It is a very generous way of doing things, but have you counted the cost?"

"I think so."

"It will run into a lot of money."

"Perhaps; but my father has left me ample means, and there are duties that belong to wealth that cannot be overlooked."

"Quite true, my boy," answered Mr. Kynaston heartily, "but you seem full young to take such serious views of life."

"Am I?" answered Marcus, looking slightly amused. "Perhaps I have seen something of the evils of taking life too easily at the outset. At least, I have seen only too much of the misery that follows lavish, selfish expenditure. I cannot help feeling that property is a sort of trust to be employed for the good of others, as well as for personal enjoyment. I am not an advocate of lavish giving. I hear a good deal too much of the result of indiscriminate almsgiving, the carelessness that results from pauperising charity. I want to see the people taught to save for themselves when they are young, and lay by enough to keep them in their old age. I want to see them taught habits of thrift, and economy, and self-denial. In other countries the peasantry are frugal and thrifty, and, though poorer, are more saving than ours, because (as I believe) they know that they must save if they are to escape starvation. Our people do not save—it seems to be against their unwritten moral code to do so—and they marry young, never considering whether or not they can provide for their children. The idea in many cases undoubtedly is that some charitable person will provide for them if they fall into difficulties, get their children into asylums and themselves into almshouses, and at any rate there is always the parish to fall back upon. What is cause? what effect? I am not political economist enough to say; but I do think it is a problem that landowners and capitalists would do well to consider seriously. I cannot but think that some system of saving (compulsory saving, if need be) imposed upon the young just starting in life, would do more for the nation than all the workhouses put together."

"Chimerical schemes—youthfully chimerical!" smiled Mr. Kynaston, "not but what there is sound common sense in much that you say."

"I am going to try, at least, if I can reduce my chimera to something real and tangible," answered Marcus; and their roads dividing, they parted forthwith, Muriel feeling that she had got several new ideas about Marcus.

CHAPTER XIV.—THE MILL-POOL.

She was destined to have more such ideas before many days had passed. To the last day of her life Muriel never forgot that terrible moment, when coming out of the mill (on the way to the Crossway hamlet a few days later) from paying a visit to the miller's sick wife, she saw the miller's rickety punt out in the midst of the treacherous deep mill-pool, swinging this way and that in the eddying current, with Topsy and Jacko trying in vain to direct its devious track, and little Lilias gazing out at the expanse of water, her eyes wide with terror.

Muriel had often taken her brothers and sisters with her to the mill. They were fond of the place, and often remained outside whilst their elder sister went in. Sometimes the good-natured miller would punt them about the pool, or land them upon the opposite bank, where in a green water-meadow wild flowers bloomed with great luxuriance; but he had always strictly forbidden the venturesome children from entering the punt without him; and Muriel, on her side, had been equally firm in enforcing this rule. The deep pool with its smooth dark surface, and strange treacherous eddies and cross currents, always roused in her a sense akin to awe. She never cared to trust herself upon it, or to let Lilias go, even when she knew they were safe in the miller's care, and now she stood transfixed with horror, for Lilias springing up at the sight of her sister, stretched out her little hands in a mute appeal for help; and Jacko, not seeing how insecure was the child's footing in the shallow, oscillating punt, stepped against her, the long punting pole in his hand, and the next moment, with a little faint cry of terror, Lilias had fallen overboard into the water.

For one moment everything swam in a dark mist before Muriel's eyes. A second later she was roused to the consciousness that something had happened by the sound of a loud splash. Some one had sprung into the water—some one was swimming with powerful strokes towards the spot where Lilias had disappeared. The punt had drifted helplessly away when the child's golden head appeared above the surface of the water, no effort of Jacko's could bring the long pole within reach of the half-unconscious grasping hands; but help was close at hand, for the swimmer had already reached the drowning child, and Roy was standing trembling with excitement by Muriel's side.

"It's Marcus!" he cried. "It's all right, Muriel! He has got her safe! Oh, well done, Marcus! Muriel don't look so white—he has her safe. She wasn't long under water, it can't have hurt her, and Marcus can swim like a seal. Oh, how glad I am we came this way! I made him stop to sketch the mill, and then I saw those three in the punt and called to him to come and see if it was safe. We had just got down to that tree there when Lilias fell over. Here they come. Hold on Lily, hold on! There he is in his depth now. Muriel, it is all right! Here they are, safe!"

Roy had been pulling the girl along with him to the water's edge whilst he panted out these disjointed sentences. His face was as flushed with excitement as her's was white with apprehension. She could not speak when Marcus bore his dripping, gasping burden ashore, and walked steadily up the path towards the mill.

By this time an alarm had been given. The miller, covered with flour, came running out of some dark recess of his mill, and his eldest daughter followed, eager to render assistance. The punt had meantime drifted aground on the opposite bank out of all danger, the other children were safe enough though for the moment out of reach; nor was the condition of Lilias such as to give rise to any serious apprehension. She had had a severe shock and a wetting; but already she was beginning to recover, and presently, when her wet clothes had been removed and she was lying warm and snug in a sort of improvised bed beside the miller's kitchen fire, her nervous trembling ceased, and she looked about her with a little sigh of relief and contentment.

"Is Marcus here?" she asked presently.

"I think he is drying himself by the other fire," said the miller's daughter, "if it is Mr. Stratford she means."

"I want to see him," said Lilias.

"You shall very soon, darling, before he goes home," answered Muriel tenderly, "drink some of this nice hot milk Annie has got for you. It will do you good."

Lilias obeyed, the colour coming slowly back into her pale cheeks.

"Where are Topsy and Jacko?"

"Quite safe, missy dear," answered Annie cheerfully, "father has gone down stream for the ferry-boat and will bring them across in it very quick now. Don't you worry about them no more."

"I wish they hadn't gone!" said Lilias with a little shiver. "I didn't want to—I knew it was naughty; but they said——" then stopping short as if afraid of letting out more than she meant, and "telling tales," she looked up wistfully at Muriel, and said, "You're not angry with me?"

"No, no, darling! Angry with you, my sweet one! Only so very, very thankful to have you safe."

"I might have been drowned if Marcus hadn't come, mightn't I? Don't let Marcus go, please, till I have seen him."

"No, darling, I won't," and the child folded her hands together and closed her eyes. Muriel fancied she was giving thanks in her simple childish way for her escape, and her own heart rose up in voiceless thanksgiving for the merciful preservation of her little sister that day.

Presently the door opened softly, and Roy's head appeared.

"How is she?" he asked in a cautious whisper. The child's eyes flashed open instantly.

"I'm quite well, Roy, I'm only in bed till my clothes can dry. Please is Marcus going? I want to see him first."

"All right, I'll tell him. Yes; he's about ready to move. We're going to send a carriage for all of you, Muriel, so wait here till it comes. She won't be quite fit to walk yet awhile, and you look as pale as a ghost yourself. You'll all be a bit shaken, I dare say."

Muriel could not deny it, and thanked Roy with gratitude. Next minute Marcus came in, passed her by with a smile and went and leaned over little Lilias.

"Well, little one, all right again, now?"

Two small hands were eagerly held out to him.

"Oh, yes, Marcus, quite, quite well! Oh, I'm so much obliged to you for taking me out of the water. I think I should have been drowned if you had not been there. I saw you just as I fell in—I thought you would come for me."

Marcus stooped and kissed her, stroking the rings of damp hair upon her forehead with gentle touch.

"Of course I should come, little one. We have always been friends, haven't we? Now can't you get a nap after your bath? and then you will wake up as fresh as a daisy, and not frighten any one with your pale looks."

He kept stroking her hair as he talked, and already the child's eyelids began to droop. In a few minutes she was sleeping quietly and Marcus turned away with a satisfied look.

"She will do very well, now," he said, softly, to Muriel, and passed out, she following him from the house until they stood together at the top of the little ascent that led down to the mill-pool; then she held out her hand.

"I couldn't let you go without thanking you, Marcus," she said, in a low voice that quivered a little, despite her outward composure of manner; "You don't know what Lilias is to me—and if you had not been there——"

"Do not think of that," he said, gently and firmly. "I was there. Surely that is enough."

"Yes," she answered. "I am very thankful; but I cannot help thinking—suppose you had been drowned too?"

"Small danger of that, Muriel. I am a strong swimmer."

"I know; only sometimes things do happen, and that pool is very cold, and dark, and treacherous, and you know drowning people so often clutch hold of their preservers and hamper their movements so that——"

She did not finish her sentence, but her eyes spoke more eloquently than her lips. He saw that light words would be out of place, and jar against her keen sensibilities. He looked down at her with a kindly light in his resolute grey eyes. His face was grave, and his manner quietly earnest.

"We know, Muriel, that in this world we are all surrounded with dangers of some kind or another, and that every step we take may be fraught with peril; but I think if we go steadily onward, just doing the duty that comes to hand, without considering overmuch what the consequences may be, we need not fear but that a providence will watch over us and guard us from harm. We know in Whose hands we and the world lie, and Who is guiding us and all things about us. After all, if we say daily from our hearts, as well as from our lips, 'Thy will be done,' we need not greatly fear what any day may bring forth. So long as that Will is done, we can leave all the rest."

Muriel was looking straight out before her. She did not speak for a few moments; then she put out her hand again, and said very gently: "Thank you. Good-bye."

He held her hand a moment in his, and then turned quietly away. She stood quite still long after Marcus and Roy had gone, looking down into the mill-pool, and thinking her own thoughts about many things.

"I am glad he said that. I am glad he feels like that about things. I thought so always; but it is hard to know. Men are different from us, I think; but he is not ashamed to own what he believes. And he saved our darling—our little Lilias. Oh, I do not know how I can ever be thankful enough! I think I am glad that we owe her life to Marcus."

THE WORRIES OF DAILY WORK.

BY THE REV. ALFRED ROWLAND, LL.B.

"But Martha was cumbered about much serving, and came to Him, and said, Lord, dost Thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone?"—Luke x. 40.

HOME-LIFE, with its worries and work, was not beneath the notice of the Son of God. Some of His noblest utterances fell from His lips in the unrestrained conversations he had with intimate friends while they sat at the table together at ordinary meals. He was utterly unlike those human teachers whose public addresses, or whose published writings, have aroused the world's attention, but whose private life, and domestic relationships are best left unrevealed. The more Jesus was known the more he was loved, trusted and adored. The crowds who occasionally listened to his lofty teaching, or gained physical blessings from his supernatural power, might in a moment of ignorant fanaticism cry "Crucify Him!" but the feeling of those who really knew Him was expressed by one of them when he exclaimed, "Lord, I am ready to go with Thee to prison, and to death!"

There were no words of our Lord's more thankfully treasured than those He uttered privately as He walked with His disciples through the cornfields, or sat with them at the supper table, or waited in some lowly room until a meal was prepared by the busy housewife. An example of this is afforded us here in an incident which has about it the most charming simplicity, and yet the most Divine luminousness. In a small hamlet, hidden from Jerusalem by the summit of Olivet, was an unpretentious house to which our Lord often resorted, for "Jesus loved Martha, and her sister, and Lazarus." On one of these visits the occurrence took place which has instructed and encouraged multitudes besides ourselves. What the disciples heard in the darkness they were commanded to speak in the light, and what they heard in the ear, they were to proclaim on the housetops. They little knew the good of their doing so, but they loyally did their Lord's bidding, and hence Mary's quiet talk, and Martha's busy service, have proved the seedcorn of many a harvest from which God has given daily bread to hungry souls for centuries.

The story is so natural that it comes home to us all. Who has not experienced the occasional friction of human life; the fret and fume of certain busy natures; the anxiety that things should go right, and the impatience when they go wrong—the pang of jealousy which shoots through the heart when others appear to be more comfortable than ourselves? All this, and much more, is exemplified here, and the Saviour's graciousness to Martha may encourage us to speak to Him about the fret of our life, and to ask His grace that we may school our restless hearts to quietude and peace.

Let us not misunderstand Martha's position, or her failing. She has sometimes been put in contrast with her sister as if she were the type of a worldling and Mary of a Christian. This was never intended by the evangelist. Both sisters were disciples; although, in disposition and temperament, they differed widely, as members of the same family often do. They were contrasts to each other, as were Peter and John in the apostolate. Martha, like Peter, was quick, decided, energetic, ready for every good word and work. Mary, like John, who leaned on Jesus' breast, was thoughtful, contemplative and confiding. Each had her own temptations: Mary to indolence, Martha to fussiness: but however much they may have misunderstood one another, both alike found sympathy and help in that gracious Master, who is the same yesterday, and to-day, and for ever.

We will think of Martha as a type of those of us who in the household, in the school, in the business, or in the Christian Church, are compelled either by circumstances, or by temperament, to be busy. Such a life is wholesome enough in itself; indeed, from its very nature, it is free from the temptations to luxuriousness, to self-absorption and to brooding which assail those whose lot is easier. But anxiety and fretting often accompany it, and these are distinctly forbidden by our Lord in His Sermon on the Mount, and wisely so, for they are as detrimental to our temporal interests as to our inward peace. It was under the power of this temptation that Martha fell. "She was careful and troubled about many things," or, as Farrar puts it in colloquial English, she was "fretting and fussing" over them; and there was petulance, and a tinge of jealousy in her question, "Lord, dost Thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone?"

We will look a little more closely into this—for it concerns men and women, young and old alike. Let us see some of the causes of such fretting—which assert themselves in us, as powerfully as in Martha.

I. A sense of the inferiority of our work too often worries us. This energetic housewife was doing a good work, both in showing to her Lord all the honour that she could—and in doing what her hands found to do with all her might. Perhaps she would have been satisfied if her sister had shared the drudgery with her, but it was vexatious to see that while she was busy with preparations for the meal, Mary was comfortable and happy, sitting at Jesus' feet, and listening to him. The feeling stirred in her heart is common enough: in a sense, natural enough, though Christ condemns it now, as then. Examples of it will rise spontaneously to your imagination, even if they are not suggested by memory from your own experience.

A girl has left school where she has distinguished herself in her examinations, and now she has to undertake some duties in the kitchen, and in the details of household work; and she is aggravated to see a younger sister meantime spending hours in pursuits far more congenial. It is a real cross-bearing to her—not the less painful, because her father and brothers would be ready to laugh at it.

A young fellow finds himself still occupying a subordinate position in the office, and has no prospect of a rise, though he has worked steadily for several years. Others, whom he knows to be his inferiors in ability and in education, are far ahead of him; and they often get credit for work which he has done while they have been taking their ease. He resents it, and even in his prayers to Him who is just and good, is tempted to say, "Lord, dost thou not care?" And what must be the feeling of some of the poor! especially of those among them who have been brought down, through no fault of their own, who have still the instincts and tastes of ladies and gentlemen, amid the squalid surroundings of penury? Often as the so-called "masses" pass palatial dwellings, or watch the carriages roll by in the streets; or note the ease and luxuriousness of those who are not morally better than themselves—they ask "Is this fair? Why should I have all the drudgery and these all the luxury?" And too often they doubt, or deny the existence of a God who judges in the earth, while others among them who pray are ready to say with tears, "Lord, dost thou not care?" Well, if this life were all, there would be no answer to these complaints; but since it is only our brief schooling for the fuller and more lasting possibilities beyond death, this lower work which compels us to sacrifice our tastes, and to deny ourselves indulgences, may be the best preparation for our hereafter. At least, we know that our Lord Himself who is highest in heaven, and rules as its everlasting King, deliberately chose for Himself on earth, not the palace and the throne, but the carpenter's shop, and then the cross of shame, and the crown of thorns. "He that humbleth himself shall be exalted."

II. Again, we are often fretted by a consciousness of loneliness in our work. Martha yearned for sympathy; and it seemed to her as if neither her sister, nor her Lord, felt for her as they sat absorbed in their converse on heavenly truths. "Lord, dost thou not care?" she cried—"Hast thou no thought for me? My sister has left me to serve alone, and I have everything to do by myself." A solitary life is lived by many who, in one sense, do not live alone; indeed, there is no loneliness more trying than that endured by one who is solitary in spirit. Crowds of uncongenial companions make the sensitive soul shrink more and more within itself, and such an one would prefer, if it were possible, "a lodge in some vast wilderness." Much of the best work of the world is done without the consciousness of sympathy or of co-operation. This is harder to women than to men, whose coarser natures are mercifully adapted by God to the rougher work which properly falls to their lot; and probably unmarried women feel it most, those of whom Charlotte Bronté beautifully writes: "I speculate much on the existence of unmarried and never-to-be-married women nowadays; and I have already got to the point of considering that there is no more respectable character on this earth than an unmarried woman who makes her own way through life quietly, perseveringly, without support of husband or brother; and who retains in her possession a well-regulated mind, a disposition to enjoy simple pleasures, and fortitude to support inevitable pains, sympathy with the sufferings of others, and willingness to relieve wants as far as her means extend." Many of us know those whose own lives seem solitary enough, but whose hearts are never-failing fountains of sympathy to others;—the stream seemingly the wider, because it is not narrowed down to one special channel. But this would surely not be possible to them unless they felt sure of the love of Him who does "care," because they are left to serve alone, and whose grace has hushed their murmuring, and stilled the pain of the old wounds, whose scars are emblems of victory over self.

But a sense of loneliness is by no means confined to these. He who knows the secrets of every life can see solitariness of soul in many a home. God sees it in her whose husband has no sympathy with her religious life, who has to do good by stealth, and often in fear and trembling, for she is left to "serve alone." God sees it in the wife who of necessity is alone all day; who feels the growing responsibility of training and ruling the children which devolves entirely on her; on whom all the planning for the best use of a limited income falls; but who lovingly says nothing at all about the economies which mean self-denial to her every day, because she knows that her husband has cares enough of his own. The burdens of life fall the heaviest on our wives and mothers; and many a man has unimagined reasons for thanking God for a good wife who is from the Lord, who while keeping worries from him that he could ill bear, feels them resting the more painfully on her own gentle heart. And what shall we say of others who would give anything to have back again even the partial solace of such imperfect sympathy? From them the husband has been taken, the strong arm is no longer their's to lean upon; yet the home duties still press, the training of the children must still go on, and sometimes in sorrowfulness of spirit the widow prays, "Lord, dost thou not care that I am left to serve alone?" Indeed He does! He is the Father of the fatherless, and the God of the widow; and with each returning day will give guidance, and help and solace as He has done until now; and soon the transient separation will be ended, and God's love set thee at his side again.

III. The drudgery of our work is often a cause of unrest. To be cooking, and laying a table, when Jesus was in the house, suddenly seemed to Martha too menial an occupation. At first this did not occur to her. It was her usual work, and she flew to it with the more zest because He was coming. Indeed, it is clear that she undertook far too much, and that if she had not planned so ambitiously, she might have quickly done what was necessary, and then could have sat with Mary, at Jesus' feet, to hear His words. It is a serious question whether the overwork of which so many complain is not due to an unwillingness to be satisfied with enough; to an ambition to get luxuries, or to make great fortunes; and when that is so, worry is natural enough. But, in any sort of work, with however much zest it is begun, there comes a time when its monotony and drudgery depress us. We want a change of some kind. We resent the yoke which galls the neck from pressing on the same parts always. We begin to sympathise with the mill-horse who trudges round and round, with no more thought than a machine. Now God would have you counteract that by a wise and Christian use of your spare time; in which by change of occupation, by mental culture, by help given to others for Christ's sake, you may go back to the morrow's toil with new eagerness. The man who spends his spare time in amusements, especially those of a spectacular kind; and the woman who slips back to her sensational novel, or hurries off to an exciting entertainment, directly she can get free from duty, are of all others most likely to fret over the monotony and drudgery of life; whereas those who brace the mind, instead of indulging it, will fill the whole sphere of toil with irrepressible cheerfulness.

IV. There is one other cause of worry in work which ought not to pass unnoticed, namely, its troublesomeness. Trifles, small in themselves, do more to destroy our peace of mind than greater troubles, and we may shrewdly suspect that something had just gone wrong with Martha's cooking. The unpunctuality of a tradesman, or of a workman; the carelessness of a servant; the loss of an important letter; the interruption of work at a critical moment by a chattering busybody—these are the tests of temper, and more than greater events they reveal what manner of men we are. How often the saintliest is brought down in humiliation by trifles! Though he towers above others in Christian manhood as distinctly as Goliath of Gath did over his fellows in physical manhood; yet the small hole in the helmet will enable his watchful foe to bring him to his knees. Though he be a king, like Ahab, clothed in armour of proof, yet an arrow shot at a venture may pierce between the joints of his harness. Therefore let us guard ourselves against fretfulness of spirit as watchfully as we do against what we call greater sins. Nothing is more opposed than it is to the Spirit of Christ Jesus. There is a discontented, unquiet temper which casts a shadow on many a home, and keeps out the sunshine in which alone young life can be wholesome and happy. There is a fault-finding spirit, which refuses to speak a word of commendation to those who hunger for it, but is ready enough with rebuke at the sight of the smallest failure. There is a disposition with some not only to mark out their own course, but to be angry (as Martha was) if others do not possess their qualities or do their work, forgetting in their bustling activity the truth which lies in the words:—

They also serve, who stand and wait.

There are some who, if their own lot is not restful, seem resolved that no one near them shall have repose, and who, being called to a life of activity, are merciless with themselves, and try hard to make themselves martyrs; being determined that all within sight and hearing shall know of their misery. This may be the temper of Martha, but it was not the temper of Christ, in whose sight a meek and quiet spirit is of great price. He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city.

Above all let us never allow ourselves to become so busy, or so fretted as to forget our Master, and to ignore the fact that we are near him or within His sight and hearing. If you find sympathy in no one else, you may find it in Him; and if you come to His feet, and tell Him the story of your failings, and sins, He will listen patiently, forgive freely, and send you back to work with the renewed strength of one who has waited upon God. Sit at Jesus' feet, as Mary did, and then you will be able to do Martha's work, without any of her fretfulness. Work will become more sacred to you if you feel that it is being done for Him; the loneliness of it will be lessened, by the thought that He knows all about it and about you. Wrong-doing and self-seeking will vanish when the Lord who was crucified for our sins is in the midst of work as clearly seen as was the cross, in every market-place in the days of our fathers; and all the fretting and chafing of the sea of life, will but wear away the sharp angles of our nature, and prepare us to become living stones, and polished stones, in the temple of our God. He who rested in the home of Bethany is ready to enter every heart, and every home, whose door is open to give him welcome; and so great is His condescension, that of all of us it may be said, "He went in to tarry with them."

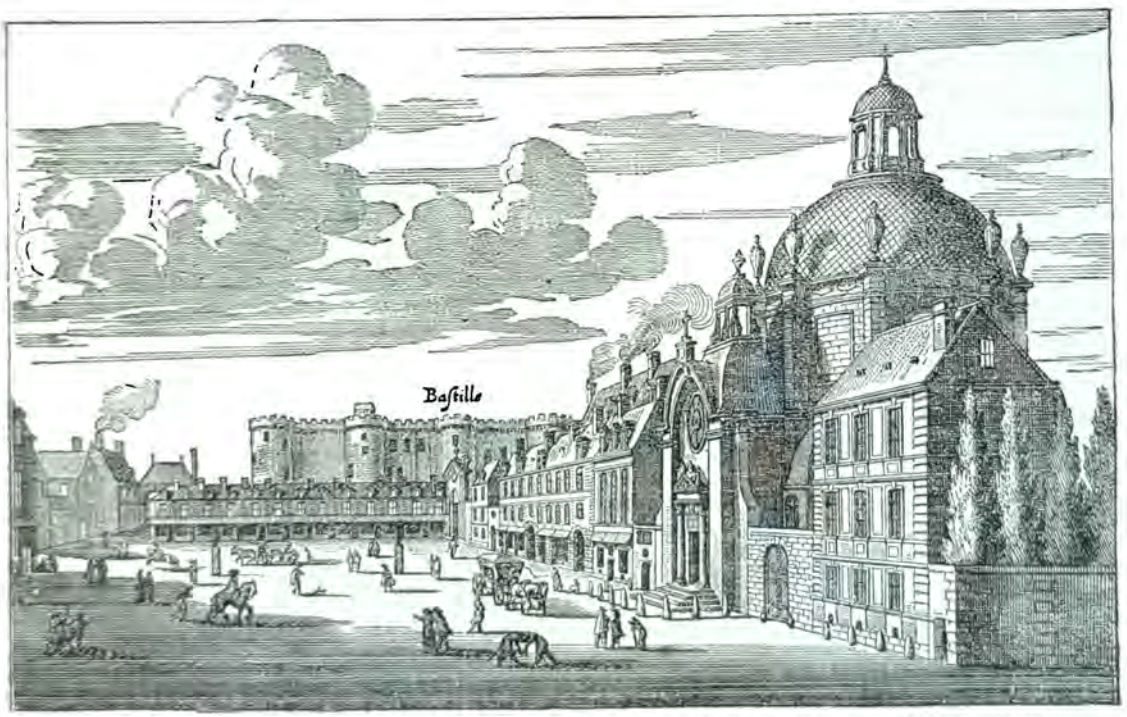
Our lives, enriched with gentle thoughts
And loving deeds, may be
As streams, that still the nobler grow,
The nearer to the sea.

To duty firm, to conscience true,
However tried and pressed,
In God's clear sight high work to do,
If we but do our best.

Thus may we make the lowliest lot
With rays of glory bright;
Thus may we turn a crown of thorns
Into a crown of light!

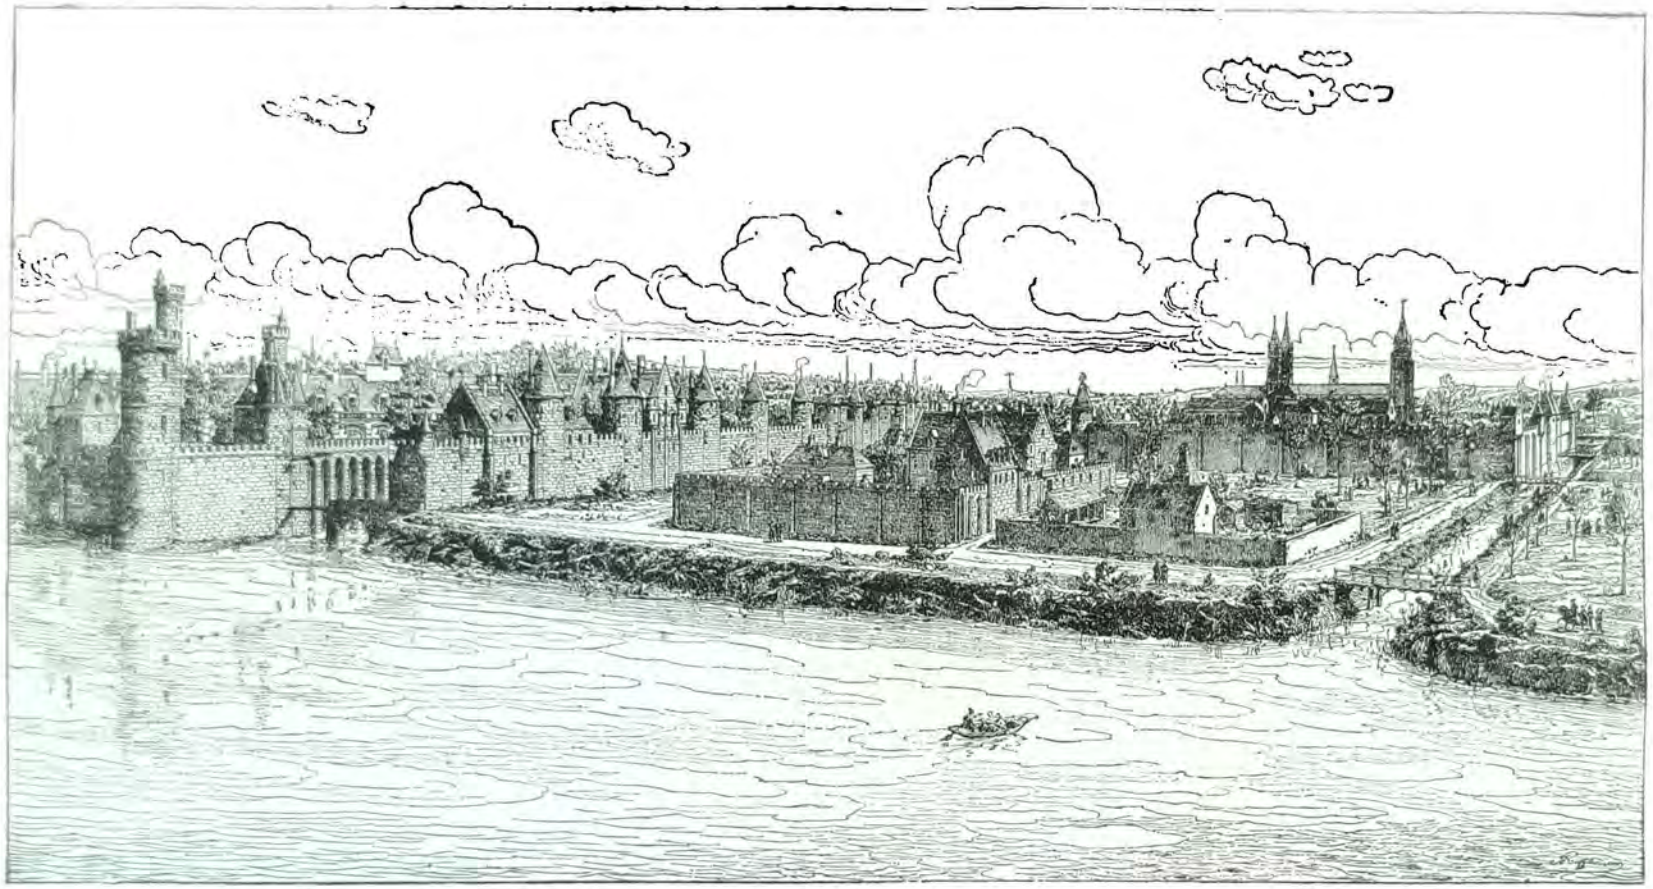
PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE REFORMATION.

II.



THE BASTILLE IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY FROM THE RUE DE ST. ANTOINE, (FROM AN OLD PRINT).

LOOKING at dates, says D'Aubigné, we must admit that the glory of beginning the Reformation belongs neither to Germany nor to Switzerland, but to France. To be quite exact, he should have said Paris. For in Paris as early as 1512, when Luther was still an agonising ascetic, Jacques Lefèvre preached Justification by Faith. His book, Commentaries of the Epistles of St. Paul, the first act, so to speak, of the Reformation in France, was dated from the precincts of the Abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, or, as Londoners would have said: St. Germain-in-the-fields. One of those great religious foundations in Paris which, by ancient privilege, were almost little realms in themselves, having even the right to dispense justice within the bourg which grew up around it, St. Germain had at this time an abbot, Guillaume Briçonnet, who protected and for a time led the effort for Reform. To enter the church of St. Germain to-day is to exchange the bright sunshiny life of modern Paris for the obscurity of a tomb. After a time the columns of a vast church begin to appear, a few flickering lights lead the eye to the altar, from whence perchance is heard the low wail of a mass for the dead. All is dreary: a vestige of a long-lost past. St. Germain-des-Prés is like that little vase found in the coffin of a Merovingian king buried within its vaults: the odour of the Middle Ages still lingers, though so many centuries have rolled by.



THE TOUR DE NESLE, ST. GERMAIN DES PRÉS, AND PART OF THE PRÉ AUX CLERCS, Showing the quarter most inhabited by the Protestants of Paris in the sixteenth century.

And it was here, or at least under its protecting walls, that the light of the Reformation first broke forth; in its immediate neighbourhood that the Huguenots long gathered as to their natural fastness.

Their particular retreat was the Rue de Marais, now the Rue de Visconti, a street running a short distance from the quay, between the Rue Bonaparte, which crosses the Boulevard St. Germain just in front of the Church of St. Germain, and the Rue de Seine, which intersects the Boulevard a little more to the east. The houses in the Rue de Marais had on both sides gardens, and being outside the walls of Paris and close to the Pré-aux-clercs,[1] which was reached by a little bridge, its inhabitants could easily escape into the open country in a moment of danger.

Reformers, however, even in the very earliest times, by no means confined themselves to this spot. They were scattered in reality all over Paris, their doctrine spreading so fast that, in 1525, Louise de Savoie (Regent of France during the captivity of Francis I.), proposed this question to the Sorbonne: "By what means can the damnable doctrine of Luther be quashed, extirpated, and entirely cleared out of this Christian kingdom?" The answer had already been given in the burning of Jacques Pauvent, or Pavanes, a disciple of Lefèvre, and a man, according to Crespin, of great sincerity and integrity. This proto-martyr of the Reformed Church in Paris, who suffered in 1524 on the Place de Grève, is a type of the first confessors of Reform. Before the authorities took to burning young people wholesale, the Sorbonne tried to quash the heresy by destroying its most able and eminent defender: Louis de Berquin, a learned and honest nobleman. The Sorbonne was the theological faculty of the Paris University, celebrated at this time as "the most excellent school" in Christendom. Thus thought Luther, who had never been there; but those who had, entertained a very different opinion. "How frivolously," wrote Tschudi to Zwingle, "the French youth are educated! No poison is as bad as the sophistical art in which they are trained: an art which stupefies the senses, destroys the judgment, brutifies the whole man. Man is thenceforth, like the echo, an empty sound. Ten women could not keep pace with one of these rhetoricians. In their prayers they present their sophisms to God (I know the fact), and pretend by their syllogisms to constrain the Holy Spirit to hear them." Nowhere was this more evident than in the schools of theology, and Luther recognised this. "They have to themselves," said he, "the most agreeable place in Paris, a private street closed with gates at either end; it is called the Sorbonne, perhaps, as I imagine, from that fruit which grows on the shores of the Dead Sea, which outwardly presents so agreeable an appearance, but proves nothing but ashes within." Luther was thinking of the old story of the apples of Sodom, which he confounded with the fruit of the Sorb. However, the origin of the word Sorbonne was not quite so interesting as that; it merely enshrined the name of its founder, Robert de Sorbon, who, in the days of St. Louis, established a school of theology. Perhaps its professors had at first been sincere and earnest men, but by the time of the Valois, a Sorbonist was a man of whom it might be said:—

> He had a creed, he had a tongue,
> He had a heart when he was young;
> But—very melancholy fact!—
> 'Twas like a bell that time had crackt;
> Which by this certain mark is known—
> His speech is mutter without tone,
> His creed is sound as any post,
> A growth which former life hath lost.
> The truth from him is mouldy crust,
> His word a wind with blinding dust;
> And in his fog of speech you fumble,
> Till at the plainest things you stumble.

The tenebrous cobwebery of these dark and dismal doctors of the Sorbonne, Louis de Berquin could not endure. A controversy in which he engaged led him to look into the Bible, and he was astonished at the immense difference between its teachings and what he saw around him. He became a Reformer. Protected at first by Francis, he was at last given up to his enemies, and burnt in the Place de Grève, November 21, 1529.

The immediate cause was the mutilation of an image of the Virgin at one of the cross ways in Paris. The popular mind, agitated by the new doctrine, ever and anon burst out into these iconoclastic acts; shattering at night some idol with a hammer, or in full daylight seizing the host from the priest at the altar, and stamping on the consecrated wafer. If the iconoclast was caught, he died that very day; but if he remained unknown, the sacrilege was atoned for by the blood of other victims.

In the autumn of 1534, a violent placard against the Mass was posted about Paris,[1] and one was even found on the door of the king's chamber. There was a panic. Perhaps Francis and the authorities thought the Anabaptist Commune was going to be set up, as in the ensuing year it was actually set up at Münster, and, like frightened people, they stopped at no cruelty in their efforts to stamp it out. From the 13th of November to the 5th of December, burnings took place in Paris every two or three days. On the 13th, a paralytic youth was burned at the cemetery of St. Jean; on the 14th, a rich draper, after having had his hand chopped off, was burnt at the Halles; and on the same day, a printer was burnt at the Place Maubert; on the 18th, a mason was burnt before the Church of St. Catherine du St. Anthony; on the 19th, a bookseller was hanged at the Place Maubert; on 4th December a young clerk was burned at the Temple; and on the 5th, a young illuminator was hanged at the end of the Pont St. Michel.

Christmas passed, and on the 25th of January, 1535, the Feast of the Conversion of St. Paul, there was an imposing procession through the streets, in which the king, bearing a lighted taper in his hand, walked bareheaded. Mass over, Francis went to the bishop's palace, where he dined with the bishop, who, like himself, was one of the stars of the Renascence. Then, returning to the Louvre, he witnessed on his way the spectacle of a martyr roasted alive by being suspended to a movable gibbet, which rose and fell, so that the victim was alternately plunged into, and then drawn out of, the flames. This mode of execution was called the Estrapade. These executions were not confined to one spot, but went on at various places at the same time. One spot near the Church of St. Geneviève, now the Panthéon, still preserves the memorial of this horrible mode of torturing men to death. Turning to the right on coming to the top of the Rue Soufflot and passing the Mairie, the first street to the right leads to the Place de l'Estrapade.

[1] Pré aux clercs, like St. Germain des Prés, has its London equivalent in Clerkenwell Green.

[1] It was a usual thing even at this time to post bills up in the streets. They were generally put up at crossings. Thus Palissy advertised his lectures on Natural Philosophy.

Had Francis practised the salutary habit of Marcus Aurelius, and recalled every evening his conduct during the day, the words of the lesson he must have heard during the service in Notre Dame might have touched his conscience. "And Saul, breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, went to the high priest."

But probably neither king nor people troubled in the least about the agonies of the six men who suffered this diabolic cruelty, but in many a house the fashionable world kept holiday, and repeated on a small scale what went on that noon at the episcopal palace. Let us imagine ourselves possessors of "the Goloshes of Fortune," and able to be present at one of the newly-built Renascence mansions to be found in various parts of Paris.

We enter a quiet court; at the end is a charming building, two stories high and moderately wide. We admire its sculptured pilasters, its delicate colouring and fine proportions. Having entered, we find the blazing hearth and odoriferous perfumes of the dining-hall delicious. The great chimney-piece, its mantelshelf supported by graceful carytides, at once attracts the eye, which next falls on a dresser of walnut-wood, loaded with coloured glass goblets, enamelled salt-cellars and choice porcelain, all arranged on shelves edged with velvet. On the left is a long table covered with a finely-damasked cloth; nothing is on it but a trencher piled with hunks of bread, and a gilded leather-case, containing knives and forks. With much pomp, preceded by pages, the company enter: the gentlemen in slashed doublets and stuffed hose, their square shoes rosetted and slashed; the ladies gorgeously attired in brocades and velvets, wearing chaplets of roses or of gold filigree, their waist-bands enriched with sapphires, emeralds, and rubies.

The master and mistress arrange the seats, and, while the company is still standing, the oldest among them, making the sign of the cross, recites the grace in a loud voice. All then take their seats, and while a copious soup, of which oysters and saffron-rice are the chief ingredients, is served round, nothing is heard but the clatter of dishes and the clinking of knives and spoons. In addition to the soup there are dishes of various meats, and of all the vegetables in season. A large goblet of Dijon wine being passed round, in a trice the silent feeders are flashing sallies of wit, and the whole room is a hubbub of voices.

But, suddenly, all is hushed, for the doors have opened, and a procession of five strong scullions appears carrying fresh dishes. The first has in one hand, goslings à la Malvoisie; in the other, stewed sea-eels; the second bears a dish of stomach of sturgeon, and another of roebuck, prepared with Milan cheese; the third has partridges and a fine capon; the fourth two huge jellies; while the fifth is laden with an enormous dish of teals, flanked by two salads of rampions of Meaux and Macedonian parsley, decorated with slices of cucumber and pickled onions. Free flows the talk, feats of arms, poetry, art, the mad antics of the students in the Pré-aux-clercs, with many a humorous story retailed from the all-amusing book of the Curé of Meudon forming its staple. An hour passes away, and the second course is concluded.

The doors open, and the cry is heard:—Place for the maître d'hotel! who enters pompously carrying in his outstretched arms a roast swan arrayed in all its glory, its neck arched, its wings expanded, and in the floods of gravy swim lapwings, plovers, and dotterels. With much address the grand Amphytrion of the feast plants his dish, grouping around its sides a number of delicious entremets, and supporting it at either end with a well of whipped cream and a pyramid of flaky cakes.

All praise the maître d'hotel, who, affecting modesty, bows low, and then, receding some steps, claps his hands. At this signal, hautboys, trumpets, clarions burst into loud music, and amidst a triumphant burst the banquet concludes with sweetmeats and confectionery.

Thus Paris might forget its martyrs; not so an eagle-faced man, who, young in years, but already old and careworn in looks, sits pen in hand, a fugitive at Geneva, preparing a defence of the sufferers. Calvin had himself been a student at Paris, and probably as Farel a disciple of Lefèvre. At any rate he was obliged to fly in 1533, the particular spot being the Collège de Fortet (long No. 27, Rue des Sept Voies), from which he is said to have escaped by a window. Although young among the Reformers, with the daring of genius he undertakes to tell the king what they believe; and his version of the Huguenot faith, set forth in his book, the Christian Institutes, does actually fix and become the standard of their creed.

What happened at the coronation of Catherine de Medici is significant of the spirit in which these two worlds now face to face in Paris met and regarded each other.

The city was full of excitement, fêtes went on day after day. The king could not let them pass without the added zest of murder. Six Lutherans should be burnt alive. The idols the Valois worshipped would enjoy such a holocaust. In the spirit Shakespeare regarded artizans and labourers, a poor tailor is sent for to amuse the court. Monarchs in those days thought it not derogatory to hold a theological tournay with some poor heretic, and so to enjoy the frightful pleasure of worrying the mouse they were about to devour. But on this occasion the mouse was more than equal to the royal cat. The tailor not only held his own against king and priest, but gave the royal mistress, the infamous Diana of Poitiers, such a stern reproof that the king became his personal enemy, and resolved to see him die. The burning took place in the Rue St. Antoine. The royal box was a window looking down upon the stake. When the martyr was bound he turned towards the king, and with a calm, courageous look, steadily gazed at him. The king got up and went away, but for several nights after he saw his victim at his bedside.

John Bunyan's Vanity Fair hits off to the life the relations at this time between the reformers, the authorities and the mob. The very appearance of Christian and Faithful in the fair creates a hubbub; on account of the hubbub they are imprisoned; their imprisonment causes the hubbub to become a fight, whereupon the pilgrims are brought before the judge, charged with "being enemies to, and disturbers of the trade; with making commotions and divisions in the town, and having won a party to their own most dangerous opinions, in contempt of the law of their prince." When Faithful is tried, the witness against him, is "that he neither regardeth law nor custom, but doth all that he can to possess men with certain of his disloyal notions, which he in the general calls principles of faith and holiness; that he says the religion of the town is naught and such by which a man could by no means please God, from which it follows that its worship is vain, and that those who pursue it are yet in their sins and will finally be damned; that he hath railed on its noble prince and hath spoken contemptuously of his honourable friends as the Lord Luxurious, the Lord Desire of Vain Glory, Sir Having Greedy, and hath said that if all men were of his mind not one of these noble men should have any longer a being in this town; and on this the jury," who were also doubtless paralleled in the Palais de Justice of the sixteenth century, "forthwith bring the prisoner in guilty of death."

Nevertheless, the Huguenots had many friends in the Parisian "Vanity Fair." Some said, "They are good men;" others, "Nay, for they lead the people astray." So one hour it was "Hosanna in the highest;" another, "Away with these fellows, it is not fit that they should live." During the enthusiasm caused by the publication of Clement Marot's metrical version of the Psalms, the Pré-aux-clercs resounded every evening with congregational psalmody, accompanied by marching in which some of the highest noblemen took part. This dangerous enthusiasm was soon stopped, and the defeat of St. Quentin, filling the Parisians with fear of invasion, turned the popular current quite the other way. Nothing, however, could stop the joy of the real believers; they sung their beloved psalms as they went to the scaffold. The authorities first tried gagging, and then cutting out their tongues. It was of little use: men, women, youths, were so filled with Divine fervour that they frightened the very judges by their courageous joy. "Jesus! Jesus!" cried one of them, "what possesses these young people to want to be burned for nothing?" The Parisians could not understand it, and began to think Huguenotism a dark and hidden devilry.

RICHARD HEATH.

FOR BETTER FOR WORSE.

PART II.

IT is terrible to think that instances of wrecked lives are to be met with everywhere. But, though they are to be found in all classes of society, they may be counted by thousands amongst young working men and women. I could fill volumes with true stories of many which have come under my own notice, and I do thank God with all my heart for others who have just escaped a similar fate. As I write, I am filled with a deep, motherly longing to send out a word of warning which shall reach the hearts of those dear thoughtless young people.

One girl whom I knew, made acquaintance with a man in the street, and the two began "keeping company," with a view to marriage. The girl's mother soon afterwards heard on good authority that the man had a wife and children elsewhere. Distressed at the news she sought her daughter, told her the story, and commanded her to see the man no more.

In her excitement she used hard words, blamed the girl for being ready "to take up with anybody," and refused to give her authority for saying that the man was married.

The girl declined to believe the story, and grew defiant and angry in turn. She was a factory hand, earning good wages, which made her independent of her mother.

When evening came she did not return home, and then the half-distracted parent found that, during her own temporary absence, her daughter had carried away her clothes. Further inquiry proved that the girl had given up her work, and no one knew whither she was gone.

The distressed mother went about making inquiries and bitterly reproaching herself for her harsh words, for hitherto the girl had been dutiful and kind, and would probably have listened to reason. This thought doubled the mother's regret. Moreover she was a Christian woman, and mourned over the passionate words into which her anger had betrayed her, and the harm they had done to her child.

What could she do? Only throw herself on her knees, pour out her penitent heart before God, and cry to Him to save her child from present ruin and life-long regret.

This case ended happily. The mother's prayers were heard. The girl had not, as she feared, sought the companionship of her pretended suitor, but had obtained work at a more distant factory, and was in respectable lodgings.

At first she had bitter thoughts of her mother, and resolved to return home no more. She had tried to be a good daughter, but where was the use of it, she asked herself, and her tears flowed afresh as she thought of those harsh, cruel words.

Then she found out that the story told her was true. The man to whom she had meant to trust her future was married already, and the girl could not feel thankful enough for her escape. This knowledge brought softened feelings towards her mother.

"She meant it for my good. She has always been anxious to keep me from harm," were the next thoughts, and with these came the memory of her parent's watchful, prayerful love in the past, though she might be "a bit sharp-spoken sometimes."

So the hard words were forgotten, and that night the reunited mother and child wept, prayed, and rejoiced together, and it is not likely that any misunderstanding will arise between them in the future.

In this case, the girl escaped when on the brink of ruin. In numbers of others, young lives have been wrecked both of men and women, whilst misery and sometimes shame have followed these hastily-formed connections.

As I write these words, I seem to see quite a number of familiar girl-faces. So young—but wives and mothers who have been deserted by their husbands, or who have been compelled to return to the shelter of their parents' roof, by the conduct of those whom they had recklessly taken "for better, for worse."

Young domestic servants are also as a class exposed to great temptations. Many are in service far from their own homes, and sometimes in houses where kitchen visitors are strictly forbidden, and where the mistress never gives a thought as to the manner in which her servants spend their time when they go out, provided their work is well done. She will surround her own daughters with all the care that maternal love and anxiety for their welfare can suggest. But these children of poorer mothers must be their own guardians, and arm themselves, as best they may, against the dangers and temptations that surround them on all sides.

If a strange girl comes to service in a large city from a country home, she often knows not a creature amongst the thousands around her. She probably goes out alone, yet naturally longing for companionship.

Is it wonderful if she accept that of a stranger, in preference to solitude? Or that the thought of having a suitor, and a husband in perspective, in the pleasant-spoken man—who first met her in her walks, and next spoke to her and whispered compliments in her willing ear—proves too agreeable to be given up?

Whose duty and privilege is it to stand between this girl and harm? Who, when parents are far away, and letter-writing on such a subject would be almost impossible, should step in and do the mother's part by exercising some oversight beyond the four walls of the house, that the girl may be guarded and kept in the right path?

Surely employers should recognise that a great responsibility rests on them with regard to the young people under their roof. They should care for their welfare in such a way, that the objects of their consideration would feel that it is dictated by no spirit of meddling or of tyranny, but springs from an earnest desire for their happiness, sympathy with those God-implanted feelings common to humanity in every station, and a desire to promote their true welfare.

Amongst young domestic servants I could instance the case of an excellent girl, modest, steady, industrious and God-fearing, and whose services were greatly valued by her employers. At the church she attended, she became acquainted with a young man who had come from a distance to a situation in her neighbourhood, and had brought with him a letter of introduction from his old minister, and a certificate of church membership. In consequence of these, he was kindly welcomed in many homes, and became a helper in the Sunday school. He soon singled out the dear girl I have mentioned, as an object of special attention, and in due time they became engaged.

Before a marriage took place, a visitor from the man's old neighbourhood came to the new one, and revealed the fact that he had left a wife and child behind him.

To the girl the shock was dreadful. She was wounded both in her tenderest feelings and in her self-respect.

The man defended himself by saying, that his wife had left him after the birth of their child and returned to her parents, taking the little one with her. He deemed himself free to enter into new matrimonial ties, and was quite ready to marry his second choice, never having intended anything else in seeking her affections.

Whether he was really so ignorant as he professed to be, and thought such a marriage would be lawful, it is difficult to say. One thing is certain. A most worthy girl was saved from life-long sorrow by a providential interposition on her behalf, and those who knew the circumstances were taught by her case, that too much care cannot be exercised in the all-important matter of entering upon a life-union.

The very words "For life" have an awful significance. Yet so many bind themselves by that term without ever thinking of its meaning. They link their fate with a mere street acquaintance, and even at times, on the spur of the moment, with hardly any consideration of probable results.

If the young people would but think what they are doing! If they would say to themselves, "When I marry, I take this man or woman to be my constant companion. We two will be associated in all things. We shall see each other's every act, hear each other's words, be associated as no outsider can be with either of us."

The girl should think: "I may be to a great extent subject to the will of this man if I become his wife. Is he one whom I can obey without an inward feeling of rebellion? Is he likely to use his authority lovingly and with consideration for one who is weaker than himself, and who looks to him for protection? Is he able to provide for me so that my young life may not be blighted by the cold blast of poverty, or the joy and brightness taken out of it by the pinch of absolute want? In time, there may be more to think of than our two selves." Men and maidens may well share another question, and ask, "If as man and wife we should become parents, are we fit for the awful responsibilities which come with children? We may think that their bodies will be nurtured. Mothers, at any rate, will mostly take the bread from their own lips and starve, sooner than their little ones should know the pangs of hunger. But with each little body comes an immortal soul. Are we fit to train it for God's service here, and for an eternity to follow?"

There are more thoughts that cluster round those words "For life," and "till death us do part," such as these, "The promise that I make in God's house I can never withdraw. The tie formed can neither be broken for me by any earthly friend, or by myself without grievous sin. Only God knows what is before me. To Him I must go as the only Guide that can never err, the one Friend whose love will never fail me."

Yes, God's guidance should be sought first of all. We need it at every stage of our life's journey, but perhaps most of all when we take the step which binds our lot with that of another human being, for better, for worse.

RUTH LAMB.

Things New and Old.

THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM.—During the closing months of last year, an extraordinary delusion was largely diffused through many parts of the country, that the "Star of Bethlehem" (i.e. the brilliant object in the sky which guided the Eastern Magi to the place where the Saviour of mankind was born) had reappeared. We need hardly point out to our readers that the bright star which was so conspicuous was no other than the planet Venus, seen near one of her periods of greatest brilliancy. These occur at intervals of alternately about seventeen months and two and a half months, the last two being on the 16th of August and the 28th of November, 1887. About the latter time she attracted general attention, owing to her being very bright in the early morning before sunrise, at a time when the sun was rising very late, so that the planet was well seen up to seven o'clock in the morning: and even much later by those who knew exactly where to look for her. She will not come into another position of greatest brilliancy until the 25th of March, 1889, when she will be visible not in the east in the morning as recently, but in the west and in the evening.

The absurdity, however, of mistaking Venus, seen in the east when at a period of exceptional brilliancy a little before Christmas, for a reappearance of the "Star of Bethlehem" has probably partly arisen from an erroneous notion that that star has been seen since the time of the Nativity at several intervals about three hundred years apart, the last time in 1572. Now, in the month of November in that year, a very brilliant star came almost suddenly into view, and was carefully observed by the famous Danish astronomer, Tycho Brahé. It increased in brightness until it was visible in broad daylight, but by the end of the year began to fade away, and ceased to be seen in March 1574. The idea was then started that this was a reappearance of the object seen by the Magi; but Tycho himself pointed out that such a view was utterly untenable. In the first place, the star observed by him was in the constellation Cassiopeia, and therefore in the northern part of the heavens, where it could not have guided the Magi to Bethlehem; in the second, the object seen by them must have been in the earth's atmosphere at no very great elevation, or it could not have conducted the eager travellers to a particular house. A contemporary writer, by no means deserving the name of an astronomer, but who busied himself in hunting up astronomical facts for their supposed astrological significance, suggested that this star had been seen in the years 945 and 1264, at an interval of about three hundred years, the latter epoch being also about three hundred years before 1572. Now, not to mention that astronomical periodicity is more exact than to be satisfied with intervals of 319 and 308 years, Tycho showed that the evidence of new stars having been seen in 945 and 1264 was very insufficient. It is not always easy to understand from ancient accounts (before scientific astronomy had its birth) what objects were observed occasionally in the heavens; but (as I have stated in my 'Celestial Motions') there seems little doubt that those seen in 945 and 1264 were comets. In the latter year it is certain that a magnificent comet was visible, and this was sometimes described as if it were a new star. The same remark may be made of a brilliant object stated by the ecclesiastical historians to have been seen in the year 389, when Theodosius the Great was Emperor of Rome—the last monarch of the undivided empire.

It should be remarked that the word star etymologically means "that which scatters or disperses light," and was originally used to include other heavenly bodies besides those which we call stars, and indeed any luminous object in the sky; indeed, we still use it in that sense when we speak of shooting-stars, as meteoric streams are often called. In this we have, it seems to me, the true explanation of what appeared to the Magi. A supernatural luminous appearance in the sky was vouchsafed to them, which, as all such appearances would do, presented the form of a star. They saw it, not necessarily in the east, but when they were in the eastern country, and afterwards it appeared in the south as they were on their way from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. The idea recently suggested by a writer in 'Nature,' that what they saw was Venus at a period of greatest brilliancy will not only not meet the case, but is in other respects untenable; for the Magi were undoubtedly far too well acquainted with the successions of astronomical appearances not to know that such periods regularly occurred at intervals of time of no great length. More pertinent is the remark of Chrysostom, that this star was not like other stars, but might be compared with the miraculous pillar of fire which led God's ancient people at night through the wilderness when they went up out of the land of Egypt. Well might the eastern sages, conducted in a similar manner to the place where lay the Holy Babe, Who was born not only to be the glory of His people Israel, but also a light to lighten the Gentiles, however dim were their perceptions of all He came to accomplish, rejoice "with exceeding great joy."—W. T. Lynn, B.A., F.R.A.S.

MISSY.

CHAPTER III.

MRS. BROOKS had seriously considered the suggestion proposed to her by the lion-tamer; and only the certainty that she would be lessening her own power by admitting a partner, had prevented her from acting upon it at once. She hoped by deferring her consent by various excuses for a time that she should see some way out of the difficulty; but things went from bad to worse, and it was only when after a week's stay in a large town she found she not only could not pay the men their wages, but could not clear her other expenses, that she gave her consent and signed the deed of partnership which Barnet had caused to be prepared.

Nellie and Christopher had strolled out for a farewell visit to a favourite haunt which they had discovered about a mile beyond the town. The road on either side was dotted with pretty villas, and handsome houses; but, when the little wood was reached, they seemed as Nellie said to be "shut up right away from everywhere." A little stream scarcely more than a yard wide trickled gently amongst the trees, and added to the attractions of the spot.

"The garden of Eden couldn't have been nicer, Chris'fer," she said with a sigh, as, turning from the hot dusty road, they passed into the dense shadow cast by the trees, and seated themselves by the stream. "There's everything here. Here's the river, one of them, and the trees are "pleasant to the eye"; and I should like to live here always, just me and you, Chris'fer; and then I shouldn't be tired when I walk, 'cause I shouldn't want to walk anywhere. I could lie here always and rest, and mother couldn't scold then; and p'r'aps I shouldn't cough so."

But the walk to the wood had been too much for the child's failing strength, and Christopher carried her all the way back to the town. After leaving Nellie at her lodgings, he returned to the show, and was greeted by Barnet with the news of the change which had taken place in the proprietorship.

"We'll make things look a bit smarter before three months is over, I bet," said the new partner complacently, nibbling at a straw. "A little fresh paint and some more music will do wonders; those old nags," nodding towards the horses which drew the vans, "will soon be food for Congo and his friends. I've come in for a bit of money lately, and I intend to invest it in some good strong horses. There's nothing like making a good show when you first go into a place; those poor old screws were enough to take away the character of the best show in the world. And you'll have to look smart, all the whole lot of you; they'll have to be groomed till their coats shine like satin. I don't mean to have any skulking now I'm master here, 'twill be work and pay now; no skulking and idling with you, and no backing out of paying your wages every Saturday night with me. When the little girl has got through her training, and is ready to appear before the public, the money will begin to come in, I bet."

"What!" cried Christopher. "You don't mean Missy?"

"Ah, but I do though, old fellow, so it is no use for you to object; it's all down in the articles, all signed, sealed, and settled."

Christopher waited for no more. As well as his lameness would permit him, he ran through the town towards the lodgings where Mrs. Brooks and Nellie were staying. A strange sensation which he had sometimes felt of late seized upon him; he felt that he was choking, and though he managed to reach the house and burst into the room where Mrs. Brooks was, he could not articulate for some minutes. At length he found his voice, and was able to answer Mrs. Brooks' question of—"What he meant by this impudence?"

"It's Missy," he gasped. "Oh, you never meant it; you couldn't be so cruel as to force a delicate little thing like that in among the beasts! What could she do amongst them? If you lets her go, she'll be killed; I know she will; then it will be murder, and it's you as will have done it, you and Barnet between you."

"You impudent old rascal!" cried Mrs. Brooks, livid with rage. "What do you mean by coming to me like this? I can do what I like with my own child, and with you too, and so I'll let you know pretty sharp. Off you go from my show! I'll have nobody coming and telling me what I am to do, or what I am not to do with my child."

At this moment the door opened, and Nellie entered. Seeing Christopher, she ran to him and caught his hand; but her mother seized her by the arm, and pulled her away, giving her at the same time such a box on the ear that the child reeled and staggered. Christopher sprang forward to ward off another blow from his favourite, but, before he could reach her, a horrible spasm of pain seized him, his face was convulsed, and with a cry he fell forward.

When the old man recovered consciousness, he found himself in the infirmary ward of the workhouse. "Something the matter with your heart," the nurse told him in reply to his question of "Why he was brought there?" "You had a kind of fit, and they thought you was dead at first, but you come round; and now you'll have to keep quiet."

The doctor gave him the same injunction. "Keep quiet, don't excite yourself." But Christopher found it well-nigh impossible to follow this advice when he felt that his little Missy might be daily exposed to deadly peril. He could hear no news of the show from the nurse, and his own impatience retarded his recovery.

It was nearly three weeks before Christopher was discharged, still weak and almost penniless, from the workhouse. But, while he lay on his sick bed, he had been maturing his plans: he would follow the show, and, when he overtook it, he would try to see Missy alone; he would get her away. Anything would be better than the awful feeling that any day she might be clawed by the savage beasts. They would tramp away together, and he would try what he could do at his old trade of basket-making.

Christopher economised his little money as he followed in the wake of the show: he would beg a meal here and there and would sleep under a hedge or in the casual ward of a workhouse, taking great care to secrete his few coppers so as to evade search.

The journey was long and toilsome to him, and when at length he reached his destination, he could scarcely drag himself along. Keeping out of sight as well as he could, he approached the show—the vans now all resplendent in blue and scarlet—and waited till one of his old comrades should come out. Happily for him, the first who appeared was Ben, who expressed some concern at the spectacle the old man presented; but Christopher cut his speech short, and asked impatiently where Mrs. Brooks was lodging, and whether she had carried out her intention of having Missy trained to perform with the lions.

"I should just think she had," was the reply; "and it was a rare sight, I can tell you, the first time the little un went in. She'd got plenty o' pluck, I can tell you, and just went up to old Congo straight, and put her hand on his neck, and he kind o' arched hisself up, and looked as though he liked it. They all takes to her, except one; and I don't mind telling you that I don't like the way that beast looks at her, and kind o' smacks his lips. Barnet's in the cage too, o' course, and he'll see that nothing don't happen to the child; but I don't like to see it, none the more for that. She isn't well now; had to stay in her bed for a week past; cough's bad, they say; and so, o' course, she can't come down to the show."

Christopher knew that the time for the evening performance was at hand, and, going into a baker's shop near the address given him by Ben, he watched until he saw Mrs. Brooks leave the house, and then walked up himself and asked to see "Mrs. Brooks' little gal."

"She isn't well, and she's in bed," was the reply he got.

"I knows that. But just you tell her as old Christopher is here, and see what she'll say."

In another minute Christopher was by the bedside, with Missy's arms tightly clasped round his neck; and the woman, who had been at first reluctant to admit him, now retired, glad to find there was somebody who would take care of the child for an hour, for, in spite of Mrs. Brooks' assurance that there was nothing the matter beyond a cold, she had felt uneasy every time she heard the violent paroxysms of coughing.

"Oh, you dear, dear Chris'fer!" said the child, as soon as she could speak. "I thought I was never going to see you again! Why didn't you come to your Missy when she wanted you so badly?"

"I was bad too, Missy, or I'd 'a' bin here long afore. But now I wants to know, my little lass, whether you be well enough to get up and come along o' me. Old Chris can't bear to think o' you going into the cage with the lions; you be such a little thing for that sort o' work. So, if you don't like it, you say so, and you can come along o' me. I shan't be able to keep you very well just at first; but Missy knows her old Chris won't never do her no harm; so say the word, and if you can get up and come down, we'll be off before anybody comes back."

The child's face brightened for a moment, and she raised herself eagerly in the bed, but a fit of coughing came, and she sank back wearily.

"I couldn't do it, Chris'fer. I can't walk; I'm always so tired now. And, Chris'fer, I don't think I shall ever go into the show again; I think I'm going to see the Garden of Eden before long. There was a gentleman came here yesterday. He was a clergyman; and when he heard there was a little girl ill, he came up to see me. And, oh, Chris'fer, he was so kind; and when I told him I wanted to see the Garden of Eden, he said there was a beautiful country up there where it was better even than Eden, and all the good people who died went there, and they never could be unhappy again, and he read to me all about it out of his Bible. We never read so far, Chris'fer, for 'twas at the end of the Book; and it said there shouldn't be any more sorrow or crying, and it's all gold and beautiful stones, and big pearls for gates. And then there's a lovely river, and a tree with beautiful fruit and leaves—the tree of life, and I 'spect 'tis like the Garden of Eden, 'cause, you know, there was a tree of life there."

"And how be we to get there, Missy?"

"You 'member when we went to church, Chris'fer, how we heard about Jesus Christ, and how they put him on a cross and killed him. Well, the gentleman said Jesus Christ came to show us the way, and if we'd only hold out our hands to Him, He'd take 'em, and guide us along till we got there; and I'm going, Chris'fer. I told Him just now before you came that I wanted Him to catch hold of my hand, and I 'spect He will, for the gentleman said He loved little children. And now I think I'll go to sleep, Chris'fer; I'm tired."

But the effort of talking had been too much for Nellie. Again her feeble frame was shaken by the terrible cough, and then from her lips gushed out a crimson stream. Christopher's cry brought the woman of the house, but the child's struggles had ceased. For some time she lay insensible, while the old man looked at her with a new fear.

"Ah, she's dying, poor little lamb," said the woman. We must send for a doctor and her mother. P'r'aps you could find the show, and bring Mrs. Brooks here, as you seem to know her;" and she gently tried to remove the child's hand from Christopher's grasp.

But he clutched her the tighter, saying—"Get you gone, woman; you shan't take her from me, she's my Missy. Nobody ever loved her as I did, and I'm going to meet her in the Garden of Eden—I told her I would, and I will. Oh, Lord, take my hand, too."

"He's mad, that's certain," said the woman, as she ran downstairs and despatched one neighbour for a doctor, and another to the show, to fetch Mrs. Brooks.

* * * * *

The local papers that week had a pathetic story of the devotion of an old man who, weak and ailing, had travelled on foot to save the child he loved from the perils and dangers thrust upon her by her mother's greed and cruel carelessness; and a grand and exaggerated climax was wrought out in the picture of the two apparently dead bodies being discovered by the doctor still clasped in each other's arms. But in neither case did Death hold his prey. Desperate as Nellie's condition seemed, she revived under the care and skilful treatment of the doctor. From Christopher, when he recovered from the swoon into which he had fallen, he heard the whole story of Nellie's life, and sternly did he confront Mrs. Brooks with the fact that she would be her child's murderer, did she persist in forcing her into the performance with the animals.

So great was the public outcry which arose when the whole case was known, that Mrs. Brooks and her partner were glad to promise to withdraw the child from the rôle for which she was advertised. Butterwick's Menagerie beat a hasty retreat from the town, for sundry threats had been heard of sacking the show, and Mrs. Brooks had been hooted through the street by a crowd of boys. She was glad enough to leave the child for a time in the hands of the kind doctor, who declared he would not give her up until she was fully restored to health; but though Nellie to some extent recovered from her illness, life flickered but feebly in her frail frame. The doctor, who had got to love the child as his own, declared he hoped to make her strong yet; but others who saw the little girl shook their heads, and said, "She is not long for this world."

Christopher, who quite recovered his strength, was taken into the service of the kind clergyman who had visited Nellie, and in his talks with his master learned of those great truths of which before he had such vague and imperfect ideas. He and Nellie were perfectly happy, and none could doubt that though life for neither could be long, yet they would eventually meet again beneath the shadow of the Tree of Life; or that Christopher's prayer, uttered in ignorance, though strong in faith, would be heard, and a saving Hand stretched out to help and guide him to those "green pastures and still waters," of which he and Missy had lovingly conversed.

E. A. CAMPBELL.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

ANCESTRAL NAMES.

No. 1765.—FEBRUARY 25, 1888.

"IN THE DAYS OF OUR FATHERS."

A FEW years ago, a party of ladies and young people planned a pleasant autumn day's excursion to a famous ruin. The castle was associated with picturesque periods of national history, and was situated among some of the most romantic rock scenery of Great Britain. We also purposed to include in our visit a neighbouring spot, less popularly known, yet fraught with pathetic memories as the burial place of martyrs, who had worn out their lives in the castle's dungeons: and further interesting as the scene where Sir Walter Scott met Robert Paterson, or "Old Mortality," the singular man who considered himself as fulfilling a sacred duty while renewing to the eyes of posterity the decaying emblems of the zeal and sufferings of their forefathers, and "thereby trimming as it were the beacon light which was to warn future generations to defend their religion even unto blood."

While we were making our plans and preparations, a relative of one of the party, a gentleman closely connected with a grand old Scotch university, suggested that while visiting the martyrs' graves, we might take the opportunity of inspecting another tomb in the same churchyard,—the resting-place of one of the ancient lords of the now ruined castle, whose benefactions had founded a college whose graduates' names and labours have spread all over the world.

We spent our morning in exploring the castle, perched on almost inaccessible rocks, the coast-line of a wild and bare country. We peered about the stately baronial chambers, now left open to all the storms of heaven—we descended into the dreadful dungeons where the martyrs had been confined, often fastened to the wall, often without food and even deprived of water. Then we started off to the old inland churchyard.

A moderately long walk brought us into a district of quite a different character.

> Gray twilight poured
> On dewy pastures, dewy trees,
> Softer than sleep—all things in order stored—
> A haunt of ancient peace.

There were the quaint manse and the old white church peeping up among a rich woodland. With chastened voices we stole through the little turnstiles, and stood among the graves. A young country woman passing through volunteered to point out the "martyrs' monuments," and the little group gathered round, and with solemn faces read the homely names of those of whom we know so little, except the greatest fact of all, that they had a faith which was dearer to them than their mortal lives.

Then we turned away to seek for "The 'Earl Marischals,'" tomb. It was but a tiny quadrangle, ingress to which was given by a low ramshackle wooden door, which we found was locked. But it had cracks, liberally wide for peeping. There was nothing but desolation within, coarse grass, rank nettles and a few neglected flowers, which somebody had planted once, but which were now degenerating to a lower type. Some workman—probably the sexton—kept his tools there, for we could see a spade and mattock and a dilapidated garment lying on the ground.

It was a pointed sermon on the transitoriness of human power and grandeur. None of us knew much about the Earl Founder, except that an old historian has described him as "a learned, wise and upright good man," yet showed him in his dealings as somewhat high handed and grasping. He was probably an honourable and well-intentioned person, according to the dim lights of his class and period. But it did seem to us that whatever had been his faults, had his endowment of the college been but the single wise and benevolent action of a foolish and selfish life, it yet behoved some of those who had cultivated their intellects and shaped their careers by the help of his antique bequest, to pay him as much grateful remembrance as would suffice to keep his last resting-place in order, and treated with decent reverence. Probably the omission has been repaired before this.

It has been too much a fashion to look at antiquarianism on its comical side: to regard it as a mere craze for discovering or collecting what is strange or old. A Scotch poet has roughly ridiculed its store as—

> A fouth o' auld nick-nackets,
> Rusty airn caps and jinglin' jackets,
> Wad hand the Lothians three in tackets
> A towmont guid;
> An parritch pats and auld saut-brackets
> Before the Flood.

And even Walter Scott, with his own tender feeling for all which time had made venerable, has shown only the ludicrous possibilities of such an enthusiasm, in the learned credulity of his "Antiquary." But, in reality, if modern man is to reap any true advantage from being "heir of all the ages in the foremost files of time," he must deal as tenderly and reverently with all the material and moral relics of the whole world's past, as those who have ancestors are generally disposed to do with the traditions or possessions linked with their own family interest and pride. Only so, can man obtain any real insight into the conditions which have brought the human race, or his particular branch of it to its present standpoint. And without that insight, he can scarcely understand the present nor foresee whither it is tending. Even the mere greedy "collector" who gathers up whatever is old or rare, with but little discrimination between the relative value of his "antiquities," is yet often a useful person, rescuing from the rapidly rising waters of oblivion some rubbish possibly, but also some rich treasures for philosophic consideration.

We will endeavour to illustrate our meaning by seeing to what ends a few reflections on one curious relic will lead us.

We find our relic in an old, old farmhouse in a wild and unfrequented agricultural district.

> What of light is lingering there
> Is lingering light of yesterday.

It is a rude iron bracket,—I think it has a rough joint, driven into the wall beside the fireplace, at a height just even with the faces of those sitting by the hearth. Our hostess smiles to see us notice it.

"Dinna ye ken what that is?" she asks. "It's just a 'puir man!'"

She explains that in bygone days the function of this article was to hold the tightly-bound torch of fir, or the rough home-made candle which illuminated the evening labours of the fireside group, and it got its name because it was the substitute, when he failed to appear, of the travelling tramp or bedesman, who was readily admitted to shelter and food, and was expected in return to render the service of holding the light.

What a significant picture! It is impossible to dwell on all the thoughts it suggests. First, what a recognition of common humanity was in it! Then, what an unconscious sermon the poor traveller must have been to the young folks. The very sight of him was a lesson on the blessings of home, and the value of regulated labour, and the virtues of industry, sobriety and thrift. What gulfs of dark experience they must have looked into through his eyes! And yet, how were his hardships softened and cheered. Such gifts and graces as he might have, would still have their value. Sheer misfortune, not trodden down into a mere mire of misery, would still command respect. He was still in sight of upward paths if he had strength to climb them. And, finally, how free and friendly was the help which humbled itself to accept a sort of return, and how chastening was the presence of a poverty from which one was not so far removed oneself, and which one was thankfully glad that good people could make bearable.

The greatest of Scotch poets had doubtless seen such a guest at the fireside of his own godly peasant sire, and it was such a lot which he faced as distinctly possible in his own future, when in his obscure and severely struggling youth, he called on his friend Davie Sillar to remember that

> The last o't, the warst o't
> Is only but to beg—

and at once, even in that moment of despondency, he could recognise that this lowest lot was not without real alleviations:—

> To lie in kilns and barns at e'en,
> When banes are crazed, and bluid is thin,
> Is doubtless great distress!
> Yet then content could make us blest;
> Even then, sometimes we'd snatch a taste
> Of truest happiness.
>
> The honest heart that's free frae a'
> Intended fraud or guile,
> However fortune kick the ba'
> Has aye some cause to smile:
> And mind still, you'll find still,
> A comfort this nae sma',
> Nae mair then, we'll care then,
> Nae farther we can fa'.
>
> What though, like commoners of air,
> We wander out we know not where
> But either house or hall?
> Yet nature's charms, the hills and woods,
> The sweeping vales and foaming floods,
> Are free alike to all.
> In days when daisies deck the ground,
> And blackbirds whistle clear,
> With honest joy our hearts will bound
> To see the coming year:
> On braes where we please, then,
> We'll sit and sowth a tune;
> Syne rhyme till't, we'll time till't,
> And sing't when we hae dune.

If a life of sheer labour had really brought the poet even to this hard end, it is doubtful whether his manhood would not have been far truer and happier than it became, when he was for a while the recipient of those treacherous hospitalities of the great, concerning which Solomon warns us so pointedly. Far better to hold a candle to cheer the homely industry of a cottage home than to take the very "light from heaven," the power of brain and warmth of heart, to illuminate the senseless revelry of selfish idlers!

We know that one Scottish woman singer, of good character, and mind cultivated beyond her period, did, in her old age, become a wandering hawker, earning her way by temporary services in shaping and sewing, nursing or brewing. Thus did Jean Adam save herself from public charity till one day before her death. She may have sung her own songs at the hearths which gave her brief shelter.

A pathetic lot! And yet how different was such "a last and warst," in which all of value in the individual came out in very strongest relief, from the dead level of artificial arrangements, where the very security of provision destroys > the hope, whose vital anxiousness

> Gives the last human interest to the heart.

Contrast the Scottish picture with that drawn by the English poet Crabbe, and whose colours have only deepened since his day,—

> With a number you
> Have placed your poor, your pitiable few.
>
> They have no evil in the place to state,
> And dare not say it is the house they hate.
>
> Like death's dread mansion, this allows not place
> For joyful meetings of a kindred race.
>
> They talk indeed, but who can choose a friend,
> Or seek companions at their journey's end?
>
> What if no grievous fears their lives annoy,
> Is it not worse no prospects to enjoy?
> 'Tis cheerless living in such bounded view,
> With nothing dreadful but with nothing new.

Then, too, I own, it grieves me to behold
Those ever virtuous, helpless now and old,
By all for care and industry approved,
For truth respected, and for temper loved:

And who, by sickness and misfortune tried,
Gave want its worth and poverty its pride,
. . . losing all the praise
By worthy deeds acquired in better days,
Breathe a few months, then to their chamber led,
Expire, while strangers prattle round their bed.

We have high authority warning us not to say that the former days were better than these, yet that very warning is an implied injunction to take care that to-day is better than yesterday. We know that changes must come as new conditions of life arise, but let us remember that the new is not always the true. Let us be careful in digging up and transplanting old roots which have hitherto borne good fruits, and let us, to descend to details, study rather how some of the moral conditions of old-fashioned rural life may be cultivated even in a capital city, than rush, as we often do, to impose the rough remedies called for by that city's terrible necessities upon still existing rural life. Do not start "committees" to discharge functions which neighbourly kindness can still overtake. Do not establish "an Institute," where real homes are still hospitably opened. Let us study that social condition, in which there was little wealth, yet in which the deepest poverty was not terrible, but had so many blessings, that it could be truly said that "the beggar was as ready to fight for his dish as the laird for his land."

Even to-day, north of the Tweed, especially in the remoter places which have been least exposed to southern influences, a new social atmosphere strikes upon the stranger. The common people may be ruder in speech and rougher in manner than their English equals, but they have a singular dignity about them, an independence which is not self-conscious, a kindliness which is not servile. One remembers that an English monarch visiting Edinburgh remarked that he had come among a nation of gentlemen. One is struck by the frank way in which handicrafts of all kinds are stated on substantial burgher tombs, which set forth on granite that will last for generations that such a man was "a mason," or "a white-fisher." There seems to be less need for anybody's standing on his dignity, so strong is the self-respect of all classes, and yet, or one should say therefore, the transition between them is more natural and straightfoward. Nobody is surprised to hear that the father of a famous professor kept a little shop, or that a certain distinguished clergyman held the plough himself in his own young days, and, of course, nobody can afford to despise the humble ranks from which such heroes have risen.

See to what wide horizons of memory and reflection one rude relic has led us—a relic which the unthinking might have thrown aside as mere "old iron." It is sad to think how many valuable monuments of the past must have been thus destroyed by thoughtless ignorance. My own father rescued a rare book—one whose "plates" are exhibited in museums as curios—from beneath the hoofs of the horses in a stable, where heedless heirs had thrown it to be cleared out as "waste paper." A friend found an old parish record, full of choice glimpses into old customs and old families, lying in fragments in the lumber-room of a manse.

But if there is so much human interest to be found in, and wisdom to be gained from, a due consideration of the material remains of the past, how much more in the remembrance of good deeds and great lives! Well sings the American poet,—

Whene'er a noble deed is wrought,
Whene'er is spoken a noble thought,
Our hearts, in glad surprise
To higher levels rise.
The tidal wave of deeper souls
Into our inmost being rolls,
And lifts us unawares
Out of all meaner cares.

It is pitiful to think how we often fail to keep green the memories of people and actions which are full of cheer and inspiration for those who may be fainting by the way which these have trodden triumphantly. Boys and girls who know how many miles it is to the moon, who can rattle off the names of all the Muses, Graces, Fates, and Furies, and who, alas! alas! are sometimes eagerly watching for the daily paper to study the latest development of a divorce suit or a murder trial, often know nothing of some great and good man who lived and died in their own street—nay, do not even know that there was such an one!

How many of the young politicians and journalists—to say nothing of the office lads and workmen who bustle about the purlieu of the Strand know or remember that it was in narrow dingy Maiden Lane, that the incorruptible Andrew Marvell received the Court emissary and convinced him that the man who was quite satisfied with a bit of mutton and willing to save some of it for to-morrow was not likely to be amenable to Royal bribes?

How many people, walking up Snow Hill, remember that it was there that John Bunyan, arrested by the hand of Death while carrying out a mission of neighbourly mercy, sighted the Land of Beulah, and was led by the Shining Ones into the City of the King? Are there many who turn aside, in the squalid City Road, to muse awhile beside his tomb in Bunhill Fields? They say that few but Americans ever make inquiry about Milton's grave in Cripplegate Churchyard.

Would it do anybody harm, or good, amid the mingled gloom and gaiety, grandeur and wretchedness, of Oxford Street, to recall that it was in a little news' shop, in one of its northward turnings, that the boy, Michael Faraday, swept and did errands, his brain already astir with mighty problems, and that there he bent his kindly steps in the days of his acknowledged greatness, to find his memory lingering along with the legend of his genius and his rise—only plain Michael Faraday was transformed into a mythical "Sir Charles"?

May it not come like a note from "the everlasting chime" borne above the loud stunning tide of human care and struggle that flows down the "Strand," if we think of worthy, heavily-handicapped Samuel Johnson carrying all his doubts and burdens into the church of St. Clement's Danes, and there finding help and comfort to go on fighting the battle of life? It is a movement in the right direction that has put up a little brass plate in the pew where the good man knelt and praised God.

There can be no doubt that remembrance is greatly helped by the identification of localities. Inspired wisdom recognised this, when Joshua was directed to cause stones to be placed where the Israelites had passed over Jordan "for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever." An incident or a character loses somewhat in reality when one cannot give it "a local habitation," but has to tell its tale according to the method so graphically described by a great modern story-teller. "He sometimes took them to the street where she had lived. . . . The old house had been long ago pulled down, and a fine broad road was in its place. At first he would draw with his stick a square upon the ground to show them where it used to stand. But he soon became uncertain of the spot, and could only say it was thereabouts he thought, and these alterations were confusing."

We have given most of our illustrations from London memories, because London, in a sense, belongs to us all, and is rich in association which many of its present conditions tend to resign to oblivion. But provincial cities and even the quietest country places have memories which they should not willingly let die, and which it would not be so difficult for them to cherish and preserve. These need not be only of the great or even of the gifted. Let us hope that in the widening wisdom of "the people" they will learn to understand that true human interest dwells in human endurance and heroism and dutifulness wherever found, and not in the mere crimes and cruelties of wicked kings and dubious princesses.

We hope that somebody knows which particular cottage was built by the very hands of the ploughboy-poets, Robert and John Bethune, for the comfort of their aged parents. We were charmed to see, in the High Street of Edinburgh, a record of the hopeful pluck of a lad who, buried alive in the ruins of a fallen house, was heard, previous to his rescue, encouraging his liberators by cheerily exclaiming, "Heave awa', chaps; I'm no deid yet." His head, surmounted by a scroll bearing this "legend," smiles down upon the shoeless "bairns," and sore struggling folk of the locality, and perhaps helps some to ply their daily task with lighter feet, feeling that there is "No hap so hard but may with time amend." The little incident only took place in 1861, so its hero has not yet had time "to found a family," or surely the "reddest" radical would not grudge them his head and saying for their "crest" and "motto."

Let us feel that it is a sacred duty to do what we can to keep green the remembrance of all good people and all good deeds—of anything by which we feel the world might be richer and better, and which we would like to see multiplied and extended. Let the rest pass. Nay, of undoubted evil, let us rather facilitate the sure oblivion with which Nature overtakes it. There was a clever thing done in a London house which had been polluted by a great crime of the sensational kind which, alas, so often attracts a morbid curiosity. The murder had been committed in a large room. This was promptly subdivided into two or three small apartments: and the windows hitherto existing were closed and new ones made. Nobody could say, "It was done here," or, "It was done there." The scene of the sin had vanished!

Let the memories which we strive to cherish be of the kind which we feel may have a memorial even in the City of the King. Let us not allow ourselves to dwell with prurient interest on scenes and legends, however gilded by historic names and the lustre of genius or beauty, whose actors, if finally repentant, can only recall them with bitter regret and shame. Let us remember the martyr's eternal triumph, but let the persecutor's name find a merciful forgetfulness as soon as it can. Let us, in our homely human measure, copy the example of the Divine Father, who "as far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us," who moderates our finite judgments, by declaring through his apostle Paul, that some whose works may have to perish, shall themselves be saved "yet so as through fire," and who soothes the heart of His restored children by declaring—

Their sin will I REMEMBER no more.

ISABELLA FYVIE MAYO.

THE LIFE WORK OF SAMUEL MORLEY.

SOON after Mr. Morley's death in the fall of 1886, the main incidents of his long and busy life were described in these pages; but the appearance of the ample Memoir of the merchant prince, by Mr. Edwin Hodder, affords the opportunity of looking at him more particularly as a benefactor of his country. Mr. Morley's life, from the biographer's standpoint, was very different from that of the successful politician, theologian or scientist. It was crowded with good deeds, and characterised by unselfish devotion to work for the good of others; but it was bare of incident such as characterised the more public career of Lord Shaftesbury. "There were no journals or diaries, save a very brief record of some of his early travels, and note-books of engagements," remarks Mr. Hodder, who, however, has woven together a narrative which ought to stimulate all young men to live noble Christian lives.

It is well to remember in these days of keen competition, and in some instances of practices which will not go by so harmless a name, that, from the first, the house of Morley was controlled by those who were model men of business; that is to say, they were hard-working, thoroughly conscientious in giving customers the best value for money, and liberal towards their staff of assistants. Under such management, the house grew until it became the largest concern of the kind in the country; and its chiefs were what they were because they were Christian men. Hence, it happened, that no one was ever more favoured as regarded the general surroundings of youth than Samuel Morley. He had only to follow in the footsteps of his father to become what he did; while the teaching and example of his mother was never at fault. The old mansion at Hackney, where he was born, is a relic of the near suburbs when they were really rural retreats within walking distance of the city. Its old garden of three acres was a paradise of its kind; and amidst its fragrant shades often wandered as visitors many of the best known Christian men of their day.

When Mr. Morley was a young man the times are described as being in a state of transition: many things that had become obsolete in ecclesiastical practice, in the political world, in social life, were passing away to give place to something better. Costly wars, public abuses, and bad customs had prevailed until the country was beginning to find the effect to be intolerable; but now that there was a clearing of the air, Mr. Morley heartily entered into the spirit of the times, and by attending public meetings, and by doing his part in helping on any good work that came under his notice, he was unconsciously preparing himself for greater service in the future. Being a politician from the first he was, of course, interested in Parliamentary reform, which became a leading question of the day; but he was more concerned about the great extension of mission enterprise, both at home and abroad, which became the most striking evidence of a revival of Christian life. It seemed to happen quite providentially that, thus early in his career, Mr. Morley should come within the influence of two vigorous minds, each of which in some degree left its mark upon him. "If he was spiritually the son of James Parsons, of York," it is remarked, "he was mentally the son of Thomas Binney, of the Weigh House." Mr. Binney was his lifelong friend, and exercised great and lasting influence over him.

When the young man had developed into the maturer Christian of middle-age, the demands of business became increasingly pressing, the working day of ten hours being too short for doing all that called for attention. It was at such a time, however, that Mr. Morley, after his father's example, began to give more earnest attention to philanthropic work. We find it said of him at this period that "half the Congregational ministers of London knew him personally, and were entertained by him either at Wood Street or in his own house; and it is no exaggeration to add, that half the schemes of usefulness in which the denomination was engaged, were discussed at those interviews." Then as wealth was increasing, and he had a heart to diffuse it for the good of Christ's cause, correspondence increased to such a degree that he was warned of the danger of attempting to do too much; but being in the full vigour of his manhood, he was hardly in a mood to give heed to kindly-expressed innuendoes however well-timed.

As a man intensely interested in the general well-being, and social elevation of the industrial classes, Mr. Morley well knew that the best service that could be rendered them was to press the Gospel upon their acceptance. In the conviction that existing agencies could not overtake the needs of the ever-growing population, he was wont to say, "We must go to the people. He had great faith in the poor being reached by pious and earnest men of their own order—men of the colporteur type, who in the same person could unite the purveyor of wholesome literature, the lay evangelist, the sick visitor, and general adviser of the poor. When it is remembered what were the demands made upon his time by an extensive and rapidly-growing business, it is no small testimony to his earnestness when we find him visiting nearly every county in England for the purpose of organizing or stimulating home missionary work. On all such occasions his energy never seemed to flag. It is said that "when a conference was to be held at Worcester, he asked the minister of the chapel in which they were to meet, whether he thought that five gentlemen in the neighbourhood could be induced to give 100*l.* each for lay evangelical work. The minister thought it was wholly improbable. Not so did Mr. Morley; he spent the best part of the day in privately canvassing those who would be present . . . and the result was that he laid on the table a list of subscriptions amounting to 1850*l.* from nine persons!"

With similar characteristic energy, he entered into all schemes which had for their object the bettering of the condition of the working classes; and he was one of the first to startle some of his friends by pleading for preaching in theatres and music-halls. It will be remembered by many friends of the poor in South London with what earnestness and open-handed liberality he supported the far-reaching work carried on by the late Mr. G. M. Murphy at the Lambeth Baths. He was for supplementing the ordinary methods of church work by any lawful agency that promised to arouse the common people from their lethargy as regards spiritual things. At that time many good persons were shocked at the Gospel being proclaimed in places provided for mere amusement. Mr. Morley, on the contrary, manifested a spirit of bold innovation.

"I believe in the use of any building," he said. "My notion of consecration means the work done in the building, and whether it be a theatre, a garret, a cellar, or anywhere, if you can get the people to come there, I say, earnest Christian people should be found trying with five, fifty, or five hundred, as the case may be, to lift them up to the higher life."

Mr. Morley's extreme solicitude for the working classes led him to advise them to practise total abstinence from intoxicants before he became himself an example of what he taught; and at length he was converted to teetotalism in quite an unexpected way.

"Do you go without yourself?" called out a labouring man, interrupting him in one of his speeches. "I dare say, if the truth 's known, you take your glass or two of wine after dinner, and think no harm of it," added the questioner. "Now, sir, do you go without yourself?"

When Mr. Morley told this story, he would remark, "This rather shut me up for an instant; but when I looked at those poor fellows whom I had been asking to give up what they regarded—no matter how erroneously—as their only luxury, I had my answer pretty quickly. 'No,' I said, 'but I will go without from this hour.'"

Since charges of close-fisted policy would at times be preferred against him, it may be asked if his example as an employer of labour always corresponded to his precepts on the platform.

On one occasion, the secretary of a Trade Society, after investigating one unfounded charge, found that four hundred work-people at Sutton-in-Ashfield received sixpence a dozen more for making hose than other manufacturers were in the habit of paying. It was added, "These four hundred men make, on an average, one thousand dozen of hose a week, and during the last four years, Mr. Morley might thus, had he been so inclined, have put the sum of 5200*l.* in his pocket; but instead of that he came over to Sutton during the distress to sympathise with us, and not only that, he left us 100*l.* to be given to the poor of the place."

The care that was shown in the control of the London house corresponded in all respects with this solicitude for more humble dependants. Men of sterling moral character alone were eligible for appointments; but when admitted these found that every possible attention was paid to their comfort and well-being. Then, beyond all, Mr. Morley endeavoured to inspire his subordinates with his own spirit; and so successful was he in this, that the staff in Wood Street became a sort of Christian brotherhood, pledged to do something for others who were out of the way of Gospel privileges. A mission was carried on in the vicinity of Golden Lane, which some years ago was the headquarters of the street-traders—a network of courts, and alleys, notorious for its vice and squalor. When all was organised, and a missionary appointed, Mr. Morley himself presided at a meeting of the promoters, when, in an earnest manner, he "dwelt upon the responsibility the young men had taken upon themselves in having committed the house to such a great and important work." At the same time he urged them on to make the enterprise a success, and promised on his own part substantial help.

As he grew older, and as wealth increased, the judicious distribution of his money became a main business of life. The manner in which the great bulk was given away is pretty generally known: it went in a multitude of small sums to assist both clergymen of the Established Church and Nonconformist Ministers in pastoral work, and occasionally large amounts such as 5000*l.* to the Memorial Hall, and 6000*l.* for securing Exeter Hall for the Young Men's Christian Association: but, in addition to these, numbers of poor ministers and struggling private individuals frequently received assistance. These cases were too numerous, and of too delicate a nature to be told to the general public; and Mr. Morley would hardly care to let one hand know what was done by the other in such matters. Nor was he ever anxious about the prestige which his munificence naturally earned for him; and he seems to have been virtually the founder of many institutions which flourished without being associated with his name. According to Lord Shaftesbury's testimony, he was "content to be anything or nothing" so long as good could be done. "No one has ever transgressed against him as I have," added the earl, "and I could tell you of a hundred instances in which he did all the work, and I had all the honour." He also showed his wisdom in making his gifts, whenever practicable, act as a stimulus to the liberality of others.

During his term of parliamentary life Mr. Morley rendered good service when the great matter of elementary education was before the country; and later, he cheerfully undertook the onerous labour of the London School Board chairmanship.

That Mr. Morley was a good and profitable neighbour was pleasantly demonstrated when he removed from Stamford Hill to Leigh, near Tonbridge, in 1870. For generations to come the village will feel the benefit of what he was enabled to do in improving the drainage and water-supply, as well as in making larger provision for its spiritual and educational needs. Then, "At the beginning of each new year," as the present vicar of the parish tells us, "Mr. Morley was wont to give a substantial tea to the workmen in his employ at Leigh, and their families, to the number of some hundred and fifty, after which he presented, with friendly and appropriate words, a present, consisting of some useful articles, to each one who worked on the estate." In every possible way, as the recognised squire of the parish, he promoted the welfare of the inhabitants. On the one hand he helped the vicar and aided in building a new vicarage, and on the other hand he erected a Nonconformist chapel. While staunch in his beliefs, and unfaltering in the principles he avowed, he cared more for the progress of truth than for any sectarian aim.

He was thus a servant of God and a friend of the people: a man who ever sought the grace of God in order that he might improve to the utmost the talent committed to his care. He so far made his mark upon the age that he left the world better than he found it.[1] G. H. P.

[1] The Life of Samuel Morley. By Edwin Hodder. (Hodder & Stoughton.)

Now upon Syria's land of roses
Softly the light of eve reposes;
And, like a glory, the broad sun
Hangs over sainted Lebanon
Whose head in wintry grandeur towers,
And whitens with eternal sleet,
While summer, in a vale of flowers,
Is sleeping rosy at his feet.

—Moore.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XV.—AN ENCOUNTER.

DRAYTON, or Market Drayton as it was generally called, had once been a more thriving and important place than it was at present. Early in the century it had been a garrison town, and had had a considerable population of its own; but the era of railways had marked its decline. No main line passed near to it, and gradually its trade and its inhabitants drifted away to larger centres, and it gradually dwindled to its present proportions. It was a picturesque, quiet, dead-alive little place, with wide streets, and quaint buildings that told a tale of departed glory. It had rather a fine town-hall with a chiming clock, and one or two important-looking buildings, one of which was a capital gymnasium, that had once been a part of the barracks, but was now used to a considerable extent by the boys and young men of the town and surrounding neighbourhood as a pleasant place for exercise and a sort of sociable club. Classes were held four afternoons in the week by a retired soldier, who drilled the members and superintended the various exercises. There were evening classes too, but these were mostly patronised by the townsfolk of a lower social grade. Gentlemen's sons preferred the earlier hour, and generally mustered there then to the number of some two score.

Roy had been a regular attendant at the gymnasium for several years, and was quite an adept at most of the exercises, especially those that required quickness and agility rather than great muscular strength. He went twice a week, and occasionally oftener, was a squad leader, and one of the most popular lads there.

He had been very irregular of late, however, and had hardly been near the place since his mother's death, but he had had several notes from his comrades asking if he would not come back, and Marcus had urged him to do so, as he would be sure to enjoy resuming his old habits when once the first effort had been surmounted.

To-day, therefore, he had made up his mind to delay no longer, and had ridden into Market Drayton at the usual hour. He had been warmly welcomed by his friends, and had found it pleasant to go through the familiar feats again, and to feel the old sense of exhilaration at his own skill and daring. He felt more like himself than he had done for many a long day. Things began to resume their usual proportions, together with something of their old brightness.

It was not unusual for a few spectators to be in the hall to watch the exercises of the young athletes. Sometimes the boys would bring admiring friends to witness their performances, or strangers who had heard of the exercises going on would drop in to look at them for awhile. To-day there were one or two outsiders present. Roy was familiar with most of the faces, but one was strange to him, and yet he fancied that he was an especial object of interest to its owner. The stranger was a man whom Roy would have designated as middle-aged. He was thin and spare, with a face that seemed as if it might have been handsome and yet just escaped being so. The eyes were the most remarkable feature, peculiarly keen and piercing. It was a face difficult to avoid looking at, though it could not be said to be attractive—at least not in the ordinary sense of the word, and Roy found himself continually glancing towards the shadowy corner where the stranger sat, almost always to find those dark, bright eyes fixed steadily upon himself. He began to feel a little uneasy beneath this persistent regard, and to wonder whether the stranger could possibly have any special interest in him.

After the master had left, the lads generally lingered awhile to amuse themselves over the various exercises for which suitable apparatus was provided. Roy was generally the leader in these improvised feats, and his graceful figure in its white flannels was a sufficiently attractive object. He was accustomed to be looked at, but not in the persistent way in which this stranger gazed. He could not guess why he had aroused such obvious interest. He was half-flattered half-annoyed, and felt disposed to walk up to the stranger and enter into conversation. This would have been easy enough to do but for a sort of self-consciousness for which he could not account, and which was altogether foreign to his usual free and unembarrassed nature.

At length, however, rather to Roy's relief, the stranger took the initiative, and, as he was standing a little apart from his companions, who were gradually dwindling away, approached from the corner he had occupied so long, and stood in front of him.

"Excuse me," he said, with an air of courteous apology "but I think your name is Edington, is it not?"

There was nothing odd in the stranger's knowing this, for Roy had been hailed by his companions from all parts of the building, and it would have been strange if any one so silent and attentive had not learned so much.

"Yes," he answered quietly, "that is my name."

"You will pardon me for addressing you, but the name is not common and the likeness is strong. Are you not related to Mrs. Charles Edington, who was Miss Howard before her marriage?"

Roy's face flushed quickly.

"Mrs. Charles Edington was my mother," he said.

"Was!" repeated the stranger quickly, "ah, then it was true. I feared it was when I saw the name in the paper; but I was not certain. I have seen nothing of her since her second marriage. Once I knew her well, and loved her. Indeed, I can claim more than mere friendship, I am a relation."

"A relation?" cried Roy, "then you must be my relation too. Will you tell me your name, please?"

"Edington. Your mother married my cousin; I knew her, too, before her first marriage; but our ways in life parted—it is so often the case—and we saw no more of each other. After her second marriage I even ceased to hear of her. I am glad, indeed, to renew the old kinship by this meeting. Perhaps you will be able to tell me, if your sorrow is not too recent, something about her."

"I will indeed—everything. I am so glad to have met you. I have wondered sometimes what had become of her relations. I have never known any of them."

"She never spoke to you of us, I suppose?"

"No," answered Roy, looking momentarily confused.

"It was quite natural," answered the stranger quietly. "We belonged by that time to other worlds; and there had been something, in fact, a little painful in the past. Her silence was quite natural. Yet in her early life we knew and loved her well."

"I know so little of her early life," said Roy, "she did not talk much of it ever. Perhaps you will be able to tell me more. Everything I can learn about her is precious. I do not remember my own father. Mr. Stratford was always like a father to me. Perhaps, if you have been long in these parts, you have heard of Mr. Stratford, of the Hermitage?"

"I think I have, but I have not been long at Market Drayton and I little thought to come upon traces here of one towards whom I entertain——" he broke off short, and Roy glanced at him, there observing traces of subdued emotion. A sudden idea flashed through his head. Perhaps this man had once loved his mother and had hoped to win her for his wife. Perhaps it was a life-long sorrow that had worn his face so thin, and given that hungry unsatisfied brightness to his eyes. The young are ever prone to romance and to castle-building of their own. There was nothing definite upon which Roy could ground his theory, but it had suggested itself to him and he embraced the idea with a sort of eager interest and pleasure.

"If you knew my mother once, you must come and see us," he said, "you will be very welcome at home. You do not know how much she was beloved."

"I can guess it well; but I must not intrude. My presence might be painful to your father after so recent a loss."

"Did I not tell you? I always fancy people know beforehand. Mr. Stratford died several years ago. His son is master of the house now; and he loved her just as much as if she were his own mother. Oh, yes, you must come and see us. Could you come to-day?"

The stranger smiled a little at the lad's boyish eagerness.

"You are most kind to wish it; but I had better wait, at least a little while longer. I am a complete stranger, and, although a distant kinsman of your mother's, have no claim upon the hospitality of your brother. I do not deny that it would be a pleasure to me to see any place with which she had been associated, and to hear, if you can bear to speak of them, some particulars of her latter years. But I had rather you consulted Mr. Stratford first. After all, he is only her stepson—and—in short—you understand what I mean—I have no claim."

"Oh, Marcus is a downright good fellow. No fear of your not being welcome there. He will be as pleased as I am. Where are you staying? Are you going to be long here? There is not much in a place like Market Drayton to attract strangers, I should think."

"There are some curious antiquities in the church, and in some of the old buildings, and I am fond of studying such things when I do get a chance and can contrive a holiday. I am staying at the George and Dragon. I dare say I shall be there another week."

"Oh, that is right. That will give us time. I want us to be better acquainted. I have so few relations—indeed, I do not know of one—not a real relation, I mean, though Marcus is just as good as a brother."

"I am glad it is so. You live with him still, of course?"

"Yes. You must come to see us soon. I will write to you when I have spoken to Marcus, but you might really come without that. Oh, I know what you think about step-relations; but it is not so a bit with Marcus. It is just the same as if we were brothers. It always has been so, ever since I came. We were always treated alike in everything."

The stranger smiled at Roy's boyish frankness.

"That is pleasant hearing," he said; "only it is better to keep on the safe side still. Changes of circumstance, occasionally bring change of sentiment, and, after all, it is your brother who is sole master now."

Roy laughed lightly.

"You need not be afraid; but perhaps Marcus will appreciate your scruples, he is a bit punctilious himself. Well, I must go and dress now, and get home; but you will hear from me and see me very soon. Good-bye. I am very glad we have met. You will tell me more about my mother another day."

"With pleasure, and you will do the same. Good-bye. I will give you my card if you will allow me, It may prove a passport to your brother's favour."

Roy took the card smilingly, and looked at it when he reached his dressing-room. It bore the name of Mr. R. Edington Thorne.

CHAPTER XVI.—ROY'S KINSMAN.

Roy rode home fast that day, with the eagerness that belongs to youth, especially when new ideas have been aroused, and vague plans are forming themselves in the busy brain.

He reached home about seven, and burst in upon Marcus, who was writing in his study, full of the intelligence he had to impart.

"Marcus," he cried, "listen! I've had an adventure! Absolutely something has happened! What do you think it is?"

Marcus looked up smiling, pen in hand. He was pleased to see Roy so bright and animated again.

"Well?" he questioned, "I don't think it's very likely I shall guess. You had better tell me yourself."

"I've found a relation!" cried Roy, as eager to tell as Marcus could be to hear. "I met him by chance at the gymnasium to-day. A relation of my own! Just fancy, Marcus! Isn't that odd after what I was saying the other day?"

Marcus bent his head over his writing without answering for a moment. His pen seemed to move swiftly; but Roy was too eager to heed this apparent inattention.

"A man called R. Edington. I have his card here. He is a kind of cousin; at least, my mother married a cousin of his. I wanted him to come home with me to-day; but he would not intrude, he said, till I had your sanction. He was very gentlemanly about it. I think you would like him, Marcus."

Marcus had raised his head again by this time, and now held out his hand for the card, which he read with silent scrutiny.

"How old was this man?" asked he, presently.

"Oh, let me think!" said Roy, whose ideas on the subject were very vague. "He was pretty old. I dare say he was forty-five. He had some grey hairs, and lots of lines in his face."

"And he claimed kinship with you?"

"Yes; you see that makes him my cousin too in a way. I rather fancy he was fond of my mother once before she married; but I don't think he has seen much of her since. You will ask him to dinner to-morrow, Marcus, will you not?"

"I will think about it. What has brought him to Market Drayton? and how did he know you?"

"He heard the fellows calling to me, and he said I was like her. I supposed he looked into the gymnasium by chance. He doesn't seem quite to know what to do with himself. I dare say he would like to spend a few days here."

"Well, it's time we went to dress, now," said Marcus rising. "We can discuss that later."

Roy was a little bit damped and disappointed by his brother's manner. He did not exactly know what to complain of; but he thought Marcus might have shown more pleasure and interest at an encounter with any one who had known and loved their mother. He wondered vaguely if Marcus were really changing slowly; if their brotherhood were not in the future going to be so real or so close as it had appeared to be. He did not want to be unreasonable, but Marcus might have been more glad.

Marcus, on his side, was not a little disturbed by all he heard. He had no doubt that this man was the Roger Edington against whom he had been warned; and his unexpected appearance just at this time, looked very much as if he had come to make some claim upon Roy's person.

It is true that Marcus in his own mind thought the mother's fears about the boy had been of an exaggerated character, and that she had both magnified the danger likely to threaten Roy's happiness if his kinsfolk did claim him, and the probability of their making that claim. Still he had received so earnest a warning, and had promised so steadfastly to shield Roy from any threatened danger, that he greatly regretted the encounter. He argued well, however, from the fact that this man had said nothing to Roy as to the guardianship his family could claim, nor let drop anything on the subject of his true parentage. Possibly Mrs. Stratford had been somewhat mistaken in her estimate of the Edingtons, or perhaps they might have improved with time. At any rate, the best plan would be to act in a quiet matter-of-fact way and see how things would turn. It would not do to deny the man entrance to the house; possibly a personal interview would be the best thing that could be desired. Yet, at the same time, in the face of his mother's dying wishes, it would not do to promote intimacy between the lad and his kinsman.

Marcus stood as it were between two fires. On the one hand was the danger of alienating Roy's confidence and affection, on the other the fear of his encountering those perils his mother had feared for him, and from which Marcus had pledged himself to try and save him. He was in a difficult position, and all he could do was to try and make the best of it, and to keep close watch over the younger brother he loved tenderly and well.

So he smiled a little over Roy's eagerness, and told him that a relative was not necessarily a congenial friend, and intimated that without knowing somewhat more of Mr. Edington's antecedents he could not wish for any very close acquaintance. Still he had no objection to asking him to dinner some time that week, if Roy would refrain from rushing into intimacy in a hasty fashion that might not be quite wise.

Roy was a little offended at so much "stand-offishness" as he called it; but Marcus spoke so kindly and so reasonably that he could not well complain, and he waited with impatience for the day when Mr. Edington should come, as he felt sure that he would make a favourable impression for himself.

In due course the evening arrived, and the guest presented himself. He was not in dinner dress, and apologised, saying he had few things with him, as he was constantly on the move. Marcus received him with great courtesy, but Roy could see at a glance that there was a want of cordiality, and a sort of constraint between the two men from the outset. He himself observed that Mr. Edington did not seem at all at ease. His sharp glances went wandering round, much as if he were taking a mental inventory of all the things in the room. He was at a loss for ordinary topics of conversation, responded with a good deal of constraint to his host's many attempts to promote more genial intercourse, and was excessively reserved about himself, slipping out of direct answers to questions with remarkable dexterity. He did not seem altogether familiar with the ordinary usages of the dinner-table, and altogether proved rather disappointing to Roy. Not that the lad was conscious of this, or thought any the worse of his kinsman for it; but he had wished him to produce a favourable impression upon Marcus, and he was afraid he was not doing this. He had been pleased to come across a real relation of his own, and it would be provoking if he were not allowed to make friends with him. For once in his life Roy wished his brother a little less fastidious and particular. He would have liked to see a different expression stamped upon his face.

Thinking that possibly the two men might get on better if left alone for a while, or that his kinsman, if he preferred it, could join him in the garden, Roy presently walked out at the open window. Marcus was glad of this. It gave him the opportunity of saying what was on his mind. He led the conversation to the boy and his antecedents, and quickly made out that this man was no other than Roger Edington, and that he was quite aware of Roy's true parentage.

"He believes himself, however, Mrs. Stratford's son," Marcus said at length, "and I see no reason why he should be disturbed in his belief—at any rate, not yet."

"There seems nothing to be gained, certainly, by publishing an unpalatable truth. You are aware of the cloud resting on his father's memory?"

"Yes. Mrs. Stratford was anxious that his life should not be clouded by the knowledge. I hope you agree with me in thinking that her wishes on the subject shall be sacred?"

"Oh, certainly. I have no reason for wishing otherwise. Are you, may I ask, acting temporarily as his guardian?"

"Yes; his mother (to use the familiar phrase) appointed me as such in her will, and hoped the boy would be left to my care during his minority. I am aware there is a prior claim upon him in your family. I presume his legal guardian, Mr. Andrew Edington, is your father?"

"Yes."

"You do not, perhaps, know his feelings on the subject?"

"No; indeed it is only accidentally that I came here and verified the death of my cousin Alicia. I know that my father gave the boy very willingly to her; how he might feel it his duty to act now I cannot tell. Of course it is possible he may consider you somewhat young for the office, if you will excuse my saying so, and possibly you may yourself be glad to be quit of the charge. After all, he is our relation, not yours."

"We have, however, always felt like brothers, and I am very ready to continue to look after him during his minority. Your father must be getting on in years now, and Roy has always been very happy here."

"No doubt, no doubt. It is a pleasant place, very, and he has evidently every indulgence. I must of course tell my father all the circumstances of the case, but you authorise me to say that you prefer to keep him here unless he wishes otherwise."

"Yes; it was his mother's wish, and I had a great regard for her. I am also much attached to Roy. I very gladly undertake the charge of him, if there is no objection on your part."

"That is very kind of you. It is quite likely my father may leave him here. He might, perhaps, like him to come on a visit later on. You would have no objection to that, I presume?"

Marcus smiled slightly.

"I should have no power to object: besides I am not unreasonable, I hope."

"Mrs. Stratford was half afraid of us, I think. I fancy she was afraid we should take away the boy. She dropped all intercourse with us after her marriage. Roy does not know even our names."

"So I gathered from what she told me, and I think your supposition is right. She was inclined to be nervous where Roy was concerned. By the way, may I ask you not to mention to him this question of guardianship unless your father decides to act? It would inevitably raise the whole question of his parentage and his father's history; and I believe we have agreed that there is no need to distress him with that."

"Quite so: I will be cautious. I will not forget. Perhaps I may join him in the garden now. I have not many days to spare, and I should like to improve the acquaintance as far as possible."

Marcus was left alone to ponder over the interview just concluded. He could not make much out of it. He was too well versed in diplomacy to trust very much to fair appearances, and there was something in the very speciousness and impenetrability of Roger Edington's manner that roused his suspicion.

"At least he asked no question as to that property; but that might have been because he did not wish to show his hand too clearly at once. Well, I do not think he read mine, and I shall keep my best card—Roy's poverty—in reserve till the very last, a sort of final test. Possibly there may be nothing to fear. He seems reasonable and smooth spoken enough: we must wait and see: but I certainly distrust the man's face."

The Difference.

DO the dead think of the living,
In the blue heaven overhead,
All repenting—all forgiving—
As the living of the dead?

Yes; but while these weep, surveying
Pathways long, and lonely feet,
They in heaven smile, softly saying,
"'Tis to-morrow, and we meet!"

F. W. B.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

Mizpah.—Genesis xxxi. 49.

WE are told in this passage that Jacob on parting from Laban set up a heap of stones as a boundary between them; and that they gave a mutual pledge not to pass the boundary to do each other harm. This landmark was called "the heap of witness"—(Chald. Jegar-sahadutha; Heb. Galeed)—also, in a more general sense Mizpah, "watch-tower," for Laban said, "The Lord watch between me and thee when we are absent one from another." The words were those of jealousy and suspicion: each man knew that he must be on his guard against the other, and invoked the protection of God against any attempted wrong. It is a curious illustration of the way in which many people are content to take the letter of Scripture without reference to its meaning, that these words of Laban are often used to express the love and mutual intercession of separated friends. They will give each other rings with "Mizpah" engraved thereon, as though this "watch-tower" of Laban had been intended as a memorial of affectionate remembrance. We have even heard of "Mizpah" Societies, the members of which were pledged to pray for one another's good. No object could be more admirable, only some word of a less sinister association would surely better express the purpose.

F. N., Clevedon, writes: "Will you kindly give an explanation of Colossians ii. 16, and Romans xiv. 1, as bearing on the question of the Christian Sabbath? Are we to infer from St. Paul's words that the command to keep holy the Sabbath day is not binding on Christians now?"

"Let no man," writes St. Paul to the Colossians, "judge you in respect of a feast day or a new moon or a Sabbath day" (R.V.). The words denote the yearly, the monthly, and the weekly sacred seasons among the Jews; being frequently used together in the Old Testament in the same sense. See 1 Chron. xxiii. 31; 2 Chron. ii. 4; xxxi. 3; Ezek. xlv. 17; Hosea ii. 11. We have, then, in the phrase a compendious description of the requirements of Judaic ritualism—which ritualism the false teachers at Colossæ sought to impose upon Gentile converts. To this claim the apostle counsels resistance. "Do not allow," he says in effect, "any one to call you to account in reference to these observances. In themselves they are nothing; their only value is in the spiritual truths which they represent. And having the reality, you may now dispense with the shadow."

This argument applies to the Jewish Sabbath, and to the ceremonial element which it included. It was this that the Colossians were required by the Judaizers to observe; and it was in specific opposition to the claim that St. Paul declares the law of liberty—not forbidding to keep the day, but repudiating its imposition as a yoke. So in the other passage quoted by our correspondent: Romans xiv. 6. As a matter of fact, we know that in the early ages many Christians regarded both days as holy—the seventh, as the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment, and the first, as the day of our Lord's resurrection. The former fell gradually into disuse, naturally lingering longest among converts from Judaism. Ignatius, early in the second century, speaks of true believers as having come to the possession of a "new hope," "no longer keeping the Sabbath, but living in the spirit of the Lord's Day."[1] On the other hand, the so-called Apostolical Constitutions, which represent the traditions of the Eastern Church a century and a half later, speak expressly of the two days as still observed: "Let the slaves work five days, but on the Sabbath day and the Lord's day let them have leisure to go to church for instruction in piety. The Sabbath is on account of the creation, and the Lord's day of the resurrection."[2] A century afterwards, Augustine, who represents the view of the Western Church, writes: "Of all the Ten Commandments, that which related to the Sabbath was the only one in which the thing commanded was typical (figurate observandum præcipitur), the bodily rest enjoined being a type, which we have received as a means of our instruction, but not as a duty binding also upon us. In the Sabbath, a figure is presented of the spiritual rest, of which it is said in the Psalm: 'Be still and know that I am God' (xlvi. 11), and unto which all men are invited by the Lord Himself in the words, 'Come unto Me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Take My yoke upon you, and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; so shall ye find rest unto your souls.'[3] The Lord's day, however," Augustine adds, "has been made known not to the Jews, but to Christians, by the resurrection of our Lord, and from Him it began to have its own festal character." In fact, in all Christian antiquity there is not, it may be safely said, a hint of the belief that the Lord's day, as "a Christian Sabbath," was substituted by apostolic authority for the Sabbath of the Fourth Commandment. We need hardly add, what readers may verify for themselves, that such an idea is equally without foundation in the New Testament; although the religious observance of the "First day of the

---

[1] μηκέτι σαββατίζοντες, ἀλλὰ κατὰ κυριακὴν ζῶντες. Epist. ad Magn. ix. The unauthentic longer Greek enjoins Sabbath observance, but "not after the Jewish manner," and adds: "After the observance of the Sabbath, let every friend of Christ keep the Lord's day as a festival, the resurrection day, the queen and chief of all the days (of the week)."

[2] Apost. Const., book viii., § 33. Donaldson's Translation (Clark's Ante-Nicene Fathers).

[3] Letter 55, to Januarius. Cunningham's Trans. (Clark's ed.) vol. i., p. 220. A curiously interesting letter to one Casulanus (36) will be found in the same volume, in which the question of Sunday fasting is discussed. "Both the Roman Church, and some others," writes Augustine, "observed a fast on the Sabbath; but to fast on the Lord's day is a great offence."

week" is plainly recognized: Acts xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2; Rev. i. 10.

But there is a moral as well as a typical element in the Fourth Commandment, the Remember of which points backward to the primal institution, to the creative rest and its weekly commemoration. This was revived in the Lord's day, which thus bears a twofold reference—to the world completed and the world restored:

'Twas great to speak a world from nought,
'Twas greater to redeem. S. G. G.

J. P., Handsworth, asks the meaning of 1 John v. 16. "Of what does the 'sin unto death' consist? If any one committed it, would he never pray for pardon? Or, if he did so, would pardon be denied? And, can any one commit it now?"

Our correspondent seems to have misconceived the last clause of the text: "I do not say that he shall pray for it." The words refer not to the sinner's prayer for himself; but to his brother's prayer on his behalf. The R.V. reads the whole passage: "If any man see his brother sinning a sin not unto death, he shall ask, and God will give him life for them that sin not unto death [or, he shall ask, and shall give him life, even to them, etc.]. There is a sin [or, sin] unto death: not concerning this do I say that he should make request." The question is concerning the sins of professed Christians. These sins, the result of human weakness, do in many cases consist with the possession of spiritual life. For the forgiveness of these sins in their brethren, let fellow-disciples pray. But there is a limit to hopeful intercession. Some sins are of so flagrant a character as to prove the sinner to be spiritually dead. These the apostle excepts from his exhortation; or, rather, he leaves them out of account: "I am not speaking of sins like wilful apostacy or the hardened rejection of the truth." It is observable that his words are not precisely, "I say that he shall not pray," but, "I do not say that he shall," leaving it still open for him to do so, if impelled by an irresistible longing or by large-hearted charity. We cannot often be sure that our brother has thus hopelessly fallen "unto death." Perhaps, in most cases, we should give him the benefit of the doubt, and still pray on. There may be a hint of this in the word translated pray ("make request," R.V.) in the second part of the verse. It is the word generally used for questioning or inquiring; as in the remarkable passage, John xvi. 23: "In that day ye shall ask Me nothing," i.e., "shall ask Me no questions." So here the apostle's thought may be more nearly expressed by the rendering proposed in the Speaker's Commentary: "I say not concerning that, that he shall inquire."

Another interpretation which has considerable authority on its side, makes the passage refer to the infliction of the death-penalty by Divine judgment on notorious offenders in the Church, as on Ananias and Sapphira. This is supposed to be intended in 1 Cor. xi. 30: "many sleep." But the constant use of "life" and "death" in a spiritual sense by St. John seems to us to confirm the exposition given above.

THE SICK CHILD.

OUR frontispiece this month is a reproduction of a picture which attracted much admiration at the time of its first exhibition in the Royal Academy of 1857.

"The story," said the "Athenæum," "is simple as a child's, but how great a simple thing may be! A rough countryman in a large loose fustian jacket holds a sick child in his lap. A mother bends over it with anxious love, trying to tempt its exhausted appetite with some savoury delicacy that love has invented. On the floor a little rosy heap of a baby plays, careless with the unconscious selfishness of infancy, and by the man's chair lies a rabbit he has risked his liberty to poach for the darling whose little face is so pale and jaded and worn, and whose legs begin to spindle and lose flesh so sadly. This pinched face is a precious bit of painting. The father's profile indicates such tender anxiety and such sadness that the roughest man might not be ashamed to shed a tear to see it."

In like strain "The Times" spoke of the artist's name as "hitherto unknown, but destined, if the promise of this picture be not belied, to be known far and wide. . . . The execution of the picture is so unpretending that it requires close examination to discover what an amount of true finish is lavished on every part. Indeed, no praise we can give for technical merits is beyond its deserts. The only objection to it is its literal painfulness. Perhaps the paternal tenderness which is impressed throughout it may be taken as a set-off against this."

Mr. Ruskin has given also his word of praise, and many a critic since; while now the picture may be said to have taken its place among the representative productions of nineteenth century English art. Mr. Joseph Clark has achieved the reputation prophesied for him, but no one of his later paintings has wider fame than this "Sick Child."

The picture is in the same spirit and as true to general experience as Longfellow's poem:

"There is no flock, however watched and tended,
But one dead lamb is there!
There is no fireside, howsoe'er defended,
But has one vacant chair."

But while the poet preaches resignation, the painter makes us realise the tender possibilities of parental affection, even in the humblest home. Where the shadow of death does not fall, this other shadow of sickness and anxiety comes sooner or later on every household, poor or rich. How many since the days of Jairus have uttered his pathetic complaint, "My little daughter lieth at the point of death." A painting like this has interpreters in every home. The shadows of such a time are happily often relieved by the presence of that self-forgetful love which is God's own angel of light in this troubled world.

THE SICK CHILD.

FROM THE PICTURE BY JOSEPH CLARK

Monthly Religious Record.

THE expulsion of the Rev. J. Jones from the Loyalty Islands is an ominous comment on the facts adduced last month in our article on the "French in the Pacific." Christianity was first introduced into Maré, which has been the centre of the British mission, by native teachers from Eastern Polynesia; and when the first white missionary landed there, a representative of the Church of England, he found a congregation willing to receive instruction. After his death, evangelisation was carried on by the London Missionary Society. Mr. Jones was sent out in 1853, before the French appeared on the scene, with another missionary, but from 1871 had been left in sole charge. Thus, for nearly thirty-five years he had laboured among this people, through good and through evil report, proving himself their friend in many ways, and leading them forward in the paths of civilisation as well as of religion. His church, of which we give an engraving, is in itself evidence of the work he has done; it is adapted for a congregation of eight hundred people, and built of stone, and by native labourers under his direction. At last he has been compelled to leave the Islands. From a speech made by Mr. Jones at Melbourne, prior to his expulsion, we learn the successive events which have led to this result.

The French took possession of the Loyalty Islands in 1864. A year afterwards Romish priests arrived, and they began by setting up for chiefs men who embraced their religion. Frequent quarrels ensued. The Protestant chiefs protested, and claimed their rights; but were many of them exiled, or compelled to alter their boundaries. A new Resident coming sought to adjust these disputes by obtaining a French pastor, under cover of whose position he might get quit of the English missionary. None could be obtained, but at length an unordained man presented himself, and was accepted. This intruder, it was soon found, was little more than an agent of the Resident. There were fresh difficulties; then a commissioner was sent across from New Caledonia. Mr. Jones was deposed from his natural position, and the schools all taken out of his hands, and placed under Government. Religious liberty was, however, promised. Mr. Jones remained on the island, while the native churches carried on the work independently.

The French Resident was amazed. "He had expected," says Mr. Jones, "the whole thing to collapse without the English missionary at its head, and that the natives must turn to the Frenchman. The native pastors who had been trained for this work by the English missionary must, it was determined, be got rid of. Yet religious liberty had been promised. It was resolved then to find something against these men one by one, and imprison them, and thus get rid of them. One man owned some private property, and he was improving it. He was told to desist, since a pastor could not own property. He obeyed in some things, but when he was ordered to cut down his cocoanut grove he refused. So he had disobeyed the Government, and that was enough. He was sent to prison to New Caledonia, where he has remained till the present day, a period of eighteen months. The same course was adopted with others; but it was too slow work, and so the Governor of New Caledonia visiting the island, called the remaining pastors before him, and said, 'Will you submit to the national church?' They replied, 'Sir, we will obey you most loyally in all things secular, but in religion we wish to be free.' That was enough. They were at once sent on board the steamer, and carried away to join their companions in exile. The English missionary also was threatened with expulsion from the island. All those who were taken away remain in exile to the present day." The promise of religious liberty was broken.

In the statement of these facts, Mr. Jones said he did not wish to speak against French rule in its secular aspects. He believed the French would be good rulers if they could divorce the secular from the clerical, but the two were so interwoven that they could not be separated until some revolution came and severed the threads which bound them together. There had been some very good and just men as governors of New Caledonia, and also some good officials.

It was supposed that the natives could not continue to hold out. The Governor had closed all churches, except to those who would attend the ministry of the national clergyman. Mr. Jones, however, was permitted to preach in the church which he had built on private property belonging to the London Missionary Society, and the people preferred to worship in their own dwelling-places rather than join the French church. "By threats of banishment to Cochin China, and by bribes, the Government succeeded in winning chief Hnaisiline's son, to the national church; but he went alone, not fifty of his people going with him. All the rest remained staunch to their profession. A scene of barbarous cruelty then arose. At the New Year's special prayer meetings, after the manner of the Evangelical Alliance, the churches being all closed, the people flocked to attend at my church. The French lieutenant, however, sent the chief men on their side to forbid the people to worship there. The people replied, 'The church is allowed by the Government to be used as a public place of worship, and we see no objection to our attending.' They were met at the doors of the church as they went out of it, and their hands were tied behind them, and they were carried before the chief. He knocked them down, kicked them with his heavy boots in the mouth, breaking their teeth, beat them with bludgeons, and dashed heavy stones upon them as they lay helpless with their hands tied behind them. Their feet were then lashed together also, and they were laid upon a cold mortar floor all night, no covering or food of any kind being given to them. In the morning the floor was saturated with blood, which had flowed during the night from their wounds. Next morning they were compelled to walk to the chief's residence, about ten miles, without any breakfast being given to them, and they were afterwards cast into prison and taken to New Caledonia. Women, too, were kicked and beaten for attending the services. The people, terrified, fled to hiding-places in the bush, but the chief, under the direction of the French lieutenant, sent men armed to hunt them down, with orders to shoot any who might run away. Much of their property was seized, their plantations were destroyed, and their live-stock killed." They then sought protection from a neighbouring chief—a Roman Catholic; he gave it; gave up all his territory to them, where they could live in peace. That was called a revolt by the French Government, whereas it was simply the people running from their persecutors.

NATIVE CHURCH AT MARÉ, BUILT BY MR. JONES.

M. Lacascade, Director of the Interior, and next in position to the Governor, was sent to suppress "the revolt." One hundred soldiers, all armed for campaign work, were sent with him. "He had orders to close my church," said Mr. Jones, "and, if necessary, to expel me. When he arrived, however, and learnt the true state of affairs, he wrote to the Governor, saying there was no need to resort to any extreme measures. His Excellency was very angry on receiving that message, and at once despatched a steamer, saying—'You must close Mr. Jones's church.' He replied to the official in charge of the message, 'I refuse to obey.' His place was then taken by M. Gallet, who also could not see his way clear to close the church, and it had remained open to the present time to a small district only just around the building, the people of all other districts being forbidden to attend. The natives were, in fact, unable to do any more than hold family worship in their own houses, and even there they were not allowed to have more than five men for an assembly."

When M. Lacascade returned to Noumea, he was deposed by the Governor, and sent home to France. When he reached home the Government made him Governor of Tahiti, where he is at the present time.

The people of Maré, meanwhile, still remain staunch to their principles, and have by letters "testified to the presence of the Lord Jesus with them in their exile, and are ready even to suffer death if called upon to do so rather than be unfaithful." The Frenchman has scarcely any followers, and the churches are overgrown with grass through being completely unoccupied.

Mr. Jones was himself finally removed by a small force which was specially despatched from New Caledonia for the purpose. It has been suggested that this speech, made during a visit to Melbourne, may have been among the causes which led to his final expulsion. The history is one full of warning.

IT is stated that the German authorities in East Africa have resolved to allow only German missionaries within their territory. This is so great a limitation of the freedom of the Christian church, that we trust it will be made the subject of inquiry, and if necessary, of remonstrance. So exclusive a rule is alien to the very spirit of the Gospel. Imagine a Roman empire in which only a Roman might have preached Christ, or a Germany in which none but a Teuton had declared the Faith. It is even said that arrangements have been made with the Pope to establish an Apostolic Prefecture in East Africa, to be occupied by German priests alone. The French missionaries at Bagomogo, opposite Zanzibar, have placed themselves temporarily under German protection.

MEANWHILE the deposition of King Malietoa by the Germans in Samoa, though described as a high-handed act, has not materially affected the good work there in progress.

THE journals of Mr. Mackay describe his last days in Uganda. They contain very abundant evidence of the influence of the Arab traders, and the uneasiness caused among the natives by the rumoured movements of Europeans in Africa. He was leaving behind some traces of his handiwork. "Every one of the two hundred sheets of syllables, &c., which I printed," he says, "quite recently, has been bought up at ten cowries each; and now I can sell no more, for the printing-press I have taken to pieces and sent to port, with all the type. One hundred and sixty copies of Luganda Matthew, complete, have also been bought up, and I have not a single copy left. But I have revised the whole with a company of our best hands at translation . . . I get little rest, for our Christian friends crowd the house till midnight, and often long after."

THE recent celebration of the Papal Jubilee was accompanied by incidents of European significance. Two hundred years have passed since a British sovereign sent a special envoy to the Pope, the last having been Lord Castlemaine, who was despatched by James II. in 1687. The mission of the Duke of Norfolk, to present the Queen's felicitations, and the royal gifts, was therefore of more than ordinary moment, as evidence of the changed political condition. More important probably was the Pope's appearance in St. Peter's, on the day of the celebration—his predecessor having never entered the cathedral after the royal troops took possession of Rome in 1870, and the fiction of His Holiness being the "prisoner of the Vatican," having been maintained to the present. The address presented by the Duke of Norfolk stated that the Queen was moved not only by a desire to return the courtesies of the Pope shown at the time of her own jubilee, but "to give expression to her feeling of deep respect for the elevated character and Christian wisdom displayed by His Holiness in his high position." The "temperate sagacity" which "had corrected errors and assuaged differences from which much evil might have otherwise arisen," inspired the hope that life and health might long be granted, and this "beneficent action" long continued. The Pope in his reply testified his "great satisfaction with the liberty which the Catholic religion enjoys throughout the vast British empire, and which permits that religion to prosper more and more." The royal gift was presented on a subsequent day—a massive basin and ewer of gold, copied from examples at Windsor. A Sunday was chosen for the Jubilee, although it was the previous day which witnessed the completion of the fifty years since Leo XIII. first said mass as Father Pecci. A great crowd thronged St. Peter's. Princes were there, and bishops and archbishops in great force. The various gifts were many of them brought into use in the celebration of mass—amongst them the ewer and basin sent by Queen Victoria. The aged Pope fainted twice before the ceremonial was concluded, but gave at the close his blessing to the City and the World.

A TRAGIC death has overtaken the Rev. Alexander H. Mackonochie, whose name was for so many years associated with St. Alban's, Holborn. He had been for some time out of health, and was visiting the Bishop of Argyll, at Ballachulish, in the Western Highlands. Being a good walker, he had started on an expedition to the head of Loch Leven, accompanied only by two dogs. On his way back he appears to have turned eastward, and to have lost himself on trackless wastes. Search was made for him on his not returning at night, through the next day, and again on the morning following, when he was found half-buried in a snow-wreath, dead and stark, with the dogs sitting one on each side of him, a peaceful expression on his face, but his right foot bare, and stained with blood from the jagged rocks over which he had strayed. The body was brought back to London, and the night before the funeral, the coffin was placed in the chancel of St. Alban's, where it rested, covered with lilies and immortelles. "Vespers for the dead" were sung at an eight o'clock service. Throughout the night watch was kept, and at intervals the next day, from six A.M. until 9.15 A.M. "low masses" were said. At eleven there was a "solemn requiem." The "altar" was draped in violet, with black hangings, and had sixty candles burning. Three tall candles were on either side of the body in the chancel, and the seven sanctuary lamps were burning as usual. Every inch of space in the church was occupied by clergy and lay Churchmen from all parts of England, it being said that no home diocese was unrepresented. The clergy wore their cassocks, surplices, and birettas. At the beginning of the little book, containing the order of service, were the words, "Of your charity, pray for the soul of Alexander Heriot Mackonochie." At the reading of the Gospel the clergy in the chancel held lighted tapers in their hands. The first part of the Burial Office followed, after which came the pronouncing of the Absolution and the censing of the bier. The coffin was borne in procession through the streets headed by a crucifix, the choir and about fifty clergymen, lighted candles being carried on either side to the railway station, and thence taken to the cemetery at Woking. Mr. Mackonochie's cope and biretta were placed on the coffin before it was lowered into the grave. It may be added that nothing in his career afforded so striking evidence of the place held by Ritualism within the Church of England as the circumstances of his funeral.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

BY EVELYN E. GREEN, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S BROTHERS," ETC.

CHAPTER XVII.—POISONED SHAFTS.

IF THERE WERE A MYSTERY, SURELY HE HAD A RIGHT TO KNOW IT.

ROY'S elation at the discovery of a real relation was considerable, and perhaps the very fact that nobody else took a liking to Mr. Edington rather increased than diminished the boy's friendly feeling, giving to it the touch of partizanship that was certain to blind him to any peculiarities on the part of his cousin which he might otherwise have criticised. He saw from the first moment that Marcus had not taken to his new relation, and that had vexed him somewhat. The next day he took him to the Kynastons, but could not flatter himself that he had created a favourable impression there. Muriel, when pressed, had been obliged to confess that she did not much like his face, and Syd, with his customary frankness, had openly said that "the fellow seemed rather a cad."

All this, however, only served to strengthen Roy's determination to be very friendly. He could see plainly that his kinsman had lived in a different world from his own, and had perhaps known something of poverty—indeed, he had hinted as much early on in the acquaintance, as a sort of apology for his gaucherie. The boy felt that it would be "disgusting snobbishness" on his part to let this want of external polish make any difference in his treatment of Mr. Edington; and accordingly, during the days he remained at Market Drayton, he contrived to see him constantly, and talked to him with great freedom of past, present, and future alike.

He thought that it was very kind of his kinsman to take so much interest in him and his affairs. Mr. Edington asked a great many questions, far more indeed than Roy could answer; and what sometimes perplexed the boy a good deal was the species of disapproving silence that not unfrequently fell upon him when his questioner discovered how little Roy knew about his own affairs.

"Does your brother never tell you anything?" he once asked in visible surprise; and for the first time in his life it occurred to the lad that Marcus was needlessly reserved.

He remembered now that other people, friends of his mother's, whom he had met since her death, had seemed wishful to know how he had been left, but Roy, with his customary easiness and carelessness, had never seriously considered the question. Muriel's advice, and his own great wish to do and to think rightly in all things, had successfully held in check any incipient feeling of discontent.

He began to wish now that he knew a little more, not so much on his own account as on that of his kinsman. It was very plain that Mr. Edington fancied that Marcus might not perhaps be acting quite fairly by his young brother, and indignant as Roy was at such a notion, he could not help its haunting him unpleasantly. He knew that the young Kynastons were angry with Marcus on his account, and altogether it seemed rather uncomfortable, all the more so from the entire vagueness of his own ideas upon the subject. He sometimes felt vexed and irritable from this very sense of ignorance, unable to shake off the conviction that a man of Mr. Edington's age and experience ought to know something of life, and was hardly likely to be suspicious without a cause.

He was vexed, too, that Marcus was not more cordial to his guest. He was always scrupulously courteous, and let Roy bring him to the house whenever he wished to do so, but there was no real friendliness in his manner, and Mr. Edington remarked as much in his final interview with Roy, and said with some significance that this dislike was a little odd.

Roy, who generally thought a good deal of his brother's discrimination, was vexed enough at it now, and thought it unkind of Marcus to be so cold and distant with the only relative he had ever known.

The fact that Mr. Edington was fully aware of this coolness did not mend matters, and Roy had too little worldly wisdom to observe that his kinsman made no effort to gain Marcus's good will, but rather took pleasure in widening the breach. Now he began vigorously to explain and disclaim.

"Indeed, I think you exaggerate. Marcus is exclusive—difficult to know—but he is a very good brother to me. You must like him, for my sake."

Mr. Edington was silent for a while. Then he said, with a sort of reluctant significance: "It is for your sake, Roy, that I find it so hard to like him."

"What do you mean?"

"I will tell you, my lad, what I do mean. It has been on my conscience once or twice when you have talked to me, and dropped bits of information about yourself and your affairs; but I did not like to speak, and I do not like it now. Only as I am the only one of your mother's relatives you seem likely to come across, and as I am going away almost at once, I think I ought to put you on your guard, and to warn you to look well after your own interests, as you have no one else to do it for you."

"I have Marcus ——" began Roy indignantly, pushing resolutely away the vague misgiving that had once or twice troubled him before.

"That is true," answered Mr. Edington quietly, "but you must remember that your brother is not very much older than yourself, and it seems to me a strange thing the way in which he keeps you in the dark about your own affairs. He is in the position of sole guardian, trustee and executor—a position which renders him perfectly irresponsible and autocratic. Nobody ought to have the absolute control of another's affairs that he has of yours. It is in itself a temptation, and you ought to do what you can to discover your real position."

Roy flushed hotly, and then grew a little pale; but he asked quietly: "What can I do?"

"You can insist, for one thing, on reading for yourself your mother's will."

"It would look as if I distrusted Marcus."

"It ought not. He should have told you its provisions himself. How old are you?—eighteen? It is an absurdity to treat you like a mere child!"

"I shall be eighteen next week," said Roy.

"Well, that would be a good opportunity to speak out and ask your brother all about your own affairs. The more reluctant he is to tell you, the more determined you should be."

Roy made a restless movement, as if to thrust the whole subject from him.

"I hate the very name of money," he said; "I am happy enough as I am, and Marcus is the soul of honour. Why should I trouble myself about it?"

"Are you always happy as you now are?" asked the tempter. "Do you not naturally want a more liberal education, which your guardian, for some inscrutable reason, denies to you? Why does he insist on keeping you always under his own eye? Why does he look with disfavour on the only relative you have ever come across, and try to stop any intimacy? Does it not appear as if all were not right? As if he feared ideas being suggested to you which should make you begin to inquire into your own affairs, and his management of them?"

"If you knew Marcus better you would not talk like that," cried Roy. "He is noble and generous and high-minded. Look at all he is doing for the place and the people—the schools he is building, and the money it will cost—as if he would ever grudge me anything! It is perfect nonsense!"

Roy spoke the more vehemently for the faint misgiving that was troubling him increasingly each moment.

His companion smiled somewhat meaningly.

"When you are as old as I am, my dear boy, you will know that generosity in one direction and parsimony in another often go hand in hand. I don't doubt his ability to look after his own interests; but I want to see him look as well after yours, as I told him once myself."

"You told him?"

"Yes, on the occasion when I ventured to ask him some questions about you, and could get nothing satisfactory out of him. I am more nearly related to you than he is. He need not have been so reserved."

"Oh, that is his way; he always is reserved with strangers, and he might not like your asking. But, indeed, it is all right. You don't know Marcus."

"No; and I am not sure that you do either. You are undoubted heir to at least twenty thousand pounds, and I want to see you treated as such."

The way in which these last words were spoken sent a sort of thrill through Roy. He did not understand his own sensations; he was half afraid of them.

"Why do you talk like that?" he asked almost fiercely. "Marcus is more to me than all the money in the world. I would rather lose everything than my trust in him."

"That is because you are young and impulsive, and quite ignorant of the world and the power of wealth. I do not want you to distrust your brother. I only want you to know the truth. If he has nothing to be ashamed of, why does he hide things from you as if you were a child? Why does he keep you at home, instead of letting you go out and see life? But I will say no more. I see you are satisfied, and I have no wish to disturb your equanimity. I felt it my duty to put you on your guard; having done so, I must leave the rest to you. If you are content, it is not for me to complain. I only hope you will not find out when too late that your blind confidence has been misplaced."

Roy made an impatient gesture, but he was ill at ease and unhappy. He hated himself, and his companion too, at that moment, and could willingly have quarrelled with him on the spot. His misgivings were too vague to take any practical form; he knew too little of life and its ways to be able to ask any questions as to what his kinsman really suspected. All he knew was that Mr. Edington anticipated some underhand treatment from Marcus, and some danger to the fortune that should be his by right. But the idea of distrusting Marcus!

"I'll tell you what," he cried suddenly, "I will ask Marcus all about it, and make him tell me. I know it's all right. I'm certain your suspicions are quite unfounded. And then I'll write to you, and tell you everything, and then you'll be satisfied."

"And most rejoiced to hear it," was the response. "And I will retract all my suspicions most gladly, if I find that all is right. I shall have left this place before your birthday; but if you write to me at Windmill House, Abbot's Heath, Thorne, it will find me. I will write the address for you. If ever you want a friend or adviser you will find one in me; but I never wish to come between you and your brother so long as you are in accord. If, however, you should at any time see cause to change your opinion, and will write to me, I will do what I can for you. In me you will always find a very sincere friend—for your mother's sake as well as for your own."

"Thank you," said Roy, trying not to speak stiffly, trying to feel grateful to one who had certainly been endeavouring to advise him for his own good, however unpalatable the advice had been. "I do not think I shall ever have any cause to wish myself out of my brother's care, or be guided by other advice than his; but, if I do, I will remember that you have acted a friend's part by me. I will write to you in a week's time, when I know all; but I think that you lay a great deal more stress upon the possession of money than we ever do. My mother always taught me to prize it at what she called its true worth, and—but you will think I talk like a child—I cannot explain myself as I would. Goodbye, I will let you know in time. I hope some day we shall meet again."

Roy held out his hand frankly and cordially. He was not sorry that this new friend of his was going away just now; but he liked him after a fashion, and quite hoped to renew acquaintance some day. He believed he had given him good and disinterested advice, and was half ashamed of his own irritation of mind. He might have altered his opinion had he seen the change of expression that came over his kinsman's face as he found himself at last alone.

"Well, I think I have brought him to the point at last; but they have brought him up to be a perfect fool as to his own interests. I don't like that young Stratford. I doubt if even Caroline will ever make any way in that quarter. I doubt if the connection with him will ever be of any use to either of us. But he is fond of the boy, and that might make a link, only he has evidently been prejudiced against us by Alicia. That was obvious from the very first. He was on his guard all through, and took precious good care to tell me nothing. I expect the boy is a pretty good prize; but it was better not to ask the question direct at the first acquaintance; and now I think we shall learn all we want from Roy; later on, we can get him across on a visit, and see what we can make of him. But Caroline is quite right; it is best not to press matters on too fast. Everything had better appear easy and natural, and then no suspicions will be aroused. Caroline shall take matters into her own hands; her judgment is always to be trusted."

CHAPTER XVIII.—QUESTION AND ANSWER.

Roy's birthday had hitherto been kept as a holiday, and been celebrated by some simple al fresco fête, in which the young Kynastons were always included. It was for some time rather doubtful this year whether anything of the kind would be held; for Roy's recent loss made the first anniversary of his birthday a somewhat sorrowful day for him. But Marcus was anxious that he should not brood needlessly, and was wishful to see him regain more of his old, bright even spirits; and Roy, on his side, did not want to do anything that should be a disappointment to his young friends and companions. So, at length, it was decided that the Kynastons should all be asked to a quiet picnic, and that they should all drive across to a very fine sea-coast place about twenty miles distant, which was unknown to any of the juniors of the party. There was an interesting old castle in the vicinity, and some very curious caves in the cliffs, and the place could have no painful associations for any one, as it had never been visited before.

Mrs. Stratford had not been strong enough for long expeditions, and Roy had never cared to go without her. He entered, however, with some zest into the proposed excursion, read up what he could find about the ruined castle, and was more animated than he had been for some days past.

Marcus was quite aware that his brother had something on his mind just now, and he had watched him somewhat anxiously, half afraid lest Roger Edington, either by accident or design, should have dropped hints that might perplex or distress him.

But Roy did not seem unhappy, although he was unusually grave at times, and his manner towards his brother was even more affectionate than before. He was constantly appealing to Marcus for approval or sympathy, eager to be with him to share in his pursuits, and to listen to his plans. It seemed as if he were anxious to atone even for the unspoken thoughts of distrust that had forced themselves upon him of late; for as soon as his kinsman had departed, leaving him alone with Marcus, Roy had been quite indignant with himself for ever having harboured the smallest suspicion as to his brother's integrity of purpose. He intended to keep his word, and to ask how things really stood; but he knew perfectly well that all was right, and he even began to see a reason for the reticence hitherto observed.

It was evident from what Mr. Edington had said, that Roy's mother was a rich woman, and that her son would in due course be rich too. Roy was glad that it should be so, because he was getting to an age to understand something of the value of wealth, and to feel how much good could be done with it. But he remembered how often and how seriously his mother had spoken to him of the danger that money often brought, and he thought it very possible that she had cautioned Marcus against talking too much to his young brother of his brilliant prospects. But Roy did not feel as if the knowledge that he had a fortune of his own would bring with it any of those dangerous feelings his mother had plainly dreaded. He saw how Marcus used his wealth, how quietly resolved he was to employ it rather as a trust for others than for a means of gratification for self, and he felt that he should like to emulate that spirit when his turn came. Meantime it was pleasant to know something certainly, and it would be pleasanter still to put into more definite form the vague aspirations that filled his mind. As he sat opposite his brother at the dinner-table on the eve of his eighteenth birthday, he felt that the moment had come when he might with advantage speak out and ask a definite question.

"Marcus," he said presently, after they had finished dessert and were ready to move, "will you come into the study? I want to talk to you."

Marcus consented readily, but a sort of chill fear passed through him. What was it Roy had heard that should make him desire a private talk on business?

"I shall be eighteen to-morrow," said the lad, when he and his brother were seated. "I begin to wish to understand my position a little more clearly, in regard both to the present and the future. I am no longer a child, and yet I know no more of my prospects than if I were too young to understand them."

Marcus looked at the boy's grave face with a smile of reassurance.

"In the eyes of the law you are but an infant," he said, "and I am responsible for you and your affairs. You will have enough when you come of age to enable you to take to the line you have elected to follow. Is that what you wanted to know?"

"Not exactly. I want to see my mother's will, if you have no objection."

A slight flush passed over the elder brother's face, which Roy was quick to note.

"What makes you wish that?"

"I think it is a natural wish. Have I not a right to demand it?"

"I am not sure; and I should be glad if you would refrain from doing so."

Roy's heart began to sink, he hardly knew why.

"You would not refuse the demand if I made it?" he asked.

Marcus's face was very grave and almost sad. He answered after a brief pause:

"No, I suppose I should hardly be justified in doing that; but, Roy, if you take my advice, you will wait till your majority before you begin to trouble your head over your own affairs. Believe me, I will watch over your interests: they shall not suffer in my hands."

"I believe you, Marcus, I do indeed," answered Roy with a certain eager impetuosity. "It is just because I do, that—I mean—I don't know quite how to say it, but it makes me want all the more to know everything. I can't explain exactly, but, in fact, I must look at that will. I don't want to act in opposition to your wishes, but things have been said—look here, Marcus, let me have it. It will be best—it will, indeed."

Marcus rose to his feet and crossed over to a safe in the wall where he kept many of his papers and securities. Roy watched him intently, thinking what a fine face he had, and wondering what had brought that stern look upon it. He felt half afraid of his own temerity, but the plunge had been taken and he was not prepared to turn back. The very sense that he was on the verge of a discovery of some kind urged him to proceed at all costs with the inquiry he was making. If there were a mystery, surely he had a right to know it.

Marcus returned to him with a folded paper in his hand; he looked down at his brother with something almost of sadness in his gaze.

"You are quite bent on it, Roy?"

The boy looked at him with bright, trustful eagerness.

"Yes, Marcus, quite; I believe I am right."

Marcus gave the paper into his hand, and quietly left the room.

Roy sat for some time with the folded document before him, his eyes gazing straight out before him, his lips smiling in half unconscious fashion as he pictured to himself the glowing future of prosperity that would be revealed to him by that paper. His mother had been something of an heiress. Mr. Edington had told him so, and just latterly, Roy, as has been said, had been awakening to a sense of the value of wealth, not so much for its own sake, as for what it could do, and for the sense of power that it gave to its possessor.

Roy saw clearly enough what an important man Marcus was going to be in the county. Already he seemed to take his stand there as one of its leading members. His advice was asked in many matters; he was looked up to as an authority wherever he went. He was able to gratify his tastes, to respond to appeals, to make himself of value in all kinds of different ways. Of course, much of this influence was due to his own force of character and intellectual culture. Roy was fully aware of that, and did ample justice to his brother's attainments and virtues; but he was well aware what an immense advantage his wealth was, and what a power it became in his capable hands. The boy began in his dreams for the future, to long for power himself; and it was a thing to rejoice in, he felt, that he too should have the means to take up an independent position of his own, and be able, by judicious liberality, and expenditure becoming to his position, to take up a standing of his own as a man of substance and resource.

With a half smile as of triumph on his lips, and a flush upon his face, Roy at length opened the momentous document. It was not very long; in spite of its circumlocution, he had soon read to the end. A strange look passed over his face, from which all colour and light had faded.

Save in the matter of the guardianship, his own name was not even mentioned in the will. Everything went to Marcus.

He sat very still for a few minutes with the paper in his hands; then, leaving it open upon the table, he hastily quitted the room, dashed up the stairs, and banged the door of his own room behind him with a force that reverberated all through the house.

His question had been answered only too well.

ON UNCONGENIAL CIRCUMSTANCES.

EVERY thoughtful man and woman must at times have been forced to ponder sadly over the apparent waste and misery wrought in human lives, not by the strokes of dire calamity, but by simple "uncongeniality of environment." "A round peg in a square hole," is a cheerful, homely colloquialism, describing this woeful condition just as well as the more grandiloquent phrase. But one cannot go through the world without longing to enact a deus ex machinâ, and arbitrarily fit round to round, and square to square. The timid and self-distrustful, for instance, are thrust into positions of authority, where every command or reproof costs them a pang. The managing and high-spirited, who would like nothing better than to rule, have to obey to the end of the chapter. Ardent lovers of the country, sighing for communion with Nature, are condemned to a city life; while impatient swains, wearied to death of rusticity, pant for the stir and stress of some great town. The would-be artist is chained to the desk and stool; the impassioned, imaginative nature of many an "Aurora Leigh," is subject to cold, precise, and matter-of-fact relatives, like the aunt who had lived—

> A sort of cage-bird life, born in a cage,
> Accounting that to leap from perch to perch
> Was act and joy enough for any bird.
> Dear heaven! how silly are the things that live
> In thickets and eat berries! I, alas,
> A wild bird scarcely fledged, was brought to her cage.
> And she was there to meet me. Very kind.
> Bring the clean water, give out the fresh seed.

Such, too often, is human life; and the problems it offers in energies apparently wasted, talents crushed, tastes unsatisfied, are impossible to solve.

Though the misery that arises from lack of harmony in one's surroundings is not so obvious as cold, hunger, or physical pain, it is none the less deserving of profound sympathy. The joylessness of doing what one does not like, to the exclusion of what one does like; of being in a place that is distasteful, or among people that are antipathetic—is a very serious trouble. And it is by no means to be remedied by the simple saying, "Whatever is, is best," or quotations about "the station in life to which it has pleased God to call me." It may be a duty to be dissatisfied and to break away from what is hampering and uncongenial. The story of many a great painter and musician, of many a worker for humanity, shows a record of "breaking short off" from associations that seemed binding.

It is all very well to be a "mute inglorious Milton," but it is better, after all, to give voice to the music within. And at any cost, save that of wrong-doing, circumstances that are obstinately uncongenial should be, if possible, altered.

The ideal state of society is that in which each man does what he can do best: and individuals may help on the "good time coming," by removing obstacles from the path of young people who long to follow their bent—remembering that the best career for any youth is not necessarily that in which he is likely to make the most money.

But when all is said and done, there is, alas! a vast residuum of human lives that are, and always must be, lived among uncongenial circumstances. What help is possible for these?

It is sometimes useful, instead of dwelling on abstract precepts, to take the life of a man who has fought through the difficulties that still in different forms burden humanity. And among such men there stands out one, eighteen centuries ago, for whom the epitaph was written:

I WAS EPICTETUS, A SLAVE,
AND MAIMED IN BODY, AND A BEGGAR FOR POVERTY, AND DEAR TO THE IMMORTALS.

As the story of this man is the story of a soul triumphing over its environment, it is worth while to linger over it awhile, for the sake of those who have now-a-days to struggle, to work, to live among surroundings that are distasteful and hindering.

I was Epictetus, a slave, says the epitaph. The very word Epictetus means bought or acquired, and was not, properly speaking, a name at all. This human chattel was of so little consequence that his badge of servitude is all that stands on record. Not even a name was Epictetus worth!

He was born about the fiftieth year of the Christian era, at Hierapolis, in Phrygia, near to Colosse and Laodicea. Conjecture may picture him when a child as speaking to some of the Christian men and women who heard St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians read. His native place is mentioned in that Epistle (Col. iv. 13). But it must be confessed that any attempts to connect him with Christianity, either at Hierapolis, or afterwards in his life of slavery at Rome, where St. Paul was at the time a prisoner, are quite unwarranted. Probably he knew nothing of what Christianity really was, though his soul was largely illumined by "the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

He was the child of poor parents, and was early sold into slavery at Rome, where he became the property of Epaphroditus, secretary or librarian to Nero.

A Roman slave! Could circumstances further go to crush the life out of a man's spirit? The horrors of negro slavery are familiar enough to English readers—but Roman slavery was even worse in its character, to say nothing of the fact that the mental type of Epictetus was higher far than that of the African. The very lack of any privacy must have been intolerable to a sensitive nature. Imprisonment in the horrible ergastulum, torture, or death, were grim possibilities, and at best the utter dependence on the will of another man was a humiliating and wretched condition. Epictetus tells a few anecdotes that show he had a satirical appreciation of the character of his master Epaphroditus, who was one of the fawning evil creatures that flourish in the shadow cast by despots. For instance, Epaphroditus sold a slave of his, Felicion, a shoemaker, because he was "good for nothing." By some chance he was bought by the Emperor, and became the Imperial cobbler. Immediately Epaphroditus began to pay him the greatest respect. "'How does the good Felicion do, I pray?' was his style of address. If any of us asked, 'What is master doing?' the answer was, 'He is consulting about something with Felicion.' Had he not sold the man as good for nothing? who then made him wise all at once?"

To such a man was Epictetus subject; but hear his own words: "Freedom and slavery are but names, and both of them depend upon the will. For no man is a slave whose will is free."

Again: "He is a slave whose body is free but whose soul is bound, and, on the contrary, he is free whose body is bound but whose soul is free."

Maimed in body, the epitaph goes on to say. Either through natural defect, or, as some assert, with less probability, the cruelty of his master, Epictetus was lame in one leg, and was weak and sickly also. He was of little value as a machine, and his master, perhaps for this reason, perhaps because it was fashionable at that period to possess learned slaves, caused him to be trained by a Stoic philosopher, C. Musonius Rufus.

Good health seems of all things the most necessary to happiness and to good work in life. Yet over this drawback also the intrepid slave triumphed. "Deal with me as Thou wilt!" he cries to his Creator in devout resignation; and not only in resignation, for he breaks forth in praise: "What else can I do, a lame old man, than sing hymns to God? I am a rational creature and I ought to praise God; this is my work; I do it, nor will I desert this post so long as I am allowed to keep it."

A beggar for poverty. At some time in his life, we know not how or why, Epictetus recovered his freedom. His master Epaphroditus accompanied Nero when he fled from Rome, and helped the wretched tyrant to commit suicide, for which Epaphroditus was afterwards put to death by Domitian.

> Who prop, thou ask'st, in these bad days, my mind:

says a modern poet—and thus answers the question—

> Much, he whose friendship I not long since won,
> That halting slave, who in Nicopolis
> Taught Arrian, when Vespasian's brutal son
> Cleared Rome of what most shamed him.

In other words, when Domitian expelled the philosophers from Rome, Epictetus crossed the seas to Nicopolis, where he gathered round him a little circle of pupils. One of these, Arrian, has preserved for modern times his master's sayings. Epictetus was indeed a "beggar for poverty." He lived in a cottage furnished only by a lamp and a straw pallet. When a thief carried off his iron lamp, he merely remarked, "To-morrow you will find an earthen one!"

Only a fragment or two can be given from his "Discourses," but they will show the manner of man he was.

"To have God for your maker and father and guardian—shall not this release us from sorrows and fears?"

With regard to the practice of suicide, prevalent under the Empire, he says:

"Friends, wait for God; when He shall give the signal and release you from this service, then go to Him; but for the present endure to dwell in this place where He has put you."

And again, as to conquest over temptation:

"Great is the struggle, divine the deed; it is for kingdom, for freedom, for tranquillity, for peace. Think on God; call upon Him as thine aid and champion."

That Epictetus was no mere human fossil, or even an ordinary Stoic, may be shown by one incident at a late period of his life. He heard that a friend was going to expose his infant son to perish; a common practice, and one considered justifiable by poverty. Epictetus, touched with pity, took the baby home to his cottage, and, in spite of his shyness of both women and children, hired an old nurse to come and live there to take care of it. Such an act of self-denial shows tenderness under the stern exterior.

In short, he is a fine figure, this slave-philosopher of old, and it may help the restless modern spirit to find in his utterances stimulus and strength.

There are certain things in our own power, and other things that are beyond our power, says Epictetus. To the first class belong our thoughts and actions; to the latter class belong bodily health, possessions, fame, rank—in short, circumstances. The former depend on ourselves, the latter do not. At the former we must labour with all our might; of the latter we must learn, by training our "ruling faculty" to be independent. Care concerning the former will make us noble and happy; care concerning the latter will make us fretful and anxious.

There is much truth in this teaching, although it cannot of course be broadly laid down that all circumstances are beyond man's power. It is with regard to those which are obviously out of the control of the individual, that the philosopher's advice should be regarded. "We must make the best use that we can of the things which are in our power, and use the rest according to their nature. What is their nature then? As God may please."

The slavery, the bodily weakness, the poverty of Epictetus, lend dignity to such utterances as the following:

"That Thou hast given me life, I thank Thee for what Thou hast given; so long as I have used the things which are Thine, I am content; take them back and place them wherever Thou mayest choose; for Thine were all things, Thou gavest them to me."

> Who nobly yields unto necessity,
> We hold him wise, and skilled in things divine;

he quotes from Euripides with approval.

The power of man by rightly training the "ruling," or rational faculty, to make himself superior to circumstances, is a thought echoed by Shakespeare, in the passage where John of Gaunt thus comforts the banished Bolingbroke:

> All places that the eye of heaven visits,
> Are to a wise man ports and happy havens.
> Teach thy necessity to reason thus;
> There is no virtue like necessity.
> Think not the king did banish thee,
> But thou the king. Woe doth the heavier sit,
> Where it perceives it is but faintly borne,—
> For gnarling sorrow hath less power to bite
> The man that mocks at it and sets it light.

And Lovelace sang in the same strain:

> Stone walls do not a prison make,
> Nor iron bars a cage.

It is not surprising to find that Epictetus set great store by books. These were, even eighteen centuries ago, what Mr. Russell Lowell calls them to-day: "Fast sailing ships to the Fortunate Isles." In the poem already quoted, Aurora Leigh finds a refuge from the cold lifeless conventionality of her aunt's rule in the garret where her father's library is stowed away. When she has enriched her mind with these treasures, it matters little to her that she has to sit at her detested crochet-work in formal state.

> My soul was singing at a work apart,
> Behind the wall of sense, as safe from harm
> As sings the lark when sucked up out of sight
> In vortices of glory and blue air.

There are few lives, however uncongenial be their surroundings, in which opportunity cannot be found for some resource, like Aurora Leigh's, that will waft the free soul away from the unattractive Present.

Resource and Resignation—these are the chief remedies against unalterably "uncongenial circumstances." The resignation taught by Epictetus is the bringing of the will into harmony with that of God, not in the crushed apathy of a slave, but the reasonable, cheerful submission of a child to a father. Not only did he teach this doctrine, but he lived it. And out of the wretched materials at his disposal—the weak maimed body, the slave's life, the extreme poverty—he framed a history that has been handed down through the centuries: and that won the final clause of his epitaph: Dear to the Immortals.

The Christian has a guide and pattern unknown to Epictetus, in the Ideal Life, lived for the most part among the unappreciative, if not the actively hostile.

The "halting slave," although he knew it not, was a follower of the Divine Master, who still bids the weary and heavy laden: "Take My yoke upon you and learn of Me; for I am meek and lowly in heart; and ye shall find rest unto your souls."

In His service is the truest balm for discontent and unsatisfied yearnings.

"Uncongenial circumstances" press most cruelly when they hinder, through poverty or otherwise, the development of latent powers. It is a hard thing to be conscious of capacities that have not room to grow; to be among surroundings hostile to a life that is full and free. Yet one may learn from Epictetus that circumstances apparently the most unfavourable may prove the means of true growth. And even at the worst, the Christian faith teaches that this world is not all—that no right aspiration is breathed in vain. With this hope, unknown to the brave old philosopher, surely the child of God may rest content.

The high that proved too high, the heroic for earth too hard,
The passion that left the ground to lose itself in the sky,
Are music sent up to God by the lover and the bard;
Enough that He heard it once: we shall hear it by-and-by.

LILY WATSON.

In Perils of Waters.

GREAT God, when the wild winds are out on the ocean,
And vexed by the might of Thy terrible blast,
The waves are uplifted in wrathful commotion,
Be Thou our sure Refuge till danger is past!

The lightnings that under Thy throne have their dwelling,
The strength of the thunder, the powers of the storm,
Unshackled, arise and come forth at Thy telling,
Their part in Thine infinite will to perform.

For Thee the sea roars in its fierce indignation,
But Thou, Lord, hast measured the stress of the wave,
And still Thou art nigh when, with strong supplication,
The mariners call on Thee, mighty to save.

Thy judgments to-day are abroad on the billow,
But Thou canst command and the terror shall cease;
As once, long ago, Thou didst rise from Thy pillow
And bridle the whirlwind with whispers of peace.

Speak now to the storm-tossed, adrift in their anguish,
O Thou who hast weathered all tempests that blow,
And grant that the shipwrecked, who tremble and languish
In perils of waters, Thy goodness may know.

On billow and whirlwind Thy name is engraven,
Thou rulest them still by the might of Thy word,
Restrain now their wrath and bring home to the haven
The souls that have hoped in Thy mercy, O Lord!

MARY ROWLES.

[Adolphe Artz, The Hague.

THE SEAFARER'S HOME.

FOR GOD AND MY NEIGHBOUR.

THE widespread and life-long misery entailed by reckless marriages amongst young working people, is a too familiar fact.

Let us now try to find out who are most to blame for such a state of things.

Some would probably reply: "Surely those who contract such marriages without due inquiry, thought, or prayer for guidance."

This is true, but not the whole truth. There are earthly friends on whom a great responsibility rests, and, amongst these, parents, or those who act as such, come first. Perhaps the mother takes the foremost rank of all, and undoubtedly so with girls.

It has been said that harsh treatment, and comfortless surroundings, render girls more susceptible to temptation, and ready to rush into matrimony, thinking that any change must be for the better.

But there are many parents living in well-ordered homes, and who are truly anxious for the welfare of their children, who yet make terrible mistakes in their efforts to promote it.

In some cases, they keep their young people at too great a distance, and repel every attempt at confidence.

Let a girl speak of love or marriage, these all-important subjects and rendered all-important by God's own decree, and what is too often the result?

She is frowned down, scolded, blamed for being bold, forward, immodest, and told to wait until she is grown up, before she again ventures to name such matters.

Grieved, wounded, indignant, the girl turns from the one who above all others should have been the readiest to listen, to sympathise, advise with, and caution her child.

The girl is not convinced of wrong in herself. Neither is she silenced. She must speak to some one, and instead of her mother, she chooses some giddy companion as her confidant. When it is too late, the parent weeps over her daughter's wrecked life, and wishes she had pursued a different course.

"I should never have married when I did, but for mother," said a poor deserted girl-wife of only eighteen, but with an infant at her breast.

Tears were streaming down her poor woe-begone face, and she was sobbing bitterly.

"I thought you had a good mother, Ellen," said the lady to whom she spoke. "I know she was grieved at your marriage and would fain have prevented it."

"She was too good in one way. If ever I tried to speak to her about Jim, quiet and reasonable like, she always flew up, and said I ought to be ashamed of myself to look the side he was on. She called him all sorts of names, and, though he was not good, he never deserved what she said about him. And she said things about me, too, in her passion that were not true, things that never so much as came into my mind, and that I would not have done for the world. I know she was angry when she said them, and she would be sorry after, but one cannot forget. There was nothing I wanted so much as to trust mother, if she would only have been a bit patient. But when you have things flung back at you, that you told because you thought that she would be the one to feel for you; when you are taunted and scolded, and spied on, but never trusted, it shuts you up. It did me, and I say again, that I should not be as I am, if mother had been patient, given me kind words, and tried to lead instead of driving. She meant well, and she was right in not wanting me to marry Jim. But she went the wrong way to work, and I am here with a baby in my arms, my husband gone, I don't know where to, and my life spoiled, and miserable at eighteen years old."

There are plenty of similar cases, and Ellen's true story will go on repeating itself in other girl-lives, unless, as she said, mothers will be a "bit patient," and try both to win and keep the confidence of their children.

Parents should encourage their young people to trust them from the earliest childhood. They should impress on their young minds, that no friend can be so safe as a good father or mother. No one else can feel the same interest in their well-being, or be willing to make such sacrifices to promote it.

This trust should not be one-sided. Children are always proud of being trusted by their parents, and they are much more likely to become thoughtful, rational beings if they are early treated as such. As a mother, I would say to other parents, "Give the children your confidence. Trust them at first in little things. Teach them to be faithful in these, and then trust them with greater matters. Treat them as if you believed in their truthfulness and honour, and you will go far to make them deserve such confidence."

As love begets love, so trust inspires trust in return. Fathers and mothers, do not forget this. Encourage confidences from your children. Listen as if you felt for, and with them. Tell them about your own young days, your own mistakes and failures. Do not try to make them think that you were perfect boys and girls, young men and maidens, for they are far too wise to believe this. Rather show them how, when you would have done some rash or foolish action, you were restrained by parents who loved you too well to let you injure yourselves by allowing you to take your own way. Or tell them how, when your young feet were just about to tread dangerous paths, a firm yet tender hand laid hold upon you and led you back into the way of right and of safety.

Tell the young people how angry you were at parents or friends for their interference, how certain that they were wrong and that you knew what was best for you. Then tell them, how, when your anger was over and the scales had fallen from your eyes, and you could see clearly, you thanked God for having given you friends whose loving care had, by His blessing upon it, saved you from life-long misery.

If you can tell a tale of happy youthful love, that led to a still more happy union of hearts and lives, tell it by all means to your children. Nothing brings the girls and boys nearer to parents, than listening to their old love story. It encourages them to whisper their own in turn, and to be sure of sympathy. And, oh, dear parents, if such confidence is given, treat it tenderly, lovingly, reverently as a holy thing, and prove by so doing, that you are the safest of confidants, the truest of earthly friends, and that the happiness of the children God has entrusted to you, lies very near your hearts.

But there are parents and guardians who are unfit for such a solemn trust. And there are headstrong, wilful young people whom parents can neither lead nor drive out of the path of danger to that of safety.

And yet again, there are the girls in service, factories and workshops, who are far away from homes and kindred, and some who are orphaned and without any place that they dare call home.

With regard to young domestic servants, mistresses are largely responsible. How can a mother of daughters hedge her own children round with all the watchful care that love can suggest, and yet feel it right to give herself neither thought nor trouble for the stranger-girl under her roof? How can she regard her as a mere sweeping and dusting machine, and forget that she has an immortal soul to be saved, a character to be preserved, a good name to be cherished: or may add one more to the long list of lives wrecked for want of wise, loving counsel, a little patience, sympathy, and motherly guidance.

Dear mistresses, as you look at your young servants think of your own girls. Interest yourself for the strangers that are within your gates. Inquire as to the way in which they spend their holidays, the associates they meet with, the places they frequent. Prove to them that it is from no idle curiosity, but an earnest wish to do them good, that you thus speak and act.

A short time ago, when staying at Southport, I was a listener to a sermon, the text of which was taken from the third chapter of Nehemiah. Just now, one little bit of it comes vividly to mind in connection with my present subject. In the thirtieth verse we find these words, "After him repaired Meshullam the son of Berechiah, over against his chamber." The preacher showed how, if we would only look for it, most of us would find work to do for God, close to our hand. If not actually within our homes, at our door, or over against it, like Meshullam, who, seeing the bit of broken down wall offending his sight day by day, set himself, single-handed, to repair it. This piece of work might be said to resemble that which people do in their own families, amongst those they employ, or by influencing near friends and neighbours. But—and here comes the point to which I want to draw special attention—Meshullam did not content himself with the work which was close at home, and the result of which would be always before him. Look at the fourth verse, and there is the honourable record that he took his share of the building, amongst the great body of workers who laboured at a more distant part of the wall. He was a large-hearted man, this Meshullam, and in earnest in what he undertook. He did not say "Charity begins at home," and let it end there. He gave time and labour and zeal to the common work and cause, and found enough of all to serve him both there and when nearer home.

See how this man's example may be followed by those who wish to be made a blessing to the young. The mistress and mother in her home, the father in the same place or amongst those he employs, may be said to find their work "over against their own chamber." For the many who would fain do something, yet know not how to begin or where, there is enough to do further afield.

There are so many whom outsiders may influence, when a parent's efforts have proved fruitless, or where the parents are at a distance, or it may be are such as would set a bad example rather than a good one.

The Sunday school teacher may do much if she will not confine herself merely to routine work, but will try to make herself a sympathising friend to her scholars—if she will address herself, from time to time, to individual minds and strive to win affection and confidence, so that she may have the privilege of giving good advice as occasion requires.

There is, for example, "The Girls' Friendly Society," an excellent organization, for no girl who is a member of it can find herself alone in a strange place, or without a Christian lady-friend to whom she may apply for advice and sympathy, in a time of difficulty or trouble. She may also be certain of meeting with suitable associates in her own rank of life, amongst its members. There is also a Boys' Friendly Society, conducted on similar lines. But as these organizations, though most excellent, are confined to members of the Church of England, they cover only one portion of the field—they repair only one breach in the social wall. There is need for many associations with kindred aims, and work for any number of loving-hearted Christian men and women who are willing to engage in it.

Perhaps some may think that the workers should be people of mature age, parental character, and life-long experience. Let me give some account of our "Manchester Mill and Working Girls' Society," which has been in operation for nearly twenty years, in order to prove the contrary, and show what Christian girls in a higher rank of life may do for their working sisters.

It was in April 1868, that the first Mill Girls' Classes were opened in Manchester, because it had been noticed how many of these girls spent their evenings in the streets, singing low songs and often visiting public-houses in worse than doubtful company. This was long before the days of compulsory education, and numbers of the girls could neither read, write, nor sew.

Nine girls attended on the first night, and the numbers continued to increase, but the conduct of the scholars was so rude and at times almost riotous, that it was enough to dishearten those who wished to benefit them. But they worked on in spite of discouragements, and God has blessed their labours.

Nearly six years ago, I gave an account of these classes for working girls, in the "Girl's Own Paper" for January 14th, 1882. That account proved a seed, from which sprang some classes of a kindred character that are still carried on in a London parish, by a number of young ladies whose hearts had been stirred to follow the example of their Lancashire sisters.

After this interval of six years, I quote from the last report of the Manchester Society:

"Has the work continued to prosper?

"It is not too much to say that during those nineteen years, thousands of girls have been watched over, advised, helped in extreme poverty, followed to their homes, cheered and comforted. They have been taught many useful lessons of domestic economy, influenced for good, and their manners and habits refined by the society and example of their teachers. They have been instructed in the word of God and the way of salvation, and the precious seed thus sown has produced an abundant harvest of good and lasting fruit.

"Many a mother has had cause to thank God that her daughters have attended these classes. Many a husband rejoices to-day, that he found a wife amongst the scholars. Many a teacher who has given up her leisure for the sake of her humble sisters, has abundantly realised the truth of the promise, 'He that watereth shall be watered also himself.'

"Homes have been brightened, sorrowing hearts cheered, and souls saved by God's blessing upon the instrumentality of these classes."

In the face of recent educational progress, an outsider may ask if such classes are still really needed.

The answer given in the Report is, "More than ever." Not, of course, for reading, writing, and sewing, but for the influences which are here brought to bear upon the girls, and which are outside ordinary school work. They increase its value by showing those who possess a little learning, how to turn it to the best account in their home life, and they endeavour to infuse with it the religious leaven which can alone purify and render that life happy and useful.

The girls receive instruction in sanatory matters, and addresses on cooking, nursing, &c., are given from time to time. They and their young teachers become sympathising friends. Often, when scholars who earn their own bread think that this fact should entitle them to act independently of their parents, and resent home interference, the teacher's influence proves invaluable.

A word in season has made many pause before contracting a foolish, or at least a too-early, marriage; and life-long sorrow has been prevented by it.

Look at a few pictures that these classes show.

"A few days ago, a teacher was met on the way to the house of a scholar, where, after taking a friendly cup of tea, she was going to give a practical lesson in cooking to a few members of her class."

Glance into another home. The teacher lives there. Her scholars are the guests this time, and they are being entertained, first with tea and substantial accompaniments, afterwards with music by the young people of the family, they themselves joining in familiar hymns before the close of that happy evening.

The girls' eyes are busy everywhere during such visits, and they will carry away with them many a hint for the improvement of their humble homes. See that new scholar. She has heard the teachers speaking to the members of the class as if they were her own sisters, and now school is over for the night, she is looking up at the general superintendent and with tears streaming down her face, says "You are kind. Nobody ever spoke kindly to me before." She spoke truly. Her surroundings were desolate in the extreme, and she had no one to say a kind word.

Listen to another girl. She is saying to her teacher that she is engaged to be married, but that she and the young man are going to wait until he can provide her a comfortable home. When undecided at first about her answer, he had advised her to pray before giving it, as he had done before speaking to her.

Here is an account of another who, with blushing, happy face, had told a similar tale. "Please, dear teacher, pray for me," she said. "You were the first that led me to think seriously about things. It was through you I was led to give my heart to God, and to wish for His blessing on whatever I do. Pray for me, now, for this is such a solemn time with me."

The first school is perhaps more flourishing than ever, but several others have been begun and are prospering.

In one you may see the scholars cutting out and making their own gowns, assisted by the teacher. In another, a capital piano has just been carried in, obtained through the efforts of the young superintendents, and it is the actual property of the school.

But I must not multiply pictures, though they are all from real life; only let me call attention to the fact that these classes are mainly carried on by girls, amongst and for girls.

Where there are no parents, or worse than none, or where girls are headstrong, and determined to rush into life-long misery, these young Christian ladies have been made a blessing, and used as a means of saving their working sisters from future lives of misery and remorse.

This is the kind of work which is not found at our own doors, or within the walls of home, or like that which Meshullam did over against his chamber. It is like that other piece at a greater distance, and at which he laboured in company with others at either side of him. But it was all part of one great whole, undertaken for the good of his neighbours, and the glory of his God.

Would that such classes were to be found in every town!

To quote once more from the Report. "Doubtless there are numbers of young ladies, aye, and young men, who long to work for God's glory and their neighbour's good, but know not how to set about it. To such we say: Help in a work like this. Give one night a week with the consent of parents and friends. Ask their prayers and blessing and tell them if they fear to let you go out on account of passing through the street, that in all the nineteen past years, no harm has ever befallen any young lady worker in this mission field. Some self-denial will be called for, but you will be rewarded as others have been, by the gratitude and love of your scholars. You will see them growing up useful wives, mothers and Christian workers in their turn. For yourselves you will be laying up a store of blessed memories which in the days to come you would not lose for anything in the world."

To would-be workers in this field, let me add a word of warning. There are many earnest people who are labouring for the social improvement of their poorer and less educated neighbours, who leave out the one thing that can give eternal value to their efforts. They care for bodies, they improve dwellings, hang pictures on the walls and strive to make home beautiful to look upon. They teach many very useful things, and they say, "Keep on the right path; go on as you have begun, and you will find yourselves both better off and happier in the long run, than you have ever been before."

But they leave out the main ingredient for making lives happy. They refrain from any mention of God the Father, of Jesus Christ the Saviour and Sin-bearer, of the Holy Ghost the Comforter. They will not have what they call "the religious element," at all.

They will not have any mention of the Book which God gave as a revelation of His will and His love for sinners, and to be a light to lead them to salvation and eternal blessedness.

It is all right to teach the house mother to prepare a meal and to set the table neatly; but not a word must be said about Him, who, before He fed the famishing multitude, "gave thanks," and, "looking up to heaven, blessed" the loaves and the fishes, which He increased so that five thousand had enough and to spare.

The value of every effort for the good of our neighbours is increased beyond estimate, when the gospel message goes along with it, and love for souls is beyond and above the wish to improve merely the temporal comforts of those around us.

The workers amongst the mill and working girls of Manchester would say to-day, whilst rejoicing in the success which has attended their labours: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thy name give glory." "It is in Thy name we have gone forth, and with Thy message, and it is through Thy blessing that the seed has taken root and brought forth fruit to Thy praise and the good of those around us." RUTH LAMB.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

"E. C." asks: "In Luke xv. 7, who are the 'just persons who need no repentance'?"

The phrase describes rather the opinion of the Pharisees about themselves than our Lord's opinion of them. "Well, be it so, that you are as good as you think yourselves, there is more joy over the repentant sinner than over you!" So He elsewhere says, "I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners;" that is, supposing them to be righteous, My gospel is not for them. If really righteous, they will not need a Saviour: and if they think themselves righteous, they will not feel their want of a Saviour. "The whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick." But it must not be inferred that any on earth are actually "whole," or "righteous," or "needing no repentance."

"A. N." writes: "I want you, if you please, to explain the meaning of the word 'perfect' in the Sermon on the Mount. I have looked out for it in Parkhurst's Greek Lexicon, and am quite satisfied that there is no command given to us in the New Testament to be absolutely perfect individually. In the Old Testament we do find the sentence, 'Be thou perfect'; but that must have had reference to the worship of the One True God."

There are two points which must be borne in mind in interpreting our Lord's words in Matt. v. 48. One is that they are an inference from what has gone before, "Be ye therefore perfect." The command is an application of the great lesson of love which He had been inculcating. Here is a principle which, fully applied, would render rules unnecessary. To apprehend and follow it is the full attainment, the completeness, of the character. Obedience to law may be servile, mechanical, partial: get the spirit of love into your heart, and obedience comes spontaneously. So will you be children of God, enstamped with His moral likeness. Upon Him no law can be imposed: He acts according to His own nature, and that nature is Love. "For God," writes Bishop Harvey Goodwin, "a law external to Himself is impossible; and because He is perfectly holy and wise and good, a law is unnecessary; Christ would desire that for His disciples law should not be felt to be necessary, because they endeavour to imitate Him who is holy and wise and good."[1]

The second point is, that where St. Matthew has "perfect," St. Luke has "merciful" (vi. 36), evidently expressing the same thought in a different way. The completeness of the Christian character is attained when the impulse to goodness springs from within instead of being enforced by external laws, and when this impulse has its ground in Love. The question is not of sinlessness, but of the ideal of the Christian life.

The Apostle Paul has a similar thought, using the word "perfect" even more strictly in its classic sense as full-grown. Be men, not children; and to have attained to Love as the master-principle of character, is to have risen to Christian manhood. "Let us," he says, "as many as be perfect, be thus minded" (Phil. iii. 15). At the same time (ver. 12) he has not obtained absolute perfection. Compare Ephesians iv. 13–15, where the stature of the "full-grown man" is described as "being true (not only 'speaking the truth;' see R.V. margin) in love." St. John also had caught his Master's spirit: "He that feareth is not made perfect in love." And St. Peter, in his Second Epistle, i. 5–7, makes love the climax, or perfection of Christian attainment.

[1] "Commentary on the Gospel of St. Matthew," Cambridge, 1857.

Bishop Goodwin well adds: "The test of perfection, 'as your Father which is in heaven is perfect,' seems to make the precept hopeless. It is obvious that our Lord, who knew so well what was in man, could never contemplate the perfections of our Heavenly Father being exhibited in the conduct of any one of us; but He might very well expect that the principles of our conduct should be the same as those of God Himself: that there should be with us, as with Him, no narrow notion of keeping a law in the letter and breaking it in the spirit: that our actions should flow from a deep principle of love, after the pattern of the actions of Him who is Love itself."

"E. A. C." asks: "What difference is there between 'a righteous man' and 'a good man' in Rom. v. 7?"

Literally, the passage reads thus (R.V.): "Scarcely for a righteous man will one die; for peradventure for the good man some one would even dare to die." There is a remarkably interesting variation in the margin of this version, making good to be neuter, so that the statement would be that though for a righteous man one would scarcely die, some might be found to die "for that which is good"—for a good cause. If we could adopt this interpretation, there would be no difficulty, but on the whole it appears untenable.

We must observe the word for[1] introducing the second clause. It shows that something in the former clause is explained, and this can only be the word "scarcely." "Scarcely," I say—not that the thing is impossible, for there are righteous men for whom some would even dare to die. But the word is changed from righteous to good, not to show that there is an opposition between them. It is not "a good man," as in A.V., but "the good man," the whole form of the sentence implying that he belongs to the same class as "the righteous" or "just," but that there is some element of character added. Not only righteous, but good, i.e., benevolent and gracious. Just men there are for whom one would even dare to die, only they must be men whose justice is touched and beautified by generosity and love.

[1] "Yet peradventure," A.V., is one of those inaccuracies that are corrected by the Revisers.

"L. W.," who desires an explanation of Hebrews vi. 4–6, is referred to the SUNDAY AT HOME for July 23, 1887, p. 477, where the passage is discussed. Our correspondent further asks: "Will you explain 1 Cor. ix. 27? How could the apostle Paul be 'a castaway,' when he says, 'I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him'?"

It should be remembered that these two utterances of the apostle belong to different periods of his life. When he wrote to the Corinthians (from Ephesus, about A.D. 57), his thoughts about himself may not have been quite the same as when he wrote to Timothy (from Rome, A.D. 65 or 66). At the close of his career, the great apostle may have risen to a higher and nobler confidence than in its earlier stages. It should be observed that the word castaway (R.V. "rejected"[1]) properly refers to being disapproved as a candidate for a prize. The candidate would enter the lists, but he has neglected proper training, and so is turned back as unfit to contend. A result unspeakably sad and mortifying for one who had "proclaimed to others" the laws and conditions of the contest! The possibility of failure was certainly before the apostle when he penned the words. But afterwards, when he wrote to Timothy, he had "fought the good fight and finished his course."

J. W. writes: "In Acts, ii. 29, 30, we read: 'Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne.' What are we to understand by Christ sitting on David's throne?"

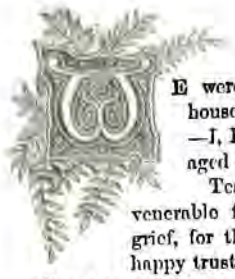
It may be noted, first of all, in answering this question, that the words "according to the flesh" and "Christ" are absent from the best manuscripts, and that the Revised Version translates, "God had sworn with an oath to him that of the fruit of his loins He would set one (or, one shall sit) upon his throne." This change, however, hardly affects our correspondent's question. The throne of David over the outward Israel represented the throne of Christ over His true Israel, His redeemed church. The one kingdom was a type of the other. Christ is King in Zion. Then, in the eighty-ninth Psalm, the kingdom of David and his seed is declared to be eternal, in reference assuredly not to the earthly Jewish dynasty, but to the everlasting kingdom of which that was but a foreshadowing. The resurrection of Christ is expressly declared to be His solemn inauguration as King. See the comment of St. Paul on the second Psalm, Acts xiii. 33. Thus to the enthroned Son of God were given the "sure mercies of David."

[1] Gr. ἀδόκιμος.

SANTA LUCIA,

A STORY OF CORSICA.

CHAPTER I.—THE BAMBINO SERMON.



We were seated in a balcony of an old house in the Rue Notre Dame, Ajaccio, —I, Frida Rocca, and the Colonel, her aged father.

Tears coursed down the old man's venerable face, which was handsome in its grief, for there was a softened expression of happy trust, despite the sadness in it.

"Yes, I am sad," he said; "for I am thinking that Pietro will grow up, as I did—fatherless and motherless; but you, Frida, must be a mother to the boy, and while I live, I will be father as well as grandfather to him."

Frida dried her eyes.

"I will try to be a mother to him, dear father," she said.

"And you must go to Palermo, and bring the boy back to me. You can spend Christmas there, and hear him preach the Bambino sermon; and then he must come to live with us. He can go on with his studies at the seminary here."

* * *

It was Christmas Eve when Frida Rocca arrived at Palermo.

In the cathedral crypt, hundreds of poor people had been congregated all the afternoon, singing, as they knelt, the Christmas hymn, which ended with the refrain—

> Dear Jesus! Thou hast stolen my heart!
> Thou Babe my heart hast won!

The words were sung to a somewhat monotonous chant, accompanied by sounds most unmelodious from a broken-winded organ.

Towards dark, the groups of worshippers in the crypt dwindled away. The streets outside assumed an animated appearance, and in nearly every house there was an illumination, in front of wax figures of the Infant Jesus.

Other figures, representing Joseph and Mary, with the ox and ass in the stall, were to be found in the houses of wealthier people Little angels of wax, too, were suspended over the cradles, or outside the stable-door, to represent the heavenly host, the "Gloria in Excelsis."

As long as the wax candles lasted, the good folk of each house, sat in front of their figures, singing church melodies, or old Sicilian ditties; but when the tapers were burnt down, nearly everybody sallied forth to church or cathedral, to the evening service or midnight mass.

The great attraction of the evening, however, was the Bambino sermon at the cathedral—a sermon preached, according to old custom, by a boy of the seminary.

From eight to nine o'clock the cathedral was veiled in darkness; only two wax tapers shed an uncertain flickering light in one chapel. A woman knelt there alone—it was Frida, the aunt of the boy who had been appointed to preach the Bambino sermon.

At nine o'clock the vergers went round and began to light a few wax candles.

At a quarter past nine they rang a bell hung up in front of the sacristy, and a few priests went in to robe. Slowly they took out their copes and cassocks and surplices. Then there was a stir in the organ gallery, and the organist and paid musicians and singers arrived by twos and threes.

At half-past nine a verger rang the sacristy-bell a second time, to warn all the priests that it was full time for robing, and some ecclesiastics who were scattered about the building talking, hurried off to dress.

A little later, one by one, all the huge wax lights in the chandeliers and the moccoli on the altar were lit. At ten o'clock the canons and deans had taken their seats in the oak stalls, with the chorister boys beneath them; the seminarists and the sisters of mercy from the convent with their pupils had filed in, and the public began to assemble.

At a quarter past ten the archbishop was conducted to his throne, the organ pealed forth, the anthem was sung, and the lofty edifice resounded with responses and chanting.

Then the aged archbishop went from his throne to the high altar; mass was said, the Gospel intoned; and having been reconducted to his throne, he was there robed and unrobed, and capped and uncapped, and mitred and unmitred, while the clergy looked on from their stalls. But not for long, for at midnight they all had to walk in procession behind the archbishop, as the figure of the Santo Bambino (which during the evening had been exhibited on the high altar) was carried by his eminence round the cathedral, slowly, and in state. Slowly indeed, for the archbishop was an old man over eighty, and many of the canons and deans had seen as many years.

After the procession came the great event of the evening, the Bambino sermon. People all shifted their seats, so as to sit as much as possible round the pulpit. The archbishop, who could not have heard the sermon from his throne, took a seat in the aisle beside the director of the seminary.

Presently the Bambino preacher, Pietro, then ten years old, entered the pulpit, accompanied by his prompter, both wearing the biretta. He uncovered his head and prayed, put on the biretta, sat down, whispered to his prompter, then rose, pronounced the customary "In the name of," and commenced his sermon as follows:

"We have seen the Santo Bambino carried round, and back to the altar, and a whole year will elapse before this dear festival returns, but each of us can take the Holy Babe to home and heart, as Mary and Joseph did, and none of us need go far to seek Him as they sought Him, sorrowing, for three days,"

As Pietro drew breath the director of the seminary rose from his seat, seeming much perplexed and annoyed. But the cardinal archbishop pulled him down again. He looked delighted, as he whispered to his neighbour—

"È proprio carino!" which might be rendered, "He is, indeed, a dear little fellow!"

"Yes, a dear little fellow, but a most audacious child," thought the director.

The boy seemed to be improvising! It was against all precedents.

The Bambino preachers were expected to learn a sermon by heart, and to repeat it, aided, of course, by the prompter. It was generally settled some months beforehand which boy should deliver the sermon in honour of the Holy Child Jesus, and the preparation for the delivery of the sermon was a long and serious one.

And here was this youngster breaking away from traditionary forms.

Yet his eminence the cardinal was unmistakably pleased, and Pietro evidently needed no prompter's aid, for he went on, while all were evidently under the spell of his sweet, clear accents, which rang out a chime of hallowed words. At last Pietro concluded with this appeal:

"Shall we not love the Holy Father Who has sent us the Holy Son? We say 'Our Father' every day. Do we say it in the spirit of the Holy Babe, when He said to His mother, in childhood, 'Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?' Do we remember that if He could thus begin His mission He could end it, saying to His Father, 'I have finished the work that Thou gavest Me to do?' Shall we not hasten to begin to do some of the Father's business, that we may some day finish some of the work He has entrusted to us?"

Thus Pietro concluded his sermon, while a murmur of pleasure went round that he should so well have acquitted himself of his task.

There is no accounting for the impulses of children.

As Pietro left the pulpit, he had to pass by the benches on which sat the girls of the convent school.

One of these, a beautiful child of six years old, rushed out from the ranks, flung her arms round Pietro, and pulling his face down to her, kissed him. It was all done so rapidly that it could not have been prevented.

There was great consternation amongst the sisters in charge of the girls.

The archbishop, who witnessed this little episode, exclaimed, "Ha ragione! She is right; he deserves to be kissed!" and moving towards the Lady Superior of the convent, he smilingly tried to set her at ease about what had happened.

"She is always so sage, so wise," said the Lady. "I am astounded! What can have possessed her? We shall never hear the last of this! It is a good thing that Santa Lucia is going back to Corsica!"

"What!" said the Cardinal, "she is from Corsica? Why that explains it all! So is the boy. They must have known one another!"

But, it was proved that they had never met before; and it so happened that these two children went to Corsica in the same steamer. Thus they met on the threshold of youth, these two whose lives were to be so closely linked together.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VI.

Brother of one oft at a prince's side,
One named like him fell with that prince and died?
Where did the prisoner Paul arrive and find,
Though not expected, welcomes warm and kind?
Husband of one who should be David's wife
When jealous Saul conspired against his life?
The home of one to whom St. Peter said,
"Christ makes thee whole, arise and make thy bed"?
Who was ashamed to ask a soldier-band
For help; he trusted in Jehovah's hand?
Where does the ark abide for twenty years,
Then, as a prophet, Samuel first appears?

Finals name one who disobeyed the Lord.
A poor dumb creature saved him from the sword.
Initials name a nation which he cursed,
Of Israel's foes this one had been the first.

L. T.

SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. II.

1. This verse describes a wonderful sight.
2. An expression in it occurs in the previous chapter.
3. The person alluded to therein once gave a very long answer to a very short question.
4. He saw a vision.
5. He speaks of one who was "exceeding fair," and his own face was attractive.
6. His death was a painful one.
7. He speaks of "the God of Glory" and the "Just One."
8. The verse contains mention of the three Persons in the Trinity.
9. The verse following gives a glimpse of heaven.
10. It contains twenty-eight words.

L. T.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. I.—p. 16.

"And Laban said unto him, I pray thee, if I have found favour in thine eyes, tarry: for I have learned by experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake." —Gen. xxx. 27.

1. Gen. xxxi. 19.
2. Experience, Eccle. 1, 16; Romans v. 4.
3. Gen. xxx. 27.
4. Gen. xxviii. 5.
5. Rachel, Gen. xxix. 16; Jer. xxxi. 16; Matt. ii. 17, 18.
6. Reuben, Gen. xlii. 37.
7. Acts vii. 8; Gen. xxx. 21.
8. Reuben, Gen. xlix. 15.
9. Gen. xxxi. 36.
10. Gen. xxx. 29; xxxii. 28.
11 & 12. Gen. xxx. 27.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMAS.

NO. II.—p. 32.—SISERA.—MARTHA.

S-odo-m.
I-dume-a.
S-ei-r.
E-gyp-t.
R-ebeka-h
A-quil-a.

NO. III.—p. 32.—ABRAHAM.

1.	A-zreil	1 Chron. v. 24.
2.	B-en	1 Chron. xv. 18.
3.	R-aamah	Gen. x. 7.
4.	A-haz	2 Kings xv. 38.
5.	H-alhul	Joshua xv. 58.
6.	A-hava	Ezra viii. 15.
7.	M-illo	Judges ix. 6.

NO. IV.—p. 48.—SINAI.—Ex. xxiv. 12-18.

S-heba	1 Kings x. 1-7.
I-saiah	2 Kings xx. 1.
N-ehushtan	2 Kings xviii. 4.
A-hijah	1 Kings xi. 29-31.
I-mlah	1 Kings xxii. 6-28

ANSWER TO HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. I.—p. 48.

In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth.—Gen. i. 1.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

A SAIL THROUGH THE INLAND SEA OF JAPAN.

BY MRS. MURRAY MITCHELL.

I.

FUSIYAMA.

IT was one of the loveliest of golden evenings when my husband and I set sail from Yokohama for Kobé, one of the five open ports of Japan, and the seaport for Ôsaka and Kiyôto. Our plan was to pay a brief visit to these cities, and then proceed on a cruise through the inland sea to Nagasaki and Shanghai.

Our short sojourn in this most bewitching of all lands was drawing to a close. We were bidding adieu to its shores with many sorrowful regrets; but, though we hardly knew it, the best was to come—the best, I mean, as to the scenery which this lovely sea has to show—and much also of higher and more stirring interest to hear about and see, in the places we had still to visit.

Japan has been my favourite fairy-land since I was a child. It is like an old dream how I used to listen entranced to strange tales of a curious and mysterious country, with inhabitants and customs as curious—a land where fearful earthquakes were the rule, and mountains were thrown up in a night—which was closed, shut up, sealed from the rest of the world—a magic, marvellous place existing on some other planet. Now I had seen it, and I can only say the half had not been told. Its real existing self—not in dreams or fairy-land, but as it is—is quite as curious and as strange and interesting, and unlike anything else in the world, as the most vivid imagination can picture. You set your foot in Japan, and the belief is firmer than ever that you have dropped on to a new planet.

But there are aspects in which this land is full of an interest far more absorbing to the Christian heart than even all its marvels—in its singular people, its customs and art, with all its physical loveliness—can inspire. Amid the "shaking of the nations" no nation in any time has been more remarkably "shaken" than Japan has been. Its history of the last two hundred years is wonderfully striking. I do not attempt of course to go fully into this history; but if my readers will accompany me in our "sail," and look at one or two of the places we shall pass, listening to the tales they have to tell, we shall know a few of the great things God has done and is still doing for this empire, of which we may well be glad.

We were specially favoured as to weather that November afternoon we sailed from Yokohama, for no sooner had we made the Hiogo harbour than we were assailed by the rigours of winter in storms of sleet and snow and icy winds. One is hardly prepared for this condition of climate in the "Land of the Rising Sun," and considering the latitude in which it lies; but winter, as we found, is a stern fact in Japan. As yet, however, the Gulf of Yeddo was as a summer sea; and when our boatful of kind friends had left us, we stood on the deck watching the beautiful scene as we slowly steamed out of the glowing Yokohama bay. The great foreign ships and boats, and strange country craft with broad sails and high sterns, sent their shadows deep into the glassy water. The long line of big houses and hongs and hotels belonging to the modern and half-European town lay along the shore; the "Treaty Point" also, and other "points" bearing American names in memory of the never-to-be-forgotten achievement of the United States in being the first to open Japan to commerce and intercourse with the outer world. On a low margin, rather northwards, lay the picturesque old capital of Kanagawa; and now nearer came the pretty green ridge of low hills called "the Bluffs," crowned with the bungalows and residences of the foreign community. How smiling they looked in the bright rays of the sinking sun, standing in gardens and grounds, called "compounds" here as in India, and ornamented with a wealth of lovely evergreen shrubs. It was more and more beautiful as we steamed on, and we settled ourselves among our cloaks and rugs in a corner of the upper deck so as to lose nothing of the ever-changing scene, full of the varied and magic beauty one finds everywhere in this favoured land of the sun. Our large comfortable steamer was one of the Mitsu Bishi line, and the Japanese flag, a red ball on a white ground, floated gaily overhead.

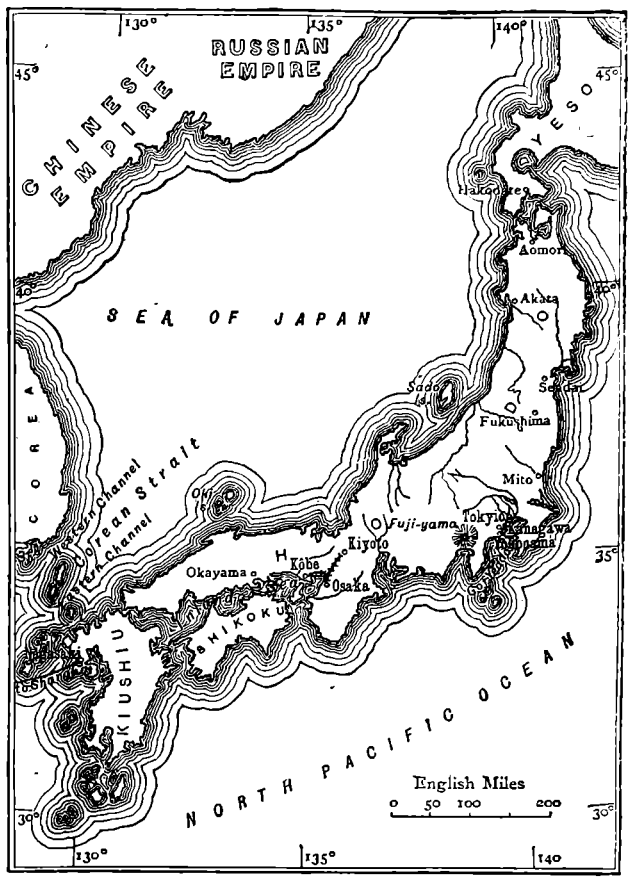
The coast ere long became bolder and the mountains grander, varying marvellously in appearance, formation and height. Some were peaked, barren, and rugged; some were green and richly wooded; some simply masses of brown rock, while others resembled the ruins of old castles or fortifications, with ramparts and walls and towers. Then away landward the peerless holy mountain—the crown and glory of Japan, the far-famed Fuji-yama, or Fuji-san, as he is called, reared his venerable majestic head. He looked near: but in reality was some sixty miles off. He towered there in solitary stately grandeur, 14,000 feet high, crowned with everlasting snow. His symmetrical form was also arrayed in the glistening white, fresh-fallen, and purple-tinted, as the sinking sun threw his glory like a mantle around him. The Japanese are justly proud of their beautiful mountain, and I don't wonder they feel the veneration and love for it they do. I knew the grand old cone the moment I first caught sight of it as we sailed up the Gulf of Yeddo from San Francisco; for is not his likeness on every Japanese screen and bit of lacquer and porcelain? We used to watch his form by daylight and by moonlight from the Royal Engineering College at Tôkiyô, while staying with our kind friends there; and the fascination only seemed to grow. We bade him adieu now, for the sun soon went down behind the mountains of Nippon, and by the morning the great Fuji-yama was lost to view.

But with night came new interest and beauty. After it grew quite dark we saw one of the loveliest sights imaginable. A large fleet of fishing boats lay together resting on the still water and covering a great expanse. Each boat had a bright torch-like light hung from its bow, and the steady brilliance of so many lights clustered together, and sending streams of flickering flame down into the dark still water had the most beautiful and picturesque effect. We watched it, fascinated, until carried out of sight. It was as if a multitude of the starry host overhead, unusually brilliant as they were in the dark unclouded moonless sky—had come down, lovingly to salute their sleeping sister, the sea.

We had a good many Japanese passengers on board, and at starting had some new and most amusing manifestations of the proverbial politeness of this people, and of the ceremony with which they treat each other. I watched two men meet. When yards apart they both bowed—not with a mere nod of the head by any means, but a bend of the whole body down to the very ground. They then advanced a step and bowed again, repeating the obeisance over and over, laughing the while in a good-humoured, but rather silly sort of way until the distance between them was covered with bows. But they did not shake hands. In exactly the same way I saw a woman bow and bow toward a man. Each advancing friend seems to vie with the other who will salute the lowliest. It was infinitely diverting, but there is a pleasing grace and good-humour in all their ways which is certainly most attractive. The French may for ever hide their diminished heads before the over-powering politeness of the Japanese.

There were some high Government officials on board, one of whom was said to be the Ambassador for Corea. He was accompanied by a numerous retinue: his doctor, secretary, attaché, and I do not know how many retainers besides. This exalted functionary was a meek, modest, not to say insignificant-looking man, his small person being arrayed in faultless English broadcloth. He appeared at table twice, sitting opposite to me at the captain's right, and spoke English pretty well. But then he vanished. "He can stand English food no longer," said the captain; and I doubt not but that the unaccustomed foreign garments, always awkward and unbecoming to an Eastern, though tolerated awhile "for the honour of the thing," would also be set aside, and appearance give way to convenience and comfort. His wife occupied the cabin next to mine with two or three attendants. I was charmed when she signed me an invitation to enter; which I did, doing my best to imitate her lowly bows and ceremonious, sidling manner. The tiny room was exquisitely decorated with sprays of blossom, and little fancy baskets filled with fruit, both fresh and dry, daintily hid in green leaves. These, and others filled with flowers and sweetmeats, were hung in the corners from floor to ceiling; but whether they were intended for her own use or for presents, I could not make out, as we had to talk by signs. Happily mutual comprehension can do without speech—or speech without articulation—and the lady and I became great friends. I cannot say she was so pretty as some of the younger Japanese ladies I had seen. But though she had the usual cavernous mouth of married women, her teeth being dyed black and her lips vermilion, her cheeks too liberally powdered with white, yet she had a most sweet and gentle countenance. Her hair was very elaborately dressed in Japanese fashion, stuck over with countless pins. She wore the usual wadded jacket with wide sleeves, the grotesquely tight skirt, made of the richest material, the wide coloured silk sash tied in enormous bows behind, and always carried a huge fan. She looked pensive and rather sad, but the sea-sickness she suffered from might account for this. She lay beside me all day on deck; for happily there is no "purdah," no zenana restrictions in Japan. The women are as free as ourselves. I could not talk nor read to her, but I presented her with a gospel in Japanese which I was glad to find she could read for herself. Education like everything else is making marvellous progress, and almost as much among the women as among the men. And further, we have been assured that the Christian work of women for women, which is going on so diligently in Japan, is one of the most useful and influential of the many agencies now operating so wonderfully in the awaking of the Empire.

After a short sojourn both in Kiyôto and Ôsaka, which are reached by a short line of railway from Kobé, we re-embarked in another of the Mitsu Bishi line of steamers for Nagasaki. The visits to these curious old cities were full of interest, an interest indeed peculiarly their own, but these visits must be spoken of some other time. Meanwhile we proceed on our cruise.



SEA OF JAPAN.

But who can tell all the beauty and fascination of this famous land-locked sea? No one, I think, who has sailed through its waters will deny the surpassing charm and variety of its scenery. I have been on the Rhine, and the Hudson, and the St. Lawrence, and our own Clyde; but I never looked on scenes more full of striking and varied loveliness than the Inland Sea of Japan has to show, with its myriad islands and most picturesque shores. To convince my readers that I am right in yielding the palm to this peerless sea, I will quote from the notes I made while sitting on the deck watching the shifting beautiful scenes, as they passed before our eyes.

December 4th.—We are again wonderfully favoured in the weather. It is keen and cold enough; but the sleet and stormy showers are all gone, the air is still, the sky is blue and everything is flooded with glorious sunshine. Our good ship is winding and circling through island-rocks of every conceivable form and height. Some are brown and sterile, absolutely without a leaf; others are vividly green, and some are clad with the glories of evergreen foliage from the water's edge to the summit. Now one of most curious shape is crowned by a solitary pine. It looks lonely, but very picturesque. Here are two beautiful green promontories which face each other, somewhat like the "Sutors of Cromarty," forming a gateway through which we steam our way into a wide expanse of water like a land-locked lake. The water is almost as calm as a lake, of a deep dark indigo blue, now and then crested with a soft curl of white, while the sunlight pours out of an absolutely cloudless sky, dancing and sparkling about us like myriad gems, and glorifying the broad sails of the curious craft which pass by us constantly. There are whole fleets of fishing boats, and queer-looking junks with great square sails quilted and ornamented in fantastic fashion. A large boat of odd construction has just sailed past close to us, all bamboo and thatch, like the cargo-boats on the Ganges, with cabin on the top, a funny, long pointed bow, very high square stern, and the usual huge, heavy quilted sail, giving the whole a top-heavy look.

The shores are always striking and full of beauty —sometimes near, sometimes far, as the water widens or narrows. The mountains which generally lie near along the coast vary extraordinarily. They are of every height from two or three hundred feet to as many thousand. Some lie in pretty green undulations, others in piles of massive grandeur; some are richly wooded, but generally they are rugged, pointed, serried, chasmy, volcanic, rising from the water in glorious Alpine peaks or bold headlands. There, on a sort of shelf or niche in the rocky wall of a frowning giant stands a lighthouse. What a solitary life for those who feed the light! Now a burnt and blasted cone we are just passing is smoking diligently. And away in the distance a grand group of some lofty peaks rise together, putting me in mind of "the Paps of Jura."

But here again comes the loveliest vegetation— woods full of autumnal colour in reds, russets, golden-browns, dark crimsons as lovely as a Canadian wood in "the fall," while long rows of brown villages nestle cosily in the foliage along the base of the mountains, inhabited, I suppose, by the fishing population of the coast. Some of the mountains are terraced and cultivated to the top. An occasional temple is to be seen, always most picturesquely pitched with the usual stone steps of an approach, and embowered in a grove of evergreen wood. The scene is full of changing beauty. The islands through which we steer our tortuous way seem countless, and as strange and fantastic as they are numerous. There are five close to us now which rise sheer out of the sea like so many sugar-loaves. Another is like a gigantic lion in repose, and two others are low pyramids exactly like that of Caius Cestius in Rome. A low ridge of barren rocks looks as if a few sea-billows had been suddenly arrested in their course and turned into stone, and another wee islet is like a hayrick in size and shape, clothed with grass and crowned with two pines. Sunset now approaches and adds to the beauty. The hills look more dreamy and of a darker hue. Rosy gleams light up the needle-like points, and strike on to the slopes and into the hollows, the rocky walls glowing like copper. Some bright slanting rays have just revealed an exquisite little knoll lying at the foot of a grand mountain by the sea, covered with graves. The little head-stones stand as close together as they can be, and our glasses show jars set beside some of them filled with flowers or blossom-sprays. Trees completely surround this sweet abode of the dead, spreading their branches lovingly over it, and like every graveyard we have seen in Japan, it is beautifully kept as well as beautifully situated.

I confess it makes me always inexpressibly sad to look at the graves of a heathen land. The thought comes at once of the multitude no one can number who are passing away continually into the unseen and unknown, without any knowledge of Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. "Send us teachers soon, for we are dying fast," said a woman in one of the zenanas of India.

Most sorrowfully true! The myriad heathen are dying fast, while Christian men and women neglect to tell them of the glorious Gospel which might light up the valley of the shadow of death, revealing the brightness and immortality and rest and joy of the Father's home beyond.

A bright slanting gleam had shot through the branches, tinging the green mounds with glory. I pointed it out to a missionary fellow-passenger, who exclaimed "Ah, that is like the bright gleam from the Sun of Righteousness, which is shining all over this land now, where so lately everything lay in darkness and the very shadow of death." Yes, indeed, let us thank God and be comforted; witnesses for Christ and teachers of the once hated "Jesus doctrine" are now fast multiplying in Japan.

It is now Sunday, and before dark we hope to be in the harbour of Nagasaki. This has been a lovely day, without a cloud in the serene heavens. It is even more beautiful than yesterday, from a kind of luminous haze which floats over the rocks, giving a softened purple look which greatly heightens the charm.

Early in the day we had quite a little excitement as we sailed through a very narrow strait— I might call it a chasm—flanked on either side by high precipitous cliffs. This is a feat rarely performed, being dangerous at most conditions of the tide. The captain did it to-day, but he could not have ventured a quarter-of-an-hour earlier or later. He had told us of this little channel, and he came a little while before we reached it, saying,—

"Shall we do it?"

"As you think right," said I, "we quite trust our captain!"

He bowed, and presently through we went, the two islands being so close that we could almost have laid a hand on each as our noble ship glided through, obedient to her carefully-worked helm. Afterwards, as we talked about it, sitting on the deck, I ventured to say,—

"There is another Captain it would be very safe to trust. It is well to have Him at the helm in passing through the shoals and currents of life."

"Yes," he exclaimed eagerly, "thank God, I know the Captain of our Salvation;" and then I found he had the love of Christ in his heart, and that we had much in common.

He is an American; a pleasant, energetic, intelligent man. He had asked my husband to conduct service in the morning, which was attended by all the passengers—among whom are three American missionaries and their wives—and by two or three of the officers, who are American or English.

As we draw near Nagasaki the beauty only increases. The declining sun is shedding a rich and ruddy glow over the nearer slopes, throwing other parts into deeper shadow, producing most striking contrasts. The colouring is wonderful. It deepens from gold and amber and aqua marine into shades of brilliant carmine and rich crimson. A dark thunder-cloud now hangs over some of the summits; while across the water on the other side the sunlight floods the whole scene with glory—mountain, sea, and sky glowing with golden light. How like the two sides of the moral aspect of this Empire! One, perhaps, still dark enough—which, however, I think people are apt to look at too exclusively. The other, thank God! is full of brightness and promise. Let us gaze on this with the eye of faith, and hearts full of prayer and thankful, hopeful joy.

We get no glimpse of Nagasaki until close in—the harbour is so perfectly land-locked. There is nothing to indicate the near approach to a large city. We wind our way round some capes and more islands; and it is curious to see how the richest vegetation intermingles with the stern, rugged, most uncompromising rocks. Now on our right a striking promontory towers crowned by a lighthouse, and then we come to a low green island-rock which stands sentinel-like at the entrance to the harbour.

"Look there," our captain cried, "there is what you are looking for. That is Pappenberg." And look we did, as we came at last on this historic little rock, so terribly famous in martyr-story. It has been too justly called "the Golgotha of the Martyrs." Now its shadow slept peacefully in the dark transparent water, the tide lapping its base with rhythmic sound, while the evening sun illumined the cone-like, tree-crowned top with a halo of glory. It was as if heaven's own hand was placing an aureole on its brow in memory of those, who, faithful unto death, had here yielded their lives rather than deny their faith. I need not speak of the feelings the sight of it awoke in us. I will return to its tragic story. Meanwhile, as we went tranquilly to our anchorage in the quiet lovely bay on this sweet Sabbath evening, it seemed hard to believe or realize that scenes of dark diabolic cruelty, too terrible to tell, had been enacted here.

PETER CARTWRIGHT.

THE BACKWOODS PREACHER.

I.

PETER CARTWRIGHT'S parentage and nurture were such as fitted him for a life of toil and endurance. His father served for two years as a soldier in the Revolutionary war, which secured for the United States their independence of the mother country. He was poor, and after his service with the army, gained a subsistence as a hardy settler by tilling the soil. Peter's mother was a pious woman, and a member of the American Methodist Episcopal Church. Their son, who was destined to do a most remarkable work for Christ in his native land, was born on the 1st September, 1785, in the state of Virginia. But whilst Peter was a little child, the family migrated to the then wild and thinly-peopled district of Kentucky, which about that time was added as a state to the Union.

The condition of the West at this period it is hard for us to realise. Kentucky signifies "the dark and bloody ground," and a hundred years ago it well deserved the name. Many tribes of Indians roamed over the country, which they regarded as their own property and hunting-ground. It abounded in buffalo, elk, deer, and bear. The white men were constantly settling upon the territory, and their encroachments were naturally resented by the Indians. Hence arose constant warfare, and thousands on both sides were slain, before the Indians were finally expelled or exterminated. Whilst the Cartwright family, with other emigrants, were travelling to their new home, they daily passed the dead bodies of white persons whom the Indians had murdered and scalped. One night, when Peter's father was posted as sentry, he perceived an object stealthily approaching the encampment; he fired, and found that he had shot an armed Indian. Another night seven families refused to proceed with the main body, who pushed on for safety to a fortified settlement; the Indians attacked them, and all but one were slain.

Nor were the Indians the only enemies to be encountered. The district to which the Cartwrights moved was known as "Rogues' Harbour;" and the appellation was justified, for it abounded in horse-thieves, highway-robbers, and murderers. These villains set all the law at defiance, and no man's property or person was safe. The honest citizens were driven to band themselves together for common defence, under the title of "Regulators." Rogues and regulators fought with what weapons they could lay hold of; and at last the rogues were defeated, slain, or lynched, and something like order was established.

It was a wild country, and the mode of life imposed by circumstances upon the settlers was primitive enough. There were no roads or bridle-paths, and journeys were made with pack-horses across country by the aid of natural landmarks. The rivers were crossed by no bridges; if no ford could be found, the traveller was compelled either to swim his horse across the stream, or to make use of a rough canoe. There were few inns, and what there were seem to have been places of entertainment of the very coarsest description. Men rode about the country armed, and prepared to defend themselves against violence. Churches, whether Baptist, Presbyterian, or Methodist, were few and far between; schools were of the poorest quality; newspapers there were none. Sundays were the days set apart for sports and amusements of every kind. The Cartwright family grew their own corn, and beat it with pestle in mortar into flour; killed their own meat out of the woods; tapped the maple-trees for their sugar; raised their own cotton and flax; spun and wove the material into cloth, and made their own garments. A busy, helpful, wholesome life they must have led, not wanting in adventure and amusement, and fitted to develope a strong constitution, and to call forth self-reliance and self-help.

According to his own account, Peter was a wild, wicked boy, delighting in horse-racing, card-playing, and dancing. The worst sin with which he charges himself was gambling; but it would not seem that he carried this to any great extent. His father sent him to school, but he made little progress. Though in after life he was a diligent reader, he always studied human nature and life with more success than books.

Religion seems to have shared in the unsettled state of things generally. Very High Calvinists were to be met with side by side with Arians, Socinians, and Universalists. New Lights seceded from the Presbyterians, whilst eccentric bodies, such as the Shakers, made way here and there. But the most striking manifestations of religious zeal were furnished by the camp-meetings and revivals which, when Peter was a youth, sprang up in the West. The first of these took place at Cane Ridge, and from this the flame of religious excitement spread abroad far and wide.

It was in the year 1801, when he was in his sixteenth year, that Peter Cartwright experienced the spiritual change that was to affect his whole life. After a day spent in mirth and dancing at a neighbour's wedding, he reflected upon the frivolous amusements in which he had been engaged, and was impressed with a conviction of his great sinfulness. He examined his heart, and felt himself unprepared for death and judgment. The conviction was so strong that he sold his race-horse, burned his cards, and gave himself to fasting, Bible-reading, and prayer. He passed through many distressing experiences, heard voices (as he thought) from Heaven, sought to follow the directions of Christian friends; but all to little purpose. It was whilst attending a revival meeting that, in answer to earnest prayer, his sorrow was turned into joy, and he was able to believe the gospel of Divine forgiveness and mercy. His mother and friends rejoiced with him in his newly-found peace and comfort. In June of this year he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church.

There can be no doubt of the perfect sincerity of Peter Cartwright in this experience, and his after life proved that his experience as a youth was no mere superficial and transitory impression. His nature was penetrated and quickened by the Holy Spirit applying Divine truth to his heart, and from that time his whole life was consecrated to the service of God in the kingdom of His Son the Divine Mediator Christ.

Soon after Peter Cartwright received enlightenment from above, and before he was seventeen years of age, he was licensed by the preacher in charge of the district to "exercise his gifts as an exhorter." The family removing to another part of the state, where was no regular circuit, the young convert was directed by the presiding elder to travel through the destitute regions, to hold meetings, organise classes, and in fact form a circuit. Thus were the energies of zealous Christians pressed into the service of souls. Much might be said as to the danger of employing the inexperienced and immature in such responsible undertakings; but the answer to such objections would in such places and times have been, urgent necessity. Peter went to school, with a view of improving his mind; but found the master so opposed to him as a religious young man, and a Methodist, that he gained little benefit. However, he used well the knowledge he had, travelled, organised, exhorted, prayed, and in the course of the twelvemonth succeeded in establishing a regular organisation.

Peter's success in this mission led to his being invited to consecrate himself entirely to the work of the Christian ministry. When but little over eighteen years of age, he was invited to "go on circuit," and after a hard struggle—for the prospect was in a worldly sense very gloomy—he acceded. The regular steps followed in due course; when twenty-one he was ordained deacon, and when twenty-three, an elder of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Meanwhile, Peter Cartwright "itinerated" and preached, not without many tokens of Divine approval and blessing. On account of his youth, he was known in the West as "the boy-preacher."

The work of evangelisation that was performed in the early part of the present century by the "travelling preachers" of the Methodist Episcopal Church was indeed amazing. Their resources were slender, and their educational and literary equipment would, from a worldly point of view, have been deemed insignificant. "Our ministers," said Cartwright himself, "were illiterate, and not only opposed and denounced by the Catholics, but by all Protestant Churches; we were 'everywhere spoken against,' caricatured, and misrepresented; we were without colleges and seminaries, without religious books or periodicals, without missionary funds, and almost all other religious means; our ministers did not for many years, on an average, receive over fifty dollars [i.e. £10] for a support annually, and a Methodist preacher's library almost entirely consisted of a Bible, Hymn-book, and Discipline."

And, if the advantages enjoyed by these pioneers of the Gospel were few, how great and formidable were the difficulties they encountered in the discharge of their commission! The circumstances of their ministry were such as only the bravest and most self-denying would venture to face. They went into the remotest and least civilised parts of the country, where the emigrant pitched his tent, or reared his rough log-cabin. Whether there was road or no road, the Methodist preachers travelled "from fort to fort, from camp to camp, from tent to tent, from cabin to cabin." They lodged in dwellings whose floor was mud, they ate with forked sticks and pocket-knives, they slept in the open air upon the hard ground, and were fortunate if they could stretch themselves at night upon a buffalo-skin before a cabin fire; they put their saddle-bags beneath their heads for pillows. And if such were the discomforts of their lodging, how great were the perils of their journeys! Cartwright himself testified: "We crossed creeks and large rivers without bridges or ferry-boats, often swam them on horseback, or crossed on trees that had fallen over the streams, drove our horses over, and often waded out waist-deep; and if by chance we got a 'dug-out' or canoe, to cross in ourselves and swim our horses by, it was quite a treat."

These backwoods preachers certainly fulfilled the admonition of the apostle to "endure hardness, as good soldiers of Jesus Christ." The first appointment which Peter Cartwright received after his ordination as deacon was to what he called "a poor and hard circuit" on the northern bank of the Ohio. He was greatly distressed at the prospect of difficulties before him; but his bishop encouraged him to go on in the name of the Lord, adding: "It will make a man of you." He had hard work, he said, to keep body and soul together; he met with heretics, impostors, and fanatics; but Bishop Asbury was right, for the life tried the young preacher's mettle, and by God's grace he stood the trial. The picture he draws of himself and his condition at the close of his labours in this circuit is worth quoting. "I had been from my father's house about three years; was five hundred miles from home, my horse had gone blind; my saddle was worn out; my bridle-reins had been eaten up and replaced (after a sort) at least a dozen times; and my clothes had been patched until it was difficult to detect the original. I had concluded to try to make my way home, and get another outfit. I was in Marietta, and had just seventy-five cents in my pocket." In such a plight this preacher commenced his homeward journey. Many and marvellous were the adventures encountered on the road; but friends were raised up for him, small sums of money were presented to him, and he reached home with six-and-a-quarter cents in his pocket!

This experience was an earnest of the difficulties and discomforts the Methodist evangelist was to meet with again and again during his after career. Hunting up a hardy pony, and taking with him "Bible, Hymn-book, and Discipline," he started with one text from which to preach wherever he went: "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world!" "In this way he went through storms of wind, hail, snow, and rain; climbed hills and mountains, traversed valleys, plunged through swamps, swam swollen streams, lay out all night, wet, weary, and hungry, held his horse by the bridle all night, or tied him to the limb of a tree, slept with his saddle-blanket for a bed, his saddle or saddle-bags for his pillow, and his old big coat or blanket—if he had any—for a covering."

Cartwright's Autobiography contains many incidents illustrating the hardships and dangers characteristic of the backwoods preacher's career. On his way to a quarterly meeting in Mississippi Circuit, he had on one occasion to cross a river. A tremendous rain had fallen, and the creek had overflowed its banks. The only way of crossing was by a little, old, crazy horse-boat, to enter which seemed to be to risk one's life. As Cartwright rode up, he found an old local preacher holding his horse by the bridle, who found himself in a difficulty—having no money wherewith to pay the ferry. However, upon learning that twelve-and-a-half cents would satisfy the ferryman, Cartwright found himself able to pay the charge for both. Richly was he rewarded; for, upon arriving at their destination, the old brother preached, "and the power of the Lord was present to kill and make alive."

"Perils by rivers" seem to have been among the most frequent and the most serious encountered by the preachers whose work lay in the backwoods. Cartwright was appointed to one district in Illinois, which he had to traverse four times in the year, and upon these journeys he was obliged to cross many rapid streams, mostly without bridges or ferry-boats. In such circumstances his courage and skill stood him in good stead. He looked out for a drift or a tree fallen by chance across the stream. Finding this, he would dismount, strip himself and his horse, carry his clothes and riding apparatus across on the fallen tree or drift, then return, and mount his horse, plunge in and swim over, and reaching the further side, dress himself, saddle his horse, and proceed upon his journey!

But the land had its perils and adventures as well as the water. Sometimes night would overtake the traveller in a lonesome wood. Unable to pursue his way, he would take out his flint and steel, heap some wood together and make a fire, tie up his horse, or hobble him—to prevent him from straying—and so pass the night as comfortably as he could.

After passing through such inconveniences and dangers, the hardy and cheerful preacher would fall upon his knees, offer up sincere thanks to God for His providential care and sparing mercy, and then would go upon his road "shouting and happy"!

The Long Sermon.

I'M lying on a hopeless bed, from which I know I'll never rise;
A peep of blue that fades to gray is all that's left me of the skies.
I'll never see the woods again, but daily some one brings me flowers,
And I am seldom long without a book to cheer the silent hours.

They're not so weary as you'd think; they float past like an easy dream;
You cannot think what visions rise, what pleasant thoughts upon me gleam;
Sometimes it almost seems as if great mysteries opened on my mind,
But nothing stays, except the sense that God is good and friends are kind.

It seems as if those days came back when I was but a little child—
With chubby cheeks and yellow hair, on whom each passing stranger smiled—
Who loved to go to church with Nell, my sister with the gentle face,
And fancied God's own glory made the sunlight in the dim old place!

And though the sermon might be long, Nell's arm was soft and warm and kind,
And gracious words went echoing through the chambers of my opening mind,
Till "God the Father" seemed to fill the carven roof that arched above,
While Nellie's clasp interpreted the doctrines of His faithful love.

Ah! Nellie's safe in heaven now. She went there, twice ten years ago,
And I've had many an uphill bit—temptation, struggle, doubt, and woe—
And oftentimes, when I was strong, and like for labour many a year,
I've needed help and pity more than now I need them, lying here.

While folks are tender to the babes, and to the sick and weak and old,
I sometimes think the strong and brave are left a little in the cold;
I'd like to whisper from my bed,—"When life is hard to understand,
There's nothing helps us through so well as tender clasp of loving hand."

ISABELLA FYVIE MAYO.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XIX.—ROY'S BIRTHDAY.

"WHERE'S Roy?"

"Haven't seen him this hour. I thought he was with you and Muriel. Joyce, have you seen Roy lately? Topsy—Jacko, have you?"

"I haven't—I haven't!" came from one and another, as the scattered party gathered at the rendez-vous preparatory to driving home. It seemed that no one had seen anything of Roy for some considerable time, and the elder brother's face clouded over with a sudden sense of anxiety.

Roy's birthday pic-nic had been outwardly a great success, and the young Kynastons had enjoyed it thoroughly; but Marcus had felt that all was not well with Roy, and even Muriel had begun to have a perception that there was something amiss between the brothers.

Not a single word had been exchanged upon the subject of Mrs. Stratford's strange will. Roy had come down the next morning in apparently high spirits, had chattered away ceaselessly through breakfast, and had been gay almost to boisterousness throughout the whole day. But it was this noisy hilarity which told Marcus more plainly than anything else that something was wrong. It was not Roy's way to be uproarious in his mirth, and it was not at all likely that, upon this first anniversary of his birthday after his mother's death, his spirits would be so unusually high. Another thing that Marcus noted was the boy's tacit avoidance of himself. He would ask questions or address comments to any one but him, and, what was most unusual in sweet-tempered Roy, he would set himself up in a sort of opposition to any suggestion that emanated from his brother. This was not done in a way sufficiently marked to be generally observed, but Marcus was keenly conscious of the tacit opposition, and he was aware that Muriel had observed it also, and was puzzled to account for the phase.

And now that Roy was missing, an anxious fear asserted itself in the brother's mind, which expressed itself in these words: "I hope he has not gone and hurt himself in the stalactite cave."

The stalactite cave was a place that Roy had expressed a great wish to explore, but had been deterred by Marcus, who had ascertained that it was in a very unsafe condition, and that, owing to continual falls of heavy pieces of rock, it had been abandoned of late, as a place dangerous for visitors and tourists to enter.

Roy had been very persistent about it, however, and had only been silenced by being reminded that it would be very wrong to lead into danger the young companions entrusted to their care. Mrs. Kynaston had, at the last, been debarred from joining the party, and they were doubly responsible in her absence for the safety of her children.

Roy had apparently acquiesced in this verdict, but there had been a mutinous look on his face that recurred to his brother's memory now, and filled him with undefined anxiety. His exclamation had been heard only by Muriel, but as the party scattered right and left to search for the missing member, his steps were turned at once towards the entrance of the cave, and after a moment's hesitation Muriel followed him. The cave was not far distant, and no lights were required, as there were several fissures in the roof and sides; but when Marcus saw who was his companion, he motioned her back with a smile.

"Wait here, please, unless I call to you. I know the cavern well; I used often to come here when I was a boy. I shall soon find him if he is here. It is not a very extensive place."

Marcus went forward into the cold, dim cave, treading cautiously, and looking sharply about him. He had a presentiment of evil upon him; he felt certain that Roy was here, and that some harm had befallen him. The boy was in just that state of restless excitement that would lead him to set scruples of prudence and obedience at defiance, and it was perfectly evident that he had felt deeply injured by the discovery yesterday afforded him. It was hardly to be wondered at, perhaps, but Marcus felt that it was hard upon him, more especially as he could not feel justified, remembering his step-mother's earnest wishes on the subject, to explain to Roy the motives of love and care for his welfare that had prompted her to act in a way that looked so strange.

He thought of all this, as he cautiously pursued his way among the scattered fragments of rock, that showed only too plainly in what an unsafe condition the cave now was. He saw nothing of Roy, however, and was beginning to hope his fear unfounded, when the sound of a stifled groan made him start and turn quickly round. The sound seemed to proceed from a dark recess not very far from the entrance. Retracing his steps, and picking his way more carefully still as the gloom increased, Marcus presently became aware of a prostrate figure extended upon the hard ground, and, bending anxiously over it, saw that this was indeed none other than Roy.

The boy's face was deathly, and his eyes were fast closed; his hands were cold and pulseless, and his condition appeared exceedingly alarming. It was evident that he had been knocked down and stunned by a fall of rock, and a heavy stone lay upon his foot and pinned him where he fell.

Marcus lifted this off with difficulty, and Roy moaned and shrank a little, though without any real consciousness. Then, by a great exertion of his unusual physical strength, Marcus lifted the lad bodily in his arms, and carried him into the warmer, purer atmosphere without.

Muriel uttered a startled exclamation as she saw him emerge; but her quiet presence of mind did not desert her. She sat down on the short grass, and took Roy's head upon her lap, whilst Marcus cut away the boot from the swollen foot, and bound it up with his handkerchief and her scarf, both dipped in the cold water from one of the cave's pools. Then, whilst Muriel bathed the boy's pale brow and chafed the icy hands, Marcus strode rapidly away, to return quickly with some brandy he had obtained, a little of which, forced between the clenched teeth, did much to bring back consciousness.

Roy's eyes opened at last, and he looked round him in vague bewilderment.

"What is it?" he asked faintly.

"You have hurt yourself, Roy," answered Muriel; "but you are better now. Don't try to talk too much. You will feel stronger by-and-by."

The warm sunlight was doing its work; but the boy had lain too long in the cold, damp cave not to be thoroughly chilled. He still shivered, and his lips were blue.

"I don't understand," he said, bewildered and a little impatient. "Where are we?"

"We are at your birthday pic-nic, Roy; but you have ended the day badly for yourself. Don't you remember now?"

His face changed somewhat; a faint flush rose in his pale cheek.

"I think I do—it's my birthday, of course. I went into that cave. Some stones fell down—I remember that. I don't remember anything else. Who found me? Who brought me out? I don't understand."

"Marcus did that," answered Muriel; "he fancied, when you did not come back, that you might be there. Does your foot hurt you much now, Roy?"

But Roy did not answer; his eyes were lifted to his brother's face, and there was a look in them that Marcus could not read. It was not defiance, but it was not the old trust he had been used to see there. It seemed as if some shadow of mistrust, or of reproach, shone in them, which he could neither combat, at this moment, nor explain away. Marcus addressed himself to Muriel:

"If you will wait here for a short time, I will get the rest of the party packed off home in the waggonette, and tell them to leave word at Lee's what has happened, that he may be at the Hermitage by the time we arrive; and we will drive the boy home in the landau. I will have it brought down as near as possible to this place. You will not be afraid to be left with him for a short time?"

"No, not at all. He is better now." And Marcus strode away rapidly to make the proposed arrangements. Roy's eyes, which had closed, opened again, as he heard the retreating footsteps. Muriel noticed the unusual expression on his face, and asked: "What is it, Roy?"

His answer startled her a good deal.

"Why did he come after me into that cave? I thought it was all over with me then, and it would have been much better so."

"Do you know what you are saying, Roy?"

"Of course I do. I am quite sane. I say it would be better to die at once than to outlive all one's confidence in love and honour and generous feeling—even one's mother's love;"—the last words were spoken with something of a strangled sob.

Muriel's eyes dilated with wonder; she could not imagine what had got into Roy's head; but she saw that he was troubled, and that much of bitterness mingled with his sorrow.

"I am sure you need never doubt that, Roy," she said gently. "I do not think any son was ever better loved than you: and I am certain that in Marcus you will find the best of brothers. What is the matter, Roy?" for she saw the change in his face and could in no way account for it. Her suspicion that there had been a somewhat serious collision of wills between the brothers was corroborated. She could not tell in the least what it had been about, nor who was likely to have been in the right; but, fond as she was of Roy, she had greater confidence in Marcus, and she was inclined to trust the soundness of his judgment. But Roy was unhappy as well as in pain. She must find something comforting to say to him. She looked down at him, smoothing away the hair from his brow.

"Roy, dear," she said gently, "there is always somebody to turn to, even when everything else seems to fail. You need never feel quite alone, whatever happens."

His eyes met hers wistfully.

"That's what people say," he answered "but it doesn't seem real to me. It is Marcus I want. I always trusted him so."

"And I am sure you may trust him still, Roy, I wish you could have heard how he has been talking of you to-day. I know something has happened to bring a cloud between you, but it will be your fault, not his, if it is not driven away. Haven't we agreed so many, many times that it is always so much better and nobler to forgive and forget, even if we do sometimes seem to be injured by other people?"

Something of the old look came back to Roy's face.

"Why, so we have," he said, "I suppose it is always best. I will try, Muriel, indeed I will. It isn't that I mind much—for myself—but I do so hate the thought that he tried to get it arranged so, and wanted to keep me in the dark, as if he were ashamed."

"Then you had better not think that any more, Roy. Keep all those ugly black thoughts out of the way; don't let them get hold of you at all. I don't believe they can be true, and they will hurt you much more than they can hurt anybody else."

Roy's eyes were closed in weariness and pain, but he looked more natural again.

"I'll try and remember that," he said. "Thank you, Muriel,"

CHAPTER XX.—ANXIOUS DAYS.

"No, there are no bones broken, strange to say, considering the size of the stone; but it's only fair to tell you that the injuries are pretty severe, and that the absence of fracture is not altogether a matter for congratulation. Bruised bones and crushed tissues make a case tedious and difficult; but he is young and strong and healthy, and has everything in his favour. It is likely to be rather a long business, I'm afraid, and boys find it hard work to keep quiet for weeks together; but you must do what you can to cheer him up, and keep him amused, and we will hope that time will do its work quickly."

This was the verdict of the young surgeon they had called in to see Roy. Frank Lee was a native of Market Drayton, and had also been at school with Marcus, so that a pleasant intimacy existed between the two young men, and Roy too knew the doctor well.

"I don't think Roy has ever been ill in his life. He will not find inactivity very congenial. He has a very mercurial temperament."

"He must learn to curb it for a time. That foot will stand no liberties for some weeks to come, and the chill he has taken lying out in that cold cave has done him no good. How did it happen? It was an odd freak of his to venture in; but then boys are so foolhardy!"

"I have not been able to ask him any questions," answered Marcus a little evasively. "I found him quite by chance, missing him from the party, and knowing that he had a great fancy for exploring that cave. Evidently a fall of rock took place, and he was knocked down and pinned by the foot."

"Well, he has been lucky to get off as well as he has done. I hope he will sleep now. I shall look in early to-morrow. I don't think, so far, there is anything to be uneasy about."

Marcus, however, was uneasy, and his uneasiness increased as the night went on. He did not attempt to go to bed himself; but sat by Roy's side, noting how restless and troubled was the lad's sleep, and how often his face was contracted by pain as the unconscious movements disturbed the injured foot.

Early in the morning Roy woke, not refreshed, but rather exhausted by the sleep that had been full of feverish dreams and fancies. He looked round in a feeble bewildered fashion, and when Marcus bent over him he caught at his hand as a drowning man clutches at a saving support.

"You are here!" he said, with a sort of gasp of relief. "Where are we?"

"At home," answered Marcus, with a smile, "where else should we be?"

"I thought I was in that cave again. I thought I hated every one, and that every one had left me alone to die there. I went there in anger and defiance—I thought some one said I should stay there always. Did you find me, Marcus? Did you care to come and look for me? I didn't deserve that you should. I thought such thoughts! Oh my foot!"

He went deadly white, and the dew stood on his brow. Marcus bathed his face and hands, and gave him stimulant, but the faintness was obstinate and would not yield for long, and at length he only seemed relieved by resting his head against Marcus' shoulder, as his brother sat on the bed supporting him. His breathing seemed oppressed and difficult, he coughed a little from time to time, and once spoke of pain in his side.

"You are very good to me, Marcus," he said once. "Are you not angry with me?"

"Why should I be angry, Roy?"

He was silent for a moment, and then said faintly, and wearily, "I disobeyed you. I behaved badly. I was angry myself. Don't be angry, if you can help it, please Marcus, and don't leave me alone. There is nobody but you, now."

"I won't leave you, my dear boy; and you must not talk or think any more. You must just keep quiet and rest, and let me think for you."

Roy was too spent to say more, but that there was some tension of mind Marcus could not doubt. He could not bear his brother out of his sight for an instant. It seemed as if he feared that some hidden foe was lurking nigh at hand, ready to spring out upon him the moment that Marcus should be away.

This anxious restlessness was very much against him, and by the evening he was in a high fever. The chill taken the previous evening had settled upon the lungs, both of which were slightly congested, and young Lee began to look very anxious about his patient.

For several days Roy was exceedingly ill, and if not in actual danger, yet so near to danger that the anxiety was almost the same. There was evidently some weight upon the boy's mind that was a good deal against him. Nobody quite knew what it was, but it seemed chiefly to take the form of a vague haunting fear that could only be dispelled by the close presence of Marcus. They tried in vain to get to the bottom of the trouble and dispel it, and Marcus would have done much to understand fully the workings of his brother's mind. Jealousy of, or resentment towards himself, there was certainly none left, and yet the strain and tension of mind continued as before. His singular fear of being left alone was his most marked characteristic, and Marcus was at a loss to understand or explain this, it was so unlike the boy's habitual mood. His great comfort, however, was that Roy's dependent, exacting affection never changed or wavered. Whatever else changed, whoever else went or came, Roy heeded it not so long as Marcus was with him, and Marcus was too glad of this confidence and love to resent in the least the tax upon his time and energy. So long as Roy wanted him, so long he was content to stay, and he quickly developed into an excellent nurse.

Whether or not Roy was aware of his own danger, nobody could tell, for he spoke but little, and was too feverish for his words to carry much weight. But there came a night when the fever abated, when some calm natural sleep was obtained, and Marcus, who was as usual taking the watch, felt pretty certain that the crisis had passed, and that a turn for the better had been taken.

Towards morning Roy wakened—wakened with a more natural look, and the faint smile that shone out of his eyes had in it none of the former pained, strained expression, but was peaceful and calm.

"You are there, Marcus; you are always there. It is very good of you."

"Nonsense, Roy. I am only too glad to be anywhere to see you looking better."

"Am I better?" asked Roy. "I thought, perhaps, I was going to die."

"I think you are better, Roy. But don't talk too much; you must rest instead."

"I am glad I am better," said the boy, with brightening eyes. "I do not want to die yet, Marcus. I do not want to leave you. Death is terrible, I think."

"And yet it is sometimes well to try and face the thought of it, and the life it leads to," said Marcus, with grave gentleness. "And your mother would be waiting for you there. If the call came, Roy, you would be ready?"

But the boy shook his head.

"I don't think so. I don't think I understand what people mean by being ready. I should like to live in a world where death never came."

"So we shall some day, I trust, Roy. But the gate of death stands between us and that land."

Roy looked at him earnestly, intently.

"Hold my hand," he said, as he had said so many times before. "I feel safe when you are with me; never without you."

Marcus paused awhile before speaking. His reserve was too ingrained to be easily overcome, but he felt that the charge laid upon him must not be broken. He must speak sometimes, and this was an opportunity that should not be lost.

"Roy," he said, in the same very quiet and gentle way, "you must learn to trust in something stronger and higher and holier than any help I can give you. What I can do for you, God knows I will most gladly and thankfully perform; but it is not in my help you must trust alone. If you fear some danger or temptation, as I sometimes think you do, my help will prove of very little avail. But there is Another who will always listen to your voice and stretch out His arm to save and succour. Roy, it is in God you must put your trust, if ever you fear for yourself or for the future."

Roy looked at him long and earnestly, with a sort of strange sadness.

"I know that is what people say, but I cannot understand it."

"Have you ever asked that help, Roy, in your time of need?"

The boy was silent.

"If you have not asked, how can you expect to receive? Roy, my dear boy, you are not fit for much talking, and I am not a man of many words. But listen now to a few words of personal experience, which I can vouch for as my own. God never turns a deaf ear to us in our need, if we will but approach Him as He has bidden us, through the merits and mediation of His Son, our Lord. When you are in difficulty, in doubt, in trouble, in perplexity, go to Him for aid and help. Think first of Him, turn first to Him, and let all other aid be secondary. Our fellow-men are often very near and dear to us, and a great source of strength and comfort; yet they may change or leave us, or fail us in our hour of need, but God's words cannot fail, nor His great love for us, and His words are 'Come unto Me.'"

Marcus stopped short, for Roy was looking weary—weary and sad and bewildered.

"I know," he said; "thank you for telling me again. Mother said just the same. I know it's all true, but it doesn't seem any good to me."

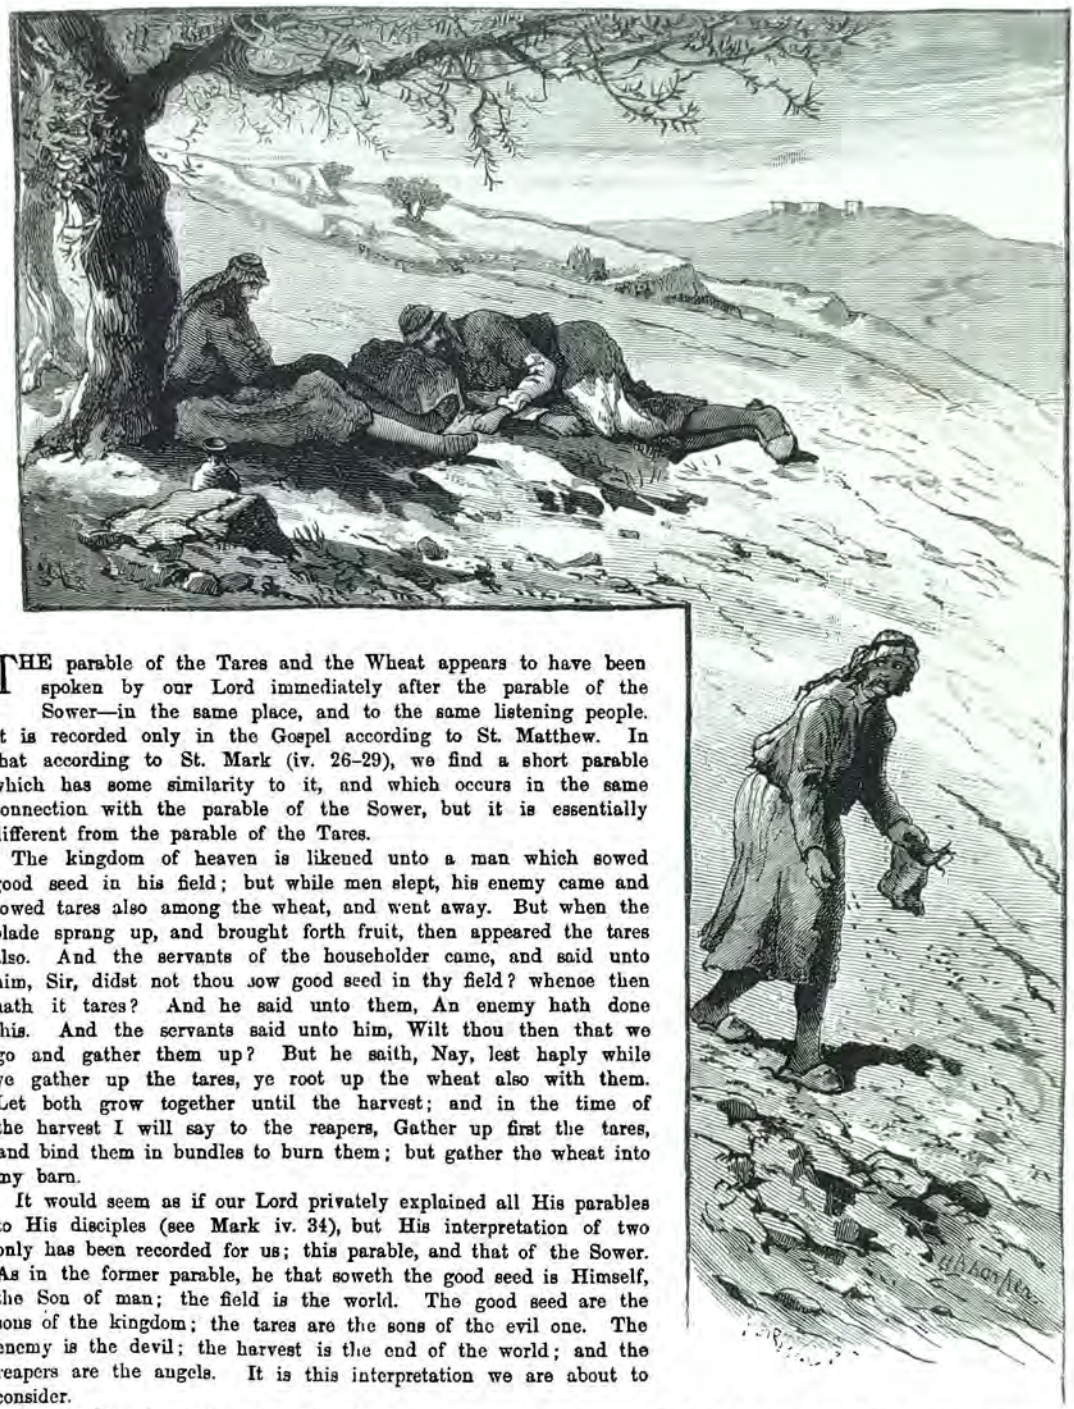
Marcus smiled, with a light in his eyes that told a tale of its own.

"Wait till your hour of need really comes, Roy," he said, "and then you will find out whether or not it is real."

THE PARABLES OF OUR LORD.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

III.—THE PARABLE OF THE TARES AND THE WHEAT.—Matt. xiii. 24–30, 37–43.



THE parable of the Tares and the Wheat appears to have been spoken by our Lord immediately after the parable of the Sower—in the same place, and to the same listening people. It is recorded only in the Gospel according to St. Matthew. In that according to St. Mark (iv. 26–29), we find a short parable which has some similarity to it, and which occurs in the same connection with the parable of the Sower, but it is essentially different from the parable of the Tares.

The kingdom of heaven is likened unto a man which sowed good seed in his field; but while men slept, his enemy came and sowed tares also among the wheat, and went away. But when the blade sprang up, and brought forth fruit, then appeared the tares also. And the servants of the householder came, and said unto him, Sir, didst not thou sow good seed in thy field? whence then hath it tares? And he said unto them, An enemy hath done this. And the servants said unto him, Wilt thou then that we go and gather them up? But he saith, Nay, lest haply while ye gather up the tares, ye root up the wheat also with them. Let both grow together until the harvest; and in the time of the harvest I will say to the reapers, Gather up first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them; but gather the wheat into my barn.

It would seem as if our Lord privately explained all His parables to His disciples (see Mark iv. 34), but His interpretation of two only has been recorded for us; this parable, and that of the Sower. As in the former parable, he that soweth the good seed is Himself, the Son of man; the field is the world. The good seed are the sons of the kingdom; the tares are the sons of the evil one. The enemy is the devil; the harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. It is this interpretation we are about to consider.

Our Lord is the author and giver of all that is good—not in one land, or in many lands, but throughout all the world; He has no smaller field in which He sows His good seed. In every country, every nation, and every age, all that has been good has been His work, who is at once the Son of God and the Son of man. He is "the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." There is not one soul that comes into the world which has not at one time or another a wish to be good and happy—to be otherwise than wicked and miserable.

There is a discontent with sin, which comes from heaven, and is the good seed which Jesus Christ, by His Spirit, sows in our hearts. To be friends with God, to feel that He is indeed our Father—that is what we all, more or less, long for, some of us with a deep, unutterable longing. Jesus Christ sows these seeds in our hearts, and if they grow unchecked, they will spring up into eternal life. Christ could not be satisfied if any soul of man was left with no seed of eternal life implanted in it. The world is His field.

"The good seed, then, are the sons of the kingdom," He says, in His interpretation of the parable. These are they who, as in the parable of the Sower, receive His words into honest and good hearts, and understand it, and bring forth fruit with patience. In all nations, and in all ages, there are those who believe in God, and diligently seek Him. Peter, who was one of our Lord's closest followers, and who heard far more of His teaching than has been recorded for us, says, "Of a truth, God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness is accepted with Him." The kingdom of heaven is wider and greater than the world, and the sons of the kingdom may be found even in the darkest corners of the earth.

The tares are the sons of the wicked one. There is a tall weed growing in our hedgerows and fields called darnel, which springs up with a long stalk, and an ear formed at the end of it, resembling corn so closely that it can only be distinguished from it, in its earlier stages of growth, by a trained and practised eye. By the time the difference is seen, its roots are intertwined with those of the corn, and it is then impossible to weed it out. The seeds of the darnel, if they get ground into meal, are nauseous and harmful, and even poisonous, if there is much of it. Shakspear knew its nauseous quality.

"Want ye corn for bread?
'Twas full of darnel; do you like the taste?"

The author of "The Land and the Book" says, "Where the grain has headed out, the tares have done the same, and then a child cannot mistake them for wheat or barley; but where both are less developed, the closest scrutiny will often fail to detect them. I cannot do it at all with any confidence. Even the farmers do not attempt to separate them. They would not only mistake good grain for them, but very commonly the roots of the two are so intertwined that it is impossible to separate them."

Exactly as the tares and the wheat grow together in a corn-field—so intertwined that it is impossible to separate them—so do the children of God live everywhere intermingled with the children of this world. They have the same relationships to fill, the same work to do. In a great measure they must live the same kind of life. Every attempt that has been made to separate the followers of Christ from the outer world has resulted in failure. Sometimes the attempt has been made to form a small, select circle, "a little spot of heavenly ground," where none should be admitted who were not true and simple Christians; but immediately the tares spring up, and before long there must be a fresh weeding-out, and a smaller circle made. At other times the weeding-out is tried on a large scale, and persecution arises as a means of clearing Christ's kingdom from offences; and lo! the ground of the persecutors is itself filled with tares, and amongst the persecuted, good corn is plucked up with the weeds. It is not granted to Christ's servants to distinguish the darnel from the wheat until it brings forth its fruit; only His eye can discern the difference from the beginning. When we say to Him, "Wilt thou that we go and gather up the tares?" He answers, "Nay, lest haply whilst ye gather up the tares, ye root up the wheat also. Let both grow together until the harvest."

The enemy is the devil. This word devil means "one who sets at variance," or a slanderer; an enemy who sets friends at variance by telling lies to each of the other. God is the Father of all; but how many men think of Him only as an angry and revengeful Judge! God is always being slandered to us, and we are set at variance against Him; but we cannot be slandered to Him, or He set against us, because He is perfect wisdom and perfect love. Yet there is no question as to the eternal enmity that exists between good and evil, righteousness and iniquity. There is no doubt, also, that we must belong to one kingdom or the other; we cannot be children of light and children of darkness.

The poisonous seed sown by the enemy was altogether different from the good seed sown by the owner of the field. Tares and wheat are suffered to grow together until the harvest; but then the separation is made, and the tares are cast into a furnace of fire, by which means only is their power to do mischief, by shedding more seed, effectually destroyed. The wicked may be suffered to do evil in this world, but there shall be no more such liberty for sin in the world to come.

The harvest is the end of the world, or the "consummation of the age," as the new version of the Bible puts it, in the margin. What is this consummation of the age? We do not know. The disciples expected it in their time, and were made strong and glad by the hope of it. Through all the centuries since, the people of God have been longing for it. Foolish and false predictions are constantly being made of it. But one thing is true and certain; the end of the world comes to each one of us separately when we die. There is one sure, inevitable harvest. Death, the stern, strong angel of God, puts in his sickle every day into the field of the earth, and gathers out of it all things that offend, and them that do iniquity, and the righteous also. In the day of harvest even a child can see the difference between tares and wheat; and at the hour of death no mistake will be possible. "Many will say to Me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in Thy name, and in Thy name have cast out devils, and in Thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you; depart from Me, ye that work iniquity."

But cannot we make a more personal application of this parable? Each of us is a little world, containing all possibilities of good and evil. Christ is sowing good seed in our hearts, which may bring forth fruit a hundredfold. But while we sleep, and are not on the watch, an enemy is sowing tares, which will bear fruit unto death. Christ says, "Do unto all men as ye would they should do unto you"—a seed which would bring to pass such a state of peace and prosperity and happiness as the world has never yet dreamed of. The enemy within us whispers, "Take care of yourself"—that seed from which has sprung all the misery and poverty and drunkenness we see amongst us at this time. Christ says, "When thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth." The enemy brings us public subscription-lists, and tempts us to give because our neighbour gives, or as much as he gives. Christ says, "When ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do, for they think they shall be heard for their much speaking." The enemy teaches us that God is to be reached by long prayers, or by the same prayers said over and over again. Christ says, "Ye cannot serve God and mammon." The enemy hints that we must make the best of both worlds, and especially make sure of this. Good and evil are so intermingled that it is difficult to separate them; and we may so live, whilst following the maxims of this world, that even the servants of God may look upon us as a fellow-servant. God alone sees whether our hearts are bringing forth fruit unto eternal life, or poisonous weeds which tend unto death.

To this parable our Lord adds the solemn charge, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." There were many persons in the crowd of people gathered about Him whose hearts were so filled with tares that there was no place left for the good seed to grow. These were the Pharisees, whose false zeal for the worship of God was soon to develop a murderous hatred of the Son of God; the scribes, who were constantly studying the letter of God's word, but whose hearts were hardened against its spiritual meaning; the people, listening gladly to Christ's teaching, but ready to forsake Him if He said anything to offend them; Judas, who was following Him through years of trial and danger, only to betray Him at last. To all of these He cried, as if He would arouse them to a sense of their great peril, "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear!"

SANTA LUCIA.

A STORY OF CORSICA.

CHAPTER II.—THE RIVALS.

EVERY year hundreds of tourists or invalids visit Corsica, and most of them stay at Ajaccio.

It is for their sake that a whole faubourg has sprung up in Ajaccio, handsome streets, with elegant houses, and hotels, and an English church, as pretty as any in England, in an exquisite parterre of flowers, where the geraniums grow as tall as laburnum or lilac-trees.

Here, at Ajaccio, every winter there is a colony of Britishers, and of Swedes and Germans.

But these birds of passage, which come with the quails in October, and return North with these birds in May, seldom see much of the interior of the island.

The picturesque villages perched high up on the mountain crags are seldom visited. Some of these villages are, indeed, only accessible by mule-paths, and those of the roughest.

The prettiest spots in Corsica, and those from which the finest views may be had, can only be reached by riding or walking up roughly-hewn paths, winding round and round, and over mountain sides where the track is at times scarcely visible. For whole hours, too, one may ride without meeting a single person of whom to ask whether the break-neck path he has chosen is leading him in the direction he desires.

Perched high on a rocky crag, some miles from Corte, in the centre of Corsica, is the village of Santa Lucia. A tortuous mule-path leads to it from the ravine below, but there is also a carriage-road by way of Tralonca. Toiling up this road one warm, sunny afternoon in December, trudged a man with a heavy havre-sac on his back.

He was a man of medium height, and almost delicate-looking frame. Yet a tough, wiry man, who had gone through many battles. For over twenty years he had been a soldier, fighting for the independence of Italy.

At the age of forty-eight he had begun a life of equal hardship, as a colporteur in Corsica. In his havre-sac he carried portions of the Scriptures—of the Old and New Testament. He journeyed alone, without arms, amongst a population little disposed to be friendly to Italians, much less to Italian Protestants. But he was brave.

Never, as a soldier, had he to face more dangers or hardships than in Corsica. For the Corsican is often savagely disposed to outsiders of a race or religion different to his own; and several times the colporteur had a knife held to his breast, and violent hands laid on him.

But he went on calmly, from village to village, and did his duty, and sold his Scripture portions where he could; and often it happened that, when an enemy set on him to harm him, a friend came forward unexpectedly to take his part.

The colporteur wearily approached Santa Lucia. As he came near the village, there was a cry raised, "U Protestante!"—the Protestant!

He was known in the island. In a few minutes a band of boys was on the rocks throwing stones at him.

Suddenly Padre Rocca appeared.

"What does this mean?" asked the village priest.

"È u Protestante!"—It is the Protestant, sang out the boys. (The Corsicans say "u" for the article—il—the).

"Basta!" said the priest, and he drove the boys away. He was not exactly angry with them for throwing the stones.

He liked to encourage a feeling of hostility to foreign religious propaganda. But he was not a brute, to look on and see a defenceless man stoned. So he went up to the colporteur, and spoke civilly to him, and looked at his books; but he said, "It is no good your trying to sell any here!" and went away.

Yet the colporteur did sell several of his books, and that evening quite a number of villagers met at one of the humble houses to hear the Scriptures read, and discussed the merits of the Protestant books. Others spoke of the colporteur as of a wolf; as in bygone times Corsicans spoke of the seafaring marauders who came to the island in pirate-ships and made raids upon their coasts, scaling the heights to the villages, to rob and plunder.

Pietro Rocco, who preached the Bambino sermon at Palermo, was the nephew of Padre Rocca. The old Colonel, his grandfather, had two sons, the elder of whom had become priest of this village, while the younger had served in the merchant navy, and, as captain of a ship, had perished in a storm, with Pietro's mother.

Pietro, now just twenty years old, had come to Santa Lucia to spend the festive season with his uncle and Frida, who, since the Colonel's death, had kept house for her brother.

As Padre Rocca left the colporteur, he met his nephew.

"Well, Pietro, are you in better spirits?"

"No, uncle! I am sure I have mistaken my career. I cannot be an ecclesiastic!"

"You are in love, that is all! That will pass off. Reflection and devotion will bring you to a sense of something loftier in your destiny!"

"I do not think so. I am not ascetic nor contemplative. I shall never be able to support the loneliness of life which you would have me accept. You have a sister to be your companion; I feel that I, too, need a companion, and the ties of kinship. I must marry, and find comfort in the home-life my father and grandfather enjoyed before me. They have left me the fortune to do so."

"Of course, I would not urge you to act against your conscience, but I do not think Santa Lucia will ever be your wife, or any man's. It is true that she likes you, but it is as one devoted to the church. Her calling is religion; I am persuaded of it. Her name is not in vain Santa Lucia!"

"Then I shall never marry! But I do not think with you. Santa Lucia is young, and almost as enthusiastic as when she rushed out from the school-ranks at Palermo and kissed me, to the amazement of the sisters! I can wait."

So saying, they came to the little square in front of the church with its whitewashed steeple. Here, lounging, or standing up against the walls of the houses, were the villagers. Now and then a man crossed the square, driving goats before him; or bare-footed girls or old women passed by, with faggots of firewood on their heads.

On the steps of the church were seated a few young women and young men.

Towards one of these, a handsome, dark youth, Pietro Rocca went, and sat down by his side. Pietro, whose mother had been a Swedish lady, had his mother's soft blue eyes and fair hair. There was a great contrast between the youths. Pietro was the taller, but he was slender and delicate. Enrico Catalan, by whose side he had seated himself, was of Spanish descent, but was, in appearance, a regular Corsican, with black hair and thick eyebrows, black eyes, and swarthy skin, robust and sturdy-looking.

Not far from the young men, there sat on the steps of the church a young woman, whose pale, thin features, and thin white hands were noticeable. In her wan face there was a meaningless expression. Looking towards her, Pietro said: "Margherita has been much better again of late."

"Yes, since Santa Lucia came here. Santa Lucia does for her what no one else here ever did."

"How long is it since Margherita lost her reason?"

"Six years!"

"Tell me how it happened!"

"She had a lover, a good sort of a fellow who drove the mail-coach from Corte to Ajaccio. This man loved her in vain; she would not look at him. In the meantime Margherita wasted her affections upon a Tralonca goat-herdsman, a desperate brute. But one day, Margherita found out that the Tralonca man was playing her false, and she looked then more favourably at the coach-driver.

"Then the Tralonca man became jealous, and vowed to be revenged. A half growled threat which escaped him made Margherita fear for the coach-driver's life, and she set out for Corte to warn him. He had already started for Ajaccio. She followed. At La Foce, half-way on the top of the mountain, she heard that the coach-driver would be there on his return journey between midnight and one o'clock of the next morning.

"It was a beautiful moonlight night, and she determined to go on to meet the coach-driver; she was so anxious for his safety, so she told the gendarmes of La Foce. They laughed at her, when she left them. An hour and a half later, she returned to their station, frantic, her hair and attire in disorder, her reason gone.

"The gendarmes understood that something disastrous had happened; and two of their number rode off to ascertain what. They came back with the appalling news, that the coach, with its driver and passengers, had gone to the bottom of the precipice that lies on the one side of the La Foce high-road.

"The coach had evidently been wrecked intentionally, for the road had been torn up, and a heavy crowbar lay imbedded in the soil. Since then, the Tralonca man has been missing."

"It is a terrible story! Why should this man have been so hateful?"

"Why, indeed?" replied young Catalan; but there was not a true ring to his voice, and his face bore a look which gave the lie to his words.

And then at the sound of his voice, and of his words, "Why indeed!" Margherita raised her head, came close to the youths, looked Enrico in the face, repeated his words, and uttered one of those hideous laughs which are frequently the outburst of the insane.

Pietro, looking at Enrico, saw that look in his face which belied his words, and for the first time understood that this was a nature at variance with his own: and a pained expression came over his own countenance.

At this moment, a beautiful girl, with her missal in her hand, approached the young men.

"Why, how gloomy you are both looking! You do not seem to be basking in the sunbeams."

"Oh! Pietro, fie! Enrico, what does this mean?"

Pietro, rising, replied, "You are right, Santa Lucia, we should be happier. But we were speaking about poor Margherita, and her sad experiences."

Santa Lucia passed on, but the frown on Enrico's face grew darker as he saw Pietro enter the church by her side.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VII.

Who lulled the man who loved her to repose,
Then stole his strength and sold him to his foes?
A spy from Ephraim's tribe: his honoured name
Before and after is not spelt the same?
Before what idol did a captain dare
To bow himself, but pay no worship there?
A Galilean town of which we know
Nothing but unrepented sin, and woe?
Whose house was Elah in when basely slain?
(In drunkenness he closed his wicked reign.)
Where did the sacred ark of God abide
When little Samuel served at Eli's side?

The final letters and initials tell
Two women's names who used their needles well:
One clothed the poor, and won their love and tears,
And one a prophet clothed in early years. L. T.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. II.

Take away eight of the words in this figure, and so arrange the others as to form a prayer of David's.

Me	For	On	O
Put	Ever	Thee	Do
I	Preserve	My	More
In	Not	Trust	Ever
God	Cry	Distrust	Lord

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VI.—p. 144.—AMALEK.—Num. xxiv. 20; Ex. xvii. 8.—BALAAM.—Num. xxii. 12, 21, 22, 32, 33.

A-binada-b	1 Sam. xvii. 8; xviii. 1; xxxi. 2.
M-elit-a	Acts xxviii. 1, 2.
A-drie-l	1 Sam. xviii. 17–19.
L-ydd-a	Acts ix. 32–34.
E-zr-a	Ezra viii. 22.
K-irjath-jeari-m . .	1 Sam. vii. 1–3.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXI.—CONVALESCENCE.

"DO YOU BELIEVE IN GOD, FATHER?" SAID JOAN.

AFTER this, Roy's recovery, though slow, might be said to be tolerably sure. He took a turn for the better that night, and made progress each day afterwards. He had no return of fever, and the warm weather was all in his favour. Frank Lee, who had renewed with zest his old friendship with Marcus, and took a more than strictly professional interest in his patient, warned the elder brother that the attack on the lungs would very likely necessitate unusual care of the boy during the ensuing winter, as he would probably be susceptible to cold for some time to come; yet, for the present, the mischief was over, and but that his foot kept him a prisoner, Roy might soon have been up and about.

The foot was an awkward piece of business, as Mr. Lee had prophesied from the first. It was never very bad; but it was terribly tedious in recovery, and was a constant source of wearying pain, that seemed really more trying than acute suffering for a briefer space. Roy tried to be patient, and his sweet temper and naturally even spirits, stood him in good stead; whilst Marcus strained every nerve to cheer him up, and devise amusement and variety for him. But he suffered for lack of his customary exercise, and began to look white and thin; and, though able to lie upon a sofa by day in a sort of demi-toilette, there was no talk as yet of his getting up and downstairs, and the improvement in the state of the foot was so very slow as to be almost imperceptible, and proportionately disheartening.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

It was with some dismay and annoyance, therefore, just at this juncture, that Marcus received intelligence of business that would take him from home for some little time, and would probably involve a journey to St. Petersburg.

He had resigned his appointment at the embassy in some haste, a few months previously, owing to Mrs. Stratford's rapidly failing health and urgent desire for his return. He had been aware then that he might possibly be required to return later on, to conclude some diplomatic negotiation in which he had been the main agent, and in which he had shown peculiar capacity and finesse. He had latterly hoped, however, that he could do all that was necessary by correspondence; but some difficulty had now arisen, and it was pretty evident to him that he should in honour be bound to go. The ambassador, to whom he was much indebted for many acts of kindness, made a great point of his return for a brief space, and Marcus soon saw that it was inevitable.

He was particularly sorry that it should happen just at this time. Roy was not fit to leave home for a visit to any friends, however kind and hospitable; and yet it was very hard to leave him all alone in his present state. He hardly knew how to mention the matter to the boy; but unexpected help came from Mrs. Kynaston, to whom he first broached the subject, asking her advice in his perplexity.

She at once propounded a new scheme. Vincent was coming home very soon—Roy's special chum and chosen comrade. This visit was quite unexpected—a sort of extra holiday upon which none of them had reckoned. If Marcus approved of it, he should stay with Roy at the Hermitage. He could see almost as much of the home party there, as if he were actually with them, and his endless flow of high spirits would make the house lively for the invalid. The brothers and sisters would be always backwards and forwards, and Roy would be quite a centre of gaiety.

Marcus was delighted with the idea, thanked Mrs. Kynaston most warmly for her goodness in sparing the sailor boy to his brother, and walked home with a lightened heart to break the news he had so far kept to himself.

Roy was lying on the sofa in the pleasant oriel window of his airy bedroom, and he greeted Marcus with one of his eager smiles of welcome. He had grown less exacting towards his brother since the fever had left him, and had not spoken again of his fear of being left alone; but it was always plain how much he clung to Marcus, how glad he was to see him after any brief absence, and how reluctantly he let him go again. It was this curious trait in the boy's character that made Marcus feel it so difficult to leave him just now.

"Well, Roy," he began cheerfully, "what kind of an afternoon have you had?"

"Oh, much as usual, thanks."

"Foot bother you still?"

"Yes, just the same; not bad exactly, but bad enough to stop my doing anything. I sometimes wonder if it wouldn't be best to take it straight off."

"Nonsense!" laughed Marcus, "it's doing very well. Lee said from the first it would be slow; but it's tiring work for you, poor old chap."

"Oh, never mind. I shall worry through all right," answered Roy, brightening up under the influence of his brother's kindly sympathy. "Only one gets down sometimes, lying here, nothing happening to mark one day from another."

"Well, something is going to happen soon. I've got a piece of news for you."

Roy looked up eagerly, with the interest of recovery.

"Out with it, then! Is it good or bad?"

"Two pieces, I should say," continued Marcus. "One, I know you'll like—the other, I flatter myself you won't at starting; but I hope you will get reconciled to it in time."

"What do you mean? out with it."

"Well the long and the short of it is that what I told you long ago has come about now, and I must leave home for a little while to wind up some affairs I left in statu quo. But I'll be as expeditious as I can; and, meantime, your friend Vincent is coming here to stay with you—Mrs. Kynaston has most kindly promised to spare him—and you will have your friends in and out of the house all day long coming to see you and their brother. You will see much more company than when I am at home, for those youngsters stand in awe of me, I know, though I do my best to win their confidence. The holidays are beginning directly, too, and if you only pick up a little bit more strength you will begin to drive out, and then you will not lack for variety and amusement. Come, Roy, don't look so grave over it. You can spare me, if you have Vincent, can't you?"

Roy's eyes had an anxious look in them.

"You must go, I suppose?"

"I'm afraid I must."

"Then it's no good saying anything, and I shall be very glad to have Vincent, for I hate being alone, and he and I are great friends. But nobody is like you, Marcus."

Marcus laid his hand upon the boy's head.

"Do you know, Roy, that it is very good of you to say and to feel that?"

"Good?"

"Yes, because you have a very reasonable cause to distrust me and my good will; but if you did, you would not feel as you do."

A kind of shrinking look came into Roy's eyes, one of the looks his face used sometimes to wear during his illness, that Marcus never quite understood. The colour flushed his pale cheek.

"Don't let's think about that," he said hastily. "Tell me about Vincent, and when he's coming, and when you must go, and all about everything."

Marcus obeyed, but though he talked frankly and freely, his thoughts were not with his words. He was thinking of that look of pain in Roy's eyes when he had alluded to his mother's will, and to the instinctive shrinking from the subject, as if it was one about which he could not bear to think. Marcus knew that he did not quite understand Roy yet—knew that there was a side to his character so far unread. He could not tell how the knowledge of his mother's will had affected him, but he saw that the whole question was full of pain. He wished to lessen that pain if he could do so without a betrayal of trust. He was pondering how much to say as he talked cheerfully to Roy of Vincent's visit. Presently after a short silence, he laid his hand once more on his brother's head, and looked steadily down at him with one of those clear, steady glances of his that seemed to come straight from his heart and appeal to the heart of his hearer.

"Roy," he said, "we have never said one word about it since I gave the paper into your hands, and left you alone to read it. I knew that you must have been astonished, grieved, disappointed—it could not be otherwise—it must have seemed to you as if there had been underhand forces at work somewhere, as if you had been unfairly dealt by. You had good cause for more than disappointment. You might have been angry, suspicious, distrustful——"

"Don't!" cried Roy almost passionately with that same pained, strained look in his eyes. "I won't listen, I won't think. I know it's all right when I have you, and when you are gone I won't think about it—nobody shall say a word. Marcus, don't be away longer than you can help. You can't think, sometimes, how horrid it all is. I am never safe without you. But don't say another word about that, please. I hate the very thought of it. I know it's all right—isn't that enough?"

"I will only say just this one thing," said Marcus in his steady way. He had hardly taken in the full drift of Roy's agitated, rapidly-spoken words. "It shall be all right, as it is in reality. There is something that I cannot explain to you yet; which, indeed, there is no need for you to trouble about; but it was no lack of love or trust on your mother's part that made her act as she did, rather the reverse. And in time you will see that it is all right. It will make no difference whatever to your future, practically you will be exactly in the same position as if you were your mother's heir. You need not let the matter be the least source of trouble to you. You have my word that all has been done in loving anxiety for your welfare, and that you shall never feel the least difference."

Roy lay back with shining eyes; a look as of triumphant pride and satisfaction had settled upon his face curiously blended with an expression of restful contentment; but he did not directly answer his brother's words, he was silent for a long time, and then he said: "You will not be gone long, Marcus?"

"Not longer than I can help. It may possibly be a few weeks."

"Because," said Roy with quiet emphasis "nothing can make up for your absence. I never shall feel quite safe till you come back."

"You talk as if you were in danger," said Marcus with a quick, keen look at the pale face.

"Perhaps I am sometimes—from myself; but not when you are with me. Oh, yes, Marcus, I know what you feel; I have not forgotten what you said to me that night: but I cannot rise to that level: I cannot feel as you do. I suppose I have not faith enough, but, be it as it may, it is human help—your help I trust in. Never mind my fancies, though I dare say they are all folly: but when I came across those words the other day, 'a man shall be a hiding-place from the wind and a cover from the tempest,' I thought at once of you. That is exactly what you are to me."

"Take care, Roy," said Marcus, speaking gravely, yet caressing the wave of brown hair that lay across the pale brow. "Don't you know that if we lean too much on earthly props, they are sometimes taken away from us?"

"Don't, Marcus!" cried Roy quickly; "it would be too hard, too cruel!"

"Not really, perhaps, if we look deeper: only a way of teaching us to put our trust where only it is safe to rest it."

CHAPTER XXII.—JOAN AND HER FATHER.

EVENTS were so few and far between at Windmill House, and changes so exceedingly rare, that the absence of Roger on his self-imposed mission, and the possibility of the arrival of a visitor, made quite a little excitement amongst the younger members of the household, and infected to a certain extent those of more advanced years.

Caroline Edington began to entertain new ideas of a somewhat more ambitious character than she had often indulged of late. Truth to tell she was sufficiently weary of the hard and sordid life they had led for the past fifteen years, and but for an overmastering passion for the accumulation of a fortune for their children, she would have been glad enough to spend somewhat less sparingly the income they possessed. But the hoarding spirit was too strong both in her and her husband to tempt them to break through the lines of strict economy long since laid down; at the same time if some of their objects in life could be attained through the medium of another person, the gain would be very great, and the idea of the guardianship of a rich ward was very tempting. It did not seem at all improbable that if they were to exercise cleverly their power over Roy Edington and their knowledge of the facts of his past life (to which he was yet a stranger) they might gain an ascendency over him that might be turned to good account. After all, they were his only near relations, as well as his legal guardians, and he might be very willing to make friends and be happy with them.

It was characteristic both of Roger and his wife that they should consider themselves the only responsible agents in the matter, and should leave the old father entirely out of the question. He had retired more and more into his own shell of late years, and was practically a non-entity in his own house. He seldom left his own study, for he was somewhat crippled in his lower limbs, and, except for Joan, he would hardly have been aware of what went on in the house. Joan tended him with great dutifulness, and with real affection, but no gentle word ever passed her lips, no mute caress was ever given or received. Love was in no sense of the word the motto of that house, or the mainspring that moved it. Self-interest was the leading motive there, the link that kept its members bound together. It was to the interest of Roger and his wife to keep the old father in helpless seclusion, and to employ Joan as a sort of domestic drudge, and neither of them had rebelled under the restraint imposed upon them, the one from the weakening influence of old age and impaired health, the other from long habit—being so well used to her daily round of duties as never to question by what authority she was made to carry them through. For so many years she had been dominated by the strong wills of her brother and his wife, that she had ceased, as it seemed, to have an individual will of her own. The time had yet to come when she should prove that she was strong enough to act in opposition to them if once roused.

She tried to get her father to feel an interest in Roy, to make him realise that it was he and not Roger who was the boy's guardian. She distrusted Roger and his crooked ways, and felt an instinctive antipathy to any course likely to be proposed by him. But Andrew Edington would not be roused.

"Roger understands all about it, my dear. If there is nobody left to look after the lad, I suppose we must do it; but I leave it all to Roger. He understands these things. I do not wish to be troubled. I do not wish to see him, even if he does come."

"But, why not, father?—why should you leave everything in Roger's hands? Why do you not decide for yourself what you wish done?"

A strange look, half-sad, half-bitter, flitted across the old man's face.

"Do you not understand yet, child, that my life is practically ended, and that I do not choose to be troubled by all these things? When that blow fell upon us fifteen years ago, and I lost everything that makes life worth living, I lost, too, all wish ever to think or to act again—nothing was left to me but to try and forget. A younger man might have tried to begin life over again; but I was too old, and Roger had not capacity—not the capacity to make himself successful in the arena of the great world we lived in then. There was nothing for it but to hide our heads in the one retreat open to us. I do not wish ever to think of the past—it only drives me to despair."

"Why?"

"Why, child? The thought of what we might have been compared with what we are. I believed that I was about to become a millionaire—and look what we are now!"

Joan stood beside the window with a slightly averted face.

"Are millionaires happier than other people?" she asked, with grave simplicity.

"You talk like a simpleton, Joan," said her father, with impatient asperity. "Money is the one thing in the world that ensures happiness, and everything else that is good. Your question only shows how ignorant you are."

"Yes, I suppose I am," was the quiet answer; "but I have not known much of happiness nor of wealth since I was quite a child."

"And that is Hubert's doing," said the old man bitterly. "Yet I am held responsible for the care of his son!"

"I think most likely Cousin Alicia will have made different arrangements for him," said Joan, after a pause. "She never liked us. She kept him quite away from us, when once she got him into her hands. I don't think she would wish him to come here now."

Andrew Edington's brow was clouded; any reference that brought the dead past to his mind was exceedingly painful to him. He had tried to lose in study and in isolation the memory of the bitter disappointment of his life, and the sense of emptiness and blank that it had left behind; but it was an impression that could never be effaced, and that was always ready to be stirred into activity. He spoke sharply now, his brow contracting with pained irritation.

"Roger will see to all that. He will know what is best to be done. He understands things better than you do, Joan, and has plenty of sound sense of his own. But understand one thing, and make the others understand it too. If Hubert's boy comes here, I won't see him—I won't have him brought to me. I was fond of Hubert once—I trusted him, and he betrayed my trust—I will not see his son; I don't want the past brought back. Understand that, Joan; there are some things one can neither forgive nor forget, and one does not want them brought to mind. I will have nothing to do with the boy."

"Very well," answered Joan, in her calm, indifferent way; and she stood beside the window a very long time, looking out over the sunny expanse of barren moor. When she spoke again, it was still in the same tone, although the question asked was somewhat startling. "Father, is there a God anywhere?"

His face expressed an astonishment not unmixed with uneasiness.

"What do you mean, Joan? What has put such a question into your head?"

"I hardly know—thinking of Cousin Alicia, I suppose; she used to teach me a good many things when I was a little girl. One hears things in church, too; but they never seem real. Do you believe in any God, father?"

The old man's hands shook visibly.

"Do you take me for a heathen, Joan?"

"I don't know much about the heathen; I should fancy they could not know much less or care much less about religion than we do. Cousin Alicia was different; she used to talk about love and happiness, justice and mercy; but those things don't seem a part of our world."

"Nor any other world, child," answered the father bitterly. "It is a cold, hard, cruel place, with nothing in it worth living for, except what can all be lost in one moment of time."

"Yes, that is just how I feel about it," was Joan's answer, spoken half wearily and half carelessly. "It sometimes makes me wonder if this is all we have here—whether we could not find something in the future to live for, something that cannot be swept away so easily."

But the old man only moved his head with a gesture of impatience and irritation.

"You don't know what you are talking about, child. Who knows that there is any future, as you call it?"

"Perhaps we don't know," was the answer, as Joan moved slowly from the room, as unconscious as her father was of the presence of a little listener, who had followed every word of the brief dialogue with undivided attention.

The study was a room nominally closed to all the children, but little Nellie had a way of stealing in, in her mouse-like fashion, and ensconcing herself behind the faded window curtain, with a big book, quite beyond her powers of comprehension. She was so perfectly quiet that she did not disturb the quiet student, who, by ignoring her presence, had not felt it incumbent upon him to turn her out. She liked the quiet and the sense of security she enjoyed here, and though she could understand little of the books she read, they fascinated her and attracted her more than the battered volumes upstairs that she knew by heart.

She looked wistfully out after Joan, as she walked away, and said to herself, with a little sigh: "I wish somebody knew if it were true. It would be so nice if it were. I do wonder if Roy will know, and if he will ever come here, so that I can ask him. I hope he will."

PETER CARTWRIGHT.

THE BACKWOODS PREACHER.

II.

IT sometimes happened that, after a long and perilous journey, the preacher came unexpectedly upon Christian brethren, whose society more than compensated for hardships passed through. On one occasion Cartwright was "travelling prairie" in winter. He had passed over frozen ponds, plunged through water and ice, until his horse was nearly dead-beat, and he himself nearly exhausted with cold, hunger and fatigue. About dark he reached a cabin, which he found to be inhabited by a Methodist class-leader and exhorter. Here he was kindly and warmly received. He shall tell what followed in his own words:—"We sat down to supper, and I partook of it with a relish only known to a weary, hungry man. We had prayers, and the most of us got shouting-happy; and one of the interesting sons, while we were all engaged in prayer, was solemnly convinced; and, after praying in mighty agony for several hours, the Lord blessed him with a powerful sense of the forgiveness of his sins. For hours we sang, prayed and shouted together; then I retired to rest, and slept as sweet and sound as if I had been bedded on a divan of King Solomon's palace. This young man shouted and praised God nearly all night. This is the way God converts sinners in the backwoods."

The Methodists of the West, in Cartwright's early days, were a very primitive people. In their religious assemblies they had no forms of prayer, no choirs, no organs. They would walk three or four miles to class-meetings, and home again; and would travel thirty or forty miles to the quarterly meetings. They were very strict and severe in life; they not only abstained from dram-drinking, and avoided plays and dances, and kept Sunday religiously,—they fasted regularly, and refrained from wearing jewellery, ruffles, and any ornamental articles of dress. Young ladies, when converted, abandoned gold chains, earrings, and lockets, regarding them as idols; and a story is told of a wealthy gentleman who, when convinced of sin, tore the ruffles off his shirt and flung them in the straw, as something unsuitable to a man in earnest about his soul!

At the same time that these primitive Methodists were scrupulous to avoid worldly amusements and ornaments, many of them were very ignorant of, and excusably inattentive to, the usages of polite society. There was a certain Brother Axley, who had been "raised" in the backwoods, who was a powerful and useful preacher, but who was more at home in a camp-meeting than in a drawing-room. On one occasion Cartwright and Axley were fellow-guests at the house of the Governor of the State, and the former relates some amusing oddities of conduct on the part of his brother minister. Brother Axley, being served with the unjointed leg of a chicken, took it in his fingers, gnawed the flesh from the bone, and then whistled for a little lap-dog that was in the room, and flung the bone upon the carpet for the dog to consume! When the good brother was offered tea or coffee, he asked for milk, declaring that his friends had quite scalded his stomach with giving him hot drinks! To sleep in a stone house, and in a plastered room, was no ordinary experience for one who had been almost "raised in a canebrake." But, notwithstanding his lack of polish, the good brother Axley is declared by Cartwright to have been a great and good minister of Jesus Christ.

It was but seldom, however, that Methodist ministers were entertained in governors' houses. They lodged for the most part in log-huts, and although they seldom lacked food, their stipends were insufficient to buy them clothes, for which they were largely dependent upon the bounty of kind Christian friends.

Religion is no doubt essentially and substantially the same in all lands, in all ages, in all states of society and of civilisation. Yet the forms which it assumes vary with circumstances. And there can be no doubt that, at the beginning of this century, the condition of the western parts of the United States was such as is hard for us even to represent to ourselves. The scattered population, the scanty provision of churches and schools, the rough life of the settlers, the utter lack of refinement,—all concurred to affect the form which Christianity took, and the methods of which it made use, when it made its conquests over human hearts and human society.

In order that the people might be brought together in large numbers for social worship and instruction, and to hear the word of God preached and enforced, it was necessary that special measures should be adopted. Camp-meetings were a natural and simple expedient for overcoming the difficulties of the circumstances. A place was fixed upon, and a meeting was announced. In some instances a rough shed was put together, capable of holding as many as five thousand persons. Families—men, women, and children—came from an area of forty or fifty miles round. Tents were pitched; rude log-huts were improvised, even waggons were used as domiciles for the time being. The people brought their provisions with them, though hucksters seem to have attended these meetings for the purpose of supplying the wants of the multitude. A succession of religious services occupied the days, and a great part, in some instances the whole, of the nights. Ten, twenty, or thirty ministers attended, and by them an incessant round of public devotions and of preaching was kept up. These meetings commonly lasted from four to five days; but upon occasion they were protracted, so that sometimes they extended over three and even four weeks. The singing was always of a noisy, but hearty description; the prayers peculiarly fervent; and the religious addresses and appeals were often not only earnest, but pointed and powerful. As the preacher depicted before impenitent sinners the wrath of a righteous God, and the terrors of the judgment-day, it often came to pass that the minds of many were convinced of their guilt and danger. In such cases, there was no restraint or reserve. The cry for mercy filled the place of assembly. The contagion of sympathy enlarged the impression, and one after another joined in the supplications. The penitents, or "mourners," as they were called, were led to a certain part of the building, where they were encouraged to pray, and where prayers were presented on their behalf. They were pointed to the Saviour, and urged to accept the Gospel and cast themselves upon Divine mercy. After a shorter or longer interval of fear and conflict and entreaty, some of those affected would experience relief as they rested in the gracious promises of the word of God. In the language of the camp-meeting, such were "powerfully converted," and "got," or "found religion." In many instances such experiences proved the beginning of a new and better life.

In such scenes Peter Cartwright was at his best. His temperament fitted him to take a leading part in such religious exercises. His own enjoyment of religion dated from a revival, and what more natural than that he should feel at home in meetings where a general concern for the salvation of men was deeply felt and publicly manifested? In recording the proceedings of camp-meetings at which he officiated, he frequently describes the widespread impression produced by the services. The hearers of the word are said to have "fallen right and left"; more than a hundred sinners "fell like dead men" under one sermon; five hundred Christians at once shouted aloud the praises of God.

The number of persons who attended these camp-meetings was, considering the scantiness of the population in the West at that period, amazing. Sometimes 25,000 souls were present on such occasions. Several preachers were sometimes addressing different congregations, each from his own stand or platform. It is said that at the meeting at Cane Ridge from one to two thousand persons were so affected as to declare their readiness to be on the Lord's side.

Revivals differed in outward circumstances from camp-meetings; but though usually held in regular places of worship, they seem to have been conducted in very much the same way, and to have aimed at very much the same end, the conversion of the irreligious and sinful.

These exciting religious exercises were attended, as has often been the case, with remarkable physical manifestations. Those who were violently affected by the preaching were seized by a convulsive nervous affection known in the backwoods as the "jerks." As is usual in seasons of religious excitement, these convulsive affections were in a manner contagious. The persons impresed took to shivering, running, jumping or barking; some lay for hours in a state of trance, and upon recovery told marvellous stories of what they had seen or heard, described their visions, professed to prophesy, or to work miracles. The peril of such excitements is manifest.

The "Shakers" were a sect who laid more stress upon physical manifestations than upon religious truth. Cartwright clearly saw their error, and boldly exposed their delusions and follies. Yet Cartwright records that he has seen 500 persons in his own congregation "jerking" at one time. He felt the ludicrous element in these phenomena, as is apparent from the following observations :—"To see those proud young gentlemen and young ladies, dressed in their silks, jewellery, and prunella from top to toe, take the 'jerks' would often excite my risibilities. The first 'jerk' or so you would see their fine bonnets, caps, and combs fly; and so sudden would be the jerking of the head, that their long loose hair would crack almost as a whip!"

The preacher's ready wit stood him in good stead on one occasion, when two young men swore that they would horsewhip him for giving their sisters the "jerks." They had seen Cartwright drink from a phial, which really contained nothing more serious than a little peppermint, but which they fancied contained something that caused the disturbance in question. "Yes," said the preacher, drawing out his bottle, "if I gave your sisters the jerks, I'll give them to you!" At the sight of the phial, the young men turned and fled; and the victory remained with the evangelist.

It does not seem that Cartwright did anything to discourage these singular manifestations, the prostrations, tremblings, and other developments. He was well aware that they sometimes led to insanity, and sometimes to disease terminating in death; but he believed that the rough and hardened natures with which he had to deal needed to be penetrated by influences mighty and violent, and his observation convinced him that the agonies of contrition and fear experienced at the services in question were in very many cases the commencement of a truly Christian career; also he evidently delighted in wielding the power he was conscious of possessing. On one occasion, he records, "several hundreds fell in five minutes." On another occasion, during a warm exhortation, "suddenly an awful power fell on the congregation, and they instantly fell right and left, and cried aloud for mercy." And again, "not less than thirty persons were smitten down." Once more: "Suddenly the power of God fell on the congregation like a flash of lightning, and the people fell right and left, some screaming aloud for mercy."

There were, however, times when all the preparations and apparatus for a revival seemed in vain. The people who came together, says Cartwright, were sometimes "as ignorant of Methodism and the power of religion as the beasts that perish." The preachers on one such occasion did their best, but the preaching seemed powerless, and the meeting dragged heavily. However, the ministers prayed in private, exercised faith, and renewed their endeavours. Brother Cook said to Brother Cartwright, "If I strike fire, I will immediately call for mourners, and you must exhort; if I fail to strike fire, you must preach!" The result was, that Cook's discourse melted the audience into tears, and that when Cartwright followed, "the power of God suddenly was displayed, and sinners fell by scores through all the assembly." Some fell to the ground, others ran into the woods, and the preachers had no further cause to complain of lack of interest and life.

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE REFORMATION.

III.

THE Rue St. Jacques is one of the oldest streets in Paris; it is still narrow and still retains its name. One night, it was the 4th of September, 1557, some priests of the College of Plessis[1] saw lights in a house opposite.

Horror! the Huguenots were holding an orgy. The neighbourhood was aroused, the chains run up at the ends of the adjoining streets, and, in order to obtain materials for the stoning of the malefactors, they began to break down the garden wall. The unhappy company who had assembled for no other purpose than to celebrate the Lord's Supper, found it impossible to leave. Some gentlemen cut their way with the swords, but one was killed by the stones and his corpse rendered almost formless.

The police came towards dawn, but, though accompanied by the procureur du roi, they dared not bring the women out. "We will burn the house down, if they remain," cried the mob. Forced to descend, the unhappy women, pelted with mud, were with difficulty carried off to the Châtelet and lodged in the dungeons. One, a young lady of twenty-three, the widow of a nobleman, after having had her tongue cut out, was strangled on the Place Maubert and then burnt. She protested that it was not legal to take her tongue; they replied, it is by the secret law.

Why was she singled out to be put to death? Because Bertrandi, keeper of the seals and cardinal, had solicited her estates. She had friends at court who hoped to save her, but directly they heard this they knew that there was no hope. It was the custom. Diana of Poitiers pushed François I. and Henry II. to the murder of the Huguenots that she might have their goods.

The Lady of Graneron had for companions in tribulation two members of the Consistory in Paris. Five days after, two more Protestants suffered at the pillory in the Faubourg St. Germain. The wind blew away the flames, making their end very dolorous and slow. Several Bibles and New Testaments were consumed with them. Two students followed shortly after, and then came four noble ladies. These last were supported in the hour of trial by exhortations from Calvin. In the following year there were still thirty persons in the dungeons of Paris on account of the affair of the Rue St. Jacques. What kind of places some of these dungeons were may be gathered from the names of two—one called La chausse d'hypocras was like a funnel, with a narrow pipe at the bottom, in which a man could neither stand, sit, lie, nor kneel without suffering. Another, called Fin d'aise, suggests tortures similarly ingenious in their cruelty. Paris was, in fact, a city of prisons.

[1] This college bears now the number, 115, Rue St. Jacques, and is in the occupation of the École de Droit.

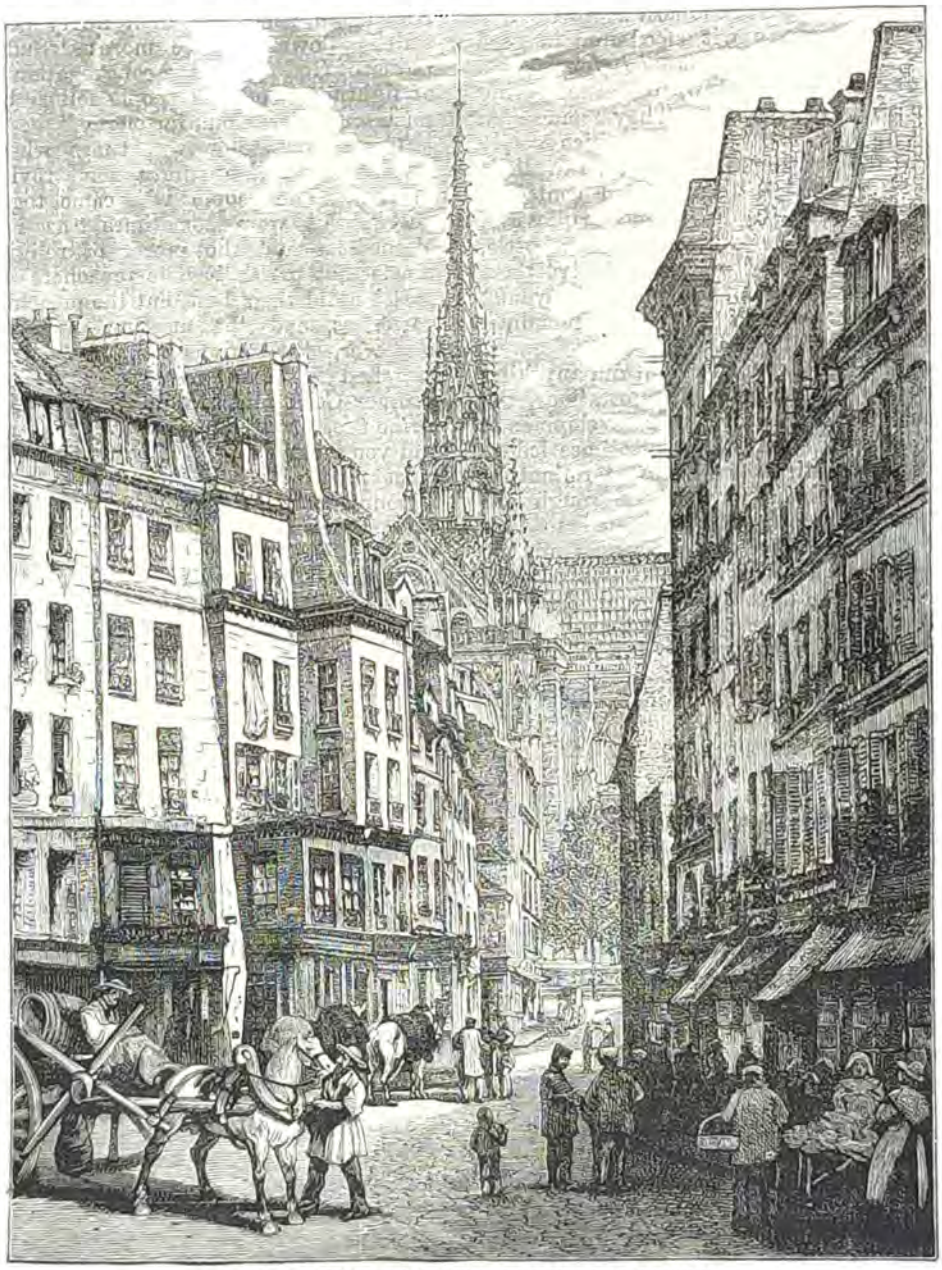
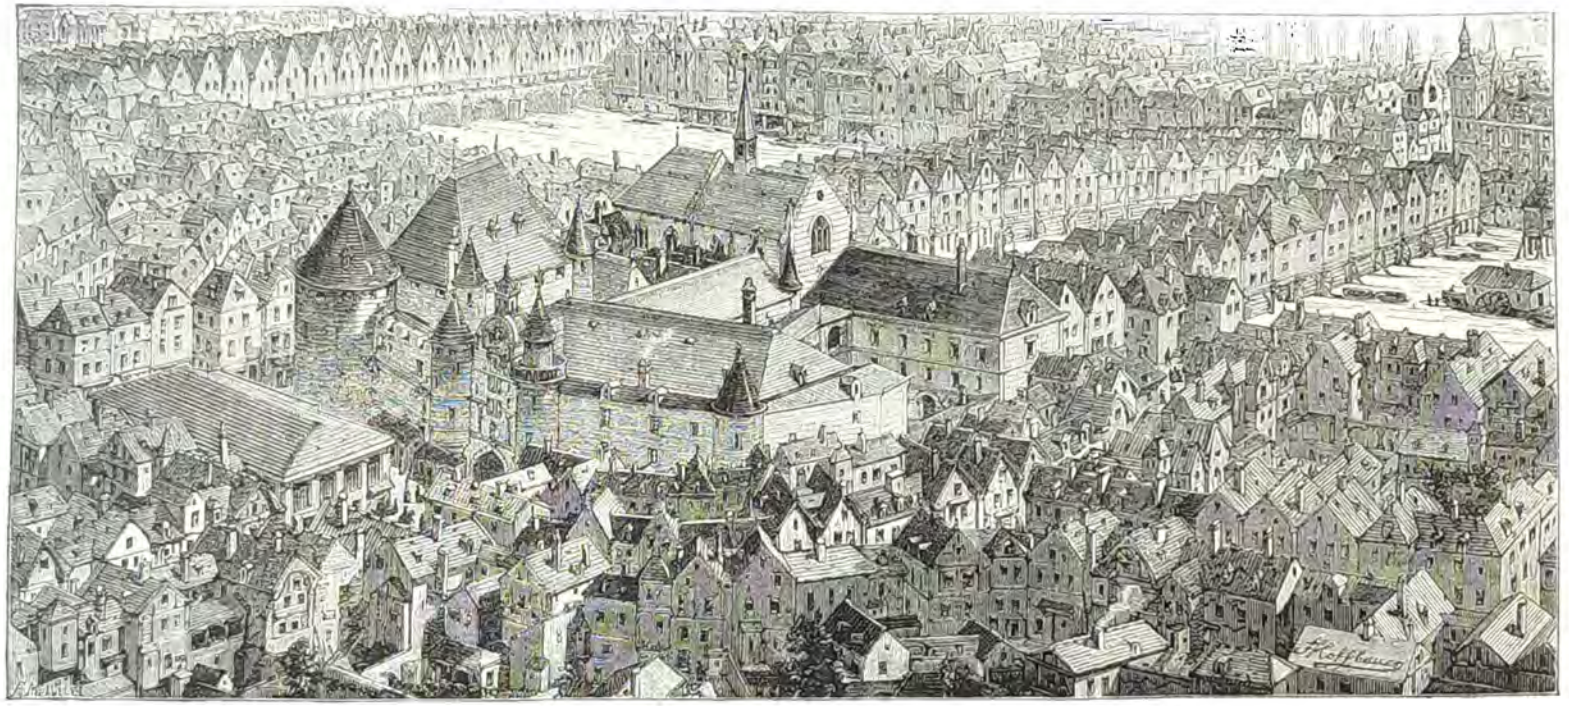
Not only were there the great public prisons, the Bastille, the Conciergerie, the Great Châtelet, and the Little Châtelet, but all important personages, as well as all fortresses, abbeys, and monasteries had their own and sometimes several prisons. Our engraving represents the Grand Châtelet and the surrounding neighbourhood as it appeared in the sixteenth century, but to realise its oppressiveness one must exercise a little imagination. To look down upon it as we do in this picture from the freedom of the skies, was very different from looking up at its grim walls, as seen from the narrow streets around. Nothing, except the gibbet at Montfaucon, was more gloomy in Paris, and when seen at night after the curfew had tolled, the obscurity lit up by candles protected by lanterns, it looked dreary as Newgate,



PLACE MAUBERT—THE SCENE OF MANY MARTYRDOMS.



LE GRAND CHÂTELET—ONE OF THE CHIEF PRISONS OF OLD PARIS.

With a bird's-eye view of the Neighbourhood, showing the Seine crossed by several bridges laden with houses

The two immediately between the Châtelet and the Pa'ais de Justice had a series of water-wheels, and were inhabited by millers though, certainly more picturesque. As Newgate is not far off Smithfield, so the Great Châtelet was close to the Meat Market in Paris, the odours from which did not lessen the horrors which came on the sensitive mind in traversing this dismal locality. Enter in imagination that great gateway you can see in the picture at the base of the central pile. It is a silent vaulted archway, except for the sombre and regular tread of the guards on duty. The solid walls effectually stifle the cries, the groans, the sighs of the wretched prisoners who lie entombed in the cells above and below: in some cases deprived of air and light in subterranean dungeons on a level with the happier dead in the neighbouring cimetière des Innocens. There were prisons in Paris into which the captive was lowered by a pulley, as a bucket is dropped into a well. It was not at all uncommon for the water to penetrate, and the unfortunate prisoner to spend his days and nights in company with rats and toads. Sometimes the prisoner was altogether forgotten, but this was not commonly the fate of Protestants; their enemies thirsted too much for their blood.

And why? It is a delusion to say it was religious bigotry. The religious convictions of the people who committed these atrocities were pliable as damp clay, and flexible as india-rubber. The Guises could, on occasion, pretend to anything. As to Catherine, she believed in nothing but astrology. Her son, the infamous Henri III. had, as a youth, such a fancy for Huguenotism, that he used to worry his sister to burn her missal, and read nothing but the Protestant psalm-book. Many of the bishops were Huguenot in doctrine; Jean du Bellay, bishop of Paris, with whom Francis I. dined on the day they roasted a number of Lutherans à l'estrapade, was a friend of Rabelais and Melancthon, a man of the Renascence. Why, then, this horrible cruelty?

The Cardinal of Lorraine alone had eleven bishoprics, some of which were rich as a princedom; the Cardinal Bourbon, almost as many more; each of the great noblemen plundered king and country after a similar fashion; even Coligny and his brothers commenced in the same way; it was the mode.

No doubt the weak had always laboured for the strong, the poor for the rich, but there had been to some extent a well-graduated scale in the social hierarchy hiding the painful fact. Now the case was glaring, and hundreds of the smaller nobility, having suffered the inevitable ruin resulting from the process, were full of hope and enthusiasm at the new and great word Reform. These movements filled those in possession with alarm, they saw the day of reckoning approaching, and they were even prepared to commit any atrocity rather than disgorge their plunder.

As long as they could, they hoped to do it in the name of the law. But, to their dismay, they found that the idea of Reform had penetrated the Palais de Justice, and that many councillors in the Parliament of Paris were secretly Huguenots. The Cardinal de Lorraine advised the king to hang at least half-a-dozen of them, and Henry II., who had entered into a secret conspiracy with Philip of Spain to exterminate the heretics, thought he would make a beginning. But conscience long suppressed, could not contain itself. When the king came to preside in Parliament, one councillor dared to hint that it was he and not the reformers who troubled France; while another protested that it was no light matter to condemn men to the flames who died invoking the name of Jesus Christ.

The protester was immediately arrested, for it was easier to get men put to death on suspicion of heresy than for a crime purely political. Anne Dubourg, one of the noblest men in France, was hurried off to the Bastille. But while his fate hung in the balance, the king was suddenly called to his account. He was slain in a tournament by accident, and over his body, so it was reported, a tapestry was thrown depicting Saul on his way to Damascus: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou Me?"

At Henry's death, things grew worse, for the Guises obtained control of the government, which they conducted by the usual means of despots. The spy system was worked in a diabolical manner. A man who had been in an official position in the church of the Reformed in Paris, sent the cardinal lists of the wealthy and leading members; and another scoundrel, a man named Freté, who knew how to talk evangelically, was put into the cells with the Huguenots, and there, under the belief that he was a brother, suffering for the cause, secrets were freely let out which no rack would have obtained. Of course the tyrants were deceived, and thought the reformers more powerful than they really were.

Their organisation was in reality only just beginning, and it is a striking fact that, in the midst of such dangers, the Paris Huguenots dared, in 1555, to appoint a minister and a consistory. A gentleman wanted his child christened according to the reformed faith. He moved his friends to elect a minister.

After prayer and fasting a young man of twenty-two, named Jean le Maçon, a student of law, was appointed, who proposed that a consistory of elders and deacons should be chosen, and thus organised church-life began in Paris. Its worship was always secret, for its ministry could only be exercised in a clandestine manner. On the least suspicion, the pastor was removed, and thus there were frequent changes. Four years later, 1559, the pastor of that date, Chandieu, returning from the provinces to Paris, brought news that there was a desire among the churches for a common organisation.

It was decided to assemble the deputies in Paris from the 26th to the 28th of May. It was the very year that Henry died and the Guises began their reign of terror. Nevertheless, these Protestant deputies prepared their common confession of faith, besides getting through a quantity of practical business. Possibly among them was Bernard Palissy, for the Church of Saintes was represented. All had to be done with the closest secrecy, for what happened shortly after proves the bloodhounds were not far off.

The very house in the Rue de Marais, in which, as it is believed, the Synod was held, was suddenly invaded by the police, and the aged father, the wife and children of the owner, the Sieur le Visconti, were hurried off to the Châtelet, where the old man and the wife perished from misery. The Rue de Marais had long been watched, and, on the Friday in question, the lieutenant-criminel arrived with his men, and, surrounding the house where the informer Freté lived, and which was contiguous to that of Visconti, they hoped to seize sixteen persons who were taking dinner. But in a moment nearly all had escaped through various passages, some gentlemen, retainers of the King of Navarre, remaining to cover their flight with their swords.

Nothing could be worse than the position of the reformed in Paris at this moment. Not only were they forbidden to assemble under pain of being burnt alive, without even the form of trial, and their houses razed to the ground; not only were their houses daily visited, but on the slightest suspicion, they were thrown into the Châtelet, where the lieutenant-criminel was empowered to execute summary judgment without appeal; moreover, such a feeling was aroused in the mob, that they were ready on the slightest provocation to attack the Huguenots in the streets and throw them into the river. It was easy to detect Huguenots, for altars were set up before the figures of the Virgin at the corners of the streets, at which passers by were obliged to bow or to run the risk of being taken for a Huguenot, and arrested, if not lynched, by the mob. Protestants were imprisoned en masse, and among the sufferers during this horrible time was Anne Dubourg. His execution was reserved as an opening act to the festivities of Christmas, 1559. On St. Thomas's Day, December 21st, he was escorted to the place of execution by six hundred horse and foot soldiers. Soldiers lined the way, and still further to disperse the crowd, sundry burnings and hangings of victims took place at the same time in various parts of Paris.

In the Place de Grève, the bourn of that tumbril in which the holy martyr sat surrounded by spears and drawn swords, thousands were congregated, every window filled with heads. Oaths, ribaldry, and horse-play, varied the monotony of waiting on this cold wintry morning for the few moments of excitement when a fellow-creature would quiver in the agonies of a public death. Amongst the crowd was a young law-student with a strong mind and a burning soul. François Holtman, a native of Paris, saw Anne Dubourg ascend the gallows, and was probably near enough to hear him say as he took off his clothes: "My friends, I am not here as a thief or a murderer, but for the cause of the Gospel." And then, mounting the ladder, he exclaimed: "My God, do not abandon me, for fear I abandon thee." "All Paris," says a Catholic chronicler of the time, "was astonished at the constancy of this man; his sermon on the gallows doing more harm than a hundred ministers would have been able to do." One result was the conversion of Holtman, who henceforth gave himself to the cause.

This was the atmosphere to breed general revolt, and the next year saw a great effort to throw off the yoke of the Guises in what was called the Conspiration d'Amboise.

The "attempt was a failure." The conspirators were chiefly Huguenot noblemen of the poorer class. They were unsupported by the rank and file of their party, and Coligny and his brothers held aloof. Thus the Guises gained the day, and their revenge was terrible; however, the young law student who saw Dubourg die, and was in the conspiracy, wrote a truly awful little book called "The Tiger of 1560." Charles de Guise, Cardinal-Archbishop, and duke of Rheims, is there pilloried as long as the French language shall last. No Frenchman that ever lived, not even Voltaire himself, could have written more vitriolic French. Every word was a stab.

The cardinal sought its author in vain. One day a stray copy was found in a small bookseller's shop in Paris. The unfortunate tradesman was condemned at once to be executed at the Place Maubert. As he passed to his fate, surrounded by a furious mob, a trader from Rouen on his pack-horse was coming through the street. Shocked at their inhumanity, he cried. "Eh! what, my friends, isn't it enough that they lead him to the scaffold? Do you want to torment him beyond his sentence?" Riding on to his inn, he was followed by some priests, who cried: Huguenaud! Huguenaud! Upon which the mob threw themselves on his baggage which they knocked about madly.

At all this hubbub, what they call "Justice," as cynically remarks the chronicler, himself a president of Parliament, what they call Justice arrived on the spot, and took the Rouen trader into custody, leading him off to the Châtelet. Here he was interrogated by a creature of the cardinal, one Du Lyon. It was not of the slightest use for the unfortunate man to declare that he had never heard of the book called 'Le Tygre,' nor knew anything whatever of the bookseller just hanged. Du Lyon gave in a report to the judges which sealed his fate. He was ordered to be taken to the Place Maubert, and there hanged in the same spot as the man whom he had dared to pity. Some days after, being rallied at a supper party on the iniquity, Du Lyon replied: "What would you have? We could not get the author of 'Le Tygre,' and we had to satisfy the cardinal somehow, or otherwise he would never have left us in peace."

RICHARD HEATH.

GETHSEMANE AND ITS TEACHINGS.

BY THE REV. GORDON CALTHROP, M.A.

"Who in the days of His flesh, when He had offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save Him from death, and was heard in that He feared."—Heb. v. 7.

THE reference here is, of course, to the well-known incident that occurred in the Garden of Gethsemane. Nothing is said by the Evangelists about the "strong crying and tears"—at least not about the tears; but such an outburst of emotion would be perfectly in keeping with the account which they give; and indeed (as I think we all feel) would be perfectly natural. Never before, and never since, was such a strain put upon a human body and soul; and that an intensity of distress past conception should find expression in every way that was open to it, was no more than we should have anticipated under the circumstances.

According to the argument of the apostle in the passage to which our text belongs—the Saviour, as the servant of the Father, as sent by Him to accomplish the work of redemption—was under the necessity of learning the lesson of an absolute submission of will to the Divine will. To suppose that, in attaining to this point of perfection, the Saviour had to pass through no struggle and to make no effort, is totally to forget the reality of His human nature. Had Christ's body been a body only in appearance, as some have taught, or had He not been endowed with a human will, as others have asserted, then, doubtless, everything would have gone on smoothly, and no difficulty would have arisen. But the corporeal nature of Jesus Christ was as real, and tangible and true as yours and mine; and He had a will, like ours, capable either of surrendering itself to, or of opposing itself to, the will of God. It was the consequence of the possession of this bodily nature that He shrank from the cup appointed Him; it was the consequence of the possession of this human will that He had to gird Himself up to the effort of an entire submission to the purpose of the Father.

Now to such a shrinking and to such a conflict the apostle points in the passage before us. Why was there the "strong crying and tears," but that the Saviour recoiled—naturally and innocently recoiled from the horrible cup of suffering that was put to His lips? His will was not to drink it. But then, on the other hand, He recoiled with even more abhorrence from the idea of disobedience to His Heavenly Father. And then His will was to drink the cup. You observe that He is placed, as it were, between two fires, and into one of the two it seems as if He must inevitably fall.

The conflict was tremendous. It threw Him into an agony of prayer, and His prayer, we are told, was heard. But how was it heard? Was He spared the agony? Was the cup of anguish permitted to pass away, and disappear from His view? No! He was not spared a solitary pang! He had to drink the bitter draught to the very dregs. But the answer came in the shape of a sustaining, supernatural power which invigorated His failing humanity, and nerved Him for an entire and unhesitating submission, and imparted to him the calm and the power of an imperturbable peace. He was heard on account of His godly fear—for the sake of His reverential devotion to the will of the Father. But let us advance to look a little more closely at the story itself.

I. In the earlier days of our Lord's ministry it is possible that He may have been, more or less, saddened by the presentiment of the sorrow that was coming upon Him before His career had drawn to a close; but there is, as far as I can remember, no allusion to the fact in the sacred record. When the end, however, approached, the dark shadow of what He called His "hour" began to project itself over His spirit, and to fill Him with anguish and alarm.

On one occasion He speaks of the baptism that He is to be baptised with, and tells His disciples that He is "straitened" until it be accomplished. His meaning is obvious. He is experiencing the horror of suspense. Suffering anticipated is, very frequently, far more terrible than suffering undergone; and Christ would plunge at once, if it were possible, if it were permissible, into the thick of His terrible trials rather than remain at a distance, awaiting and expecting them.

On another occasion when the request of some Greeks to be allowed to have an interview with Him, reminds Him of the sacrifice that is to be offered up on the cross, He passes through a phase of feeling, which may be said to be a rehearsal of the scene that occurred in Gethsemane. Involuntarily, as it would seem, and almost as if holding a soliloquy with Himself, He exclaims that His "soul is troubled"; and the expression is especially significant, when we remember the calm steadfastness of His usual demeanour. And why is He troubled? Because He is reminded of the approach of His "hour." And the remembrance forces the petition from His lips, "Father! save me from this hour!" But then, close upon this expression of natural, human shrinking from anguish, comes the recollection of the fact that it is for the very purpose of passing through this hour that He has come into the world; and then the recollection of that other fact that it is His business in the world to do the Father's will; and His first prayer is immediately corrected, and, as it were, counteracted by the second: "Father, glorify Thy Name!"

In all this we have, as I have said, a sort of participation and rehearsal of Gethsemane. But let us now, without any further delay, pass on to Gethsemane itself. See what light it throws upon the text, which we have now to consider.

When the supper was ended, and Judas had gone out, taking away with him the dark cloud of his traitorous presence, the Lord Jesus began to speak freely to the faithful eleven who remained there, who had continued with Him in His temptations. After awhile the stream of His conversation ceased to flow. He seemed to have finished all that He had to say; and He rose up from the table with the apparent intention of passing out of the room into the streets; and through the streets to the garden, to which He had been accustomed to resort during that memorable week for the purpose of meditation, and of communion with God. But as he stood there—the disciples standing round Him—a tide of thoughts rushed into His mind, to which He judged it best to give immediate expression, and He finished His discourse, ending with the marvellous high-priestly prayer, with which we are all of us familiar.

Then He goes out with His disciples into the illuminated streets, threading His way through the crowd, and before long stands outside the city-wall, on the slope of the mountain which overhangs the valley of the Kedron. The night was bright, for the Paschal moon was up in the sky, but the two mountains—that I mean on which Jerusalem stands, and the Mount of Olives, are so close to each other that there would be gloom in the ravine between them, and the rush of the Kedron would be heard before its waters could be distinctly seen. So Jesus and His disciples begin to descend; the gloom of the scene seems to fall upon the Saviour's spirit; something is obviously oppressing Him.

The disciples, though not understanding, participate in His mood, and the little company move on in silence, not a word being spoken amongst them. Presently they cross the bridge that spans the stream, and then ascending the opposite mountain-path, arrive before long at an enclosure surrounded by a high stone wall, and there they make a halt. This enclosure is the Garden of Gethsemane. It is full of large olive-trees, and belongs (we suppose) to some friend or disciple of Jesus. Here Jesus begins by making a separation amongst His disciples. Eight of them He leaves at the gate of the enclosure, and with the remaining three (who are the most capable of sympathising with Him) He advances under the shadow of the olive-trees.

Soon the gloom which has already rested upon Him begins to deepen, and He tells the disciples that His soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. He is sore amazed and very heavily oppressed and appalled. An indescribable horror overwhelms Him, and He feels as if His bodily frame must give way under the strain and pressure of the mental agony. He will go a little way from them. Let them stay within sight—within call—it will be a comfort to Him to feel that they are not so very far off—and let them watch and pray! But He must suffer alone.

And so He leaves them, going to a short distance and kneeling down and pouring out His heart in supplication to God. Soon His anguish becomes so insupportable that He can no longer retain His kneeling posture, but flings Himself prostrate on the ground, and groans out, "O My Father! if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me. Nevertheless, not what I will, but what Thou wilt."

After awhile, there seems to have been a little respite, a lull in the storm of misery, for the agony came upon Him in surges. Rising up from the ground, He moves towards the disciples, but finds them sleeping. He leaves them, and another wave rolls over Him, more terrible, apparently, than the former one, for His bodily frame is racked with strange convulsions, and His sweat, tinged with blood, is forced out from the pores of His sacred body and falls in large drops to the ground; and but that an angel was sent to Him from heaven to strengthen Him, He would have given way altogether, and the tragedy of the cross would have been anticipated in the Garden of Gethsemane.

A third time the sad scene is enacted; a third time with strong crying and tears He appeals to His Heavenly Father, and now—His prayer is heard. The cup is not to pass away. That cannot be—but the will is braced to submit itself to the Divine will, and peace, and calm, and resignation have once more taken possession of the Saviour's soul.

Such, briefly and imperfectly told, is the story of the Saviour's agony in the Garden of Gethsemane. And now we have to consider, as well as we can, what is the meaning of it.

II. We shall, probably, all of us feel that it was not the mere apprehension of death which caused the struggle. Everything that we know about the character of Jesus of Nazareth militates against the supposition; and besides, if it was death that He feared, He might easily have escaped over the mountain, and put Himself, in a few hours, far beyond the reach of the malice of His enemies. That He shrank from dissolution, that He clung to life, as you and I do, may be considered certain enough—He could not have been human, if it had not been so—but a recoil of so marked a character, and on the part of such a one, indicates a peculiarity in the cup of suffering that was put to His lips.

Just consider for a moment. How could Christ have set us an example that we should follow His steps, if it were merely death that He dreaded? If that were really the case, He manifested less nerve, less courage, less resolution, less magnanimity, than thousands and tens of thousands of martyrs—men, women, and children—who have calmly faced the king of terrors in his most appalling forms, and have braved his worst. The fact was, that what Christ had to encounter was not a mere death, but a sacrifice; in this lies the explanation of the whole matter. It was a sacrifice that He was about to offer. The Lord Jesus Christ was not a mere individual, but the representative of mankind. He took upon Him their cause, and stood in their place before God;

He was the second and last Adam, in whom were included and involved the fortunes of the human race.

Now this peculiarity of position involved Him in peculiar suffering. In the first place, having identified Himself with mankind, He felt intensely the evil of their wrong-doing and sin. Their shame was, as it were, a shame to Himself; their trangression was, as it were, His transgression.

Do not say that this is a fictitious and unreal feeling. Have you never heard of a family that has felt itself disgraced by the disgrace of one of its members? They have nothing to blame themselves for. The lad was brought up well—he had a good example set him; but, in spite of everything, he took to wild courses, associated himself with worthless and dissolute companions, and went rapidly down the broad road until he arrived at degradation and ruin.

Now, can the family detach themselves from him, and profess themselves to be altogether unconcerned and indifferent? You know that they cannot. In proportion to their own excellence, and nobleness of character, and refinement of feeling, they cannot. Carry this thought then on to Christ. He was the brother of sinful man; He had bound Himself up with them: had become one of them: bone of their bone, flesh of their flesh. And when He realised, by close contact, their unworthiness, their hatred of His Heavenly Father, their greed, their cruelty, their malice, their foul passions, their miserable avarice, their bitterness towards one another—His soul was oppressed and troubled within Him, and the burden of human brotherhood pressed heavily upon Him.

But this is not all. Indeed, I think we may say that the feeling just spoken of was not restricted to the time with which we are now concerned, but was experienced, more or less, throughout His whole life. There is something much more important than this to be taken into account. Sin involves us in suffering; but the worst sting of sin is, that it separates between us and God, and compels God, by a necessity of His nature, to turn the full terrific darkness of His frown upon us. The horror of a soul which lies under the shadow of the Divine wrath we can only very imperfectly conceive.

Now it was just this mysterious wrath of God against sin which the Lord Jesus Christ as our representative had to undergo. It was this, which caused the agony in the garden; it was this, which wrung out from Him the bitter cry upon the cross, "My God, my God! why hast Thou forsaken me?" He underwent all this of His own free will; He accepted the cup, but He shrank from it. It was through a struggle, and by Divine help granted in answer to prayer, that He was able to drain the cup to its dregs.

What He underwent, how He underwent it, what was the precise nature of the misery He was called upon to suffer—of course I do not know. I only know that He endured it, not for His own sake, but for us. And this also I seem to know, that by far the worst part of the Saviour's suffering for us was the mysterious suffering of His soul. The physical pain to which He was called upon to submit, the intolerable restlessness, the tension of the strained nerves, the fever, the thirst, and then the humiliation, the shame, the scorn, the maltreatment which He underwent at the hands of men—all this was as nothing, when compared with the agony which fell upon Him in Gethsemane, and with the horror of great darkness which enshrouded Him, as He hung upon the cross.

III. And what shall be our practical conclusions?

First, this (a most comforting and encouraging one) Christ hath made hell impossible for His people. What is hell? Well, a place, if you like. Yes, of course, it must be; for I remember a verse in one of our Lord's parables in which the tares are to be gathered together in bundles, and cast into the fire. And the expression points to a calling-out of the wicked, from all ages, and generations, and peoples, and a bringing them together into one hideous fellowship—apart from the good, and apart from all good influences — shut up among themselves. And probably it means that there are external inflictions of misery to descend upon the wicked. But this seems clear enough that hell, properly understood, is the condition of a soul that clings to its sin and refuses to be separated from sin, and is unchangedly fixed in its antagonism to God, and on which therefore God is compelled to turn the intolerable anguish, the fearful darkness of His wrath and indignation. Now if this be hell, it is obvious enough, that you, who belong to Christ, can never come into it. You may have to undergo pain, loss, distress, suffering, perhaps agony, God alone knows. You will certainly have to suffer if you do wrong. Your discipleship will not except you from the laws which God has laid down for the moral government of the universe. But the horror of Divine wrath against sin you can never know. You may have many and many a cup of suffering to drink; but that cup will never be put to your lips. For Christ has been beforehand with you and drained it dry.

Lastly, let us carry away this thought, that if you and I come, by the teaching of the Spirit, really to understand the meaning of Gethsemane and Calvary, life can never be for us exactly what it is to other people; or, perhaps, what it was to us before. There are many persons, I fear, who gaze on the sad scene with, probably, not an altogether uninterested feeling, with some stirrings of human compassion, and yet much in the same way as that in which they contemplate a tragedy acted on the stage. "Is it nothing to you" (cries the prophet), "is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto My sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted Me in the day of His fierce anger!" Yes, to not a few, it is nothing. It is a picture, and nothing more; a thing to be lamented over and reprobated; but nothing more. But if the inner meaning has been revealed to us, and we see at what a tremendous cost our redemption was obtained; if we perceive that the horror and shame of the crucifixion were merely the thin superficial covering of a still profounder horror beneath endured for us—then life will be changed. I do not say that it will be made gloomy. Far from it! The life of the Christian is the only truly noble life! But the shadow of the cross will rest tenderly upon it. And the self-abandonment of the worldly, the self-indulgence, the insatiable thirst for pleasure—the mad pursuit of gain, or place, or fame, or power—will become perfectly impossible things. They will be replaced by self-control, and self-restraint, and we shall pass through this world with a calm, but not a harsh and unkindly superiority to its allurements, because, under the strong constraint of gratitude and love, we are living unto Him, who loved us, and gave Himself for us.

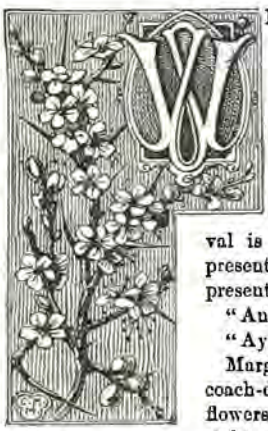
SANTA LUCIA.

A STORY OF CORSICA

CHAPTER III.



HEN Santa Lucia came out of the church with Pietro, she beckoned Margherita to her.

Taking one of the poor woman's thin hands between her own, she caressed it, speaking to her in gentle, loving accents, "The festival is coming, and there will be presents for Margherita, regale, presents!"

"And flowers?" asked Margherita.

"Aye, flowers and fruit."

Margherita's ill-fated lover, the coach-driver, had always brought her flowers or fruit from Ajaccio, and the sight of either delighted the poor girl. Santa Lucia, remembering that she had a spray of orange-blossoms in her hair, removed it, and fastened it to Margherita's dress.

The girl cooed over the fair flowers, singing,

Il bel flor'
Fa ben' al cor!

(The beautiful flower does the heart good.)

But almost immediately after, she broke out into one of her hoarse, frightful laughs.

Santa Lucia, nothing repelled, drew Margherita to her again, stroking gently her wasted hands, and talking to her, until she evoked a smile of confidence and pleasure which made Margherita look quite herself again. Had Santa Lucia's father permitted it, she would have kept Margherita with her at home, for, she perceived clearly that, as a few loving words and acts went so far to calm and soothe the girl, a continuous life of association with one who would be a kind and considerate companion might bring about her complete recovery.

As it was, much of that which her carefulness had wrought in favour of Margherita, was undone by rude boys, and brutal men and women, who jeered at and irritated the girl. And when thus irritated, Margherita would become dangerous; her long thin hands would be clenched in rage; she looked ready for a spring, and her eyes would flash, while she uttered her hideous laugh.

A little way out of the village of Santa Lucia, where the road turns off on the right to Tralonca, and the mule-path winds to the left across the mountain to Corte, there runs, under the overhanging cliff, a crystal stream.

Towards this spot, young Catalan, in a fit of jealousy and bitterness of heart against Pietro and Santa Lucia, had wandered, brooding over the thought that Pietro in his ecclesiastical dress was a young hypocrite, and that likely enough Santa Lucia, with her pretended zeal for religion, was as bad. Somehow an idea had sprung up in his mind that these two understood one another, and it filled him with jealous anger. He was fond of Santa Lucia, and now, because he fancied she was hankering after this other boy, he could have crushed her and him.

Thus cogitating evil and spite, he clambered up the steep, rocky side of the cliff above the stream, and lay down with a stifling sense of resentment and bitterness, which would have been ridiculous, were it not so capable of being murderous. And mixed up with this resentment, was a cruel rage against poor Margherita. Why had she as it were parodied his words? It was as if an evil spirit had entered into him with seven other spirits more evil than itself, to urge him on to a state of preparation for some horrid deed.

While Catalan thus crouching on the rocks mused upon his imagined grievances, Santa Lucia and Pietro hand-in-hand came walking out from the village to the spot beneath him, where the paths separated.

"'That the happiest life is one of the greatest usefulness to the greatest number,' I have always, since I thought seriously, believed. But of late I have concluded that this is not necessarily the exclusive privilege of a religious career. It would be presumption on my part to suppose that you think as I do, but I believe your views will change."

So spake Pietro.

"Our paths," Santa Lucia replied, "lie apart; as these paths before us do, though they both tend to one direction. Padre Rocca says that you will master these thoughts, as other men have done. I hope you will. I have always believed you destined for the church."

While they were still talking, from the rocks above him there came crashing down upon Pietro, before he could realise the danger, a huge boulder. Catalan had watched their approach, and in ungovernable rage, thinking little of any consequences, had detached the stone, and set it rolling. The mass was upon Pietro before he could cross the brook, and he fell heavily forward, insensible.

As he did so, a loud, shrill cry, followed by a hideous laugh, echoed across the ravine, and Margherita bounded down the path towards the spot where Pietro lay.

She saw the blood streaming from his head, and looking up the rock above she saw Catalan, like an evil genius, frowning down upon her. The madness in her awoke. She scarcely saw Santa Lucia. Seizing a huge stick, she began to clamber up the rocks to the ledge where young Catalan stood. A cold shiver came over him. He felt sure she was bent upon attacking him. When she was furious, he knew she could be dangerous too. There she was, scaling the rock nearer and nearer. He could not fly upwards, the rocks above him were almost like a bastion. Should he stand his ground, or try and rush past Margherita? For a moment he wavered, then, as Margherita gained ground, another murderous impulse came upon him, and again detaching a huge piece of stone from the rocks, he hurled it down upon Margherita. It struck her, and she, losing her balance, rolled down the cliff.

Enrico Catalan saw how his horrible deed had too surely cleared a passage for him, and, frantic and beside himself, he sped down the rocks, leaping like a goat from boulder to boulder, flying onwards down the mule path, and up over the heather, and plunging into and over the fields beyond, until the lights of Corte glimmered in the distance.

Then he halted to wipe his forehead, and his practised ear heard distinctly, on behind, the sound of feet striking on the rocks he had left behind, as if in pursuit.

Fear came upon him! Already the avenger was after him. The Corsican knows what that means. It means to be tracked and hunted down, aye for weeks and months together, until at last the blow is struck, and revenge taken, an eye for an eye, blood for blood.

The Brigand of Corsica is not a thief, or highwayman. The men who are in the mountains, hunted down by gendarmes and spies are not the enemies of society in general. Some one man has wronged another; that other has become his executioner; and having usurped the rights of the law to deal with such cases, has had to flee before the jealousy of the tribunal, and has become an outlaw, menaced as much by the mounted gendarmes as by the reprisals of the relatives of the man whose blood he has taken.

Fear gave fresh vigour and speed to young Catalan, and he soon was far, far ahead of his pursuer. He did not halt once however, till he came to his father's house; he let himself in, took a mantle, filled a havre-sac with provisions and started off again at once out of Corte; nor rested till he had scaled a height overlooking the river where, in a stone hut, he lay down to pass the night.

He wrapped his mantle round him, and began to reflect. He shuddered at all that had happened. The evil spirits that had urged him on to frenzy and crime, seemed now to have abandoned him to despair. Ah! he understood what he had lost for ever by his savage rage; the esteem of his father, of Santa Lucia, of all the better beings he had lived with. And then he began to wonder who his pursuer could be. He felt sure some one was upon his track. But who? Margherita had no brothers, no parents, no one to avenge her, and Pietro had no relations but the priest, and he was an old man.

He ate and drank sparingly, and then lay back to listen to his own heart beating. Sleep he could not.

What was that sound below, at which he started, raising himself on his elbow, holding his breath?

It was the pursuer's footsteps tearing down the hard highway by the river below. He could see the form of a tall, strong-looking man, and the form seemed familiar to him. But, where had he seen it before?

The pursuer passed by the spot where he had climbed up to his hiding-place, and sped onwards. He hoped the man would go very far before discovering that he was on the wrong track. But it was clear to him that he must seek security in flight.

He rose again, cautiously descended the rocks, regained the road to Corte, and under the walls of the old citadel, struck into the path to the Tavignano bridge, and crossing it, fled up the highway to Venaco and Viarreggio.

Half way between these villages, as the morning dawned, he lay down to slumber in another shepherd's hut, high above the road, on a steep cliff where he hoped to be out of danger; and fatigue overpowering him, he fell asleep.

He awoke with a fearful yell of fright. Some one was kneeling on his back, pinioning his hands behind him.

Suddenly he was grasped by the neck, twisted round, and thrown violently against the wall of the stone hut.

A tall man with haggard face, long shaggy hair and beard, and eyes half starting from their sockets, glared at him.

"What did you want to kill her for? I killed her reason, you have killed her outright. She had jilted me; she had done you no wrong. Do you recognise me? It was I that upset the coach! Oh! the years of anguish I have passed since then! Perhaps you too will live to curse yourself for this madness that has made of you what I have been—a murderer!

"Why have I lived all these years? How have I lived? I will tell you why, and how. Why? because I loved Margherita. How? anyhow, by stealing a fowl one day, by trapping a bird, a rabbit; by stealing a loaf, a flagon of wine, a few cheeses; by catching and milking a goat; anyhow. Often I have starved for days together. But, my old friend Beppo has helped to keep me alive.

"Sometimes I have crept down into the village to see Margherita, and twice I have kissed her in her sleep, as she lay on the church steps at night. And now, you have robbed me of my only incentive to life. I could kill you for this; but I will leave you here for to-day, while I return to Santa Lucia. If I find Margherita is dead, I will return and kill you. If she recovers, I shall leave you where you are, to escape if you can."

So saying, the man turned and left Catalan to his fate.

Enrico Catalan tied hand and foot in the stone-hut on the cliffs above the Venaco-road, at first gave way to despair. But hunger and self-preservation prevailed, and aroused him to effort. He dragged himself to his havre-sac, after long trying succeeded in opening it with his teeth, and satisfied his hunger and thirst.

The threat, "I will kill you," was, he felt sure, no idle one, but how was he to escape?

He could not break the thongs that bound him, but could he not get some one to set him free? He had many friends who often passed by on the road below. If but he could hail one of them!

For some hours he lay on the rock at the threshold of the stone-hut looking down on to the highway for some well-known figure to pass. At last, a goatherd, of Corte, whom he knew, passed by.

He gave a loud whistle, familiar to the man, who, on his repeating it, looked up and replied.

Soon he saw him ascending the rocks. He was saved! He would be able to fly. His friend had a mule with him: he would borrow it, and ride off to Ajaccio, and take the first steamer to Tunis or Algiers.

This friend had soon loosened his bonds. To tell him a trumped-up story, to borrow his mule, and ride off to Ajaccio, was easy. Once there he could borrow money from his uncle and escape from all reprisals.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. III.

Reject nine of the words in this figure, and arrange the others to form a saying of the Lord Jesus.

Ye	The	God	Of
For	More	Life	Ever
Kingdom	Fruit	On	Tree
First	Grass	Field	Seek

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

THE MARCH OF ISLAM.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM JOSEPH SMITH, M.A.

I.

"IS IT THUS," SAID THE KHALIF OMAR, "THAT YE COME OUT TO MEET ME?"

BUSY men in the hurry of affairs cannot be expected to compass all historical knowledge, and yet there spring up controversies which cannot be determined satisfactorily without acquaintance with special fields of history. This has been pre-eminently the case in recent discussions about Islam. It may, therefore, be helpful, rapidly and lightly to sketch the leading features in the past career of that religious system.

That must have been a mighty force, which within a hundred years from the prophet's death (in A.D. 632), had spread the wings of empire from the river Indus to the Atlantic Ocean, toppling over the old and illustrious kingdom of Persia and planting its standard near by where once was Carthage, occupying the sacred spots of Palestine and owning the Pyramids of Egypt, revelling in the gardens of Damascus, and shouting its war-cry before the gates of Constantinople.

For though when a hurricane breaks through a forest, as if a park of artillery had opened upon the trees, there will have been decay unperceived at work beforehand, this does not account for the force of the wind. Rottenness was in that Empire of Rome, and in that kingdom of Persia, but there was also in the onrush of the Arabs the combined momentum of strong physique and of a mighty enthusiasm. They had earned their hardihood by the struggle for existence in an inhospitable country, and they were, for the first and last time in history united as one man. Firm belief in a recent revelation had seemed to bring God and destiny very close to them, and this presentment of deity was in the guise of a special Providence directing them to victory.

The problem therefore was, how long could this new development of Arab-life retain its primitive bodily vigour, and how long would this overmastering enthusiasm constrain these Arabs? What we propose to show is the manner in which time and circumstance solved that problem.

Naturally the first objects of attack were those nearest, the neighbouring countries of Persia, Syria and Egypt. The first of these was still independent, the latter were provinces of the mighty Roman Empire, which had then its capital at Constantinople. The battle of Cadesia, A.D. 635, practically settled the fate of Persia. Like the usual Moslem fights it consisted of many onslaughts, for the Arab dashed on with his cavalry and archers, and not with a heavy ponderous mass. The combat was consequently protracted for three days. A whirlwind of dust finally helped the Arabs, and in the triumph, the royal standard of Persia was captured. It was a blacksmith's leather apron, and the fortunes of this homely symbol had betokened the fate of the people. A blacksmith had once delivered them; but this badge of heroic poverty had in course of time become enlarged to the almost incredible dimensions of twenty-two feet in length and fifteen in breadth, and was disguised and almost concealed by a profusion of precious gems.[1] It was like a presentation sword, which has a hilt of gold and jewels but is worthless as a blade. As a useful garment of leather the ensign had been potent, as a regal toy it was only fit for parade, not for the battlefield.

The Arabs were now in their turn the simple, frugal, downright energetic warriors, the men who could dare and do, and who, with 40,000, could rout thrice their number of Persians. Indeed it was with amazingly small armies they won most of their campaigns. With 16,000 troops they subdued Egypt; with 12,000 they overran Spain. They plunged on with the violence of an avalanche, and nothing could resist them.

But victory brings luxury, and the next scene lifts the corner of the curtain upon a stage with the beginning of new manners and fresh ambitions. It is the next year, and at the capitulation of Jerusalem. The patriarch had agreed to terms, but it was felt that the ancient and sacred associations of the place required something more august and striking than the mere entry of a conquering general and his soldiers. So the Khalif Omar was sent for from Mecca, to lead his people in in solemn state. It was an occasion that might tempt to magnificence, and so the army thought, for they paraded to welcome their sovereign with flashing silks and embroideries—the spoil of fallen cities—their beasts also being gorgeously caparisoned.

The aged khalif, who had been a friend of the Prophet, sped him on his journey in a shaggy sheepskin cloak, with coarse, patched, woollen undergarments. Rough saddle-bags were thrown over the back of a single sorrel camel; these had parched grain in one pouch, and dates and dried fruit in the other. At his saddle-bow the khalif had a skin of water, and behind him a wooden platter. One slave attended him, who, at times, rode the camel, whilst the khalif dismounted and walked by the side. At night, he slept indifferently in a little tent of coarse haircloth, or under a tree.

Thus apparelled, and with such regal train, the man who already ruled the second largest empire in the world, and was competing with the first, approached his army, and greeted them with a startling salutation.

Catching sight of their dainty array of silk and bravery, he cried out in disgust—"Is it thus that ye come out to meet me? Have two years effected such a change?"

Then he snatched up handfuls of gravel and flung it in the faces of the astonished generals. But the men were not corrupted yet; they rose to the humour of their sovereign, and they were all the prouder of him for it. It was easy to toss off their gaysome finery, and to bare the stern armour underneath. In an instant every man did this.

"Enough," shouted the khalif, with a smile of delighted approval. "Go forward!"

Yet can we wonder if, in another fifteen years, Arabia had grown too drear and sterile for the rulers of Islam, and the new dynasty of the Ommiades removed their state and pomp to Damascus, the most inviting city of the East? For less than half a century, under Mohammed and his four immediate successors, Arabia held the primacy; thenceforth, until to-day, it has been content with the religious prestige of its two cities, Mecca and Medina, and with the authority upon religious matters of its Mecca doctors. For the following hundred years Damascus was supreme, and then the glory of the Khalifate passed from the Ommiades, under the black flag of the Abassides from Damascus to Bagdad.

This change was achieved in a drenching bath of blood, for every representative of the Ommiade family was slain, except a single individual, who, through a series of the most hairbreadth adventures, escaped to Barbary, and thence to Spain, where the Moors had already established themselves, and where he, breaking away from the Khalif of Bagdad, erected a separate Moslem kingdom, and became the famous Abd-er-Rah-man I. He had, in his first flight, reached the banks of the River Euphrates, and there he lingered.

[1] Ockley's "History of the Saracens." Bohn's edition.

One day his little boy ran into the tent in a fright, for the black flag of his enemies was on the horizon. Hastily seizing the lad, he made for the river, accompanied by a young brother and one servant. His pursuers called to him from the bank, offering safety, and the brother, exhausted with swimming, and tempted by this offer returned, only to have his head instantly chopped from his body.

Day and night Abd-er-Rah-man sped on to Africa, and there wandered five years upon its northern sea-board. He was twenty years of age, and of handsome mould, but blind of one eye, and with no sense of smell; a man, however, of high ambition and amazing capacity. Something of a poet, too, for he addressed a poem to a solitary palm which he had transplanted from the land of his ancestors.

"Like me thou art separated from relations and friends; thou didst grow in a different soil, and now thou art far from the land of thy birth."

In this he was a thorough Arab, a compound of sentimental feeling, untamed daring, and ruthless ferocity.

At the supreme moment of his life, when he had been besieged in Carmona, in Spain, and shut up for two months by the Abasside general, he chose seven hundred of the bravest of his followers, kindled a fire, into which he and every man cast the scabbards of their swords, and then, with naked steel, dashed through the circle of his foes. The heads of their leaders he tied up in a bag, with labels in their ears, and forwarded the parcel by a Mecca pilgrim to the khalif, who exclaimed, "Thank God, there is a sea between that man and me."

Four illustrious cities were founded by the Moslem, namely, Kufa, Bassora, Cairo, and Bagdad. Around Bagdad, with all its glamour of "Arabian Nights," the romance of Islam is haloed. Here it was the celebrated Haroun-al-Rashid held his court, and here, for five hundred years, the khalifs lived, in the first days veritably ruling, but in the later years being nothing more than gilded figure-heads, like the Mikado of Japan, or the rois fainéants of early France.

It was at Damascus, however, that the style of architecture known as Saracenic first took shape, and that letters began to be cultivated. Walid I., at the beginning of the eighth century, after having built a grand mosque at Cairo, and enlarged the one at Jerusalem, and scandalised the prejudices of Mecca by much alteration and beautification there, finally dispossessed the Christians at Damascus of their ancient Church of St. John the Baptist, and on its site "employed workmen by the thousand in erecting a mosque, in which, by uniting the architecture of Greece and Persia, he laid the foundation of the Saracenic style."[1] But though starting at Damascus it was at Bagdad that the æsthetic pride of the Moslem culminated, unless, indeed, we except Granada, with its famous Alhambra.

This is the pleasant side of the picture, the other is a wretched veining of self-indulgence and intrigue. The Ommiade Khalifs were few of them "teetotallers," and it is said that of all the Abassides there was only one who abstained, namely, Mehdi, the father of Haroun-el-Rashid. Omar II., a Damascus Khalif, died from indigestion. "A Syrian Christian made him a present of two great baskets of eggs and figs, and in his gluttony he ate them both one morning, adding to the mass a large number of grapes from Taif, a quantity of marrow and sugar, a kid, six fowls, and seventy pomegranates." If we discount this narrative ever so much, on the ground of Oriental colouring, there remains a sorry spectacle of degeneration in the nominal head of a religion. His cousin, who preceded him, had also died of a surfeit. Of course there were many great and noble rulers, and these particular instances the other way may be extreme; but they are at least typical of that temptation to which unparalleled power and wealth are exposed, and of the creeping cancer of luxury which is the bane of despotism. The Saracens had speedily advanced far on the route of perilous knowledge and in the taste of forbidden fruit, from that day when, at the taking of Madayn, in Persia, they mistook camphor for salt, and mixed it with their bread, being astonished, when they had done so, at its bitterness. They deserve, at the same time, a full meed of praise for their contributions to science and letters. The Arabic words Algèbra, Alchemy, and Chemistry, to go no further, attest the origin of familiar sciences, and the Arabic numerals are used in Europe to-day.

Yet even here it must not be overlooked that Bagdad owed much to the influence of Persian Traditions, that land of the "Wise Men of the East"; for as Greece in captivity conquered through the arts her own conquerors, so did Persia. In Spain, too, where literary advancement was the highest that it ever reached under the mantle of Islam, there were three co-operating circumstances. First the Jews had assisted the first Arab conquerors, and were consequently always favoured afterwards. The ill-treatment of the Jews under the Roman Catholic sovereigns robbed Spain of the enterprise of this nation, and helped on the degeneration which has marked that kingdom in the last three hundred years. Secondly, commerce conveyed to Andalusia under its Moorish monarchs the refinement and culture of the Greeks; whilst, thirdly, the Moorish kingdom in Spain was by the fact of its rebellious origin in a measure cut off from the remainder of the Mohammedan world, and thrown upon its internal resources. Thus it was brought to be enlightened and tolerant very much by the concurrence of local conditions.

Meanwhile, through the whole course of Mohammedan history, there has been one most remarkable element of power. This has consisted in the wonderful manner in which Mohammedanism has been able to recruit itself from the more robust of Pagan races. Arabs even by marrying extensively in the lands they subjugated could not have multiplied sufficiently to garrison the large extent of the world's surface which they so soon managed to occupy. It was in another way they retained their mastery, remaining themselves the aristocracy in each country. In Africa they converted the Berbers, men of very kindred temper and qualities to their own. The use they made of these ardent neophytes may be judged from what happened in Spain. There, the Arabs possessed themselves of the fairer portions of Andalusia, and pushed forward the Berbers to the front, to be their breakwater against the small but vigilant and invincible remnant of Christian Visigoths, who were in the wild highlands of the Asturias. There these Christians were still holding on very much as the British did in Cornwall and Wales after the Anglo-Saxon invasion of our island. In after years, in Spain, the Moorish monarchs sustained their authority by drilling into a permanent bodyguard and standing army large numbers of Slavs, who, sad to say, were imported and sold to them by Christian (?) merchants. Similarly, in the East, the Turks came forward and propped up the tottering throne of Bagdad, ultimately superseding it. The Mongols also set up the empire of "The Great Mogul" in India. This not merely enlistment, but actual religious absorption of vigorous and strenuous heathen populations, has constituted the vitality of Islam, and is a factor in its influence well deserving to be regarded. We can see the same process repeated in Africa: there fine races, like the Mandingoes and Foulahs, have been captivated. But, nowadays, there does not appear to be much more of this sort of Pagan element left on the earth, this hard quartz out of which gold can be crushed. When therefore this particular material is used up the resources of Mohammedanism will be at an end, and the fires of their ardour will have no remaining fuel to feed upon. For we may rest assured that they will never compete with Christianity, even with that broad nominal Christianity which is at the present moment supreme as an energising and dominating power wherever it moves.

[1] Gilman's 'Saracens,' p. 322, in the "Story of the Nations" series.

I may hazard a prophecy that, from such date forward, Islam will have finished its allotted task in the earth, and will be numbered amongst the dying systems. Already we can discern signs of this issue. At present there is not in the world a single district of the older ones under Mohammedan government that flourishes. Those new partial civilisations in Africa are of too recent growth, and altogether, as compared with those which we reckon civilisations, too low in scale to be of durable character under the advancing conditions of modern life. Magnificent regions, such as Egypt, Asia Minor, and a portion of Persia, lie more or less waste, impoverished and desolate, partly because of the selfish despotism of the government, and partly because of the sluggish fatalism of the religion. Half-tilled fields, a bankrupt exchequer, and the existence of state-officials, who from highest to lowest are open to bribery, are sure symptoms of political decay. One who has studied the subject closely writes: "Notwithstanding its fair show of outward observance, and its severe legal enactments, there is something in Islam, which strikes at the very root of morals, poisons domestic life, and (in its truest sense) disorganises society. Freedom of judgment is crushed, and a barrier is raised, not merely against the advance of Christianity, but against the progress of civilisation itself. It is impossible to account for this peculiar feature in Mohammedan nations by attributing it to the peculiarities of Oriental races, or other accidental circumstances. The great cause lies in the religious system which they profess, which binds them hand and foot. For everything in religion, in law, in life, and in thought has been measured for all time. Mohammedanism admits of no progress in morals, law, or commerce." [1]

[1] Hughes' 'Notes on Mohammedanism.' Introd. pp. xi., xii.

PETER CARTWRIGHT.

THE BACKWOODS PREACHER.

III.

IT would be a mistake to suppose that Cartwright's power lay wholly in declamation and appeal. He had a firm grasp of the great central doctrines of the Gospel, and had great power in stating and enforcing them upon his hearers. A camp-meeting was held in the Roaring-river Circuit, in a neighbourhood which was at the time infested with Arian teachers, who had shaken the faith of many in our Lord's Deity. Cartwright tells us that at this meeting he for two hours held listening thousands spellbound, while to the best of his abilities he defended the supreme Divinity of Jesus Christ, and "riddled Arianism." At the conclusion of the sermon, he called upon all believers in our Lord's divinity to raise their right hand, and they did so by the thousand. Many Arians recanted, and many sinners sought and found mercy through a Divine Saviour. Cartwright's explanation of the incident is very characteristic:

"It was plain to me the Lord had given marching orders to the legions of little Arian devils to the lake, as He had done to the swine in the days of old; and when these were cast out, it was quite easy for the possessed to come to their right mind."

But, although well able to expound the truth in an orderly and systematic fashion, Cartwright seems generally to have met with most success when he trusted to the inspiration of the moment. He very ingenuously confesses that at one place he completely disappointed the expectations of the people, although he had done, as he thought, his very best. He saw his mistake. "So," says he, "on Sunday night I mounted the stand, took my text, and though I had loaded in a hurry, drew the bow at a venture, and let fly arrows in almost all directions. Some laughed, some cried; some became angry; some ran; some cursed me right out; some shouted; some fell to the earth; and there was a general uproar through the whole encampment. Our meeting lasted all night, and the slain of the Lord were many; and although this discourse was delivered without connection, system, or anything else but exhortation, I redeemed myself, and now it was admitted that I was a great preacher."

In striking contrast with such scenes was an incident Cartwright has put upon record which happened in the course of his journeys. On a dark wet day, he reached a place where he was quite unknown, but where he was appointed to preach. He found only one hearer: however, he preached, and made a deep impression upon his audience. This man spread the preacher's fame abroad, and upon his next visit he found a crowded church, and his labours in that apparently unpromising place issued in a great revival, and in many accessions to the Society.

Many are the instances recorded in which Cartwright displayed marvellous tact and presence of mind, especially in dealing with troublesome and dangerous opponents. A young man, being reproved for behaving ill during the services at a camp-meeting, threatened with many curses to whip the preacher in revenge for the insult. Cartwright invited the young fellow to follow him to the woods and fulfil his threat. It happened that the preacher made a movement with his right hand, which his opponent misinterpreted. "Ah, you are feeling for a dirk, are you?" In a moment Cartwright saw and followed up his advantage, exclaiming, "I'll give you the benefit of all the dirks I have!" he rushed at the young man, who took to his heels and escaped. He was caught by some of the rowdies present, who ducked him in a pond within an inch of his life, so that he was glad to leave the camp.

Such gatherings as those above described, could not take place without occasional disturbances, which called for great wisdom and boldness on the part of the conductors. On one occasion the morning service in the camp was interrupted by two young men with loaded whips, who were known to be supported by a rabble armed with dirks, knives, and clubs. Cartwright was preaching at the time, and requested the disturbers to desist from their annoying conduct. He called upon the magistrates to interfere, and a scuffle took place, in which the preacher threw one of the young men to the ground, and flung down a drunken magistrate who took the part of the disturbers, and then struck on the ear the ringleader of the mob, and felled him to the earth. Order was restored, and the prisoners were secured and put under guard. On the evening of the same day, when the encampment was lighted up and the trumpet blown to call the people together, Cartwright addressed the assembly upon the appropriate text, "The gates of hell shall not prevail." The impression upon the people in their excited state was tremendous: "Not less than three hundred fell like dead men in mighty battle; the air was filled with loud wailings from penitents, and with triumphant shouts from rejoicing Christians." The meeting lasted two days and nights, and as a result, two hundred persons were added to the church.

The difficulties in the way of managing these vast gatherings were not always from without. "Idle professors and idle spectators" sometimes crowded into the spaces set apart for "seekers" and "mourners;" and on one occasion Cartwright was obliged to clear the place of all such persons, and, as he recorded, with the happiest results.

No man ever lived who was better adapted to deal with "rowdies" than was Peter Cartwright. Some of his methods cannot by any means be defended, and can only be excused by the singular state of society which existed, and the very exceptional characters with whom he had occasion to deal.

At a certain camp-meeting the "rowdies" were much enraged because the Methodist leaders had the groggery under guard, and would not allow intoxication. They threatened mischief, but Cartwright defied them, declaring his readiness to "whip the whole regiment." When all had retired to rest, the disturbers approached the camp, barking, howling, hooting, crowing, and, in addition to these annoyances, throwing "chunks" at the tent. Cartwright endured this until daybreak approached; and then determined to put an end to this nuisance. We tell what followed in his own words: "One ring-leader among them came right before the preacher's tent, clapped his hands, crowed, and passed on. I stepped to a fire close by, and gathered a chunk of fire, and threw it, striking him right between the shoulders, and the fire flew all over him. He sprung and bounded like a buck. I cried out, 'Take him; take him!' but I assure you it would have taken a very fleet man to have taken him, for he ran as though the very devil was in him and after him. When I returned to the tent, one of the guard came and told me that they were taking wheels off the waggons and carriages; and, looking through an opening in the tent, I saw one of them busy in loosening my carriage behind the tent, where I had tied it to a sapling for fear they would run it off. I slipped round, gathered a stick in my way, and came up close behind him, and struck at him, not with much intent to hurt, but to scare him. However, the stroke set his hat on one side of his head; he dashed off in a mighty fright, and, his hat not being adjusted right, it blinded him, and fleeing with all speed, he struck his head against a tree, knocked himself down, bruised his face very much, and lay senseless for several minutes. When he came to himself, he was as tame as a lamb, and his dispensation of mischief was over. This put an end to the trouble of the rowdies, and afterwards all was peace and quiet."

Peter Cartwright was a man well able to put down braggarts. Travelling through a wood one day, he came upon a party of rough fellows, who were abusing Methodist preachers generally, and Cartwright in particular. One of the band avowed his intention of whipping Cartwright the first time he saw him. The dauntless evangelist rode up to the party, saying, "Who is it among you that is going to whip Cartwright?" The man who threatened came forward, and Cartwright, facing him, observed, "Cartwright is known to be much of a man, and it will take a man to whip him, mind you." The preacher added: "I never like to live in dread. My name is Cartwright. If you really intend to whip me, come and do it now!" The braggart professed not to believe him. The whole party entered the ferry-boat to cross the river, when the blaspheming boaster broke out in a fresh volley of curses on Cartwright. "Hereupon," said the preacher, "I said to a gentleman on the boat, 'Here, hold my horse,' and stepping up to this cursing disciple, I said sternly to him, 'Now, sir, you have to whip me as you threatened, or quit cursing me, or I will put you in the river and baptize you in the name of the devil, for surely you belong to him.' This settled him, and, strange to say, the man was ever afterwards my warm and constant friend."

The backwoods preacher could use clever strategy as well as force. Being much annoyed and interrupted in the conduct of a camp-meeting by a turbulent whisky-seller, who went about armed, and who defied the constable, Cartwright took the man in hand himself. Rising in the middle of the night, he stole quietly to the whisky-seller's waggon, and found him sleeping. He took the man's gun and ammunition, struck the waggon bed with the muzzle of the musket, and cried out, "Wake up!" The man sprang to his feet, and felt for his gun. "You are my prisoner," said Cartwright, "and if you resist you are a dead man!" The poor wretch surrendered, begging that his life might be spared, and that he might not be taken before the magistrate. Cartwright made him at once harness his team and start and leave the place, first pouring out the powder, and discharging the gun, that he might be tempted to do no more mischief.

The same adroitness was shown by the backwoods preacher in dealing with a party of Mormons, who were holding a mock camp-meeting in ridicule of Cartwright's services, and one of whom was so foolish as to personate Cartwright himself. In the course of the meeting, Cartwright stole into the Mormonite assembly, and whilst they were profanely carrying on a pretended revival, seized a favourable moment to introduce confusion amongst the multitude. "I fetched," says he, "two or three loud whoops, and said, 'Here! here! here! officers and men, take them! take them! every one of them, tent-holders and all!' and I rushed on them. They broke, and ran pell-mell. Fortunately, five or six little lads were close by, from our encampment, who had been watching me, raised the shout, and rushed with me into their camp. But all the motley crowd fled, tent-holders and all, and the lads and myself had not only peaceable but entire possession of all their whisky, goods, chattels, and some arms, and not a soul to dispute our right of possession. Thus you see a literal fulfilment of Scripture: 'The wicked fleeth when no man pursueth;' or, 'One shall chase a thousand'!"

Cartwright well understood the class of people that a Western preacher had to deal with. There were in many places ruffians who hated the truth of God, and who would use any means to silence those whose work it was to preach that truth. The state of society was such that it often happened that there were no magistrates or officers to protect peaceable citizens, and that they were compelled to take the law into their own hands. Cartwright was a tall, stalwart, and fearless man, and on many occasions used his bodily strength for his own protection and for the silencing and confusion of opponents.

The reader of Cartwright's Autobiography cannot but be repeatedly shocked by the record of his employment of physical force. It is only by remembering the very different state of society in which his lot was cast, that we are able to make proper allowance for methods of proceeding which it is not possible always to justify. One of his eulogists, comparing him with Peter the Apostle, quaintly remarked: "Our Peter if he has not cut off, has certainly boxed the ear of many a Malchus."

What he did himself in this matter, Cartwright did not hesitate to recommend to others. A young preacher, a powerful, muscular man, was about to travel in a wild, half-civilised district. Cartwright saw in him just the type of man needed for the work. "If you can't convert them with the Gospel," was his advice to the young evangelist, "do it with your fist!" In this case the advice was taken and acted upon, with quick results. The young man was set upon by four miscreants, who were determined to hinder him from preaching. With great courage he felled two of them with a stout chair which he had time to seize, upon which the other two took to flight. His reputation for boldness and for muscularity rapidly spread through the district, and thenceforward he pursued his work without molestation.

It was not always from men that Cartwright encountered opposition in his ministry for Christ. Now and then he met with a woman violently hostile to the truth. When in the Sangaman district, he made the acquaintance of a good and useful local preacher, who had a wife cursed with a vile temper, and bitterly opposed to religion, and to any religious exercises, whether conducted by her husband or by others. Many Christian brethren had come to the house, and had tried to overcome her hostility to prayer, but she only raged and cursed at them. Cartwright tried his hand. Being at the house one evening, when she objected, as usual, to family prayers, he expostulated with her, but only aroused her wrath and violent cursing. Cartwright shall tell the sequel.

"I put on a stern countenance, and said to her, 'Madame, if you do not be still and behave yourself, I will put you out of doors.' At this she clenched her fist, and swore she was half alligator, and the other half snapping-turtle, and that it would take a better man than I was to put her out. It was a small cabin we were in, and we were not far from the door, which was then standing open. I caught her by the arm, and swinging her round in a circle, brought her right up to the door and shoved her out. She jumped up, tore her hair, foamed, and swore. The door was very strongly made, to keep out hostile Indians. I shut it tight, barred it, and went to prayer, and I prayed as best I could, and then I started a spiritual song, to drown her voice."

These measures were effectual. The woman had found her master; she asked to be admitted; admitted herself to be a fool; and joined in family worship. A real reformation began, and in six months she was a changed character, and became as bold in the cause of God as she had been in the cause of the Wicked One.

The effect of the evangelist's earnest preaching was sometimes heightened by striking and unexpected events which occurred, and which a superintending Providence overruled for spiritual good. Cartwright and a friend were preaching on one occasion to the inhabitants of a very wicked village. Each evening the congregation increased, and there were mighty displays of the power of God. Still, there were some who mocked and made sport, especially two wicked young men, ringleaders in sin; these interrupted the congregation with their oaths and curses. On their way home from the meeting one evening, these young men raced their horses for a wager. The horse of the most daring and presumptuous of the two swerved from the track, and dashed his rider against a tree, so that he was killed upon the spot. "With all his blasphemous oaths still lingering on his lips, he was suddenly hurried into eternity, totally unprepared to meet his God. The tidings of this awful circumstance ran with lightning speed through the village and country round; an awful panic seized upon the multitude, and there was weeping and wailing among the young man's relatives and the people at large. There was no more persecution during the protracted meeting, which lasted for many days; and it seemed, at one time, after this calamity had fallen upon this young man, that the whole country was in an agony for salvation. Very many professed religion and joined the church."

One of the strangest instances of preaching "out of the season" which have ever occurred, even in backwoods evangelisation, took place in Cartwright's ministry, in a lonely spot among the Cumberland Mountains. He put up for the night at a house of entertainment where was a large company assembled for a friendly dance. He was watching the young people enjoying their amusements, when a young lady politely advanced to him, and invited him out to take a dance with her. Here was a situation for a Methodist preacher! He acted on the impulse of the moment; advanced with his partner to the middle of the floor, and then knelt down and proceeded to pray aloud! General excitement followed; exhortations, hymns, and prayers succeeded one another, and the dance was turned into a religious service. Many were converted, and a Methodist society was the result!

A droll story is told which illustrates the gross ignorance of spiritual things which prevailed amongst the people for whose benefit the early American Methodist preachers lived and laboured. Mr. Wilson Lee was preaching at a certain station in a remote part of Kentucky, and was impressing upon the people the duty of taking up their cross and following Christ. Amongst the congregation were a wicked Dutchman and his wife, who was a notorious ill-tempered scold; this couple, strange to say, were deeply affected by the address, and, being convinced of their sin and need, resolved to act upon the advice of the preacher. After the service, Mr. Lee mounted his horse, and rode to fulfil another appointment for the evening. He soon saw ahead of him a man slowly trudging along, and with effort carrying a woman on his back! Recognising the Dutchman and his wife, Mr. Lee sought an explanation of this strange proceeding. The Dutchman replied that having learned from the preacher that those who would reach heaven must take up their cross, and feeling that his bad wife was the greatest cross he had, he had taken her upon his back and was bearing her, in the hope that thus he might save his soul! A more spiritual explanation of the passage in question was given; and it is recorded that both man and wife were truly converted, so that the woman ceased to scold, and the husband was relieved at all events of this heavy and all but intolerable cross.

No man ever lived who was less a "respecter of persons" than was Peter Cartwright. At a certain conference at Nashville, he was preaching in a Methodist church to a crowded audience, and just as he had announced for his text the question, "What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" General Jackson walked in, and took his stand against one of the columns. An officious brother minister, standing close to Cartwright, pulled his coat, and remarked in a loud whisper, "General Jackson has come in!" "I felt," says Cartwright, "a flash of indignation run all over me like an electric shock, and facing about to my congregation, and purposely speaking out audibly, I said, 'Who is General Jackson? If he don't get his soul converted, God will damn him as quick as He would a Guinea negro!'" It is satisfactory to know that the General was not offended, but expressed approval of the preacher's independence.

The Home Fireside.

A FIRESIDE TALE.

O! THE ruddy welcome shining
In the firelight's cheerful glow,
When the shadows are declining,
And the weary rest may know.
What care we for outside weather,
Skies of blue, or sullen grey,
When we are at home together
In the ending of the day!
Is bleak winter on the meadows?
Love finds blissful summertide
In the changing lights and shadows
Of the home fireside!

Here the father from his labour
Turns for recompense and rest,
Here, at times, the lonely neighbour
Tarries as a welcome guest;
Here, more precious than all other,
Loving-hearted, strong, serene,
Moves and reigns the gentle mother,
Happy as the homestead queen;
Here the heart's first fond affections
Through all after years abide,
Life's most sacred recollections
Haunt the home fireside.

How the children watch the embers,
Seeing visions none may know,
While the grandmother remembers
Treasures vanished long ago!
As the same light flickers o'er them,
And the one love holds them fast,
These, with life stretched out before them,
Her life story almost past,
Hoary head and tresses golden
Are together glorified,—
Dear the young love and the olden
At the home fireside.

In its happy converse, blending
Youth and age in one sweet bond,
In its prayer and praise ascending
Nightly to the home beyond,
All the great world's strife and evil
For awhile are made to cease,
Life attains a holier level
In this nook of calm and peace;
Oh, the soul's best things are dearest,
And its joys, love-sanctified,
Are to God and heaven brought nearest
At the home fireside!

MARY ROWLES.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXIII.—ROGER'S RETURN.

"PAPA is coming home to-day," announced Mildred in the schoolroom, with an air of some importance. "Mamma got a letter this morning to say so."

Nellie looked up quickly from her nook in the sunny window-seat—almost the only bit of sun she ever enjoyed came in at that window in the early morning.

"Is Roy coming too?"

"I don't think so. He doesn't say a word about him—at least mamma says he doesn't" (the tone implied that Mildred had no particular confidence in her mother's veracity). "Besides, if he were coming now, they would have to get a room ready for him, and that isn't being done. I never believed he would come—nobody would care to stay in a dull house like this. I wonder what it is like living somewhere else," and Mildred stretched herself and looked out of the window, with the longing of a wild bird to burst its cage.

"I guess he'd have to come, whether he liked it or not, if papa said he was to," remarked Dick with a grin of a not altogether amiable character. "He's got to obey him just as much as we have, you know."

"Well, that wouldn't come to much!" was Mildred's somewhat scornful retort. "When do you boys ever do anything you're told, I should like to know?"

"Quite as often as you do, Carrots," returned Archie, taking up the cudgels in his turn. "'Tain't for you to come it over us as a model of propriety. You're none such great shakes yourself, that I can see."

Mildred tossed her ruddy gold locks with her habitual scornful defiance of "the boys." Without troubling to answer Archie's attack, she continued to speak to Nellie:

"The boy is to take the pony-cart and to be at the station at three o'clock. He will come straight home without going to his office."

"I'll go for him!" cried Dick springing up. "I can drive that slug of a pony just as well as Jem. I'll go and meet him myself!"

"No, you won't, my boy!" cried Archie, "for I'm going."

"No you arn't, though," cried Dick flushing up hotly. "I spoke first."

"I'm the eldest."

"I can drive best!"

"You can't!"

"I can! Papa said so!"

"I don't care who said so! You can't! and I shall go this afternoon."

"You shan't, I say! I shall."

"Can't you both go?" asked Nellie timidly, fearing that there was going to be what in schoolroom parlance was familiarly termed "a row."

"There wouldn't be room for both of them and papa," answered Mildred, as the boys took no notice of the question, being otherwise engaged in the squabble, "what a noise you do make to be sure. I wish you'd go somewhere else to fight it out."

For it was almost a fight by this time, not carried on altogether in anger, or with any great show of passion on either side, but with a noisy boisterous spirit of pugnacity that was so common between the brothers as to pass almost without comment. Quarrels, angry words and mimic fights had always been the rule amongst these children, and had never been checked, unless the noise became loud enough to disturb the elders. "Children always do squabble and always will—it is ridiculous to think it can be stopped," had been the expression of Mrs. Edington's feeling on the subject, and, accordingly, there had been perpetual wrangling and disputing in that nursery-schoolroom as long as there had been children there. Nellie, from her feebleness, had joined but little in any kind of warfare, and of late Mildred had held herself slightly more aloof; not from any sense of the evil of perpetual fault-finding, and quarrelling, but because she was growing and developing with some rapidity, and did not feel the same absorbing interest in the trifles that had seemed of so much importance once. She had reached the stage when she began to look forward to the time when she should cease to be a "child," and should be called a "girl" or "young lady." She had decided in her own mind that fifteen was the right age for that metamorphosis to take place, and as she would complete her fourteenth year in six months, she was anxious to show how ready she would be to take upon herself the dignity of her new position. She felt it would be derogatory to that dignity to be constantly at logger-heads with her brothers, and she was making very decided efforts to ignore their personal remarks and home thrusts, and to hold aloof from their games and pursuits. They on their part were very little conscious of the change, and they made up for their sister's defection by a more persistent squabbling between themselves.

The hubbub was interrupted by the entrance of Joan, who came to superintend the daily lesson hours. She had some little difficulty in ascertaining the cause of the dispute, and when it was made out she decided that the matter must be referred to their mother. Lessons then proceeded in their usual half-hearted way, without much zest on the part of either teacher or pupil, until the first dinner bell put an end to the penance on both sides, and released all the captives. Lessons were more than usually distasteful to-day from the sense of excitement that pervaded all the household; in their very monotonous life, even so small an event as Roger's return seemed a matter of interest and importance.

Curiosity was a good deal baffled, however, and expectation disappointed by his arrival alone, and his way of snubbing all inquiries about Roy. The children retired grumbling, half inclined to believe the very existence of this cousin a myth, and Nellie was more disappointed than she had expected to be at hearing nothing definite about the prospective visit. The airy castle she had built for herself seemed now to melt away. There was no likelihood of her ever finding out now whether the things she read or dreamed about were true, or whether they were as Mildred said, only another kind of "grown up fairy-tale."

Not till he was alone with his wife and Joan (and Joan's presence went for nothing) did Roger speak openly of what he had seen and done.

"I found him all right enough, and managed to let it appear that the meeting was accidental. He invited me home and introduced me to the step-brother who is acting as his guardian at present. The Stratfords are county people and live in great style, and Roy has evidently been brought up to the purple as if he were heir of all. He was friendly enough and easy enough to get on with; but the brother was just the reverse, and as he had heard the whole story of the Edington failure and of the boy's parentage from Alicia, he was imbued with all her prejudices. I could see he distrusted me from the first. He was so reserved that I could get nothing out of him. I did not choose to ask a direct question. Roy himself knows nothing. He believes himself to be Alicia's child, and takes his easy pleasant life for granted, as the most natural thing in the world."

"Was he pleased to see you?"

"Yes, quite at first. I was not quite certain later on whether or not he was not a little infected by young Stratford's doubts."

"But you said nothing about the claim you can make in your father's name?"

"No; I thought it best to keep up the notion that the meeting was accidental. The subject was just alluded to, but it passed without anything definite on either side. It was not to Roy, but to the brother I spoke. He seems fond of the boy, and is evidently quite willing to continue the guardianship Alicia left in his hands. I committed myself to nothing. I merely said we might perhaps like the boy to visit us."

"If he is so ready to act as guardian, most likely it is because it is to his advantage; young men do not generally care for the charge of a ward."

"Exactly what I felt myself, my dear; but, of course, he was very close about it. I could make nothing of him."

Caroline Edington mused awhile.

"The connection might be valuable to us in any case, apart from pecuniary advantage, and the boy's keep would not tell much in our housekeeping. Of course, some provision for his minority would be made; but, in any case, I think it would be well to know him. County people, you say?—moving in good society most likely?"

"The very best. Of course they are living quite quietly now because of Mrs. Stratford's death; but I heard plenty about them and their connections. They are in the tip-top society set, and their name is a passport anywhere."

Mrs. Edington sat looking very thoughtful.

"It would be worth while to get a hold upon him, but it must all be done in a pleasant and friendly way—at any rate, at first. The puzzle is how to get him here. There are few inducements to attract him, or to make him stay when once he does come."

"He would not know that."

"He would soon find out; and, whatever our legal power might be, it would be practically difficult, and perhaps even dangerous, to keep him here against his will. What a pity he and his step-brother are such friends; a quarrel now between them would be so very convenient for us."

"Well, I tried to do something to shake his confidence in Stratford. My own opinion is that there is something odd about the whole business, and I've tried to infect the boy with suspicions too. I don't quite understand why the fellow is so pointedly reserved, nor why he keeps Roy so entirely in the dark about his own prospects and position. I wound him up at last to the point of insisting on an explanation, and he is pledged to let me know what he finds out. If things are fair and square, we shall have the certainty that the game is worth the candle; whilst, if there is any complication or underhand work, it may chance to bring about a quarrel, and we can get in as the champion of the boy's rights. He must come into something, and it will be odd if we cannot, directly or indirectly, make profit out of it."

Caroline Edington made a sign of assent.

"Indirectly, I believe we shall; but you must be content, Roger, that the advantage shall be indirect. It is absurd in these days to think of playing fast and loose with trust money, even if it could be touched. All we can do is to work upon the boy's feelings, and make him understand, in a practical manner, what his father's dishonesty entailed upon us. If Alicia has had the bringing of him up, the rest will follow."

"If he comes here," said Joan, speaking for the first time, "he will learn his lesson in an exceedingly practical form."

Her words were not noticed,—were barely understood. Caroline Edington was listening intently to her husband's detailed description of Roy's present home.

"I could wish it had been less pleasant; but, after all, young people like change and the companionship of their own kindred. He may be willing enough to come, and at least it will be friendly to ask him. We will wait a little while till he writes the promised letter to you."

CHAPTER XXIV.—THE LETTER.

THAT promised letter was, however, strangely long in coming. July passed, and the best part of August, and not a syllable had been heard from Roy. The children, from never hearing his name spoken, began to look upon his very existence as little better than a myth, and ceased to talk or even think of him, whilst Roger and his wife began to feel pretty certain that something had happened which had sufficed to put the lad on his guard against them.

"It is provoking," was Mrs. Edington's remark from time to time, "but it is no use pushing things on too fast: we had better wait quietly and see what happens."

She was glad afterwards that she had given this advice, for at last the long-expected letter came, giving a full explanation of the delay; but August was nearly over before the missive came.

"Dear Mr. Edington (Roy wrote):

"You must have wondered why I never sent you the letter I promised, but the fact is I have been ill for a great many weeks, and not inclined for the trouble of writing letters; though as it is only my foot that is hurt, perhaps I ought to have managed it sooner. You wanted to be sure that I was properly provided for, and that my future was well assured. I told you I was sure it would be, and so it is. Everything is quite right, and I shall have all I want. It is kind of you to feel so much interest in me, but you may be quite satisfied now.

"My brother Marcus is away from home just now, and will not be back, I am afraid, for a few weeks longer. They couldn't get on without him at St. Petersburg, for some diplomatic business there. He belonged to the embassy for a long time, and it seems as if, now they have got him again, they mean to keep him. He has been away since the beginning of the month, and his last letter says that his work is not half done yet. It must be a bore in some ways to be so clever and so useful. He quite hoped when he left, to be back in three weeks; but things had got into a mess during his absence, and he has to stop till they are put right again.

"I have a friend staying with me, so I am not lonely, which is a good thing, as I am still too lame to get about and amuse myself. Unluckily he will not be able to stay much longer, as his ship is almost ready for service again (he is in the Royal Navy, and got an unexpected holiday by his ship's getting knocked about in a heavy gale), and he will have to go, but I dare say I shall be better myself by that time. It is stupid not being able to walk or ride or get about.

"I am afraid this letter is all about myself, but I don't know much news mewed up here. Please remember me kindly to the members of your family, although I have not seen them.

"Yours sincerely.

"ROY EDINGTON."

This letter was read with a good deal of interest both by Roger and his wife.

"It is frank and friendly in tone, but too boyish to tell us much. It's a pity he has been ill so long; he would have gone into greater detail had he written at once."

This was Roger's comment, his wife's was of a different nature.

"It is a very satisfactory letter in every way. Its tone shows that no prejudice exists in his mind with reference to us, which is a very important matter. It tells us as much as there is any need for us to know at present of his future prospects, and it gives you an excellent pretext for paying him another visit."

"A visit. You think I had better go and see him again?"

"I do; and see if you cannot get him to wish to change his own abode, at least for a while, The brother is out of the way and cannot interfere, and the boy is evidently sufficiently dull, and in dread of being quite alone. He is certain to be pleased to see you; and, as after an illness, change of air is likely enough to be recommended for him, you might easily prevail upon him and his friends to let you take him away with you. If sea air is recommended, we are in the direct route to Brighton. He could come here on his way to make our acquaintance, and we could then judge of the desirability of his prosecuting the journey farther. He would be better provided with funds if he were starting for a few weeks at Brighton, and as he is lame and unwell he might not rise all at once to the proposal of paying a visit amongst strangers, even though they are his own people. But if you could get him to leave home with you, and come here on his way to the sea, we might, amongst us, prevail upon him to change his plan and remain with us. The children would be wild for him to stay, and if he is the pleasant, open-hearted sort of lad he seems, he might not be impervious to entreaty. We must make him comfortable as far as we can, at any rate, at first; later on, of course, it may be our duty to tell him the whole truth and explain his true position; but there need be no hurry about that, if he will but be reasonable and submissive."

Roger secretly thought that it would take a stronger nature than Roy's to be rebellious against the power of his wife. He stood a little in awe of her himself, her will had long dominated the whole household. In his business-office at Thorne he ruled supreme; but in his own home his wife was queen regnant. His confidence in her capacity reconciled him to the secondary part he often found himself reduced to play.

This new plan of hers was accepted as a matter of course. Roger had far less reluctance to visit the Hermitage again in the absence of its owner, than he would have felt had Marcus been at home. He had a perception that the young diplomatist would have seen at once through the hollow disguise of his purpose, and would have declined to allow Roy to accompany him, unless a formal intimation from his father were forthcoming, to the effect that he desired to take over the guardianship that had lapsed to him at the death of Roy's so-called mother. And Roger and his wife were not wishful to commit themselves so far. They had not yet made up their minds as to whether they wished to keep Roy with them altogether during his minority; all they wanted at present was a good opportunity for studying his character, and for ascertaining as nearly as possible in a natural and easy way what his exact prospects were, and how far they were likely to be of advantage to themselves. They had an immense source of influence and power over him, as they very well knew, if only it were rightly used. The ruin and poverty (apparent if not now altogether genuine) entailed upon this family by his father, could not fail to touch Roy nearly, and if he himself were succeeding to affluence and independence it was more than probable that he would feel it incumbent upon him to do something for these cousins of his who might well have looked to be as well off in this world's goods as himself. If Roger felt some vindictiveness towards the son of the man who had brought such trouble and loss upon them, his wife had no personal enmity to indulge. She thought that, as a simple matter of justice, Roy ought to be made to see the true bearings of the case, and to taste something of the ills of poverty and straightened means; but she did not wish him ill, and if she found him amenable to influence and malleable in her hands, she was ready to be kind to him in her own hard, unsympathetic fashion.

As for "the children," as the junior portion of the family were invariably designated, they were quite wild with excitement when they were told that their father had really gone away to fetch Cousin Roy home with him; and when it was explained to them that they must all do as much as they could to make him happy and persuade him to stay, there was no lack of protestations on their part that they would do everything they could, that they "would not let him go."

They not unnaturally looked at him in the light of their own especial visitor. True, he was just eighteen, and that almost made him a man in the estimation of his younger cousins, but then he was much nearer their age than that of their parents, or even of Aunt Joan, and it was quite certain in their minds that he would prefer the schoolroom and their society to that of their mother's so-called drawing-room. The children so disliked being downstairs, or in the presence of their parents, that they felt an absolute certainty of obtaining Roy as a sort of lawful and willing prey.

Joan's feelings on the subject of the impending visit were the most mixed. She looked forward to the change and variety it must make with a good deal of pleasure, but she disliked and distrusted the double and self-seeking motives of her brother and sister-in-law; and she was of opinion that if Roy were in delicate health, a home like this was a very unsuitable place for him to come to. The air might be fine and pure, the living plain and wholesome. Illness was little known amongst the inmates of Windmill House, and a somewhat Spartan severity in the manner of living was often recommended as healthful and bracing. Perhaps it might be for those brought up to it; but Roy was used to something altogether different, and it seemed hardly the right time to introduce him to a new régime. Joan, however, was quite helpless in the matter. She could only wait and watch, and hope for the best.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR.

THE BOYS' BRIGADE.

ONE of the most thriving religious movements of late years is that of which Glasgow is the centre, and which, in four years, has grown a hundred-and-sixty-fold. What is this Boys' Brigade, of which so much is heard?

Can it be that we have here, at last, the long-sought secondary school of moral discipline and education which Sunday School managers have desired, and that it has come combined in a quite unexpected manner with a means of strengthening the nation? North of the Tweed there are many who think so, and the spread of the movement in the great cities of the south seems to prove that the Scotch are not alone in their opinion.

Of its origin and aim a very clear account is given by the Brigade Secretary in its "Manual."[1] It originated in October, 1883, in the Woodside Mission Sunday School. On the roll of this school are from 700 to 800 scholars; the number of boys and girls being about equal. One branch of the mission organisation is an admirable Young Men's Club and Institute, with a Fellowship Meeting on Sunday, a Debating Society on a week-night, a capital Library, and comfortable Reading and Recreation Rooms open every night in the week. All these advantages are open to any young man on attaining the age of seventeen (the usual minimum age for young men's societies), and yet the fact remained that out of this great school of nearly 400 boys, hardly any of them ever got the length of the senior organisation, which was almost entirely recruited from outside, and not from the school as it ought to have been. It was felt that there was something wrong here. The managers were face to face with a two-fold difficulty not unusual. Not only did they fail to keep the bulk of the boys in the school until they reached the age of seventeen, but those they did keep were not turning out the sort of young men they desired to see. And so the idea of the Boys' Brigade was conceived, and wrought out with a view to overcome these difficulties; and experience has shown that, wisely conducted, it

[1] The Boys' Brigade: its origin, aims, methods, and results. A Manual for the use of officers. Compiled by William A. Smith, Brigade Secretary, 22 West Nile Street, Glasgow.

COME UNTO ME
ALL YE THAT LABOUR
AND ARE HEAVY LADEN
AND I WILL GIVE YOU REST.
Matthew XI.28.

is capable of fulfilling the anticipations that had been formed concerning it. It is not only retaining the boys in the Sunday School, but, while doing so, it is being made the means of moulding their lives and characters for Christ, and encouraging them in every way to take their stand on His side as the best and noblest thing a boy can do.

In proceeding to work out the idea of the Brigade, it was thought that nothing could be so attractive to a boy as some organisation of a military nature. Boys are inherently fond of soldiering and drill, and it was decided to take hold of this fact. "We often hear the complaint that so few boys are Christians. Is it not possible that in Christian work among boys, we may have gone too much on the lines of seeking to commend Christianity to them by showing the boy the same side of it as would commend it to the gentler nature of the girl? Christ is the Christ for men and women, for boys and girls, but the aspect of Christ which naturally appeals to a boy's nature is that of His Manliness; that of the Stainless Leader, without fear, and without reproach; the Leader who commands his reverence, and constrains him to aim at being worthy to follow in His train." It was on this idea that the Boys' Brigade was founded. It was determined to try and win the boys for Christ, by presenting to them that view of Christianity to which their natures would most readily respond, being fully conscious how much more there was to show them after they had been won. It was felt that what boys wanted more than anything else in these days, was to be taught habits of reverence, obedience, discipline, and self-respect, all of which would spring naturally from such an organisation as was contemplated; and that these habits would form the best foundation for useful Christian lives. It also seemed that by associating Christianity with all that was most noble and manly in a boy's sight, much would be done to disabuse his mind of the idea that there is anything effeminate or weak about Christianity, an idea that is widespread among boys, as all who have to do with them can testify.

And so was formed the original company, now known as the 1st Glasgow, of the Boys' Brigade. The aim was to create in the company a sentiment that would make the boys proud of their company, jealous of its honour, ashamed to do anything that would disgrace it, and prepared to make any sacrifice rather than be dismissed from it. How heartily the boys took up the work, and how earnestly they entered into it, is shown by the fact that there are to-day boys in the company who have been members for three years, and during that time have never been one minute late for drill, nor once missed the Bible class on Sunday morning.

The idea met with so much approval from gentlemen connected with other Sunday Schools that several other companies on the same lines were soon instituted. In the belief that much might be gained in the way of mutual help and encouragement by forming an association, a meeting took place on the 26th of January, 1885, at which the Boys' Brigade was constituted. The organisation made such rapid progress, however, that it soon became necessary to adapt the constitution to the national scope that the movement was assuming, and accordingly the original constitution was superseded by that now in existence, which was adopted at a meeting of the Council held at Glasgow on the 28th of September, in the same year.

The unit of organisation is the company. As an example let us take this 1st Glasgow Company, which consists of eight squads and four band squads, making 79 rank and file in all. With the rank and file we count the non-commissioned officers, of whom there are twelve—5 sergeants, 3 corporals, and 4 lance-corporals. The first promotions in a company are by examination, held after the boys have had eight or ten drills. The candidates have all to be over fourteen years of age, and are examined one by one in practical drill in such movements as each boy can go through individually. Supposing six non-coms are wanted, the twelve best boys in the practical examination are eligible for the written one, held on a subsequent evening, and mainly made up of questions on drill. Marks are given, and the candidates with most marks get the step, although there is a certain allowance made for general suitability.

The company has its special "Card and Squad List," giving, besides the company rules and other information, the names and addresses of the officers, the names and addresses of the boys arranged in squads, the prize list, the drill card with syllabus of drills from the beginning of the session up to the inspection, the programme of the Bible-class, and particulars as to the company cricket club, football club, gymnastic club, swimming club, recreation and social meetings, and any other agency at work for the good of the boys of that particular company.

The company rules of the 1st Glasgow are: 1. Members must at all times set an example of good conduct to their comrades and other boys. 2. At the company Bible-class there must be quietness and attention, and at all times perfect reverence during prayer. 3. Members must conduct themselves in a quiet and orderly manner when going to or from parade. 4. Members must come on parade in uniform, sharp to the hour, looking smart and clean, and must always bring with them their hymn-cards and membership-cards. 5. Members must give prompt and cheerful obedience to the orders of their officers and non-commissioned officers, and will be held responsible for making themselves acquainted with all the orders posted on the company notice-board. 6. Members must always salute their officers when they meet them or go up to address them, either on or off parade, and must always use "sir" when addressing an officer. 7. During drill there must be no talking in the ranks, except when standing easy. 8. Any member who misses two drills running, without good and satisfactory reason, shall be struck off the roll. 9. Any member changing his address must at once intimate the change in writing to the captain of the company, and the non-commissioned officer of his squad. 10. A company record-book shall be kept, in which every boy's conduct, good or bad, shall be duly recorded. The record in this book shall count more than anything else either for or against a boy's promotion.

In addition to these rules there are five general instructions, giving the keynote to the whole scheme. These are: "The officers expect every member of the company to be a total abstainer, and neither to smoke nor chew tobacco. To show kindness and politeness to every one, and never to miss a chance of doing any one a good turn. Never to use bad language in any shape or form. Always to prefer duty to either pleasure or inclination. To be true to Christ." That is the important point. As the second article of the constitution lays it down—"The object of the Brigade shall be the advancement of Christ's kingdom among boys, and the promotion of habits of reverence, discipline, self-respect, and all that tends towards true Christian manliness."

The success of a company depends very much on the captain. The Brigade is a Christian organisation, and it is absolutely essential that the captain should be in entire sympathy with the Christian side of the work, and prepared to throw himself heart and soul into it. He ought, of course, to be capable of giving the company the necessary military instruction; and in order to assist him in this and not to be taken unawares and fail through indecision, it is part of his duty to have the programme for each evening cut and dry before he appears on parade: but the efficiency in drill is but a means to the end.

The officers having been chosen, the next step in the formation of a company is to obtain the sanction of the church, mission, or school with which it is proposed to work. That having been obtained, the notices of the first meeting are issued, inviting boys, of from twelve to seventeen, to become recruits, and a general explanation given of the character of the duties required.

The first night but a very few boys appear, as a rule; but a good drill, and a short interesting address, send them away with a good report, and at the second meeting there is nearly always a large accession of strength.

Thirty or forty recruits having been secured, the Brigade secretary, or battalion secretary in such towns as a battalion exists, is communicated with, and the necessary forms and cards of membership obtained. These are distributed with some ceremony, and the boys are then formally admitted as members of the Brigade, and reported ready for equipment. A contribution of from half-a-sovereign to a sovereign is expected from each company, towards the Brigade expenses, and this fund is raised, as a rule, by charging a small entrance-fee from each member.

The next outlay is for uniform caps, which are sold at fourpence a-piece by the contractors; the next for belts, which cost elevenpence each. The belts remain the property of the company, and all are numbered, issued and withdrawn each season, as is done with the arms in the Volunteer Service.

When the equipment is complete, the only further expense is for prizes offered for special efficiency, regularity of attendance, essays written for the Bible-class, and musical proficiency among the band-boys, in cases where a band has been formed.

In the 1st Glasgow, the prize-list is a long one. There are four Bible Essay prizes, given to the boys, in order of merit, who gain the highest number of marks for examination papers and essays on the subject of the lesson in the syllabus; and the boys are also qualified to take part in the "Free Church Welfare of Youth" scheme, which has a series of thirteen prizes for Bible knowledge, ranging in value from four pounds to one. There are six prizes for efficiency and attendance given to the boys with the highest number of attendance marks for drill and Bible-class; and there is an inspecting officer's prize for the boy with the best record. There is a Squad Challenge medal, held for one year by the non-commissioned officer whose squad has the highest average attendance of drill and Bible-class. There are three band prizes; and, in addition to all these, each boy who has served three sessions in the company is entitled to wear on the right arm a silver star, which is presented by the company at, and after, the preliminary inspection at the close of the third year.

So much for the rewards; now for the work.

The company Bible-class meets every Sunday morning at half-past nine; and, during the session, a part of one of the Gospels is steadily gone through. At every meeting there is an essay read, or address given, the essayists being the members of the company, the speakers being well-known men, such as the Rev. George Reith and Dr. Morrison, or the captain and lieutenants of the company. A preparation for this Bible-class is insisted on. Every boy has to read the passage for the next lesson carefully and thoughtfully, so as to have something to say about it, or some question to ask about it, the remarks or questions being generally written and handed in before the class begins. To the class the boys bring their Bibles, hymn-books, text-books, and note-books.

The text-book used for the drill is the official "Field Exercises" sold by the military publishers, and if model arms be adopted, "Rifle Exercises" is used in addition to the first and second parts of the Field series. Half an hour before every meeting a squad of the company, on a roster kept for the purpose, comes on "fatigue duty" to clear the hall, and have everything in readiness for the "fall in." As soon as the company is "sized" and formed, caps are lifted, and prayer offered up by one of the officers, or a collect or prayer repeated by the boys. Then the drill begins—a thoroughly efficient soldierly drill, with the band in readiness to help the marching. At the close a suitable hymn, such as "Onward, Christian soldiers," is sung, and there is then a short appropriate address, lasting from five to ten minutes, the speakers being as varied and telling as possible. After the address the Lord's Prayer is repeated, and the National Anthem sung; and then, instead of the usual "break off," the boys are marched out of the hall, in single file, each boy saluting, as he passes, the senior officer.

In the 1st Glasgow, the month of September is devoted to recruit-drill, on Tuesdays and Thursdays, at 8 P.M. On the 1st of October there is a drill for old members and recruits, ending in the presentation of the new membership cards. Next week the belts are issued, and the Sunday after there is a company Church parade. Thenceforth, the drills go on regularly at 8 P.M. every Thursday, up to the second Thursday in March, when there is a special drill, preparatory to inspection. A week after, the preliminary inspection is held, and the parents and friends are present to hear the announcement of the prize-winners. Next week comes the inspection by some army officer of eminence, concluding with an address from a minister, and the presentation of the prizes. Next week comes the long-looked-forward-to social meeting, with which the session ends.

In addition to this social meeting it is customary for the officers to invite the boys to tea, a squad at a time; the evening being made thoroughly enjoyable with games and music, and always ending with family prayers. "Try and visit every boy in your company at his home," says the Manual. "If a boy is laid up, go and see him as often as you can. In every way let the boys feel that you are always thinking of them. Miss no opportunity of strengthening your hold over them. Give the non-commissioned officers and all the boys as much to do as you can in connection with the company and the school. Trust the boys. There is nothing better for a boy than to have his feelings of honour and responsibility drawn out. The worst boys are often completely transformed by what to many of them is the new revelation that there is some one who trusts them. Never break faith with a boy, even in the most trifling matter. Confidence in their officers is an absolute essential to success; and confidence can only be built up by slow degrees. Hence no chance should be missed, however slight, of strengthening the confidence of the boys in their officers. We cannot overestimate the importance of the Brigade work, the tremendous issues that are bound up in it, or the responsibility that rests upon us, as officers, over these boys. To think of them as we know them, in all the freshness of their boyhood, full of life and energy and vigour, and to think of all that being taken and used for the service of Christ, is surely enough to inspire every one of us, and make us thank God that He has privileged us to take a part, however small, in this great movement."

In addition to the "squad teas" and "social meeting," there is a "camp" held in the summer, and in the spring there is a "march-out and athletic sports." In February there is an annual concert given by the band and the company, the proceeds of which go to swell the funds, and relieve the pockets of the members; and from time to time during the session special instruction and recreation meetings are held.

There are two clubs which are well supported. The swimming club consists of all the members of the company, and has the privilege granted to it by the Magistrates and Council of Glasgow, of using the corporation baths at half rates, the boys being encouraged to take advantage of the winter months to learn swimming, when the baths are not crowded. The cricket club is open to all members of the company on payment of a small annual subscription, the usual presentation bat being given by the president at the close of the season.

By these, and other means, persistent influence is brought to bear on the boys to keep them in the right path in work or play. Every company has its clubs, and as soon as these are formed, information is sent to the battalion secretary, so that matches can be arranged between company and company.

When three or more companies have been started in any town or district, they are encouraged to form themselves into a "battalion." The officers then constitute a "battalion council," with president, secretary, and treasurer, whose duty it is to admit new companies, and do their utmost to promote the object of the Brigade in their immediate district. When the battalion has been formed the companies report to it, instead of reporting direct to the Brigade headquarters. In the Glasgow battalion there are now over seventy companies; and there are battalions at Edinburgh, Beith, Kilmarnock, and Ayr, and others are in course of formation.

There are also new companies at Inverness and Penzance, and in Manchester, Liverpool, and London, and the movement is afoot even in America and the Colonies.

Such is the interest of the boys in the work, and their love for their company, that the difficulty now pressing is not how to keep them in the Brigade, but how to get them to leave it when they reach the age at which they are expected to pass on to the young men's societies connected with the churches and missions.

W. J. GORDON.

SANTA LUCIA.

A STORY OF CORSICA.

CHAPTER IV.

THAT same evening the Italian colporteur, returning late at night to Tralonca from Santa Lucia, was surprised to see a man carrying, what appeared to him a woman's dead body, cross the brook that runs just where the mule-path branches off to Corte, and clamber up the rocks above, with the body in his arms.

The colporteur was astonished at the sight, as no dwelling was visible on the rocks about. True, there might be a herdsman's stone-hut; but women seldom, if ever, lived in such inaccessible dwellings. Long the colporteur stood, wondering, and watching the man, till he reached a ledge, behind which he disappeared.

Almost immediately the man began redescending the rocks. Soon he was by the colporteur's side, and confronted him: "I have heard you are clever at bleeding. You must come with me; she is in a swoon—she must be bled!"

The colporteur, who was known to have some skill in dressing wounds and burns, and in administering simple remedies, was nothing surprised at the request, and followed the man, who took his bundle from him and carried it for him.

When they came to the spot where the man had seemed to deposit the body, there was none to be seen, but removing from a rock a mass of creepers, the strange man disclosed in the rock a narrow cavity behind, through which both penetrated into a good-sized cavern, where on a bed the body lay.

The colporteur with a lancet performed the operation, administered restoratives, and recommended the strange man to persist in friction of the feet till animation and warmth returned.

"E ma moglie?" he asked.

"E mia figlia!" was the reply.

As the colporteur turned to go, the man asked him eagerly one question—

"Il Signore puo Egli perdonare ogni peccato?"

("Can the Lord forgive every sin?")

The colporteur paused, said a word of hope, and as he left, gave the man a copy of St. John, with the page turned down to chap. viii. and verses 34, 35, 36 underlined:—

"Jesus answered them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin.

"And the servant abideth not in the house for ever: but the Son abideth ever.

"If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed."

Margherita's body had been laid out for burial in the stone-hut which served as the morgue for the village of St. Lucia. Judge of the surprise of the villagers when, on the morrow, it was found that the body was gone. No one could explain the mystery. The colporteur could have done so, but he did not return to the neighbourhood again for some months. When he did so, and made inquiries about the strange man, the mystery was solved. The cavern was visited, and a man was found there almost a skeleton, dying of starvation. He could not speak! Feebly he pointed to a passage in a tiny book he held between his wasted fingers; and then the light in his eyes expired, and his pulse ceased beating.

And there sat by his side and sobbed like a child poor Margherita. Her consciousness had returned, and with it her reason. But she had found herself unable to walk. When she discovered with whom it was that she was shut up in that cavern, her horror had been great, but the immense sorrow and repentance of the poor wretch, the sufferings he had undergone, his humble, suppliant, pitiful demeanour, disarmed her anger and loathing. And when she saw how he starved himself to feed her, how he was at pains to procure her nourishment and bring it to her, at any sacrifice of his own convenience, she pitied him for the misery his crime had brought upon him.

And where all this time was Santa Lucia? She had heard the sound of movement at the first moment Catalan had set the rock rolling, and springing back to see whence it came, had escaped the blow that the same instant crushed her companion. With a wild shriek of mingled pain and despair, she threw herself upon him, lifted him in her arms, and strove to bear him to the bank, but her strength failed her. Then she saw Margherita approach and vanish. The second boulder fell, and not apprehending what had happened, Santa Lucia flew down the path, with a cry for help. Happily she was heard and quickly recognised. The peasants carried news of some disaster to her home. Her uncle hurried, with attendants, to the rescue.

There on the ground lay two bodies. It seemed as if all life had fled from Margherita's. Pietro was groaning, unable to move. Santa Lucia's uncle gently raised him. He groaned more than ever. One of the party ran to fetch the doctor. He came. Other men followed bringing trestles; long poles with stout canvas stretched across. Pietro Rocca was laid on one, and the apparently lifeless form of Margherita on the other, while Santa Lucia followed with such sadness and sorrow in her as she had never known before.

SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

OBEDIENCE AND DISOBEDIENCE.

1. What feelings were produced in Adam as the result of his sin?
2. What special command did Noah receive from God, and how was his obedience rewarded?
3. What principle supported him in his obedience?
4. Which of Abraham's acts of obedience is the most remarkable, and why?
5. What undertaking did the Israelites venture upon in spite of God's prohibition? And how did they fare?
6. Enumerate some of the curses pronounced on the Israelites in the event of their continued disobedience to God's commands.
7. In what point did Saul transgress God's commandment with respect to the Amalekites?
8. What was Samuel's utterance with regard to this? Quote other passages of Scripture of the same import.
9. Relate the story of the disobedient prophet.
10. Which of the commandments enjoins obedience to parents? What remark does St. Paul make upon it?
11. Find a passage in the Proverbs in which disobedience to parents is strongly denounced.
12. By what subterfuge did the Jews connive at a breach of this commandment?
13. In what language does St. Paul describe our Lord's obedience to the will of God?

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. V.—p. 80.—SHIELD AND HELMET.—Eph. vi. 16, 17.

1. S-trengt-h . . . . . Psa. viii. 2.
2. H-op-e . . . . . Rom. v. 5.
3. I-do-l . . . . . 1 Cor. viii. 5.
4. E-stee-m . . . . . 1 Thes. v. 13.
5. L-ov-e . . . . . Gal. v. 22.
6. D-us-t . . . . . Gen. iii. 19.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. II.—p. 96.

1. Psa. lxxiv. 8.
2. Neh. viii. 2; ix. 1; Zech. vii. 5.
3. Matt. xxiv. 6; James ii. 2, 3.
4. Luke viii. 41; Acts xviii. 8–17.
5. Rev. i. 20, etc.
6. Luke iv. 20.
7. Luke vii. 5.
8. Acts xiii. 14; xiv. 1; xvii. 1 and 2, 10; xviii. 4.
9. Psalm cxxxvii. 1; Acts xvi. 13.
10. Luke iv. 17; Acts xiii. 15; xv. 21.
11. Matt. vii. 29; Luke iv. 21; Acts xiii. 15.
12. 2 Kings ii. 3; vi. 1.
13. Acts iii. 1; x. 3, 9.
14. Matt. v. 22; xi. 17; Mark xiv. 12; Luke xii. 11; xxi. 12; Acts ix. 2; xxii. 19, 15; Acts vi. 9.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXV.—VINCENT.

VINCENT THINKS THAT "SUNSHINE WILL CHEER THEM ALL BETTER THAN ANYTHING."

A MONTH of Marcus's absence had already flown by, and Roy showed no signs of having lost ground or suffered in spirits. It would have been rather difficult, indeed, to give way to depression with a companion like Vincent near him; and though undoubtedly Marcus was much missed, a change of faces acted beneficially upon the patient. In the society of his young companions, who came and went almost as freely as if the house were their own, Roy regained some of his old gaiety of spirit, and began to look more "like himself," as his friends phrased it.

Vincent was a capital companion for him—strong and handy and ready of resource. He had a sailor's dexterity and ingenuity of contrivance, as well as a sailor's high spirits and love of fun. He was a regular magnet to his brothers and sisters, who spent half their day at the Hermitage; and Roy, tired of inaction, and eager to be on his feet again, no longer shrank from exertions that he had been inclined to avoid heretofore. Mr. Lee sanctioned his efforts at getting about, as his general health was suffering from prolonged inactivity; but it was patent to all that it would be some considerable time before the foot would be serviceable again, and it was still painful as well as weak, and would allow no liberties taken with it without resenting them.

However, Roy was satisfied with his advance, and well entertained by his guest. He listened unwearied to Vincent's stories, and built up again the airy castles that he and his friend had so often erected together. Vincent's dreams seemed in a fair way of being realised, for his chosen career was his own, and he seemed likely to rise in his profession; but a haziness hung over Roy's future, and his castle-building was of a vague, indeterminate character, fascinating, perhaps, but hardly satisfactory to a practical mind like Vincent's.

"But what are you going to be, Roy?" he asked one evening. "It's all very well to talk about ambassadors and prime ministers and governor-generals, but one can't leap straight away into berths like those. What are you going to settle on, and when are you going to begin your career?"

"Oh, Marcus will settle all that. I expect it will be the diplomatic service. I like all I hear of it, and he has influence there, and could give me introductions, and help me on. But Marcus will settle things. He's the kind of fellow one can trust to do the best by one."

Vincent screwed up his brown face.

"Not so sure of that, old chap. You take things uncommon easy, but most fellows like a voice of their own when it comes to the choice of their whole future, even when they have parents to study their interests. I should never have got to sea if I hadn't made a stand for it myself; and you, with only a step-brother to look to, ought to have a keen eye for your own affairs. Marcus may be a great paragon—by all accounts he seems to be one—but I suppose I've a natural distrust of paragons, for I should like to see you looking out for yourself. Don't you drift along too easily, Roy; it's your nature, you know, to trust too much to wind and tide, and let them take you where they will. You ought to be keeping an outlook ahead, or you'll be running foul of a rock or a quicksand. Why aren't you going to Oxford or Cambridge, as was talked of once? I never hear a word of it now, and Syd looks glum whenever the subject comes up."

Roy flushed up quickly. It was a topic he never quite cared to think about, and never desired to discuss.

"Oh, that's all been given up," he said hastily. "My mother didn't wish it, and Marcus thinks I ought to act according to her wishes. I don't care about it, really; I'm just as well pleased to be here; and if this foot is going to be a bother for some time, and stop my rowing, or playing cricket or football, I might just as well stop at home. Half the fun of the 'Varsity is its games and athletics."

Vincent made no reply. He was just wise enough to see the folly of unsettling Roy's mind when he had made it up to submission; but he privately thought this elder brother, whom he had not seen for half-a-dozen years at least, a terrible tyrant and ogre, and was by no means prepared to endorse the opinions he had heard expressed both by Roy and his own people at home.

"Because he saved Lily's life nobody can see his faults, and they all rave about him," was Vincent's mental comment. "But it's all nonsense to think that because a fellow can do a plucky thing on the spur of the moment, that his whole conduct is beyond criticism. If any of them had knocked about the world as much as I have, they would know better than that. Of course, the fellow has his good points—I'm the last person to deny it; but I don't altogether like the way he's treating Roy, and I shan't pretend I do. He's a fellow that wants shaking up out of his home-bred ways. He'll be no good at all, if he goes idling on in this aimless way much longer. He's got the making of a capital fellow in him, but he'll never be half a man if he isn't sent out to rough it in some sort of a fashion. Why, to my certain knowledge, he has never left the Hermitage all his life, save to go to the seaside or London for a few weeks with his mamma. And he hasn't ever been to school, only read with my father and the boys. I don't know how they expect him to be a man. It wasn't to be expected that his mother would be willing to spare him—a hen with one chick is proverbial; but there is no excuse for Marcus."

Vincent kept these thoughts to himself, however, but, in one of his temperament, silence was a pretty good indication of dissatisfaction; and Roy, who was decidedly sensitive where his brother was concerned, knew in a moment that his explanation was not satisfactory to his companion. It was a wet afternoon—one of those depressing summer days when the closeness of the air, and the perpetual drip and swish of the drenched leaves, make rain more dismal than in winter. Nobody had come across to the Hermitage that day, and the boys had given up expecting visitors now.

For the first time they were feeling a little dull, and Roy was conscious of that inward misgiving and irritation that now and then assailed him with regard to his own ambiguous position. He never felt it when Marcus was by; but he could not help doing so at times in his absence, and although he had written, a day or two back, to Mr. Edington, assuring him that all was right, he could not help entertaining an unwilling misgiving, and felt that he would give much to get rid of the knowledge he had been at such pains to acquire, or else share it with some one who would be able both to sympathise with and to reassure him.

Vincent's good-will and sympathy were perfectly safe; but he would most likely be wrathful towards Marcus, and suggest it was by his underhand influence that so strange a will had been made. This was just what Roy did not wish to believe—just what would keep forcing itself into his mind; and the boy, though full of high principle and anxiety to do and to think aright, had not yet found that source of strength that enables a man to resist temptation, and to vanquish the evil thoughts and suspicions that so often assail us in weaker moments.

Vincent's words had aroused a sense of the unsatisfactory dependence of his future position. A sort of irritation at the injustice of it filled his mind. For the time being, at least, he felt that his brother had acted the part of supplanter, and deserved little consideration at his hands. Why should he not tell Vincent all? Vincent was his oldest friend—the "chum" of his boyhood, and his main confidant. Temptation half yielded to becomes tenfold more strong; in a few minutes all Roy's scruples were scattered to the winds.

"The long and the short of it, I believe, is this, Vincent. The University is the place for rich men or their sons (poor men want no end of brain to make their way, and that I haven't got), and so I dare say Marcus feels I am better away. I have got my own living to earn, and ought to learn how to do it as early as possible."

Vincent's eye-brows went up.

"Why so? Surely you will come into a tidy little fortune of your own when you come of age? Everybody says so."

"Everybody makes a mistake then. I shall not come into a penny. I have not a penny in the world of my own now."

"You must be making a mistake, Roy. I know your mother had money."

"Yes she had; but she left everything to Marcus. I have seen the will. Nothing at all comes to me."

Vincent uttered a long whistle.

"Marcus says it will make no difference—" began Roy, but was quickly cut short.

"Marcus talks like a fool, then, and acts like a knave. No difference, indeed! You're not such a simpleton as to believe that, Roy! What on earth does it all mean?"

"I don't know. I want to think it all right; but I find the best thing is not to think at all more than I can help. I don't want to be covetous—I don't think I love money for its own sake; but when one has been brought up as I have been, and led to expect that things would always be much the same, it is a little odd to find oneself left dependent upon a fellow who really is no relation at all, and might throw one over any day. I don't mean that Marcus would, you know; but he could, of course, and it isn't a comfortable feeling quite, even though we've always been like brothers, and I have the greatest confidence in him."

"Confidence!" repeated Vincent with a sort of angry snort, "that's the last thing I should have in the man who had supplanted me like that. I should dispute that will, if I were you, Roy, it's a scandal to let it stand."

Roy smiled a little bitterly.

"It takes money to go to law, Vincent; and what chance should I have of winning my case? My mother was in full possession of her senses up to the very end of her life, and very tender and loving to me always. That makes it the harder to understand—only that she loved Marcus almost as much, and had such immense confidence in him."

"And he had great influence over her, I suppose?"

"Oh, yes, she would do anything he wished. She thought there was nobody like him."

Vincent's face was very stern and set; he had in a measure infected Roy with his own feelings, though he had not spoken out with his customary frankness. Yet the boy's better nature struggled to assert itself.

"After all, there are other things of more importance in the world than money—mother was always telling me that, always warning me not to place too great love or confidence in riches. It's rather difficult not to feel them of paramount importance sometimes—or, at least, of very great value; but I don't mean to bother myself more than I can help, and don't you bother either, Vincent."

Vincent however was silent, and not with the silence of acquiescence.

CHAPTER XXVI.—A VISITOR FOR ROY.

"It's a horrid shame! I don't think I ever heard anything quite like it in all my life! I don't want to say harsh things of a fellow, especially as he's liked here, and has given us cause to be grateful to him; but, really, I do think it's the greatest swindle I ever heard in my life, and Roy's blindness is simply inconceivable. Actions speak louder than words, and if your paragon had had a spark of right feeling he would have taken care to have stopped such an insane proceeding. He ought to have burnt the will outright, and then Roy would have come in as heir-at-law, or something. My blood boils at the whole business."

This explosion of wrath took place on the following day, in the school-room of Coombe Drayton. It was a wet morning; and Roy, after a bad night, was not astir when Vincent dashed across the fields to see the home party. He felt the need of relieving his pent up feelings, and a good out-pouring of indignation did him good.

"I always did detest paragons, from my youth upwards!" concluded the lad with a sort of triumphant peroration. "I never did quite believe all your laudations of Marcus. My recollection of him was that he was rather a prig. History seems to have revealed him as something worse."

"If that's true what you say about the will, it explains everything," cried Syd, with indignant protest in every tone of his voice. "I never could make out why he wouldn't send him to Oxford: now it's as plain as a pike-staff!"

"Do you mean that he grudged him the money?" asked Joyce quickly.

"What else could it be?"

"Well, I call it all a beastly shame!" burst out Jacko with boyish vehemence. "I wonder Marcus isn't ashamed to look any one in the face again."

"No wonder he tried to hush it all up, and keep Roy in the dark!"

"No wonder there was no reading of the will!"

"I always thought there was something odd in the way Roy was always treated—so like a child—never told anything about anything, just because he was a minor. As if people could not understand things till they were twenty-one!"

"I never quite liked Marcus. His fine gentleman airs were such a bore!"

"It's been twice as jolly at the Hermitage since he left. One never feels at home when he is about."

"Such hypocrisy, to pretend he kept Roy at home because he couldn't bear to part with him! I've no patience with him at all!"

Young people are very like sheep. Where one leads, all will often follow. Vincent had come home in a state of great indignation and irritation, with his account of the transaction, and had found no difficulty in communicating his feelings to the party of brothers and sisters in the schoolroom. Muriel alone had remained silent, but it was not the silence of indifference, as could be seen from the variation of colour in her face, and from the quick glances she flashed from time to time at the speakers. She did not attempt to stem the torrent, although she had an instinotive distaste for hard words and hasty judgments. She had shared, indeed, in the general sense of astonishment and disfavour; but she could not all at once condemn Marcus. After all, it might be no doing of his. He could not be held responsible for all his step-mother did; but yet if not done by his consent, why did he not make reparation?

Little Lilias looked up at her pleadingly.

"Why are they all so angry with Marcus? He has not done anything wrong, has he?"

"I hope not, dear," she answered very low. "Don't trouble about it. You are much too little to understand."

"I understand that they are all angry with Marcus," whispered Lilias, "and it makes me sorry, because I love him very much. You don't think he would do anything wrong and unkind, do you?"

"I hope not, Lilias, but it is very hard to know always what is right. We will go into the greenhouse now and get some flowers for the rooms. Those outside will be too washed with the rain to be any good."

Muriel's departure with the little sister produced a sort of lull.

"She doesn't like to hear us slanging into Marcus," cried Jacko mischievously.

"Marcus has been her hero ever since he rescued Lilias," added Topsy.

They all looked a little grave then, remembering what they owed to the much-abused Marcus, and the twins in particular, who knew that it was their rashness that had so nearly cost the life of their little sister, grew quite quiet. But for Marcus a life-long sorrow and remorse would have been theirs.

"Well," said Vincent, "I must be off again to Roy. The poor old chap is rather down in the mouth; talking his prospects over, shows him that they are not quite so brilliant as he hoped. And then he knows I must be off almost at once, and now I shall have to fix to-morrow as my day, after the letter I've just had. Come over, some of you, this afternoon; and mind you don't say anything to bring all this to his mind. It can't be helped, and the less he thinks about it the better."

And Vincent swung himself down the stairs and dashed across the fields and park, arriving just as the sun struggled out and began to roll away the leaden banks of cloud.

"Sunshine will cheer us all up better than anything," was the boy's mental comment, but when he reached the house he found that Roy had got another kind of consoler. A stranger was sitting with him when Vincent entered, and the boy's face was animated and bright.

"Oh, here you are, Vincent, that's right. Let me introduce a cousin of mine, Mr. Roger Edington. He's been good enough to come thirty miles to see me, because he heard I had been seedy, and thought I might like to see fresh faces. He talks of taking me off somewhere for change of air as you have to go almost directly. Wouldn't that be jolly? Marcus said in his last that if I wanted to go anywhere, and was well enough, I might, if Mr. Lee would let me. I think it would be awfully jolly. I've hardly ever been away from home."

Vincent was shaking hands with the stranger and now sat down with an expression of great satisfaction on his face.

"Well, I'm awfully glad to hear that, old chap, for the fact is, though I didn't quite know how to tell you before, that I really ought to be off at once. I've got some things to get in London or Portsmouth before we go to sea again, and I ought not to be here any longer. I had a letter to-day waiting for me at home which is tantamount to an order to come away, and I shall have to be off to-morrow. If Mr. Edington is here, however, that will matter the less, and I shall be awfully pleased not to leave you quite alone."

"Must you go so soon, Vincent? I am sorry; however, I've kept you longer than we thought at first. Yes, it is a great thing not to be left quite alone. You will be able to stay a few days with me here, will you not, Mr. Edington, before we go away? I should like you to see more of the place my mother lived in—I know it will interest you."

"I shall be most happy to be your guest for a short time," was the ready answer, "as your friend is to leave you so soon. Otherwise I had intended taking up my old quarters at the hotel, where I have deposited my portmanteau."

"I will send for that at once. Ring the bell, please, Vincent. I must have a room got ready for you. It was awfully kind of you to come. You are sure you can spare the time?"

"Yes, I have had not one real holiday this year, and I tell my wife that it is quite due to me. I am not much more fond of solitude than you seem to be; but I cannot take my family about with me wherever I go—it is rather too serious a consideration for a poor man. A single companion will, however, make all the difference. The idea came into my head as I read your letter.

Perhaps I shall be able to tempt you to spend a few nights at my house on our way to or from our ultimate destination. It would be a pleasure to my wife and young folks to be introduced to their new cousin."

"I should like that awfully," answered Roy with boyish eagerness, "I have so few relations," and with the sense of disappointment in Marcus so fresh in his memory, the boy turned with a feeling of rest and relief to the idea of introducing himself to his mother's relations. "Please tell me about my cousins. Would they care to know me, do you think? I wonder if they would like to come here to see me."

The words escaped Roy unthinkingly before he had time to remember that he was in no real sense the master of this house, and that Marcus had not expressed any real wish to make acquaintance with Roger Edington himself. He pulled himself up short, a quick flush rising to his face. His kinsman was sharp enough and shrewd enough to note this change of feature, and set it down to its right cause.

"Never mind," he said, with some kindliness of manner. "Don't trouble yourself about that. It will do quite as well if you come to see them at my house some day."

"He's not half a bad fellow," was Vincent's mental comment, as he listened to the conversation. "I'm glad he has turned up just now."

THE CHRISTIAN ANGAREION.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D.

"And they compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear His cross."—St. Mark xv. 21.

WHEN Cyrus the Persian king conquered Palestine, he introduced into it several of the customs of his own country. One of the most remarkable of these was what might be called the postal service which forwarded the messages of the government to all parts of the land. It was called the Angareion, from a Tartar word which means compulsory work without pay. Herodotus gives an interesting account of this custom; from which we learn that in order to transmit messages with the utmost possible speed, relays of men and horses were kept ready at intervals along the principal roads, who handed on the despatches from one to another without pause or interruption, whatever might be the inclemency of the weather, and by night as well as by day. Such mounted couriers were further empowered to press into the service, should it be found necessary, additional men and horses, even if they had to leave their own work in the field for the purpose, and boats, if they had to cross a river or an arm of the sea.

It can easily be imagined that such a system could be used by a government as an engine of oppression; and the people who were compelled to render this gratuitous service, often at very inconvenient times and at great risk and loss to themselves, would doubtless feel very keenly the injustice of it. In Palestine it was greatly disliked, for besides its own inherent evils, it had the additional one of being a foreign custom imposed upon a conquered people. The Tartar or Persian word for this disagreeable labour, having been introduced into the language of the Jews, came to be identified by them with every oppressive service. Our Lord used this peculiar word when He laid down the duty of self-denial and goodwill, even towards those who act oppressively towards us. "And whosoever shall compel thee—" as the mounted courier compels the farmers and labourers along the way to help him in forwarding the despatches of the government—"whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain." And here in my text, the word which is employed to denote the action of the Roman soldiers in compelling Simon the Cyrenian to carry the cross of Christ for Him, is the same word which was borrowed from the old postal service of Persia. The Romans, who too readily made their own any instrument of oppression which they found among foreign nations, were familiar with the word, which crept into their own language, and with the custom which it represented.

No more appropriate word could have been used. It gives a most picturesque and at the same time a most touching pathos to the occasion. It links this single act of tyranny with the whole gigantic system. The world has been familiar with forced labour from the earliest days. As far back as we can go in the sorrowful history of our race we find the stronger tribes making slaves and beasts of burden of the weaker and of those whom they conquered in war. The brick-making of the Israelites, under the intolerable cruelty of which they groaned and died, was not by any means the first oppression in Egypt. Ages before that we find proofs of the reckless disregard of human life shown by the Pharaohs, compelling thousands without wages or even food to construct for them those enormous monuments, the ruins of which excite the astonishment of every traveller. Nor can any modern race lift up a stone against those ancient oppressors; for there is no nation that has not been guilty of similar practices. Our own country cannot plead guiltless to the charge. It brought upon America and upon the West Indies the curse of slavery, which could only be removed by a tremendous sacrifice of blood and treasure. Within the memory of this generation men have been carried away from their homes and pursuits and forced into the naval service of our country by the ruthless press-gang. As the cross of Christ represented the sins of the whole world laid upon the Redeemer, it may be said therefore that that cross laid upon the unwilling shoulders of Simon the Cyrenian represented all the oppressive burdens which man has laid upon his fellow-men. It was the Angareion of the world.

We know very little about the victim of brutal power who was compelled to take part in the crucifixion of the Saviour. He was in all likelihood a proselyte who had come all the way from Africa to observe the Feast of the Passover at Jerusalem. He had, perhaps, never previously heard of Jesus of Nazareth, and was not thinking of Him at the time when he saw Him on the way to execution. Probably, instead of pitying the sad case of the Sufferer beside him, he was occupied with the hardship of his own case; and filled with resentment on account of the odious service so ruthlessly exacted of him, including even Jesus in his indiscriminate wrath. But forced, in spite of himself, to accompany Christ to Calvary, bearing the hated cross, he was made a witness of all the memorable incidents of the transcendent tragedy that took place there. He saw the Divine meekness and patience of the Sufferer; he heard the wonderful words of love and pardoning mercy that flowed from His lips; he beheld the supernatural darkness gathering round the cross, and felt the ground trembling under his feet; and, dismayed by these awful portents, he heard the loud cry with which Jesus gave up the ghost. And when the darkness cleared away he saw the centurion transfixed with awe before the central cross, glorifying God, and exclaiming, "Truly this was the Son of God." All this could not but have deeply impressed the mind of Simon. He must have learned enough in the brief companionship of a few hours with the Prince of Sufferers—in such unexampled circumstances—to change the current of his whole life. He must have been one of the first who were drawn to Christ when lifted up upon the cross in fulfilment of His own words. Coming to Jerusalem to keep the Passover, he found in the cross of Christ the true fulfilment of the great historical rite; he found in that dying life a perfect example; and in that death an atoning sacrifice.

And not only was he himself converted, but through him his whole family was won for Christ. For St. Mark speaks of his sons, Alexander and Rufus, as if they were well-known disciples of the Lord; and Paul, in his greetings to the Christians at Rome from Corinth, sends special words of love to Rufus and his mother—who had acted in a peculiarly tender and motherly manner to him—"Salute Rufus chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine." We read, too, that Simon, surnamed Niger, whom we may identify with the cross-bearer of Christ—for Simeon and Simon are the same name—is noticed with Lucius, of Syrene, as one of the prophets and teachers in the church at Antioch. There he would assume the new name of Christian, which we know originated in that city; and although he and his fellow-disciples could foresee but little of the future glories of that name, they chose it as one that was to them above every name. Well might Simon extol the strange arrangement of providence which brought him to the very place where he should meet Jesus at the very time when they were leading Him out to be crucified. Well might he bless the rough violence of the Roman soldiers who compelled him to bear the cross for his weary and fainting Master. The bondage of man proved to him the liberty of Christ; the shame of earth turned into the glory of heaven. How proud and grateful must he have felt afterwards that he had this high and unique honour; that it was given to him to alleviate in the smallest degree the unparalleled sufferings of his adorable Redeemer—to share with Him the obloquy and the degradation of the cross. When he was afterwards called by the name of Christ at Antioch, he could indeed clothe himself with the shame of the cross as with a royal robe, and say with the great apostle of the Gentiles, "God forbid that I should glory save in the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ."

Simon of Syrene, the cross-bearer of Christ, was the first-fruits of Africa to Christianity. Eighteen centuries of Christian history have passed, and how little has been done to give the light or the liberty that has been won by the cross to the enslaved and benighted continents. But the Christian freedom which Simon found in his degrading bondage may be regarded as the earnest and the guarantee that similar Christian freedom will be enjoyed by all in the dark land, who have been compelled by their fellow-creatures to carry the cross of toil and shame. The transportation of the slave to other countries has often been the means of bringing him within the reach of Christian influences, so that his bondage has proved to him to be no less than life from the dead. In bearing his compulsory cross, he had heard of the Crucified One, and now knows Jesus of Nazareth as his own Redeemer, and the truth has made him free indeed. And so it will go on until there shall be no compulsory labour under the sun, and every oppressed one shall enjoy the glorious liberty of the sons of God.

Christianity has put its own higher meanings and purposes into the common language of men. The wild weeds brought into its garden under the culture of grace display a beauty and fruitfulness before unknown. The use of the Angareion, or compulsory service of the Persians, is ennobled in the service of the Christian religion. Like the other Persian word "Paradise," which signified originally a park, or pleasure garden, in which wild beasts are kept and beautiful foreign trees grow, but which our Lord employed to describe the blessed heavenly world into which the dying thief should be immediately translated—"To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise,"—so the original Persian word for "compel" is transformed by being used in connection with the cross-bearing of Christ. In this Divine usage it becomes the vehicle of far higher truth than any which it knew at first, and is divested of all its former disagreeable associations. The inhumanity of man becomes the salvation of Jesus Christ. Blessed are those who are compelled to bear the cross of Christ, for in so doing they are bearing the instrument of their own redemption; and the following of Christ, that is at first enforced, that is done in pain and shame and toil, ends in walking with Him at liberty, running with enlargement of heart in the way of His commandments!

Many are compelled in this world of wrong and oppression to act the part of Simon. It is an every-day experience. Much of the work of the world is carried on in the way in which the ancient postal service of Persia was carried on, by enforced labour, by the strong oppressing the weak, and the rich the poor. Our Lord, by enacting a law regarding it in His Sermon on the Mount, shows how common it is. He speaks of a man being compelled to go a mile, as if this were a thing which His disciples might expect to be called upon to do at any time. Not, indeed, that the compulsory service might literally take that form at all times. That was only one illustration among many others. The compulsion in question would meet a man in many ways. And our Lord showed how this pressed service was to be performed; what was the law of the heavenly kingdom regarding it. "Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain." He does not counsel retaliation or revenge, but a spirit of self-denial and love. Love will prove itself stronger than force by voluntarily doing what force cannot do. Law will compel us to go a mile, but love, of its own large-hearted free will, will induce a man to go twain. The law is founded upon the principle of repelling force by force; the essence of the gospel is conquering by submission. Love takes the brother's violence upon itself, and thus by becoming like him causes him to become like it. The man to whom our Lord alluded, who was compelled to go a mile, evidently some farmer or peasant who was called from his own employment, and pressed into the service of the government by some courier, who, after the old Persian method, was passing by, carrying important despatches, might have resisted and refused to go. But the power of the government was greater than his, and he would be forced to go in spite of himself. But hard and oppressive as was the service, if a man, instead of resisting it as he would be naturally disposed to do, meekly and patiently yielded, and did voluntarily in the spirit of freedom and love more than he was compelled to do—go of his own accord with the courier another mile beyond the first to bear his burden, and to cheer him on his way—this graceful act would take away all the evil out of the compulsory service and make it a moral benefit to himself and a means of good to his oppressor. The servile act would be glorified by the spirit of love and gentleness in which it was performed. He would feel that he was doing not the will of an imperious servant, who impressed him, but the higher law of the land, carrying out the important work of the government; and such a thought would redeem the act from its degradation. But, above all, he would feel that he was doing this thing not as unto men but as unto the Lord. Such a man would emancipate himself from the bondage to which he was subjected; and his freeborn spirit, obeying the law of Christ, would rise high above the slavery of the outward obedience. In a similar way Simon could have transfigured the oppressive and hateful burden-bearing of the cross on the way to Calvary, into a crucifixion with Him who was free and yet yielded Himself up unto death, who had all power in heaven and earth, and yet submitted meekly to be led as a sheep to the slaughter, and to be nailed to the accursed tree. In the complete sacrifice of himself he would rise above the condition of an unwilling victim, into the condition of one who made a freewill offering, and who therefore voluntarily yielded what no outward force could compel him to give.

This law of the kingdom is to be carried out in every cross-bearing which we have to endure. If we bear it patiently we rob it of its sting, and convert it from a bane into a blessing. We make the thorn that wounds us to blossom and fruit for our good. We act as the freemen of Christ who are forced by outward circumstances, but who yield their souls a living sacrifice, and whose acts are therefore priceless, free. We are perpetually meeting the Crucified One on the path of life. We are continually impressed into His service. We are compelled to go with Him a mile on the path of duty. We are commanded to deny ourselves, take up our cross and follow Him along the straight and narrow way that leads to Gethsemane and Calvary. We are, it may be, in a situation where those about us are disagreeable, and the circumstances trying, and the duties unpleasant. We are tied down to a work which we loathe, while we are filled with longing for a work which we love; bound to some mechanical inferior employment, while we feel within us faculties and aspirations for higher service. We are placed perhaps in homes which have no attraction or brightness for us, while we have visions of the Eden that might be if our circumstances were different. We are wronged or maligned, or undervalued, or unloved, wrestling with care or sorrow or penury. We come in, as it were, from the country, like Simon the Cyrenian, thinking only of our own selfish pursuits and enjoyments, and at the straight gate of life, in some crisis of our history we encounter the Crucified One, and life puts on to us at once a painful aspect. Our holiday pleasure is spoiled, our plans are thwarted, and henceforth we have to gird ourselves for toilsome effort and patient endurance. The Saviour is thus constantly crossing our path, meeting us as He is said to have met Peter, in the beautiful legend of the Early Church, on the Appian Way, when he was fleeing from the persecution of Nero. "Lord, whither goest Thou?" said the trembling and awe-struck Apostle, as he saw his Master with His face and step steadfastly turned towards Rome. "I go back to Rome to be crucified a second time," was the reply; and the conscience-stricken apostle, ashamed of his cowardice, went back at once to die the martyr's death. Jesus is meeting us bearing His cross, and asking us to take it from Him, to help Him in the form of some hard duty, some painful self-denial, some humbling employment, some patient endurance of suffering or wrong.

Whatever form of cross-bearing is laid upon us, we feel at first that it is a pressed service, a compulsion, which is trying and oppressive. We feel the pain of having to give up our own way and to have our liberty restricted. At first we are filled with resentment against the gospel of Christ for spoiling our plans and pleasures. But, by and by, as God's grace works in us and makes us willing, the service that we most hated we shall learn most to love. The cross that crushed us to the earth will support us and lift us to heaven. The things that seemed against us we shall find working together for our good. The compulsion of painful circumstances that brought us to Christ will issue in richer life and grander liberty; and the constrained service will be changed into a life-long fidelity. How thankful should we be to be brought into Christ's companionship, even if it be by the pressure of the heaviest cross that was ever laid upon human shoulders! How thankful should we be that we may still carry Christ's cross for Him by being crucified in our own souls to the love of sin and the world; by bearing our own sufferings patiently and meekly and thus knowing the fellowship of His sufferings, a fellowship created by memories of Gethsemane and Calvary; by sharing with Him His love for the souls of men and His keen solicitude for their everlasting salvation, undertaking the heavy labours and enduring the trying persecutions connected with it, having great heaviness and continual sorrow of heart because of the ungodly!

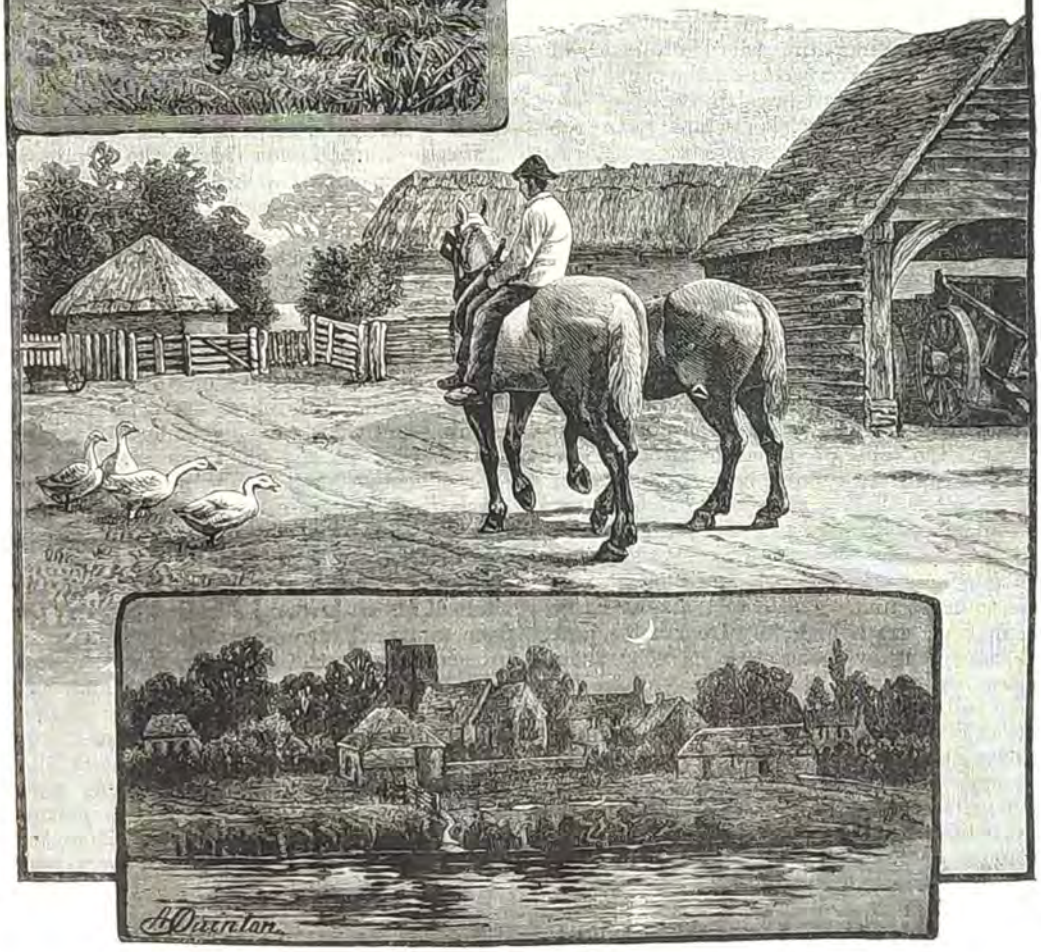
Who talks of compulsion in such a service? "Compel them to come in," was indeed Christ's command to the servant who was sent out to the highways and hedges to collect the outcasts to the feast of joy. We need, it is true, compulsion in regard to the things we are unconsciously longing most for. We need the terrors of the law to arouse our consciences and awaken our fears and drive us to Christ, our only refuge and hope. We need trials and losses and sufferings to show to us the value of eternal things to which we are so lamentably insensible when all goes well with us. And it may be that poor and needy souls may deem themselves unworthy of the invitation—hardly deeming that it can be intended for them—and may therefore require earnest persuasion and a certain constraint to induce them to avail themselves of the rich provision of Zion. But once satisfied with the goodness of Christ—once engaged in His service, once helping Him to carry His cross—the love of Christ, kindling the soul it touches, makes all service a willing service—all sacrifice a living sacrifice. We are obeying the instincts of our own hearts and seeking our own nobler ends in the help we are giving to the Lord. All our service rests on a right the root of which is not law but love. It is like the tender ministries of an affectionate home—like the loving services which father and mother and children and brothers and sisters render to each other—in which no claim on the one side or indebtedness upon the other is urged save love. Who grudges acts of devotion to a mother? What mother would feel the sacrifice of tending a sick child? Love lives on service and sacrifice; and the Lord, by calling upon His children to carry His cross for Him, to do Him some self-denying service, wakens only joyful responses. It is not those upon whom God lays the heaviest burdens who are the saddest, but those who lay burdens on themselves by their follies and sins. God's cross-bearers who share His burden have an inward blessedness which shines upon their faces and upon all their ways, and makes their very presence—the outcome of their brave, patient, faithful spirits—a benediction wherever they go.

We cannot indeed in one sense help Christ to bear His cross. Our sufferings, our merits will not be allowed to compete for a single moment with His infinite atonement. In the sense in which we need Him as our Saviour from sin He stands alone—in an awful supremacy of suffering, and in a glorious supremacy of grace. He has trodden the wine-press alone; and of the people there were none with Him. And He might have carried on the work of grace which He thus inaugurated unaided, as He finished the work of creation without help of man or angel. Who are we, and what is our power of service? What are our trivial gifts and petty labours and puny sorrows in the sum of the great forces that are working out the will of God? We are dismayed and disheartened when we think how little we can do in contrast with the magnitude of the work. And yet one of the deepest things in Scripture is the assurance that God has need of us—that He cannot carry on His work of salvation without us. Not more truly did Simon the Cyrenian help Jesus to carry His cross on Calvary than we can help Him still in making that cross efficacious in healing the sins and sorrows of the world. The cross is ours as well as Christ's. There is a Divine necessity laid upon us. We are under Divine compulsion to carry the cross of Christ into the heart of the world's sufferings—to bring its soothing and elevating and healing power to bear upon the case of those who feel life's burdens too wretched to be borne. The love of Christ constrains us. By the depths of that love which even Gethsemane and Calvary left unfathomed, let us help the Lord to bear the burden of the world's misery; and by bearing it, to bear it away and so end it for ever. And assuredly we shall find that such gracious compulsion is our grandest freedom and expansion of soul; and such love-constrained service the highest blessedness of man. And whatever be the cross we ourselves may have to bear—and life for each of us is full of crosses, cross purposes, cross callings, cross relationships, cross necessities, cross circumstances and issues of life—let us seek to carry our cross for the sake and in the spirit of Christ, as the Divine-appointed means by which we are to be crucified with Him to the world and the world to us. And however long it may remain, and however hard it may press, we shall assuredly realise the truth of Christ's own words, "My yoke is easy and My burden is light." If we take up the cross of others our own cross will fall; and if we take up our own cross and follow Christ our sorrow will be turned into joy. The cross will crown us; and our bondage will make us free.

Rest at Nightfall.

WITH the soothing touch of an angel's hand,
Night hushes the world once more,
And those who have striven and wrought and planned
Rejoice that the day is o'er;
After the burden, the toil and heat,
The labourer's rest is sweet.

With the loving touch of a Father's hand
God hushes to rest His own,
When the day is done, and over the land
The shadows of death are thrown;
After the lifework, begun, complete,
The labourer's rest is sweet!



PETER CARTWRIGHT.

THE BACKWOODS PREACHER.

IV.

CARTWRIGHT had an intense dislike to coldness, stiffness, and formality when associated with the Christian profession. It is recorded that on one occasion he visited a Congregational village, and that his Methodist fervour was offended by the quiet, calm, and intellectual type of religion there prevalent. He accordingly rode off on his horse into the open country, and when far from human dwellings, raised his voice and sang and shouted the praises of God to his heart's content. A man approached him riding quietly along, and Cartwright recognised in the horseman a deacon of the Congregational church of the village he had just left. The Methodist preacher insisted upon his Congregationalist acquaintance dismounting. Then he prayed with him with great fervour, so that, upon Cartwright's own showing, the frigid professor of religion was actually converted on the spot!

Many were the "hair-breadth escapes" experienced by the backwoods preacher in the course of his long and adventurous career. A merciful Providence watched over him, and often interposed to preserve him from harm. He was one day travelling, with "Brother Walker" as his companion, over some dreary mountains, which were known to be infested by robbers and murderers. They were well mounted, but unarmed. Cartwright saw upon the road before him a pocket pistol, which he picked up, and found to be heavily loaded and freshly primed. "This looks providential," said Cartwright. At sunset they overtook a lame man, limping slowly along with the aid of a large stick. The seemingly crippled wayfarer begged to have a ride, and Brother Walker assented to the request and was about to dismount. "Just then," says Cartwright, "a thought struck me that this fellow's lameness was feigned, and that it was not safe to trust him. I said to Walker, 'Keep your horse; we are a long way from home, and have a long journey before us. Under such circumstances, trust no man.' We trotted on down the hill, and thought we had left our lame man more than a hundred yards behind. Walker was rather ahead of me. All at once my horse made a spring forward. I turned to see what was the matter; and, lo and behold! here was my lame man within a few steps of me, coming as fleet as a deer. I grasped my pistol, which was in my overcoat pocket, cocked it, wheeled about, and rushed toward him. He faced about, and in a few jumps more I should have been on him, but he plunged into the thick brush, and I could not follow him."

In studying the life of Peter Cartwright, we are at no loss in endeavouring to account for his actions or for his success. His character was open, manly, fearless, and steadfast. No subtle analysis is needed to explain the man and his adaptation to his work. Having in boyhood found the Gospel the power of God to his own salvation, he believed it to be capable of renewing and saving all to whom it is published. His reliance was not upon intellectual power or social influence, or honeyed, persuasive eloquence; but upon the plain statement of the righteousness and the love of God in Christ, as the only hope for sinful man. He preached the judgment of God against impenitent sinners, and warned them to flee from the wrath to come. He found by experience that plain, strong speech succeeded where learning and argument were vain.

The sarcastic question was one day addressed to Cartwright by an enemy of the Methodists and their work, "How is it that you have no doctors of divinity in your denomination?" The preacher promptly and wittily replied, "Our divinity is not sick, and needs no doctoring!"

Having himself been denied the advantages of early education and theological training, Cartwright was too disposed to undervalue theological seminaries and professorships. He was acquainted with many most successful preachers who had started in their work as ill-equipped educationally as himself; and he had seen great spiritual results follow from the labours of self-taught men. On the other hand, he had been witness to many failures on the part of young ministers who had relied upon their academic training and their theological lore. He put the matter very plainly in these words:—"However education may be desirable, and however much the progress of this age may demand an improved ministry, especially an improved pulpit eloquence, I would rather have the gift of a devil-dislodging power than all the college lore or Biblical Institute knowledge that can be obtained from mortal man. When God wants great and learned men in the ministry, how easy it is for Him to overtake a learned sinner, and, as Saul of Tarsus, shake him awhile over hell, then knock the scales from his eyes, and without any previous theological training, send him out straightway to preach Jesus and the resurrection! When God calls any man to preach His Gospel, if he will not reason with flesh and blood, but do his duty and live faithful, my experience for it, God will qualify him for the work, if he never saw a college."

It is not surprising that a man of Cartwright's natural powers, determined character, self-denying piety, and remarkable usefulness should have attained a position of extraordinary influence. "The whole West," said a contemporary, "recognises Peter Cartwright's supremacy." He was the primate of all Prairiedom. Rough as were his features, firmly set his mouth, resolute his expression, there was nevertheless a certain dignity and even urbanity of manner, which commended him to men's favour and confidence. Devoted as he was to Methodism, it was felt that he was still more devoted to the service of the Saviour and to the welfare of the souls of his fellow-man.

Peter Cartwright had the brightest hopes regarding the progress of the Gospel throughout the world. What he himself had witnessed assured him of the invisible power of the truth. He lamented what he thought to be the needless and wasteful expenditure in old settled Christian communities upon the accessories of religion, upon the ornaments of the churches and the musical services. "All this," he exclaimed, "while millions upon millions of our fallen race are dying daily without the Gospel of Christ!" "Scarce as ministers are in some places in our own happy country, yet there are thousands that are ready and willing to go to the utmost verge of this earth, and carry the glad tidings of mercy to those dying millions—if they had the means of support. Would it not the better comport with the obligations of our holy Christianity to refrain from superfluous expenditure, and with a liberal hand and devoted heart to apply or furnish the means to carry the glad tidings of salvation to those that sit in the region and shadow of moral death, than to apply them as is done in many directions in this Christian land?" Rising to a strain of earnest eloquence, Cartwright proceeds: "Say, ye professed lovers of Jesus Christ, are not your responsibilities tremendously fearful? There is wealth enough in the churches, and among the friends of the different Christian denominations in this happy republic, if rightly husbanded and liberally bestowed, to carry the Bible and a living ministry to every nation on the face of the whole earth. And may we be permitted to hail with Christian rapture the rising glory of this liberal spirit, when we shall see it as the apocalyptic angel flying in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting Gospel to preach to every nation, kindred and tongue! When shall we see this happy day? May the Lord hasten it in His time, and we be co-workers together with Him! Will the Christian world say, 'Amen'?"

When Peter—now Dr. Peter—Cartwright completed fifty years of service as a "presiding elder," which was in the year 1869, a Jubilee celebration was held in Illinois, the state where he had spent the greater part of his ministerial life. At this time he was eighty-four years old, and had travelled and preached for sixty-five years. A very warm and affectionate reception was given to the old soldier of righteousness. In the speech which he delivered on the occasion, he made some interesting statements regarding his ministry. He said that he had not lost six months through illness during his sixty-five years' service; that there had only been three years in which he had received the proper stipend appointed for him by the church; that having been brought up under the "log-cabin dispensation," he had been a preacher several years before he even saw a shingle-roofed house; that when on the Sanganon Circuit he had been so poor that for two years' support for himself, his wife, and six children, he had received only a hundred dollars, i.e., twenty pounds sterling! After enduring toils and hardships to a period exceeding that usually allotted to man, Dr. Cartwright was at that time still able to speak and to preach, though not with his former vehemence.

As he appeared in advanced age before a conference, Dr. Peter Cartwright must have presented a very impressive presence and figure. One who knew him described him as "a large, square-built man, with some native ruggedness, mingled with a good deal of humour, both in his looks and in his speeches. . . He is not lacking in geniality and good-nature; for both his mouth and eyes, as well as the radiant play of the upper part of his cheeks, tell of a kindly and sociable nature. His head is large, and firmly supported between ample and compact shoulders. His brow is broad, and overhung with a mass of iron-grey hair. His eyes are intensely deep in colour, and shine like dark fires beneath his shaggy eyebrows. . . . His complexion is deeply tanned by the sun. His voice when he begins to speak is tremulous, but as he proceeds its old power returns, its rich natural organ-tones are recovered, and he swells and rolls its deep diapason most manfully."

As he drew near to the close of his long and successful ministry, Dr. Cartwright enjoyed the esteem and honour as well as the affection of his brethren and of the whole Methodist community of America. And when he was called to his rest and reward, he left behind him a name which will ever be associated with the evangelisation of the settlers in the backwoods, and a memory which will be an inspiration to many a faithful servant of God who shall be called to endure hardships as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

J. RADFORD THOMSON, M.A.

THE MARCH OF ISLAM.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM JOSEPH SMITH, M.A.

II.

HAVING thus pointed out some of the indications of that growing luxury and tyranny to which a religion of iron bigotry and yet with a sensuous Paradise has been and always must be exposed, it remains to estimate what amount of cohesive attraction and unifying force this religion has exercised. It is amazing how the zeal of this new creed bound together at first those Arabs who were never at one before or since. And yet nowhere has this union and unity exhibited itself for long in Mohammedanism. Mohammed himself is reported to have "prophesied that as the Jewish Church had been divided into seventy-one sects! and the Christians into seventy-two! so his followers would be divided into seventy-three sects."[1] According to Abdul Qádir Jilāni there are now at least one hundred and fifty. But we are considering the system more in its political working than in its religious phases, externally rather than internally.

Now it is remarkable that three of Mohammed's four immediate successors met with violent doaths, and also his own grandchildren. For ten days in the first month of every Mohammedan year, the Shiahs in Persia, and those of that sect elsewhere, celebrate the Moharrem in memory of the martyrdom of Hosein, Mohammed's grandson and Ali's son, who was slain, not by infidels, but by rival Moslem. The scenes of the massacre of Hosein and of his friends are represented over again, with such vraisemblance, that the actors sometimes actually die in the process, and sometimes the spectators stone those of the actors who are doing the mimic slaughter. The excitement is such that in India our Government always watches the celebration with jealous and careful vigilance. This was one memorable tragedy, but not a score of years after the slaying of Hosein there is the following characteristic incident. Abd el Melih, the then khalif, had entered Kufa, after crushing other claimants. Here, whilst in his palace, the head of one of these competitors, named Musab, was brought to him. He noticed as the head was brought in that one of the bystanders shuddered at the sight, though it was, alas! not an uncommon one. He interrogated the man, and received this reply: "In this place I saw the head of Hosein placed before the governor of Kufa: I saw the governor's head in like manner placed before Moktar; I saw the head of Moktar placed before Musab, and now I see the head of Musab placed before thee." The khalif, horrified at this gruesome recital, had the hall instantly razed to the ground, in order that his own head might not be added to the dismal catalogue.

It would be difficult to parallel the number of bloody pages there are in Moslem story. Men like Moktar at one moment chanted poems, and the next ordered quite calmly the massacre of thousands; and were themselves in turn victims. It would be equally hard in other histories to discover as many examples as here of unblushing treachery. We need but read the life of Haroun el Rashid to discover ample proof of both statements. His name is picked out only as being better known and also one most celebrated as that of a model ruler. This prince had contracted such friendship for Djafar, one of the Barmecide family, that he could never bear him out of his sight. In order therefore to have him always near, he even introduced the nobleman into the guarded enclosure of the royal harem.

To cover this with an air of propriety, the khalif made Djafar go through the marriage ceremony with his (the khalif's) sister Abassah. Then because these two persons thus introduced to such other, fell by-and-by into real love, the sovereign exterminated the whole family of the Barmecides, treacherously seizing and murdering them. Djafar himself was beheaded, and parts of his mutilated body were affixed to the bridge and to the gates of Bagdad. These incidents are mentioned, not because they are picturesque and tragic, but because they are thoroughly in accord with the tenour of Mohammedan history. Indeed one can never determine which was the more perilous to be, the friend or the enemy of a Moslem ruler. Perpetual jealousies existed, and an atmosphere of suspicion spread everywhere. And this has scarcely waned for a thousand years. At the very outset it exhibited itself, for there was Khalid, who had been dubbed the Sword of God, and whose were the first great conquests. He never aspired to be more than an obedient soldier and a brilliant commander. Yet, for pure jealousy, the Khalif Omar dismissed and despoiled him, so that he died in undeserved disgrace, possessed of only his horse, his arms and one slave. Equally unworthy was the fortune of Tarik, the conqueror of Spain, after whom Gibraltar—Jebel Tarik, the mount of Tarik—is named, as also the city of Tarif. This city again gave rise to the term "tariff" which we use for a "duty," because such duty was forcibly levied upon vessels passing through those waters. Tarik was despatched by his superior officer Musa to cross the strait from Africa with 400 infantry and 100 cavalry. His force, though ultimately augmented, never exceeded 12,000. With these he traversed 700 miles of Spanish ground, and subverted the existing governments. From the banks of the Guadalete to the walls of Cordova it was one career of conquest and onward to Toledo. Approaching Cordova a storm of hail muffled the clatter of hoofs, and a shepherd pointed out a breach in the walls. Beneath this there was a fig-tree, which a soldier climbed, and from it could leap into the opening. Then he threw down one end of his turban and drew his comrades up by this extemporised scaling rope. Nor was it the first time in Moslem campaigns that this comical device had been resorted to.

A gigantic slave named Dames had long before stood gymnastically with a human pillar of six men above him, till the topmost clambered to the ramparts of the castle of Aleppo in Syria. Then with ropes of turbans thirty men under the darkness of the night were successively and quietly hauled up to stab the sentinels and secure the citadel.

But Tarik's successes inflamed the envy of Musa, who recalled him. Tarik, like Lord Nelson, did not heed the mandate. Therefore Musa followed, and outside the gates of Toledo they met. It was a singular interview: Musa was old, but vigorous and fiery: a man of the dandy school of soldiers, who always rouged his white beard to make him look young. Tarik came forth in full uniform and ceremony, with his staff of officers to receive his superior officer in all duteous courtesy. Musa was so overcome with wrath that he horsewhipped his lieutenant on the spot, and loading him with vile reproaches packed him off instantly to prison. From this Tarik was released and restored to his rank by the direct intervention of the khalif, and in the whirligig of time it was Musa's turn to suffer the bane of jealousy. On his return to Damascus, laden with booty and captives, he was ignominiously scourged, was made to stand bareheaded a whole day beneath the scorching sun in front of the palace gate, and then was deprived of everything. His son, who was doing good service in Spain, was causelessly executed, and the head brought home and presented to the father. "Do you know this?" they asked him. "I know his features, I assert his innocence, and I imprecate the same, a juster fate, against the authors of his death." The old man died broken-hearted at Mecca.

[1] Hughes' 'Notes on Mohammedanism,' p. 63.

Nor was this exceptional treatment for great statesmen and generals. The whole record runs red with the number of instances. It may be that they could be paralleled for number and atrocity by like examples under Christian governments in those ages. But the difference is this, that the genius and spirit of Christianity is against such treatment, and that the progress of Christianity has happily lifted Christian nations above such a state of feeling, so that they will never return to it. Islam, unfortunately, is the same as ever. There may have been transient periods of a better disposition; there have been here and there noble lives, but the sad, sad impression left upon one's thought the more one reads the long narrative of Mohammedan annals, is that this is the natural outcome of the religion itself. A tendency towards autocratic tyranny, with its accompanying slavery, a deadening of the more tender feelings towards both man and woman, and a disregard for the sanctity of human life,—these are its direct fruits. The future of Islam will never surpass the high-water mark of its past, and that at best is such as we scarcely could wish the world to see again. We have happily gone beyond it.

There has been, indeed, in Mohammedanism an intense faith in the prime article of their creed, the Unity of God, yet little sense of God's love; there have been glorious gleams of chivalry and magnanimous generosity; there have been splendid intervals of literary attainment and artistic development, yet ruin has always followed these transient periods; there has been legal provision for the poor, since the legal alms is imperative on every Mussulman, and yet there are no lands with more poverty and unmitigated wretchedness; there has been teetotalism, countervailed by other vices; and there has been always glorious courage, but with it a haughty unsympathetic pride. We are alive to all the remarkable qualities which have been from time to time developed in Islam, to the solid contributions it has occasionally added to the world's stock of permanent goods; but the more we reflect, the more are we convinced that it has seen its best days, and that the good it has done has been terribly outweighed by an awful burden of evil. May a better spirit be introduced into it, and all its confessed capacity be utilised for the world's absolute best. But this can only be by such reform as shall make Islam cease to be Mohammedan and become Christian.

SANTA LUCIA.

A STORY OF CORSICA.

CHAPTER V.

PIETRO recovered slowly, though visibly. And his happiness made him completely forget his suffering, when he found himself so tenderly cared for by Santa Lucia. He had often envied poor Margherita when Santa Lucia stroked and caressed her hands. And now it was his emaciated hand that Santa Lucia held in her own. He had been very, very ill, very far gone, but the doctor had declared him out of danger, though it appeared that he was likely to be almost a cripple, if not for life, for a long time, unless a miraculous cure was effected.

Of course, Santa Lucia was not the only nurse by his side. Bianca Mona, a specially trained hospital-nurse, had been brought from Ajaccio.

As it has been said, Pietro was happy at being loved by Santa Lucia, but when he knew how shattered his health was, when he understood what it was to be an invalid, he began to doubt very much whether it would not be very selfish, very unwise, and very imprudent to think of becoming united to Santa Lucia.

It seemed to him that all her tenderness for him was but the outcome of her pity. Bianca had told him that Santa Lucia was in despair until he began to mend, and he had asked the old nurse whether she believed that Santa Lucia really cared for him. Bianca had replied—

"Care for you! Does a hen care for her chickens? Does Padre Rocca care for his church and its altar-cloths, and his chasubles? Ah! you should have seen the tears run down her cheeks when in your feverish wanderings you pronounced her name!"

Yes, it seemed to him that undoubtedly Santa Lucia did care for him. And happiness gave him such a will to get well, that the miracle was effected, and he became again, ere the year was over, the strong healthy youth he had been, and with hopes revived, all obstacles to his marriage with Santa Lucia were soon overcome.

A year went round, and yet another, and there landed one day from the Tunis steamer a young man, in whose sad, dejected countenance and miserable dress and appearance one had difficulty in recognising the gay, handsome young Catalan of two years before.

Slowly he wended his way to the Rue Notre Dame. There he made some inquiries about a Dr. Catalan he had known, about a certain Pietro Rocca, and about one Santa Lucia of a village of that name. And so he learnt that Pietro Rocca had married her whom he had loved. His face grew more savage in its misery, and a desperate hatred of life took possession of him. It was not worth living. He would have done with it.

He wandered on to the Rue de la Porte, and to its far end, where there is a little hostelry called the Bête Noire, a fit name for the last resting-place of a diseased, desperate mind.

There he ate and—drank much and persistently. There was no one to stay his hand, no angel of mercy met him on the shore, to show him love and dispel his gloom; not one face looked into his with tender compassion.

He went to his doom! His determination was to put an end to it all, and none deterred him.

At nightfall he climbed the hill to Alerta, and half way up, near the orange groves, he put a pistol to his temples and drew the trigger! It was all over! All? Aye, for this side of the mysterious journey we all make, whether we will or not. Happy those who meet the angel of mercy at each turning of the way, and who make the journey wisely and well!

The feathery branches of the olive trees waved in the soft breezes. The nightingale ceased singing. The streaks of dawn appeared on the horizon.

The stars disappeared in the vault of heaven as the pale morning light spread, and the twittering of thousands of birds broke forth.

But that pale face looked up to the sky, and gave no response to the invitation to sing the song of life.

Let us all fervidly pray—

"Lead us not into temptation; but Deliver us from the evil!"

There was one other involved in the tragedy of this southern story. Poor Margherita never wholly recovered that awful time in the mountain, yet the dim consciousness of what had passed lightened her days, and gave a new sense of quiet to her agitated life: but her days were numbered, and she found at last a profounder rest in the grave.

In imitation of the Roman tomb-stones on the Via Appia, you may see in Corsica, bordering many of the chief highways, little railed enclosures round some monument of modern erection, generally with an inscription or bust. The spot chosen is often a pretty one, overlooking a garden, or it is in an orange or olive grove. In such an olive grove, where every year hundreds of men and women gather to pluck the dark green nuts from the dusky olive trees, stands a neat tombstone erected by Pietro and Santa Lucia to the memory of "MARGHERITA.

SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. III.

1. This verse closes the description of an interview of great importance.

2. Ten persons are mentioned in the chapter as being present, but the names of six only are given.

3. All were surprised at the result of the interview: one, at least, was not well pleased.

4. With the exception of one all the ten were related.

5. Two are mentioned in the verse as engaged in a brief ceremony.

6. When these two persons met again one was in danger of his life.

7. Both are mentioned in one verse in an epistle.

8. One of them reproved the sin of a priest and of a king.

9. The other was reproved by a prophet because he had "despised the commandment of the Lord."

10. Both had wicked sons.

11. One killed a heathen king in Gilgal.

12. The other, though a servant of God, told a lie to a heathen king at Gath.

13. A town is mentioned in the verse near to Deborah's home.

14. A journey is also indicated and the destination given.

15. One of the characters strongly resembles Joshua, Saul and Samson in one particular.

16. We are told something of the dress of the other in an earlier passage.

17. The chapter in which the verse is found contains mention of music and mourning, of war and peace, of good and evil spirits, of age and youth, of a king and a servant, of four different domestic animals, and of oil, wine and bread.

18. It contains thirty-seven words. L. T.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VIII.

1. He "a mighty man of wealth," yet did wondrous favour show
   To the lowly Moabitess, favour such as few may know.
2. Here we have a noted chief, to whom when Ezra did appeal
   For "ministers for the house of God," sent large numbers with all zeal.
3. A little thing this, yet it helped a wondrous scheme to carry out,
   In which, by clever strategy, an encamped host was put to rout.
4. Lo, a prophetess appears—harken, a triumphant song:
   Awake, arise, the foe is vanquished, unto God doth praise belong.
5. Here another prophetess in the temple we behold,
   A widow of great piety the world's redemption then foretold.
6. This the only entrance is to the fold, as to the heart,
   Climb not up, but enter in, wisely choose the "better part."

The initials and the finals give the names of two persons who deemed themselves exceeding wise.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS—p. 62.

1. To the fact that God rested on that day from the work of creation.—Gen. ii. 2, 3.

2. On the seventh day there was no manna to gather.—Exod. xvi. 26, 27.

3. No fire was to be kindled on that day.—Exod. xxxv. 3.

4. A Sabbath-breaker was stoned.—Num. xv. 32-36.

5. A day of rest was secured for slaves and cattle.—Deut. v. 14, 15.

6. Fires were kindled for the sacrifices.—Matt. xii. 5.

7. Luke xiv.

8. They objected to the disciples plucking ears of corn on the Sabbath.—Luke vi. 2. A ruler was angry because Jesus healed on the Sabbath.—Luke xiii. 14. The cripple when healed was forbidden to carry his bed.—John v. 10.

9. Mark ii. 27, 28.

10. Isa. lviii. 13, 14; Jer. xvii. 21-27.

11. Neh. x. 31; xiii. 15-22.

12. Luke iv. 16; xiii. 10; Acts xiii. 14, 27.

13. Because our Saviour rose from the dead on that day, they looked upon it as a day for joy and thanksgiving.

14. They probably observed the seventh day, at least as long as their temple existed; but gradually began to give greater honour to the first day.

15. Acts xx. 7; Rev. i. 10.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. II.—p. 144.—Acts vii. 55.

"But he being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God."

1. Acts vii. 55; 2. "Full of the Holy Ghost," vi. 5; 3. vii. 1, 2-53; 4. 55, 56; 5. 20, vi. 15; 6. 60; 7. 2, 52; 8. 55; 9. 56; 10. 55.

Monthly Religious Record.

NO attempt has yet been made to complete a religious census of London, which has not been the occasion of controversy, and open at some points to the charge of inaccuracy. The "British Weekly," in an effort to deal comprehensively with the Mission Halls of London, has not escaped criticism, but, despite some inaccuracies and the danger of drawing absolute conclusions from its figures, has collected an array of facts of great value. According to its summary of statistics, the approximate accommodation of all the Mission Halls reaches a total of 251,980. It is worth noting that those marked "undenominational" supply 67,813, while next comes the Church of England, with 40,516. But comparison on such lines, even if expedient, would be delusive as regards the "missionary" influence of particular bodies, seeing that some regularly constituted churches and chapels are in themselves a power of evangelisation more aggressive and successful than any external agency. The evening attendance at these various halls is given at 127,037, which is four times as many as at the morning services—a difference due in part to the necessities and in part to the habits of the people from whom the audiences are drawn. If it be asked, what is the vital force of all these "missionary" efforts combined against the heathendom of London, it must be remembered that preaching is but one portion of the work attempted at these stations, and in some instances the least important. There are "halls" which are the centre of manifold activities, by which faith and charity find powerful expression in places where no evangelist's voice can penetrate. Meanwhile, the "Record" has been taking stock of South London, with its 800,000 souls, and after an elaborate report, which includes account of both Nonconformist and Romanist centres, comes to the conclusion that Christianity is not in possession. "Heathen indifference, the result of hopeless penury, is settling down more and more into the hearts of the people, and is making religious work harder and harder." The riverside dwellers from Battersea to Greenwich are of the poorest class; those nearest to the water's edge in the lowest depths of poverty, those behind them but a little better off. The whole district is decadent, for the drift of the wealthier classes is every year further southward. This division of classes here and elsewhere creates serious difficulties. The social question is serious, the spiritual need is urgent. How can these changing conditions best be met?

MR. ARCHIBALD BROWN, whose work in the east of London is well known, points out that "a very weak point in mission enterprise is the multiplication of halls in close proximity." As the purpose of mission work is purely evangelistic, "there is," he urges, "no excuse for such competition. I know, however, one district in which there are four halls within three minutes' walk of one another, and two of them are next door but one." A casual correspondent of the "Record," on the other hand, objects that "working men are not necessarily heathen because they do not go to church." "They have been disgusted with deeper views through the inconsistencies and injustice towards them of the church-going rich." And he pleads strongly that religious people ought not to acquiesce in the ever-growing local separation of classes.

THE new reredos in St. Paul's Cathedral is on a scale proportioned to the noble pile of which it is now the most ornamental part. The sculpture is of elaborate design, and includes many figures. The central subject is the Crucifixion. A tabernacle placed upon the summit of the structure contains the figure of the Virgin, and on either side are statues of St. Peter and St. Paul—on an equality forbidding the supremacy of Peter—while above all is the figure of the ascending Christ. The representative facts of the great history are thus presented from the miraculous birth to the burial and resurrection. It is plain that we are far removed from the age of the iconoclasts; there has been a recoil in many directions. Opinions, however, are not unanimous as to this reredos; whatever may be said as to the services which art may render to religion, there are not a few within the Church of England who hold that the use made of it, in this instance, is a violation of the existing law, and dangerous in its tendency.

FULL particulars have now come to hand respecting the deportation of the Rev. J. Jones from Mare. It appears that he was sitting in the schoolroom, engaged in revising the Mare Scriptures, on the morning of December 9th, when a French war steamer arrived off the coast. A boat came ashore, bringing the captain of the Noumea gendarmerie, who informed Mr. Jones that he must consider himself under arrest, and gave him half an hour to pack what was required for his immediate wants. He was then taken on board the steamer, where he was treated with due consideration, and afterwards carried to Noumea, where he was told he was free to go ashore when he liked. He landed, and then lodged a formal protest with the British Consul. Subsequently he proceeded to Sydney, where he placed his papers in the hands of the Governor of New South Wales, with a view to bringing the matter before the home Government. The despatch from the Governor of New Caledonia, which authorised the act, makes reference to a "ministerial despatch of October 5th, 1887," and decrees the expulsion on the ground that "the acts of Pastor Jones of foreign nationality are of a nature to compromise the public order and tranquillity of the Loyalty Islands."

THE American Board for Foreign Missions reports that the quiet settlement of German authority in the Gilbert and Marshall Islands has turned out to the furtherance of the Gospel. Not so the assignment of the Caroline group to Spain. The Rev. E. J. Doane, the missionary of the Board at Ponape, after arrest and imprisonment, has been exiled. Yet the thirty-five years of Protestant labour in these islands have wrought great results. Nearly fifty churches have been gathered, with 5300 members; six "high schools" have been established for the training of native preachers and teachers, and forty common schools, with more than 2800 scholars. Thus the people have been transformed "from naked and warlike savages, to orderly, peaceful, and industrious communities." The latest tidings speak of a revolt of the natives against Spain. Meanwhile an appeal has been made to the United States Government to secure protection for the missionaries.

THE Church Missionary Society recently devoted a day to prayer and the consideration of the spiritual aspects of its work. At the morning meeting, Archdeacon Richardson and the Rev. Handley C. G. Moule spoke on "Spiritual Shortcomings"; in the afternoon, the Rev. Canon Hoare and the Rev. H. W. Webb-Peploe on "Spiritual Possibilities"; and in the evening, the Rev. H. W. Webb-Peploe and Sir S. Arthur Blackwood on "Spiritual Determinations." The great object of these devotional gatherings was the increase of spiritual power. Great stress was laid on the fact that the constraining love of Christ is the true spring of missionary efforts, and the best argument for those who plead the cause of the heathen. Canon Hoare, in speaking of possibilities, warned his hearers against impatience. "Men had toiled and died one after another, and their wives had died. From 1804 till 1816 there was in Africa not one single baptism, and then the fountain was opened. So it was in New Zealand. They had toiled on without success from 1814 till 1825—eleven long years—without a baptism, in the midst of cannibalism, and people taunting them with the folly and the madness of persevering in such a work. So it had been at Foo-chow. They had gone on for eleven years toiling without one baptism, till there was a great discussion whether or not the mission should not be abandoned; and one young man—he remembered him well as a Scripture-reader at Margate, and he had afterwards gone out—when every one said it was to be given up, had said, 'You may give up the mission, but I will remain.' He did remain. That very year baptisms began, and a shower was poured forth from God." Often the richest blessing followed on years of quiet work.

THE Bishop of Jamaica, replying to some of Canon Taylor's recent references, makes the satisfactory statement that the negroes of that island are not lapsing into Obeism, but "developing in general knowledge and in all those qualities, attainments, and beliefs which go to make up an intelligent, industrious, progressive Christian community."

THE past year has been one of general prosperity for the missions of the American Board in the Turkish Empire. So runs their report. The opposition of the Government and the increasing poverty of the people are still obstacles. "Certain sections of the country have been visited by special calamities which have brought with them very great suffering and distress. Only a few years since Zeitoon was destroyed by fire, and during the past year it has been destroyed again in the same manner. The famine in Cilicia is a fact well known to all who are interested in the eastern world. There is little encouragement in that country for any one to plant or to build; and it is almost impossible for the common people to accumulate property for old age, sickness, or for their children. Yet these people, poor as they are, contribute nobly towards the support of their own churches. The growth, in respect to theological seminaries, colleges, higher schools for boys and girls, industrial schools, preaching and evangelistic work, and in respect to Christian literature, is a steady growth." We observe also that the American Presbyterian Church reports greater prosperity in its work in Syria than ever before, and the same is true of Persia.

THE Universities' Mission to Central Africa has suffered from a disastrous fire at Magila, the chief station in U-Samhara. The loss of property is great, and the hindrances to work serious.

THE Moravian missionaries, whose fame is in all the churches, say that contact with the heathen—that is, in the stricter sense, as wild tribes utterly ignorant of the Gospel—is less frequent than formerly. Of their work in general it is stated that the nucleus of old and faithful members is more or less on the decrease in most of the congregations—that among the young people there is but little desire for the Word of God—and that indifference and sloth, drunkenness and immorality are increasingly prevalent; yet there is happily a brighter side, the Word of Life has not lost its power, nor is it unfruitful, and they are "continually able to report of awakened souls." Many interesting facts are embedded in the last annual report. Thus, from the borders of Thibet, we hear that "the lamas and headmen at Kyelang are growing hostile to the preaching of the Gospel. Formerly they thought that the labours of the missionary would prove fruitless, but as they cannot any more shut their eyes to the fact that our scholars surpass many of the lamas in knowledge, they are afraid of losing their influence. Their intrigues have been principally directed against the schools. They have also endeavoured to strengthen their own position. Lately they procured from Thibet, at an expense of more than 100*l.*, a religious work consisting of a hundred volumes (a twelve-horse load), which has been deposited in the Kyelang monastery. A kushog, or incarnation of Buddha, from Great Thibet had also made a progress through the country." But the missionary still found people willing to receive the Scriptures.

THE China Inland Mission has received communications from several of its missionaries who have been eye-witnesses of the devastation wrought by the floods in Ho-nan. Thus Mr. Slimmon writes from Chau-kia-k'eo: "The damage done by the water is greater than my worst imagination had pictured. . . . The water came on so slowly that the people would not believe there was any danger, and stayed till the water was up to their loins, when they could no longer carry off their effects. So they climbed up trees, and got on to the roofs of their houses, which are built either of mud or of sun-dried bricks, so the walls soon gave way, and the people on the roofs perished. Those in the trees were many of them rescued in boats, but others in lonely situations, or those who could not hold out till help came, fell into the water and were drowned. Numbers of bodies have been found, some of them showing that piteous efforts to escape had been made. In one case, a string of men was found tied hand to hand; in another, a father and child were found tied together." In another letter he says:—"Just fancy a vast plain, about half the size of Scotland, thickly populated, suddenly turned into a raging sea! This is what has taken place here. Misery reigns supreme in this place just now. Out of fifty-six streets in our portion of the town only five are not flooded. Hundreds have escaped with their bare lives; their little all has been lost. They are huddled together in straw huts, with scarcely enough to cover them, and the nights are getting bitterly cold. I am living in the midst of it, able to do little or nothing for want of money. The distress will continue for many months to come; cruel winter will soon be on us, and hundreds will perish from cold." Beside the millions who have perished in the waters, it is now estimated that two million people have been reduced to absolute destitution.

THE Bishop of Durham speaking recently at a conference on Foreign Missions, referred to recent controversies, and said, "that if there was any truth in the allegations made as to modern missions they should set to work and ascertain it, and review and revise their methods." It struck him that there were three things needed. They ought first to send out bands of preachers and not isolated individuals, and those bands should be partly clerical and partly lay. Secondly, they must allow greater liberty in the matter of public worship. The negroes had their "revivals." It was not the highest form of worship, but it revealed the negro character, and they must have respect for this character if they would influence the negro. They must allow a more demonstrative form of worship than that which seemed quite right and sober to the ordinary steady-going English Churchman. Thirdly, they must avoid all dogmatic subtleties. Creeds were of the highest value, but in an early stage of Christianity the simplest truths of the Gospel were most effective. Wherever Mohammedanism took the place of the idolatry and fetish worship they ought to rejoice, for it was an enormous step in advance; but as an ultimate and fundamental religion they could have nothing to say for it. In civilised nations Mohammedanism had been the very reverse of a success. In classical times Asia Minor was one of the most civilised parts of the world, but Mohammedanism had made it a scene of desolation.

ALL such questions will no doubt be fully discussed at the general Conference on Foreign Missions to be held in London next June, the preparations for which are satisfactorily advancing. All denominations are combining for it, and America and the Continent will also send delegates.

FROM South India come representative facts full of encouragements. Writing from Cuddapah, the Rev. W. Howard Campbell, M.A., B.D., says: "I have spent most of my time this year in camp, and have visited most parts of the district. In the hot season I spent a month in Rayachati and Kadiri talugs. The villages in these talugs are small and numerous, and by dividing our forces we were able to visit and preach in five or six villages each day. Everywhere we were well received. In a village called Wandadi the people literally pressed on us to hear the Gospel. During the three days I was there my tent was never empty. People kept coming and going, and some of them would sit for hours listening to what we said, and questioning us as to the way of life. . . . At the earnest request of the people, I left a catechist with them for a couple of months. I was much interested by the work that is going on in Pulivendla talug. In a number of places there are earnest inquirers after the truth, and some who are, I believe, secret disciples of Christ. We spent a day in a village called Gorlagudur, where a large number of people are inclined to embrace Christianity. Four men desired baptism. These people seem, like the Christians of Bukapatnam, to have been led to Christ by their own study of the Bible. They told me their story. Four years ago a man belonging to another village brought a large Telugu Bible from Madras. Shortly afterwards he died, and his wife, thinking his death due to his Bible-reading, threw the dangerous book out of doors. These people took it, they told me, to their own village, and read it carefully. In reading it, the light dawned upon them; they saw that Jesus is indeed their Saviour, and gave their hearts to Him."

CONGREGATIONALISM has lost one of its most generous supporters in the late Mr. James Spicer, of Woodford. The superintendent of a Sunday-school when but twenty-two years of age, he maintained his interest in religious work throughout a long and active career; and a large gathering of representative men at his funeral attested the regard in which he was held.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

BY EVELYN E. GREEN, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S BROTHERS," ETC.

CHAPTER XXVII.—A PROPOSED VISIT.

MILDRED THINKS IT A MAKE-BELIEVE.

AS Mr. Lee was approaching the Hermitage the following morning, he was musing to himself something after this fashion.

"That fellow does not pick up as I should like to see him, and he will run down directly he is alone. Even a few hours of solitude tell upon him. It shows he is not in the state one would like to see. I wish I could devise some means of getting change of air and scene for him. Sea-bathing would do him a power of good. I shall be sorry if Stratford comes back to find him still an invalid. I must see what can be done."

When the doctor was shown up to his patient, however, he found that Roy was not alone. He was in the company of the kinsman of his whom Mr. Lee had once met at dinner at the Hermitage.

Mr. Edington had not struck him with particular favour on that occasion, but he was pleased to see him at this juncture, the more so as Roy looked bright and animated.

"Good-morning, Frank," cried the boy, "you are just the man we wanted. Mr. Edington has been propounding a scheme to me, and we want your sanction for it."

"I was suggesting to Roy that a change might do him good," explained Mr. Edington quietly, "that is, if we can gain your approbation for the scheme. He tells me his brother cannot be back for some few weeks still, and that he finds home dull all alone. I thought if he could be entrusted to my care, we might go away somewhere together. Mr. Stratford, I hear, gave him full liberty to make his own arrangements during the weeks he was to be alone."

"And you would like to go, Roy, would you?" asked the young surgeon.

"I think I should," was the ready response, "as my cousin is kind enough to wish it, and does not mind the trouble of me. I haven't been away for a long while, and September is a capital month for the sea."

"And where do you propose going?" asked Frank Lee, turning to the elder man.

"I thought of Brighton, as a pleasant, cheerful place and not over-crowded yet. But we can hardly be said to have made any definite plans so far. I only came yesterday to ask after Roy, and he kindly insisted on my staying the night. Seeing him still so pale and weak, it naturally occurred to me that change of air might be beneficial. I have a little spare time of my own on hand as it happens, and I could as well take him away to the sea as do anything else."

"Well, if Roy would like to go, and you are prepared to take him, I have no objection to sanction the plan," said Mr. Lee. "Only you must be careful of your charge and not let him walk much or overdo himself. He must keep his foot up a good many hours each day, and you must feed him up well. I dare say the sea air will give him a better appetite than he has here. When do you propose going?"

"As soon as you will let me move," cried Roy, who was beginning to look excited at the prospect. "I should like to go to-day."

"No, not quite so fast as that," smiled Frank, who was examining the foot, and felt that the boy winced beneath his touch. "Not to-day, nor to-morrow either: but I think the day after you might try to make a move. It's well to take the fine weather whilst it lasts. And when you get to the sea, try what salt water will do for this unruly member; and I almost advise not attempting the whole journey in one day, but calling a halt at some half-way house. You're not up to very much fatigue or exertion yet."

"That will be easily managed," said Mr. Edington. "My own house lies on the road, and it will be a great pleasure to my wife to receive him there. They will all be delighted to put us up for a night or two. If Roy will trust himself to me, I do not think he will repent it."

"I'm sure I shan't," was the eager answer. "I'm quite in the humour to see new people and places, and especially relations; and I want to come back to Marcus as strong as a horse. I'm awfully pleased you came when you did. We shall just have time for a nice little jaunt before I have to come home to receive Marcus. I'm so glad you approve, Frank."

Mr. Lee did approve, though he would have preferred a companion for Roy about whom he knew a little more. The man, however, though somewhat under-bred and under-educated, seemed respectable enough, and really solicitous as to Roy's well-being. He was a relative of his, too, and one who had been to the house as Marcus Stratford's guest. It would be uncalled-for on his part to take exception to the man, simply because he was unprepossessing, especially when Roy was obviously pining for some kind of change.

"You must be careful of that boy," he said, on his last visit, as Mr. Edington accompanied him out of the room. "He had an attack on the lungs this summer, and he will very likely be susceptible to cold for some little time to come. He's not been quite himself ever since his mother's death several months back, and this accident has told upon him considerably. He wants care and watching and generous living. I believe sea air will pick him up faster than anything; but if you are not satisfied let me know, and I'll run down and see him. By-the-bye, where will you be?"

"I shall leave that very much to the boy; I will take him first to my own house, which lies in the direct route to the coast. We shall see then how he stands travelling and act accordingly. We have fine moorland air at our place, which stands right in the middle of miles of heath, and the sea is at no very prohibitive distance. He can go on there as soon as he chooses. He will be the one to settle that point."

Roy was much pleased to be going to visit his cousins the Edingtons, and though he by no means abandoned the idea of the Brighton visit, he began to wonder if he might not manage to get all the cousins to accompany him there. He gathered from many little things that they were not rich, and he thought it would be a very pleasant thing to contrive a holiday for them all. He had plenty of money just now, having spent nothing of his liberal allowance during the past months, and when he applied to the family solicitor, as Marcus had directed him to do, should he have a fancy for leaving home to try what change of air would do, he found himself supplied with funds in so liberal a fashion that he felt like a miniature Crœsus. He said nothing of this to Mr. Edington, however, fearing to offend his sense of delicacy, but he built up many schemes of his own, and enjoyed them very much.

Vincent was able to say farewell in a much more happy frame of mind than he had anticipated, and he left Roy looking bright and gay in the anticipation of pleasure to come.

It was one of Roy's marked characteristics, his ability to banish disagreeable thoughts, and live in the enjoyment of the present whenever it was sufficiently engrossing; and despite the troubled thoughts that had assailed him of late, he was as full of merriment and boyish high spirit as he had ever been in his life. If he had not conquered his sense of injury, at least he had pushed it into the background of his thoughts, and with so many reminders of his brother's liberality and consideration towards him it would be hard to cherish unkind or distrustful thoughts.

The proposed visit to his cousin's house filled his mind to the exclusion of all else, and no one was more eager to face the fatigue and possible discomfort of the journey than the boy himself. He was only afraid he might give trouble to his hosts, but Roger Edington reassured him on that point.

"We are rather rough-and-ready people, Roy; Windmill House is not at all like the Hermitage, you must understand, and our ways will not be much like anything you have been accustomed to here; but there will be a warm welcome waiting for you, and you need not be afraid of giving trouble. You will have four very willing slaves in your cousins from the first. The more you keep them running about in your service the better they will be pleased."

And Roy, who had all the instinctive love of variety natural to youth, fancied that he should enjoy a thorough change in his manner of life more than anything else. He saw everything couleur de rose, and was all aglow with excitement and delight when once he found himself en route for Windmill House.

"I wonder how long it will last," was the somewhat grim unspoken thought of Roger Edington.

CHAPTER XXVIII.—INTRODUCTIONS.

Roy found travelling more trying than he had expected, and was very glad that the railway journey was quickly over. Although he could hobble about pretty well by means of a stick, the jarring of wheels was excessively disagreeable to him, and he was much relieved when the train drew up at the insignificant station of Thorne.

A lumbering fly seemed the only conveyance to be had, and although Roy had not expected his kinsman to keep a carriage, he found it in his heart to wish that the three miles that lay between the station and Windmill House could be shortened, or that some better vehicle could be obtained. However, he would not hurt his host's feelings by a single word of complaint, and resigned himself to the inevitable with praiseworthy resolution. Things were better than he had expected; the fly was easier than he had ventured to hope, the horse took his time, and the road was fairly smooth. What gave him most uneasiness was the change of manner that had gradually come over Roger Edington. His former geniality seemed to have vanished. He was silent and gloomy, and took but the barest notice of his companion. In reality it was but an involuntary relapse into his ordinary self, but to Roy, who had always known him different, it appeared as if some unconscious affront must have been put upon his kinsman. He racked his brain to try and find out what he could have said or done to vex him, and was resolved that he would atone for the blunder by every possible means in his power.

He had hardly thought to spare for the strange character of the country through which they were passing—strange, at least, to eyes used to the well-wooded pastoral regions in which Roy's home lay; but when at length the fly turned off from the main road into a less well-used track, he did begin to look about him with surprise at the desolate waste, until the stoppage of the vehicle before the large, plain stone house caused him to realise that his destination was already arrived at.

At once, as it seemed to him, a strange sort of tumult arose, similar to, and yet somehow altogether different from, anything he had witnessed before, even at the noisiest receptions he had ever received from the Kynaston household. Two big lads rushed down the steps and tore open the door of the fly, both talking at the top of their voices, contradicting each other, hustling Roy about in a fashion most unpleasant to him just then, and pouring upon him such a torrent of questions and information that to attempt to speak was utterly out of the range of possibility. He could only smile, try to feel pleased at this boisterous style of welcome, and mount the steps to the top, where two girls stood watching him with unrestrained, wild-eyed curiosity.

"You are our cousin, Roy, I suppose," said the elder of the two, holding out her hand and speaking rather bluntly. "We are very glad you have come. We are Mildred, and Nellie—perhaps papa has told you that."

Roy shook hands with them both, and said it was very nice to have so many new cousins; but Roger's voice from behind, speaking in loud and rather angry tones to his children, caused the girls to shrink back, half sullenly, half timidly, whilst the boys began hauling the luggage into the house with a great deal of unnecessary noise and rough horse-play.

Roy was growing bewildered by a scene so utterly unlike anything he had ever witnessed before; the bare, untidy hall, the uncarpeted stone stairs, the plain, poverty-stricken look of the girls' serge dresses, and the rough aspect of the boys—all these things struck him as very strange, and even more strange still was the rough manner of the father, and the utter absence of any kind of greeting between him and the children, whom he had not seen for several days. They took no notice of one another as it seemed, all the interest being centred on the new-comer; but if the children did not love their father, neither did they obey him, for his curt command to them all to go upstairs was entirely disregarded; they only drew back a little into the inner part of the hall, and continued to gaze at Roy with a steadfastness that was not ill-bred, only because it was so entirely spontaneous and childish. It seemed as if their eyes were altogether fascinated and riveted.

"You had better come and see my wife and sister," said Roger Edington, when Roy was fairly inside the door. "I suppose they are in the drawing-room, girls?"

Roy would certainly not have guessed, had he not been told before, that the bare, untidy room into which he was now ushered could be dignified by that name; but he had only time for a hasty look round him before he was called upon to go through introductions of a somewhat more formal character than those with his new cousins; not that there was any particular ceremony in the manner of his elder hosts.

"This is the boy, Caroline," said his kinsman, in the blunt abrupt way that seemed to have come over him under the influence of the surroundings of his own home. "Roy, let me introduce you to my wife, Mrs. Edington, and to my sister Joan," and Roger moved away, watching and listening without attempting to join farther in the scene. Nobody, however, seemed to want him.

"How do you do, Roy?" said Caroline Edington, with as much of cordiality as her naturally cold manner could assume. "We are very glad to make your acquaintance at last, and to welcome you to Windmill House. I hope we shall be able to persuade you to pay us a visit here, though I am bound to admit we have not many attractions to tempt you with. I hope you are feeling better again? We were sorry to hear of your illness. You are not looking very strong yet."

"I am quite well, thank you, except my foot; and change of air is sure to be the best kind of medicine, they say. It is very kind of you to take me in, Mrs. Edington. It is pleasant to make acquaintance with one's relations. Is this another cousin?" and he turned to Joan, who was standing silently by, and gave her his hand with a kindling smile. Her cold quiet face attracted him, he hardly knew why; he felt instinctively that she was to be trusted.

"I am your cousin Joan," she said, "I remember you when you were a tiny little boy, Roy."

"Do you?" he asked with interest, adding laughingly, "I'm afraid I don't remember you, Cousin Joan."

"Perhaps you will like to see your room now," said Caroline Edington, after a few more commonplace remarks had been exchanged—conversation would not flow easily, somehow, though she was anxious to please, and Roy to be pleased. "You will be sure to find some of the children outside eager to show it you. They have been wild with excitement about this visit. I hope you will be comfortable; but we can't do things here in the way you have been used to."

Roy coloured quickly.

"I am sure I shall be quite comfortable," he answered. "It is very kind of you to take me in at all."

He moved to the door as he spoke, and was at once seized upon by the quartet outside.

"Come along! What an age you've been!"

"Whatever could you find to talk about to them?"

"Come and see your room and ours. We'll show you everything!"

"What makes you so lame? Can't you get on without a stick?" This more quietly from Mildred.

"Not very easily," answered Roy, who had lost no time in gaining possession of his trusty staff, which he had left in the hall. He had already been walking and standing about much more than he had done on any one day since his accident, and he was a little surprised, after having heard Frank Lee's many cautions to Mr. Edington, to find that he was not expected to play the invalid at all here. In some ways, perhaps, it was something of a relief to feel that there was no likelihood of "fuss" on his account, but he could not quite make this indifference tally with his host's protestations of care and watchfulness made only four-and-twenty hours ago.

Nellie looked at him with a sort of shy sympathy in her blue eyes.

"I'm lame, too," she said timidly. "I've always been lame, I think."

He smiled kindly, and held out his hand to her.

"Then we must help each other along. We'll take things more leisurely than those two young monkeys up there."

For Archie and Dick had already precipitated themselves up the staircase, and were hanging grimacing over the rails like a veritable pair of monkeys.

"I wish you boys would either behave yourselves decently, or else go away," said Mildred sharply. She had been struck by the air of refinement and good-breeding in Roy, and was painfully conscious of the contrast presented by all of them, and particularly by the boys. Mildred was very observant, though she could not have defined the impressions her eyes took in.

The boys paid no heed to her words, save by an increase of noisy tumult. No one paid much heed to them or their antics, and the little procession reached in time the room allotted to Roy.

The girls had been very busy over it for days, and were immensely proud of their handiwork. They thought that for a bed-room it was quite luxurious in its appointments; for there was a carpet on the floor, a faded rug before the hearth, some old moreen curtains to the window and a cloth upon the table in the middle of the room. They had none of these things in their bare rooms, for they had been brought up with the most Spartan-like simplicity; but to Roy's eyes the place looked altogether poor and sordid. The servants at the Hermitage were more sumptuously lodged than that.

However, he was far too well-bred to show the least sign of dismay; indeed, his regret was not personal, for, as he mentally said, it mattered little enough for him; he was only sorry to see signs of such poverty about his relative's house, and wished there was anything he could do to help him.

The boys were too noisy and volatile to stay any length of time; but the girls were so anxious to make friends and be useful that at last he let them unfasten his portmanteaus and unpack his things for him, whilst he sat still in what Nelly called the "easy chair," and amused himself very much over their curiosity and surprise at the character of his wardrobe, and the novelty or costliness of its little appointments, which to him were matters-of-course. They exclaimed, and admired and questioned unceasingly, as they lifted out the things and arranged them in the places according to his direction; but when he once said something about "not wanting that till he went to Brighton," they both turned round and began a simultaneous entreaty.

"Oh, don't go to Brighton, Roy! Do stay here. We never have anybody to talk to or play with, and we want you to stay with us as long as ever you can! Do say you will! It's horrid here, I know, but you can't be sick of it like us. Do stay! It is so much nicer when you are here!" and Nellie's hand was laid pleadingly on his.

Roy laughed; it was early days, he thought, to have made so favourable an impression; but he was rather flattered by it, nevertheless, and drawn towards this pair of odd-looking girls, who seemed to have lived so dull and colourless a life. At least it seemed very friendly of them to be so eager for his society.

"It's awfully kind of you to want me," he said. "I shall be very pleased to stop here for a bit; but I can't arrange exactly without consulting your father. I think he wants a holiday himself somewhere at the sea. We said we were to take it together, you know."

Mildred stared. "That's all a make-believe," she said decidedly. "He never goes away like that."

"He said he'd had more holiday this year than he'd ever had before, already," added Nellie, "I heard him tell grandpapa so."

"Does your grandfather live here, too? Your mother's father?"

"No, he's papa's father; yes, he lives here; but he always stays in his own room. Aunt Joan looks after him."

"Why, he must be my great-uncle then!" cried Roy. "I wonder your father never told me. I should like to go and see him."

"But you mustn't," said Mildred quickly.

"Why not? Is he ill?"

"No, not ill—he isn't very well ever, I believe; but he won't have you go and see him. I heard Aunt Joan say so the other day."

Roy sat very still: he was beginning to feel exceedingly perplexed.

THE BISHOP OF DERRY AND MRS. ALEXANDER.

BY THE REV. THOMAS B. WILLSON, M.A.

THE church in Ireland was, until a short time since, fortunate in the possession of two bishops whose names may fairly claim a place amongst the poets of our century. Not, indeed, it may be, in the foremost rank, but yet of the numbers of those sweet singers whose verses men will not "willingly let die." One, the late Archbishop of Dublin (Dr. R. C. Trench), now rests in the stately Abbey of Westminster, of which he was once Dean; the other, William Alexander, Bishop of Derry and Raphoe, still lives to adorn the church of which he is one of the chief pastors.

It is not a little remarkable that in the Bishop of Derry's case his wife's fame in the field of poetry exceeds in some ways his own, for she must always be classed amongst the very first of our modern hymn-writers, having placed all those "who profess and call themselves Christians" under a deep debt of gratitude for the many gems with which she has enriched our collections of sacred song.

The Bishop of Derry is the eldest son of the late Reverend Robert Alexander, Rector of Aghadoey, and Canon of Derry Cathedral; his mother was Dorothea, daughter of Henry McClintock, Esq., of Rathdonnell, county Louth. It was in the historic city of Derry, so full of heroic memories of the past, that the future bishop was born on the 13th of April, 1824. He was educated in England at Tonbridge School, and afterwards proceeded to the University of Oxford. He commenced his university career at Exeter College, but subsequently he went to Brasenose, from which college he graduated in 1847. The same year he returned to Ireland, and was ordained deacon, serving as curate of Templemore, the principal parish in the city of Derry; the church of which (St. Columb's) is the cathedral of the diocese. During this time he did not, however, abandon his studies, for we find that in 1850 he obtained the Denyer prize at Oxford for a theological essay, the subject of which was "The Divinity of our Lord"—this essay has since been republished. In 1860 his poetic gifts gained him a prize of considerable value, given every three years for the best poem on a sacred subject. That which he selected was "The Waters of Babylon;" it may now be found in the volume recently published of collected poems, entitled "St. Augustine's Holiday," to which we shall allude further on.

BISHOP ALEXANDER.
(Photo. Alexander Ayton, Londonderry.)

During these years his advancement in the church was rapid. He was successively presented to the parishes of Termonamongan, Fahan, and Camus-juxta-Mourne, to which last he was nominated in 1860. The Deanery of Emly became vacant in 1863, and it was offered to, and accepted by Dr. Alexander. In the year 1867, on the death of Dr. Higgins, he became Bishop of Derry, and from that to the present day he has ruled over the united dioceses of Derry and Raphoe, with which he was so long connected, both by family and personal ties.

We must not forget to mention, that in the same year in which he was consecrated Bishop of Derry, he had been a candidate for the Chair of the Professor of Poetry at Oxford, then vacant by the resignation of Mr. Matthew Arnold; but he failed to secure the coveted prize, which fell to Sir Francis Doyle. His alma mater of course conferred the degree of D.D. upon her distinguished son on his accession to the episcopal bench.

The period of Dr. Alexander's appointment to the see of Derry was naturally an agitated one for the Irish Church, on account of the famous disestablishment resolutions carried in the House of Commons by Mr. Gladstone in 1868, and brought into effect next year (after the General Election) by the Irish Church Act of 1869.

As a preacher and speaker the bishop is well known. There are few occupants of the bench who surpass him in glowing eloquence and poetic fire; he is a favourite preacher at the opening services of the Church Congress, and there are few of those who have listened to him, who have not felt the charm of his "fervid heart and speech." In the university pulpits Dr. Alexander is often heard, and few of the select preachers at Oxford or Cambridge are more popular. In 1876 he was Bampton lecturer, and chose for his subject "The Witness of the Psalms to Christ and Christianity"; these discourses, when published, became widely known, and have passed through several editions. His lectures on literary and social subjects, as well as printed sermons, are too numerous to mention here, and embrace a very wide field of secular and theological learning. Of his power in less ephemeral literature he has given ample proof in contributions to "The Speaker's Commentary." The portions assigned to him were the Epistles to the Colossians and Thessalonians, the Epistle to Philemon, and the Epistles of St. John. This shows that as an exegetical writer the bishop may claim a high place, besides being an eloquent preacher and poet. In 1876 he was presented with the degree of D.C.L. at Oxford, in company with other distinguished men.

As a bishop, Dr. Alexander is much esteemed in his diocese; his kindliness of disposition has made him much loved by all his people, and he has entered fully into the historic associations of his birthplace. The cathedral which has been immortalised, for its share in the heroic defence of the city in 1688–9, by the genius of Lord Macaulay, has recently been restored and enlarged, a result due in a great measure to the zeal of the bishop. His liberality to the see of Derry has been very marked, and deserves to be recorded, for he has permanently endowed it with £2000 a year, which makes it, we believe, the richest of the suffragan sees in the disestablished and disendowed church. For this act he received the thanks of the synods of his diocese; a mark of their gratitude for "his large sacrifice of income."

The bishop's gifted wife, whose name as a writer of sacred song will probably live as long as hymns are sung, is Cecil Frances, the second daughter of John Humphries, Esq., of Milltown House, county Tyrone, to whom he was married in 1849. It is doubtful if any woman has ever excelled Mrs. Alexander in her own special branch of poetry. There is a delicacy of expression, and depth of religious feeling, along with the truest poetic genius, not often to be met with, and one must hope that the writer of "There is a green hill far away," may long be spared to give to the church many more of her beautiful hymns. Her early published collections are "Hymns for Children," issued in 1855, "Poems on subjects in the Old Testament" (in which we find the well known and very striking "Burial of Moses"), and "The Legend of the Golden Prayer," 1859. For the selection and arrangement of the "Sunday Book of Poetry" in the "Golden Treasury Series," 1864, we are also indebted to Mrs. Alexander. As a translator she is associated with her husband in some most powerful translations from the French of Victor Hugo.

MRS. ALEXANDER.
(Photograph by A. Ayton.)

We have already alluded to the Bishop of Derry's recently published collection of poems, entitled "St. Augustine's Holiday," and with a notice of this work we shall conclude. The volume contains verse of no mean order, "full," as a recent reviewer says, "of a certain splendour as well as power." The collection derives its name from the first of three longer poems which are placed at the commencement, "St. Augustine's Holiday," "An Old Volume of Sermons" (St. Bernard on the Song of Songs) and "The New Atlantis;" these are succeeded by poems sacred and reflective. The second part consists of Characters, Inscriptions, etc.; followed by "Withered Laurel Leaves," chiefly Oxford poems; some sonnets, and the very fine translations from Victor Hugo.

To this volume the bishop has prefixed a few very characteristic words. "Here I gather together," he says, "fragments mostly which (with three or four exceptions) I have had no sufficient time either to conceive deeply or to finish even after the measure of my own poor powers. Some, I already know, care for the things such as they are, and think them not altogether worthy of death. Perhaps God may enable me to say in the sweeter dialect dear to me long ago some things which I have failed to say in prose. If so, I shall thank Him from my heart. If not, the church and the world will suffer no great wrong from me; and, for myself, I do not much fear a whiff of sarcasm and the painless punishment of oblivion."

The first poem in the book refers to an interesting period in the life of the great Latin Father, mentioned by him in Book X. of his immortal "Confessions." It was when he had finally resolved to abandon the profession of Rhetoric, and to receive baptism, that he joyfully accepted the offer from his friend Verecundus of a retreat at his country house, at Cassiciacum, where he might spend a short time in rest and meditation. "So Augustine went on holiday to that green banishment." "It was a little company of ten," and included his mother Monica, the poet Licentius and Augustine's youthful son Adeodatus. In this happy country home they passed a pleasant time with—

> Sweet liberty for prayer or for the word,
> Or for discourses grave, or readings made
> From a page chequered by the chesnut shade.

Their varied studies are described, and Augustine's great love of light and of the sea are noted. The stories of the notary of Uzala and Gennadius are also introduced. The poet Licentius read Virgil aloud; and in such ways, reading, meditation, pleasant converse and prayer, the happy days of what Augustine ever afterwards called "My one Holiday," slipped by until—

> The holiday is o'er—the rest is done,
> Cassiciácum lies in sunny mist;
> They turn toward it, praying every one,
> "To Verecundus do thou give, O Christ!
> For that sweet rest beneath the happy skies
> The fadeless greenery of Thy Paradise.
> Never was yet to-day whose incompleteness
> Fail'd not in somewhat of the bliss it brought,
> Till it inherited the dim faint sweetness,
> The immaculate azure of the sky of thought:
> Till we baptized the dead hours far away
> By the ethereal name of yesterday."

The poem entitled "An Old Volume of Sermons," though it starts with a comparison between St. Bernard's and M. Renan's treatment of "The Song of Songs," consists rather of a series of sketches of the life of the great founder of Clairvaux, including the visits paid to him there by St. Malachy, the Primate of Ireland, and Pope Innocent II. It abounds with many fine passages, of which we may perhaps quote one, in which St. Bernard, speaking to the soul of his brother who had passed away, says—

> God's life is to have mercy and forgive;
> One spirit with Him, thou, my Girard, art;
> Wherefore thro' that great life which thou dost live
> There is unsuffering sympathy in thy heart.
> Thou carest, though no care can pass thy gate,
> And passioning not art still compassionate.

The other poems in this first part of the volume are chiefly sacred, and contain many noble thoughts. We quote the closing verses of "The Chamber Peace":

> Another chamber yet—
> The curtain is of grass, and closely drawn;
> But the pale pilgrim, in its portal set,
> Looketh toward the dawn.
>
> Oftimes red roses lie
> On the green curtain of that chamber low,
> And blossoms like the deep blue summer sky,
> Or like the winter snow.
>
> And when the eves are calmest,
> Up in the incense-laden aisles of lime,
> Some sweet bird meditateth like a psalmist
> His poesy sublime.
>
> So lay the pilgrim down—
> Set thou his feet, and face, and closed eyes,
> Where they may meet the golden raying crown
> Of Christ's august sunrise.
>
> So let him rest, unheard
> Thy faithless mourning; let thy murmur cease;
> Translate the grave into a gentler word,
> Call it the "Chamber Peace."

There is an epitaph on Agnes Jones, one of the founders of hospital nursing, who is buried in Fahan churchyard in the bishop's diocese, and whose beautiful monument is placed in the chapel of the Liverpool Infirmary, which we may quote—

> Alone with Christ in this sequester'd place,
> Thy sweet soul learn'd its quietude of grace.
> On sufferers waiting in this vale of ours,
> Thy gifted touch was trained to higher powers;
> Therefore, when death, O Agnes! came to thee—
> Not on the cool breath of our lake-like sea,
> But in the workhouse hospital's hot ward,
> A gentle helper with the gentle Lord—
> Proudly as men heroic ashes claim,
> We ask'd to have thy fever-stricken frame,
> And lay it in our grass beside our foam,
> Till Christ the Healer call His healers home.

Here is another—

"On R. H. in Derry Cathedral."

Down through our crowded lanes, and closer air,
O friend, how beautiful thy footsteps were;
When through the fever's waves of fire they trod,
A form was with thee like the Son of God.
'Twas but one step for those victorious feet,
From their day's walk unto the Golden Street;
And they who watched that walk, so bright and brief,
Have marked this marble with their hope and grief.

Those who read the Bishop of Derry's poems, will, we are sure, lay them down with the feeling that there is in them the true spirit of poetry; and that in spite of the many labours and cares laid upon him, yet he is truly, what he long ago hoped to be, "one of the brethren who prophesy with harps, and are instructed in the songs of the Lord."

THE HOLDEN EYES.

"And it came to pass, while they communed together and reasoned, Jesus Himself drew near, and went with them. But their eyes were holden that they should not know Him."—Luke xxiv. 15, 16.

IN the new activity of the Resurrection life, our Lord appeared to His disciples no less than five times on the first day. Here we have the record of the fourth of these appearances.

In its soberness and reticence it bears satisfactory evidences of the veracity of the historian: —in its tenderness and grandeur it bears satisfying evidences of the truth of the history.

We are told how on the evening of the first day, two men, who had been scholars of Christ, left Jerusalem for Emmaus, a village some eight miles distant. As they walked, they talked. Nature surrounded them with shadows, set before them her dying sunset colours in the western sky. Their own gloomy experiences by degrees took a darker hue. Suddenly a stranger joined them. He stepped, as it were, from some mountain path or roadside coppice. Coming to their sides, He walked with them, talked with them, and presently showed Himself to them. It was the Christ, who three days since was crucified, but now risen, living, victorious.

1. Observe, the death of individual faith in the doctrines of Scripture, is a very different thing to the death of the doctrines themselves; and especially of the truths that underlie the doctrines.

Cleopas and his companion say sadly enough at the end of their story, "We trusted this had been He who should redeem Israel!" But He was dead, and three days have gone and no sign. Some women, indeed—eager, fond enthusiasts—had been early at the tomb, and had seen a vision of angels who said He was alive. And some of the men had then gone also, and saw the empty grave, "but Him they saw not."

And so faith had failed. And yet—and yet—there He was Himself, close to them! "But their eyes were holden that they knew Him not."

Some people to-day may say sorrowfully, "I have lost faith in the Resurrection." It is only the sensual and fiendish, that could say such a thing scoffingly. But it does not follow that the Resurrection is lost, or that there was no resurrection. A stone pillar stands at your house door. Round it twines the clematis or the honeysuckle. But, alas! the tender climber has been smitten by frost or blight. It is dying. It is dead. Yes; but the pillar still remains, solid, stable, invulnerable to frost or fire.

In every man who walks by our side—a changed man in his life, because of faith in Christ—we have a proof of the Resurrection. In the slow leavening of the world with a new spirit of love, and the slow heightening of human standards of goodness, which are round us every day, we have a proof of the Resurrection of Christ. In all changes, private or public, from folly to wisdom, from pride to humility, from hate to love, which have come to pass through faith in Him—these are evidences of the Resurrection of Christ.

"Out of nothing comes nothing." These people could not change themselves. It is only because our eyes are holden, that we do not know Him in them. The delay is nothing. Three days—three years—thirty centuries. It matters not. He is still working in us. He is still walking with us. The risen Christ! "Our eyes are holden that we know Him not."

2. There is a reason worth remembering as to why our faith in the supernatural side of our Lord's life may become feeble and even die.

After Cleopas and his companion had told their sorrows and fears, how were they met? By condolence and sympathy? Not so. They were met by reproof and instruction. "O fools, and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken:" "And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, He expounded unto them in all the Scriptures, the things concerning Himself."

Why is it that some of us are losing hold of this and other doctrines? We forget the unreliability of the faculties with which we work. There is much native foolishness in our intellect, much native indolence in our affections. Our proofs seem to fail; but that is really because our faculties for discovering proofs—and weighing them after discovered—are not wholly trustworthy.

We forget to allow in our observings for that "personal equation," which is so familiar and

By permission] [After Heinrich Hofmann.

EMMAUS.

necessary to the scientist in his search for material truth. We admit in lesser things, that we must accept the authority of teachers. In architecture, agriculture, chemistry, we compare and rectify our crude ideas, by their matured observation and prolonged experience. But when we deal with the greater things of religion and theology; when we consider the supernatural side of the life of God, and of His Christ, we act as if our own faculties were equal to the task. But the reverse is the case—untrained and unaided, they are not equal to the task. We have no strong stretch or grasp of faith, because our spiritual natures are too feeble, and, alas! too perverse. In the denial of the Resurrection, it is often as if one afflicted with ophthalmia, declared the sun had vanished—as if one afflicted with ague, affirmed that the house shook. The reason of doubting or denying the Resurrection, is more deeply often in ourselves than in our evidence. More deeply than we care or even dare to look.

3. There is one abiding life principle set before us here by Christ.

The Crucifixion prepared for the Resurrection. The experience of suffering was the preface to glory. "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and entered into His glory?"

It was the one destined and appropriate course for the Redeemer. And as it was for Him, so it must be also for us. Those who die with Christ to sin now, will even now also live with Christ in righteousness. And presently will live yet more; following Him in His Resurrection, His Ascension, His unshown and inconceivable Glory of the invisible world.

"Thou sayest 'Take up thy cross,
O man, and follow Me;'
The night is black, the feet are slack,
Yet we would follow Thee.

Comes faint and far Thy voice
From vales of Galilee;
Thy vision fades in ancient shades—
How can we follow Thee?

Oh, sense-bound heart and blind!
In nought but what we see
Can time undo what once was true?
Can we not follow Thee?

Within our heart of hearts,
In nearest nearness be.
Set up Thy Throne within Thine own—
Go, Lord: we follow Thee."

We may also take to ourselves those minor lessons.

1. We must be satisfied with fleeting glimpses of His greater supernatural glory; even if we are ever permitted to have them.

Cleopas and his comrade invited Him into the house. He came and sat and ate with them. Instead of guest, He became suddenly host. "Then their eyes were opened and they knew Him. And He vanished out of their sight." There are times for some when Christ is very real, His presence very sure. Those times pass and they lose Him. But He has not lost them. Real once, and real for ever, is He. Present with them once, and present always, is the risen Christ.

2. In the house and at the table—although unseen and unfelt—He still sanctifies common things and common actions.

They knew Him in the breaking and sharing of bread. "It came to pass as He sat at meat with them, He took the loaf and blessed it and brake, and gave to them." There was something divine in His air and gesture. There was a gratitude, a reverence, an unselfishness, a Majesty, which only One could show. And they knew Him there. Thus He rebukes that pride of possession and production that ignores God as the Giver of all. Thus all frowardness and ostentation and gluttony are dismissed by the Risen Christ.

3. As regards companions and conversations He gives us our still necessary example.

He chose two sorrowful travellers, making their way by foot along a country road. He joined them and by-and-by made them glad. We may well sometimes seek obscure places and sorrowful people as our best companions. There it is that we may give, if we do not get, help that is very precious. Not always in public streets and amid clamorous throngs do we find those who most need our sympathy and our companionship.

"It is better to go to the house of mourning than the house of feasting," said the wise Hebrew. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the widows and orphans in their afflictions, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." "Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ."

4. Then as regards conversations.

They talked about human hopes and disappointments, about Christ and His crucifixion, about the sacred books and their witnessing to truth. It would be well if we talked to one another often on these things. We talk enough on art, science, manufacture. Why not talk a little more on religion, and the morality and high endeavour that the religion of a risen Christ makes possible to us and incumbent on us?

Two men walked together, like Cleopas and his companion, over the mountains of Ireland. They were brothers, sons of a farmer. And the farm was too small to support the family. So it was decided that one of the sons should cross the sea to America. And the farewell had been said at home; and the younger brother went to see the elder brother on his way. He was a truly pious man. And, in the quietude of the fields and the solemnity of the parting, he began to speak to his brother for the first time on religious things. He urged him to give his heart to God and his hands to work for God. And, after talking awhile, they knelt together upon the grass and the younger prayed earnestly for the salvation of the elder.

To that circumstance, in after years, the emigrant brother traced his first spiritual experience; and he gradually ripened in a career of great usefulness.

And so it is, that although perhaps we know it not, on the common roads as we travel to and fro among common houses the risen Christ draws near and goes with us; giving us His Spirit and using us in His work. ALFRED NORRIS.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR.

THE EDINBURGH INDUSTRIAL BRIGADE.

THERE is in Grove Street, Fountainbridge, Edinburgh, one of the most excellent institutions in Scotland. The problem it deals with is not an easy one, but in a quiet, modest way it solves it successfully. The problem is—What is to be done with a homeless boy after he leaves school? He is then turned adrift in the world on his own account; his earnings are small, and the better the trade he starts in the smaller is at first his pay. Where is he to find a home? What is he to do with himself in his leisure? If school has been irksome to him and he has been taught to look forward to the time when he "will have done with book-learning," he will, for a time, at least, throw away books, and run wild in his liberty. He is neither boy nor man. He has ended his boyhood; he has begun his manhood. What is to be his pattern on the tablet of life, for the marks he makes are ineffaceable? An important question this as to what we are to do with our young men when they shake off their leading strings. It meets us in every class. We have seen how Glasgow tries to deal with it in certain strata; here, in Edinburgh, is the way in which the problem is attacked among the lowliest.

It was twenty years ago, on the 4th of last October, that the Edinburgh Industrial Brigade came into existence. At the first meeting the chair was taken by Sheriff Watson, the pioneer of ragged schools in Scotland; and Mr. David Harris, in a pithy and persuasive speech, referred to the condition of the lads he sought to reach, and indicated generally the organisation and working of the institution he wished to establish. In a month the scheme was fairly afloat, and to Cockburn Street, on the 4th of November, the boys of Edinburgh were invited. Fifty-seven appeared, tempted by the "tea and cookies" promised on the bills. All the lads were miserably clad, most of them in rags, and covered with filth and vermin, and all of them were extraordinarily hungry. The way in which the tea and cookies disappeared on the opening night is told in the Home to this day. A few hymns were sung—in which the boys joined vociferously—a short prayer was offered, and a few words of encouragement and welfare spoken. Then the names and addresses of those present were taken, and of the fifty-seven, fifteen were induced to take up their abode in the Home.

"To wean the boys from their arab life in the streets," says the official account, "it was deemed advisable as a first step to employ some as shoeblacks, and accordingly a number were comfortably clad, and fully equipped with blacking, box, and brushes. Others who were found suitable, were sent to learn agricultural work on Lord Polwarth's farm, at Humbie, and a few were apprenticed to trades or employed as message boys. The first year was an eventful one, the wild natures, ungoverned passions, and roving dispositions of the lads causing scenes at once serious and comical. Cases of boys absconding with their wages and selling their clothes, staying out all night, and being hauled in by their chums with the aid of blankets let down from the windows, were not uncommon. On one occasion their blacking-boxes were piled up against the entrance door of the Home, so that when the superintendent opened it, instead of admitting the boys, he received a shower of blacking-boxes about his ears. On another occasion the superintendent unfortunately left a large barrel of coals in the lobby. The boys, taking advantage of this, kept firing volley after volley of coals at the door, and it was not until eight o'clock, when their ammunition was well-nigh reduced to dross, that the siege was raised and the superintendent effected his escape. This was no easy matter. Armed with the barrel lid as a shield, he at last succeeded in running the gauntlet. The boys beat a hasty retreat, singing at the pitch of their voices, 'Scots wha hae.' One day our young friends decamped in a body to Glasgow, leaving the Home empty!"

It was agreed to look on this experience as experimental, to remove the Home to other quarters, and to start fresh. From Cockburn Street a move was therefore made to Leith Street Terrace, and the work proper of the Brigade begun. Afterwards a move was made to the present premises at Fountainbridge. There is a vast difference between the tone of conduct now and what it was in the old days, but there is a good deal of healthy fun going on, as a visitor soon finds when he takes a stroll through the building in the evening, when the lads are at home. The Brigade is not a reformatory, for reformatories only exist for such lads as have brought themselves under the law; it is not an industrial school, for industrial schools are only for children under fourteen years of age, who work on the school premises; it is not a ragged school, for ragged schools only provide for children up to thirteen years of age. It is a home for destitute lads willing to work; where they are fed, clothed, lodged, and educated; where every boy is apprenticed to a trade of his own choice, and works on his master's premises; where he has an opportunity during his apprenticeship of qualifying himself in every branch of his trade, is placed on the same footing as other boys living in their own homes, and in the end is in a position to take his place as a skilled artisan. While in the Home he is removed from evil influences and those surroundings which render it impossible for him to raise himself to a position of honest independence and tend to drag him down to crime. He is not labelled as a charity-boy; he wears no uniform or distinctive dress, but can choose within certain limits his own patterned clothes; everything is done to make him feel and look as other boys; he comes to work with them, and leaves work with them, and it is only his address which tells his employer that he is one of the Brigade.

Any boy that is destitute has only to apply to be admitted. No canvassing is necessary; the first vacant bed is given to the first needy applicant, and the fact that a lad is helpless and destitute, and of suitable age, constitutes in itself a claim entitling him to admission, if there is room. If the father or mother brings the boy, an agreement has to be entered into pledging the parents not to interfere with the boy as long as he remains in the Brigade, to give every assistance to the directors in their efforts on the boy's behalf, and not to remove him without paying what has been spent on his board and clothing, after deducting such wages as may have been earned by him. The boy signs a promise to be cleanly, kind to the other boys, obedient and respectful to the masters, and at all times careful to maintain the good character of the Brigade.

The boy can choose his own trade. He is recommended to choose one of the more reputable, which means as a rule an apprenticeship during which his earnings are nominal. Among the hundred and thirty boys in the Brigade last year, there were joiners, brass-finishers, tailors, lithographers, saddle-makers, blacksmiths, printers, glaziers, plumbers, bookbinders, tinsmiths, wire-workers, draftsmen, and so on, trades of all sorts in fact. Some of the boys go for sailors, some after a time for soldiers, some go to the colonies. One of the pleasant features at Grove Street is the collection of photographs sent by old boys doing well in all parts of the world, some of them as farmers, some of them even as missionaries and ministers, for the sorting out that soon takes place as the boys advance in manhood is wonderful. With the photographs, and exceeding them far in numbers, are the letters, for the correspondence is often kept up for years with the old home. And in the office is a small museum of odds and ends sent from many a distant land, in sign that the kindness of the superintendent had not been forgotten—snowshoes from Winnipeg side by side with seashells from Sumatra.

Every Saturday the boy hands over his week's wages to the superintendent, who returns him a small allowance for pocket money. A huge ledger is kept with eighty-five lines on a page—one of the largest books obtainable—in which every boy has an account. All the money the boy hands in is credited to him, and all that is spent on his account is charged against him, for, in order to teach the lad the value of money, he is, by a fiction, supposed to buy his own clothes, &c. We say by a fiction, for merely nominal charges are made, such as five shillings for a coat, and two shillings for a pair of trousers, the said coat and trousers being of good strong Scotch tweed of which there is a large choice of patterns. It is a significant fact that since the establishment of the institution the boys have earned for themselves, and paid towards their maintenance over 20,000*l.*, or over forty per cent. of the entire sum needed to carry on the work. The keynote of the management is to help them who try to help themselves. There is nothing to compel a lad to stay a day longer than he chooses. Sometimes a lad leaves dissatisfied, but many of these come back having learned a bitter lesson of the world's difficulties. On an average the lads leave when they are about nineteen, when they have become self-supporting.

The Home contains a large dining-hall, three spacious dormitories, with forty beds in each, and a smaller dormitory with twenty beds. Off the dining-hall are the kitchen and store-rooms, and a school-room, a meeting-room seated for 150, with platform, harmonium, desk, and blackboard. There are, besides, gymnasium and band-room, and a large-sized swimming bath, got at, strange to say, through the windows of the school-room. The bath is a great institution among the boys, nearly all of whom become good swimmers, and many of whom win prizes at the swimming competitions in the district.

The rules under which the Home is managed are worth quoting in full:—

1. Every boy on entering the Brigade shall have the admission line read over to him, and shall be made to understand its import, and shall then sign it—the "admission line" being an amplified version of the agreement.

2. Every boy shall treat the superintendent with respect, and give implicit obedience to his orders, and shall also behave in a proper and kindly manner to the other inmates.

3. The boys shall be called in time to get ready for their work; and when called they shall immediately rise, wash and dress, and neatly make up their beds.

4. All the boys shall attend the week-day evening classes, unless when prevented by out-door employment, or specially excused by the superintendent; or unless they are exempt by having passed the standard of education required by the directors.

5. No boy shall be excused for leaving his employment without having previously informed the superintendent, and given a satisfactory reason for his intention to do so.

6. Every boy must return to the Home immediately on leaving his work, and at all times give a faithful account of his earnings.

7. The greatest propriety of conduct shall be required in the Home, especially at meals, in the school, and during Divine worship—all being made clearly to understand that it is only by such conduct that there can be either real usefulness or happiness in the establishment.

8. Every boy shall be present at family worship, unless when excused by the superintendent. Every boy shall attend the Brigade Sunday school at 9.30 A.M., and the Brigade Sunday evening service at 7, and also a place of public worship on Sunday forenoon. Attendance is optional at the Home service in the afternoon at 2 o'clock.

9. Any boy staying out all night may be dismissed; and any boy leaving the Home without leave asked and given, shall not be re-admitted without the consent of the superintendent.

10. Any boy who is guilty of the wilful breach of any of the above rules, and continues to offend after being warned by the superintendent, shall be brought before the Home Committee, for admonition or dismissal.

11. Any boy who has been admonished and again offends in the like manner may be dismissed.

12. Any boy who commits any criminal offence shall be conveyed before the sitting magistrate, with the view of commitment for five years to a Reformatory.

13. Subject to the foregoing rules, the superintendent is authorised generally to punish, in any way he may see fit, any boy who disobeys an order, or behaves in a riotous and disorderly manner.

The daily routine is hinted at pretty clearly in these rules—up at four, five or six, according to the hour for commencing work; breakfast, after morning prayers, at eight for those boys not at work earlier; dinner at one; supper at seven, when every boy must appear with face and hands washed; school from half-past seven to nine, after which evening worship, conducted by the superintendent or one of the directors, or friends who may happen to be present; bed about half-past nine. In charge of each dormitory is a superintendent who reads aloud to the boys from some "interesting and instructive book after they are in bed," and when all are asleep from the effects of the volume thus used as a soporific, the charge is transferred to the night watchman, who exercises a strict supervision of all the dormitories and awakens the boys in the morning.

There are clubs for out-door sports, such as cricket and football; and books and magazines are provided by friends for the boys who care for reading. Everything is done to make the place like home. If the visitor to Edinburgh finds his way to Grove Street any evening from 5 to 6.30—and it is well worth his while to do so—he will find no elaborate building with silent inmates and appalling spread of whitewash, but a house like the rest in the street, with all its flats occupied as we have told, wherein a lot of particularly healthy-looking big boys are amusing themselves in a rational way, with a certain amount of vigour, and an absence of humbug that says much for the genuineness of the training. Let him ask Mr. Rattray, who has rendered whole-hearted service to the Brigade since its commencement, to show him the photographs and letters from those who have passed out into the world, and he will find a look and tone of Christian manliness, which is as rare as it is desirable among institutions of the class. The limit of the Brigade's valuable work is the limit of its means, which could well bear a tenfold increase. It gives a boy a better chance amongst boys in his own rank of life than most institutions, for it treats him as an individual and not as a machine. It does not force a boy into a trade whether he is fitted for it or not; it gives him a chance of choosing that which he is best fitted to do. It practically provides him with capital on which to live while he is learning a solid means of obtaining a steady livelihood in the future. The importance of this help cannot be over-estimated, for it is one of the curses of our modern life that our precarious occupations offer the best immediate advantages, so that skilled trades are despised, and a boy with greedy short-sighted friends is often forced to enter on some comparatively highly paid employment dependent on luxury, from which there is no chance of advance, which lasts but for an irregular period, and from which a change of season or of fashion may turn him out for months to loiter round a gin-palace or figure in Trafalgar Square.

W. J. GORDON.

Things New and Old.

THE HARDENING OF PHARAOH'S HEART.—There are two ways of describing certain human actions and mental conditions, which at first sight may seem contradictory, but are in fact harmonious and identical. Thus, it is said that "Pharaoh hardened his heart," and it is also said that "God hardened his heart." Both are true, and are not inconsistent. Here is what Mr. Gladstone says, in an article in the Nineteenth Century, speaking of Homeric accounts of Olympian deities interfering in human affairs, especially in setting "divinely interposed bars to the repentance of offenders." "The hardening of Pharaoh's heart is predicted in Exodus iv. 21, but nothing of the kind takes place, until a solemn demand has been made upon him in the name of God (Exod. v. 1) and contumeliously refused. From this point down to ix. 34, we have two forms of statement intermixed; the one, that the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and the other, that he hardened His own heart (see viii. 13; viii. 15, 22; ix. 12, 34). From this stage onward Pharaoh seems to have fallen into an incurable obstinacy; and we are told (in Exod. x. 1, 20, 27) only that God hardened his heart. And so it is that would not ever passes into could not; that, under the stern law of mental habits grounded in nature, the evil we have chosen takes deeper and deeper root, and at last passes beyond our choice to recall. There are gradations of impenitence marked; an opportunity of free pardon is offered; and lighter punishments foreshadow the greater. When it is said that Pharaoh hardened his heart, we are viewing the voluntary and human side; when it is said that God hardened his heart, we see the judicial and penal side."

THE BUSH NEGROES OF SURINAM.—In our Christian negro congregations the remnants and traditions of heathenism have not been altogether exterminated. Sorcery or obeahism is still practised in secrecy, though it seldom comes to light. But gross and open idolatry is universal among these Juka negroes. The entrance to every camp is indicated by branches of palm trees hung up in some conspicuous place, and to the right and left are generally suspended two small idols, supposed to guard the entrance. Follow the road leading to the camp, and about midway you come upon the principal idol of the place, standing beneath a somewhat scanty roof of leaves resting on four poles. It is nothing more than a rough upright clump of wood, about a yard high and about six inches thick. Sometimes the upper end is carved into a rough head, not unfrequently that member is simply a piece of earthenware thrust on the top of the pole. Eyes, nose and mouth are represented by pieces of charred wood; for arms and legs there appears to be no necessity. This local deity is supposed to bring luck to the inhabitants of the camp, in house, field and forest. The idol temple, to be found more in the centre of the village, is small and low-roofed; in fact to effect an entrance it is almost necessary to crawl on one's hands and knees. Although access is forbidden to all except the priest, our missionaries were not prevented from entering some of these shrines and minutely examining their contents. The idols to be found within are of a ruder construction than even the main local deities already described. A few dirty dishes and bowls lie about, wooden lances or long sticks lean against the walls, and the floor is strewn with the teeth of animals, the skeletons of fish and similar refuse. Nearly everything is plastered with white clay. One significant and probably recent addition to the objects of worship is now invariably found in these temples, namely, a brandy bottle with a glass. In the more remote negro villages one may see a table in the open air, and by its side a stick planted in the ground with a bright-coloured strip of stuff as a flag. On this table stands a bottle, ready to supply refreshment for any passing god. In most cases, however, the bottle contains nothing more than dirty rain-water.—Moravian Periodical Accounts.

Peace.

"Peace be unto you."—John xx. 19.

THEY cowered within that upper room,
With closèd doors, at eventide,
And One stood with them in the gloom,
And showed His wounded hands and side.
Their fears were calmed, their doubts were dead;
"Peace be to you," the Master said.

O Thou, before Whose awful throne
All powers and glories bow the knee,
Thou dost not leave Thy sheep alone,
But joinest yet the two or three;
When helpers fail and foes increase,
Thou drawest near to whisper "Peace."

O while our prayers go forth to-night
In loud appeal or contrite sigh,
Dear Lord, unviewed by mortal sight,
A healing presence be Thou nigh;
Let every lightened spirit know
A peace the world may not bestow.

And wheresoe'er a heart perplexed
Is rent by thoughts at war within;
And wheresoe'er a heart is vexed,
Or grieved and weary with its sin;
Bid doubt, and pain, and striving cease,
And breathe like balm Thy word of peace.

Sweet Saviour, at Thy blessèd birth,
When angels chorussed overhead,
Their anthem told of peace on earth—
O let it alway wax and spread!
Thy kingdom come from pole to pole,
Thy peace bedew each longing soul.

For peace our spirit yearns and cries—
We need it more each hour we live;
The world has many a golden prize,
But peace is only Thine to give.
From earth and self, O grant release!
Lord, keep our souls in perfect peace.

FREDERICK LANGBRIDGE.

THE PAINTER'S MODEL.

I.

THE painter sat alone in his studio. He had been sitting lost in thought for some minutes. All at once he looked up and glanced round the large picturesque room. As his eye rested upon several canvases in various stages of progress, he smiled as if the sight of them gave him great satisfaction—he stroked his long black beard complacently.

"Yes," he said. "I have worked hard and I have produced much good work." Another mood seized him. "But have I done anything great? I fear not."

His thoughts went back to earlier years, and the determination of his youth to excel. Those early thoughts perhaps were not all wise. Fame is a poor ambition, but the resolve to produce good work in every department is a worthier motive. He sighed as he reflected how far off he was still from the goal which he had set himself.

"But life is not over yet. I am hardly in my prime. I will do something worth the doing before I die. What shall it be? Oh to find the subject!"

He got up and went to a window. "How late it is," he muttered. "I must go out at once, or I shall lose the view of the sunset from the terrace. It will be grand to-night, I fancy."

He put on his hat and went out. He went by the back way and walked through the small garden, passing two splendid oleanders covered with large rose-like blooms. He closed the massive iron gate behind him, and went up the steep road opposite, which presently turned abruptly to the right and then led straight to the high part of the town.

Fellowes had now been in Italy for about three years, but the country and all its wonderful and varied effects of colour had still as great a charm for him as ever.

The sun was sinking fast as he walked along, and when he reached the platform at the top of the hill a magnificent sight burst upon him.

Before him, some twelve or thirteen miles distant, on the other side of the Tiber, lay Assisi; the valley itself was one continuous garden of vines, olives, and fig-trees, made fertile by the hidden river; and the beautiful grey town nestled snugly against the bold round-shaped mass of the hill of Subasio.

Fellowes turned to look at another side of the landscape. This was equally beautiful in its way. On all sides the circling and interlacing Apennines met his view. Every instant they changed from one lovely tint to another. He looked again towards Assisi. He cried out with delight and wonder. He could hardly believe that what he saw was real. Subasio was one blaze of a light-hued purple glory; the rays of the setting sun had just caught the mountain, and had turned its usual sombre brown tint into a perfectly marvellous colour.

Fellowes stood rapt gazing on the full beauty of an Italian after-glow. But almost before he was able to take in its loveliness it paled, faded into a delicate hue of greenish-grey, and night came swiftly on.

"I smiled just now as I looked round at my canvases," Fellowes thought, "but if only I could worthily paint a scene like this I should be truly great. But no, it is impossible—I could not represent it—it is too fleeting."

He knitted his brows. He felt an idea for a picture was coming to him, but at present it was dim and hazy.

Lost in thought, he slowly retraced his steps, and went indoors to supper. He went to bed early, but he could not sleep. The indistinct idea of his picture haunted him, though it would not take definite shape. At last he could not stay in bed any longer, and shortly before dawn he got up. He opened the outside shutters of a window and looked out. The pale purplish-blue of the sky was rapidly growing lighter, the air was filled with sweet sounds and perfumes, the cries of the cicalas, the grasshoppers, and the bellfrogs, softened by distance, made delightful melody. Suddenly a cock began to crow, giving warning that day was at hand. The sky grew still more delicate in tint; soon the sun started up gloriously; and gradually, as it rose, the pale blue of the sky darkened, and became deeper and deeper in colour.

"If I could but paint this," thought Fellowes.

All at once the idea with which he had been struggling came more clearly to him. He went on musing.

"Why should I not paint dawn figuratively? To me dawn brings the idea of purity, innocence, and brightness. Why not paint a beautiful child, and call it 'Dawn'? Then afterwards I might paint a companion picture of a man, to convey the idea of darkness, night, and the evil passions fully developed, as suggested by last evening's effect and call it 'Sunset.' I could personify the fleeting beauties of the skies in this manner. But first I must find the models—to begin with, a perfectly beautiful child. I will begin to look about at once—to-day."

He dressed quickly and went out. He walked about the quaint rambling streets of the old hill city, but it was too early for many people to be stirring. After breakfast he went out again, but he could not see any child at all coming up to his ideal. He spent many days in fruitless search. He began to fear that he must give up his idea.

One Sunday he went to the Cathedral. It was a festival, and the fine old church was crowded. Many peasants had come in from the country for the service. But Fellowes did not look about him. He was absorbed.

The service over, he came out with the crowd. Close by him in the doorway, he noticed a peasant woman and her boy of about nine years old.

When they got into the clear light of the piazza he looked more closely at the boy.

The artist with difficulty restrained a cry of delight. He had never in his life seen such a beautiful child.

"He is the very model I have been hunting for," he said to himself.

He went up to the mother and began to talk to her. He asked her if she came from a distance.

"Yes, signor," she answered. "Andrea and I have made a long journey to San Lorenzo to-day, and it is hot and tiring."

As Fellowes looked again at the boy he thought he would be still more beautiful if he were not so tired. At any cost he must secure this boy to sit to him. He went on talking to Andrea's mother; presently he said, "I am an artist, and for some time I have been trying to find a boy of Andrea's age to paint from. Do you think you could spare him for a time? He could sleep in my house and I would take great care of him."

The woman looked troubled. Andrea was her dearest possession on earth. She had recently lost her husband; her boy was all she had left, and he was delicate. But she was poor, and this offer seemed to give her an opportunity of making a little money to help her to keep body and soul together. She hesitated.

"Of course, I would pay him," added Fellowes.

Still the poor woman did not answer; she was struggling between her love and her poverty.

"Come to my house," said Fellowes, "and you will see how well Andrea will be cared for."

The woman assented, and they all three walked on until they came to the tall iron gates. Fellowes pulled one of them open, and went in; Andrea and his mother followed through the little bit of garden, past the beautiful oleanders, and into the spacious house.

The poor woman and her boy were overwhelmed with astonishment at all they saw. Never before had they been in such a handsome house. The mother's last scruples were vanishing fast. She felt that she would be injuring her boy's prospects, if she refused Fellowes' offer.

"Well," said he, "will you agree to let Andrea remain with me? It will only be for a time."

"Yes, yes, signor," the woman said, "let it be so. I am sure you will take good care of him."

"No fear about that," said Fellowes heartily. "I promise he shall be well looked after, and here is something on account of his salary," he said, as he slipped ten liras into the woman's hand.

She thanked him effusively, and invoked all sorts of blessings upon his head. He gave her some refreshment: then, after finding out from her where she lived, he bid her good-bye, telling her that she might come and see Andrea whenever she liked. And the poor woman, after many tears, and much hugging of her child, went away, and left the artist and Andrea alone.

II.

THE picture went on slowly; Fellowes could not at all satisfy himself. The wonderful beauty of the boy's eyes baffled him, and he could not render the perfect look of innocence in the child's face.

Fellowes began to think that to paint this boy successfully would be almost as impossible a task as to reproduce on canvas the fleeting beauties of dawn. But he persevered.

"I will not be beaten," he said; "I am determined to make something of this subject."

It was not long before Andrea's mother came over to see her boy. She found him in good health and spirits, and overjoyed to see her.

"Will the portrait take much longer, signor?" she said to Fellowes. "I don't know what to do without my Andrea."

Fellowes smiled.

"You must not be in such a hurry, my good woman," he said; "I have hardly done anything yet. A good portrait is not painted in an hour or two. But your boy is happy here; he is very good, and he makes a capital model."

Andrea's mother sighed, and returned disconsolately to her poor home.

Fellowes often talked to Andrea, and found him intelligent and amiable. The only thing he did not quite like was that the boy seemed to be a little vain of his good looks. Several times Fellowes came into the studio unexpectedly, and found Andrea studying himself in the looking-glass.

One day Fellowes took the boy to task about this. Andrea said—

"I was only looking, signor, to see if I was tidy enough to sit to you," and Fellowes thought no more about the matter.

After several months of study Fellowes began to have hope of his picture.

"I think it is coming all right now," he said joyfully. But it was nearly a year before he was prepared to let Andrea go home to his mother.

The last time Andrea's mother had come, it struck her that her boy was altered, and she began to fear the effect that taking him back to her poor home might have upon him. She said something about this to Fellowes.

"I will think over it," he said, "and when you come to take Andrea home, I will tell you what I advise you to do."

At last Andrea's mother came to take him home. It was some time since Fellowes had allowed her to see the picture. Now he showed it to her.

"Santissima Maria!" cried the poor woman. "But it is wonderful. The signor is a magician to have made such a marvellous likeness."

The portrait was indeed wonderfully like the boy; and the painter had thrown so much energy into the work that it almost seemed to breathe. It represented Andrea sitting in a chair, with one hand on an arm of the chair, and the other by his side. The head was slightly thrown back, and he looked intently before him. It was truly a beautiful face of perfect innocence and purity: the large dark eyes, encircled by long sweeping lashes, the delicate classical nose, the rich full lips, half parted; the whole surrounded by a mass of light brown hair, which fell down in splendid clusters on to the shoulders. It was like the face of an angel, or some being of a higher sphere.

Presently Fellowes said to Andrea's mother—

"I have been thinking about Andrea's future, and it has occurred to me that if you could part with him, he might make a living by sitting as a model in one of the great art-centres, such as Florence, or Venice. I will write about it to a friend of mine in Florence, and, when I hear from him, I will let you know. Meanwhile, you must make the most of Andrea, for, if he goes to Florence, you may not see him again for a long time."

The poor woman looked miserable, but she knew it was a great thing for her boy to be befriended by Fellowes, and she did not like to raise any objection to the plan. Such a life is not the noblest which a man can follow, and has many temptations connected with it, but she saw only the prospect of a living. She thanked Fellowes most gratefully for all his kindness, and went off with Andrea.

Fellowes sent the picture to Florence to be shown in the studio of one of his friends. Its success was immediate, and people came flocking to see it.

At last, a wealthy Englishman offered a large sum of money for it. Fellowes accepted the offer, and began to think that his fame and fortune were made.

Meanwhile, many painters in Florence were eager to get Andrea to sit to them, and in a short time Fellowes wrote to Andrea's mother to say that he had better go without delay.

In little more than a week the artist took Andrea to Florence, and left him in the charge of a friend.

Fellowes himself determined to make a tour of Europe, for the purpose of further study. Months, then years, slipped away. Fellowes, from time to time, painted a few portraits to replenish his purse; but his great success had been bad for him, and idly he let slip his idea of painting a figurative picture of Sunset, as a companion to his picture of Dawn.

At last, after more than ten years of travel, he resolved to visit once more the old hill city in Umbria. He felt a longing to see the restful old place again; he was tired of constantly moving about.

After travelling rapidly from England he reached Locarno, on the Lago Maggiore, one evening towards the end of summer. The next afternoon he went on by boat. He was thinking intently of the old hill city, and wondering whether he would find many changes.

As he neared Arona the sun sank low on the horizon, and the sky rapidly became suffused with crimson. This deepened in tint each instant until sky, lake, hills, and distant snow-capped mountains, were flooded with the crimson glory, and the whole scene seemed as if it were on fire. Quickly the crimson melted into orange, striped with bars of purple giving a fierce and angry appearance to the sky. Then these glowing colours rapidly faded into dulness, gloom, and night.

Suddenly Fellowes remembered his forgotten idea of painting a picture to typify Evil. This magnificent sunset revived his ambition in full strength, and he deplored the many comparatively idle years that he had spent. He vowed he would at once begin to hunt for a model for "Sunset."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. IX.

Who asked these questions? tell them one by one,
And set initials down when all are done.
They form two words found on Isaiah's page
Re-echoed in the apostolic age,
When Paul the Church calls forth from darkest night—
"Awake!" he cries, "and Christ shall give thee light."

What manner of man was he which came up to meet you?
The child is not; and I, whither shall I go?
Lord, how long?
Who art Thou, Lord?
Wouldest thou be spoken for to the king?
Wherefore then didst thou not obey the voice of the Lord?
Is thy servant a dog?
How is it that thou hast found it so quickly, my son?
How can these things be?
Should we again break Thy commandments?

L. T.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. IV.

Reject eleven of the words in this figure, and so arrange the others as to form a text, showing David's trust in God.

God	For	Cast	Satan
Help	Behold	Wicked	Heaven
Mine	Earth	Pass	Lord
Till	The	Helper	Is

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VII.—p. 160.—DORCAS AND HANNAH.—Acts ix. 36-39; 1 Sam. ii. 18, 19.

D-elila-h . . . Judges xvi. 4, 18-21.
O-she-a . . . Ex. xvii. 9; Num. xiii. 8; xiv. 6.
R-immo-n . . . 2 Kings v. 1, 18.
C-horazi-n . . . Matt. xi. 21.
A-ry-a . . . 1 Kings xvi. 8-10, 13.
S-hilo-h . . . 1 Sam. iii. 1, 21.

ANSWERS TO HIDDEN TEXTS.

NO. II.—p. 160.

Preserve me, O God: for in Thee do I put my trust.—Psa. xvi. 1.

NO. III.—p. 176.

Seek ye first the kingdom of God.—Matt. vi. 33.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

A SAIL THROUGH THE INLAND SEA OF JAPAN.

BY MRS. MURRAY MITCHELL.

II.—NAGASAKI.

BUDDHIST TEMPLE AT NAGASAKI.

AFTER we had rounded the picturesque little island of Pappenberg, steamed through a deep narrow creek, and entered a natural portal among the rocks, we found to our surprise that we had arrived in a noble harbour full of stately ships, with a grand environment of hills, and the city spread out on the slopes before us.

Nagasaki, which has played so interesting and important a part in the later history of Japan, is situated on the large island of Kiu-Siu, and has one of the finest harbours in Japan. Before the visit of the United States Expedition, little more than thirty years ago, during the dark period as we may call it, between the great persecution and the signing of the famous treaty, Nagasaki was the only port in the empire which was open to European vessels, and these were rigidly restricted to those bearing the Dutch flag. It was only here that a Japanese was permitted to buy or sell, or have any commercial dealings with foreigners,—unless we except the Chinese, and with them only to a very limited extent. What a contrast now! The harbour, though not very wide, extends a long way inland, is very deep, and affords an abundance of safe anchorage. It was filled with an amazing number of foreign ships, those of Russia greatly preponderating, and also with picturesque junks, sampans, and native craft to any extent. We cast anchor in the midst of these, and but for the presence of the ships and the stir they caused, might have fancied ourselves far enough from great ocean-ways and the busy tracks of commerce, so exquisite was the peace and beauty of the scene around us.

It was a perfect evening, glowing with rich light and colour, and yet so still that there was not the faintest ripple on the water; and the pennons hung drooping and straight from the mast-heads. The water was of a deep violet tint, but so clear and calm that the reflections were wonderfully perfect. The graceful spars and masts, catching the golden rays of the sinking sun, shone double "mast and shadow." The encircling hills rose all around, sending their brown and green shadows also far into the clear depths. Close along the shore on one hand stretched the handsome houses, Consulates, Banks and offices of "the Concession," or building-ground allotted to the foreign community. A little higher, to the left, lay the native city, a compact mass of low grey roofs, while away up on the slopes, among the maples and evergreens, bungalows and churches and temples stood at every elevation. There was one temple nobly placed on a lovely plateau surrounded with wood. The usual strangely-shaped ponderous roof gave a massive look to the structure, which was approached by a handsome flight of stone steps, at the top of which was the torei, or sacred gateway, also of stone, leading to the shrine. The Japanese plant their sacred places "on every high hill and under every green tree." If there is a spot prettier than another, there they rear their temples, always on a slope or hill, and generally surrounded with lovely wood. Now the gilding and abundant colour on the roof caught the slanting sun-rays, and gleamed with gorgeous brilliance, adding to the striking beauty of the scene. Further up still, fine summits reared their noble heads, a glorious background. Some of the nearer high-lands were broken into fissures and ravines and filled with the abounding foliage; while others were cultivated into little terraced fields.

As we were kindly rowed to the shore by two gentlemen of the place, fellow-passengers from Kôbe, I eagerly asked where Deshima lay, the famous small island where, in their devotion to trade, the poor Dutch merchants had lived their melancholy lives in the dark days, as I have called them, not so very long gone by. Deshima came next in interest with me, I think, to Pappenberg. They pointed it out—a tiny, half artificial island lying close down by the harbour, happily now having a new interest wholly apart from its sordid traditions.

In the days of its seclusion and isolation from other nations, Japan, as I have said, permitted a sort of restricted commerce with Holland. The Dutch had somehow managed to retain a sort of footing in the empire, when the Portuguese, root and branch, were driven from the islands. They had not much to boast of, however, for the merchants were confined to this little island, which is about 600 feet in length and 250 in breadth. Here the "factory" and dwelling-places of the prisoners stood—for prisoners in every sense of the word they were. A quaint old stone bridge spans the hand-breadth of water which divides it from the town. This bridge, during the Dutch occupation, was closed by a gate and flanked by a guard-house filled with soldiers, while the entire small holding was surrounded by a fence topped by iron spikes. Insult was added to injury in every possible way. For instance, the unhappy men were obliged to pay the soldiers and policemen, and the numerous spies employed to watch their every movement. If they wanted to go out for a walk in town or country, which they were only permitted to do once or twice in the year, they had to ask permission of the Government twenty-four hours before; they were attended by a guard, and any number of spies, and had to be safe back within the iron-spiky environment before dark. All the employés of the factory had to report themselves at the guard-house every night. The head man of the factory had to go on a yearly deputation to Yeddo to offer homage to the Emperor, or rather Shogun, to make him handsome presents —in other words, to pay tribute. Then, worse than this, no word from home was allowed to reach them, save once in the whole year. No message of comfort or cheer, no breath from the Fatherland, no cup of cold water, however consuming the heart-thirst might be—nothing but this once-a-year ship! How they must have strained their eyes to look toward the far horizon for the longed-for sail! Only this one might enter the Nagasaki bay, once in the slow, long, revolving twelve months; and it would not have been allowed to come, but that the Japanese wanted the rich cargo of silks and furs and other goodly merchandise which it brought.

But worse still than all this, these men had a yet higher price to pay for their toleration and their gains. They had to renounce their religion. They dared not avow themselves Christian, nor perform any act whatever of Christian worship. An iron cross lay imbedded in the road across the bridge, this being an ingenious way of obliging the Christians to offer indignity to their own sacred symbol. As the bridge was the only connecting link between the island and the shore, all who went and came had to pass over it, thus, as it were, treading it under foot.

Such was the bitter hatred of the Japanese to the religion and very name of Christ, and so strong was their determination to stamp the very remembrance of the "vile Jesus doctrine" from their land. The wonderful thing was that the gallant Hollanders submitted so meekly and so long to these indignities, and a hundred more; but then, Japanese gold filled the scale on the other side, and, I suppose, outweighed all else. So the Government held to its hatred and dread of all foreigners, and their religion, and carried out its policy of isolation. Japan would have nothing to do with the outside world, except in so far as it was represented by the little colony at Deshima. It is curious to see the laws and regulations within which she fenced herself. If an unfortunate junk brought any foreigner to her shores, not only was the bold stranger seized at once and killed, but the whole crew were put to death! No Japanese might quit his country on any pretext; but if he did, and ventured to return, then he too was put to death. These are specimens of the thorough-going laws which were thought needful to protect the empire from being swallowed up by other powers,—to save her from any conquering force who had never been conquered in all her history. And the laws promulgated against any who dared to profess "the accursed religion" (namely, Christianity) were quite as stringent. All through the country edicts were posted up along every thoroughfare, proclaiming death to any follower or preacher of Christ.

Strange to tell, this state of things lasted for nearly two centuries and a half. But then the time of her emancipation came, and Japan was shaken from her exclusiveness and terror. The more enlightened of the people began to get tired, I suppose, of being so entirely left out in the commerce of nations. Some, no doubt, had longings after more knowledge—more light; for even poor Deshima, with its small European community and its yearly ship, was of some use as a connecting-link with a living, progressing, outer world. At all events, the long sleep was ended, the night was over, the dawn was near. The Empire was prepared for its awaking, and it did awake with a great start of surprise, I dare say, when the United States squadron, under Commodore Perry, suddenly appeared on the coast, and boldly steered into the bay of Yeddo. This grand event, so fraught with important results to Japan, occurred in 1853. There was a tremendous commotion, of course, but enlightened councils in the government prevailed. The following year the famous treaty was signed, and Japan, through five of her ports, was opened to commerce with the rest of the world. This was the beginning of the new day in this interesting land—the first of a series of great moral earthquakes which shook the nation to its foundations, "overturning, overturning, overturning," until old things have passed away, and all things are becoming new.

JAPANESE BRONZE STATUE OF BUDDHA.

I am glad to say Deshima has shared in the beneficent and sweeping reforms which have taken place. In place of the factory and huts and guard-house and fence and the imprisoned merchants, we found a pretty little mission-church and schools and mission-house, with peace, quiet, toleration, liberty, and light. The day is indeed breaking; the shadows of night have fled away.

As we rowed to the shore we had noticed one or two church steeples rising on the slopes amid the lovely foliage. One of these we were told belonged to a mission-church of the Church Missionary Society. To it we directed our steps, being armed with notes of introduction to the missionaries from our friend the Rev. Mr. Evington, of Ôsaka. We slowly climbed the ascent, arrested every moment by the exquisite and ever-changing beauty of the scene. The sun was now near his setting, filling the western sky with radiance, and sending gleams of vivid light across to the higher summits on the other side. These were flooded with glory, the serried rocks and the forest-topped heights alike flaming with the rich carmine, all the while that the lower slopes and the calm lake-like water below were in deepest, stillest shadow, and wearing an aspect of sublime peace—a kind of heavenly repose which well fitted the evening of the day of rest.

We easily found the mission-house, which was close to the church. Mr. Maundrell, the missionary, was absent on duty, his wife was ill in bed; but before we had time for regrets a lady rushed into the room with extended hands, saying, "Can it be? Are you really my old friends?"

We were indeed old friends, and had met the last time years and years ago in dear old Poona. It was strange now thus unexpectedly to meet in Japan. This was Mrs. Goodall, wife of a chaplain in India, who had died there. But her missionary spirit did not die. Hearing of the spiritual need of Japan, and an opening occurring in connection with the mission of the Church of England at Nagasaki, she came out at her own cost, and for five years now had worked in connection with the mission. She first mastered the Japanese language, and has now a boarding-school for girls, classes for women and also for lads, and receives no salary, nor remuneration of any sort except the pleasure and blessing she feels she has in connection with her Christ-like, self-denying work.

She at once took possession of us, and carried us down to Deshima, to be introduced to Mr. and Mrs. Andrews, also missionaries of the Church Missionary Society. We were just in time for evening service in the pretty little church, which was well filled by a respectable native Christian audience. Mr. Andrews read prayers, a Japanese pastor preached, Mrs. Goodall played the harmonium, and with her school-girls conducted the singing. One of the hymns sung was, "Jesu wasi wo aisu" ("Jesus loves me"—a very favourite hymn in Japan), and "Wari taru, iwa ya" ("Rock of ages, cleft for me").

The whole service was of course in Japanese, one word of which we could not understand; but we had ample food for observation and thought. How curiously altered, for example, were the conditions in this little island, and within so short a period! And little Deshima was a type only of the entire Empire. What had God already wrought! and ought not faith to be equal to large expectations for the time that was to come?

After the service we had an interesting talk with the pastor and some students who knew English. We then had tea with our friends, united in family prayer, and after a delightful and refreshing evening returned to the ship to sleep.

At nine o'clock next morning, just as we had finished breakfast, Mr. Andrews kindly came off for us. We hailed one of the numerous sampans about, and were soon on shore, crossed the quaint old stone bridge, and were again among the missionary colony who have wondrously and worthily supplanted the poor old Dutchmen. Mrs. Goodall joined us here, and took us to her house, and to see her schools, and boys' class. I was greatly pleased with her boarding-school girls, who were exceedingly intelligent, bright in manner, and even graceful. They talked to us quite readily in English, which they can also read, and were not in the least shy. They all shook hands with us, and bowed in the lowest, politest way. They seemed greatly to enjoy the questions my husband put to them, answering very readily. Some of them played a little, both on the harmonium and piano, and sang more sweetly than any we had yet heard, for the Japanese often have harsh, discordant voices. We also visited the pastor Kô San, and his pleasing wife O Suza San, the "O" and the "San" both being titles, and as universally used as our titles Mr. and Mrs. The school-girls were by no means of the class of charity-school girls. They all belonged to respectable parents, who desired that their daughters should receive a good education and training from this Christian lady. Some of them had already confessed Christ and been baptized.

After we had spent some time in the schools and among the nice gentle people associated with the missionaries in their work, Mrs. Goodall took us a charming jinricsha-ride through the quaint, curious old city. After this we wandered through lovely groves of maple, and cypress, and camphor-wood, and visited the handsome temple we had observed the evening before as we came up the hill. It is most picturesquely situated, and commands superb views of the harbour and shipping and town lying below, with the grand surrounding of mountains behind.

This temple has no images, as it belongs to the Shinto sect. The two recognised religions of Japan are Shintoism and Buddhism; but the former is much the most ancient, Buddhism having only come in about the sixth century after Christ. Both these faiths are decaying fast, even among the common people.

The Buddhist temples often have the most grotesque and hideous images inside and out, though the Buddha himself is always represented sitting cross-legged with folded arms, in an attitude of repose, his countenance wearing an expression of calm, gentle benevolence and peace. Here, however, in this Shinto shrine, were no idols, but plenty of beautiful decoration, and the usual mirror, gong, and flowers. The carving and lacquer were specially good, with much gilding and colour, the latter usually being a dull red. We next visited a tea-house, most strikingly perched upon a small plateau, with the usual comical little fairy-like garden behind. These miniature gardens are very pretty, each being a multum in parvo of rockeries, rustic bridge, lakelet, evergreens, flowers, and fountain, and all within a very handbreadth of space, generally in a hollow. Here we saw a dwarf maple-tree in the tiniest pot, covered with leaf in all the rich colouring of autumn, and a row of some half-dozen magnificent chrysanthemums, each plant having only one flower.

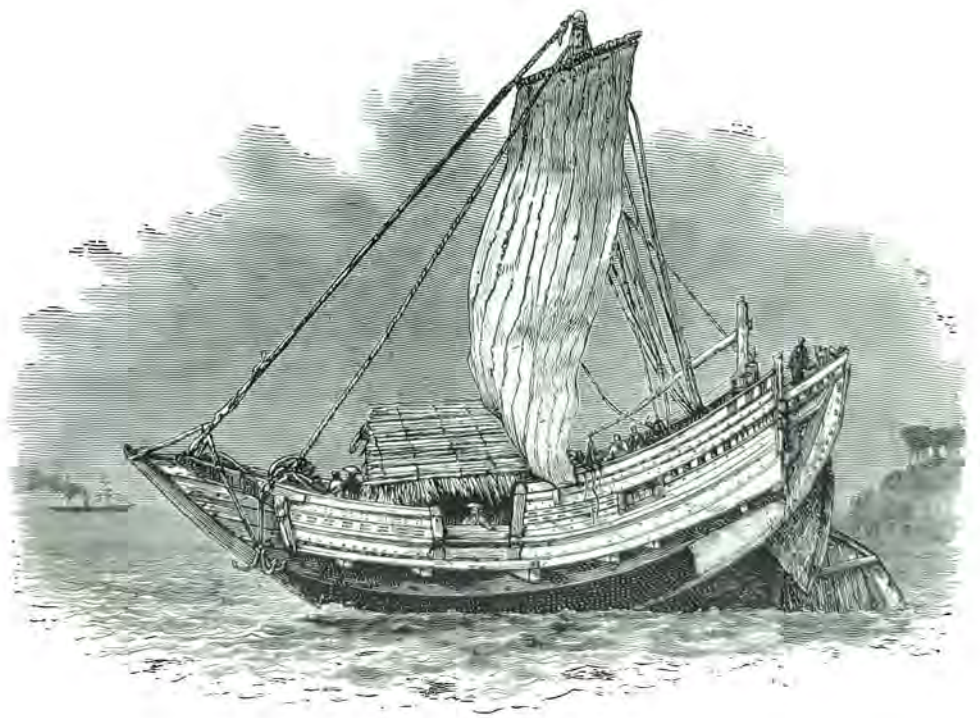
Finally, while Mr Andrews took my husband to see the mission college, which had been founded three years before, Mrs. Goodall and I paid a most charming visit to the curio-shops. The drawback was that as we sat pursuing our investigations on the little raised lacquer platform under the eaves of the low projecting roof, we were terribly stared at and mobbed. The people were polite enough; but they crowded round, determined to see the white-faced strangers, until at last the kind shopkeeper took us within to a kind of inner den.

This proved a most fortunate chance for us, as here we found hid away the most beautiful real old bronzes, and old lacquer with Daimios' crests, and porcelain, china, and all manner of quaint and queer things. It was the most fascinating collection I had seen. The man seemed greatly pleased with our enthusiasm, and took a great deal of trouble to satisfy our curiosity, which was very good of him, as we made no pretence of buying. A tour like this is to some people, of necessity, an education in self-denial. When we have seen good things and real (which are expensive), the common and the cheap have certainly no charm.

Our day at Nagasaki was one not to be forgotten. We lunched with our friends, called on the Consul, and on the American missionaries; and at half-past four were once more on board. Among many kind adieus we slowly got under weigh, passed round the little Pappenberg rock, and were en route for Shanghai.

We must, however, linger a little over Pappenberg, and hear the touching tale it has to tell.



A JAPANESE JUNK.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXIX.—NEW EXPERIENCES.

ROY'S experiences during the next two or three days were so exceedingly novel as to be a source of continual surprise to him; but the dreariness of the state of things thus revealed was almost unheeded for a brief while in the perpetual sense of astonishment, not entirely unmixed with dismay, that was constantly present with him.

Personally he felt that he had no reasonable complaint to make; he was treated to a good deal of consideration. He was often really embarrassed and distressed at meal-times to find himself expected to consume delicacies (at least, they might be called so by courtesy in that house), which had been made expressly for him, and of which nobody but he partook; and he had at length to petition seriously that he might share and share alike with the rest of the family, and forthwith took his oatmeal porridge at breakfast and thick bread-and-butter at tea, with all the gusto he could command, wondering what Frank Lee or Marcus would think if they could but see him, yet half enjoying the change and the new experiences.

But there were other things that he did not by any means enjoy: the angry words exchanged between the children, the quarrels, recriminations and chronic warfare, which his presence soon failed to hold in check; the cold indifference displayed towards them by their parents, and the want of anything like that atmosphere of loving sympathy that he had always been used unconsciously to breathe. Another and stranger thing too was the entire absence (as it seemed to him) of any kind of religion in that house. There was no family prayer of any kind, no reading or study of the Bible, so far as he could see, by any member of the household, and he gathered that even church-going was altogether an uncertain thing, and depended more upon mood and convenience than anything else. Mildred casually remarked once that "Papa and the boys never went—sometimes mamma did, but not very often. Aunt Joan went oftenest; but she (Mildred) didn't see any fun in it. She generally stayed at home."

Another element of discomfort in Roy's mind arose from a conversation he had held with Mrs. Edington. He had chanced to say in her hearing that he must write to Marcus soon and tell him where he was. Roy was at no time a very good correspondent, and of late he had not known exactly where to address letters to his brother, whose movements had been somewhat uncertain.

"Perhaps he may not be best pleased to find out where you are," Mrs. Edington had said, and Roy had looked at her in surprise.

"Why should he mind? He suggested himself, that as he couldn't get back to take me, I might like to go somewhere on my own account and get a change. You are my relations—he could not mind my coming to you."

"That is the point. It seems to me that he has been careful to keep you as far as possible out of the reach of your relations. My husband did not meet a very cordial reception at his hands."

Roy coloured painfully.

"He didn't mean anything."

"Well, I hope not; but we have not been quite pleased at the way you have been alienated from us, Roy. We understood it in your mother's time—there had been a little coolness, a little estrangement, which is all past and forgotten now; but I do not understand Mr. Stratford's determination to keep you so entirely in his own hands and in his own power. There is an odd look about it all that we have not quite approved."

"Perhaps he did not know about you," began the boy, but he was stopped at once.

"He did know, begging your pardon; my husband elicited that much; but he showed a great determination to keep all your affairs a perfect secret. Seeing that my husband is your nearest kinsman, whilst Mr. Stratford is no real relation at all, it seemed odd and uncalled for, and I confess we did not quite like it."

"Why not?" asked Roy, in an odd muffled voice.

"Well, I do not wish to say anything that sounds unreasonable or far-fetched. Of course, everything may be perfectly right; but the impression my husband got was that you were being kept altogether too much in subjection—too dependent upon your step-brother; and that your own relations, who are your natural champions and protectors, were being held purposely at a distance. Most men have some motive for their conduct, and we feel very doubtful of Mr. Stratford's. Is he acting for your benefit or from motives of self-interest?"

Roy made no reply; but the words rankled nevertheless. He could not entirely forget or ignore them; his letter to Marcus was not written that day, nor for several days, and when it did go it was unusually brief, containing little more information than the fact that he was staying with his cousins, the Edingtons, who were exceedingly kind to him, and that he was enjoying himself very much. This was something of a stretch of the truth, for Roy's enjoyment was of a rather fitful and doubtful kind; but, at least, in his present mood he felt no disposition to return to the Hermitage; the visit to Brighton seemed in some odd way to have been entirely abandoned, and the only alternative course was to remain where he was.

The first Sunday seemed to pass most strangely to Roy. It was a gusty day, with heavy rain showers at intervals, but by no means so bad a day as to prohibit church-going, had any one been disposed to go. But nobody seemed to entertain the idea for a moment, and Roy was too lame to attempt the walk himself. Mr. Edington sat down to his newspaper and his accounts, his wife busied herself about a variety of domestic duties, not generally admitted into the routine of Sunday employment; whilst the boys romped about and quarrelled, and the girls dawdled and teased one another, as if there was nothing to be done or thought of but to get through the long hours with as little ennui as possible.

"Sunday is always so dull!" grumbled Mildred. "I don't quite know why, but it is. Cousin Roy, will you read some more of that book to us? That would be jolly!"

Roy had been amusing himself and his cousins on dull evenings sometimes by reading aloud one of Dickens's novels to them. It was different from any story they had ever come across, and with Roy's explanations and judicious skips it was very much to their liking. If he would beguile the dulness of Sunday by more reading, it would be a capital way of passing the time. They did not notice his slight hesitation and glance towards their mother. They hurried him upstairs to the school-room, and Mildred prepared to dash off to fetch the book.

"No, let me go," said Roy; "I think I shall read another to-day."

"Oh, finish the one we've begun first! It is such fun! I want to know more about Captain Cuttle."

"And little Paul," added Nellie. "I like him best—and Florence."

But when Roy joined them in the school-room they saw that he had not brought the book they had asked for, but another that "didn't look half as interesting" Mildred thought.

It was an old copy of "Pilgrim's Progress" that had accidentally got into Roy's portmanteau with the few books he had selected to take away with him. He was glad enough now of the chance that had brought it there, for although his ideas upon religious exercises were somewhat vague and unformed, there was a great deal of reverence and devotional feeling in his nature. He had been brought up to keep the Sabbath day "holy" as far as he was able to do so, and it went greatly against the grain of his nature to see it observed (or rather ignored) in so careless and godless a fashion. He could not have brought himself to read Dickens to his little cousins on Sunday, but he was glad enough to read them the immortal story of the pilgrim, and they listened with great attention, for any new story-book was a treat to them, although he doubted very much whether they heeded anything beyond the simple narrative part of the story. He did not attempt any explanation of the parable. He was but a lad himself, and it would have been a difficult task to open up such a subject; then too he began to be doubtful if his cousins were acquainted with even the rudiments of teaching that had been familiar to him from childhood.

That evening however, the sunny beauty of which had tempted Roger and Caroline Edington out to take a walk, whilst Mildred had suddenly decided to go to church with her aunt Joan, was to bring Roy face to face with one or two questions that he had never heard put quite so pointedly before. He was sitting alone in one of the big, deserted rooms, turning over in his mind the odd turn taken by affairs, when he was aware of soft, timid footfalls behind him, and little Nellie appeared with an open book in her hand.

"Cousin Roy," she said, "I wanted to find you when you were quite alone because Mildred would laugh and the boys would tease and take my book away. Do tell me if it's true what it says here? I've wanted to ask you ever so long. Is there another country somewhere else? and can people get to it anyway?"

He looked down at the open page, and saw that it was a little battered Testament the child held, open at some place in the Revelation.

"Everything in that book is true, Nellie; you may be quite sure of that."

Her face became illuminated.

"Oh, I'm so glad. Milly said it was only a grown-up people's sort of fairy tale. Are you sure, Roy—quite, quite sure?"

Was Roy quite sure? In theory, perhaps, he had never experienced any real doubt; but had his life been as practical a testimony to the truth as it should have been if he was as sure as that simple child wished him to be? His face glowed for a moment, partly at his own thought, partly at the novelty of the position; it was so strange to be looked up to as an oracle of truth, especially on themes like these; but he thought of Muriel, and the answer she would make to such a question, and he did not keep Nellie waiting long.

"Yes, I am quite sure; it is all true."

"All about the golden city, and the gates of pearl, and the harps, and crowns, and everything? Oh, Roy, how I should like to see it! How do people get there?"

Roy's face still burned, but he had to find an answer for his earnest little questioner.

"Why, by being good, Nellie," he said, though not quite satisfied that that was the right reply.

The child sighed, and looked somewhat damped.

"I should think one would have to be very good indeed to get in there. I don't think any of us will; we are always being naughty. You will, Roy, I should think; you are quite different from us."

Roy felt a little desperate.

"No, Nellie, it isn't quite like that; only I don't know how to explain it properly. People don't get in for being good; they get in because God takes them in, and He takes everybody in who will love Him and take Him at His word. You had better read the first part of your book—about Jesus, and what He did and said when He lived here long ago. It was His doing that we can ever get in there. You'll understand it better when you've read all that. Only, you know, people have to die first before they can go to Him there. You know that, I suppose?"

"I don't think I know anything," answered Nellie humbly, looking half perplexed, half mystified. "But I shouldn't think anybody would mind dying if they could get into a place like that, not if they'd only lived before in a place like Windmill House."

CHAPTER XXX.—MAKING FRIENDS.

After the experience of a week or ten days spent at Windmill House, Roy began to get a more definite idea respecting its different inhabitants than had been possible just at first.

He was forced to come to the conclusion that whatever Roger might be abroad, he was an unpleasant man in the bosom of his family; and it puzzled the boy sometimes to guess why he had troubled to make the effort to ingratiate himself with him, and to make so great a point of bringing him as a guest to his house. True, his children seemed greatly pleased with their cousin's visit, and in their odd, rough way made a regular hero of Roy; but Roger hardly seemed the kind of father to put himself about to gratify his children, and, for his own part, he behaved with scant courtesy to his young kinsman. His wife was more complaisant, and seemed wishful to secure his comfort and good-will; but Roy was unable to take to her. She did not seem to him to ring true, and she often embarrassed him greatly by allusions to their poverty, and by bringing into prominent notice little bits of needful domestic economy that would have been more gracefully passed over in silence.

Roy was really distressed by little evidences of the straitened circumstances of this family that were constantly coming before his eyes, and he would have given much to have made over then and there to his hosts the well-stocked pocket-book that was to have furnished funds for his expenses to Brighton. He was almost glad now that the proposed trip had been abandoned, for he hoped he might find a way of benefiting his cousin's household without offending their pride or their delicacy, and of leaving some substantial good behind him when he left. He sometimes thought that if he could only get the chance, he would try to open the subject with his cousin Joan. Little as he had so far seen of her, she attracted him more than any one in the house, and in a very quiet, unostentatious way she showed him more consideration than all the rest put together.

For Roy was in reality barely fit for the sort of life he was leading. Had he been in his usual health, a plainer, coarser diet, and an absence of the luxuries with which he had always been surrounded would have done him no harm, might, indeed, have been rather good for him than otherwise; but just now, when not entirely recovered from a rather severe illness, he was not in a condition to stand experiments like these with impunity, and his foot also suffered, and grew worse rather than better, owing to the amount of walking and standing that seemed unavoidable in this house. It was Joan, however, who appeared to notice this, and laid an embargo on the walks that the children were always proposing to him; it was she who noted if his appetite (capricious since his illness) was unable to manage the rather coarsely-cooked viands that appeared at Mrs. Edington's table, and she would herself prepare him some little trifle more suited to his taste, and bring it quietly to him, or send it by little Nellie, without letting it be generally known that such attention was necessary.

If a little embarrassed by her acts of considerate thoughtfulness, Roy was very grateful, and at last his chance came for speaking to her with more of confidence and unreserve than had been possible before.

One night he had gone to bed rather early, feeling unusually tired, and with an incipent cold hanging about him which had given warning of its approach by sundry fits of coughing and shivering; but he had not heeded it much himself, and he was proportionately surprised when, after he had been a short time in bed, the door opened to admit Joan, who came in with a steaming basin in her hands.

"I think you want something hot in bed, Roy," she explained quietly, "to take your cold away. If you will drink this, and stay in bed to breakfast to-morrow, I dare say you will be all right again."

Roy laughed as he sat up and thanked her, but he was grateful for her thoughtful kindness, and as she seemed disposed, after accomplishing her errand, to go away again, he interposed quickly, and said—

"Do sit down, cousin Joan, and have a chat. I hardly ever see you by yourself, and I often want to talk to you. Can't you stop and have one now?"

Joan sat down in the armchair. She was in no haste to go. She had felt much drawn towards Roy since he had become an inmate of the house, but she was so unused to expressing her feelings in words that her good will had only been evinced by little acts of consideration.

"Cousin Joan," he began rather abruptly, "do you never have any regular pleasure or amusement here? Do you never go away and enjoy yourselves, and get a rest and a change?"

An odd sort of smile crossed Joan's face.

"Well, no, Roy, that sort of thing is not much in our line."

"But, why not? Is it—is it——"

"Want of money? I suppose perhaps it is; but I know very little about our affairs."

"Because, you know," said Roy eagerly, "that I have enough with me here to take us all away for a week's holiday to some place; I dare say, if we were economical, it would keep us longer. I can't bear to hear Mildred and Nellie asking about 'other places,' and showing that they know nothing of the world beyond the immediate limits of home; and one can see that they have never known any real enjoyment—or what we should call enjoyment—all their lives. It makes me so sorry, Joan. If I were to give Mrs. Edington the money that was given to me for Brighton—I know Marcus would not mind—and ask her to take us all there for a little

CONVALESCENT.

"SEE the wretch, that long has tossed,
On the thorny bed of pain,
At length repair his vigour lost,
And breathe, and walk again.

The meanest floweret of the vale,
The simplest note that swells the gale,—
The common sun, the air, the skies,—
To him are opening Paradise."

—Gray.

while, and let the children have a real good time, do you think she would?"

"No, Roy, I don't; I'm quite sure she wouldn't."

"But why not?"

"She would think it a waste. She would never spend it like that; and Roger wouldn't allow it either. They would think it dreadful."

Roy looked sorry and perplexed.

"But I can't offer it to them in any other way, can I? I thought that might be a nice way of doing it. I should like to do something for them all, but I can't offer them money."

An odd look passed across Joan's face, but she could not explain to Roy that he need have no diffidence on that point, that there would be no real difficulty in the disposition of that fund.

"What can I do?" he asked.

"Wait and see. You will understand better by-and-by."

"What shall I understand?"

"A great many things, I dare say," was the rather vague answer. "Roy, how long are you going to stay here?"

He laughed a little, colouring up slightly.

"I don't know, Cousin Joan. I should like to talk to you about that. I want to do what is most agreeable. I'm in no hurry to go home, and Marcus is not back yet." A vague shadow fell over the boy's face, for the thought of his brother brought with it a certain amount of painful doubt. "But I don't quite like to be a burden on my cousin, and I am not certain that he wishes me to stay, though the children do, I am sure."

"I believe we all want you to stay," answered Joan, with more warmth than before; "but I begin to doubt if you ought to do so. I don't think our life agrees with you."

"Oh, yes, it does," was the quick reply. "Don't think me quite a milksop, Cousin Joan. I can put up with what other people do, and be none the worse. If I may stay on, I think I would rather. I like the girls very much, and I don't care quite so much about going home as you would think. There are things there that bother me rather; here I forget them."

Joan made no reply. She was of opinion that he would pretty soon find things to bother him here, but as she knew it was intended that he should remain at least for a time, she was glad that he could be content to do so. She only wondered how things would look to him when he knew his true position, his true relationship to them all.

His next question, however, startled her a little.

"Joan, when may I go and see my great-uncle? I should so like to."

She shook her head; her face was quite inscrutable.

"Not yet, Roy. He is an old man, and peculiar. He hardly sees anybody but me. None of the children are allowed in the study, and even Roger and Caroline do not go there often."

"I should like to see him, though. Let me know if ever I may. Did he know my mother too?"

"Oh, yes, long ago. We all knew her."

"When was that? You were not living here then, were you?"

"Oh, no; in London. I never saw her after we came here."

"And what made you come here? Isn't it a very odd, out-of-the-way place?"

"Yes; but it belongs to father, and Roger got an opening in Thorne. We had lost all our money; we had to do what we could."

"Then you were not always poor?"

"No, not always."

Roy looked sympathetic and interested, but Joan's manner was peculiar, and did not invite further questioning.

"I wish I could do something for them all," was Roy's thought, as he composed himself to sleep that night. Perhaps he had never felt so much as he did at this moment the loss of the fortune that he had naturally expected would come to him.

THE LESSON OF THE SPRING FLOWERS.

ONE must have experienced hunger and thirst before one can rightly appreciate the true delights of gratifying the appetite; one must have known loneliness of heart before one learns to crave for love; one must fight through sickness to death before the exquisite joy of returning health can be tasted.

Sorrow must endure through the night, before joy cometh with the morning; winter be bleak and bare and bitter, before we can revel in the tender beauties of spring.

Weeks and weeks had she spent on a sick bed, haunted by feverish dreams, feverish longings, feverish cravings for the wide open sea; the country common, bedecked with clumps of gorse; the woods and fields, which were as impossible to reach as heaven itself, when the bed on which she lay was in a back-room of a town house, in a small street.

The deadly weariness of the walls and curtains, whence grotesque faces peer forth from the patterns and folds; the deadly weariness of the long winter nights, when the fire was packed, only emitting a dull glow; and the night-light flickered, burning low for so many hours. She did not know whether to be more disgusted and sickened with the dreary, foggy, dismal day of sleet and rain, of tempest and snow; or with the sun streaming in to put out the fire, to make the room look dusty and faded and shabby; to make the atmosphere close and hot and stuffy; to create longings, impossible to gratify, for dewy grass, for the scent of a sweet-briar hedge after rain; for the chequered sunshine and shade of a forest dell, where the bluebells carpet the ground, and the wood anemone hangs its fragile purple-streaked head.

"She is better," said the doctor. "You may get her into the country as soon as you can."

Welcome hearing, though the attainable country be but a quiet homely place among very simple people.

But to leave behind her the incessant noise, the rattle of the streets, the dismal cries of "Want grit," and "Do ye want chea-e-eps?"—the dust, the dirt, the soot-laden air, the dull shadows cast by the houses opposite. To open her eyes upon a wide sweep of sunlit azure, softened by hazy distances, flecked by snowy streaks of cloud. To hear the lark singing madly overhead; the throstle whistling a mellow note from the laurel bush; the ploughman calling in the far-off meadow to the horses that guide the plough in turning the glistening furrow.

A robin sat upon a bare branch of a tree outside the window, singing his short sweet note to his mate who had her nest in the holly-bush below; and, oh! how the sunshine caught and was reflected from the leaves of that holly-bush, from the rhododendrons and the ivy upon the wall!

She hastened to go out, though yet able but to creep up and down the gravelled path. But to see nearer the almond-tree, with its roseate branches; the tiny crimson tassels hanging beneath each baby leaf on the ribes; the lilac bushes pushing out their green buds; the hawthorns besprinkled with tiny emerald dots; the peonies coming up, red among the tender hue of springing bulbs; the ferns pushing out thick coils of silvery, mossy balls from the centre of dark-hued fronds, battered and browned by winter's storms.

How resplendent the crocuses must have been a week since! Their clumps were gay with gorgeousness of colour even yet; and how busy the little brown bees about them! Listen to their humming, as they hover over honey-filled cup after cup!

Ah! the primroses! Why does one love the primrose so dearly? Wide-spread, pale-hued stars among their richly-crumpled leaves, looking up from out of the neglected corner where the rotting autumn foliage of last year still lay thickly. The polyanthus is fair and handsome, its colours varied and gay, but it can never rival its simpler cousin, the primrose, in our hearts.

Here was a border of white double daisies, such quaint, little, fat, cushion-like balls; how prettily they edged the thickly-clustered, blue-starch hyacinth, prim and dainty! Beneath the window was Pyrus japonica, hardly open yet, but covered with gay knots of scarlet bud that would soon replace the yellow leafless jessamine that had already shed its best flowers.

Each day something fresh was to be seen here; but her strength increased, and she could wander further.

Across the running stream, dancing in the sun, and clear to its pebbly bottom here; cool and dim with brown shadows there, where the flat stone crossed it like a bridge, and where the bush of gorse hung over it, bedecked with an early spray or two of blossom, emitting slight but rare fragrance; over a rustic style beside the five-barred gate, and into a daisy-strewn meadow. In the ditch beneath the hedge was marsh-mallow, putting out its thick round leaves, yet beneath the water, and forget-me-not springing from the mud, which it would soon bespread with beauty. Dandelions flaunted upon the bank above, and downy catkins covered the willows over.

Now the ditch widened and led into a great horse-pond in a corner of the field, where she emerged into the lane again, over a plank with a hand-rail. Ducks revelled in this place, standing on the brink, preening their feathers, or turning upside down in the water from exquisite enjoyment of the splash, and wobbling foolish tails alone out of it in ecstacy.

A huge frog, sprawling with leg and arm, lay on the edges; and, startled by her approach, made a sudden spring, and swam across to a safe harbourage beneath the roots of the willow-tree that stretched its boughs above the spot.

But what brilliance was it which lay beyond? An orchard, with gnarled branches still bare, spreading, hoary with age, above gooseberry bushes, dropped all over with tender green tufts like jewels. Beneath were daffodils; bunches of them, clusters of them, patches of them, dancing gaily in the light breeze, down to the very water's edge. How gay, how golden, how happy they seemed, how fresh, how careless, how ignorant of sorrow, of pain.

She breathed an envious sigh; and, crossing the little bridge, round the orchard hedge, came to a low long whitewashed cottage, with thatched roof, and a long border of spring flowers on either hand of the flagged path, to the half-hatched door. Tufts of primroses, pale and pink; double ones too, lilac and crimson; gold-laced polyanthuses, orange-spotted cowslips, and wallflowers, dark blood-red wallflowers, dashed with yellow, and, oh! so sweet!

Bright milk-pans were ranged in a row upon a bench by the door; and, against the lintel, leaned a lovely two years' old child, in a pink pinafore, and cotton bonnet hanging down its little back, only caught by its strings round its chubby neck, and serving as a plaything for the kitten held tightly in the round fat arms, but stretching soft paws over the baby shoulders to sport with its toy.

We almost pity those to whom such sights are matters of so common and every-day occurrence that they have ceased to yield the keen pleasure, the memorable delight which she took in each one separately, after her famine from nature's food.

But, had there not been that famine, could there have been the same satisfaction in fulness?

Had there been no craving, would there have been the keen relish? Had there been no pain, could there have been half the pleasure? Had there been no winter, could she have had the joyousness of spring? Were there no cross, should we ever wear the crown?

MARGUERITE LEROY.

A LEAF FROM THE JOURNAL OF A FRENCH PASTOR.

ONE hot summer day I was engaged in my usual round of visiting. It was a part of the town the most distant from my church: near the harbour—a district chiefly inhabited by sailors, lightermen, quay-porters, and others connected with shipping, a rough set mostly, but hard working and industrious. Some of them were regular attendants at my church, and I was not altogether a stranger and unknown in the district. I had turned down a street leading straight to the quays, and had crossed to the side where there was shelter from the sun's fierce rays.

Just after passing a house, the door of which was open—a wooden cabin chiefly constructed from old ships' planks—I heard a voice calling me to stop. On turning round I saw a sailor-looking man—one of the quay-porters, not very tidily dressed—standing at the door. In fact, he was an ill-clad and ill-looking fellow, dirty and unshaven, and with features bearing unmistakable marks of a coarse intemperate life.

"Oh, you have stopped, have you?" speaking in a careless, almost insolent tone, and then, pointing to the steeple of a church which was in sight, added, "Is it you who are the captain of that frigate down there?"

"Do you wish to speak with me, my friend?" I said quietly, taking no notice of his rude way of accosting me, or his disrespectful manner, when, under the guise of nautical speech, he plainly sought to show his contempt for my pastoral office.

"Not exactly," he replied, with an air of indifference. "It's my old woman in here who wants to have a word with you. She thinks she is soon starting on her last voyage, and wanted a minister to see if her papers are all in order."

"Do you speak of your wife?" I said, looking at him with mingled indignation and pity.

"Yes, my wife, if you like it better. She is very near the end, and has been bothering me to go to fetch you, though this is too hot a day for a Christian to go out, except driven to it. Just then I saw you in the street, and hailed you."

"A Christian? Are you then a Christian, sir?" I said to him, in a tone and with a look which seemed to take him a little aback.

"Oh! I don't expect to pass for that exactly," he replied. "What are your Christians?" resuming his careless manner: "people who bore you with their sermons. The world would be better with less preaching and more business."

I made no reply, but, passing by, I entered the poor dwelling. The sick woman lay on a miserable palliasse, in a recess in the side of the room, something like the lower berths in a ship's cabin. She fixed her eyes on me, and, holding my hand, she said, "Thank God for this favour."

I could see by her haggard look and her feeble voice that she had not long to live. From the first sight of the rough husband, I expected to see one of the ordinary types of vulgar women, such as one is accustomed to meet in the low streets and slums of a seaport town. What was my surprise when I found in the dying woman an intelligence, a gentleness, and sweetness singularly unlike the sad surroundings. She seemed about thirty years of age, at least about ten years younger than her husband. I felt curious to know by what mysterious causes a nature so tender and apparently refined had become united by the closest of all bonds to a being so rough and brutal.

On seeing her more closely, I recognised a stranger whom I had on several occasions recently observed at my church. She had joined with us at our last Communion, and I then intended to speak to her after the service, and ask her name and address; but she had hastened to go out, without exchanging words with any one.

"Sir," she said, as I drew near her couch, "I have greatly desired to see you ever since this illness came upon me, which I know is unto death. God has heard the desire of my heart. Sir, I beseech you to pray for my husband."

She turned her eyes towards him, as he stood in the doorway, gazing out with seeming indifference, but having his ears keenly listening to what was passing inside.

"Marguerite," he said, turning his head, "if you wished to see the minister in order to ask him to pray for me, you give yourself needless trouble. If any prayers are offered for me, sir," he added, looking at me with a glance of defiant insolence, "you had better address them to the devil."

The poor woman closed her eyes, and her lips moved as she lifted to God a silent supplication. On her countenance there was an expression of patient resignation, which told how far her heart and her pious experience had been disciplined to endure the constant hostility of her worthless husband.

"I want none of your religion," he continued, accompanying the words by an oath.

"Are you a man?" I said to him, with firm and serious voice.

"Well, I don't think I am a dog," he rejoined in a sneering tone.

"You have, then, need of religion in everything that belongs to you as a man, if you are one. There are in the universe only two orders of creatures, apart from man—spirits good or bad, and the brutes that perish. The good angels have not sinned, and therefore have no need of a Saviour, and the brutes have not got souls to make better or to be saved. But man, who has sinned, and who has a soul to save, has need of all that the Christian religion can give. Since you say that you have no need of religion, it must be that you are either better or worse than man; if you are better, you are an angel, if you are less, then you are a brute."

The man listened, and surveyed me with a malignant look.

"You speak words, sir, which are hard for any one to understand."

"You recognise, then, that you are a man," I replied, bearing with calmness the defiant stare of his grey eyes. "The language which you say is hard to be understood is only that of the word of God, which says that man without God and without religion is like the brutes that perish."

I saw the man clench his fists as if he intended to strike me in his rage.

"Jacques," cried his wife, "don't strike."

"No, no, Marguerite, don't fear; I shall never fight about a saying of the Bible. But one might draw it a little more mildly, in flinging stones at a fellow's head. It is hard to be called a brute outright."

"Pardon, sir; I called you nothing of the kind. You drew the conclusion from my words. I simply meant that man has need of a Saviour, and that only angels or brutes could do without."

He made no answer, but, turning his back, began to pace to and fro in the room. He appeared to be digesting the ideas suggested by words that caused him embarrassment rather than anger. His wife looked at him, and then, turning to me, said, "May God bless you, sir, for having spoken so frankly. He was, and would have been, a good husband to me, but for drink and evil companions. Oh, sir, when I am gone, think of him, he has a soul to save. Christ died for sinners. His sins are not too great to prevent him having part in the Saviour's atonement. Once he was good and gentle, but the drink, the terrible drink, has changed him. He is not a bit like what he was when we were married."

"I promise you," was my reply, "never to forget the charge you lay upon me as a Christian pastor."

"Thank you, sir; a thousand thanks."

As this moment the emotion which filled her heart choked her words. I saw that the exertion had enfeebled her, and again the shadow of death overclouded her countenance, which had been lighted with a gleam of life when she was speaking. I knelt beside the couch, and offering a short but fervent prayer, I commended her spirit to the Saviour. Her face was brightened, and a smile was on her features, as she said, in accents full of fervour and of faith, "'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' and 'I shall see Him.' Jacques, my husband, come near me. I am going to leave you. Let me say Adieu."

The poor fellow, who had stood still while I was praying, then came to the bedside of his wife, and there he stood, with folded arms, still affecting an air of callous indifference.

"Jacques, come near me," she said gently; "look at me. Give me your hand."

He came, with a bad grace, and gave his rough hand. Yet I could perceive that he was touched more than he cared to show. The anxious countenance of his wife made a chord vibrate in his long-hardened heart. It was not a brute but a man that I now saw; a man, in whose soul a life of sin and drunkenness had not wholly defaced the image of his Creator. It is not on earth but only in hell that the work of the Creator is irrecoverably destroyed. On this side the tomb, and up to the last moment, there is hope for the vilest sinner, and the most hardened blasphemer. The man said nothing, but remained with his eyes fixed on his dying wife, who continued to speak to him.

"Jacques," she said, "farewell, I am soon to leave you. I am going to dwell in that place the hope of which has sustained me in the vale of tears. I am going to be with Jesus, my Saviour. I am going where there shall be no more sin, nor sorrow, nor pain, nor death. The joys of that world shall be eternal as the life of those who enter it. And, now, O my husband, listen to my solemn declaration. At this moment, with death at hand, I am supported by the glorious hopes and promises of the gospel, the reading of which has caused so much bitterness against me. But I forgive all, and reproach you not. Embrace me, my husband."

To my astonishment he was on his knees in an instant, and bending over her to hear her words, and to kiss her forehead. She sighed, and putting her hand on his head she prayed, "Father, glorify Thyself by making my husband a Christian indeed, nothing is too hard for Thee." The rough man even now showed little visible emotion. Perhaps my presence caused him to restrain himself. But the very effort to appear unconcerned, and the fixing of the muscles of his face, revealed the conflict in his mind. He kept hold of the hand of his wife, and remained kneeling, as if under a kind of fascination. Marguerite's last moments were drawing near, but she had strength and presence of mind to say to me: "I wish also, sir, to say to you Farewell. May we meet in heaven! I thank you for the instruction and for the consolation which I have received from you in your church, and for your presence here to-day."

Then, addressing her husband again, she said, "Jacques, my dear husband, adieu. I can return to you no more, but you can rejoin me. Oh may we be found on the right hand of the throne, on that day, when we appear before the judgment-seat of Christ. Adieu!"

The gravity and the tenderness of Marguerite's words, joined to the solemnity of the death which was now too plainly drawing near, deeply touched the husband. He fairly broke down, and I could see the convulsive heaving of his chest, although the compressed lips seemed to show an attempt to keep down the emotion that agitated his mind.

When his wife's voice ceased to be heard, and her hand no longer felt his touch, the efforts at self restraint which my presence had probably prolonged, were at an end. He burst at once into tears and sobbed like a child. The anguish of his spirit was the more extreme from the long suppression of his emotion.

We were both gazing on the countenance of the dying woman. We were alone with her, for the manifest absence of any vital power made it useless to seek medical or other help in the extreme moment. We then saw what has been sometimes described as being witnessed in the dying. The countenance became, as it were, transfigured, and radiant with an unearthly light. It was like the after-glow that is seen to glorify the tops of the mountains after the valleys are in darkness. The husband also saw it through his tears, and it caused a fresh outburst of passionate grief. He knelt to kiss that face, but the eyes were now closed, and the pallor of death was increasing.

Before this last scene, a few words passed which I almost forgot to record. When the tears first fell and the fountain of that sealed and seared heart were broken up, Marguerite said, "These tears give me joy. They show that you love me. Oh may God grant that you may come where I am going! Will you promise me to try to go to heaven?"

"Yes, Marguerite, I promise it. May God help me." He could say no more. But I heard him muttering to himself: "I am miserable. I am indeed a brute. I am not worthy of approaching a creature so nigh to God! God help me. God forgive me."

He was kneeling all this time at the side of the couch. When all was over, and he had risen, I said to him, "You have seen, my friend, how a Christian dies."

"Yes, sir," he replied, striving to check his tears, "and I have for a long time seen how a Christian lives. This woman was an angel sent from God to me. I see, I understand all now. She bore my brutal usage, thanks to her piety, which I called her weakness. Sir, I am indeed a brute. I have persecuted her, and she never spoke a bitter or cross word to me. Her lips never opened but to speak words of love, and gentleness, and truth. I hated her because of her goodness. The holiness of her life was a perpetual reproach to me, a living testimony against me and my bad life."

He hurried out of the room after uttering these words of contrition, and I heard him pacing to and fro in the little court behind the house. I also went out, to seek for some neighbour to take charge of the corpse; and I committed to charitable hands the duties pertaining to the burial.

On the second day after the coffin was borne to the church. The husband was there, calm, serious, and deeply impressed by the mortuary service. When the body was carried to the cemetery, and the first handful of earth resounded on the coffin, the tears, the remorse, the passionate grief of the poor husband broke out anew. Burying his face in his hands, he went to lean on an adjoining tombstone, and every one could see, with sympathy and pity, the tears which flowed from his eyes, and hear the sobs and groans that escaped from his heaving breast. There were many of the neighbours from the harbour, where Jacques Leroy had only been known as the most wicked man of all that quarter. The respectable appearance of the mourners at the funeral of his wife, and the behaviour of the husband, excited the surprise and the remarks of the neighbours, who were ignorant of the scene witnessed at the death of Marguerite.

From that time a work of grace, the operation of the Holy Spirit, began in the heart of Jacques Leroy. His eyes were opened to see the hideous nature of his sins; his heart felt the misery of the bondage under which it had kept him, and he knew the danger of dying without Christ and salvation. He had learned from the life of Marguerite that there was peace that passeth understanding, a peace of which one could partake only from a sense of pardon, and from the love of God shed abroad in the heart. I need not follow his history further, except to say that Jacques Leroy, once the most degraded of the men of that place, became as remarkable as a model of what a Christian should be in his words and ways and whole life. Let us magnify the grace of God as shown in him, and bless that love of the compassionate Saviour who is ever ready to receive the guilty, and to restore the lost. Yes, truly He is able to save to the uttermost all who come to God by Him!

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

"E. C." puts the questions: "What are we to understand when we repeat in the Apostles' Creed, 'He descended into hell?' From what part of Scripture are these words taken?"

IT is unnecessary, perhaps, to say that the words are not taken directly from Scripture; and therefore the question what was originally meant by them is of secondary importance. Most Christian believers who now repeat the Creed understand them to affirm that our Lord descended to Hades (Hebrew, Sheol), the unseen world, the place of departed souls. So, in Ephesians iv. 9, it is said: "He descended into the lower parts of the earth;" according to the popular conception of the invisible realm. The Creed thus makes two statements: "He was buried," as to His body; "He descended into Hades," as to His soul. With reference again to this descent, He is described as adopting the language of the Psalmist: "Thou wilt not leave My soul in Hades, neither wilt Thou give Thy Holy One to see corruption," Acts ii. 27. Then seeing that He said to the dying robber: "To-day thou shalt be with Me in Paradise," it plainly follows that Paradise also is a part of that unseen world.[1]

But the meaning of those who added this clause to the Creed,[2] and of many who have used it in succeeding ages, was probably somewhat different from this. In fact, their interpretations have been many. Bishop Pearson, in his Treatise On the Apostles' Creed, enters into long details into which it would be now unnecessary to follow him;

[1] The reader who may wish to pursue this subject, may consult Dr. Campbell's 'Dissertation' appended to his well-known "Commentary on the Gospels."

[2] The clause was not found in the Creed as originally framed, and appears to have been first added in the Latin Church. "Descendit in inferna" are the words.

showing that only a minority of the early fathers held in substance the opinion to which we have referred; that Hades, Hell, or Inferna, was "the common receptacle of the souls of all men, both the just and the unjust; and that the soul of Christ descended unto those which departed in the true faith and fear of God, the souls of the patriarchs and the prophets, and the people of God;" to proclaim to those who had waited for Him that His redeeming work was accomplished, and their deliverance assured. But there He did not remain. The "intermediate state" was no place for His soul, any more than the grave was for His body. In His Resurrection He gloriously quitted both, leaving His redeemed ones still to wait for Him against that day.[1] But the greater number seem to have believed that He actually descended to the abode of the lost, either to proclaim to them the Gospel (misinterpreting St. Peter's words, "He preached to the spirits in prison"[2]), or else to announce Himself even there as triumphant. In the words of Pearson, who adopts this view with one modification: "He went into those regions of darkness, that our souls might never come into those torments which are there. By His descent He freed us from our fears, as by His ascension He secured us of our hopes. He passed to those habitations where Satan hath taken up possession and exerciseth his dominion, that having no power over Him, we might be assured that he should never exercise any over our souls departed, as belonging unto Him. 'Through death He destroyed him that had the power of death, that is, the devil,' and by His actual descent into the dominions of him so destroyed, secured all which have an interest in Him of the same freedom which He had." Historically, these opinions must be taken into account; but we are convinced that there is no passage of Scripture, rightly understood, which countenances the supposition that our Lord descended to the regions of the lost, even for the completion of His redeeming work.

"E. P." wishes for an explanation of "the apparent contradiction between Ezekiel xviii. 20, and Exodus xx. 5. In the former passage it is stated, 'The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son'; in the latter, it is written: 'For I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children.'"

Both statements are true. That in Exodus declares the course of Divine Providence, that in Ezekiel sets forth the higher law of God's eternal justice. The two may seem, in life, as in Scripture, to contradict each other, but all will be right in the end. That the iniquities of the father are visited on the children is a fact of every-day experience. If I am drunken and dissolute, my children will probably inherit the seeds of disease; if I am a spendthrift, they are likely to come to want; if I am a scoffer or a hypocrite, they are almost certain to be irreligious. It may be said that all this is by way of natural consequence. True, but the course of nature is the ordinance of God. Again, there were instances in the Hebrew history of children suffering directly for their parents' crimes. The case of Achan may be cited, to go no further (Joshua vii. 24). In such cases, we may conclude that the whole family needed to be cut off like a gangrened limb from the Israelitish body. But it was easy to misapply this general law, and to draw conclusions adverse to the Divine equity; as in the popular proverb: "The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge" (Ezekiel xviii. 2). In opposition to this it was necessary to assert the Divine righteousness, and to vindicate individual responsibility. Such punishment of the children for the parents' crimes leaves no sting in the child's conscience, and argues no actual Divine displeasure. The soul that sinneth it shall die; and no one is judged finally and eternally for another's sin, but only for his own.

[1] But some held that our Lord delivered these captive souls from Hades, and made them at once partakers of His triumph and His glory. See quotations in Pearson from Eusebius, Cyril, Ambrose, and Jerome.

[2] On 1 Peter iii. 19, see SUNDAY AT HOME, 1887, p. 511. [To this paper our correspondent "R. C." is referred for an answer to her query.]

THE PAINTER'S MODEL.

III.

FELLOWES had been in the old hill city for several days, and he was gradually settling down in his old abode into his former habits. He had looked out diligently for a model in the towns through which he had passed after leaving Arona, but he had not been able to see any one at all suitable. He had also taken several walks in the old hill-city and the neighbouring country, keenly looking about him, but he could not meet with a face that would help him. He was very despondent, and he feared that he would have to abandon the picture as hopeless.

"I have made one success," he thought. "I can hardly expect to make another. I had better have continued my rambling life, and then I should have been free from these worrying thoughts."

One morning he walked out into his garden through a side door. Just outside the door stood two small acacia-trees, their tender green leaves making a delightful contrast with the brilliant blue of the sky. Round the trunks of the acacias, and up amongst the leaves, beautiful convolvuluses flung themselves; the trees almost touched the door and formed a covered bower for fifteen or twenty yards, which was a pleasant shelter from the hot sun. As he looked to the bottom of the garden he had a lovely view of the Apennines framed in by the trees. In the garden itself there were vines loaded with white and purple grapes, fig-trees with fast ripening fruit, and great fresh-looking shiny leaves; and near to these were gorgeous sunflowers, and some tomatoes bent down with clusters of scarlet fruit.

Fellowes for a time wandered disconsolately about the garden. Then he went out into the road and walked along until he came to the church of San Pietro. In an absent frame of mind he went into the church and looked at the pictures. While he was looking at them the sacristan, Fra Antonio, came up to him and began to talk.

Fra Antonio questioned Fellowes about his travels, and they strolled on through the church until they came to the east end. Here Fra Antonio opened two beautifully inlaid doors and invited Fellowes to go through. He walked out of the dim light of the church, and in a moment he found himself in a small balcony overhanging the walls of the town. Directly opposite was a glorious view of the surrounding Apennines, embracing Subasio with Assisi at its foot, while close by the silvery olive-trees made a delicate foreground. Although Fellowes had often been here in old days, he had forgotten how beautiful the view was. He gazed for some time in silent delight.

"Who are those men working in that field in such a half-hearted, miserable way?" he said at last to his companion.

"Those," said Fra Antonio, "are the convicts: they are generally to be seen working there at this time of day."

"Can one speak to them?" said Fellowes idly.

"Oh, yes," said the sacristan, "but they are an ill-conditioned lot."

Presently Fellowes took leave of Fra Antonio, and strolled round to look at the convicts. As he got near them he saw that they were indeed a villainous-looking gang.

But he noticed that there was one who seemed to keep himself apart from the rest, and to be intent upon his work. Fellowes, without knowing why, felt curious to see this man's face.

Just as Fellowes came close to him, the man looked up, and his eyes met those of the artist. The latter started when he saw the convict's face. Formerly, it must have been a noble face, regular and beautiful in feature; but now, although the traces of its former beauty could still be seen, it was sadly disfigured by indulgence in vice and infamy, yet the eyes still retained great fire and brilliancy, and seemed to say that this man was much younger than he looked.

Fellowes spoke to him, but he only made a surly answer, and went on with his work.

The artist felt excited and eager.

"Here is the face I want, the ideal of my dreams," for "Sunset," he thought; but the sun was hot and he restrained himself and walked leisurely home. The same afternoon he applied to the governor of the prison, and, after some difficulty, obtained leave to paint the convict.

The next day Fellowes set to work. As he painted, he had a strong feeling that he had met this man before. When, or where, he could not say, but the impression grew upon him. After some days he asked the man directly whether they had ever met.

"Well, signor," said the convict, "since you ask me, I will tell you. Do you remember one Sunday, years ago, seeing a little boy and his mother coming out of San Lorenzo, they went back with you to your house, and you engaged the boy to sit to you as a model; afterwards you took him to a friend of yours in Florence?"

"I remember all this perfectly," said Fellowes; "but what has it to do with you?"

"I am coming to that," said the convict. "The boy you befriended was for a time very happy in Florence; the artists were kind to him, and made much of him, they gave him a good deal of money. The boy—his name, perhaps you remember, was Andrea—was naturally inclined to be vain, and all this attention and notoriety had a bad effect upon him. As he grew older, he became more and more conceited; he would only sit to those artists he liked, and even from them he asked a large price. At first, he used to write regularly to his mother, and he sent her most of his earnings—Ah, that poor old mother, you remember her, signor?—but gradually he forgot all about her and her poverty-stricken home, and he spent all the money he made upon himself. After a while he went to Venice, and from there to Paris. As the years passed, his character slowly deteriorated, and he went from bad to worse, until he was put into prison for stealing. When he came out of prison, instead of mending his ways, he sank still lower: he took to drinking, and other vices; again he was found guilty of robbery—this time with violence—and he was imprisoned once more."

"And where is he now?" Fellowes broke in eagerly.

"Here," said Andrea, throwing himself on his knees before Fellowes. "And wretch though he is, he will always be grateful to you for your kindness to him as a boy."

The telling of this sad tale had moved Andrea greatly. His pale cheeks flushed, his eyes flashed, and, for a time, the old beauty of his face almost seemed to return. But the excitement soon passed off, leaving him more pale and haggard than before, and he coughed in a dry hacking way that shook his whole frame.

Fellowes worked steadily at the picture, but, as he made progress, Andrea grew weaker and weaker.

Meanwhile, Fellowes talked earnestly to him, and exhorted him to amend his life, so that when his term of imprisonment was over he might start afresh.

Andrea appeared to be deeply sorry for his past evil ways, and he protested that when once he was free again he would make an effort to lead an honourable life.

But he grew paler and thinner; and one morning, when Fellowes went to the prison to put some finishing touches to the picture, he was told that Andrea was down with a raging fever, and that he could not see any one.

Before the week was over Andrea died.

Fellowes was greatly shocked and distressed at this premature death, for he could not help thinking that much of Andrea's sad history was owing to the first encouragement he had unwittingly given to the boy's vanity.

The artist finished "Sunset" from memory, and sent it to Florence. The success of this painting was even greater than that of the companion picture of Dawn, and it sold for a very large sum.

But the painter felt ill at ease, it seemed to him that his success had been gained at terrible cost to Andrea; that he had in a way been the means of throwing the boy into temptation by taking him out of his sphere of life, and that he had been careless what became of him. New thoughts came to him from that time, and new resolutions. But the terrible lesson of that sad experience hung like a shadow over his life. Dawn and Sunset! what symbols of hope and glory! Yet the day that begins brightly may end in the blackness of despair. Mournful fact though it be, let youth remember it.

G. S. M.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. I.

1. He was not an Israelite, though a servant of a Hebrew king.

2. An accident put him in possession of a secret.

3. He used his knowledge to curry favour with his master.

4. His master wished to take revenge on innocent persons.

5. He ventured on a bloody deed which every one else shrank from.

6. One of David's Psalms is written against him.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXXI.—THE NEWS BROKEN.

ROY DID NOT HEED HER APPROACH.

ROY'S cold was sufficiently bad to confine him for some days to his own room. The weather had turned cold and damp, the house was full of draughts; and the result of his attempting to ignore premonitions and go about as usual was followed by such an increase of cough, that he was forced to give way to Joan's authority and remain a prisoner upstairs.

On the whole, he was very fairly comfortable in his own room, and it was a distinct benefit to his foot when he was no longer obliged to be going perpetually up and downstairs. Joan insisted on keeping a small fire burning in the grate in defiance of Roger's scornful remonstrance, and the children made a regular practice of sitting with him, so that he was very seldom alone. The boys soon tired of the dulness of the room, and took themselves off, not much regretted by the rest; but Mildred and Nellie found in Roy's room a regular haven of refuge, and were never tired of sitting with him, listening to his stories of his past life, or the romances of fiction retailed for their benefit, playing games with dominoes or letters, or being inducted into the deeper mysteries of chess. For Roy had contrived to get some little commissions executed for him in Thorne, and the result was a most welcome addition to the children's scanty library, and to their yet scantier stock of games. No wonder he was a popular cousin, and he certainly received almost as much pleasure as he gave.

On the whole, Roy did very well upstairs. He got Mildred to help him to sweep and dust his room, and polish up the windows to his own liking. He was very tidy in all his ways, and it was a relief when his eyes were no longer offended by the litter and untidiness that prevailed in the house generally. He saw and heard nothing of the discord and lovelessness that grated continually upon him when brought into contact with the domestic relations of the household. He was amused by the chatter of Mildred and the more quiet pleasure of little Nellie, and he quite enjoyed helping them with their morning lessons and beguiling the afternoons with reading or play. It was almost pathetic, he thought, when Nellie, with a great sigh of contentment, would look up to tell him how "very, very nice everything was now that he had come," and Mildred chimed in with her fixed determination never to let him go any more. If his presence made such a difference to these two children, what could their life have been like before?

He was, however, a little vexed at this time by the tone of a letter received from Marcus in answer to his written from Windmill House. It was very plain to him that his brother did not approve of the way in which he had been "carried off" by his cousin, "under something very like false pretences." He did not think Roger Edington's conduct had been altogether straightforward in the matter. Why had he professed so much about Brighton if he had no intention of going there at all? It was the sea that Frank Lee had so strongly recommended for Roy; it was quite an open question whether he would have sanctioned a visit merely to Windmill House, of whose resources Marcus evidently held a very poor opinion. Evidently Frank Lee had written to Marcus before Roy had done so himself, and the former was manifestly annoyed to gather that his brother had settled down in his present quarters without caring to move. He expressed it very plainly as his wish that the seaside visit should even now be prosecuted and that immediately. Roy had the necessary funds, and they had better be at once applied to that purpose. Marcus spoke of joining Roy at Brighton shortly and bringing him home himself. He hoped to get his business speedily wound up, and then he should lose no time in joining his brother in England.

Somehow, in his present mood, this letter irritated Roy quite unreasonably. He might not like his cousins very much, or admire their ways, but he resented any implied strictures upon them. The Edingtons were, after all, his own flesh and blood, and he felt angry with Marcus for setting himself up against them and trying to interfere with the friendship that Roy wished to form. Other people had commented upon this conduct as strange and suspicious, and Roy knew well that if his acquaintances were to know the whole truth about the relative positions of the two brothers their strictures would be far more severe than they already were. Roy could not, however, bring himself to say anything that could tend to lower Marcus in his cousins' estimation; but he wrote off immediately upon the receipt of this letter a somewhat cool and defiant answer, to the effect that he must consult his relatives' wishes and convenience in the matter of the Brighton visit, and that he was in no hurry to change his present quarters. He was very happy and very well cared for, and he claimed to have a right to visit his own relations if he chose.

Impulsive people who act upon the spur of the moment often say more than they really mean; and Roy's letter was hardly out of his own power before he was half sorry he had sent it. He remembered how kind Marcus had always been to him, how solicitous for his welfare, and he admitted that he had a distinct and undoubted claim to a voice in his affairs. Since he had become a member of a household of relations of his own name and kindred, he had grown unconsciously to lean a little less upon the brother who had until lately seemed all in all to him; but despite all surface fluctuations of feeling, his affection for Marcus was deep and true, and he began at once to wonder whether it might not be his duty to try and follow his plainly expressed wishes in this matter.

So when Mrs. Edington came up to see him after the girls had gone out for a walk, he told her that he had heard from his brother, who was very insistent on his getting some sea air, and he ventured somewhat diffidently to propound the scheme he had had so long in his head, about taking all of them to Brighton for a short time; but though Mrs. Edington smiled and said nothing definite, he was convinced that she did not intend to profit by this offer of his, and he broke off short, half afraid of giving offence, adding as a sort of apology:

"You see it would be so much pleasanter for me if there were a party of us; and I suppose I am almost bound to go, for my brother is my guardian too, and I have to do as he wishes."

Mrs. Edington's smile was a little peculiar.

"Well, Roy, we will see what can be done. I will speak to my husband when he comes in. You can arrange matters with him. No doubt we shall find some way of settling things satisfactorily. You are hardly fit for the sea in such weather, according to my ideas."

When Roger Edington came home that evening he was informed by his wife of what had occurred. It was the first intimation Joan had had of anything likely to bring matters to a crisis, and she listened with intent interest to all that passed.

"I suppose I had better have a talk with him and explain all to him in full," said Roger with a species of gloomy malevolence. "As well now as any other time. You've made up your mind that he is worth the bother you are all giving yourselves!"

"For the present, certainly, I have no intention of letting slip our claim upon him; and as it evidently will now become a question of legal power—Mr. Stratford plainly intends keeping him away from us if he can—it is about time to put things on a proper basis. The boy is not a bad-hearted lad at all, and when he knows all, I have no doubt that he will act and feel properly. I cannot see any good in keeping up the farce any longer. You must tell him the story from beginning to end, and then he will understand the true bearings of affairs."

"I will do so," said Roger with a dark look upon his face: and he strode rapidly from the room. He did not observe that his sister followed him silently, nobody had noticed her presence or observed the strange expression in her eyes, the slight paling of her cheek. In that house Joan was little more than a kind of animated machine. Nobody thought of her as being much concerned about anything.

School-room tea was going on, so that Roger found Roy alone. He sat down opposite to him, and said: "I hear that you have had a letter from your brother." Roy was puzzled by the emphasis laid on the two last words. "Will you show it to me?"

Roy coloured up quickly.

"I cannot very well do that; but I will tell you what he says: he wishes me to go to the sea with as little delay as may be."

"Does he assign any reason for this wish?"

"He thinks it would be better for me. He says it is the doctor's wish. You know Mr. Lee did seem anxious about it, only when I got here I did not care to move. You must not think I am tired of Windmill House, if you are not tired of having me. Only I feel as if I ought to do what my brother wishes."

"And he wishes to separate you from us?"

Roy flushed to his temples.

"He wishes me to go to the sea."

"Practically that is the same thing. And what is your wish in the matter?"

"Well, I don't know that that much matters, does it? You see I am an unlucky minor, and bound to do what my guardian wishes."

"Just so; and your guardian wishes you to remain here for the present."

Roy looked up astonished; he could not understand Roger's strange manner, nor the look upon his face—cold, crafty, almost cruel.

"Marcus said——"

"It is not of the least consequence what Marcus said. Marcus is no guardian of yours. Your guardian is my father, Andrew Edington."

Much astonished, Roy shook his head.

"Excuse me, you are mistaken there. My mother appointed as my guardian my step-brother, Marcus Stratford."

"Excuse me, Roy Edington; your parents both died when you were an infant, leaving you to the guardianship of my father. The aunt who adopted you was not your mother at all. Marcus Stratford is no kind of relative of yours, barely a connection. You are the son of Hubert Edington—a speculator, a swindler, and a suicide!"

CHAPTER XXXII.—JOAN'S COMFORTING.

ROGER was shut up for a long time in Roy's room. Joan had concealed herself behind the half-open door of an adjoining apartment, and waited with quiet patience for him to come out. She heard the even tones of his hard voice speaking on and on without interruption of any kind. She could guess how harshly, how almost brutally, he would tell the defenceless boy all the truth about his past: what cruel names he would give to the last deeds of his distracted and unhappy father, and with what terrible crashing weight the news would fall upon Roy's head, all the more heavily from the brightness of his past, and the sunshine which had hitherto surrounded his lot. Joan was not imaginative; but she had heard a good deal of late about his past home, the Hermitage, and the life there, and she could picture a little what his existence had been like, brought up with such tender care, and surrounded by every luxury. She had never before been drawn quite so much towards any one as she had towards Roy, fascinated by the pictures of the past that he drew, as well as by his bright spirits and flow of even happiness, so different from anything she had known before. She almost hated her brother for making a revelation that must so damp or destroy this happiness, and she would have given all she possessed to have kept the secret from passing his lips. But she knew her own powerlessness. She could only wait and try to soften the blow after it had fallen.

At length the door opened, and Roger came out. She saw his face full for a moment, saw its look of mingled triumph and hatred, and felt that this interview had not softened him one whit towards his victim. More she could not divine, for he was gone at once with hasty strides that seemed to betoken some inward irritation, and Joan remained standing quite still listening intently for some sound from Roy's room.

But all was quite still there, so very, very still that presently she grew a little uneasy. She knew that the boy was not well, for he still looked delicate, and often rendered her a little uneasy by his fluctuating colour and the severity of his cough at times. Perhaps he needed help and could not summon it. Little as she knew of illness, she might be of some help to him. She could but try if she could do anything for him.

Her knock at his door evoked no response. She opened it softly and looked in. Roy sat before the table, his arms crossed upon it, and his head resting on his arms. His face was hidden, and he did not move as Joan came in. He did not appear to heed her approach. She came and stood beside him, and by-and-by put her hand upon his head. The touch roused him, and he looked up, raising himself slowly and pressing his hand to his brow as if in pain or bewilderment.

The boy's face was very white, and there was a look upon it that Joan did not like to see. She did not know what it betokened, but it seemed as if the hope and youth had been, at least for the moment, crushed out of it. There was a strange expression in the eyes that met hers. It hurt her, she hardly knew why.

"Is it you, Joan?" he asked in a very low voice.

"Yes, it is I, Roy. Can I do anything for you?"

"You were kind to me before. Will you be kind again? Will you tell me if it is all true?"

"What?" asked Joan, fencing with the question as if to gain time.

"What he has been telling me? Roger Edington—your brother? Is it true, or is he deceiving me about it?"

"I'm afraid it is all true," answered Joan, "but I would not give way, Roy. After all, what does it matter? You are the same."

"Am I?" he asked wearily.

"It must have come hardly upon you, I dare say. I know you thought yourself Cousin Alicia's child, and did not know anything about the family trouble and disgrace. But, after all, it has been forgotten long ago by everybody but ourselves. It was no doing of yours, and I don't see why you should take it so to heart."

Roy's face was hidden between his hands.

"I cannot think to-night," he said, in the same weary way. "It all seems like a horrid dream. I don't understand it. What does it all mean? Why was I never told before?"

"I don't know. I suppose our cousin Alicia when she adopted you did not want you ever to know you were not her child. She did not like us—at least she did not care for Roger and his wife much—and they were glad to be rid of the charge of you. I suppose she thought you would be happier not knowing anything about it, and it was almost the same as if you were her own son. If she had lived it would have been all right, but when she died Roger said you ought to come here—that you had no claim on Marcus Stratford, or he on you; but don't be so wretched about it, Roy. Roger is very bitter whenever he talks of the past, because he loves money better than anything else in the world, and because he lost his through that crash. But we don't think like that—the rest of us—and we like having you here. The children, in fact, don't know anything about it."

But it was difficult for Roy to take comfort; the blow had been severe, and had been none too gently dealt.

"Then I have no real home anywhere," he said dejectedly. "Marcus is neither my guardian nor my step-brother, and I have no claim upon him; and your brother does not like me, and only has me here from a sense of duty. I wonder how much Marcus knows about all this."

"Roger thinks he knows everything," said Joan; "and you know he wants you to make his house your home. Everybody is fond of you, Roy, I think. He wants you, and we want you. It seems to me that you have two homes instead of one. I wish you would not be so wretched. You will make yourself worse; and things are not really a bit different because you know the truth. You are the same, and we are the same; and, after all, what does anything matter so very much?"

Half kindly, half sadly the words were spoken, and Joan laid her hand lightly on Roy's bowed head. Something in the unwonted feel of a caress made him look up, and he tried to smile, though his face was wan and his eyes were dim.

"You are very good to me, Joan," he said. "I wonder you don't all hate me."

"Why should we hate you?"

"Because—because—oh, you know, what my father did. If it hadn't been for him you would have been living so differently from this."

Joan made no reply, and presently the boy continued, with subdued vehemence:

"And to think how I have been living all my life—with everything I want—more than I knew what to do with—and you like this. I hate to think of it. I shall always be thinking of it now. And it was all my father's doing, yet you suffered for it, and I did not; I suppose really I profited by it, for I could not have been happier than I was as her son." The last words were almost a sob.

"I wish you wouldn't take it so to heart, Roy. It had nothing to do with you, and I always think Roger makes the worst out of it. Why didn't he look after things himself?"

But Roy was hard to comfort.

"He was deceived—he said so—and by my father. He lost everything, and you have had to suffer for it."

"He lost a great deal of money, I know," was Joan's calm, deliberate answer; "but is it only money that makes the happiness of life, Roy? You ought to know; you have had experience."

The question was quite simply put. It was no moral reflection on Joan's lips, as it might have been in the mouth of another; she was simply pondering to herself, and the question was the outcome of her thought. It struck another chord in Roy's heart, however, bracing him up, and bringing something of the light back to his eyes. How many times had his mother talked to him on this very point, as if in anticipation of such an hour.

"No, Joan, I believe not; I don't think money makes happiness."

"I thought not," was the quiet answer. "I often think that if Roger and Caroline had all the gold of India, they would not really be any happier, or we either."

"But you would live differently; things would be pleasanter."

"Perhaps so; I am not sure."

"If only I could make it up in any way."

Joan looked at him half sadly, half curiously; she could not bring herself to tell him that it was with the idea that he might directly or indirectly do something towards making it up to them that he had been brought here. He might just as well think that his guardian had claimed him because he felt it his duty to do so. Presently he looked up at her.

"Is it because I am his son that your father will not see me?"

"I think it has something to do with it, perhaps," answered Joan truthfully; "but he never sees anybody now. Perhaps some day I will take you in; but you must let me choose my own time, and not say a word about the past unless he does.

"I shall not want to, you may be sure," was Roy's answer; then, rising slowly, the boy went to a drawer, and took from it a pocket-book, which he placed in Joan's hands. "Will you please give this to Mrs. Edington? I think now she will let me give it. It is all I can do yet, and I think I ought to be allowed to place it in her hands. I know Marcus would let me, under the circumstances, and some of it is really mine. Please take it away; I never want to see it again, or to hear about it. Sometimes one wishes there was no such thing as money in the world."

"I have often wished that," answered Joan, with an odd little smile. "Well, Roy, I will do as you wish, but I don't believe it will do any good to anybody. It always seems that we are just as poor, whether we have money or whether we have none. Keep your eyes open; perhaps you may learn some useful lessons here before you go back to the old life."

Roy heaved a weary sigh.

"I do not suppose I ever shall go back to that now, and I don't think I deserve to, either."

ON LEAVING BEHIND.

THE panoramic effect of life increases upon all of us as we grow in years. We are never quite so vividly aware of the changes in ourselves, as of the changes about us, for the former are always going on gradually, while the latter are generally forced upon us by some special crisis. We note how swiftly the years are passing, because we find we have so much to remember. We discover that we are old because we find we are living in an utterly different world from that we used to know. We revisit a familiar town after an absence of a few years, and we cannot see the well-known names, and the picturesque corner house is pulled down, and the pleasant easy-going green is railed into a prim square, and nobody knows us in the streets! And there comes upon our heart a sick sense of the irrevocably gone! The past had not seemed wholly passed till then, it was but "yesterday" —that "only the other day" with which a dear old minister and philanthropist was slily accused of being caught still prefacing stories that his hearers had heard for the first time before they went abroad and made their fortunes! But suddenly, we realise that now "yesterday" was ten years ago! A leaf of life is turned down for ever.

In middle age, we get accustomed to such warnings of the transitoriness of earthly things. But for most, if not for all of us, they begin, in one way or another, in early youth. For into the best established and securest home, Death will come, with his stern Never again. There is an empty chair at the fireside; we may stand it back against the wall, and efface its gap by drawing our circle closer, but the evenings when grandmamma told us stories of her own girlhood are over, or we cannot sing together as we used, because the sister who led our voices has been taken; or what heart have we for the familiar games when we have lost the brother who was their life and soul? Henceforth, the psalm of our life has in it a minor key. The shadow of possible loss falls across all our remaining treasures. We know what sorrow is, and that knowledge enters into all our love, and all our joy. But it may be there only to consecrate and purify: to increase patience and tenderness. I remember once being struck by the remark of a wise and thoughtful woman, that she was always sorry for those who did not early make acquaintance with Death, because they lived through so much of life without knowing what life really meant.

But sometimes change comes to us in early days, yet in a somewhat less pathetic garb—change in which the young folks of a household have little active share, and yet in which they are often very real, though passive sufferers. The old home is broken up; in pursuit of fortune, or under the pressure of dire necessity, the household must remove to another city, perhaps to another country. The new home may be larger or smaller, drearier or brighter than the old one, but the old life can never quite go on in it. Perhaps the change is from the country to town, the household cat will be taken, perhaps the dog, but the dear old cow must be parted from, and there will be no more watchings of her milking at gloaming time. The pony will be sold; we shall sit no more in the old pew at church, where we know the very lights and shadows which the sunbeams cast across the floor. Regular habits are suspended, never to be resumed, because the conditions of life are all new. Familiar playmates are left behind, all sorts of little schemes and projects are only too ruthlessly snapped asunder. I remember a gentleman, who, amid his professional pursuits, retained a bitter regret that an unexpected family migration had caused him, as a schoolboy, to break an appointment made with a little schoolfellow. They had parted at noon, having arranged for an evening ramble, and then, very literally the one was taken, and the other was left. He had heard afterwards that his companion had come up according to promise, and had stood lonely, at the door of the deserted house, weeping for his missing friend.

The two lads never met again. Certainly they had a somewhat sharp experience of the uncertainty of human arrangements, a decided proof that

> The best laid schemes o' mice and men
> Gang aft a-gley.

But at any rate, into all lives sooner or later, comes the first real going away from home—the going to service, or to study which shall lead, not back to the old house, but out into the world, or to the exchange of a father's roof for a husband's. The young birds must fly away from the nest. The movement may be voluntary, nay, sometimes looked forward to with great eagerness and pride and joy. Only, a few months before, "the departing day" may have seemed to impatient young hearts as if it would never come, as if time, "which brings up all we hope as well as all we fear," was, for once, leaden-footed. Yet somehow, at the very last, days and hours seem to fly too quickly. Even the bride

> Can see among her golden wedding gifts
> Ghosts of her broken toys.

While others who are going forth to new labour and new trials, not yet assured of new love, begin to realise a desperate clinging to the old associations so soon to be broken up. They discover a charm about old scenes and old neighbours which they never noticed before: why did they not recognise their value earlier? Ah, why not? It is an old copy book adage that > Blessings brighten as they take their flight.

But let them be consoled with the reflection that some, at least, of this charm, could have never been developed but for this parting hour. Very hard faces soften to say "Good-bye." Hearts which have been allowed to grow dry as summer dust, are refreshed and softened by old memories awakened by the departing footsteps. Life-secrets are sometimes revealed to him who is going away, which shrink from the ever-present sympathy of those who remain. Such seasons are nature's own basis for those "love days," which the ancient church appointed for the settlement of feuds, the adjustment of differences, and the reconciliation of enemies. In those tender emotions of the last hours together, even fathers and mothers draw nearer than ever before. The father tells the whole story of the difficulties and embarrassments which beset him on those occasions when he had seemed to his son so stern in his denials, and so rigid in his economies. The mother explains some sorrowful experience of her own, which had made her guardianship of her daughter seem to the girl too strict and exacting.

But the last day at home comes. The farewells are all said; there is an awful half hour in the docks or the railway station, a half hour which is terribly short, and yet, somehow, seems longer than all the years which went before. Then the ship or the train moves on, and some go drearily homeward—and one goes out alone.

It is true that the empty seat—and the one blank where all else remains unchanged—is the special aching pain of those who are left behind; but the pain is not all with them. The very change of scene which it seems to them must lighten the traveller's sorrow, seems to him an added woe. He feels as if his whole world had come to an end, and he was projected, an utter stranger, on a new planet. I remember reading the first letter written by a young girl, after her going out for a long journey across the seas. It was not "a home letter," for she had no home, having been an orphan from babyhood; but it was written to those who, in the phrase of the old Scotch ballad,

> Had been kind till her.

"As the train moved off," she wrote, "and your faces were lost to sight, then I knew I was looking my last on the dear old river and our own silver sea, and the familiar green fields stretching away to the hills; and I felt so strange—I think it must have been like dying!"

And when the outward journey comes to an end, who shall tell the history of the first lonely hours under a strange roof? Perhaps the restless young spirit had chafed against the little rules and regulations of home, but now it learns—

> Better be fed by mother's hand
> Than eat alone at will.

For the first time the heart realises how it has been hitherto surrounded by love—how the little comforts and privileges which seemed to grow of themselves were but the outcome of a ceaseless ministry of tenderness. A gifted American clergyman has a pathetic record of this moment of revelation.

"I knew not a mortal in the whole extent of that city. I went to church; the sound of the old liturgy—a few alterations, of course—carried my thoughts across the seas to the old home. I began to be a little homesick; I knew my poor mother was thinking of me. . . I went home and wrote a letter to her. . . Next morning, as I was getting ready to go out, the idea struck me, what am I to do for clean clothes? Just then a woman knocked, and reported herself as the washer-woman. For the first time in my life, I counted out and made a list of clothes to be washed. When the woman went out, I sat down on my trunk and had one of the heartiest cries in my life. That trunk had been packed by my mother, it was now fairly unpacked, and as one little thing after another came out to tell me of her love and care, all my love for her came back to me; not only so, but the idea pressed upon me that I had now no home. I was where money alone was of any account."

It has often seemed to us that such a moment would be a beautiful opportunity for the "finding," folded among the fresh garments, or tucked in the home-knit stockings, of a letter full of a mother's heart, or a transcript of texts or sayings which she has selected, such as she would whisper in her child's ear if she could reach him in that hour of lonely agony! Such would be a fit service for

> Thoughtful love,
> Through constant watching wise.

What comfort and peace would the discovery of such a treasure bring to the poor young heart that has suddenly begun to yearn with a thousand pathetic regrets over careless words spoken, and little kindnesses left undone—regrets which are ever the most poignant in those who have been the most affectionate and dutiful.

"Blue are the hills which are far away," says the sweet Gaelic proverb, and we all know

> The past doth always gain
> A glory from its being far.

A very common story is told in the simple verses:

> 'Twas a summer eve when I went away,
> More than twenty years ago,
> The sunshine had slept upon hill and vale,—
> And I had remembered them so!
>
> And often, afar on the stormy seas,
> Or in dusky Hindoo town,
> I'd yearned for those trees with their greeny gold,
> And the calm sun sinking down,
>
> And I'd sometimes dreamed of my mother's tone,
> As she prayed by the ingle side—
> But I had not remembered the rainy days
> Nor the voices that used to chide!

Cheer up, poor young heart! It may well seem to you now that there were no shadows on your past, save those thrown by your own wilfulness and folly. Doubtless they did their full share! But those at home do not remember these; they think only that perhaps they were not so wise and patient as they should have been, and watch and wait in trembling hopes that your well-doing and well-being shall justify (or at least excuse) their methods, whether of discipline or of mercy. You, poor children, wish now that you had acted more thoughtfully, more considerately—you long to be in your old place again, to unsay the sharp words, or to confess anew the disobedience or the far sadder deception. But that can never be. What is done cannot be undone, though be sure it is forgiven utterly, and that it will be surely utterly forgotten too, if you are careful to add no new item to the old account, but to act and utter, henceforth, as you wish you had done from the beginning. If you have left any wounds behind you—and which of us does not feel that we have?—you will not heal them by sending back moans of pining homesickness. Rather, take the poet's counsel.

> Look, look up, in starry passion,
> To the throne above the spheres:
> Learn, the spirit's gravitation
> Still must differ from the tears'.
> Hope; with all the strength thou usest
> In embracing thy despair.
>
> Love: the earthly love thou losest
> Shall return to thee more fair.
> Work; make clear the forest tangles
> Of the wildest stranger land.
> Trust: the blessed deathly angels
> Whisper, "Sabbath hours at hand!"

Do not let your home-letters convey a sense of your complete desolation and misery. These are not the best proofs of the love you bear to those you have left behind you. Rather let them hear of your contented and cheerful endeavours, be careful to let them know of wishes of theirs which you remember and carry out now, though perhaps you did not once respect them. Do not forget the home anniversaries, and write your letters or send your gifts to be in time for them, so that their presence may create a joy—rather than their default leave a doubt or a fear.

Tender remorse and regret are very beautiful things. It is a touching picture, that of Dr. Samuel Johnson, middle-aged and renowned, standing bare-headed in the market-place of Lichfield, where he had once refused to stand at his father's book-stall. Such a yearning was possible only to a noble and devoted nature, and yet the great lexicographer's truest atonement for his early impatience and impertinence was to be found, not so, but in his pitiful patience with the whims and ill-tempers of the suffering old folks to whom he gave shelter in his house in Bolt Court. Only by the wiser action of to-day, can we touch the mistake of yesterday.

In reality all life is but a leaving behind. To-day turns into yesterday, while we sleep. And one of our most weird experiences is that we so seldom know when we do anything, or see anybody, for the last time. But it would not be good for us if this possibility was too much present to us. Nature has not meant it to be so. We are immortal beings, and there is a wholesome unconscious sense of eternity upon us, which makes us ignore the transient possibilities of time, except when our mere mortality feels their pang. There are few of us who would be strong enough to utter an unpalateable reproof or to pass a justly severe judgment on a beloved one, aye, or even on any fellow creature, if we lived in a perpetual realisation that this might be the last passage of words between us. It remains our clear duty to seek out the true, to consider the right, and to study the law of kindness, but not to weaken our hearts by any sentimental dwelling on chances that are not in our hands. The unkind sneer, the insolent remark, cannot be made right, cannot be really unsaid, though every day for years afterwards we meet again those on whom we inflicted them. The firm refusal, the earnest warning, will not be made wrong though those to whom we uttered them be snatched away in the next hour.

Only let youth always remember that it is making the memories which will be the world of its old age. Idle listless days, wasted opportunities, foolish frivolities, forfeited friendships, ill-regulated passions, are not the sort of memories which gladden such a sweet picture as a simple Scottish poet has drawn for us where

> The auld folks sit by the fire,
> When the winter nichts are chill,
> The auld wife she plies her wire,
> The auld man he quaffs his gill:
> An' meikle and long they speak,
> O' their youthfu' days gone by,
> When the rose it was on the cheek
> An' the pearl it was on the eye.

They talk of their bairnie's bairns,
  They talk o' the brave an' free,
They talk o' their mountain cairns,
  An' they talk o' the rolling sea.
An meikle and long they speak,
  O' their youthfu' days gone by,
When the rose it was on the cheek,
  An' the pearl was on the eye.

They talk o' their friends lang gane,
  An' the tear draps blin' their e'e;
They talk o' the cauld kirk stane,
  Where sune they baith maun be.
Yet each has had their half
  O' the joys o' this fitfûl sphere,
So whiles the auld folk laugh,
  An' whiles they drap a tear!

And above all, nothing but a resolute pursuance of daily duty, a brave submission which has discovered the peace that lies in accepted sorrows, and a cheerful faith, which mounting upon a grave finds but a wider horizon, nothing but all of these can work that blessed state of mind in which the aged saint can say:

I often think of the days that are gone
  And of all I joyed in then;
But the brightest that ever arose on me,
  I have never wished back again.

ISABELLA FYVIE MAYO.

A CALM SUNDAY IN THE NORTH SEA.

ON the Saturday afternoon, a light breeze wandered fitfully over the level water; the dainty Brixham cutters with their flesh-coloured sails, flitted around like pretty butterflies; the gorgeous orange of the Lowestoft vessels' great mainsails, shone in rich splendour as the sun sank, and the whole scene amid the Short Blue fleet was quaint, and peaceful, and lovely to the last degree. The smacks manœuvred hither and thither, and they seemed to glide like graceful dancers in the maze of a crowded ball-room. How perfectly those men know their business. Distances are calculated to the fraction of a yard, and the skill of the man at the tiller seems to be exercised automatically. Many callers jumped on board of our Mission Smack, and the business of shaking hands assumed the proportions of a stirring gymnastic exercise. I liked the soft-spoken Brixham men very much. Two out of every three fishermen in the pretty old town that nestles on the rocky shore of Torbay are now teetotallers and abstainers, yet I remember the day when the place was a nest of unscrupulous roughs. What a work!

When the sun sank, the wind died away, and the gorgeous water was shot over with bewildering colours that twinkled and changed like the iris on the burnished neck of a dove. What wonder that the fishermen take eagerly to religion when they are wisely taught. Every sight and sound that strikes their nerves is fitted to rouse thoughts of awe to reverence. Ah! that immortal sunset; it will colour my blood till I die.

Our men must of course have a meeting, and, as the evening chill descended and the dew fell clammily on the decks, the strong chorus of their hymns sounded nobly. Night on the water. Oh! magnetic, nourishing night; night of the moaning zephyrs, night of the large few stars. All round us the floating city throbs with life, and mysterious noises travel over the quiet water. All on board feel certain that we shall have a rare service to-morrow, and we settle in the midnight gloom with glad hearts.

Morning broke in magnificence, and after the tossing scarlet plumes of the early clouds had passed away, there was not a fleck of vapour left to vary the brilliant blue of the sky. The crowds of vessels lay on the shining mirror of the sea, and the boats had an easy journey when they came to us.

The converted fisherman is insatiable in his desire for religious exercises, and, before nine o'clock, a cheerful company lounged on our decks. The joyous morning seemed to make the men even more joyous than usual, and their healthy silver laughter was very good to hear. No foul word could be heard in that gallant assembly; no loutish action was seen. Some of the lads were not very smart in bearing, or very clean, but their behaviour made up for all, and I liked their rude modesty. Boat after boat drew up alongside of us, until at last I counted no less than twenty-four lying astern. The decks were crowded with superb specimens of manhood, and the hoarse murmur of talk went gaily on. As the sun gained power, I wondered how the men supported their marvellous clothing. The heavy boots, the obtrusive flannels, the vast baggy trousers, seemed strange garments for a sweltering summer day, but our friends bore calmly a mass of clothes that would have smothered me.

When the word was given to go below, I confess to having felt certain terrors. Every square inch of the floor was packed with men, and the most obscure corners of the hold had occupants. These fellows are most uncompromising worshippers, and the delightful good humour which they showed in that seething hold was enough to give useful lessons to fastidious persons of any sort. Of course, they must sing—indeed there were spasmodic outbursts of rough melody long before we came down—so a self-constituted precentor broke off into a hymn, and the roll of many voices filled the air. Marvellous it was to watch the expressions of the men's faces: rude, gnarled visages seemed to be transfigured by sheer ecstasy, and a curious spiritual change beautified some features that were coarse and common. The prim formalities of genteel religion are not known among the North Sea men: they vent all their passion in their utterances, whether they sing or pray, or encourage some eloquent brother, and any attempt to drill them into trimness and sedateness would be about as useful as to plant an oak in a teacup. Years ago I was used to attend the services among the

A SUNDAY MORNING ON THE NORTH SEA.

Primitive Methodist fishers in Northumberland, and now I observe that the manners and customs of my old friends are reproduced among the men of the deep sea fleets. The same passion, the same moaning self-humiliation, the same pathetic pleading for strength and pity, the same simplicity mark the modes of worship among all those good souls on the coast, and no wise men will seek to effect a change, save by very cautious steps. The chill, restrained religious expression of a more cultured or luxurious gathering are totally unfit for these powerful, virile sailors, and the Deep Sea Mission has gained its chief success by judiciously following the men as well as by leading them.

The prayers offered are more than pathetic; few of the worshippers have learned to take that pride in their own eloquence which is so fatal to true devotion, and their appeals to their Master are like the trusting cries of children. It is beautiful and moving to see how they pray for this mission which has so changed the current of their bleak and cheerless lives. By the way, I may here transcribe a letter which I took down from the lips of a huge rough fellow who could not write. He was telling his experiences, and he said, "Ah! if I could only see the director of this here mission, I would tell him what he has done for me. I can't write a word, or I'd set it down in a letter." It seemed a pity that the brave man should be prevented from sending his message, so I said, "If you like I can take down your letter. Come to the after cabin and we can finish very soon." He said, "You know how to begin with it," but the mystery of short-hand appalled him, and he fancied, I believe, that there was magic in the process. When he went back among his mates he observed, "Well, here's a masterpiece, that gentleman can write faster than any one can talk." I give the letter exactly as it was uttered.

"Dear Sir,

"I came on board the Edward Auriol two years ago, and found the blessing of Almighty God, and since then I have rejoiced in my Saviour. I should much like to have seen you and bid you be of good cheer, for I have found great peace in believin' for it kep me from drink and evil. I have my children well cladded and had a happy home ever since. On the first night of my going home after I found help, my children knew there was a great change taken place, because they found I was quiet, and because they all bid me goodnight—and I never remember my children bidden me goodnight in my life before. Now I go home and praise God for the blessings He bestowed on me, and I mean to go on by the help of God, because I feel happy all day long, and may God bless all Mr. Mather's commerades and himself. I think what a great blessing it was when I'd received and praised my God because He told me to come on to Him, and He would give me rest, and I have realised His presence every day as I have passed troo life, and that I mane to continue goin' on that I may have that crown which He have promised for me."

This is verbatim, and if any one can read it without being touched he is of harder fibre than I am. Well, men of this sort kept up the service for a long time, and I was touched by the sight of the patience with which they knelt on in that blinding heat. The preacher entered, and at once put himself on free terms with the congregation by, saying:

"Now do any of you mind my preaching in my shirt-sleeves?"

The sermon was like a confidential talk, and as lucid and simple as words could be. Not a man moved; but I instinctively knew that they did not miss a single point. It is useless to speak of abstract doctrines to them; nothing but simplicity, earnestness, and perhaps a spice of homely humour will serve.

The mid-day halt was called, and the lusty band of men smoked and exchanged their peculiarly humorous remarks with charming kindliness and ease. Then came the afternoon service, but the cruel heat forced us on deck, and our great congregation sat in the open; they were spell-bound, and most of them seemed to be in a kind of happy trance. Vessels glided lazily past at the will of the tide, pretty white butterflies flitted delicately round—poor little wanderers they made me think that stray thoughts of God were being sent to us—the fierce sun blazed, and the lingering sea shone; but our men sat on heedless of all, and all their faculties were bent on reverence and adoration.

Then once more came the splendour of ended day, and the wild beauty of sunset made my heart tremble. But our devotees would not disperse. As the creeping shadows stole up from the sea to the arch of the sky some one began a hymn. A huge extempore choir was organised and the thunder of manly music rolled over the waters. All round us the vessels lay as if asleep, and the men on board came to gaze on us. In the stillness of the trance-like night the rush of prayerful harmony must have been heard for miles, pealing the news of happiness. How many hundreds were impressed I know not, but I do know that not a soul jeered at us, and when we came to part and the boats sank into the shadows on the solemn sea, many a score of good fellows cried, "God bless you!" I was bewildered and yet happy, and I mused long under the silent sky, as our vessel stole away gently into the loneliness of the mystic north. What a Mission for good! [1]

R.

[1] This mission to Deep Sea Fishermen has now nine vessels at work among the nineteen trawling fleets. Every month brings fresh testimony as to its usefulness. The latest project is to send out a cruising hospital ship which, with her Majesty's sanction, will be called the "Queen Victoria." Last year no fewer than 3900 sick and injured smacksmen received help from the mission ships which act also as dispensaries; but in many cases more effectual aid is required. The idea is that this mission-ship of the future shall be all that the existing ships are plus the cots and the doctor. About 2200*l.* has been received out of the 3500*l.* needed to carry out the scheme. A full account of the origin and progress of the mission, and many details of great interest, will be found in Mr. Mather's volume, 'Nor'ard of the Dogger.' (Nisbet.)

KIRK-BRADDAN AND ITS VICAR.

ALL visitors to Douglas, the fair capital of the picturesque little bit of rock and valley lying somewhere between Liverpool and Belfast, and known as the Isle of Man, must be familiar with Kirk-Braddan. Perhaps the most favourite walk about Douglas is through the famed nunnery grounds to Kirk-Braddan, which is the original parish church of Douglas. On a Sunday crowds come there to worship—not in the old church, for that is a ruin, but in the new one, which was erected very recently, and can accommodate 1000 people. It was a sight in the summer time to see the old vicar lead his people out of the church, as he was compelled to do for want of room, and preach to them in the open air.

The churchyard is crowded at all times, for there the dead of many generations lie, and few are the Manxmen who have not a relative buried there. Amongst the attractions of the place are two Runic crosses, which were erected by the early Scandinavian Christians of the ninth or tenth centuries, or perhaps earlier, but the Runic stones here are all old,—one of them decorated with scroll work and fighting dragons, states that Thorlaf Neaki erected this cross to the memory of Fjak his son, brother's son and Jahr. What a long time that takes us back, and how redolent of the fierce rovers of the sea, whom we still remember as Vikings.

Inside the church there are few monuments calling for special notice. A slab records the memory of the Rev. John Kelly, LL.D., J.P., rector of Copford, near Colchester, and compiler of a polyglot dictionary on the Manx, Gaelic and Erse languages. Whilst conveying the manuscript of this laborious work to England, he was wrecked between Ramsey and Whitehaven, but with great fortitude he supported himself in the sea, holding the manuscript at arm's length above the waters for the space of five hours. It is to be hoped future ages will appreciate the care which saved so great a work for the benefit of posterity.

Kirk-Braddan may claim to have made Episcopalianism popular in the Isle of Man, in spite of the Wesleyan tendencies of the great body of the people. I once had the honour of driving with a distinguished party of local M.Ps., that is members of the House of Keys, and found most of them local preachers. As to the old church, which was built as far back as 1291, it had nothing remarkable about it, except that the bells are hung in the open air and exposed to the fury of the elements. In the memoirs of the Rev. Hugh Stowell Brown, recently published by Mr. Caine, M.P., we have a striking picture of the state of ruin in which the old church was, and of the utter dreariness of the service carried on there when his father, who seems to have been but a half-hearted churchman, was the incumbent. The Isle of Man bishops seem to have been rather backward themselves in discharge of their episcopalian duties; of only one of them, Bishop Wilson, does the memory still survive. One of them in the "good old times" seems to have acquired no little success as a pirate. Bishop Wilson's tomb is at Kirk Michael churchyard, and it bears the following inscription: "Sleeping in Jesus, here lieth the body of Thomas Wilson, D.D., Lord Bishop of this Isle, who died March 7th, 1755, aged 93, in the fifty-eighth year of his consecration. This monument was erected by his son, Thomas Wilson, D.D., a native of this parish, who, in obedience to the express commands of his worthy father, declines giving him the character he so justly deserves. Let this Island speak the rest."

The Island perhaps never had a greater benefactor. He repaired the episcopal residence, which when he came there, was in ruins having been unoccupied five years. The avenue of elm trees to the north of the palace, is said to have been planted with his own hands. His coffin was made out of the trunk of a tree which he had set on his first coming to his sacred office. The Act of Settlement of 1708, which has been termed the Manx Magna Charta, was granted mainly through his interest with the Earl of Derby, to whom the Island then belonged. Perhaps he carried his benevolence to a fault.

On one occasion, having ordered a cloak to be made by his tailor, he gave him directions that it should be made plain, with merely a button and a loop to fasten it. "But, my lord," said the tailor, "what would become of the poor button-makers and their families if every one thought that way, they would be starved outright." "Do you say so, John," replied the bishop, "then button it all over."

At Court, even Bishop Wilson was held in due honour. In 1735, when attending a levee of Queen Caroline, where several prelates were in attendance, the queen turned round, and said, "See here, my lords, is a bishop who does not come for translation." "No, indeed," replied the bishop, "I will not leave my wife in my old age, because she is poor." He had previously refused English bishoprics at the hands of Queen Anne and George I.

Once upon a time the bishop appears to have got into jail, at Castle Rushen. They show you a small dark and wretched apartment, quite unfitted for any human creature to live in; yet there the good bishop was closely confined for two months, in 1722, for the non-payment of a fine of 50*l*., imposed upon him by the governor. It appears the bishop had suspended an archdeacon who was the governor's chaplain, for a serious breach of ecclesiastical discipline. The archdeacon appealed to his friend the governor, who thus unwisely interfered on his behalf. The Manxmen in a rage gathered outside the governor's house and threatened to pull it down. It was only by the personal appeal of the bishop who spoke to the people through the grated window of his cell—that this catastrophe was averted. On appeal to the king the governor's proceedings were reversed, and the bishop and his vicars-general who were imprisoned with him were released, but the expenses of the trial were so great that the bishop was permanently impoverished, while, from the closeness of his confinement and the dampnesss of his cell, he contracted a disorder in his right hand which partially disabled it for the rest of his life.

Coming back to Kirk-Braddan, we are reminded that its popular vicar, the late Rev. Mr. Drury, would have been bishop of the diocese years ago, had the choice been in the hands of the Manx men themselves. In the cemetery close by, is a stone bearing the inscription: "Of your charity, pray for the soul of Sarah, wife of Patrick Fisher," whereupon writes the editor of one of the local guide books: "It may appear strange to Protestants that such a stone should have place in a parochial burial ground, but in Man all sects agree to differ, and Churchmen, Catholic and Protestant Dissenter all lie buried in the same consecrated ground, whether churchyard or cemetery." Baptists alone seem to find no footing in the Isle of Man. Episcopalian churches abound in Douglas, they are strong there—as are all the denominations, except the Baptist.

In September they buried the good old parson Drury at the ripe age of eighty. But years will have to pass ere his name can be forgotten. Thousands wept over his grave, and in all the great cities of the north, such as Manchester, and Sheffield, and Liverpool, and Leeds, many of whose inhabitants had been benefited by his earnest ministry on their summer trips to the Island, there was deep sorrow when it was known he was dead. Only this last summer he was active as ever, reading the lessons in the church, and then going outside to preach the Gospel in the open air.

There was no one in the island better known or harder worked. He was a Manxman—it is not all the clergy in the Isle of Man are that. He loved the island, and spoke its native language to the last. In stature he was a son of Anak, and his strength and gospel zeal were in proportion to his size. At one time he might be always seen preaching, or rather exhorting, at Douglas Pier on a Sunday afternoon, and many were the listeners who came to laugh, and remained to pray. At the conclusion Mr. Drury would kneel upon the stones and pray, repeating the prayer in Manx. His Sundays were indeed working days, commencing often with a funeral in the morning at a village four miles away. At half-past ten there would be service at Kirk-Braddan, without the assistance of a curate. After that, there would be funerals in the cemetery till three, when Divine service in Kirk-Braddan had again to be held. After that, there were christenings or late funerals till it was time for him to go down to Douglas Pier-head. After chatty and pleasant words to the poor old women around, he would stride away to the evening service at Tromside School Room, miles away, and all this would be done with little refreshment, save a packet of sweetmeats which he invariably carried in his pocket. No wonder the new Bishop Bardsley delivered one of his first addresses in his new diocese at his grave; that the Wesleyan Methodists in conclave passed a resolution of regret saying that all the Island mourned his loss.

Many are the stories told of him, and all to his credit. In many ways he was distinguished. As an athlete he was far-famed. One day when he was with some friends enjoying a picnic in the neighbourhood of Port Erin, they saw a sea-bird, known as a diver, a little distance from the shore. The vicar, who was then about sixty years of age, said: "Watch me catch that bird." And, without taking off any of his clothes, he rushed to the edge of the rocks, and made a quick dive into the water. The bird dived as well, but the vicar caught him nevertheless.

Few are there who ever heard him can forget with what emotion he read the church lessons. As a preacher he was practical and hortatory—often talking in a free and easy conversational style. Whatever he did he did with all his might, and troubled himself little about church themes and conventional observances. It is told how on one occasion he had to preside at a missionary meeting in Douglas, but was detained longer than he had anticipated at the bedside of one of his sick parishioners. He had with him a clean shirt which he had intended to put on at his clerk's as he was on his way home; but there was no time for that, and he resolved to change his shirt in the dark whilst riding to Douglas. Accordingly, off went his coat and vest, and, laying them on the neck of his horse, he exchanged the shirt he was wearing for a clean one, and in a few minutes he was quite ready to preside at the Douglas meeting.

On another occasion when the cemetery was to be consecrated by the Bishop of the diocese, in the presence of all the local clergy arrayed in spotless surplices, Mr. Drury was late, but, equal to the emergency, he pulled his well-worn surplice out of his pocket and proceeded coolly to fall in with his brethren.

He was ever ready with his word in season. A would-be sceptic trusting to confute him came up to him after church one day, asking him the name of Cain's wife. Looking earnestly at his questioner, the vicar took him by the hand, led him into the church and, kneeling down, prayed for him, not only that he might be enlightened and instructed, but given what he needed most, a clean and new heart. In all his conversations Mr. Drury always gave the talk, when possible, a spiritual bearing, but this was not done in any objectionable or professional manner. He spoke out of his heart—no man more so. One of his favourite hymns was, "All hail the power of Jesus' name." His one aim was to be, in season and out of season, a good minister of Jesus Christ—at the service of the poor as well as of the rich, of the sick as well as the sound. He realised more than most that he was not his own—that he lived not unto himself. Of bigotry in any shape he had no taint.

Dissenters are numerous in the island, as we have said. By the Burials Act of recent times they have power to be interred by their own ministers in any churchyard or cemetery. As a matter of fact, however, they were quite content to let the Kirk-Braddan parson consign their loved ones to the tomb. A correspondent writes: "We heard him occupying his fifteen or twenty minutes in commending to his hearers—and we saw amongst them several persons of considerable wealth and influence from England—a little prayer like that written by Miss Marsh for her navvies at Beckenham: 'Almighty God, pardon all my past sins; they are very many, and only Christ's blood can wash them away. Turn me by the power of Thy Holy Spirit from all my evil ways. Give me a new heart. Guide and direct me in the right way, and help me to live a new and holy life. I ask these things in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ. Amen.'" Ah, if we could all pray like that we might be happier men and live better lives.

J. EWING RITCHIE.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

"E. A. C." writes: "Will you kindly explain Matt. xii. 5: 'The priests in the temple profane the Sabbath, and are blameless'?"

TO "profane" anything sacred is to turn it to common uses: to profane the Sabbath is to employ its hours in work. Now the priests were compelled to do this, in offering double sacrifices and all the duties therewith connected, also in placing freshly-baked bread on the table in the sanctuary. See Numbers xxviii. 9, 10; Leviticus xxiv. 8. The service of God was a higher claim than that of Sabbath rest.

Our Lord applies the argument from sacred times to sacred things, and from the service of God to the service of man. For the sake of obeying the ritual of worship, the priests made the Sabbath a day of work; for the sake of feeding the hungry, Ahimelech gave the consecrated bread, like common loaves, to David's company; and all ritual observances in like manner must give way to the dictates of piety and charity.

A correspondent asks how the announcement, so often found in the Apocalypse, of Christ's speedy advent, is to be understood.

"Behold I come quickly." Such is the burden of the message to every one of the Seven Churches. To Ephesus, it is said "I will come unto thee quickly" (ii. 5); to Smyrna, "thou shalt have tribulation ten days" (ii. 10); to Pergamos, "I will come unto thee quickly" (ii. 16); to Thyatira, "Hold fast till I come" (ii. 25); to Sardis, "I will come on thee as a thief" (iii. 3); to Laodicea, "Behold I stand at the door and knock" (iii. 20). "It is impossible," adds the author of 'Parousia,' "to conceive that these urgent warnings had no special meaning to those to whom they were addressed; that they meant no more to them than they do to us; that they refer to a consummation which has never yet taken place. This would be to deprive the words of all significance" (p. 385). There was a crisis, a "day of the Lord" before that generation passed away, in which He came, in His judgments and His love, to all the churches that professed His name. This "coming," again, was typical of His future "appearing."

THE HIDDEN TREASURE.

Our correspondent E. R. R., in further reference to the parable of the hidden treasure (see p. 221, April, 1887) remarks, "How came the man to be digging the ground which did not belong to him?" and suggests as a solution that it was his own patrimonial estate, which had passed from his hands, but which he had now an opportunity of redeeming should he find it worth while. In this case "the treasure" might have been hidden by one of his forefathers, and he had an equitable right to it. The conjecture is interesting, but unsupported. Some instance of a discovered treasure had possibly, as our correspondent remarks, occurred in our Lord's time, and the whole would be well understood by His hearers. The application of the incident would no doubt gain force if "the treasure" had been the forfeited inheritance of an ancestor. So our forefathers forfeited the treasure which it is our joy, through Christ, to regain.

"A. N." asks an explanation of Psalm cxxvi. 4: "Turn again our captivity, as the streams in the South."

The usual explanation is no doubt correct. "The South" (Negeb) was the great undulating plain between the hill country of Judah and the desert. This was intersected by water-courses which, during the summer, were arid, stony channels, but which the early and the latter rains filled again with rushing fertilising streams. So the Psalmist prays that the flow of the returning exiles to their land may replenish it and renew its prosperity, like brooks refilling their channels.

It should be added that the word "captivity" does not refer to the state of exile, but to the exiles themselves. So, in verse 1, "The Lord turned again the captivity of Zion," i.e. "brought back Zion's captives." So, Psalm lxviii. 18, "Thou hast led captivity captive," i.e. "hast led captives captive." (This sense the R. V. makes clearer by inserting the italic Thy: "hast led Thy captivity captive). The change of abstract into concrete is in accord with the law of most languages. [The Hebrew scholar will observe that the words for "captivity" are not precisely the same in these different passages; but they are from the same root, and for practical purposes identical.]

Our correspondent offers the conjecture that the "turning" may possibly allude to the rush of the Euphrates upwards at the flow of the tide, which to the Jews, accustomed to the tideless Mediterranean, would be a phenomenon to strike the imagination. But no Jew would speak of the district where the Great River enters the Persian Gulf as "the South," nor would the word for "streams" be applied to the Euphrates. It means properly "valley-brooks, or channels." It is the word used in Psalm xlii. 1: "As the hart panteth after the waterbrooks."

THE FLYING FAY.

"LISTEN! THAT IS A WOODLARK'S NOTE."

ONE morning in that pleasant time of year when gardens look their gayest, and banks are bright with blossoms, and wild roses and honeysuckle twine together in the hedgerows, and fill the air with fragrance, Nellie Burton and her twin sister, Maud, started for a ramble through the woods.

"We will bring back heaps of your favourite foxglove and fern, mother darling!" cried Nell gaily, as they tripped through the open French window of their pretty breakfast-room.

And "mother," wheeling her invalid chair a little forward, and gazing fondly after her two winsom lasses, decided in her own mind that the sweet summer morning itself was not more fresh and fair than they.

Twins though they were, there was but slight resemblance between them. They were of equal height, and wore simple white frocks of much the same pattern and material, but Nell's face was brown as a berry, and her dark hair rippled far below her shoulders; while Maud had a fair complexion, and the short curls that clustered in little rings round her head, shone like gold in the sunlight. And this was why, I suppose, many of their friends called the two girls Night and Morning.

Well, Night and Morning, hand in hand, sauntered slowly down the lane which led to the pine wood. They meant to go round the prettiest way, and to cross the rustic bridge over the river.

"It is just the day for a walk," remarked Maud, stopping as she spoke to gather some wild strawberries.

"Yes," said Nell; but she evidently was not thinking of the beauty of the day at that moment, for she added suddenly—"Maudie, it must be very pleasant to be able to do good in the world, mustn't it?"

"Very! What made you think of it now?" asked Maud, admiring a particularly fine berry before she popped it into her mouth.

"The book we have been reading."

"Oh, yes! 'The Heiress of Lowood.' But she was rich, you know."

"Mother says the people who are not rich can do almost as much good as the people who are, if they take care not to miss opportunities," said Nell, musingly.

"We must take special care then," laughed Maudie, "for I am afraid, Nell, we shall never be rich; not that I think we could be much happier if we were."

"Of course we couldn't—not a bit, with such a dear darling mother as we have!" declared Nell stoutly. "And, oh! Maudie, isn't it glorious that in a week she will be able to go to the seaside, and we can begin the riding lessons she has promised us! Do you know I could hardly sleep last night for wondering whether it will be best to have a blue habit, or a brown. I like blue myself, but—" and here Nell's brow grew puckered with anxiety—"Clara Wright says brown is more fashionable."

"It seems to me," said practical Maud, "that so long as we have them neat and well-made, the less we spend on the habits the better. Then we shall have more money for the rides, don't you see?"

By this time they had gained the bridge, and Nell was bending over the rustic railing to watch the fish gliding to and fro in their watery home.

In answer to her sister's question she nodded her head so energetically that her light straw hat fell, not into the river, but where it was equally out of reach; for it lodged on that part of the bridge projecting beyond the bottom of the fence, and as the trellis work of the latter was too close to permit the passage of a hand, the hat, for all the use it was to its owner, might as well have taken flight to Kamtschatka.

"We must go back," said Maud, ruefully.

"Oh, no, we needn't!" replied Nell. "We are close to the wood, and once there it is so shady that it will be rather pleasant than not to be without a hat."

"But you will get dreadfully burnt."

"Bah! what can that matter to a gipsy like me?" laughed Nell; "now if I had your pink and white skin it would be different."

So the sisters went on; and soon they were beneath the shadow of the pines, and too busily occupied searching for woodland treasures to think any more of their little mishap.

By-and-by they stood in a certain nook, which Nell not inaptly called a "perfect nest of beauty." From a carpet of daintiest moss sprang many kinds of graceful fern; and above these rose the clustering speckled bells of the stately foxglove, gleaming redly against the rough brown stems of the pine-trees. Their baskets were already laden with flowers and roots, so Maud set to work and filled her apron.

"Listen!" said she, as they turned away, "that is a woodlark's note."

But the woodlark's song was drowned by another voice which suddenly rang out. A human voice this time, and one more shrill than sweet.

"I care for nobody, no, not I,
And nobody cares for me!"

announced the owner of the voice; and Nell and Maudie saw coming towards them a girl about their own age, but dressed more like a child of nine or ten, in a very short, tawdry-looking dress of red velveteen. This shabby garment being further embellished with plenty of common lace (rather dirty—to tell the truth) at the throat and wrists gave its wearer a peculiar appearance; but what first struck Nell was the fact that her lost hat was perched jauntily on the head of the new comer, who swung by the string another and much more showy arrangement of velvet and artificial flowers; she having apparently deposed her own headgear in favour of Nell's property.

Now Nell was a fastidious little body, and the stranger's rough hair did not betoken a very intimate acquaintance with either brush or comb. She therefore began angrily—

"How dare you wear my hat?"

"Your hat!" retorted the girl in the red frock. "I like that! My hat, if you please."

"How on earth did you get it?" said Maud, her curiosity mastering her indignation.

"Paid six-and-ninepence halfpenny for it up Camden Road way, if you must know," was the unexpected rejoinder.

"You wicked girl, how can you tell such a story?" broke in impetuous Nell.

"Hush!" said Maud, rather alarmed at the wrathful look with which this outburst was received. "Listen, Nell, you could not use the hat now, you know; so let us say it shall be hers if she will tell us how she contrived to get it."

"We shall not hear the truth, I expect," murmured Nell. "But to be sure," looking regretfully at her pretty hat, "it is no good to me now."

And so she consented to this arrangement.

When the strange girl was told of the proposed gift, and the condition attached to it, she looked mightily pleased.

"Mine! Honour bright! Well, now, that's handsome. Tell you how I got it? Of course I will, and welcome. I saw it when I came to the bridge, a-dangling right over the water; so I climbed the railing and slipped down hand over hand, and directly I was near enough, I took it in my mouth by the brim, and came up again hand over hand, and swung myself over the railing as right as a trivet!"

"I knew she wouldn't tell the truth," whispered Nell disdainfully.

For to her this account seemed quite incredible.

"Oh, you don't believe me?" cried the strange girl "Well, then, just you look here."

And the words were hardly out of her mouth before she was climbing a tree with cat-like agility, and, grasping a branch in both hands, swung backward and forward, and over and under it, until the pair below fairly gasped for breath.

"There!" said the climber, descending. "You couldn't do that, I guess. But then, you see, you ain't the Flying Fay."

"Is that your name?" asked Maud.

"That's my professional name," returned the Flying Fay with dignity. "My private one is Polly Muggins. We're acting just now at the fair in the village; and I tell you what, as you've acted so handsome about the hat, I'll get Brown, our doorkeeper, to pass you two into the pit for nothing."

"You are very kind," said Maud, smiling, "but we shall not be able to come."

"Ah, you're a cut above the pit, I suppose," observed Polly Muggins, calmly surveying the sisters. "Well, get your friends to treat you to the boxes; it's only eighteenpence. And there's something worth seeing to-night, for I've got a new trick. A regular teaser it's been, and awful dangerous; but I'm to have my pay raised if it goes all right, and so," continued the girl with a laugh, "who cares?"

Somehow or other that reckless laugh touched Nell's tender little heart. She raised her soft dark eyes to the bolder ones of her new acquaintance, and said gently:

"I don't think you should talk like that. And, Polly, when you wear my hat, do let it remind you not to tell stories."

"Who's a-telling 'em?" began the Flying Fay fiercely.

"Why, just now, you know, about the Camden Road," said Nell, putting it as delicately as she could.

But Polly did not seem at all abashed.

"That was nothing but a 'little cram,'" she laughingly remarked, adding, however, more graciously, "I'll remember, though. I heard a parson say once God hates liars. He talked so nice and kind that I wished I could ask him more about it; but we're always on the move, and I lost the chance. Well, good-bye. Mind you come to-night. Pit a shilling, boxes eighteenpence." And here the Flying Fay departed as she came, singing at the top of her voice:

"I care for nobody—no, not I,
And nobody cares for me."

The next day the doctor came to see Mrs. Burton. Not that she was worse, or in special need of advice; but he every now and then paid her a friendly visit, and, if he had a little time to spare, enjoyed a chat with his patient. On this occasion he spoke of a sad accident which had happened the previous evening at one of the shows at the fair. A poor girl, set to perform some stupid and perilous feat by means of hanging ropes and bars, had fallen to the ground and broken her leg in two places.

Nell and Maud listened with breathless interest, and the same question sprang to the lips of both.

"Was it—could it be the Flying Fay?"

"Yes, I believe that was what they called her. Pray is she an acquaintance of yours, young ladies?" asked the doctor, fixing quizzical eyes on the sisters.

Of course, after this, he had to hear all about yesterday's adventure, and to answer plenty of questions as to poor Polly's condition.

"Will she be able to perform again?" said Mrs. Burton.

"Never—at least, not in the same way. And a very good thing too," added the worthy doctor, "for it is a shocking life for a young girl."

"Oh, mother," said Nell, "could we go and see her? I really think she would be pleased. And—perhaps we might do her some good."

Mrs. Burton at first shook her head doubtfully, but the doctor giving it as his opinion that if they went at once, while the fair was comparatively quiet, they need fear no annoyance, she consented. To the great joy of the twins, the pony-carriage was ordered, and cook having supplied them with a nice milk pudding for the sufferer, they immediately set out on their charitable errand.

They found the Flying Fay in one of the fair carts. At any other time Nellie and Maud would have been greatly interested in her surroundings—the funny little room on wheels, with its tiny window draperies of white muslin, and bows of smart pink ribbon. But now their whole attention was centred on the poor child, whom they had seen only yesterday so active and so careless, and who now lay pale and helpless on a small bed, wedged tightly in the farthest corner by the rest of the furniture. Tears came into Nell's eyes as she saw her straw hat on the patched quilt, just where its new owner could see it and stroke it proudly with her little brown hand.

Poor Flying Fay, she was very, very sad. The pitiful smile which welcomed her visitors soon died away, and she was sobbing out her troubles to kind Mrs. Burton. She would never be able to act again—never! And Maria, who had taken charge of her since her mother died, said she would only be a drag and a burden on everybody now; and she would have to sit still, and make dresses and mend clothes for the other performers, while they—— Oh, it was too hard! How should she ever bear it?

And here Maria, a great coarse-looking person, drew near, and told her to "shut up," and not make matters worse by crying, speaking so unkindly that the sisters grew quite hot with indignation, and Mrs. Burton drew the angry woman aside, and tried to enlist her pity for the suffering girl. Altogether, it was a sad scene; and Nellie owned the same evening, as they sat at their cosy tea-table, that she could not get it out of her head.

"Cannot we do something for Polly, mother, dear?" said she. "The people she is with would be only too glad to get rid of her now, that's certain. And I'm sure Mrs. Lane, in the village, would take her in and nurse her, and charge very little."

"That is true, darling," replied Mrs. Burton: "and the best thing that could happen to the poor child would be to take her from her present life, and put her in the way of earning her living in service, or some such respectable employment. If we could have tided her over her illness, too, it would be easy to get her admitted to an institution where they train young girls for domestic work; but unluckily I cannot afford to maintain her until she is well, especially just now, when our expenses at the seaside will be heavier than usual."

The sisters looked at each other, and the same thought crossed the minds of both. Was it possible to give up those long-anticipated, long-promised rides?

They talked it over together by-and-by, strolling up and down the garden paths. Never had the pleasure they proposed to forego seemed more tempting. And yet—and yet—would the delight of cantering over the downs, or trotting briskly up and down the parade, be equal to the joy of rescuing a poor girl from a life of misery, and teaching her to be useful and happy? The roses, gleaming in the setting sun, whispered of the "Rose of Sharon." So did the spotless lilies, emblems of the gentle, self-denying Jesus. Was it well that those who professed to be His followers should shirk a little sacrifice for His sake? Half unconsciously Maudie murmured His gracious saying, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me."

I do not think you will be greatly surprised to hear that when the Burtons went to the seaside, Nellie's mind was no longer troubled by the question whether to order a blue habit or a brown one, for that article of attire would not be needed in her wardrobe. She and Maud had agreed to give up their riding lessons, and to devote the money thus saved to the benefit of Polly Muggins, whom they left comfortably installed in Mrs. Lane's cottage, with many injunctions to do her very best to get well and strong against their return. Polly was wonderfully softened by her misfortune, and very grateful. She was too shrewd not to compare the true kindness of her benefactors with the selfishness of her own people, who were only anxious to be rid of her now that she was not likely to prove an attraction to the show. The day that Nellie and Maud, looking bonnier than ever, came home from their trip, which they declared all the rides in the world could not have made more enjoyable, she met them with such genuine delight that the twins felt amply repaid for their sacrifice. Soon afterwards Mrs. Burton was able to get the young waif admitted to a capital training-home for servants, and there she lived for several years, well cared for and happy.

And where is Polly now? Well, if you go to the village where Nellie and Maud spent their childhood, you will find that time has wrought some changes. For instance, those two damsels are married and settled in homes of their own, not far, however, from the parent nest, where Mrs. Burton, always more or less of an invalid, still lives, attended by a faithful maid. Although the latter walks with a slight limp, she is strong and well formed, and you may often see her carefully supporting her mistress round the garden, or down the green lane famous for wild strawberries. And few people would recognise in the pleasant, comely young woman, looking so neat and trim in her close-fitting gown, and snowy collar and cap, the loud-voiced, romping girl who was once proud to call herself the Flying Fay.

SYDNEY GREY.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE REFORMATION.

IV.

[J. H. Hoffbauer.

PARIS EARLY IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY. LA TOUR D'HORLOGE AND THE ABBEY.

THE Bible is the best model in writing history. When it portrays the chosen people it softens no ugly lines, nor ever implies that they were in the least degree better in themselves than the heathen round about them. Yet they have all the sympathy of the sacred historian, and why? Because they represent the cause of God in the world: the cause of justice and truth. So it was with the Huguenots; they carried God's banner in France, they represented His cause, and this being the case, we have no need to hide their defects.

What a tragic history is that of the reformed church in Paris, from the death of Henri II. to the accession of Henry IV. It were better to have lived under Nero than under the Valois.

Nevertheless, the reformers did not doubt God was on their side, and one of their number, Pierre la Place, in his book, 'De l'estat de la Religion et Republique,' relates that, in 1557, a letter was sent to the king detailing the miseries that had befallen several of their persecutors, who had been cut off suddenly in the midst of their sin, or had suffered anguish, mostly in the form of internal fire.

What rendered the existence of the reformers so difficult, making it well-nigh impossible to maintain equanimity, was the fact that at one moment they were encouraged to act with the utmost boldness, at the next they found themselves treated as criminals, and the objects of every injustice. And this was ever their fate.

At the beginning of the reign of Francis II. an edict was issued pardoning all those accused of heresy, whereupon the Reformed had the temerity to hold two assemblies in the Palais de Justice. The first, numbering one hundred and thirty persons, took place in the very chamber of the chancellerie; the second, held in the square tower, was discovered, and they had to fly. Of course the explanation is that they had friends in high places, often ambitious people, who used them simply as tools. In October, 1561, the Chapter of Paris sent a deputation to the Governor of Paris, the Prince de la Roche-sur-Yonne, to ask him to prevent the preachings and the conventicles. The governor demurred to the word "conventicle," as applied to assemblies of the Reformed, reminding the Chapter that it had itself complained that, on November 1st and 2nd, 1560, assemblies had been held, numbering as many as two or three thousand persons.

This shows how many persons there were in Paris at this time who wished for a reform in religion, and it is not surprising that, after such a period as the Guise tyranny, they began to rely on their own power to combine and defend themselves.

The fall of the Guises and the regency of Catherine de Medici envenomed the more turbulent among the Catholics, and their attacks on the Reformed became more frequent. In April, 1561, a house in the Pré-aux-clercs, during the holding of an assembly, was besieged by a mob. The owner, Michel Gaillard, Sieur de Longjumeau, defended his dwelling, and a man was killed. In the same year, 1561, the Reformed began to hold religious meetings on the other side of the city, in a place called the Cherry orchard. They were accustomed to return by various gates, and in small groups. On one occasion, some of them found the gates closed, and guarded by citizens. The Huguenot gentlemen forced them to open, and in the skirmish wounds were given and received, and one of the Reformed being left for dead, his body was thrown into the common sewer. Next day, his friends returning to bury him, found him still breathing. He recovered, and afterwards became a superintendent or elder of the church.

These troubles were so frequent and so violent, that the government of Catherine de Medici tried to stop them, by compelling all the Parisians to give up their fire-arms, and by exercising a strict watch over the armourers. This not proving enough, gallows were erected in various parts of Paris, with the significant legend, "For the seditious." This would seem to have been under the government of Michel l'Hôpital, the only honest ruler of the time.

The year of the Colloquy at Poissy, 1561, the Protestants of Paris were a recognised religious body. Beza was, in France, almost in the character of ambassador extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the reformed churches of France and Geneva. The queen-mother and the court went to hear Beza preach, and he met the Cardinal of Lorraine, and all the great dignitaries on equal terms.

But when the Colloquy shipwrecked, the reaction set in, l'Hôpital being unable to stem the tide. The Reformed had two important places of worship just outside the walls of Paris. One was at the Porte St. Marceau, the other at Popincourt, outside the Porte St. Antoine. The former was a house which had once belonged to two of the oriental patriarchs and was then in possession of an Italian Protestant who had taken it for a meeting-house. It went by the name of the Maison des Patriarches, a name still preserved in the Marché aux Patriarches, where a number of kind-hearted old women sell to-day admirable dairy and farm produce. The pastors of Paris and other distinguished preachers spoke here: Le Maçon and l'Estaing, Malot and Viret. The new service attracted large crowds. The day after Christmas, Jean Malot preached here at three o'clock in the afternoon. During the sermon, the bells of St. Medard, the presbytery of which was contiguous to the Maison des Patriarches, began to ring so loudly that the preacher could not be heard. A psalm was sung, but the ringing continuing, two persons were sent to beg the curé to desist. They were beaten, and one was mortally wounded, whereupon the congregation growing furious, rose up and rushed into the church of St. Medard. The priests barricaded themselves in the belfry and showered stones on the invaders. The tocsin of the neighbouring churches rang the alarm, and the mob gathered. Meanwhile the Huguenots, finding the dead body of their messenger, revenged themselves on the altars and images, and were about to fire the belfry when the police arrived. About thirty-six persons were arrested, priests as well as others, and taken to the Châtelet.

Next morning the clergy had their revenge: a great crowd invaded the Temple aux Patriarches, burnt the pulpit and the seats, and demolished the garden. The whole building, in fact, would have been consumed, had not some Huguenot gentlemen arrived, who, sword in hand, drove the mob away.

In the sequel, the Parliament liberated the Catholic prisoners, and hung three of the Protestants before the church of St. Medard. Later on, four more were hanged inside the Temple aux Patriarches, having previously had their hands chopped off. To add to this iniquity, the Parliament also put to death, for having too loyally done his duty, the head of the police—Gabaston. Immediately after his execution, the other place of worship at Popincourt was destroyed by a troop of soldiers, under the command of Coligny's uncle, the Constable Montmorency, who personally saw this great work done, and thereby earned the sobriquet of Captain Burn-benches.

Probably these atrocities were due to the panic caused by an explosion in Paris on the 28th of January, 1562. The Arsenal was blown up, and without a shadow of proof, the Huguenots were accused of doing it. Such was the fury of the populace, that it was only enough to cry "Huguenaud" after a man in the street, and into the river he went. The rage was almost incredible; two officers who had permitted preaching in their districts were seized by the mob and hanged, their decapitated corpses being rolled in the mud and then burnt.

In June of this same year, 1562, an edict was promulgated ordering all who were notoriously known to be of the new religion to quit the city in twenty-four hours; while those who were only suspected were to go before the bishop and his vicars and make a confession of faith. The same edict gave the people the right to attack and break up any gathering of the Reformed. As to justice, it had been for some time denied the Huguenots. If any one came to ask it of the Constable, he only replied, "Let them cease to be rogues."

And yet it was not six months since persons in authority among the Reformed in Paris had gone publicly to the preaching in their official costume. Moreover, they were by this time a completely organised body: their consistory fully constituted, and a regular bureau being established for the relief of the poor, composed of eight of their principal members, assisted by four superintendents, and any number of deacons required. Twelve boxes were held at the close of every preaching, and as much as five sols or sous, and even as much as a crown-piece, was given to each poor person. As to the Lord's Supper, the greatest care was taken to prevent occasion for scandal. It was administered publicly, and only those allowed to partake who had applied beforehand to the superintendents.

This terrible year ended by the execution of the Huguenot, Poltrot, on the Place de Grève, where he was torn to pieces by horses. His crime was the assassination of the Duke de Guise.

The following years went on much in the same manner. In 1563, twenty Huguenots, being arrested, were massacred in the street on their way to prison. Nevertheless, on the slightest appearance of security, 4000 Huguenots collected at one assembly, and on Christmas Day, 1565, the second National Synod of France was held at Paris.

French Protestantism never dreamt until the present century of being something distinct from the state. The reform it sought was entire, and covered the whole life of man and society. This, amongst other considerations, explains its being a political party. Of course, in this way, it got mixed up with the worst elements of the world, ambitious men and adventurers. The thing was unavoidable, and a party must be judged as a man, not by a circumstance of its life, but by its persistent aims.

In 1568, Paris was surrounded by a Protestant army. Fifty years earlier the reformers in France were a little group of students. Now, they not only besieged Paris, but actually beat the army at St. Denis, sent out under the Constable to drive them away. Amongst the slain was Montmorency himself. Of course the Reformed in Paris had a bad time of it. Those who could, left during the siege; in fact, all were ordered to do so. After the peace they were advised to keep within doors if they did not want to be killed. During the next six months, probably 10,000 Huguenots were slain in France.

In 1569 came the Protestant defeats at Mon-

MONTFAUCON—THE PARIS CALVARY. HERE THE CORPSE OF COLIGNY WAS EXPOSED ON A GIBBET.

contour and Jarnac, and Coligny was hanged in effigy at Montfaucon. This childish ceremonial was a true bit of the middle ages. The real criminal not being procurable, a wax effigy was made and dressed in costume. Thus a lawyer would wear an advocate's robe; in the case of Coligny, they did not forget the toothpick. This lay figure was treated exactly as if it were a living man. Placed in the tumbril, it was solemnly jolted up to Montfaucon, where it was left hanging amongst the mouldering remains of the real corpses suspended there on a great and horrible gibbet.

In 1570, this same Coligny rode a living man by the side of the king into Paris. As they passed the corner of the rue de l'Arguillerie, in face of the rue des Lombards, they came upon a stone pyramid. It was the monument of a great crime. On that spot had stood the house of an old merchant of high character. Accused of allowing the Lord's Supper to be celebrated at his house, he, his son, and his brother-in-law, were all hanged on the Place de la Grève. Another son was sent to the galleys, and the third banished for life. Their house was razed, their goods seized by the king, except a small dole allowed the widows. Finally, a pyramid was set up as a warning to all like malefactors. Coligny demanded its removal, in accordance with a treaty just signed at St. Germain-en-Laye. It was done in the night, nevertheless the mob rose in fury and pillaged some houses inhabited by Huguenots on the Pont Notre-Dame.

This bridge was one of the sights of old Paris, and would, indeed, have been a famous thing to-day. Destroyed by an accident in 1499, the Pont Notre-Dame was rebuilt in 1500 from designs by Jean Jocunda. The last houses were finished in 1510, there were sixty-eight, and all of the same design. Each house had a shop with its number written in letters of gold, and a text of Scripture over the number. At the back there was a balcony looking over the river, and no part of Paris was more agreeable to live in. When Charles IX. made his entry into Paris in 1571, the Pont Notre-Dame was splendidly decorated with triumphal arches, Bernard Palissy being almost certainly employed in the work. On this handsome bridge several of the houses were occupied by Protestants: proof that reform had found many adherents among the wealthier citizens of Paris.

RICHARD HEATH.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE:

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXXIII.—ROY'S RESOLVE.

MILDRED and Nellie were both quite certain that "something had happened," as they called it, with reference to Roy, for Aunt Joan would not let them go into his room all that day nor for a good part of the next. She said he was not so well, and did not care to be troubled with them; but the little girls felt sure that he would not have kept them away of his own accord. They were shrewd enough to see and suspect that there had been a domestic storm, and they had had pretty considerable experience of these disturbances of household peace.

"Everybody is so disagreeable to-day," grumbled Mildred, as they returned to the school-room after the early dinner. "Wet days are horrid at the best of times. I want to go and see Roy, and make him read to us or play with us. He must be as dull as anything all alone."

"Aunt Joan said we weren't to go till she gave us leave," answered Nellie. "He has a bad headache to-day. Perhaps he'll get better and want us by-and-by. I do hope he will."

And in effect about dusk came a message from Roy, asking the little cousins to come and pay him a visit, and drink tea in his room. They repaired thither in a state of considerable elation, only a little damped by finding Roy considerably changed since the previous day. Nellie supposed it was his headache that made him look so pale and grave, and had brought a different look into his eyes from anything she had seen there before, whilst Mildred, who generally managed to get a general sort of idea as to what was going on in the house, attributed his changed looks to the interview he had had the previous day with their father. "Papa has been saying horrid things to him," she said to herself indignantly, "and Roy doesn't understand being talked to like that—he worries over it," and presently she said aloud in her quick, abrupt way,—

"You won't go away and leave us, will you, Roy?"

"No, Milly, I think I'm quite a fixture here for the present, unless your father and mother want to get rid of me. Why do you ask?"

"I thought papa had been cross to you. I was afraid perhaps you'd go. I know I should pretty soon run away from here if I were like you, and had another home to go to. This is a hateful place!"

Roy smiled a little, wistfully and sadly.

"If you were like me, Milly, you would find you hadn't much run left in you. Oh, no; there's no hope of getting rid of me quite so easily. I'm located here, I fancy, for a good spell."

Nellie's eyes fairly beamed with delight, whilst Mildred clapped her hands.

"Oh, Roy, we are so glad!" they both cried in a breath. "We don't want you ever to go away."

"That is very kind of you both," answered Roy, a little flush of pleasure stealing into his pale cheek. "We must manage to cheer each other up if we get dull, and make the winter days pass as pleasantly as we can. I shall have a lot of books sent to me here when Marcus gets back, for I must study hard so as to be fit for some calling or other when I am old enough to follow it. I will get him to send all my old story books and lesson-books too, for you, and some other things that you will like. He will be sure to do that, even though ——" Roy stopped short. His face grew suddenly very sad, but his listeners were too eagerly excited to heed it.

"Oh, Roy, you are nice! Oh, Roy, what fine times we shall have! It is so nice that you aren't going away! I hope you'll stay for ever and ever!"

Roy needed the consolation and pleasure communicated by the unrestrained delight of the little girls; for in truth the following days were sufficiently sad and dreary for him—all the drearier for the loss of physical strength which followed the shock of discovery, and for the want of the buoyancy of spirit that usually carried him over all troubles.

It seemed to him as if his former life had been utterly and entirely plucked up by the roots—that he himself had been suddenly transplanted into new and uncongenial soil, and that weak and bruised and battered, he was left to struggle with the elements, and to live or die as best he might, unaided and alone.

Yet, perhaps, this very sense of utter isolation was good for him; perhaps the very knowledge, at the time so inexpressibly bitter, was just the tonic he needed most to give to his easy, pliant nature that firmness and independence that hitherto it had undoubtedly lacked. Roy was much alone during the days that followed, for he was very unwell in himself, and Joan, who had constituted him as her special charge, insisted on his keeping quiet and not allowing the children to be perpetually about him, worrying him with their constant chatter and demands. Perhaps the boy had never had so much leisure for quiet thought and meditation in his life before, and perhaps he had never needed it so much. Gradually the sad dejected look passed away from his eyes, and his face, if graver and older in expression, was no longer very sorrowful. Joan noted the change with satisfaction if with surprise; and as his spirits improved so did his health, and she began to suggest to him that he need not keep himself quite so close a prisoner. He looked up with an odd smile.

"I do not consider myself a prisoner in any sense of the word. I have found the secret of perfect liberty, I think."

Joan was not certain if she understood him.

"Would you like to come out into the garden?" she asked. "It is warmer out of doors than in the house to-day when the sun shines."

"I should like a little walk very much," answered Roy, "especially if I can have my stick, and if you will come with me."

"Your stick is somewhere about. I'll get it for you," answered Joan, with alacrity; "and of course I'll come, if you like."

It was a new thing to feel herself wanted in any capacity save that of household drudge. There was something of brightness on her face, and of elasticity in her step, when at length she and her companion left the shadows of the desolate house and stepped out into the October sunshine.

Roy's progress was not rapid, as walking was evidently not easy to him; but he talked with cheerfulness as they wandered through the little enclosure graced by the name of garden, and only when they reached the low stone wall that divided it from the wide moorland beyond did silence fall upon him, as he stood bareheaded in the sunshine, lifting his face to meet the breeze as it blew across the trackless waste. Joan, glancing at him, saw something in his eyes that stirred her more than she liked. Anger, hatred, rebellion, she would have understood, but that sort of quietly-repressed sadness, blended with so much strength and resolution, perplexed and almost worried her. She felt that Roy's standpoint was one she could not reach, that he had thoughts and feelings beyond her ken. She wanted to know the secret of his resignation and endurance, and she knew not even how to frame the question.

Presently he aroused himself from his reverie, and sat down upon the low wall, looking round him with a sort of curiosity.

"And so you always live here, Cousin Joan?"

"Always now; ever since——"

"Ever since the ruin entailed upon your house by my father," concluded Roy quietly. "Yes, I know it was different before that. It must have been a strange hard life for you. Do you never go anywhere for a change or a rest?"

"Oh, no, I don't want those things. I'm not like—like other women—those I see in Thorne sometimes. I've plenty to do at home. I'm not dull; I'm used to it."

He looked at her, yet hardly as if he saw her.

"Always here, in this strange, lonely place? Cousin Joan, are you happy in your life?"

"Is any one happy?" she asked, not in any spirit of philosophical cynicism, but as the natural and literal expression of her feeling.

"Some people are," he said.

"Ah, well, perhaps so; I do not think I have ever seen them. Yet Cousin Alicia was; she seemed to have a secret of her own. I wonder what it was. Do you know, Roy?"

Roy had flushed at the sound of his mother's name (she would always be mother to him, despite the story he had heard), and he looked full at Joan, his hazel eyes lighting strangely.

"Cousin Joan," he said, with curious earnestness that was almost vehemence, "if you had asked me that question five months ago, I could not have answered you in the least; if you had asked it five weeks ago, I might have answered with my lips, but not with my understanding: even five days ago I could not have answered as I can to-day. But now I think—I believe that I do understand—that I do know her secret."

Joan looked at him with an uneasy sense of not comprehending or entering into his feelings. She longed to ask him more, yet knew not how to frame the question. A sort of unsatisfied yearning to which she had hitherto been a stranger took possession of her now. To rid herself of it she turned to another topic.

"How long are you going to stay here, Roy?"

"I do not know. So long, I suppose, as my guardian wishes."

"And do you mean to submit?" she asked, in a good deal of surprise.

"I do," he answered, resolutely.

She took a few paces away from him and then came back. She spoke with her abrupt vehemence.

"But, Roy, you must hate the life here; and it must be very bad for you too. You are as pale as a shadow and as thin. And you want to be with Marcus Stratford. We all know from your own lips how fond you are of one another, and what a lovely home you have. You must long to go back."

The mention of his brother's name brought a quiver to Roy's face, and a wistful sadness into his eyes. The truth was spoken almost before he knew it.

"Indeed—indeed I do!—sometimes."

She approached a step nearer—

"Then why don't you?"

He smiled a little half-sadly.

"I am not much in cue to meditate escape; and besides, law is law, and my guardian's control will not cease till I am of age."

"Three years of the life here will about kill you," said Joan, concisely. "You haven't been brought up to it, and you don't know what it is really like yet. You are not strong, and our cold winter months will be bad for you."

He looked her full in the face with a smile that expressed a good deal.

"What you have put up with all these years, Cousin Joan, I am surely able to stand for a much shorter time, if necessary. My father's act entailed this life upon you; is it for me to complain if your father wishes me to share it for awhile?"

Joan was silent a moment; she had used this argument herself sometimes, and had heard it used by others; yet from Roy's lips it seemed to sound different, to acquire a new significance. She looked away as she made reply—

"I don't see that that has really anything to do with it, and if you made up your mind to go, I don't believe they'd be able to keep you. People can't be too tyrannical in these days they say; and your brother would help you."

"I believe he would, if I asked him," answered Roy, quickly; "but I do not intend to do so. I am not his brother really in any sense of the word; and of late I have behaved very ill to him—more ill than he knows. I understand things better now than I did—I can see a great many points that puzzled me sadly before; but that only makes me feel more ashamed of myself for feeling and acting as I have done—feeling what I hate to think of now. I have no claim upon Marcus, and it may be good for me to be away from him for a time. I think perhaps—if it is not conceited to say so—that I am wanted here. After all, Cousin Joan, it is true what I have heard both my mother and Marcus say, that it is not where we are but what we are that constitutes our happiness or misery. I mean to stay at Windmill House and to be happy here—and I shall tell Marcus so, that he may not be troubled about me."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

So Roy settled down with brave resolution to the curious life led by his new relations. Roger Edington he hardly ever saw, and Roger's father never; but the mistress of the house was very fairly friendly towards him, was quite gracious to him when he tried to hint as delicately as he could that he hoped to have power in the future to do something towards counteracting the effects of the evil his father had done. She thought that he took the knowledge of the situation in the right way, and might very likely prove himself useful in time to come.

It never occurred to Roy that these relations of his looked upon him as a rich man—prospectively. He fancied they had known all about his mother's will from the hints they had dropped about Marcus; and although Roy thought he understood now his mother's motive in leaving her wealth away from him, it was not a subject he cared to discuss with others, and he did not care to think about it more than he could help; too many painful associations were connected with the matter. He was grateful for the good-will he received from his kinsmen, and was far from suspecting any motives of self-interest as actuating them. If there were some things in the past he did not quite understand, he did not trouble his head over them. It was only gradually he grew to understand that he was living amongst those whose main-spring of action was a greed of gold—a covetous desire for wealth, not for the sake of a wider sphere of usefulness, or even of power and social distinction, but a love of it for its own sake—a love that the boy had heard of, but never seen before. And he watched its development with a kind of subtle horror, impossible to describe; for he felt that there had been moments when this strange eagerness for wealth had taken possession of him—when he had felt that it was the great power of the world, and had experienced an intense longing for its possession. He recoiled now before some of the thoughts that once he had half-unconsciously harboured. He began to understand some of the teaching that had fallen once on somewhat heedless ears. He was learning and developing fast, and at the same time unconsciously helping others too. Even Mrs. Edington, who was slow to observe and slower to praise, could not but notice the improvement that was coming over the manner of her two daughters. Mildred actually and consciously studied and copied Roy, greatly admiring his manner and bearing as well as his gentle way of speaking, whilst Nellie, taking courage from his kindness to her, began to throw off the awkwardness that had resulted from excessive timidity.

Nellie was perhaps Roy's most constant companion, for her lameness prevented her getting about, very much as it did him, and she had a link of common interest with him that so far was not shared by Mildred. Nellie had taken Roy's advice, and had studied her Testament with great zeal and interest; but there was a very great deal in it that she did not understand, and often, if she could find Roy alone, she would ask him to explain these knotty points, and listen with close attention to his words, thinking all the time how very wise and good he was, and little dreaming that this simple examination and explanation of primary truths was doing almost as much for him as it was for her.

Nellie began to be very happy in these days. Life at Windmill House was changed for her even in the present, and with the wonderful future to look forward to, of the golden city, and the pearly gates, and the Lamb that is the light thereof, she felt that she never could be really miserable again.

She wondered if Aunt Joan knew about this too, but the child was too timid and felt too ignorant to open the subject herself. She thought it probable that Roy had talks himself with Aunt Joan just as he did with her, for those two were visibly growing friendly, and it was she who took most care of their guest.

Joan indeed felt that Roy needed her care, and she fought his battle vigorously. She insisted that he should be better cared for than her hardier cousins, and often contrived that he should have a fire in his room on cold nights, though it was an unheard-of luxury in that house. Roy, however, made something of a parlour of his bed-room, as he found getting up and downstairs a decided difficulty, and here he was often to be found on wet, cold evenings, sitting over a little fire with one or both of his cousins; and here Joan found him one stormy Sunday evening, very much engrossed in explaining to Nellie the pictures in an old Bible. She had been much moved of late out of her ordinary self, and now a sudden rush of feeling came over her that she found it difficult to master.

When Nellie had at last grown sleepy, and reluctantly gone to bed, she turned suddenly to Roy, and said: "Your mother used to teach me like that; but it has all gone now. Shall I ever be able to learn it again?"

"Oh, yes, Joan! It is never too late to learn that, as I have been finding out lately."

"Lately! But you must have known it always."

"Did I? It seems to me that I have only learned it since I came here."

"I don't see how that can possibly be, Roy. We couldn't have taught you anything."

"Something else has then," he answered with rather an odd smile. "I think I shall always be fond now of Windmill House."

"But are you not unhappy?"

"No, not now—not often," he answered quickly. "I was once for a time—after I had heard that story; but that is past now."

"I wish you would tell me what you mean," said Joan, in a very low voice.

"I don't know if I can; it would sound like cant I'm afraid."

"What does that matter? Tell me!"

"I'm not sure if you would understand. You have not lived as I have done, with everything you can wish for; love, health, happiness, all reasonable indulgences, a mother's tender care, friendship with comrades of your own age, everything that makes life easy and happy. That is the way I was brought up; and when my mother talked of sorrow and its discipline, I did not understand—I did not heed the lessons she tried to teach. Her death was my first trouble; but it did not do for me what sorrow does for some. I had lost her; but I had Marcus left, and I turned to him for what I had lost in her. I don't know if you will understand me, Joan, when I tell you that I have never been able to do without some one to lean on—some one to love and trust in, to go to for advice and help. I don't know if you have ever felt afraid of being left alone—not afraid physically, but morally. I have often; and after my mother died, I felt it more, because I let unworthy, ungenerous thoughts take possession of me, and I was afraid of them, afraid that they would prove too strong for me at last."

He paused a moment, and then went on rapidly: "I need not trouble you with all that, Joan. I see things clearly enough now. What I mean is that all these years I had never learned where to look for help and strength; I trusted in those about me, and never looked higher. It was not exactly that I did not know—you remember my mother; you know that she would teach me right—but I never took it home to myself; I was in no fear or difficulty. I did not think I should ever fall, or be afraid. I knew, but I would not learn; I turned from the higher to the lower until I deserved that He should turn from me. But He did not, Joan. He never does, I do believe, or why was not my careless neglect visited upon me? When everything and everybody seemed taken away, and I was left quite alone in my misery, and there was nothing left to me in all the world, then I turned to Him, and He heard. He has been with me ever since, I think; and that is why I am not unhappy, and why I can bear it, if He wishes it. I want to do His will now, if I can see it clearly—not my own any longer."

The boy's voice had sunk very low. Joan listened to him with a sort of awe that was not all comprehension.

"Who? Whose? What are you speaking of?" she asked. "Whose will are you going to do?"

"God's," he answered very softly, "if I can. If it is His wish that I should bear some small share of the cross Christ carried for us, He will help us with it, and I shall try to carry it gladly, for His sake."

"Oh, Roy, Roy!" cried Joan in sudden agitation and feeling; "teach me about that too! I do want to learn, I do, indeed; and it has all gone away. I am no better than a heathen."

"Perhaps we have been brought together that we may help and teach one another," said Roy, his voice quivering a very little. "It would make us both much happier, Joan, to think that."

THE RECENT EXPLOSION AT AMOY.

BY C. F. GORDON CUMMING.

A CATASTROPHE, probably unparalleled in the annals of destruction wrought by explosives, occurred on the 19th of November, on the island of Amoy (which forms part of the Fuh-Kien Province, on the South-West Coast of China). The city of Amoy has from early days been an important trading-centre, and was one of the first ports of commercial contact between China and the rest of the world. In the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the Portuguese, and then the Dutch, obtained a footing here, and after the war with China in 1841, Amoy was proclaimed a treaty port, and French and British subjects obtained the right to settle on the Island of Kulang-su, which is only separated from Amoy by a narrow strait.

Any one who has ever been in a vast crowded Chinese city can understand what an advantage to the foreign inhabitants is the isolation secured by that narrow strip of blue sea. On the one side are upwards of 100,000 Chinamen, closely packed within the confines of a walled city. On the other are the large luxurious homes of the foreign residents, scattered in the most pleasing manner amongst huge madder-coloured boulders and rock-masses, shaded by clumps of feathery bamboo, and the flowers and foliage of well-cultivated gardens in a semi-tropical climate. Naturally, in the scorching summer droughts, the land does acquire a sickly yellow tone; but in the cooler winter season, the island is comparatively green, and here and there a vividly verdant hillside shows where diligent husbandmen have laid out their terraced rice-fields.

Carriages and horses would be superfluous luxuries on the isle, or indeed, on the mainland. Since no carriage roads exist, and in a country where there are so many mouths to feed, it would be considered that horses were taking the bread of the strong patient coolies who are so ready and willing to carry the sedan chairs, which in China take the place of carriages. So on the isle every lady has her own chair and her bearers, and for those who have work in the great city, boats are ever in readiness to carry them and their chairs and bearers across the harbour.

Besides the foreigners who are here engaged in mercantile work, there are a considerable number of representatives of three great missionary societies—the London Mission, the English Presbyterian, and the American Methodist Episcopal, who find this city a convenient centre for work in the surrounding district; the island of Amoy being about ten miles in diameter, and dotted all over with little towns and villages, making up a population of about 250,000. This port having been one of the first to tolerate foreigners, early offered possibilities for commencing Christian work; but for some years, with such small result, that thirty years ago, the Amoy Missions could only reckon twenty converts. But, as is invariably the case in China, though the good seed sown seems to have died, some does eventually bear fruit an hundredfold, and each Chinaman who becomes a Christian (in the face of much persecution and contempt), invariably contrives to influence others to follow his good example, and so Amoy now numbers three thousand communicants, besides a much larger number who are receiving Christian teaching. I mention this because it must surely increase our interest in any place, to know that it is the home of so many of our fellow Christians.

As seen from the foreign settlement, the main isle is very picturesque. The city rises all up the side of a steep hill, and is encircled by a mighty wall, so broad that its summit affords a good paved roadway, by which one may walk round and obtain a fine general view of the densely crowded city. Walks, such as these, are a distinctive feature of most Chinese towns of any importance. Within them lies a labyrinth of dirty streets and markets, with bewildering crowds for ever hurrying to and fro; even the main streets are so narrow that it is a mystery how the traffic can be carried on without ceaseless collisions. But even the poorest people are so polite to one another, and so careful in their movements, that such accidents scarcely ever happen.

To a foreigner, each shop in a Chinese street presents some point of interest, were it only the extraordinarily gaudy tall sign-boards of all the little open shops, in which the patient shopkeepers sit awaiting custom. One of the special industries of Amoy is the manufacture of pretty little ornaments in bright coloured silk crape for ladies' heads. They are suggestive of birds or flowers, but entirely fanciful. Even the poorest women generally contrive to procure one or two of these to adorn their glossy black hair, which shines in the sunlight. One branch of this trade is the manufacture of artificial flowers for the family of the Emperor, not for their own adornment, but to offer at the tombs of the Imperial dead. Strange to say, our pretty custom of scattering flowers over graves, is in China a privilege reserved for the Imperial family, and they prefer artificial flowers to real ones. Every one else, from the highest noble to the poorest coolie, must be content to offer ornaments of red and white paper.

One thing which must strike the most casual observer in Amoy is the excellence of the fish-supply. Both river and sea-fish, salt and fresh, are conspicuous by their abundance, as is also the supply of bamboo oysters, so-called because they are artificially bred on this coast, where bamboo oyster-fields are prepared more carefully than any hop-field. Holes are bored in old oyster shells, which are then stuck into pieces of split bamboo, about two feet in length. These are planted close together on sand-flats between high and low water-mark, where strong tidal currents are said to bring the oyster-spat. Certainly the said spat is soon found adhering to the old shells, which in due time are covered with tiny oysters. The bamboos are then transplanted and set several inches apart; and within six months from the date when they were first planted, they yield a crop of well-grown oysters ready for the market. Not even the shells are wasted, for though Chinamen have learned to appreciate the luxury of transparent glass, a large number of oyster-shells are still scraped down till they are so thin as to be translucent, when, neatly fitted together (like the diamond-shaped panes in the casements of our ancestors), they form the ornamental windows in the inner courts of rich men's houses.

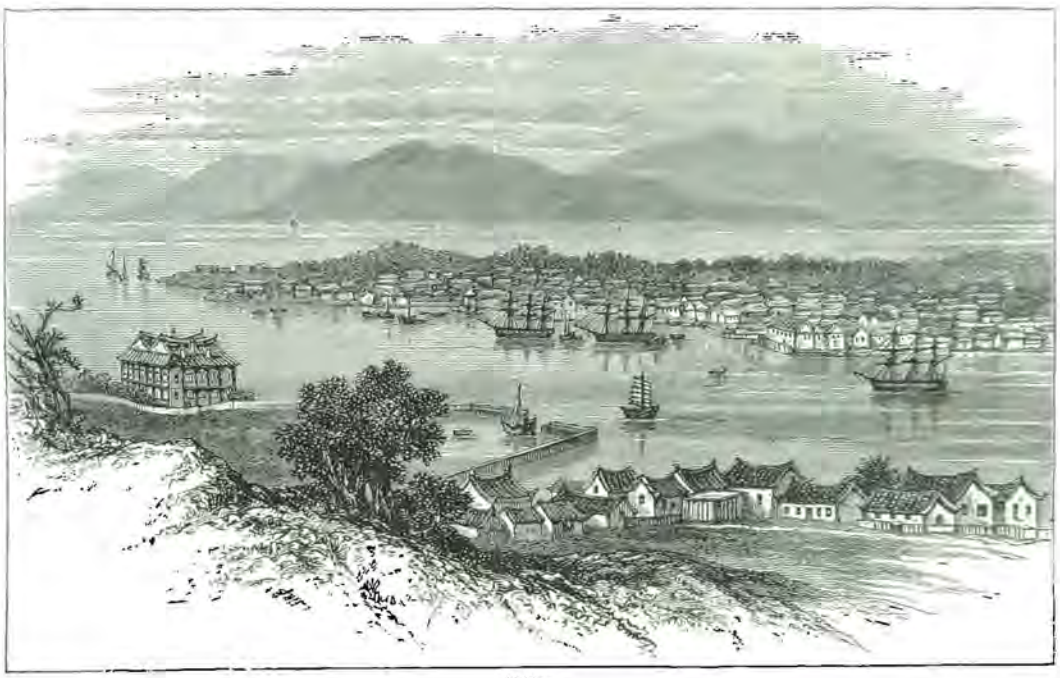
population is about the most decent and cleanly section of society in all Chinese towns.

Of course, the Citadel is a point of special interest, though to the foreigners its brave defenders are chiefly suggestive of burlesques and pantomimes, as they lounge about in picturesque groups, some armed with bows and arrows, some with spears, while others only carry small ornamental banners on tall flag-staffs. Some, indeed, carry rifles remarkable for their length; but the majority of the firearms seem to consist of old flint-lock guns, more likely to damage the bearer than his opponent. This is peculiar, as China has of late years purchased and manufactured enormous stores of first-rate arms of all sorts, and it is strange that her soldiers should not be provided with these.



AMOY.

The island itself seems built up of successive ranges of barren hills, strewn in every direction with huge boulders of dark-red rock, and a ridge of the same crests the sky-line. Nowhere else have I ever seen so many boulders—they really look as if they must have dropped from the clouds! All along the shore and up the hill-sides they lie, overshadowing small temples and shrines, and nameless graves and fine old trees. In some places they have fallen together so as to form caves, which are furnished with stone seats and tables, all ready for Chinese picnic parties.

One great ridge divides the town itself, and is strongly fortified (according to Chinese views of fortifications), many big guns commanding the harbour, which is crowded with quaint native junks, wonderful both in form and colour, and also with an incredible number of small boats, each of which is the only home of its proprietor with his wife and children, and probably his parents also. Strange to say, this great boat

Alas! these poor soldiers have learnt from terrible experience to what danger they are exposed from the stores of ammunition which their rulers have so diligently accumulated at various ports, ready to resist possible invaders. All unknown to the British residents on Kulang-su, a great powder magazine had been established just across the harbour, and therein were stored four hundred tons of gunpowder. On the 21st of November, just after luncheon, while all were going about their peaceful avocations in the calm sunny afternoon, suddenly an appalling and deafening roar rent the air; the isle rocked as if shaken by an earthquake, and almost every house was more or less damaged; some fell in ruins, and few escaped shattered doors and windows, and fallen ceilings. The wife of the English Consul writes that her first consciousness of the disaster was that immediately after the terrific report she was conscious that her hair and dress were covered with powdered glass, and then she realised that every pane of glass in the Consulate was shivered, the very window-frames being blown in, and every ceiling fallen.

Running out to learn the cause of the catastrophe, she saw dense volumes of thick smoke rising from the farther shore; then the wind blew the smoke towards the foreign settlement, darkening the heavens, and showering pieces of charred timber in every direction. This was the first intimation which residents in the Foreign Concession received of the fact that since the scare consequent on the bombardment of Foochow by the French, the Chinese had established a powder magazine just opposite to Kulang-su, and had there accumulated vast stores of ammunition. Happily the intervening strait greatly lessened the damage which would otherwise have been inevitable; but for that narrow strip of water, not a house would have remained standing in the Foreign Settlement.

The noise was followed by the momentary stillness of a people stunned and stupefied—and then there arose from the city the cries of maimed and terrified human beings in extremity of torture, or wildly wailing for the dead. How the calamity was caused can never be certainly known, for as the four hundred tons of gunpowder exploded they blew to atoms the forty-eight soldiers and the mandarin in charge of the magazine—besides killing or grievously injuring a multitude of peaceful people. There can be little doubt however that the aforesaid mandarin was the culprit, as he appears to have been in the habit of smoking while on duty in the magazine. On the day of the explosion he was superintending his men who were engaged in drying damp gunpowder, and current report affirms that even then his pipe was as usual alight.

In truth, one cannot but be struck by the pitiful lack of ordinary prudence in everything connected with this business, and especially in the selection of the site in this populous suburb of a great city. When this was chosen, four years ago by the The-tok (who unites the duties of Admiral and General at Amoy), the inhabitants ventured on strenuous remonstrances, but these were totally ignored; no wonder that when, after the explosion, this official visited the scene of the disaster, he was stoned by the survivors, and that his residence was mobbed by the homeless people.

Hundreds were more or less seriously wounded, either by the concussion, the falling of houses, or the bursting of shells, filled with four-pronged spikes of iron destined for invaders. These inflicted horrible laceration. As to the luckless soldiers, coolies were employed to go about with baskets collecting their arms and legs and other fragments.

As usual, one catastrophe leads to another, and the houses in falling scattered fire, which broke out simultaneously in several places, and fanned by a sharp breeze, spread rapidly, raging for nine hours; the conflagration extending over fully one-fourth of the city. All the Christian Missions have sustained more or less damage. One reports that the sun shines through the roof of its church. The Presbyterian chapel had the roof damaged and all the doors and windows driven in, but these seem trifles in its wonderful preservation from total destruction, as some houses near it were set on fire by a rocket, and almost all buildings in the neighbourhood were burned. Happily when destruction seemed most imminent, the wind blew the flames towards the sea, and the chapel was spared. The house of the London Mission in the Foreign Concession suffered severely, all its doors and windows having been torn from their hinges and hurled into the rooms, while ceilings fell in with a crash. Happily no lives were lost in the foreign settlement, but the damage and the loss of life in the city were very terrible.

HYMNS ON THE NEW JERUSALEM.

REFERENCE has already been made in recent papers[1] to the many hymns founded upon the closing chapters of the Apocalypse, and describing the heavenly state under the figure of the New Jerusalem. That this is not the only, or even the primary intention of the inspired prophetic delineation, we have also attempted to show; yet the application has many points of truth, and is endeared to the heart of Christendom. In mediæval times the image of heaven as a celestial city appears in more than one famous hymn, the chief of which is attributed by the late Archbishop Trench to the eighth or ninth century; entitled Hymnus in Dedicatione Ecclesiæ, consisting of eight three-lined stanzas, and a doxology, the first stanza beginning:

Urbs beata Hierusalem, dicta pacis visio,
Quæ construitur in cælis vivis ex lapidibus[1]
Et angelis coornata ut sponsata comite.

(Blessed city, Jerusalem, called "Vision of Peace," reared in the heavens of living stones, and adorned by angels as a betrothed with her spouse.)

The hymn in an altered form was introduced into the Roman Breviary; and metrical translations, or rather imitations of it, by Dr. Neale and by the present Archbishop of Canterbury, appear in several hymnals, each beginning:

Blessed city, heavenly Salem:

Dr. Benson's version having been composed for the dedication of Wellington College, in 1863. The Latin hymn itself, as we have seen, purports to have been written "for the dedication of a church;" at any rate, it is applied to such an occasion in its two concluding stanzas, descending from the thought of the spiritual city to that of the earthly temple.

[1] See SUNDAY AT HOME, July, 1887, p. 525.

[1] The whole hymn may be found in Daniel's Thesaurus Hymnologicus, vol. i., p. 239; see also vol. iv., p. 193.

How far the "Rhythm" of Bernard of Cluny in the twelfth century, from which we have Dr. Neale's "Jerusalem the Golden," was derived from the same source, it is impossible to say. The main intention of the two Latin poems is altogether different, Bernard's great theme being the contrast of this world's transitoriness and evil with the permanence and glory of the heavenly state.

Our own hymn, "Jerusalem, my happy home," comes to us from the Urbs beata, as imitated by a poet of the Elizabethan age, whose rugged but striking verses are given below. They are found in a MS. volume, in the British Museum (No. 15,225, "additional MSS."), small 4to, 124 pp., labelled "Songs MSS., Temp. Eliz.," without title, but with fly-leaf inscribed "Purchased at Bright's sale, 18 June, 1844. Lot 188." The volume contains thirty-six ballads and sacred poems, of a very miscellaneous description.[1] Among them is Sir E. Dyer's well-known poem:

My mind to me a kingdom is, with some variations from the current text.[2] Another poem is headed, "A dittie most excellent for every man to reade, that doth intend for to repent and to amend with spede. To the tune of a rich merchantman, or John come kiss me now." The longest piece in the volume is entitled "The Parliament of Devils"—a quaint, satirical production. There are no dates in the book, but it may be confidently assigned to the time of Queen Elizabeth or James I., two, at least, of the ballads ending with allusions to "the King;" and one of them mentioning "James" by name.

That the collection was made by some Romanist is tolerably clear. Two of the poems are connected with the name of John Thewlis, a Roman Catholic priest, put to death at Lancaster in 1616. Another places the mystery of transubstantiation among miracles to be believed. Yet, in general, among the devotional pieces there is no very pronounced doctrinal bias. The thought of the New Jerusalem is evidently one dear to the writer's mind, as, besides the poem which we quote in extenso, there are two upon the same theme, one of which is expressly entitled "A Prisoner's Song." We give a brief specimen:

The walls of jasper stone be built
Most rich and fair that ever was;
The streets and houses paved and gilt
With gold more clene than crystal glass:
Her gates in equal distance be,
And each a glistening margarite;
Which comers-in far off may see—
A gladsome and a glorious sight!

But the following is by far the most considerable poem on the subject. It occupies pp. 72–74 of the MS., and is headed "A Song, made by F. B. P., to the tune of Diana." The initials have been variously interpreted; but it seems most probable that they stand for "Francis Baker Porter," a Roman Catholic priest and author, who was imprisoned in the Tower in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.[1]

The hymn, in the form now given, remained long unknown, but a paraphrase of it by David Dickson, a distinguished Scottish minister and professor in the seventeenth century (d. 1663), became popular, being often printed in Scotland as a broadside. This version expands F. B. P.'s twenty-six stanzas into sixty-two, much of the quaint beauty of the hymn evaporating in the process. Dickson altered the first line to O mother dear, Jerusalem.

Dr. Horatius Bonar has printed the whole, with some interesting notes, in a little book entitled The New Jerusalem: a Hymn of the Olden Time.[2]

For the shorter version of the hymn, as contained in our hymn-books, we are probably indebted to the Rev. James Boden, of Eckington, near Chesterfield, at the beginning of the present century. At least, the earliest hymnal to which it can be traced is that made by Dr. Williams, of Homerton, and Mr. Boden, in 1801, as a supplement to Dr. Watts, in which this hymn is attributed to "The Eckington Collection," of which, however, nothing else is known. Burkitt, the Commentator, in 1693, had added to an abridged form of Dickson's hymn a verse which some hymnals still contain in a modified form:

Reach down, reach down thine arm of grace,
And cause me to ascend
Where congregations ne'er break up.
And sabbaths have no end.

We now give the hymn as it appears in the British Museum MS., with the anomalies in its antique spelling:

A Song mad by F. B. P. to the Tune of Diana.

Hierusalem, my happie home!
When shall I come to thee!
When shall my sorrowes have an end,
Thy joyes when shall I see?

O happie harbour of the saints!
O sweete and pleasant soyle!
In thee noe sorrow may be founde,
Noe greefe, noe care, noe toyle.

In thee noe sickenesse may be seene,
Noe hurt, noe ache, noe sore;
There is noe Death, nor uglie Devill,
There is life for evermore.

Noe dampish mist is seene in thee,
Noe could, no darksome night;
There everie soule shines as the sunne,
There God himselfe gives light.

There lust and lukar cannot dwell,
There envie beares noe sway;
There is noe hunger, heate, nor coulde,
But pleasure everie way.

[1] See Leisure Hour, March 20, 1862, p. 189: "A Scrap-book of the Olden Time."

[2] See Ward's English Poets, vol. i., p. 377.

[1] This is the view of the late Mr. D. Sedgwick, the well-known hymnologist. Others construe the initials "Francis Baker, Priest." See Anglican Hymnology, by the Rev. James King, M.A., p. 87

[2] See also Sunday at Home, Nov. 28, 1861, p. 763: "Songs of the New Jerusalem."

Hierusalem! Hierusalem!
God grant I once may see
Thy endlesse joyes; and of the same
Partaker aye to bee.

Thy wales are made of pretious stones,
Thy bulwarkes Diamondes square;
Thy gates are of right Orient pearle,
Exceedinge riche and rare.

Thy terrettes and thy pinacles
With carbuncles doe shine;
Thy verie streets are paved with gould,
Surpassinge cleare and fine.

Thy houses are of Ivorie,
Thy windoes cristale cleare,
Thy tyles are mad of beaten gould,
O God! that I were there.

Within thy gates nothinge doeth come
That is not passinge cleane,
Noe spider's web, noe durt, noe dust,
Noe filthe may there be seene.

Ah! my sweete home, Hierusaleme,
Would God I were in thee!
Would God my woes were at an end,
Thy joyes that I might see.

Thy saints are crownd with glorie great,
They see God face to face;
They triumph still, they still rejoyce,
Most happie is their case.

Wee that are heere in banishment,
Continuallie doe mourne;
We sighe and sobbe, we weepe and weale,
Perpetually we groane.

Our sweete is mixt with bitter gaule,
Our pleasure is but paine;
Our joyes scarce last the lookeing on,
Our sorrowes still remaine.

But there they live in such delight,
Such pleasure and such play,
As that to them a thousand yeares
Doth seeme as yeaster day.

Thy viniardes and thy orchardes are
Most beutifull and faire;
Full furnished with trees and fruits,
Most wonderfull and rare.

Thy gardens and thy gallant walkes
Continually are greene;
There groes such sweete and pleasant flowers
As no where else are seene.

There is nectar and ambrosia made,
There is muske and civette sweete;
There manie a faire and daintie Drugge
Are troden under feete.

There cinomon, there sugar groes,
There narde and balme abound;
What tounge can tell, or hart containe,
The joyes that there are found?

Quyt through the streetes with silver sound,
The flood of life doe flowe;
Upon whose bankes on everie syde,
The wood of life doth growe.

There trees for evermore beare fruite,
And evermore doe springe;
There evermore the angels sit,
And evermore doe singe.

There David stands with harpe in hand,
As master of the Quoere;
Tenne thousand times that man were blest
That might this musique heare.

Our Ladie singes magnificat.
With tune surpassinge sweete,
And all the virginns beare their parts
Siting above her feete.

Te Deum doth sant Ambrose singe,
Saint Augustine dothe the like;
Ould Simeon and Zacharie
Have not their songes to seeke.

There Magdalene hath left her mone,
And cheerefullie doth singe
With blessed saints, whose harmonie
In everie street doth ringe.

Hierusalem, my happie home!
Would God I were in thee!
Would God my woes were at an end,
Thy joyes that I might see!

Finis. Finis.

We cannot conclude this paper without referring to another hymn on the same fruitful theme, which may also have been suggested by F. B. P. and David Dickson, but which has some pathetic touches of its own. Samuel Crossman, the author, was prebendary of Bristol (d. 1683). His hymn, in parts, is found in many modern collections; Lord Selborne seems to have first drawn attention to it in an address at York 1866, when the hymn was sung by the choir with great effect. We give a few of the less familiar verses:

The stranger homeward bends,
And fighteth for his rest:
Heaven is my home, my friends
Lodge there in Abraham's breast.
O happy place! when shall I be,
My God, with Thee, to see Thy face?

Earth's but a sorry tent
Pitched for a few frail days,
A short-leased tenement:
Heaven's still my song, my praise.
O happy place! when shall I be,
My God, with Thee, to see Thy face?

No tears from any eyes
Drop in that holy choir;
But Death itself there dies,
And sighs themselves expire.
O happy place! when shall I be,
My God, with Thee, to see Thy face?

There should temptations cease,
My frailties there should end;
There should I rest in peace
In the arms of my best Friend.
O happy place! when shall I be,
My God, with Thee, to see Thy face?

Jerusalem on high!
My song and city is,
My home whene'er I die,
The centre of my bliss:
O happy place! when shall I be,
My God, with Thee, to see Thy face?

MEDITATION. [After Robert Beyschlag.

THE PARABLES OF OUR LORD.

BY HESBA STRETTON.

A FEW SHORT PARABLES.

A FEW short parables will form the subject of this paper: parables which do not contain any sort of story, as so many of the others do, though in each of them there is a hidden meaning, which teaches us what the kingdom of God is like. Where a king reigns he makes laws for his kingdom; and these short parables contain some of God's laws for His kingdom, both in the world and in our own hearts.

The parable of the Mustard-seed we find in Matt. xiii. 31, placed there as if our Lord spoke it immediately after the parable of the Tares. But in Luke xiii. 18, it seems as if He had spoken it in one of the synagogues on a Sabbath day, after He had healed a poor woman, who for eighteen years had been bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself. The ruler of the synagogue was filled with indignation, and reproached the people for coming to be healed on the Sabbath day; whereupon our Lord rebuked him so sharply that he and all the other adversaries were ashamed; and the people rejoiced for all the glorious things that were done by Jesus Christ.

It is quite likely that our Lord uttered many of His parables more than once, when different people were listening to His teaching; but both in Matthew and Luke this parable of the Mustard-seed, and the next parable of the Leaven, seem to be spoken more to His foes than to His friends. They are a prophecy of how great the kingdom of God would become, though, when He spoke, it was like a grain of mustard-seed, and a little lump of leaven.

"As small as a grain of mustard-seed" was a common proverb among the Jews, and meant that it was so little as to be next to nothing. It was the smallest of all the seeds that men took the trouble to sow; nothing more trifling was worth their care. Yet, from this tiny, insignificant seed, there sprang a herb that sometimes grew as tall as one of the lower kinds of trees; it became the greatest among all herbs, with branches that could bear the weight of the birds that came to feed on its clusters of seed. Even when growing wild this mustard-plant attains the height of ten feet; but if planted in cultivated ground, such as a garden of herbs, it might be expected to grow into a "great tree," and shoot forth large branches.

The special point of this similitude to the kingdom of God is the exceeding smallness of the seed, and the greatness of the plant springing from it. Our Lord's disciples were probably disheartened by the parables they had just heard. In the parable of the Sower only a quarter of the good seed sown had brought forth fruit; and in the parable of the Tares they heard of a cunning and diligent enemy, busily sowing poisonous seeds in the same ground as the good seed. The constant opposition of the scribes and Pharisees to their Master discouraged them; and now He Himself had spoken parables which seemed to damp their hopes. But this parable was full of certain triumph.

One grain of mustard-seed a man took—not a handful: one grain which he could hardly see or grasp, and sowed it in his garden; and this tiny, almost invisible, grain sprang up into a "great tree." In his garden he planted it—not a field which is ploughed, and sown, and then harrowed, and left, till the harvest is ripe—but in a garden, where men walk to and fro daily, watching the growth of their herbs and fruits, and guarding them against blight and injury. The kingdom of God was like this.

So, when the hour came when our Lord should be crucified, it was like the single grain being sown in the garden of the world. His crucifixion seemed so trivial and insignificant an event that none of the great people of the earth took notice of it; it was similar to the death of thousands upon thousands of other men. But from that single death has sprung the great all-embracing religion of Christianity, which will some day draw every man under the shadow of its branches, where he will be safe from all tyranny and evil. In the meanwhile God watches the growth of this kingdom, as a man watches the growth of the plants in his garden.

Our own souls, also, may be likened to the garden of the Lord; each of them may be a "little spot of heavenly ground." One seed planted by God's hand there will become a great tree, and will bear fruit, which will satisfy all our hungering and thirsting after righteousness. A tiny seed of patience will grow into great long-suffering; the smallest seed of love will spring up into a far-reaching lovingkindness, which will care for all living beings. Nor shall we finish all our growth here. Through all the endless ages which lie before us, we shall make new discoveries of fresh fruit on the tree of life. "To him that overcometh," says our Lord, "will I give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the Paradise of God."

THE PARABLE OF THE LEAVEN.

VERY similar to the insignificant, common-place act of a man sowing seed in his garden is the everyday household duty of a woman making bread. Our Lord often saw His mother and her neighbours making bread for their families. He and His family were poor people, and kept no servants. The corn had first to be ground into flour between two large and heavy stones, and only women and slaves were ever employed in this hard work, which was considered too menial for men. But I like to think that He Who took upon Himself the form of a bond-servant, or slave, did often share His mother's hard and tedious labours.

When the corn was ground the flour and water were first mixed together into a thick paste; and then a lump of old dough from the last baking, in a high state of fermentation, was hidden in the midst of it. The flour and water could be baked into unleavened cakes, but when once the leaven had penetrated into the paste, it was absolutely impossible to separate it again. It was a slow process, and the mass of kneaded flour and water, with the lump of leaven in the midst, was usually left to work during the night.

The thought of a kingdom of God upon earth was not a new one; it was common among the Jews from their earliest history. Christ took it, as the woman took the old piece of dough, and hid it in the great unleavened mass of the heathen world. He gave to the world the idea of a kingdom of righteousness, which should be in the heart, not in outer forms of worship: hidden, not seen, until it has so leavened the whole nature that righteousness cannot be separated from it. This process is extremely slow, but it is going on, and there is a desire for a universal reign of righteousness and peace. We are still in the darkness of the night, but the morning must come when all the world will be the kingdom of God.

The three measures of meal have by some been referred to the three continents then known to man—Europe, Asia, and Africa, or Libya, over which the Romans had extended their victories. All these countries were heathen, the Jewish nation alone possessing a knowledge of the true God. From that little land of Palestine, where our Lord lived and died, the doctrines of Christianity have spread, and are still spreading throughout the world. The customs and maxims of every nation are influenced by Christianity; and, in proportion as the power of the Gospel is felt, they become altogether purer, and higher, and better, just as leavened bread is lighter, more pleasant, and more wholesome than unleavened bread.

But in the three measures of meal we may also see the deeper and more personal meaning of the body, mind, and spirit of man. Christ may hide the leaven of His life and His Spirit in our hearts; and it will work within us until every thought and feeling of our spirits, every thought of our minds, and every action of our bodies, are brought into harmony with the will of God.

"The kingdom of God is within you," says our Lord. No outward forms, no mere worship in words, are of any avail; they will not satisfy either God or ourselves. The leaven must be hidden in our inmost natures, and must work through to the outward and visible signs of our characters. Only in this are we different from the mass of unleavened dough into which the woman put the leaven: we may resist having the leaven hidden in our hearts. It is necessary for us to yield ourselves to the influence of God's Holy Spirit.

Many a man who had listened to the parable of the Mustard-seed would think of it as he walked to and fro in his garden in the cool of evening, wondering what the Teacher meant when He spoke it. Many a poor toil-worn woman, as she kneaded the bread for her household, would remember what the Master had said in her hearing about the leaven hidden in the meal; and, though she might not understand its meaning, the very thought of Jesus Christ and of the kingdom of God would do her good, and make her work seem lighter. The kingdom of God was like unto these simple, common, everyday things, and suited to working-people; it was no far-off, great, and splendid kingdom, with which only the learned, and the rich, and the noble had to do.

SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. IV.—THE TABERNACLE.

1. How would you describe the tabernacle?

2. What were the chief objects in it?

3. Various names are used in speaking of it. Find texts as follows:—

   a. Two in which it is called a house.
   b. Two in the Revised Version, where it is called a tent.
   c. Two in the Old Testament, and one in the New, where it is called a sanctuary.
   d. Two in which the word temple is used to describe it.

4. Find two passages where it is called the tabernacle of witness, and give the reason why it should be so called.

5. Which of the early Christians refers to it under this name?

6. On one occasion Moses called it the tabernacle of the congregation. What word has the R.V. substituted for congregation, and why is it more appropriate?

7. Where was the tabernacle set up after the people entered Canaan?

8. Whose early life was spent mostly in the service of the tabernacle?

9. Whither was it removed afterwards, and by whom?

10. What saying of David's refers to the tabernacle, and what purpose of his does it indicate?

11. Why was he not allowed to carry out his purpose?

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. III.—p. 206.—1 Sam. xvi. 13.

"Then Samuel took the horn of oil, and anointed him (David) in the midst of his brethren: and the Spirit of the Lord came upon David from that day forward. So Samuel rose up and went to Ramah."

(1) 1 Sam. xvi. 4-13; (2) 8-13; (3) xvii. 28; (4) xvi. 10, 11; (5) 13; (6) xix. 18; (7) Heb. xi. 32; (8) 1 Sam. iii. 13, 18; xv. 19; (9) 2 Sam. xii. 7-9; (10) 1 Sam. viii. 3; 2 Sam. xv. 6, 10; (11) 1 Sam. xv. 33; (12) xxvii. 8-12; (13) Judges iv. 5; (14) 1 Sam. xvi. 13; (15) Num. xxvii. 18; 1 Sam. x. 10; Judges xiii. 25; (16) 1 Sam. ii. 18, 19; (17) xvi. 23, 1, 18, 4, 13, 14, 4, 11, 1, 18, 2, 19, 20, 13, 20; (18) xvi. 13.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE Sunday Recreations of the Rich were the subject of a memorial recently presented to the Upper House of Convocation by the Lord's Day Observance Society. When the subject came up for discussion the Bishop of London said he thought the allegation of the memorial was true—that there had been of late a very marked increase in the employment, by the upper classes of society, of the afternoon and evening of the day for amusements of various kinds; but that this change had been quietly taking place over a number of years, and was more conspicuous in London than elsewhere, only by reason of the facilities afforded, and the concentration of gaieties within the brief summer season. The Bishop of Exeter believed there were a good many earnest people who continued to keep the English Sabbath, but said there was especial danger in the present day of "not giving sufficient quietness and thought to the higher concerns of life." The Bishop of Winchester said that as regarded the working classes, the large immigration of foreigners had tended to diminish the popular respect for the day. After some further discussion, the following resolution was adopted: "The attention of the Upper House of Convocation having been directed to the discontinuance of Sunday observation, which appears to have increased of late years, even amongst those who have fullest leisure on other days, and with a consequent increase of Sunday labour, the House deems it to be its duty to appeal to the clergy, to all instructors of the young, and to all who exercise influence over their fellow men, not to suffer the church and the country to lose the priceless benefits of the rest and sanctity of the Lord's Day. Its reasonable and religious observation is for the physical and moral health of all ranks of the population, and to it our national well-being has been largely due." As to the actual state of things, the "Standard," as a secular newspaper, may perhaps be accepted as an authority. "Theatrical performances, comic recitations, exhibitions of jugglery, lawn tennis, and carpet dances are all ways of spending Sunday afternoon or evening which, in a preceding generation, would have shocked even those amongst us who were not considered exceptionally straight-laced. The spectacle now to be witnessed at Maidenhead Bridge on a Sunday afternoon in summer would never have been tolerated thirty years ago. And only people of very doubtful reputation would have ventured in the brilliant four-in-hands which, covered with elegantly-dressed ladies, can now be seen, Sunday after Sunday, driving down to some suburban resort. The change is certainly not for the better. Whether there are persons to be found who can share in these Sunday gaieties without violence to the sentiments of the day, or any forgetfulness of the duties of which it is meant to be a reminder, we will not undertake to pronounce, though we have a strong opinion on the subject. But thus much may be said, at all events, without fear of contradiction, that if such pleasure-seekers do not injure themselves by the practices to which we refer, they most indisputably cause harm to other people. Such amusements cannot be enjoyed without compelling servants, hotel-keepers, tradespeople, artists, and a host of others to take part, whether they like it or not, in these very equivocal entertainments." The causes of this change may be easily suggested; the consequences that must follow any general movement in this direction are not less apparent. But similar practices have prevailed before, and were checked by the revival of spiritual religion; and this is still the surest weapon against every kind of worldliness.

"THE Dictionary and Grammar of the Congo Language, as spoken at San Salvador," compiled and prepared for the Baptist Mission by the Rev. W. Holman Bentley, must be ranked among the missionary achievements of the past year. It is a volume, every page of which testifies to the industry and ability of the compiler. Future years will be indebted to it, and it will remain as one more evidence of the manifold services rendered by missionary enterprise to civilisation. It bears the following dedication: "This work, undertaken solely in the service of the King of kings, is most respectfully dedicated to His Majesty Leopold III., King of the Belgians, and Sovereign of the Congo Free State, by His Majesty's gracious permission."

When Mr. Comber, in 1879, arrived on the Congo with three helpers, of whom Mr. Bentley was one, the party settled for a while at San Salvador, where they had to build their own house. As a rule, they were hard at work from six o'clock in the morning till sundown, and in the evening they had to teach some of the lads of the town, who would not wait till the building was over. Amid all this work and travelling they made their first study of the language, having nothing to help them beyond a short vocabulary of some forty or fifty words. "The elder sons of the king, and one or two others, possessed some knowledge of Portuguese; they helped us," says Mr. Bentley, "in our early palavers, and occasionally gave us some words; but they had their own business affairs, and could not give us much time. The children, however, were always at hand, and words could be caught more easily from them, as they articulated more distinctly. Every word gained was noted, entered in our memorandum books, and in the evening we each reported to the other all that had been acquired, and further discussed the new words. Our vocabulary steadily increased as we talked or played with the children, or initiated our scholars into the mysteries of reading and writing. The alphabet was arranged, and the force of letters decided upon. Some words were gained as we worked with the men who helped us in building our houses, timber cutting, quarrying limestone, or in cutting the canoe to transport the stone to the holes in which the Portuguese had burnt their lime long ago. Also when travelling, or doctoring the sick, we collected words, and thus added daily to our lists."

So year by year the stores of knowledge increased, and opportunities of comparison came with the exploration of the country. After five years spent abroad, Mr. Bentley (whose contributions to our pages readers will remember) returned home for a time, and devoted himself to the preparation of this dictionary and to the work of translation, in aid of the mission. He was hindered by the temporary loss of sight, and prolonged ill health, but persevered, and by the aid of his wife, during the time of his blindness was enabled to complete his task.

The Congo language takes its place by the side of the Swahili, the Zulu, and the Pongwe, as one of the typical languages of the Bantu family. "Although the Bantu people," writes Mr. Bentley, in explanation, "present to the casual observer no appreciable physical difference from what is known as the Negro race, being similar in colour, hair, etc., and sharing the same superstition as to witchcraft, etc., they are in language as widely distinct as it is possible to conceive. It is a recognised fact, that the Bantu and Negro families of languages are as far apart from each other as from the Aryan, Semitic, or Ural-Altaic. Indeed, the natives of the Cameroons, and those on the Niger River, although living so near together, have no more in common, as far as the language is concerned, than they have with English and Chinese. While the family likeness in radical, grammatical, and syllabic construction is easily distinguished in Bantu tribes, however remote from each other, there cannot be found a trace of such resemblance between the two frontier peoples above referred to, either in roots, in general grammatical rules, or even in construction of syllables; and these two samples of the two great races, taken from places so near to each other, may be, without hesitation, regarded as types." Thus much for the language and people among whom Mr. Bentley is now once again actively engaged.

THE Archbishop of Dublin, preaching in London on behalf of the Spanish and Portuguese Church Aid Society, said a great spiritual work was being wrought out in Spain and Portugal, which when we remember the difficulties with which it has had to contend can only be ascribed to the influence of that Holy Spirit by whom the whole body of the church is sanctified and governed. "This work is in a land where we should least expect to find it, in the land

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

BY E. EVERETT GREEN, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S BROTHERS," ETC.

CHAPTER XXXV.—LESSONS.

"HUBERT'S BOY."

AFTER that wet, dreary Sunday evening, a new life seemed to open out before Joan Edington. That first talk with Roy, when the veil of reserve had been fairly drawn aside, was followed by many more, and two young spirits, more or less weighed down by despondency and doubt, were brought closer together in warm human comradeship, whilst they helped each other upwards and onwards along the path that both desired to tread.

Nothing could have been better for Roy at this juncture of his life than the spiritual hunger his words had aroused in his cousin Joan. Roy had been learning many lessons of late, and had been developing with unconscious rapidity. The sudden break in the quiet monotony of his life, and the strange revelations that had come one after another upon him, had all done their work in moulding his character and bringing out the stuff of which it was made. Temptation was not altogether new to him. He had had many battles of late with unworthy thoughts and suspicions, and, on the whole, he had triumphed over these successfully. He had never harboured for long any mean distrust or thought of jealous covetousness, and if his victories had not been won in the best strength, still they had been won, and his mind was braced to resist evil as it had not been in the happier times when all had been smooth and easy before him. Since those days of severe illness, when in his hours of weakness he had clung to his brother as if for salvation itself, and had been gently taught to look elsewhere for greater help and strength, the boy had known many earnest thoughts and strivings. He had been taught his own weakness in full measure, and many, many times had he called to mind Marcus's words of brotherly counsel, and had repeated to himself his warning that sometimes in very love the props in which we trusted are taken away, that our hearts may be drawn upwards, where true support is always to be found.

All this came back upon Roy when he found himself alone indeed. It was then, in his desolation and misery, in his aching longing for counsel and help and strength, that the poor boy thought of all he had been told—lessons that had hitherto fallen on half unheeding ears —and learned for himself the truth those words contained. Trusting, frank, and loving, he had no doubts to hold him back, and his indifference had all melted in this hour of extreme need. Almost in despair, he turned at first to the Stronghold which had sheltered so many others before him, and he found with a sort of wondering joy and gratitude that it was open, also, to him.

Those days, therefore, outwardly so peculiarly desolate, were full of strange chastened happiness to the lonely boy. It seemed to him that almost in proportion as he learned himself outcast, orphaned, and desolate, the wings of the Everlasting Love folded more closely about him; and if he had something to bear from the memory of Roger's cruel taunts and cutting reproaches; if the knowledge that his father had brought shame upon himself and ruin upon others pierced him to the heart, as much as did the realisation that he had never really known a mother's love—that she whom he had so fondly cherished was no blood relation of his own; yet there was strange, sweet consolation in the sense that one Father was watching over him yet, and that nothing could ever sever him from that sonship or that eternal all-knowing love and pity. It gave him strength and resolution to bear all, and to bear it patiently. Was it not an honour to be called on to suffer even a little, where Christ had suffered so much?

But as we all know so well this first sense of exultation and elevation of spirit is but too likely to be followed by a reaction in proportion to its intensity. Deep and sincere as our devotion may be, human nature will assert itself, and a time of depression or deadness follow upon any severe strain of feeling. But Roy was saved from this most trying fall by Joan's sudden call upon his help. She appealed to him to teach her what he had but just learned himself, and in leading another darkened soul into the light that had shone upon his own path, Roy learned a deeper and more earnest trust, and took an ever closer hold upon the truth that had suddenly become so much to him.

He had other lessons too to learn in those days—lessons of patience, kindliness and forbearance that had never been brought before him quite in the same way before. Mrs. Edington, who was anxious (to use a common phrase) to get out of Roy as much as she could, and make him worth his keep, suggested to him, that he could not better employ his leisure hours than by instilling into the hard heads of her unruly boys some of that elementary knowledge of Latin and Greek and mathematics of which they stood so sadly in need. Archie and Dick had been educated in a most casual and hap-hazard fashion. Joan had taught them to read and write and cypher when they were little fellows, and they were still driven to the school-room sometimes to be instructed in history, geography or grammar; but they were so noisy and unruly that no way was ever made with them, and though Roger professed sometimes to give them a little classical teaching, the amount learned was practically nothing.

It cannot be said that Roy was exactly elated at the prospect of becoming tutor to these two young ruffians; but when he reflected why it was that they had never been to school or had proper instruction at home, he felt that he ought to be more than willing to do everything in his power for them, and at least to put them in the way of acquiring knowledge themselves.

He easily obtained the requisite books from the Hermitage and set himself to work with great good will to the task. He was used to boys and their ways, having been educated by Mr. Kynaston with his own sons, but never in all his life had he come across boys like these.

For the first few mornings the novelty of the thing kept the youngsters tolerably amenable, and Roy made everything as easy and interesting as possible; but when once learning with Roy had ceased to be a sort of new game to play, they became entirely and hopelessly unmanageable—shouted, laughed, flung about their books, played all kinds of practical jokes upon their young tutor, and if called to order or seriously remonstrated with, set him at open defiance.

Roy was too young to have any moral authority, and too weak and lame to be able to exert any of the physical power of compulsion that would have produced some good effect upon boys of this calibre. The whole thing was such a farce that at the end of ten days he told Mrs. Edington plainly it was useless attempting the task; but he found to his dismay that she was entirely of a different opinion. They were so used to this kind of behaviour on the part of the boys that nobody in the house thought anything of it. "You will get them into shape in time," was the encouraging answer he got, "you must have a little patience and perseverance."

Roy set his teeth and braced himself up to the task, resolved that nothing should make him complain, but his daily battles with his refractory pupils became a source of dread to him, and he really had not the strength to cope with them or to stand the strain and the fatigue. Things were just a little better when Mildred got leave to join the "boys' classes," for she was intelligent and liked the novelty of learning Latin, and "doing sums with x's and y's and z's" as she called it, or grappling with the eccentricities of the Greek alphabet. She set a good example to the boys, and if they did not follow it, at least Roy had the satisfaction of one amenable pupil, and Mildred was willing to assist him in enforcing order in a fashion that was sometimes more effective than orthodox; but the long hours and the perpetual struggle told perceptibly upon Roy, and if he did not complain or give in, it was only because he was learning patience and perseverance in a more practical form than he had ever been called upon to do before, and because he was very wishful to learn the lesson to some purpose.

Yet all the same he was very thankful to hear a piece of news with which Mildred came flying to the schoolroom one day about the middle of October.

"Oh, do listen, everybody! Such a thing is going to happen! Our Aunt Julia, you know, mamma's sister, who went to India when she married, and has always been there since, has come back for six months, and has taken a house in London, and she wants mamma and papa and all of us to go and see her and her children, and she'll pay all the expenses, and mamma says she thinks she shall take all, all four of us, I mean, not Aunt Joan and not Roy. I'm sorry Roy isn't to come, but of course Aunt Julia doesn't know anything about him, and we're to stay a week, and perhaps longer, and I think it will be lovely, if only those horrid boys will not go and spoil everything by their disgusting ways."

Mildred gabbled off this astonishing piece of news all in a breath, and of course an immense hubbub arose instantly. The boys jumped about and made a fearful uproar, whilst little Nellie shrank nearer to Roy and looked more frightened than pleased.

"I think I'd rather stay at home with Roy."

"Oh, but you can't," cried Mildred. "Mamma says perhaps she shall take you to a doctor to see if he can make you better, and, besides, Aunt Julia has never seen us, and she particularly wants us all to come. Mamma will have to get us a new frock each—she said so, and mine is to be longer, down to the top of my boots, and perhaps I shall do up my hair if I know a nice way of doing it. I wish you had some sisters, Roy; perhaps then you would be able to tell me how."

Roy laughed at that, but he entered with great zeal into all the preparations, and was not at all sorry to think of the holiday he should himself have during their absence. He was anxious to be prosecuting his own interrupted studies; but after his hours of teaching he had so little strength or energy left that he could seldom manage anything that wanted steady thought: and he was more disposed to read a story book to the children than to study himself.

Mrs. Edington gave Joan a good many cautions not to be wasteful in her absence, or to pamper Roy too much. She did not see why the study should not be made into the general sitting-room, and Joan said she did not see why not either. It was by far the warmest and pleasantest room in the house, and would be much better for Roy. Nothing kept the biting east wind out of the lad's room, and if only she could persuade her father to get over his repugnance to seeing the boy, she felt sure he would take to him, as the rest of them had done. She would be very glad indeed if she could conquer this unreasonable prejudice, as she believed that Roy would do her father good, as he had done good to her.

A few days of bustle and hard work followed, and then came the noisy start of a family unaccustomed to travel. Joan and Roy watched the departure of the party with mixed feelings, but for the present, in the minds of both, relief preponderated over everything else.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—THE GREAT-UNCLE.

JOAN said nothing to Roy of what was in her mind; but she had plans of her own working in her head, and she was resolved that this interlude of quiet and loneliness should be made a sort of holiday to those left behind at Windmill House.

Pinching, economical ways might in the main be necessary, but she knew that the household funds had lately been considerably augumented, and she was determined that her father and Roy should profit to a certain extent by the windfall. She began to suspect that a more rigid economy than was needful was enforced; she did not resent this on her own account, but her father was growing old, and somewhat enfeebled, and could stand asceticism less well than of yore, whilst Roy was getting visibly more pale and thin, and falling into a languid state that indicated, even to Joan's inexperienced eyes, a marked retrogression in health. He never complained, but she knew that he felt the cold severely, by the way in which he would hobble down to the fires, whenever he could; but the last few days he had not appeared downstairs much, and she was certain that his foot was worse, and that he was afraid of the stairs.

The first thing that she did therefore after Roger's departure, was to get up a cheery fire in her father's study, and the next was to fetch Roy from his cold, cheerless room, and establish him in an arm chair on the opposite side of the hearth.

The old man had not heard their entrance. He was seated before his secretary, and was deeply engrossed in some calculations before him. His hearing was not very acute, and he never heeded Joan's comings and goings. Roy sat very still, enjoying the warmth and comfort, and rather excited by the success of Joan's schemes of introduction, and he studied the face of the old man, seen in profile as he sat, with great interest and intentness. It was a fine face he thought. Joan had evidently inherited her broad brow and good features from him, and the harsh lines indicative of cupidity and avarice were not visible just now. Roy wondered if this oblivion of his presence were studied or not, wondered what kind of a greeting he might presently expect, but he was too languid to care very much, as he had been too languid to resist the intrusion insisted on by Joan; and very soon the unwonted sense of luxury and well-being produced its natural effect upon his weakened frame, and Roy who seldom slept well at nights now, disturbed as he was by a harassing cough and an aching foot, fell sound asleep in his chair by the fire.

Presently Andrew Edington put away his book with a great sigh, and turned round to the glow of the fire. Then it was he saw the slight figure opposite, lying back in the great easy chair, the thin white face plainly visible in the flickering fire-light, the whole attitude of the sleeper betraying the abandonment of absolute repose and unconsciousness. The old man started violently, and caught the arms of his chair.

"Joan!" he whispered hoarsely, "Joan—who is that?"

"It is Roy," answered Joan in low guarded tones. "I brought him here, because Caroline wishes us to use this room as a parlour in their absence. I was sure you could not object to that. There is a bitter wind to-day, and he has a bad cough. He could not stay in his bedroom."

The old man made no response, only gazed and gazed at the sleeping face.

"Hubert's boy," he murmured at last to himself. "Hubert's boy, whom I promised to guard and care for as my own, should need arise. Why did you bring him here, Joan?" he asked, turning sharply upon his daughter. "You knew I did not wish to see him."

"I thought you could hardly mind now—he has been here so long," answered Joan in her stolid way, "and one fire costs less than two. You and Roy both want warming up in this kind of weather. I wish, father, you would give me some money. I want to make things more comfortable for you, now that we are going to be alone together a little while. We need not tell Roger or Caroline anything about it."

It was the first time in her life that Joan had made quite so bold a request; but some instinct warned her that she had a better chance of success at this juncture. He gazed at her almost as if he thought her off her head; but then he rose softly and bent several minutes over the sleeping boy.

"Is he ill?" he asked, looking round.

"He is not well, I think: but he never says anything about it."

"Was he like this when he first came here?"

"No, he looked better then; but he has not been strong for a long time."

The old man again fell to studying the sharpened face, remaining so very long standing over the boy that Joan feared such close scrutiny would awake him. Then he turned suddenly round, unlocked a drawer, and took out the pocket-book Joan had seen once or twice before. To her very great satisfaction three sovereigns were hastily thrust into her hand, whilst the miser turned his head away, as if fearing even to look upon the treasure with which he was parting.

"Take it," he said, "and make the best use of it—for him, you understand—for him. Don't talk about it to Roger. He would call it wicked waste. But—but—he is Hubert's boy—and he has a look of his father as he lay dead. Don't let him die too!" he added, almost fiercely, turning upon Joan with a sudden imperious gesture. "I won't have him die, I say. I don't like this business—I never did. I told Roger so from the first; but he would have his way. I'm getting an old man now. I can't stand up against Roger."

Andrew Edington stumbled back to his chair again, and Joan hurried away with the treasure, half afraid lest the impulse of unwonted generosity might pass, and the money be recalled before she could conceal it safely. She was exhilarated by the success of her experiment, and on the strength of her victory she ventured to add to the ordinary tea a dish of fried bacon and some eggs, a quite unwonted luxury at Windmill House.

The rattle of the tray as she brought it in roused Roy from his slumbers. He looked round with a start, and met the old man's keen dark eyes fixed full upon him.

He rose to his feet and slowly crossed the intervening space.

"I hope I am not intruding upon you, sir. Your daughter thought you would be kind enough to excuse my presence here to-day."

The old man took his extended hand for a moment and then dropped it quickly.

"You are very welcome," he said, in an odd voice.

"Thank you, very much," said Roy with boyish frankness. "Can't I help you with your tray, Joan? shall I pull up this table for you?"

He tried to help her, but desisted with a start of pain; and laughed a little at his awkwardness.

"Go and sit down again," said Joan with quiet authority, "I can manage best alone."

"What makes you so lame?" asked Andrew Edington sharply.

"I met with an accident a few months back, and haven't been quite right since."

"Nor anything like right to judge by your action; were you like this when you came here?"

"Not nearly so bad," said Joan briefly.

"What have you done to get worse?"

Roy's face was flushed now, and he answered with a light laugh, "Nothing, sir, I assure you, I have a capital time for rest. If my foot does not get better it is its own fault, nothing to do with the place."

Andrew Edington said no more, and never opened his lips during the remainder of the evening. But he listened to every word that passed between his daughter and their guest, and his bright eyes beneath their bushy brows hardly ever quitted Roy's face.

Some of the brightness so characteristic of the boy had come back to him to-night. The genial warmth of the fire, the sense of comfort and leisure, and the feeling of being admitted at last into the inner sanctuary of the household, brought with it a sort of pleasant satisfaction. Roy laughed his genuine boy's laugh as he regaled Joan with reminiscences of his past life—nothing of a personal character exactly, but anecdotes about his friends and himself, queer sayings and ludicrous bits of adventurous mischief. He had not often of late been in so bright a mood, and Joan enjoyed it as much as he did. Only she would have been better satisfied if he would have eaten his food instead of playing with it merely. Her own appetite was so sharply set that she could not understand his indifference, even to the unwonted luxury of fried bacon.

But he was quietly merry all the evening, taking her knitting away and making a pretence of doing it himself, and making her show him how to hold the needles and pass the wool over them. He told her tales from history and fiction and wished he had some particular book to read to her—a good ghost story to give her the horrors on a stormy night. Joan smiled and thought her nerves could stand even that.

He grew tired at length and assented to her hint that he should go to bed. He thanked his uncle again for letting him come to his study, and said with his bright sunny smile what a pleasant evening he had had.

"You can come again whilst they are all away," was the indifferent answer. That is Roger's chair and I rather like to see some one in it, you can just as well occupy it in his absence; after he comes back you must settle it with him."

Roy thanked him warmly and went away; but Joan noticed that her father did nothing all that evening but stare silently into the fire, a look upon his face which she did not remember ever having seen there before.

"ONE ANOTHER."

BY THE REV. R. F. HORTON, M.A.

"Let us consider one another to provoke unto love and good works."—Heb. x. 24.

THIS very beautiful text comes in the midst of a group of exhortations which follow upon the exposition of the New Covenant. Because the new covenant is what it is, therefore these injunctions have their claim upon us. The old faith of Judaism was good, but the new faith of Christ is better. If Judaism could produce a consecrated people, with a deep religious life, a life marked by singular mutual sympathies and interests, how much more should the new faith produce such a people, and such a life! For the old was but the type, the sketch, the outline of the new. Judaism had its sacrifices, offered every day; but now a sacrifice has been offered, complete and final. Judaism had its priests, mortal men, frail as well as mortal; now we have one great High Priest always with us, unfailing and effectual. In Judaism there was a Holy of Holies into which only the high priest might enter, and he but once a year; our High Priest has, through the veil which is His flesh, admitted us into a still holier of holies, has called us to dwell in the secret place of the Most High, to abide under the shadow of the Almighty, enabling us to repossess that Eden from which Adam was driven with flaming angel swords.

Think what a holy of holies this is to which the blessed Lord has brought us. We are not kept in the outer court of seeking, where strangers and proselytes wait for a doubtful boon; we are not even detained in the large temple-chamber where the spirit is taught merely by symbols, by candlesticks, and shewbread, and incense altars; but we are taken through the veil—the rent veil of our dear Lord's sufferings for us—into the innermost shrine where is the open mercy seat, the great and real Propitiatory (ch. ix. 5). In this holy place we find cleansing added to pardon, and power added to cleansing; we are allowed to hold unbroken communion with God. Yes, and not only through the High Priest do we enter, but also with Him. He abides with us, a High Priest over the hallowed temple, and the head of His beloved household; revered and adored as Priest, loved and approached with sweet familiarity as head of the household. Do pause, dear Christian heart, and think what all this means!

Now since we are called to such a holy and happy life as brethren of our dear Lord, we are exhorted to draw near (v. 22) believing, pardoned, washed. We need not hesitate or doubt; unfalteringly we may lay hold of all that is involved in this relationship with Christ; for it does not depend upon our wavering purpose or limited strength, it depends upon Him, and "He is faithful that promised." We, all of us, a company of communicants with Christ, are exhorted to consider one another to provoke unto love and good works; we are told not to neglect our assemblies, which should lead to mutual stimulus and aid; they are not antiquated; on the contrary, they gather new meaning every year, because the day is approaching, the day when the general assembly will be gathered, and the firstborn will be summoned to enter into their birthright. These earthly assemblies are the appointed means by which we prepare for the great assembly, and acquire the pledges of our inheritance as the firstborn.

Sit down in a quiet moment and sum up all the truths which this chapter touches on—set before your spirit the position of the Christian as this chapter sketches it; then, by faith in Christ, enter in and take possession. As, by this act of faith, you become aware of the spiritual facts, you will find them almost unconsciously spurring you on to the highest endeavours; they will concentrate your thoughts on this practical command which we have singled out from the rest; its yoke will seem easy, its burden light.

First, we are told to "consider one another." This expression, "one another," seems to be the keynote of the Gospel. We shall understand it better if we contrast it with the keynotes of the world and of ethical philosophy. The keynote of the world is "self." Let us consider self; that is the world's precept; yes, always the same dreary, diseased, centring in self, until all high thought is lowered and all pure love is soured. The world means it very seriously, and goes on preaching it in spite of thousands of years of failure; it presumes on our ignorance of the past, and it appeals to a treacherous ally in our own hearts. On the other hand, the noblest ethical philosophy bids us to consider "others." In uncompromising terms Altruism denounces Egoism. Very high and beautiful, though cold and chilling, is the categorical imperative of the moralist. The worst of it all is that the standard is unattainable. If self-sacrifice means self-loss it ceases to command our obedience; it has no sanction. The doubt creeps in—can it be the order of the world that all the best men and women should prostrate themselves before the selfishness of others; give up their own existence, cease to be, in order that the rest may live and thrive upon their sacrifice? It is some such doubt as this which has rendered void the lofty command of ethics: "consider others."

But "consider one another" at once presents the ideal. What is true in the world's demand is met, what is practicable in the demand of ethics is realised also. When we consider one another, each may safely cease to care for self, because all are caring for each; none can be neglected or forgotten; all will be amply considered, while none will be required to waste the fine powers of the spirit in the one withering and ruinous practice of self-centred thought. This is the mark of the household of God. Its motto is "one another."

Second. What is meant by considering? Well, it means several things. It means observing, but it also means observing thoughtfully, bringing our mental powers to bear upon the object, and such thoughtful observation leads to interest and sympathy, so that by "consideration" we usually intend something very near to the tact and forethought which can only come from love. When we are told, then, to consider one another we must take it to mean a tender and patient study of one another's characters. You are to look upon your brother, your sister, in Christ with a vivid interest in discovering all the peculiarities and idiosyncrasies which make each human being separate and distinct from all others. We want personal interest in one another, for it is not enough to know man, we must know men. We want to surround each other with an atmosphere of loving comprehension, to breathe upon one another the spirit of delicate discrimination and understanding.

Only in such circumstances can we human beings expand and grow to our full stature. There is a timid, shrinking spirit—quite a typical human being—shut up within itself, unthawed, ungenial, undeveloped, unutilised. The world has been to him a freezing and unsympathetic place; his fellow-creatures have touched him only to chill, or to exasperate, or to wound him. But now he comes into a society of men who regard him with considerate and discriminating interest, who make him perceive that they are concerned to know what is in him, and to develop all his latent powers. Watch him! Little by little in that warm and genial human sunshine he opens up the inner chambers of his being, and brings forth his treasures—yes, there are treasures there! —to the light.

If that true and beautiful thing called a church is ever to exist upon earth it will be composed of men and women so sunned and developed and trained, men and women whose frozen nature has first been thawed by the great love of God, and who, therefore, warm to one another with a kind of tender enthusiasm—approach one another with a feeling that they together constitute the temple of the Holy Ghost, but that each is a separate chapel, shrine, or oracle, infinitely sacred in the sight of the Lord.

Third. We have already caught a glimpse of the object which we must have in view when we engage in the task of considering one another. It is defined in the text in this way: to provoke unto love and good works.

It is true we may consider each other for lower reasons: we may delight in human nature for its endless play of passion and purpose; we may study men for the pleasure of criticising them, we may even find a malicious satisfaction in finding out their faults and holding them up to ridicule. A great deal of the apparent consideration which is to be found in a civilized society is tinged with these base thoughts. Tattling, scandal, heartburning, hatred, and scorn are among the evil consequences. But if we approach our fellow-men as members, together with us, of the Kingdom of Heaven, if we drink deeply of the spirit which fills the chapter before us, if we vividly realise that we are the ransomed people of God, the living branches of a Vine, which is our beloved Master, Jesus Christ, our interest in one another—an interest ever deepening, daily enriched—will be free from these low ends. We can have but one object in view.

Here are our fellow-creatures made in the image of God; we want to see that image developed in them, we want to awake in each one all the life of Christ, and all the capacities of service. No husbandman, looking at the plants and seedlings, can desire their perfection so fervently as we long to see these souls in the garden of Christ, which are God's husbandry, flourishing, flowering, bearing their fruit up to the full measure. How thoughtfully shall we consider one another to this end!

To provoke! It is a strange word. It is the Greek word which appears almost unchanged in English as paroxysm. All the intensity is meant, but not the transitoriness. Perhaps we get the idea better by going back to the original meaning—sharpening. As iron sharpeneth iron, so love provokes love. Every tender feeling rouses tender feeling in others; every breath of love nurtures some flower of love. Do you find people unloving? Perhaps it is because you do not love them. Try the plan of sharpening their love by loving them. Could there be a happier reflection at the end of the days than this: "There is that poor hearthstone where the fires had grown cold, it is now aflame again; there is that human spirit which had become cramped and wizened and peaked; it is now rounded out in full and wholesome development; and this is the result of my feeble service in the cause of the Master?"

But when we stir the love in human hearts, good works follow almost as a matter of course. Just as the warm tropical seas teem with all forms of life, so by a divine law lives which are warmed with love bring forth innumerable and manifold good works. Nor is this law altogether inscrutable. For, in the first place, many faculties of service lie unused in us because no one has called them into play. No discriminating love has been considering what gifts we were dowered with. Many of us are difficult to awaken, the spirit can only be touched on one side; the faculties can only be stimulated by one method of appeal. There are tendrils of our nature trailing in the dust, crushed and blighted, which must be very carefully and delicately picked up, nurtured if they are to grow. Thus the course of life is sometimes determined by the wise suggestion of a discerning friend. Mr. Darwin would not have gone on the voyage of the Beagle, but for his uncle, who feeling sure that he had special gifts as an observer and a naturalist, took the trouble to drive over to Shrewsbury at a critical moment to persuade the young man's father. And the voyage of the Beagle gave a bent to Darwin's whole life.

I have known a young man toiling at a business for which he was ill-adapted, awakened by the apparently chance remark of a thoughtful friend. The conversation was about missionaries, and the need of men, especially in Africa. "Why should not you go?" said the friend. The suggestion touched the slumbering spirit within. The young man went, and has done service for which many are now thankful. We do not always use our gifts, because a kind of diffidence leads us to under-value them and to think that every one is similarly gifted. In such cases the word of an outsider, who yet by sympathy and spiritual insight is better acquainted with us than we know, may give the necessary stimulus, encourage and inspire, and in a beautiful way "provoke unto good works."

But in the second place, it is not only by direct suggestion that we may, if we are in the right mutual attitude, spur one another to service; the unconscious influence of example is more constant, more subtle, more sure. So sensitive is our spiritual organisation that it cannot live in proximity to others without assimilation or else violent repulsion. Where the Spirit of the Lord brings us into ordered fellowship with one another, the spirit of the man responds quickly to all noble influences, ideals act upon it with a formative power; we take the heavenly colours of those with whom we mix, and our features and activities fall into a delicate imitation.

It is in the circle of statesmen, where affairs are constantly handled, and the traditions of statecraft are absorbed from the very atmosphere, that, for the most part, a great statesman is produced. It is in the school of artists, where the eye is rendered quick to detect the niceties of form and colour, while the hand is trained to skilful craftsmanship in stone or pigment, that the great artist makes his appearance. A Pitt or a Canning does not spring immediately from the soil; a Tintoret or a Titian implies an ancient school of Venetian painting. So in the gracious school of love and good works we are roused to noble energies and trained to skilful aptitudes. We are seized by a holy emulation; and the thought of being idle where all are so beautifully employed becomes a burden to us. As in some Olympian festival of souls we strive to be crowned with the approval of our Lord for the victory gained in self-sacrificing love, for the duty done in lowly obedience.

In this two-fold way, then, of suggestion and example our consideration of one another will, in Christ's school, lead to the service which He wants.

And now in conclusion, try to picture to yourselves a community of men and women, in which this sacred principle of considering one another is established.

None are self-absorbed. Each one is looking at the rest, becoming daily more interested in them. Then by the lovely law which holds throughout the world, the interest taken in these human souls begins to create a love for them. You cannot even collect beetles without acquiring a certain affection for them. How much more does an interest in men lead to the love of them! Thus as each one begins to love the rest, little by little even the hard hearts are melted; even the cold natures begin to kindle.

Thoughtful love has elicited in that human heart an unknown faculty, and much to its own surprise, it is the first to benefit by the faculty's exercise. Earnest living has here stimulated indifferent souls to zeal, and in an unexpected way finds itself strengthened and helped by the new enthusiasm awakened. Men and women in such circumstances become greater than they know—they have not to wait for heaven in order to live the heavenly life. This is the calling with which we are called—wherever there is a true church of Christ this ideal will be realised or earnestly struggling towards realisation.

Have you been living in isolation, nourishing a feeble spiritual life in the secret shrine of the heart, but repeating the hollow and unchristian sophistry that a man's religion is only a matter between himself and his God? For your own sake, as well as for the world's sake, take the precept of this larger law, "Consider one another to provoke unto love and good works."

A SAIL THROUGH THE INLAND SEA OF JAPAN

BY MRS. MURRAY MITCHELL.

III.—PAPPENBERG.

PAPPENBERG AND THE BAY OF NAGASAKI.

THE story of Pappenberg is indeed sad to tell. By the way, this was not the original name of the rock. It was called Pappenberg by the Dutch, and is known now by that appellation; but it possesses a native name, though, unfortunately, I have forgotten what it is. As I said in a former paper, it is only a small island-rock, shaped like a cone somewhat, crowned with a few trees, and lies low on the sea at the entrance to the beautiful harbour of Nagasaki, on the great island of Kiu-Siu.

In the olden time, Japan was not by any means famed for its narrow intolerance and dread of foreign intercourse as, unhappily, it justly became in later days. The contrary rather was the truth. So that when, early in the sixteenth century, some Portuguese traders were driven by stress of weather (but who shall say accidentally?) into Japanese waters, they were most cordially received, and kindly treated, both by the Government and the people.

Portugal was then a great and powerful nation, and she had some splendid Commanders, with energetic, enterprising crews, scouring the seas, anxious to secure to their country the commerce of the Eastern world. The men who so happily and unexpectedly found their way to Japan lost no time in following up their advantage. They soon established commercial relations with the Government, and sent frequent ships, laden with the treasures of both West and East, in silks, and furs, and countless valuable articles, which were eagerly received by the refined, beauty-loving, appreciative Japanese.

Seven years later, a new chapter in the curious story commenced. Another event occurred, seemingly insignificant enough, but which was to have a yet deeper and more commanding influence on the affairs of the Empire. From the next ship which arrived, this time from India, there landed along with the merchandise three Roman Catholic missionaries, one of whom was the famous and devoted Francis Xavier. These men were accompanied by a Japanese youth who had been converted to Christianity—really the first of this people who professed the name of Christ. He had committed some crime, was obliged to fly from his country, and found his way to Goa. There he met with some Portuguese ecclesiastics, was instructed by them, and eventually baptised into the Christian faith—of course after the Romish form. One of his instructors, and the man who baptised him was Francis Xavier, who was easily persuaded by the zealous young convert to accompany him to his native land, and to found a mission to his countrymen.

A JAPANESE LADY.

Full of enthusiasm and zeal, this remarkable man was ever eager to find new races to influence, and new ground whereon to do battle for his faith—especially if there were dangers to encounter, and difficulties to overcome. He embarked at Goa for Japan in 1547, accompanied by two coadjutors and the Japanese youth. In time they all landed in safety on the island of Kiu-Siu, I believe at Nagasaki.

Thus it was that Francis Xavier began his famous work among "his beloved Islanders," as he called the Japanese, "the delight of his heart," and thus it was that Christianity, as yet only after the Romish form, found its way to this Empire. Previous to this, the name of Christ, as far as we know, had never been heard in Japan.

The friendly people received the missionaries gladly, and the Government, then perfectly tolerant, at once gave permission for the founding of the mission, and the preaching of Christianity. The success which followed was very remarkable. Stations were multiplied, churches were built, and converts were made by thousands. Among the latter were many of the nobles and Daimiyos, and high people of the land. Before the end, some millions of Japanese, it is said, had embraced the Roman Catholic faith.

But by-and-by evil days came, though, at first, through no fault of the Japanese. Most authorities seem agreed in laying the blame of at least the origin of the mischief at the door of the foreign priests. The first men were humble, devoted, and thoroughly discreet, occupied wholly with their own sacred work. But they were succeeded by others of a very different stamp. Jesuits began to multiply, monks and other ecclesiastics flocked to the attractive islands; quarrels and jealousies arose among different orders; Franciscans and Dominicans, and others had constant feuds among themselves; while the immorality, rapacity, and evil lives of the whole foreign community frightened and disgusted the entire people. But this was only part of the mischief at work. The Jesuits, with their usual ambition, began to interfere politically. Their bold intrigues aroused the alarm and suspicion of the Government, while their pride and insolent bearing, even to the chief officers of state, their contempt of all order, and rude defiance of native custom and etiquette, awakened the greatest resentment among both officials and people. The rival Buddhist monks, who hated these so-called Christians with a perfect hatred, did all they could to foster the ill-feeling, and fan the fire of general indignation which was smouldering everywhere through the Empire. Presently the discovery of treasonable documents and letters, revealing a conspiracy to overthrow the Government, made the fire burst forth into all-devouring flame. So the great persecution began. The downfall of Christianity speedily followed; the Portuguese were to a man banished from the islands, and many of the missionaries were put to death. It is extraordinary how bitter and intense the hatred grew to the religion of the Cross; and the cruelties practised towards many unoffending professors of the faith among the islanders are too terrible to relate.

ON THE COAST OF JAPAN.

The determination to stamp out the new religion was shared by the whole Empire. The fires of persecution raged from 1614, culminating about twenty years later in the awful tragedy at Pappenberg. Here 30,000 native Christians were cruelly put to death. The poor victims—men, women, and children—were taken to the summit, where a cross had been erected: the choice was given them either to spit upon it and renounce their faith, or be hurled from the cliff on to the rocks in the sea below. Rather than deny their Lord, these heroic Christians accepted the dreadful alternative. Many were put to death by burning and crucifixion; most were thrown from the cliff; but all were subjected to horrible torture and suffering. Women as well as men, and even little children, went to their death bravely—accepting it in the cruellest form rather than be false to their religion. Never were courage and constancy more heroically shown. The annals of martyrology do not contain more touching tales of souls firm and faithful to the end, than this little rock could tell, if it had a tongue to speak of those noble, true, devoted Japanese martyrs. May their blood be the seed of a yet purer and more lasting—a Protestant—church, which shall yet fill all the Empire! And is there not good hope of this? No one need wonder if, within the next few years, we shall see Christianity adopted as the religion of Japan.

Since these sad scenes were enacted, two hundred years have come and gone. These were the years of Japanese isolation and intolerance, alike of foreigners and their religion. The enemy was slain. Christianity was blotted out with blood. The missionaries were dead or banished, and all foreigners had shared their fate, with the sole exception of the poor Dutch, on their tiny Deshima. The people rejoiced that now the independence of the Empire was secured.

The new policy was supported by the severest regulations; and it was then that the edicts were placarded everywhere, in every city, and at every street corner, setting forth the new laws. The "vile Jesus doctrine" first and foremost was denounced, and death proclaimed to any one daring to profess it. Rewards were offered for the discovery of any missionary or native Christian; who, if discovered, was to be put to death. No Japanese, nor Japanese vessel, might leave the country. If a native did manage to go to another country he could never return, on pain of death. No one could even receive a letter from a foreign land. And so on. These are some of the strange laws which were proclaimed and were in force, until within the last few years when, in the marvellous providence of God, the emancipation of Japan was wrought out. God had a purpose of mercy towards this interesting land, and His time to work it out had come.

And now I have another little incident to relate of this famous and beautiful Nagasaki bay. The same year, I think, that the treaty with the United States had been signed (1854) an English fleet sailed into the harbour. Acting according to traditional law and rule the commander-in-chief of the district with some of his troops watched the new-comers carefully. So the better to detect whether there were any sinister or suspicious proceedings going on on board, the great man himself often went out in a boat to watch. One evening he saw a little book floating on the water. He sent to have it brought to him; and, strange to say, it proved to be an English New Testament! He was curious to know its contents; but as he could not read English he sent for a Dutch interpreter, who told him it was something about Jesus Christ, and the Christian and English religion. He found out that a Chinese translation of this book existed, so he sent to Shanghai for a copy, and forthwith began to study it. This man's name was Wakasa, and he induced his brother, Ayabe, and a retainer named Montono, to study it along with him. Afterwards they found that a Christian missionary had once more come to the islands. This was the well-known Dr. Verbeck. They sought him, and he gladly undertook to give them further instruction in the wonderful Book. One time when Ayabe was detained on duty some distance from Nagasaki, he sent a retainer two days' journey to and fro to listen to Dr. Verbeck's teaching and bring him home word again. This novel Bible-class went on secretly for two or three years, and the word was blessed to the conversion of all these men. They dared not profess their belief, however, nor be baptised; and during the troubles which arose before the revolution of 1868 they had all to fly to China. One day, however, a good many years later, Dr. Verbeck was told that a great man had arrived and wished to see him. To his unspeakable joy this proved to be Wakasa, with two of his sons, accompanied also by his brother and their man, Montono. They at once declared the object of their visit to be a desire that they might receive baptism and declare themselves Christians. The missionary told them plainly the danger they incurred in making a public profession of their faith, the law being still in force which proclaimed death to any one who should call themselves by the name of Christ. But they were resolute. On the next Lord's Day they returned —this time, like Nicodemus, by night. The shutters were closed, and they all received the sacred rite, afterwards partaking along with the mission circle of the Sacrament of the Supper. They then returned to their distant homes, full of joy and of the Holy Ghost.

These men were the first converts to the Protestant faith. The baptism took place either in 1866 or 1868, and now, only twenty years later, the Native Protestant community in Japan is believed to number fifty thousand.

An interesting little sequel to this wonderful story occurred the year of our visit to the Nagasaki Mission. One Sabbath day two strangers were noticed at the service in the little church on Deshima. One was a Japanese lady of rank and the other her attendant. After service the lady introduced herself as the daughter of Wakasa. She told the missionaries that her father had died a few years before, a believing and rejoicing Christian. She had married, and coming to Nagasaki to live, she had hoped to find their old friend and teacher, Dr. Verbeck. She was much disappointed to find he had removed to Tôkiyo, as she greatly desired to be instructed more perfectly in the Word of God. Her father had brought her up as a Christian, and she knew the Lord's Prayer and some passages of Scripture by heart; but she did not possess one of "the books." Happily however, she and her nurse one day passed a book-shop, and here they found a gospel of St. Matthew which they bought. She said they were soon going away to Osaka to reside, and before she left Nagasaki she and her servant wished to be baptised.

After some more intercourse and more instruction these interesting women were received into the church, and now they are not only adorning the doctrine of God their Saviour by their own consistent lives, but both are labouring earnestly and very successfully to advance His cause among their people. The nurse is now at her own village, acting as a Bible-woman or missionary. She teaches a school for girls and Bible-classes for women; and there are now twenty converts in her village, all of whom have been won to Christ through her instrumentality.

The lady has been equally useful in her sphere in Osaka. She at once joined a native Christian congregation, and threw herself heart and soul into its interests and work. Besides this she has helped to send a mission to one of the islands which her husband had visited and found to be without a Christian teacher.

Thus the truth is making way in Japan. The victory is sure, and it is probable that the battle will not be long.

SIR HERBERT EDWARDES.[1]

I.

NEARLY twenty years have passed, since Sir Herbert Edwardes was laid in his grave in Highgate Cemetery, and nearly thirty since the period when his achievements, half-hidden, and never fully recognised, proved to a great extent the preservation of the British Empire in India. This is a great distance in time; seen across it, events assume their due proportions; things which were striking at the time, but in themselves unimportant, fade from the view; what is real and massive loses nothing, but rather gains in significance. The stories of the Sikh war, of the subjugation of the Punjab, and of the Indian Mutiny are to the present generation matters of history; to those who are old enough to remember them, they sound like an oft-told tale. For these reasons it is desirable in dealing with the life of such a man to drop the smaller details, and throw up into as strong a light as possible the main features of his character and work. The most cursory reader of his life cannot fail to class him among men who are Christians first and soldiers afterwards, who would have carried their Christianity into any calling, and caused it to mould their outward life.

In the year 1846, the late Sir Henry Lawrence undertook, as President at the Court of Lahore, the government of the Punjab. He gathered round him there a number of young men, of whom he writes "Each was a good man; most were excellent officers." A self-denying Christian himself, Sir Henry was able to perceive and appreciate Christian principle in others. In this circle are found his brother, George Lawrence, John Nicholson, who led the attack on Delhi at the cost of his own life, Hodson, the leader of "Hodson's horse," Abbott, Edwardes, Lumsden, and Taylor, remarkable both as soldiers and administrators, and some of them, as Edwardes and Taylor, leaving behind them the nobler reputation of introducing Christianity and founding Christian churches among the subject races. All of these earned the appellation of "good men" by Christian virtue; they gave up their lives as an act of self-sacrifice; they administered their government for the benefit of the governed, not for their own; their great influence was largely due to their own sterling worth; and if they aided directly in the establishment of Christianity, it was because they themselves knew the blessedness of subjection to its laws.

[1] Memorials of the Life and Letters of Sir Herbert B. Edwardes, K.C.B., etc. By his Wife. Kegan Paul, Trench & Co.

There is an impression in some minds, that an Indian official of eminence must needs be of the type of Clive and Warren Hastings, according to the ordinary conception of that type,—men rough and ready—grasping in their dealings with natives, and holding no faith with them, when good faith would cross their interests; men who feared God as little as they feared danger. Whatever may be said of the founders of our Indian empire, it is emphatically most untrue of the great men who, as the servants of John Company, or the Empress Victoria, have laid anew the foundation of that empire. Those whom we have named above believed in an empire of truth and righteousness; they ruled the governed to do them good, and their reward is on high. To no one do these remarks better apply than to the subject of this paper.

To give our readers a living cast of the man, we will try to gather up some of the traits of his mind and spirit. The two volumes of his life lately given to the world by his widow, Lady Edwardes, will furnish the material. The pith of these volumes lies in the letters written by Edwardes himself and by friends who felt the attraction of his worth. Here is the portrait—externally a man of prominent features with a certain delicacy of moulding, a natural abundance of dark wavy hair, a soldierly bearing coupled with the well-bred air of an English gentleman; internally a mind of versatile powers not to be confined by artificial training, revelling in literature, rather than in the exact sciences which are supposed to make the soldier, clever with his pencil, but "of such true courtesy and goodness, that he could not draw an ill-natured caricature." These powers were exerted for the entertainment of his equals and inferiors.

Do you want to see into his heart? He does not talk of religion and piety, but here are a few lines written to a friend through which "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." "If you have succeeded in so disciplining your mind as to see God in everything, and realise His presence around and about you at every hour of the day, and refer all questions of life and duty, great and small, to the awful tribunal before which you are thus perpetually standing, why, you are in my opinion to be as much respected as envied by every right thinking man."

Now this man—this gentleman, with these abilities and these principles, was somehow or other whisked away from England—from the society of such kindred spirits as Charles Kingsley and Nassau Senior—and planted in India as a subaltern officer. He did not seek the employment; he kicked at it, would gladly have been elsewhere, and yet by means of his appointment great good was achieved. Certainly he was not, at starting, a soldier that would have passed muster with a German or French military critic, but he was possessed of the power of adapting means to ends—an especial gift for controlling semi-barbarous tribes—a plucky heart, and, as a crown to it all, he had the fear of God before his eyes. One of his superiors wrote a few years later, that he was "the very best and most unexceptionable officer I have as yet been brought in contact with. It is not his ability that I admire so much as his weight of character and high tone and principles altogether." Of the respect with which he inspired the natives, a remarkable instance occurred in a moment of real danger during the battle of Kinyeree, of which more presently. Wanting writing materials to send off a despatch, they were handed to him by his head moonshee, who had followed his master to the field, and said, "My place is with my master. I live by his service, and when he dies, I die." The same hour of danger furnishes an example of his own settled faith. "I knew," he writes, "I was fighting for the right. I asked God to help me to do my duty, and I rode on, certain that He would do it." It is his inflexible devotion to duty, his unvarying application of Christian principle in the difficult circumstances of his outward life, which chiefly claims attention in these pages.

In mentioning these things we are getting ahead of the events in Sir H. Edwardes's life. Arrived in India, although he felt himself somewhat above "the duty of moistening pipeclay," he applied himself diligently to regimental duties. At the same time, he threw himself eagerly into a course of preparation for something higher. He mastered the Hindi, Hindostani, and Persian languages, a qualification for the civil employment he so much desired. At the same time, his pen was busy in discussions on the affairs of India, our disasters in Cabul, and other matters, in a series of papers called "Brahminee Bull's Letters in India to his brother John Bull in England." These letters caused Sir Henry Lawrence to find him out, and secured for him the first step in an administrative career.

This was at the close of the first Sikh war, in which Edwardes had his first experience of actual warfare and received a severe wound, which laid him aside till the last battle at Sobraon.

His period of pupilage, if we may so call it, at Lahore, under Sir Henry's eye, was but of short duration. His power in managing the native tribes led to his mission to Bunnoo, an Afghan valley, inhabited by a most intractable race. With the terror of an occupation by a Sikh army hanging over them, these wild people were persuaded to throw down their village forts, and the Sikh troops, from fear of the tribes, constructed a fortress, by which the valley was held in subjection for the future. These results were not accomplished without the exertion of much personal influence; as one of the Afghans remarked years afterwards: "Edwardes compelled us to like him better than any other Feringhee; and see, sahib, what he has left to our children—pensions, jagirs (grants of land)," etc. Here was the iron hand in the velvet glove, strong measures backed by armed force. "There is no arguing," he said, "in this country without a force to back you. If you have a rebel's life at heart, threaten to take it." But when these strong measures had been carried out, there was comfortable provision for the subdued rebels and their children after them.

The spell of this controlling influence was still more manifest in the campaign against Mooltan. The treacherous murder of two English officers had been the signal for a general rising. Edwardes made war at once, in the belief that attack was the best defence, though he had but a small force, and next to no funds at command. At the battle of Kinyeree, to which we have already alluded, finding his native allies disorganised, there was nothing for it but to remain passive, till General Cortlandt's guns and troops could come up. For seven hours he checked his troops, made impatient for the attack, by seeing their fellows struck here and there. "Hour after hour he calmed the excited throng, and when the proper hour arrived" he led them on to victory.

The result was the capture of Mooltan by General Whish, who afterwards came up with a body of troops and a siege train. And here is a trait of characteristic modesty. At the general's request, Edwardes himself wrote the narrative of the operations, inserting nothing about himself or his troops. The general was on the point of despatching this report without any addition of his own, when Edwardes—out of justice to his troops, not on his own behalf—requested that proper mention should be made of their services; and the general was obliged to write an additional despatch!

We pass over some years of Edwardes's life to the year 1853. He is then established as Commissioner at Peshawur. The importance of his work there justifies the use of high language. In every-day life he was busy as before with the management of native tribes, in his heart and mind working for the good of the empire. It was his thought, and his alone—unless Nicholson, his attached friend, may claim a share in it—to quiet the whole of Afghanistan, and turn its ruler from an enemy into a friend. The nation had been vanquished, it is true, but they retained the sullenness of vanquished men. Their leader was ready to throw himself into the arms of Russia when Edwardes's treaty, followed up by a timely subsidy, made him determine for friendship with the English. Dost Mahommed remained our firm ally through the storm of the Sepoy Mutiny, when his own followers were urging him to raise the green flag and sweep the English into the sea. This might have happened but for the treaty concluded two years before. The conclusion of the treaty was an act worthy of a statesman high in office, but it was the work of a subordinate. Moreover, it was done against the judgment, one might almost say in the teeth of his superior at Lahore, Sir John Lawrence. He thought Dost Mahommed a knave, and the treaty negotiations waste of labour. Yet Edwardes was publicly honoured for concluding it, as for other consequences which flowed from it. There is a verse in an old book which runs thus: "There was found a poor wise man, and he, by his wisdom, delivered the city, yet no man remembered that same poor man." The career before us exemplifies this. Yet some did remember Edwardes's work; Lord Dalhousie at the time, and later Lord Canning and Lord Elgin.

Some few facts will support what has just been said. At the outset, Lord Dalhousie wrote, "I give you carte blanche, and if you can only bring about such a result as you propose, it will be a feather even in your cap." In the course of the negotiations, Sir John Lawrence wrote: "I dare say you are right; still, I cannot divest myself of the idea that it is a mistake." When the negotiations were nearly complete, Edwardes was selected for the honour of putting the crown on his own work by signing the document himself on behalf of the Indian Government. Meanwhile, Dost Mahommed conceived the idea of coming himself to meet the governor-general. Failing that, he deputed his son, the heir-apparent. On this, Edwardes, thinking that the treaty would acquire more importance, and therefore greater stability, if the Indian Government was represented by some one higher in office than himself, did, as his widow proudly and justly says, what only he and such as he would do; he proposed that the Chief Commissioner should put the finishing stroke to a work which he had looked coldly upon throughout. This is how Sir John Lawrence had, in the eyes of the public, the credit of this important negotiation. Privately he wrote to Edwardes, "the merit of the affair, whatever it may be, is yours." Nevertheless, when Edwardes was asked what honours he would like to have conferred on him, he asked nothing for himself, but only that his faithful subordinates should be rewarded. The same generous spirit prompted him to be silent about his own share in this business, so that Lord Elgin even was ignorant of the truth until, on assuming the government of India, he heard it from Edwardes's own lips.

An equally important branch of his activity at this time was his dealing with the native tribes. The appointment to Peshawur was an appointment to a post of danger. He took the place of one who had fallen by the assassin's knife. He, Colonel Mackeson, had relied on force and subtlety, keeping an army of spies in his pay. Edwardes did everything openly. He had a custom, dangerous, it seemed to some, of receiving the chiefs in numbers, hearing them talk, and after a good feed, sending them back to their homes. It was said of him that he could hear their talk, and if they ventured too far, could turn the laugh against them. For armed force he substituted another kind of pressure. Peshawur is a great market, and if a hill tribe offended, he shut them out from the market, and gave rewards to any one who could catch one of the offending tribe within forbidden distance. There are stories almost droll of retribution exacted at one time for open murder, at another for stealing a bottle of quinine. But the effect in all cases was the same; the wild tribes felt that there was a strong though hidden hand ready to be laid upon offenders. Moreover this personal contact with the children of the hills gave him an ascendancy which mounted higher and still higher, until the terrible crisis of 1857 was reached. Of the use it was then turned to, it will be better to speak in a future number.

A REMINISCENCE OF SWISS TRAVEL.

IT was in the early autumn of 1886. We were waiting outside of the Post for the conveyance that was to take us over one of the passes in Eastern Switzerland to our destination. Presently the official in charge of the arrangements came out and from a large book read out the names of the passengers, and assigned to them their appointed places, first in the Diligence, then in the supplementary carriages in which those for whom there was no room in the Diligence were to be accommodated. We had to wait until the last supplementary carriage. Two fellow-countrymen occupied the front seats outside behind the driver. A peasant woman was our only travelling companion in the inside when we started, and for the first portion of our journey.

She was elderly; had a bright, intelligent, open countenance, and a good forehead. We felt drawn to her, and soon found ourselves engaged in interesting conversation with her. She was, as she described herself, a vegetable wife (Gemüs-frau). Her business took her from time to time to cities some hours' distance by rail from her home. On this occasion she was going to visit a step-daughter at the first important halting place on our journey that day, and was taking her a bunch of flowers. She was a widow; her husband had been able to keep a horse and cart, and used to go over one or other of the passes to the holiday and health resort whither we were then going. She was not able to keep a horse and cart. These particulars of her history we gleaned from her conversation during the time she was our travelling companion.

It was not her circumstances, past or present, however, that then interested us so much as the remarks she made about the people, and her own reflections on religion and other matters. There has been of late years a great influx of visitors of many nationalities into the part of Switzerland whither we were bound, and a consequent large increase in the amount of money coming into the hands of the native population. She did not think that the people were any happier in consequence. The more they had the more they desired to have, she thought. She was not like so many of the Swiss of her class, apparently insensible to the grandeur and beauty of the scenery—like the driver of our carriage on one excursion, who told us that they, the natives, thought nothing of the mountains and valleys that the visitors admire so much. They have a clear perception, however, of the real or affected enthusiam for fine scenery shown by the thousands of tourists, and know how to turn it to profitable account. One of our travelling companion's remarks was, "the world is wondrous fair and wondrous foul" (wunderschön und wunderschlecht). She could not separate the thought of the moral deformity of the people from the beauty of the world they live in.

Talking of the religious habits of the people, she said, "she loved to go into the wood on Sunday mornings, she felt so much at home there."

When we referred to the fine old hymns sung in the German-speaking churches, "O Haupt voll Blut und Wunden" ("Oh bleeding head and wounded") and others, her face brightened up, she seemed to be quite familiar with them. In passing some of the villages she called out to a group of women standing at the roadside (our carriage was open) whom she appeared to know well, "I am quite happy with the English people." Of one woman whom she pointed out, she said, "She is a very pious woman, she loves to go to church."

At length we reached her destination and bade her farewell. We did not then learn her name, nor did we expect ever to meet her again. In the autumn of 1887, however, we found ourselves once more in the same part of Switzerland.

On our homeward journey we stayed two nights in the capital of the canton in which she lived, from whence we had started on our journey over the pass in the previous year. We were walking about the city in the forenoon before making an excursion to the famous baths at some distance by rail, when, lo! in a square, in which were a number of fruit and vegetable stalls, we saw, at one of the stalls, our travelling companion of the year before. She at once recognised us, and exclaimed, "We did enjoy ourselves!"—then, pointing to a church at the end of the square, she asked us if she might give us a photograph of it as a memorial of our journey. It was the church, "where," as she said, "she had often prayed, and often wept."

We arranged that she should come to our hotel in the evening at an hour which we fixed. When she came, she not only brought us a photograph of the church, but also a plate of beautiful fruit. She told us her history—of her years of domestic service, of her married life, of her joys and sorrows, in all of which we were deeply interested. When we asked her address, that we might send her our cartes and some books (her name we had learned from the manager of our hotel), she smiled and mentioned only the name of the city. She was, she said, well known.

On the following morning, before starting for Basle on our homeward route, we saw her again. Her last words were, "Don't forget your promise," referring to the portraits and books.

When we reached home we fulfilled our promise, and in due time received a letter from one of her pastors, written on her behalf, and at her request. There were two pastors in the parish church which she attended. The younger one was her favourite, because, as she said, "he spoke so to the heart." The letter acknowledged the receipt of the books and photos, and went on to say—"She is very glad to have your photographs, and also to hold fellowship with you in spirit by means of the edifying books [we sent her a German copy of Bunyan's 'Pilgrim's Progress,' with one or two others]. Frau —— is an upright and religious woman. Although she does not live in affluence, she has pleasure in doing good to other poor people. Yesterday, on our Swiss Fast day, she came to me in great joy to speak of your friendly present, and to remember liberally our own poor. I believe that your kindness has made this good woman more beneficent."

The pastor wrote as her neighbour and pastor, because she was not much accustomed to writing. It was very gratifying to us to receive such a testimony to her character, and to find that we were not mistaken in the estimate we had formed of her from the intercourse we had with her for a couple of hours or more during our journey up the pass, and on our second visit in our hotel. Again we heard from her about the end of last year, when, in acknowledging a small Christmas present which we sent to her, she sent us portraits of herself and her late husband, and a card for the New Year.

During both of our visits to that part of Switzerland we met people whose acquaintance it was a pleasure to make, and made friends whom we should be sorry to lose, but there is no one of whom we think with greater pleasure, or speak of more frequently, than this humble and devout "vegetable wife" as she called herself, or "dealer in vegetables" as her pastor less familiarly described her.

J. K.

NESTA AND PHYLLIS.

I.

NESTA and Phyllis Elliot were two little maidens who lived with their father and mother in a quiet street of a Scottish city. Ever since they could remember their home had been in the same town house, and when they went to the country for a few weeks in summer it was always to the same farm among the hills. As their mother was not strong they saw very few visitors; the two servants who waited on them had been for years in the household; and the school to which Nesta and Phyllis went every day was taught by a lady who had known them when they were little babies.

Thus every one and every thing about the children had for them the comfortable feeling of familiarity. They led a very quiet and uneventful life, but it was full of happiness, for it was lived in the midst of love and understanding.

These little sisters were at the time my story begins just eight and ten years old, and they loved each other more than I can tell. They did everything together—slept together, and walked together; worked at their lessons, and played together. They hardly knew what differences of taste there were between them, for Nesta liked books because Phyllis did, and Phyllis found delight in the doll-house because it so much pleased Nesta. Phyllis was the cleverer at lessons, but that only kept her on an equality with her elder sister; and Nesta was the favourite among their school-fellows, but her popularity drew shy Phyllis also into their merry circle.

The two fitted into each other in all things, feeling themselves halves of one happy little life, complete and inseparable: neither of the children ever had a plan—they hardly had a thought—which did not include the other.

And yet the little sisters were so unlike outwardly that by seeing them you would never have known they were relations at all. Nesta was one of those round-faced, rosy-cheeked, yellow-haired, open-eyed children, whose fresh innocent looks remind one of the dear little field daisies; and Phyllis was pale and slight, with a big brow and big deep-set eyes—dark grey under dark brown lashes. She was so shy and grave with strangers that they often thought her sad, and I do not think she was ever compared to any flower. But I myself am very fond of Phyllis; and I hope you will like her too, because it is of Phyllis I shall have most to tell.

For in the midst of the pleasant summer weather, when the children were talking daily of lessons ending and holiday fun beginning, and their father and mother had almost fixed the exact time they were going to the country, a great sorrow—the first sorrow of her life—fell upon little Phyllis.

It was Nesta's sorrow too, and indeed it was generally felt that Nesta was the most to be pitied when it came; yet in many ways it was far harder for Phyllis to bear. Even on that first morning when Nesta, pale and languid, turned away from her untasted breakfast, she could rest her head on her mother's shoulder, and was far too weary to be troubled by thoughts of her own illness; while poor Phyllis, bewildered and frightened, trudged off alone to school, and remembered all the sad stories she had ever read till she forgot her lessons, and blistered the pages of her copy-book with tears, and tried the patience of both teachers and pupils by her stupidity.

And next day it was even worse for Phyllis, though she did not go to school at all, and those about her knew now that Nesta was really very poorly, and did not expect her little sister to be anything but dull.

Nesta lay in bed in her mother's room which had been given up to her, and dozed and wakened; seldom caring to speak, and (oh, strangest thing of all!) not wanting Phyllis: she wanted nothing but to be left in quiet, and have mamma sit beside her and give her a drink very often. Phyllis sat in the nursery among the dolls which were all no fun now; and the nursery was so quiet she could hear everything that passed in the stillness of the rest of the house. When the doctor came in, or her father, it seemed to make quite a great noise. And sometimes she would take one of her story-books down to the drawing-room, and if papa was there he would speak to her cheerfully, and even try to be playful, in pity for her little sad face. But Phyllis was shy with him, as she was shy with every one but her mother and Nesta; and most of the time they were together the two sat quietly each with a book.

Thus things went on for several days during which Nesta grew worse. Then the doctor said he was sure now that his little patient had typhoid fever, and Nesta's father and mother prepared bravely and steadily for the long illness that was coming. Phyllis, of course, had nothing to do; and she thought of nothing else before her but a longer time of such dreary loneliness at home as she was getting used to now. But it was not to be as Phyllis thought.

One evening—it was the evening of the day on which she had heard what Nesta's illness was—Phyllis was lying in bed, but not nearly asleep, when her mother came into the room. This was the first time she had done more than look in since Nesta was ill; and now, though she had come to stay for a little, she did not take Phyllis in her arms, or kiss her, or even come close to her bed. Phyllis knew why she did not, yet it chilled her heart all the same. But she was a brave little girl and would not distress her mother by complaining; she knew her mother had enough to distress her. Phyllis even tried to keep her from seeing that she had been crying till she had made her pillow wet with tears, as she had done every night since Nesta had gone to her mother's room to sleep.

Then Mrs. Elliot told her little girl that she was to be sent away from home. Even though they had good hopes that Nesta would not be very ill, papa, mamma, and the doctor thought it was best for Phyllis to go out of the house; and her aunts, who were spending the summer at St. Margaret's, had offered to take her for a few weeks. Mrs. Elliot spoke cheeringly of the pleasures of the sea-side, and the kindness of Aunt Adelaide, and Aunt Flo, and Aunt Madeline; but to poor Phyllis it seemed as if staying at home, where she could have glimpses of her mother and hear of Nesta hour by hour, was happiness compared to going away alone to the nicest place in the world—and reading silently beside papa, or keeping company with the well-known dolls in the dear old nursery once so merry, was better than any entertainment she could ever find among strangers.

So, in spite of all her bravery, her little face grew whiter on a sudden as her mother spoke, and her lip quivered piteously. Then Mrs. Elliot stopped in the midst of a sentence, and said, "Oh, my darling, I know!—I know!" And Phyllis cried in the comfort of not needing to tell why, and the knowledge that her mother was sorrier for her than she was for herself; and the crying and the feeling of her mother's love did her good. As for Mrs. Elliot, she was asking God in her heart to keep both her dear children now; and the knowledge of His great love was her comfort. Yet even she could not think how good He was to be to little Phyllis, nor dream that her first great sorrow was to bring her life-long joy.

The next afternoon Phyllis's father took her to St. Margaret's. It was little more than an hour's journey by train; and the journey was through a green pleasant country with peaceful-looking old houses here and there among the shady woods, and many and many an open view of the blue breezy sea Phyllis was going to live beside.

There were other children in the train; happy bands of holiday-makers; mothers and little ones, brothers and sisters together. Phyllis watched them with silent wistful interest in all the bustle of their getting in or getting out at different stations. Most of them were bound, like herself, for St. Margaret's, and the platform there was crowded with them and their belongings when Phyllis alighted. Then presently her three aunts came hurrying through the crowd, talking and laughing. It seemed to Phyllis as if there were at least six of them.

The child did not know them very well; they were only half-sisters of Mrs. Elliot's, and they had lived a great deal abroad. But, there was no doubt, they were, as her mother had said, very kind,—though somehow they managed to silence not only Phyllis but her father, taking all the conversation to themselves, and keeping it up in a very high key.

The house where the Miss Bruces lived was quite at the other end of the town from the station, and it looked right out on the sea. Phyllis had tea by herself at a little round table in the big bow-window of the sitting-room; and she felt as if she could have got out with one jump to the beach below. She could see the near rocks, and the far-away white ships just as well as if she had been out, all the time she sat munching the good things with which her aunts kept filling her plate. Ah, if Nesta had been here, all this would have been nice!

After tea, the party walked for a while on the sands, Phyllis keeping close to her father's side. Then Mr. Elliot went back to the station again, and Phyllis went early to bed in her strange little room. What a sad awakening it was in the morning to find herself there, and remember why she had been sent away alone, and to fancy what they would all be doing at home now, and wonder how she herself could ever get through that day, and the many days that were coming!

Her aunts tried to amuse her at first, but when she could not be amused they got rather vexed in a good-humoured sort of way; and Phyllis quickly understood that they were vexed by her, and grew shyer and more hopelessly miserable as time went on. She felt she was stupid and guilty, and looked all she felt when they exchanged laughing glances of despair over her head, or told their visitors how homesick and dull their little niece was, calling her an "unnaturally quiet little mouse," and asking what any one could possibly do with a child who cared for neither toys nor playfellows?—Poor Phyllis, who wanted nothing but Nesta, Nesta, Nesta!

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. II.

1. He was a king "who did very wickedly."
2. He is said to have "walked in the way of his mother."
3. His namesake, a good man's son, was murdered.
4. His grandfather bought a hill and built a city on it.
5. Jericho was rebuilt during his father's reign.
6. He lost a hundred soldiers just before his death, but not in battle.
7. He brought disgrace on a good man.
8. He honoured an idol which is only mentioned in one chapter.
9. "The Angel of the Lord" sent a messenger to him.
10. The message was one of reproof and condemnation.
11. His father once "fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly."
12. He gave a command which was not carried out.
13. He was killed through an accident, and left no son.

L. T.

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. VIII.—p. 206.—BILDAD—ZOPHAR.—Job viii. 11.

B oa-z	Ruth ii. 1.
I-dd-o	Ezra viii. 17–20.
L-am-p	Judges i. 16–28.
D-ebora-h	Judges v.
A-nu-a	Luke ii. 36–38.
D-oo-r	John x. 1.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

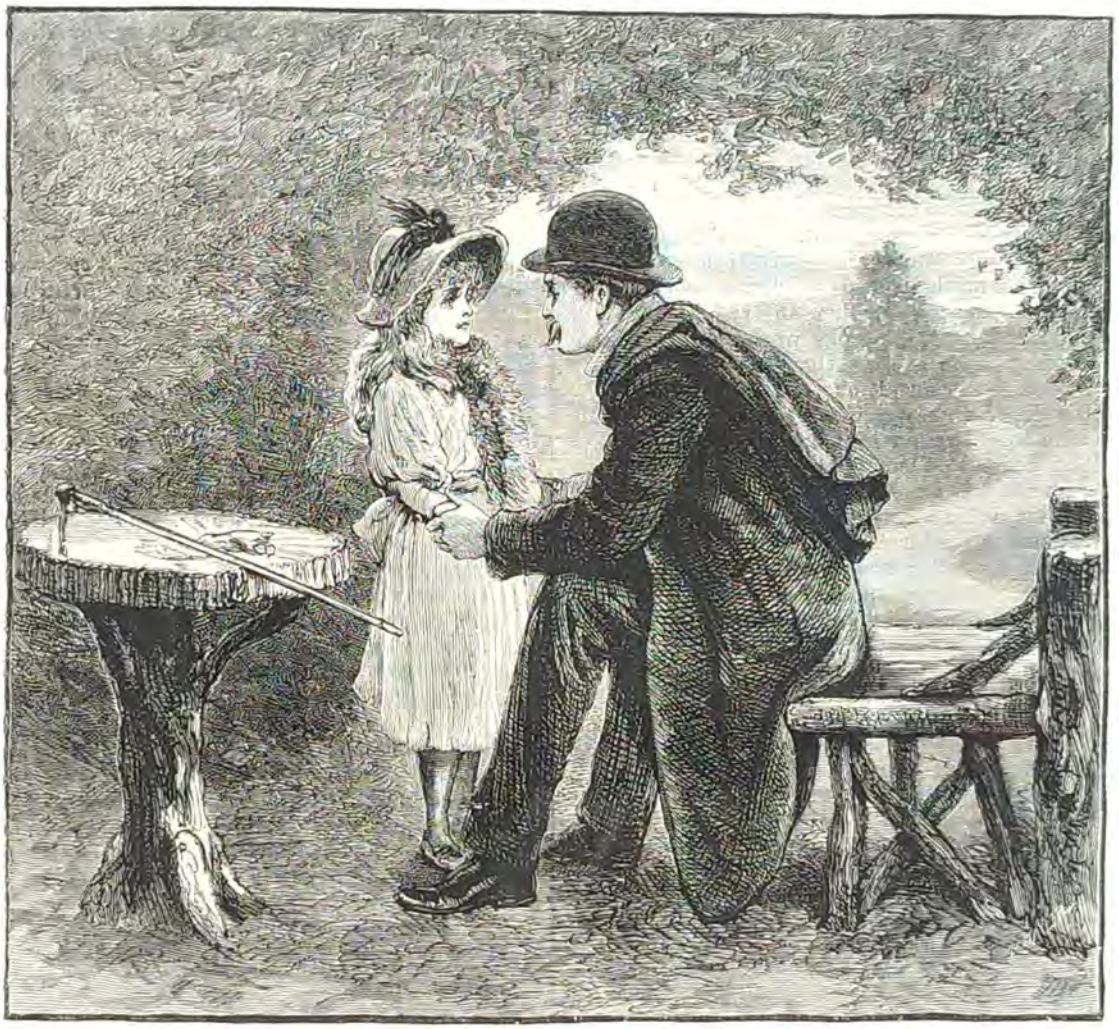
MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—A COOL RECEPTION.



"IT'S MARCUS COME BACK!"

MARCUS STRATFORD returned to the Hermitage late on in October. He was a good deal disturbed by the letters he had received from Roy, telling him of his visit to Windmill House and his proposed residence there. Letters are proverbially unsatisfactory, especially when written by a boy, for boys are generally bad correspondents, and never enter into their feelings on paper, and Roy was certainly no exception to this rule. He only stated a few bald facts in his letters, and it was impossible to judge from his words as to the state of his mind.

The one communication he had received from Roger Edington on the subject had not been much more satisfactory. He had said that his father wished to take the boy under his own guardianship, now that the death of Mrs. Stratford had left him without kindred in the world except themselves. They intended for the present to keep Roy with them, as he seemed happy and wishful to remain, and a hint was dropped to the effect that it might be just as well for them to understand what arrangements had been made by his so-called mother for the lad's minority. This letter Marcus had not answered. He wanted to know more clearly the true state of affairs before he committed himself to anything. He was ready enough to be very liberal and generous towards Roy; but he had no intention of playing into the hands of the Edingtons if they had any underhand game on foot. He was much puzzled to account for Roy's sudden apparent change of feeling towards himself and towards his old home. He had been so devoted to Marcus before he left; it was strange that he should be so content to do without him now.

No. 1776.—MAY 12, 1888. PRICE ONE PENNY.

Evidently he knew all about his true parentage and position—that was plain from his letters, brief though they were; but it did not explain his apparent readiness to remain in his new quarters, and to do without so much as an interview with Marcus after their long separation. Yet he had said once that "it would never do" for his brother to try and come to Windmill House, "people would not like it." Had they been setting the boy against him? It looked rather suspicious.

His great hope was that the Kynastons would be able to enlighten him on many points. Roy might write to them more freely than to him. They were his great friends, and had seen him last. He walked across to their house the very next morning after his return, and encountered the master of the house a short distance from his own door. He fancied the reception he met was a little cold, but he was too pre-occupied to notice it much till fairly startled by Mr. Kynaston's words.

"I came to ask some questions about Roy," Marcus began. "I suppose some of your children get letters from him?"

Mr. Kynaston gave him rather a meaning look.

"Does he not write to you?"

"I have not heard for ten days or so; and he says very little when he does write. It seems so odd his going off like this, and settling himself down so contentedly amongst practical strangers. I can't make it out at all."

"Indeed!"

The word was so drily spoken that Marcus stopped short, involuntarily, and looked steadily at the speaker.

"Have you any clue to this riddle?"

No response.

"May I ask if you know anything about his feelings towards these people?"

"Nothing at all."

"Yet his reserve and prolonged absence does not seem to surprise you. You appear to understand why he has taken himself off, as it were, into exile so willingly."

"I think I can form an idea as to the state of mind that has led to it."

"Would you be good enough, then, to explain it to me?"

The two men stood facing one another, a look of resolve upon both faces.

"Look here, Stratford," said Mr. Kynaston at length. "I've known you all your life and I've liked you and respected you heartily. I don't like to say a word that seems unfriendly; but facts are stubborn things—things there is no getting out of. That business of Roy's mother's will has an ugly look about it; and, to speak the unvarnished truth, all my young people have been sadly put about by it, and it is difficult not to share their feeling that the boy has been badly used. Of course, he feels it himself, feels it keenly; and although his affection for you and confidence and all that, are considerable, it is not pleasant to be dependent, and he is old enough to know as much. I don't think it ought to astonish you particularly that he should avail himself of an opportunity to escape from a place so full of painful associations, nor that he should extend his absence as long as he is able to do. You have always set your face against his leaving home, though it is natural at his age to wish to see a little more of the world, and now that a kinsman of his own has turned up who takes an interest in him, and is no doubt anxious that his welfare and happiness should be considered—well, can you wonder that a high-spirited lad should give his guardian the slip for a time? My own opinion is that you will not hear much of him for some while to come. He doesn't write to us, but no doubt that is because he is settled and comfortable where he is. His relations evidently make him welcome, and I am not surprised at his liking to stay on. Look here, Marcus, I've got lads of my own, and I know something about their ways and thoughts. It doesn't do to keep too tight a hand upon the rein. They may seem to answer quietly to it for a bit, but in the end they will be sure to rebel and make a bolt."

Marcus had stood quite still whilst Mr. Kynaston was speaking, and had not attempted to interrupt him even by a sound. His face had grown rather pale and very set as the sense of his companion's words came home to him. When all had been said he asked quietly—

"You think, then, that this is the real reason of Roy's strange willingness to leave us?—that he is hurt and grieved, and that home and my presence are alike distasteful to him?"

"Candidly, I do—not permanently, you understand—but just whilst it is all fresh to him."

"He did not seem to feel anything of that before I went away."

"Perhaps not. He is an affectionate fellow, and you have always been fond of one another. I dare say he had leisure to think and to take it all in when you were gone, and possibly Mr. Edington may have endorsed the opinion to which my boys gave pretty free vent. I don't mean anything personal, you understand, Marcus; you might not have been able to stop the drawing up of an eccentric will any more than Roy could; only you know when one man profits so much by another's loss, hard things are apt to be spoken and thought."

Marcus bent his head in voiceless assent. Mr. Kynaston was not very acute in his perceptions, but he saw that he had given pain and hastened to change the subject.

"Your school-house gets on capitally. Muriel goes almost every day to report progress. You will be very busy now, I suppose, if you are to carry out your plans of improvement and self-help during the coming winter. Roy will be home again before long, and everything will go right, you will see. We all know you mean to act for the best, and a little passing annoyance soon passes over, you know."

But there was something a little forced in the easy cordiality of the words, and Marcus turned away with a sense of shrinking.

"Thank you," he answered briefly, "I must be going now. I only came to know if you could give me any information about Roy. You have explained a great deal. I understand things better than I did."

And Marcus walked rapidly away, a strange sad bitterness settling down upon his spirit.

It was all so different from what he had planned. He had been of late, though in general not much of a dreamer, indulging in very sweet hopes for the future: had given rein to his imagination in a fashion not usual to one so quietly self-contained.

He had been planning life at the Hermitage for the months and years to come, a life of earnest purpose, of mingled toil and pleasure, a life that should leave its mark behind, and should bring with it a blessing to others.

And with all his plans and projects Roy had been associated. His young brother should share in all things, should learn that it was no vain promise that had been made him when his lack of fortune had been spoken of as making no difference. Marcus felt a keen pity as well as a deep brotherly love for the boy over whose early years so dark a shadow hung. Roy should never know unhappiness if he could save him from it; he would be to him a brother in every sense of the word. They would act together, plan together, work together; home should always be home to him, and he would try to impart to Roy the deeper purposes that made the background of his own life and character. When once the boy had known the happiness of thinking and working for others, there would be no danger of his finding life purposeless or colourless.

And even from the sweetest of those dreams that had haunted Marcus of late, his brother was not excluded. When he pictured his home beautified and sanctified by the presence of one whose gentle face was constantly before his eyes; when he mused on the holy wedded love that he looked to as the crown and seal of all that was best and noblest in his life and manhood, he had room to think still of Roy as sharing in a measure in his happiness, of feeling home made more home-like to him in the presence of one who had loved him from his childhood and been a sister to him in sympathy, long before there was a thought that such relationship might become a reality.

Marcus hardly knew how and when he had first begun to dream of Muriel Kynaston as his wife. Was it long years ago in his happy boyhood, when she had been his little playmate and queen?—or was it since his late return when he had read in her sweet, earnest eyes a sympathy with his larger views of life and a power of comprehension and thought unusual in one so young? He could not have answered these questions or analysed his feelings, he only knew that he loved her with every fibre of his being, that he had come home full of bright hopes of winning her for his own;—and now he was confronted with coldness and suspicion by those that bore her name and whose opinions she probably shared. Roy was gone—gone in pain and anger, and his friends held his brother up as the cause. With this cloud of suspicion hanging over him, how could he hope that he should be trusted either by her he loved, or by those who held her happiness in their keeping?

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—COMFORTING WORDS.

HARDLY knowing what he was doing, Marcus strode down the long shrubbery walk he had so often paced with Muriel at his side, and threw himself down on the seat in the yew arbour, which in summer was a favourite haunt of the young Kynastons. There was small chance of its being invaded this chill, damp October day, and Marcus was too much absorbed in thought to heed his surroundings over much.

How long he remained thus, lost in thought and dead to outside impressions he never knew, but he was roused at length by the sound of a child's voice.

"It's Marcus!" cried the voice in accents of eager welcome. "It's Marcus come back! Oh, Marcus, I am so glad! We have missed you so!"

Marcus looked up quickly to see little Lilias speeding towards him, her face, upraised for his kiss, glowing with pleasure, her hands stretched out to clasp him round the neck as he bent his head to the warm childish caress so very sweet to him just then.

"Oh, Marcus," said the child, settling herself upon his knee and looking trustingly into his face, "I am so glad you have come home. Now you will be able to tell them that it isn't true—that you didn't get all Roy's money and then drive him away."

"Is that what they say?" asked Marcus, looking into the child's face with a sad smile.

"Yes, they do say such things; but I know it's not true. Say it isn't, Marcus!"

"Why are you so eager over it, little one? What is it to you?"

"I love you, you know," answered the child caressingly, "and I know you wouldn't do anything wrong or unkind. And you love Roy too, I know you do. You didn't take his money, did you?"

Marcus smiled a little as he answered "No."

"I knew you didn't," cried the child eagerly, "and you didn't say he wasn't to go to Oxford, because you didn't want to spare the money? And you didn't say you would keep him at home, because it cost least and gave least trouble, did you?"

"Is that what they say about it?" asked Marcus, stroking the child's fair head.

"They do now. They say anything. Vincent came home with a long story one day, and they've been angry ever since. Roy went away very soon afterwards, and they all say 'No wonder,' and talk as if you'd driven him away? But you haven't, have you? He'll soon come back, won't he?"

"I hope so, little one. I want him back as much as any one."

"Oh, I know you do. I know you love him. You are kind and good to every one. As if you would be stingy to Roy, when you are spending such lots of money over the school, and other things! That's what Muriel says—and she always understands best."

"Did she say that?" asked Marcus, his eyes lighting suddenly.

"Yes; Muriel always tries to stop them when they go on about you; but they won't always listen. When she said that, Syd said it was very easy to build schools with the money you had defrauded Roy of—what is 'defrauded,' Marcus?—in order to make people think you generous and liberal. Syd often talks grandly like that, but Muriel does not like it. When he said that she went out of the room, and I came with her."

The child paused, but as Marcus did not speak, she presently continued—

"Muriel talks to me often about things, though I am so little, because she knows I like her to. I want to be just like her when I grow up, and to think just as she does."

Marcus was caressing the curly head laid trustingly against his shoulder. He could not refrain from the next question:

"And what does she think, Lilias?"

"She thinks that it is wrong to talk as the boys do, and she is quite sure that you have done nothing unkind to Roy," answered the child, "and Muriel always knows best. She is fond of you, and so am I, and we often talk about you when we go to look at the schools, and we hear the people say what a good landlord you are to them. She has missed you, and so have I—so did Roy till he went away. Roy was always very fond of you, too."

Marcus smiled. It was pleasant to hear such things, even from a child's lip.

"There is Muriel calling me," cried Lilias, "She is coming to seek me. Come, Marcus, she will be so pleased!"

Marcus stood quite still. He had meant to leave the place without risking an encounter with any of those who had mistrusted him, but the temptation to see Muriel once again triumphed over all beside, and then was it not almost certain that she had not misunderstood him? He made a few steps forward, and came face to face with her round a sharp turn in the walk. For a moment they both stood silent, then Muriel held out her hand with a smile.

"I am glad to see you back, Marcus," she said simply, and he knew that she spoke in all sincerity.

He could not answer conventionally. He had been too much moved and saddened. He looked at her with an earnestness that betrayed something of the struggle he had gone through.

"So you have a welcome for me, Muriel?" he asked, half sadly. "You have not believed all you have heard?"

"Indeed, no," she answered, steadily, colouring a little beneath his gaze, but speaking fearlessly and openly, "I am sorry you should have heard it. I know it will all be cleared up in time. I do not think that those who say hard things, believe half what they profess. Why did Roy go, Marcus? what made him leave home so suddenly? There was no reason behind the one Mr. Lee gave, was there?—the wish for change, and sea air?"

"None, that I knew of. That was all he said to me when he wrote first. It is this staying on with his relations so willingly, that puzzles me. He seems to like it—he talks of being happy and content, and yet I do not think, by what I saw of one of them, that they would be the kind of people he would care for."

"You did not like Mr. Edington, then?" said Muriel, quickly, "neither did I."

"You did not?"

"No. I saw him twice, once when he first came, and then when he came to see Roy, when you were away. Each time I got the same impression."

"And that was?"

"I hardly know how to express it. It seemed to me as if he did not ring true, if you know what I mean. I did not quite like his manner towards Roy, and I often felt that he was rather intrusive, even though he was a kind of relation. Marcus, has he tried to make Roy distrust you? Has he done anything to separate you?"

"I can hardly say. I have heard so little from him since he left home. It is not like Roy to be so reserved, and so unsatisfactory."

"You do not think, as my brothers do, that it is in hurt pride and pique that he keeps silence?"

"It is difficult to do so, remembering the terms on which we parted."

"He did not then resent——" began Muriel, half hesitating over the words.

"I believe not. I explained that there was a reason, and that it would be put right later. Nothing could have been more affectionate than his manner all through his illness."

"Oh, he will come back—it is sure to be all well!" cried Muriel eagerly, "and then everything will be explained. What are you going to do, Marcus? Are you going to see him?"

"I should like to do so, but I am not sure that he even wishes it. You see he is the guest of a man who does not like me much. That may be why he cares so little about it."

"Oh, I suppose that is it. I know it will all be right in the end! Roy is a dear, affectionate boy."

Marcus smiled as he held out his hand.

"Thank you for that encouragement, Muriel, I needed some very much. And whatever happens, whatever is said or done, may I look upon you always as my friend?"

Her hand lay trustingly in his. Her eyes met his for a moment in a glance that thrilled him strangely.

"Yes, Marcus," was the quiet answer, and he went on his homeward way strangely comforted.

Two days later Muriel received a letter from Roy—the first that had been written by him to any member of the Kynaston household.

"Now that Marcus has got back," said the letter, "he will have told you everything, I suppose; for the secret was only kept, I fancy, for my sake, and now that I know who I really am, other people will do the same. Of course it makes everything quite plain in every way, and I feel horribly ashamed of ever feeling angry about what Vincent told you of. You will understand, too, better why I am staying on here. You see, my great-uncle is my real guardian, not Marcus, at all, and I have not any claim now upon him; and, after the way I've treated him sometimes, I think he must almost be glad to be rid of me—at least he would if he were anybody else, or if he could know some of the things I've thought and felt about him. You see, Muriel, it seems to me as if it were in a sort of way my fault that these people are so poor, and if they like to have me here, it isn't for me to grumble. It's very different from the Hermitage, but I sometimes think perhaps it is good for me to see what other people's life is like. I've learned a lot of things since I've been here, and I'm not unhappy, even if I do get a little homesick sometimes. Perhaps I'll come and pay you a visit some day, but not just yet. It might unsettle me; and I don't want Marcus to come here either, for a lot of reasons, though I long to see him sometimes. I don't quite understand what the older people want me here for; but I think I am useful in many ways to the children. I should make you laugh if I told you all we do here. Things are so odd and strange; but I am fond of some of my relations, and you see for yourself that it is not for me either to grumble at sharing their life, or to clamour to be taken back to the Hermitage, even if they would let me go. I begin to think it was not quite the best thing for me to be so prosperous and well cared for. You will understand me, I think, Muriel, when I say that I have learned a lot of things by being away from you, and feeling alone and cut off from everything—more than I did when I had just what was brightest and pleasantest. Tell Marcus that he was quite right when he told me I should find out it didn't do to trust in the props I'd been holding to before. They were taken away, and I had to find others. I think I've got to the right place now, so you mustn't be unhappy about me. I'm not unhappy myself."

EARLY MISSION WORK IN IRELAND.

BY E. J. WHATELY.

I.

IN watching the early spread of Christianity in Europe, it is curious and interesting to observe the course it took in various parts. The gospel light did not burst all at once on any one country or district, or even proceed straight from one to the next; its progress, as in modern missions to the heathen, was in bright spots here and there; the mountains were touched by the sunrise while the valleys were still dark, and some ranges or isolated peaks seemed to catch the light long before the rest.

The Celtic and Sclavonic races received gospel light, in general, earlier than the Teutonic ones, who were slower to embrace new ideas, though more tenacious in retaining them when once taken.

Notably was this the case in our own Isles. How and where the gospel first reached them cannot exactly be told; but Eusebius speaks of some of the Apostles having crossed the ocean to these remote lands (to them practically much farther than Australia or the Falkland Islands to us) in order to announce the glad tidings which their Master had bid them preach to "every creature." In the days of Chrysostom, towards the end of the fourth century, there were, in his own words, "even in the British Isles that lie away in the open ocean," worshippers of God in Christ and students of Scripture.

The general word "Isles" seems to point to Ireland, quite as much as to England. Through the medium of trade Ireland was even better known to strangers than England, as Tacitus declares.

And when, about the middle of the fifth century, the invasion of the heathen Saxons plunged the chief part of England into spiritual darkness and paganism, the Celtic Christians driven into Cornwall or "Wild Wales," and those who inhabited Ireland, kept the lamp of Gospel truth burning.

Still it was but a very partial light. The largest portion of Ireland was still heathen; and the first missionary of the gospel of whom we have an authentic account is the celebrated Patrick, patron saint of Ireland. This has led to the erroneous impression that Patrick was the first, or nearly the first, Christian preacher in that country. As we have seen, this is very doubtful; but he seems to have been the means of doing more for the spread of the gospel in Ireland than any one Evangelist had effected before.

The ancient lives of this remarkable man are very numerous, and some are still extant, but it must be owned that very few are of any historical value.

Of the seven lives published in one volume by the Irish Priest, Father Colgan, in Charles I.'s time, most are a mere tissue of fables, abounding in miracles and visions; some incidents recorded may have a foundation of truth, but they are so inextricably mixed up with what all the most sensible and well-informed writers, even of the Romish Church, agree to be as utterly fabulous as the stories of Hercules and Theseus, that it is very difficult to separate the truth from the falsehood. Those, however, who have studied the records on the subject most carefully are agreed in believing that "the Apostle of Ireland" was a real person, and that the substance of his own "Confessions," is to be relied on.

The "Confessions," however, is not a complete or detailed autobiography, far from it. Very much is left to conjecture. Of his birthplace there is but little reliable evidence. He was certainly not Irish. Some say he was born in Scotland, others in Cornwall, but the most satisfactory evidence makes him out a native of the north of France. His parentage is generally believed to be British, his father was said to be a Deacon named Calpurnius, and his grandfather a priest called Politus. The early Britons, first civilised by Roman teaching, had generally both Roman and Celtic names. Patrick's own original British name was Succath, but the Latin appellation of Patricius (meaning one of noble birth) is now alone remembered.

The young Patrick was brought up by his parents, naturally, in the Christian faith; but by his own account it had been more outward than real, till the time when trials and afflictions were made the means through God's grace of leading him to a genuine heartfelt belief. The trial came in the form of early captivity; in his sixteenth year he was carried off by one of the piratical bands who were constantly invading his country, who sold him as a slave to a Pagan prince in the north of Ireland. For long years he was herdsman to his master in the mountains of Down and Antrim, suffering all the hardships of slavery. But in the midst of this misery, he himself says, "The Lord brought me to a sense of the unbelief of my heart." He gave himself to instant and earnest prayer, rising often before daylight, "in the midst of snow and ice and rain," to call on the Lord. "I was from my childhood," he writes, "a believer in the only God, but I continued in doubt and in unbelief till I was severely chastened, and in truth I have been humbled by hunger and nakedness, and it was my lot to traverse Ireland every day, sore against my will, until I was almost exhausted. But this proved rather a benefit to me, because by means of it I have been corrected by the Lord, and He has fitted me for being at this day what was once far from me, so that I should interest or concern myself about the salvation of others, when I used to have no such thoughts even for myself."

His captivity lasted from four to six or seven years, after which he regained his liberty and returned to his own country. He was again carried off later, but this second captivity only lasted two months, and he returned to his parents in safety.

But the suffering he had undergone had led him to fix his thoughts and affections on the land of his captivity. He had had full opportunities of learning the language, habits, and feelings of the people, and he was powerfully impressed with the conviction that God had set him apart for work in Ireland. His parents and friends naturally dreaded his departure for the land where he had suffered so much: but he was firm.

He believed he had a revelation, like St. Paul's of the "man of Macedonia;" he saw in a vision a person coming as from Ireland, with letters, and heard voices, as of the people crying out to him to come and teach them. In spite of opposition from all around him, he set his face steadfastly to the work before him.

It was however many years before his project was carried out: what the circumstances were that detained him we know not: but certainly during that time he evidently felt the need of diligent preparation. He studied first under Germanus, Bishop of Auxerre, and then under the celebrated Martin, Bishop of Tours.

Of the events of the years following we know nothing, till we find him, in the year 432, coming over with several well-qualified companions to preach in Ireland.

He landed first on the coast of Leinster, but meeting with violent opposition, he re-embarked in the same vessel and landed in the northern province in which he had formerly toiled as a slave (it is believed in the county of Down), where he preached with great success, and one of his first converts was the prince of the district, Dichu, who provided him with a place of worship where he could hold his services.

He travelled through Ulster and Connaught, where thousands heard the word of God with gladness. Then he returned to Leinster, where he met with similar success, the princes of the country embracing his doctrines with readiness, and encouraging the spread of them among their subjects.

He then laboured in Munster, with equal blessing, and finally retired to the scene of his first labours in the North, where he spent his last days. His death is believed to have taken place about the end of the fifth century, and on the day (the 17th of March) which has been always observed in his honour.

His "Confession" is written in very incorrect Latin; he had probably (as sometimes happens with missionaries who have lived exclusively with the natives for many years) unlearned in some degree the Latin spoken in his youth, and learned to think as well as speak in the Erse tongue. But this roughly-written account bears witness to most extensive labours among the Irish Pagans.

"Though" (in his own words) "I was not worthy or deserving that the Lord should grant such favours as this to His servant."

"And I beg of all," he continues, "that believe in God and seek and fear Him, whoever may be pleased to examine or read this letter, which I, Patrick, poor, sinful, and ignorant creature that I am, have written in Ireland, that no one will ever say that my ignorance is to have the credit of it, if I have effected or proved any little matter according to the purpose of God, but believe and be assured for certain that it was God who has done it."

Besides the Confession, the writings of Patrick that have come down to us, are a letter to the Christian subjects of a Pagan prince, relating to the persecutions they suffered from him; certain canons supposed to have been drawn up by him in conjunction with others at a synod held in Ireland; and lastly, in the Irish language, the famous hymn commonly called "St. Patrick's Armour." This is a kind of prayer intended for a defence against the plots of his foes, which beset his path to Tara, where he was going to preach before the king and states of Ireland. It is believed to be the oldest monument of the Irish language in existence. It begins with a profession of faith in the Trinity, the Incarnation, Death, Resurrection and Ascension of Christ, and His coming to Judgment; then follows a trustful prayer for protection against the danger of the eventful day. It has already been often quoted: but to some readers it may be new, and an extract from it will show the spirit in which it was written. It may well be taken as a watchword for every Christian going forth to work for God under difficulties and trials.

"At Tara, to-day, may the strength of God pilot me, the presence of God preserve me, the wisdom of God instruct me, the eye of God view me, the ear of God hear me, the word of God render me eloquent, the hand of God protect me, the way of God direct me, the shield of God defend me, the host of God guard me against the snares of demons, the temptations of vices, the inclinations of the mind, against every man who meditates evil against me, far or near, alone or in company." The prayer ends with these memorable words, "Christ with me, Christ before me, Christ after me, Christ in me, Christ under me, Christ over me, Christ at my right, Christ at my left, Christ at this side, Christ at that side, Christ at my back, Christ in the heart of each person whom I speak to, Christ in the mouth of each person who speaks to me, Christ in each eye that sees me, Christ in each ear that hears me. Salvation is the Lord's. Salvation is Christ's. May thy Salvation, O Lord, be always with us!"

Patrick's writings are all animated with the same spirit as his prayer. Christ is the centre of his teaching. On him all his faith is fixed. We find no allusion to prayers to human mediators, whether saints, angels, or the Virgin Mary; no mention of purgatory, human merit with God, transubstantiation, or any other specially Romish dogma. His father and grandfather were in holy orders, and naturally he had no idea of the celibacy of the clergy being necessary. All we gather of his teaching is far more in harmony with that of the modern Protestant Mission teachers in Ireland than with the Romanists who delight to speak of him as one of themselves.

A LAY PREACHER.

Little things, on little wings
Bear little souls to heaven.

A LINNET came to stay with me for a month during last summer. It was a little town-bred thing, probably originating somewhere in the Seven Dials, or thereabouts; and had never piped its shrill note to the glory-lit sky, unclouded by smoke or fog, nor felt its wings pulsating in the sweet air, above green grass and streamlets or waving cornfields.

It came to me in a little box, some six inches by ten, where it had evidently passed its previous existence, because its tail had become misformed from the cramped position, and it had never learnt to fly. I cannot bear to see birds in cages, and this particular little prisoner gave me real pain when I saw how near the soft little head, which ought to have been pushing its way skywards, was to the top of that wooden box. But I was asked to receive the little creature as a visitor, and I could not refuse.

I was going to stay in London during the summer, and the owners of my little friend were going away, and could not take their live possession with them. It was certainly no gilded cage that the bird was confined in, and no grandeur or luxury lay outside his prison. The children who owned him knew well enough what it was to go without food during the day, and their own cage (the linnet would call it their cage!) was as cramped as his own little box. One little room in a wretched street, where during the summer the inhabitants sat outside the houses to catch the least little breeze, or fresh air, that blew upon the heated heavy atmosphere.

It was a little street, but the number of people who lived in it seemed enormous; and when they all sat outside and talked and screamed, and fought together, it was anything but a refreshment to the mind, at least, to be there. There was a dying woman who used to sit, wrapped up, at the corner of the street, and in the kindness of their hearts, the neighbours used to go and stand by her "for company." She has gone now, and I cannot help thinking of another street in another City, "of pure gold," and of a tree in that street, the leaves of which are for the healing of the nations. It will certainly be a new life after the thick smell of rotten cabbages and other garbage, and the loud and angry voices, many of them cracked from trying to make themselves heard in the busy streets, and more of them husky from drink and hard living.

But such was the world that the children lived in, and the linnet looked down upon, as he hung on a nail outside the window, in the heat. And to this world he preached, chirping in his box, and the nature of his discourse was this: "My friends, we have song in us—let us sing."

If any one had said with bitterness, "Here the only songs are of the public-house kind," his faint clear note would have contradicted them, and his mis-formed tail preached patience.

From this world the children were going away for a time, going to the Hopping world. The father and mother and all the children would be away for about a month, and the key would be turned in the door, but the linnet could not go with them.

Last autumn we read in this magazine of the hop-pickers and the hop-fields. Will any one look back and read about them? I am afraid all hop-fields are not like those; it took many loving hearts and weary brains to make a garden of cultivation of what used to be a hotbed of evil. We need many more hearts and brains to work, as some are doing, for the good of the hoppers, for there is plenty still to do. The way is clear to us, for we can follow those grand leaders who began the Augean work. What hop-gardens must have been we can scarcely imagine. What they are in some places still, and what only took place last season, cannot be written here.

When we remember that it is to many of the inhabitants of our back streets the one holiday and change they get during the year, it would seem only natural that those who know what fresh air means would make it a possibility for those who wish to keep respectable. In the present state of things one can only implore the mothers and fathers to leave their daughters behind when they go for this "harvesting," with some one to take care of them; but I dream of a time when it will be safe for those dear girl-faces to become bronzed and rosy with the fresh air. The great advantage of this kind of holiday is that they can be employed all day in a new work that is like play to them, and they can go with their own "pals," the companionship of whom makes all the difference in life to them. Who is going to help in this work, I wonder? Do not let any delay too long, for lives are not long where the linnet came from, and the need is sore.

The children went with their mother to the hop-gardens, and the linnet came to me with a halfpenny for its supply of food. I took it out of its little box as soon as possible, and let it fly about my room. Its flying was of such an extremely wobbly uncomfortable kind, that I do not imagine it cared much for its passages in the air. The fact of the matter was, that owing to a faulty education and sundry disadvantages in the way of a crumpled-up tail and such things, it could not really fly at all. It would flutter to a shelf, upon which stood some green boughs in a jar, sent to me from the country, smelling of the sweet resinous smells which no one appreciates so much as a Londoner. Upon these boughs my little friend would sit for hours. I think a little extra joy must have come into his life as he felt the boughs bend beneath his weight, and sway beneath him if he moved.

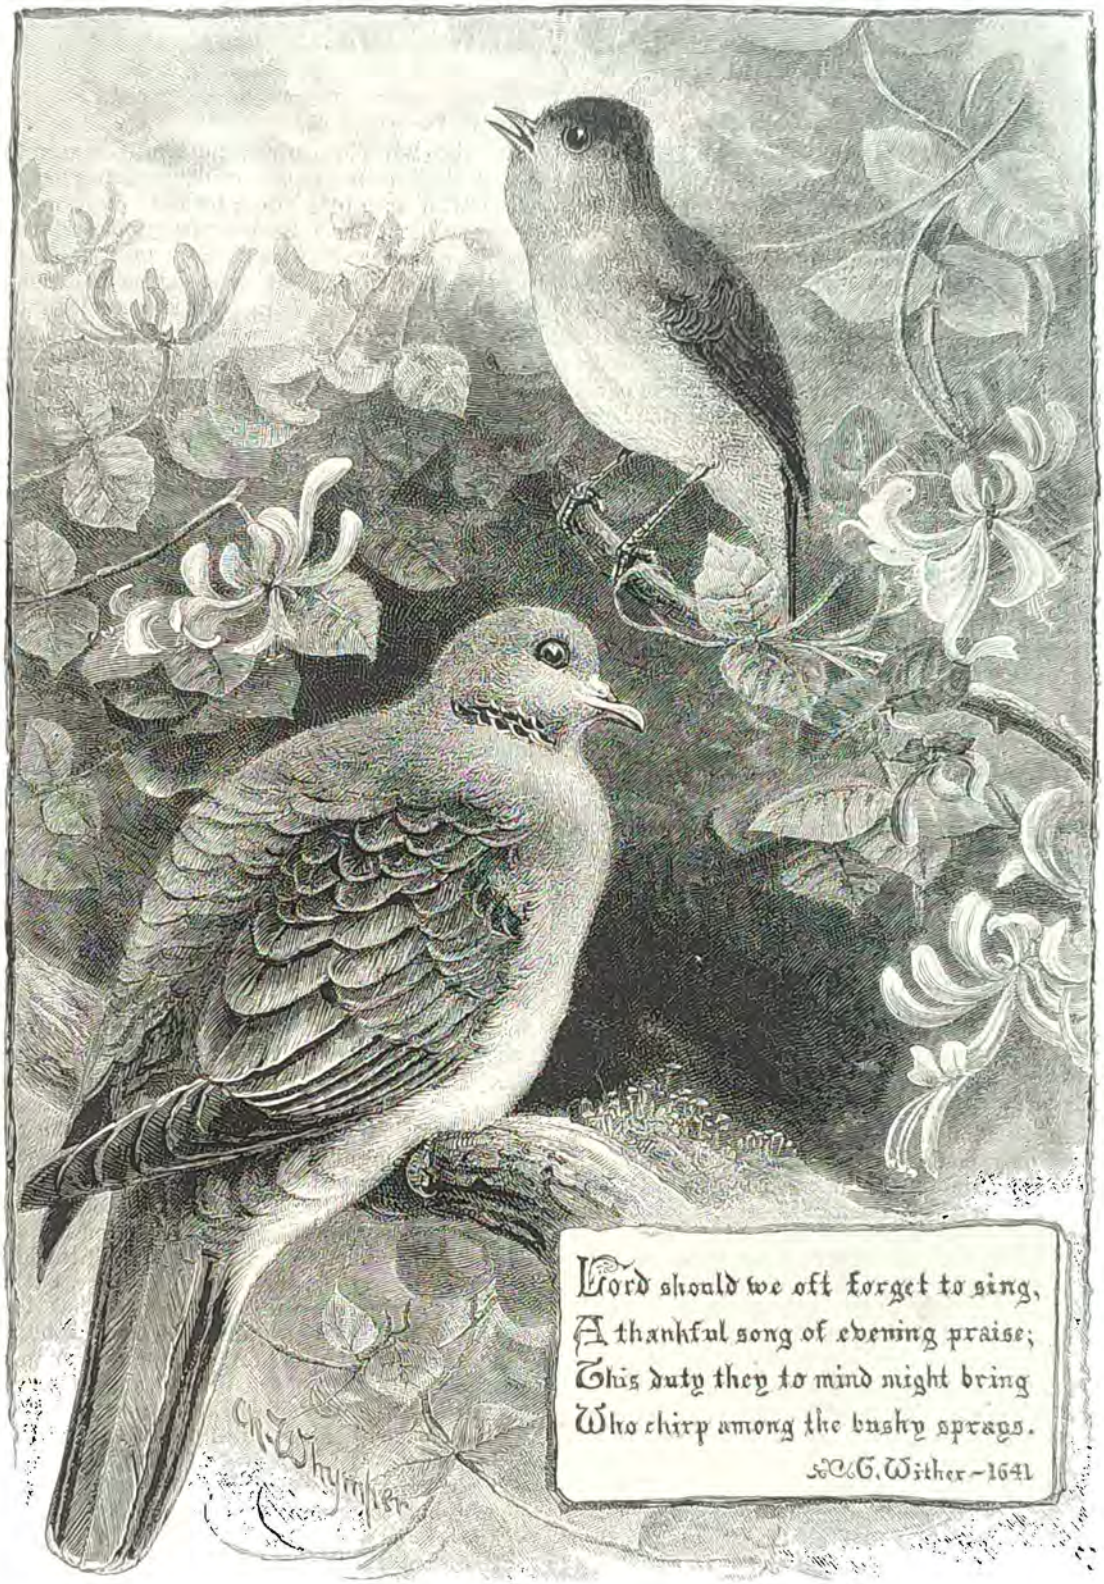
It was a great happiness to me to see him there, and after a time he would always find his way to these "green-wood shades," and from there he would preach to me, and his sermon would be of this kind: "My friend, if you cannot sit in a forest, or even in a tree, be thankful for a bough. Why should you sigh for more? You cannot sit on more than one bough at a time."

That bird was always preaching, not only to me but to every one that came to see me. I overheard a little sermon one day, the text of which was: "Fellowship." It was preached to a little child of three years old. Her short life had been a series of struggles by reason of the simple matter of boots. It has always seemed to me such a natural thing for children to go about barefooted, in fact I have sometimes gone to the length of envying their free little toes; but to this little child no boots was a sign of disgrace, and I have seen her stand with her face to the wall and refuse to go beyond her particular domestic alley because she had no shoes or stockings.

She happened to be shod on the day she came to my room, slipping in while I was writing, and making her way shyly towards the window where the linnet was. I heard the bird flutter as she leant over the box, and stuck her little fingers between the bars. Then I heard her say to herself in a tone of triumph, "De bird's dot no boots!" And she sat down contented, by her companion in adversity, as she considered.

There is one more sermon I will mention, and remember this is no "make up" on my part, it is all truth. The linnet used to be put outside on my balcony in its little box, in the cool of the evening. I used to notice how the little London sparrows would hover round. One day I came into the room quietly and went towards the window. I thought my little friend was eating his seed, but I soon saw that this was not the case. He took seed by seed in his beak and deliberately dropped them out between the bars of his cage, where the sparrows were waiting for them. What was the text this time, do you ask? It sounded to me very like one that I had often heard: "If thou hast much, give plenteously; if thou hast little, do thy diligence to give of that little." And I do not doubt that in some way the promise was fulfilled of the "good reward in the day of necessity."

Those who have taken the trouble to read about this little lay preacher may be glad to hear that when the children came home from the hop-gardens, the first thing they did was to buy a new and larger cage for their little winged friend.



Lord should we oft forget to sing,
A thankful song of evening praise;
This duty they to mind might bring
Who chirp among the bushy sprays.

G. Wither—1641

SIR HERBERT EDWARDES.

II.

OUR first notice left Sir Herbert Edwardes nearly at the outbreak of the Indian Mutiny. It was not so great a surprise to him as to those distant from the scene, and to some who were close upon it. Eight years before, when dropping down the Sutlej, on his way home to England, in company with his friend John Nicholson, he had written a forecast of the event in these words: "The outbreak in the first of the month at muster; massacre of all European officers at parade; ineffectual stand of a few European regiments; retreat to the sea and embark." The chief part of this outline, conjecturally prophetic as it was, received its fulfilment to the letter; that the last sentence was not also realised, was mainly due, under God, to his own forethought and efforts. He was well acquainted with the various elements of danger embodied in the Sepoy army, and had carefully in times of peace revolved the chances and changes of that dreadful war. As the event drew near, he was quick to hear the first rumbling of the storm. Intuitively he discerned the probable origin of the movement. He writes to his wife: "These regiments at Barrackpore have probably been tampered with by the dethroned princes who are still in exile at the capital," an explanation which was soon to be verified by the information that the Government received.

And if his discerning mind had prepared him to receive the intelligence without surprise, his steadfast faith had given his spirit an equally solid preparation. His attitude at this time cannot be better described than in the language of the 112th Psalm: "He shall not be afraid of evil tidings; his heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord;" or in the words of the 46th Psalm, of which we find an echo in one of his letters; "God only could have carried us through it. There is a sure refuge in our God, in faith and prayer." Yet he did not underrate the danger. Speaking of the chances of defeat, he says, "It cannot be God's will; and you will rely upon it we shall gain the victory, though there must necessarily be a frightful loss of blood." What distress of mind he felt, was much more for others than for himself. He was happy to think of his wife as safe in England, whither she had gone for the sake of her health early in that year. Others of his friends were in the thick of the mutiny, and for them he had to endure the agony of fears arising from danger, distant, unknown, and therefore magnified. Sir Henry Lawrence, whom he had just left at Lucknow, was soon beset by a host of rebels, and met his death before the day of its memorable relief. However much pain these fears cost him, they raised no cloud over his intellect. With a clear and cool head he set about contriving and carrying into execution the schemes needful first for securing the Punjaub, and next for despatching help to those who were beleagured by the mutineers.

As political more than military officers, it fell to Edwardes and Nicholson, who was closely associated with him, rather to devise and counsel than to command. Happily the actual issue of commands depended upon a man of like mind and determined will, General Cotton. A crisis soon came that called for all their wisdom and firmness. Disaffection arose in the native army. Some regiments were immediately removed from Peshawur, but this was not enough. Regiments broke out into open mutiny, and they resolved on the disarmament of all the native troops. In order to effect this, the opposition of their commanding (English) officers had to be overcome. They were not alive to the danger, and pleaded for half measures. They were, in fact, pleading for their own honour. General Cotton broke in with, "Gentlemen, no more discussion. These are my orders, and I must have them obeyed!" Some cavalry officers threw in their swords with those of their men, and even tore off their spurs. Edwardes writes: "It was impossible not to feel for and with them; but duty must be done; and I know that we shall never regret the counsel that we gave!" The odium, if evil consequences followed, would naturally fall upon Edwardes and Nicholson. But no evil followed; an immediate advantage was gained. Edwardes and others had been making great efforts to raise levies among the natives of the district. Their chiefs had been holding off waiting upon the tide of events. These vigorous measures determined them, and troops soon came flocking in. That they did so, was in a great degree due to Edwardes' influence, acquired in former years. As soon as the outbreak of the mutiny was expected, he proposed to raise a thousand Mooltanees, the men who had witnessed his gallant bearing at the battle of Kinyeree. They were ready to answer his call, and not only they but the wild people of the hills, whom he had tamed not by armed force, but by the terror of being dismarketed, as has been before related. One day he was roused by the news that three hundred Afreedees were running down from the hills, ostensibly to take service in the force he was raising. The people about him were scared. He walked in among these unpromising recruits, not without a passing thought they might wish to entrap him; he picked out the young and able, gave friendly words to the elders, and then sent them, with the present of a rupee for each, back to their native hills.

Thus the crisis was met. Peshawur and the neighbourhood were rendered secure; and the disaffected Sepoys, who had supposed that they held the lives and empire of the English in their hands, saw their places filled by the rough men of the mountains. Upon some of them a terrible retribution had come. Those who had been in open rebellion were soon broken and scattered in flight, cut up by European troops, and hunted down by the natives of the provinces.

Meanwhile the eyes of all in the Punjaub were directed to Delhi. There was the heart of the mutiny, and upon it an onslaught was preparing. Thither all available troops had been sent, and upon their excellence Edwardes rested his hopes, especially upon the Guides, emphatically a Punjaub corps. This is not the place to speak of that memorable siege, or even of one event in it which cut him to the heart—the death of his friend Nicholson, who was badly wounded inside the walls; so far had he led his troops towards victory. It is enough to say that these hopes were realised, and that Sir Herbert had the pleasure of welcoming back the Guides, and giving in honour of them a public narration of their deeds.

After hearing the story of that year, one can readily believe that if Edwardes' counsels had been followed, a much larger force would have been raised and at a much earlier date. He proposed it immediately the mutiny broke out; but his proposal was slighted, and the whole business delayed, because his chief, Sir John Lawrence, was not sufficiently alive to the pressing need. His subordinates were almost forced to act without orders, carrying out what they had determined on in face of disapprobation. This is the more noteworthy, because the English public in general, for want of correct information, has hitherto given Lord Lawrence the sole credit of the achievement.

In Edwardes' correspondence with Sir John Lawrence on these matters, the frankness and singlemindedness of his character fully appear. He does not hesitate to assert the correctness of his design, and yet there is no note of reproach, nor a trace of wounded pride, as if he had been at all wronged by his superior's course of conduct. All is friendly, charitable, and Christian-like.

It is time to turn to another phase of his activity, in which his pure religious faith shows itself, not as the hidden spring by which an even course of life was maintained, but itself in direct action for the cause of God and the benefit of mankind.

Four years before the mutiny, Edwardes had taken part in the establishment of a Christian mission at Peshawur. In doing so, he took a departure in a direction exactly opposite to the course adopted by his predecessor. Colonel Mackeson dreaded and would not tolerate the presence of a missionary, thus impersonating, as we may say, the spirit and policy of the East India Company. Edwardes took a different view. To his eye, Hindoostan had been committed to Englishmen by Providence, not that they might enrich themselves, nor yet that they might find suitable spheres for their younger sons, but that they might convey to India the blessings of Christian faith, and in the act of giving to them the benefits of Western civilisation, might base their institutions upon the only true foundation. Other nations had tried their hands with a degraded form of Christianity; it was England's duty to disclose to the heathen the priceless jewel she possessed of an unadulterated faith.

These views he openly propounded when occupying the chair at a meeting called to establish an Afghan mission, and in accordance with them he gave cordial help to Colonel Martin, a less distinguished man, but equally devoted, who a few years after resigned his post that he might give himself entirely to missionary work. This was but a small beginning, still an outpost was here established, an advanced picket of the great army of Christ. Even this movement was a considerable advance upon the previous state of things. In General Reynell Taylor's life we read how he, Edwardes, and General von Cortlandt, Edwardes' coadjutor at the battle of Kinyeree, met for prayer in a tent in the Bunnoo valley, the only four Christians in all that wide region. They nursed the flame which now warmed them for further effort.

In connection with the beginning of the Afghan mission an incident is recorded which seems to show how the paths of Providence centre on a given point. The mission naturally required an Afghan version of the Scriptures. Edwardes remembered seeing a Pushtoo Testament in the hands of an old chief. It was one printed at Serampore, thirty years before, and the chief had been told to preserve it till the "English should come to his country." The English had come, and the Testament so long preserved was quickly printed and the copies circulated.

The support thus given to the mission was steadily continued. When in England, finding it difficult to keep up his subscription, he handed over his house at Peshawur as a permanent resource in aid of the mission.

No one can fail to remark the essential difference between this line of conduct and that of other English officers, who carried out to the letter the views of the East India Company. They dealt tenderly with Eastern superstition; it was a thing not to be touched for fear of exciting religious hostility. Edwardes' belief, on the other hand, was that the Oriental is religious, intensely religious; his belief may be wrong, but he holds it fast; if we are slack in maintaining our faith he will not respect us; an aggressive not a neutral policy is the true course for Christians in India.

After his return to England he never ceased to reiterate these views in the public ear. He showed the futility of the policy which absolutely discouraged Christianity in the Sepoy army; and the strength that would result, if a number of Christians were spread like leaven throughout the native ranks. He maintained that caste should henceforth be disregarded, that no official notice should be taken of Mohammedan and Hindoo festivals. Abhorred to his mind was the idea of levying tribute on the horrid festival of Juggernaut.

There are recorded in this volume two remarkable instances of men who discountenanced Christianity, one going the length of openly censuring a chaplain who ventured to explain the Scriptures to Sepoy soldiers. Further it is remarked that both these men were victims of the mutiny. Had there been a few Christians in the ranks, they might have been saved.

The exclusion of the Bible from Hindoo schools was another thing with which Edwardes would have nothing to do. In all things, indeed, he was a Christian first, a soldier and ruler afterwards. Unsectarian in his sympathies, he supported warmly the form of Christianity in which he had been brought up. That was the Church of England, but the ritualistic branch of that church found small favour with him. He could not see that anything was gained by putting one ritual in place of another. The heathen, he thought, would identify such Christianity with idolatry. His views of church organization had somewhat of a soldierly colouring. He could not understand how a clergyman could do otherwise than obey his bishop, being as it seems much of the mind of the centurion of old: "I say to one, Go, and he goeth!" Yet in this and in other points, he was sincere, single-hearted and pious. His reward is on high. Yet he had a large share of reward on earth. He was honoured by his comrades, honoured by his superiors, honoured by the British public, and most of all honoured and in his death mourned by the natives of the Punjaub.

THE HOPE THAT IS IN US AND THE REASON OF IT.

BY THE REV. JOHN KELLY, EDITOR OF THE "PRESENT DAY TRACTS," ETC.

"But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts: and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear."—1 Peter iii. 15.

TWO things can hardly fail to strike the readers of this epistle, viz. the background of trial, suffering, and persecution which it reveals, and the spirit of hopefulness which it breathes.

The Christian communities to whom St. Peter's Epistle was addressed were passing through much tribulation, and in comforting and instructing them he wrote in the most buoyant and cheery tone—in a tone that was fitted to animate and strengthen them to the utmost. His faithfulness too is as conspicuous as his hopefulness.

In the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth verses of the third chapter, he writes:

"The eyes of the Lord are over the righteous, and His ears are open unto their prayers; but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil. And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good? But and if ye suffer for righteousness' sake, happy are ye; and be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled." And then he adds—

"But sanctify the Lord God," or Christ as Lord, "in your hearts; and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear."

You see, he addresses the believing strangers scattered abroad as having a hope in them.

At the beginning of this epistle, he says, associating himself with them,—

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to His abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, or a living hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance, incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you, who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time."

We see here the nature, source, and object of the hope. We see also the guarantee of the fulfilment of it. It is a living hope—an undying one. Its ultimate source is the mercy of the Father. Its immediate source is the new birth of the partaker by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. "We are quickened together with Christ." When the new life enters, the living hope springs up in the heart. Its fruition is in the incorruptible, undefiled and unfading inheritance. The guarantee of its fulfilment is its reservation in heaven for us, and our preservation for it, through faith, by God's power.

In every respect it is a contrast to the hope which springs up in the natural heart, of which the world's poets so often sing. There is nothing sure and certain in that hope. The only sure and certain thing about the earthborn hope, which terminates in the things of time and sense, is its ultimate disappointment. The vanity of human hope is a very common theme of the moralist, and a favourite one with the cynically disposed. It is illustrated everywhere and every day in the world. We have not far to seek nor long to wait if we wish to find proofs of it. The hope of the Christian is also a contrast to the vague hope of a blessed future when this life is over, which many cherish who have not been quickened together with Christ.

Many are ready to express their hope in God's mercy, and of the attainment of heaven at last, who know nothing of Christ and the power of His resurrection. They reveal their ignorance when they attempt to give a reason of the hope that is in them. It then becomes manifest that their hope has no vital roots, that it springs from their good opinion of themselves, or from their erroneous and defective conceptions of God's character and law. It is not based on God's revealed character and testimony.

PAINTED BY PROFESSOR HOFMANN.

CHRIST PREACHING ON THE LAKE

To those who have a living, heaven-derived, God-given hope, the Apostle addresses two precepts. One has reference to their inward life. The other has reference to their attitude and spirit in relation to inquirers concerning the reason of the hope that is in them.

"Sanctify the Lord God," or "Christ as Lord in your hearts."

That is the first precept. The state of our hearts is to be our first concern. What is it then to sanctify Christ as Lord in our hearts?

We sanctify Him thus not only when we recognize Him in His true character, as the Son and the Sent of God, with the eye of the heart, when we receive Him into the heart, and believe on Him with the heart, but more particularly when we render Him the homage of our hearts, when our thoughts and desires are in accordance with His mind and will, when nothing is harboured in our hearts that is contrary to His will. We sanctify Him in our hearts when we enthrone Him there, when we have Him to rule over us, and every thought is brought into captivity to the obedience of Christ.

This precept shows the inwardness of the true Christian life, the paramount importance of keeping the heart with all diligence, that the Christian life must be rooted in the heart. If Christ be not sanctified as Lord in the heart, there can be no true sanctification of Him in the life. Lip-homage and outward observances, phrases and forms, are not holiness.

We must sanctify Christ as Lord in our hearts habitually, or else there can be no true holiness. This habitual sanctification of Him requires habitual vigilance and prayer. No one can fulfil this precept truly who does not watch and pray,—who does not watch against the risings of pride and rebellion within, and against the encroachments of evil from without; who does not pray for grace to repress the one and resist the other. Our hearts are treacherous and weak, and they need to be kept and watched. If we go to sleep, or cease to pray, they will deceive and betray us.

The word of Christ too must dwell in us richly, if we are to sanctify Him as Lord in our hearts. We must meditate much and deeply in His word. By His word and Spirit He teaches and rules us, and we honour and obey Him. By them He sanctifies us and we sanctify Him. His word gives us light. His Spirit gives us strength.

We must trust Him fully and implicitly in all circumstances if we are to sanctify Him in our hearts. If we distrust Him we cease to sanctify Christ as Lord.

We must love and delight in Him if we are to sanctify Him in our hearts. Christ can never be sanctified as Lord in a loveless heart. Unreserved trust, love, obedience, homage and reverence are requisite in order to sanctify Christ as Lord in our hearts.

The second precept contained in our text has respect to the attitude and spirit of the Christian towards inquirers concerning the hope that is in him.

"And be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and fear."

The hope that is in the Christian is here supposed to attract attention, to excite interest and curiosity, and a desire to know the reason of it. The hope, therefore, must have a practical and perceptible effect upon the character and life. It must have such an effect as only a heaven-born hope—a hope fixed on a heavenly object—can have. The effect must be so decided as to leave no doubt in the mind of the beholder, that it is, to the Christian himself at least, a sure and certain hope, not a doubtful and uncertain one.

The effects to be produced by it in those to whom he wrote, contemplated by the Apostle, were mutual love, kindness to enemies, blamelessness of life, patient endurance of wrongful suffering for Christ's sake. The effects which the "living hope" should everywhere and always produce are—unworldliness of spirit, Christlikeness of character and walk, separation from all evil in every form, patience in affliction, and calm and joyful expectation of the ultimate attainment of the object of the hope.

The hope that is in us should produce purifying, sustaining, gladdening effects, effects fitted to impress the beholder and cause him to exclaim—What is the secret of the hope which these Christians cherish? I cannot explain it. To answer such an inquiry Christians must always hold themselves in readiness.

"Be ready always to give an answer."

We are not enjoined to give unsought explanations. We are not told to be forward in giving reasons. We are to hold ourselves in readiness to give them.

It is more important to have the hope so manifestly in us that it will attract attention, and excite inquiry, than to speak about it.

The silence of the man who has this hope thus in him, whose whole character and life are moulded by it, is much more eloquent than the speech of the man in whom the presence of the hope would be imperceptible, unless he ran about saying to everybody—"Come, and I will tell you all about the hope that is in me, what it is, and why I cherish it." His silence, indeed, may be more expressive even than his own speech. There have been cases of persons who were converted by means of silence, who were unmoved by speech. We have heard of one—a Jew—who resisted every argument used by a missionary in conversation and discussion, but was led to reflection and decision for Christ when he was told that arguments and persuasion were exhausted and he must now be left to himself.

In applying a precept couched in such unqualified and universal terms, we are to have respect to the whole teaching of the New Testament with reference to our conduct in various circumstances, and to act accordingly. Proceeding on this principle, we shall remember that to reply to the scoffer may sometimes do more harm than good, that it may be like casting pearls before swine.

The inquirer may be truly anxious, if possible, to have his doubts solved, but the scoffer does not want to know the reason of the Christian's hope. He wants to find occasion to deride the Christian's hope. Silence is often the most effective answer to him. We need to have the wisdom of the serpent and the harmlessness of the dove. By our silence we may show that we perceive his spirit and purpose. By our life we may show the reality and power of our hopes, and disarm if not convince him.

A Christian minister was once preaching in the open air to an audience of men near a large public-house. One of the roughest of his hearers, a well-known scoffer, asked if God was good, why He did not give us beef and bread. This was really a taunting challenge to the preacher to vindicate the faith and hope that were in him. The spirit of this challenge and the circumstances were not such as to hold out any prospect of advantage from entering into controversy, and no controversy took place. Some time after, the preacher was called very early in the morning to visit a man dying of fever. He went, and while he was praying by the bedside, the patient breathed his last. The scoffer of the open-air service happened to be a witness of the death-bed scene. He said nothing at the time, but afterwards declared to his fellow-workmen that he would never speak against the preacher again. He had previously believed that Christian ministers were mercenary hirelings, who would not expose themselves to inconvenience and risk in the discharge of their duties. What he saw on the morning in question, however, convinced him that there was such a thing as disinterested devotion to Christian service.

It is an answer sufficient to justify our hope, that we are to be ready to give. We are to be ready to say in whom we hope, on what ground our hope is based, and what we hope for. We should question and cross-question ourselves to see that we have a hope for which we can render a reason, that we have a good and sufficient reason for the hope we have. It is not a blind and unintelligent expectation which we are to cherish, but a hope that will bear examination, based on reasons intrinsically sufficient to sustain it.

Need it be said that only divine testimony and the witness of the Spirit with our spirits afford a foundation strong enough to sustain the hope of the Christian? Any other foundation than this is sometimes weak, and will assuredly give way.

It is important and useful to be able to give good answers to various objections that are raised, to be able to show that greater difficulties are involved in the denial of the reality of the faith and hope of the Christian than in their acceptance as true and well founded, but human reasoning alone affords no sufficient ground for them. They must have a foundation divinely laid and eternally sure. This they have in Christ, Christ for us and Christ in us, Christ our righteousness and Christ our life, Christ the offering for our sins, Christ in us the hope of glory.

Our answer must be adapted, as far as may be, in form and contents to the state of mind of the inquirer, to his knowledge and character, but substantially it must come to this: we must acknowledge the divine foundation, the spiritual source and the heavenly object of our hope. The humblest and least enlightened real Christian can fall back upon his experience of Divine power and grace, and in the spirit of the man blind from his birth, whose eyes Jesus had opened, say:

"Whether the difficulties and objections which you raise are valid or not, I cannot tell; one thing I know, that whereas I was blind now I see."

One point more remains for consideration, viz., the spirit we are to display in answering inquiry touching the reasons of the hope that is in us. "We are to give an answer to every one that asketh us a reason of the hope that is in us with meekness and fear."

There is to be no bitterness in our spirit, no superciliousness in our tone. We are not to be censorious or overbearing. There is to be no flippancy or irreverent familiarity in our manner of answering. We are to seek to commend the truth to the inquirer's conscience, and to win his heart. We are to remember the source and object of our hope, that it comes from God, and terminates in Him, and to speak under the impression which these considerations are fitted to produce. We are to speak of the hope that is in us with meekness and fear. Thus only are we likely to influence and impress.

This then is the spirit in which inquirers should be answered by the Christian. What beauty as well as power is there in such a spirit!

We would do well to ponder deeply, in order to possess, cultivate, and display the three features of vital, influential Christianity which the precepts contained in our text commend to us, viz.: the inwardness of the true Christian life; the dignity of the true Christian attitude; and the beauty of the true Christian spirit.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

ON THE HEROINES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

NO. X.

Warm-hearted, active, sparing not
Herself in any task or toil,
To honour her dear guest.
And yet, methinks she hath forgot
How all her needless care must spoil
This hour of sacred rest.

1. Once to thy wife, then thee, the angel came,
   And doing wondrously vanish'd in flame.
2. O tiny thing, we fain would learn of thee,
   Thy patience, skill, and wondrous industry.
3. This fertile spot in a great Nile-fed land,
   Was given to the Israelitish band.
4. Here on the murm'ring host, swift judgment came,
   God's righteous wrath, in punishment of flame.
5. O Agagite, but for thy son's fierce pride,
   And plots, he had not thus untimely died.
6. Jehovah's wondrous grace and love alone
   Can touch the callous heart, hard as this stone.

M. E. R.

NESTA AND PHYLLIS.

II.

THE aunts themselves were always lively, and busied themselves happily with a variety of things; lawn-tennis and bathing; a little painting, a little music, and a good deal of dress. They had many acquaintances, and were apparently very much liked by them. Phyllis used to listen to their talk at tea-time as she sat in her own little chair by the window, but she did not think it very interesting. She was most nearly happy when she could hide herself in some quiet nook among the rocks with a book—only the place was so crowded it was difficult to find a quiet nook even among the rocks, and there were not many books to be got in her aunts' lodgings. Phyllis wandered on the sands, too, sometimes by the hour, and watched the other children playing: if Nesta had been with her, she would have made friends with them.

In this way things went on until Phyllis had been more than a fortnight at St. Margaret's. And all this while the news of Nesta was that she was no better yet,—nothing else could be expected, her aunts said; such an illness as hers must take time. To Phyllis it seemed a terribly long time! Then there came one very bright Sunday, on which Aunt Madeline remarked that Sundays at the seaside were very tiresome. That was after morning service and after lunch, and when Aunt Adelaide and Aunt Flo had just agreed that a nap until tea-time was the best thing to try for.

"What are you to be about, Phyl?" asked Aunt Adelaide, who was already on the sofa.

"I don't know," said the child.

"There's to be a children's sermon this afternoon, I believe," said Aunt Flo. (The regular church service was in the evening). "Would you care to go, Mouse? Now, mind, you need not say you would unless it's true."

"I think I'd like to go," said Phyllis, thinking most of what her mother would like.

"Off with you then, and tell Laing to go with you."

Laing was the Miss Bruces' maid, a very grandly dressed and haughty person, who did everything she had to do for their little visitor as if she felt it beneath her dignity. It was a relief to Phyllis that Aunt Flo came to the bedroom with her after all, and gave her own message; and whether or not Laing had any more desires to go to church that afternoon than her mistress had, she made no objections. The two walked off together slowly and primly through the blazing sunshine: Phyllis ventured only one remark from under the shade of her Leghorn hat.

"It's very hot."

"Yes, miss. Very hot," answered Laing severely; and after that nothing more was said until they reached the church gates.

No one was to be seen entering there but themselves, so it seemed plain at once that they had mistaken the hour of service: and very soon they knew they were late, for a hymn was struck up suddenly within the church, and the sound of lonely little Phyllis's footfalls on the door-step were lost in the music of young voices singing, "What a friend we have in Jesus!" She did not know herself why she felt the tears come near her eyes and her heart beat faster. Laing stepped into church first, and beckoned impatiently to Phyllis as she lingered behind, ashamed of being so late. The middle of the building was filled only with children, but Phyllis did not go to sit with them; Laing took her into an empty pew at the side, and quite near the door.

Well! we have all read stories of little waifs and strays; home heathens and outcasts, who had wandered by chance within hearing of the "glad tidings of great joy;" and how that sound when first heard seemed so beautiful that even one or two words of the message of love were enough to change all their lives. But my little well-taught, well-cared for Phyllis came to church that day as she had often done before, carrying her own Bible in her hand, and her mother's Christian lessons in her mind, if not in her heart: how could it be then that to her all she heard was new and wonderful?

Ah! the same miracle had to be done for Phyllis that has been done for all those who hear aright. Christ Himself must open our ears before we can understand His voice.

The minister had chosen an old familiar text, the first that Phyllis had ever learned: "Suffer the little children to come unto Me." And probably there were in church other children whose first text it had been too, and who did not mind it or the sermon much; played a little quietly, or whispered to each other, or thought of something quite different; or perhaps some of them listened for the time being, and forgot about what they heard afterwards. But Phyllis listened with all her might; and never forgot that sermon afterwards. You see, it was all about what she needed: she felt as if it had been meant just for her.

Now, Phyllis had generally been thought a very good child by other people; and nobody but Phyllis herself quite knew what a mistake that was. The memory of many wrong things she had done—some of them in what seemed the long ago time of her eight years of life—used to come back to her again and again when she lay in bed at night, and the room was quiet, or when something made her think of death, which comes to the young as well as to the old, and must come at last for us all. Disobedience, untruthfulness, selfishness, unkindness, covetousness—Phyllis's conscience was clear of none of these things. And in the last days, when she had wanted so much to pray for Nesta, the feeling of her own sinfulness used to hinder her when she tried. Why, she knew that she had not even loved Nesta as she ought to have done! But now she heard that Jesus Christ would take away all her sins.

Then next, the minister told her that children, when they came to Jesus, found a Friend, from Whom they could never be separated—a Friend who could always help them, who loved them better than any one else could do. Oh, how Phyllis, during these motherless, sisterless weeks at St. Margaret's, had wanted a friend like that! Would He really (she kept asking the Lord in her heart) not only forgive her and make her good, but let her tell Him everything, and stay with Him always? Did He care that Nesta was so ill, and Phyllis alone among strangers and always shy; and did He know, better even than mamma did, the sorrow of it all?—Yes, indeed. In all the wide world Phyllis heard, there is no such friend as the loving Lord Jesus.

And last of all, the minister spoke about coming to Jesus to find a King.

Then Phyllis heard that the Great King of Kings and Ruler of all creation orders also the lives and hearts of little children. And she knew now that it must be His will that Nesta lay very sick of typhoid fever in her mother's room at home, and that Phyllis wandered alone by the sea at St. Margaret's; and somehow that thought made all her trouble seem different. There is perhaps nothing so sore as fretting, and Phyllis had learned long ago in her mother's nursery the comfort of submission to a wise and loving will. "Mamma knows best, we must do as mamma says," had been her earliest lessons; and because she knew them so well now, it was the easier to begin to change them into a higher trust and obedience. For the children who come to Jesus have the hearts and the duties of loving subjects in the Kingdom of Heaven.

The sermon was not at all long—Phyllis thought it short—and when it was done, the congregation sang, "I heard the voice of Jesus say"; and the minister sat and looked kindly down on his little hearers; perhaps he was praying for them in his heart.

But Phyllis was not thinking much of the minister; she was not thinking of any one in the church but the Lord Jesus, whom she could not see at all with her bodily eyes, but who was there nevertheless, and had shown Himself to her. Her heart was so full of the new thought of His love that there was no room in it then for anything else.

She rose quietly from her seat when Laing beckoned to her, and walked home without saying a word aloud. But though Laing did not hear her, perhaps the angels could—One greater than the angels certainly did. For Phyllis was praying "O Lord, be my Saviour—my Friend—my King!" And He Who loves the children so, gathered this one who had come to Him into His arms, and answered: "I will."

Now, it would take too long to tell you all the difference that Sunday made in Phyllis's life at St. Margaret's, where she felt herself a lonely child no more. That very evening she went down to the rocks with her own little Bible in her hand, and found a sheltered seat where she could only see the waves and the sky, but she was not solitary even there. She knew her Saviour and Friend was very near, and when she read in her Bible, it was about Him, and what He had done and said; and when she looked out on the sea, she remembered that it was His and He made it; and the Bible had never been interesting before as it was now; and the world had never seemed so beautiful.

And after that day Phyllis began to think that her aunts were growing much kinder. The truth was, I think, that God put some of His own love and patience into the little girl's heart; and she tried to please her aunts, and was grateful when they tried to please her, instead of keeping away from them coldly because they were not like her mother; and she found things to occupy her, and did her best with them, even though it had to be done without Nesta.

The Miss Bruces were delighted to see the child happier, and met her timid advances a good deal more than half way; and, strange to say, even Laing became quite friendly with Phyllis. That change dated from one afternoon that the little girl offered to read aloud to her a new story-book which Aunt Adelaide had given. It needed a good deal of courage to make the offer, and Phyllis would rather have read to herself (she could get on so much faster); but she was so sorry for poor Laing, sitting hour after hour and putting stitches into Aunt Flo's new dress, without anything to make her forget how tiresome it was!

And though probably Laing did not love reading or hate sewing so much as Phyllis did, she felt her heart grow warmer, and smiles came to her thin lips, as she listened to the new story.

Then, one day on the beach, where Phyllis was walking about as usual watching the other children, a little fat baby girl tumbled down almost at her feet; and Phyllis picked her up before her nurse could come to her help. And somehow it came to pass (because the nurse was such a nice girl, Phyllis thought, and the children were so dear), she found herself presently making a sand castle with a moat round it for an admiring group of little toddlers, who thought her very big and very clever. Phyllis's little friends were ready for her again next time she came to the beach; and as days went by she played with them very often, and she, who had no brothers and sisters of her own, found out, among the many new discoveries of that time, how delightful baby children are.

These were some of the ways in which God comforted Phyllis—putting love between her and those around—and yet, if He had not been more to her than those earthly friends, she would have been solitary still. But she learned that she could not be happy, even for a short time, away from Him: if she did not keep close she was sure to stray back again into the old desolate life of her first day at St. Margaret's. Every morning, when she knelt in her little room before Him, Who knew all she needed better than her mother did, she prayed Him to hold her close.

Meanwhile Nesta's fever had been running on its course. Phyllis did not know—there was no need she should know—with what anxiety her parents watched for some time over their little daughter's sick-bed. God knew, and He held Nesta's life in His hands. Phyllis could do nothing for her but pray; and how could she, in any case, forget to do that for her sister, her other self?

And He Who does all things right chose to bring Nesta back to health and strength again in this world. She began to grow slowly better, and after six long weeks of separation the little sisters could look forward at last to a day of meeting.

The re-union was to be at St. Margaret's, to which an easy journey would bring the little invalid: and, oh! with what loving joy and expectancy did Phyllis gaze beforehand up at the windows of the lodgings Mr. Elliot had taken for his family!—She used to pass by that house three or four times every day.

Then came the delight of watching the packing of her own box, which was the first of the luggage sent to the new lodgings.

"We'll all miss you, Miss Phyllis," said Laing, as she folded up the little dresses quite as if she respected them.

And Phyllis, though proud and pleased and amazed, could think of nothing truthfully polite to say at first, and then fortunately remembered before it was too late—

"I'm not going far away; I'll see you often again."

Then she added, with a great blush of shyness, "Thank-you for all your kindness."

But Phyllis had other things far more precious than any Laing packed into her box—treasures which could only be carried safely enough in her own arms. There was a big doll which her aunts had given to her and she had kept for Nesta, and there were all the clothes (such smart ones!) which Laing had made for it in the evenings when she had time to sew for herself, and which she had brought to Phyllis all ready as a surprise. Then there was Phyllis's collection of shells—for Nesta, too, of course. The shells were put in a box on the table of the room that was to be Nesta's, and the doll was put in a chair; and the new story-books (aunties had been very generous!) with the names of Nesta and Phyllis Elliot, both written in them by a childish hand, adorned a shelf above the bed.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

"JUST ENOUGH!"

No. 1777.—MAY 19, 1888.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR.

THE VENNEL SCHOOL AT EDINBURGH.

UP from the Grassmarket, or rather down into the Grassmarket, to be etymologically correct, runs that narrow steep descent the Vennel of Edinburgh. Near the top is the New Greyfriars Parish School, or Ragged School, or the Vennel School, to give it its popular name, founded forty-two years ago, by the late Dr. William Robertson. It began humbly and quietly as a practical experiment for the moral and religious elevation of the poor; and it has gone on steadily fulfilling its design. To it come children from all parts of Edinburgh, most of them willingly, some because the School Board insists on their attending some school and this is the only one that will receive them in their state of poverty and hunger. Since its establishment there have passed through its books over 15,000 children, a large number, considering that the usual strength, half boys and half girls, is under three hundred; but this is accounted for by the short stay made in the school by many of the children, whose parents either lead a wandering life or else improve in position and become properly independent so as to feed their family without recourse to charity.

Life has not much hope for such as come to the Vennel; orphans and deserted children adopted for purposes of gain; children of deserving poor widows, and other women, whose circumstances compel them to work for their livelihood, but who are too poor to provide enough food for their children and to pay for their education; children of parents, who, through long-continued sickness or want of employment, have been reduced to extreme poverty; children of idle, dissipated folks who, in spite of all we can do, neglect their natural duties, and squander on their selfish indulgence the means that should go to provide for their offspring; children whose relatives are all in prison. Not a nice lot the two last, and apt to prove the truth of heredity! But what is to be done? To prevent is wiser than to cure, and it is surely only just to give the children a chance of improving on their parent. The scope for improvement is often great. A month ago we saw a letter from a man, now much respected in the world, the youngest of nine brothers all of unblemished character, whose parents were never out of prison for three consecutive months from their marriage day to their deaths. The boys were turned adrift to starve, or beg, or steal, and one by one found their way to a ragged school. "I owe my position," said the letter, "to acting as my brothers have done. We have all, under Providence, prospered honestly in the world. In every difficulty we ask ourselves what our parents would have done; and we do exactly the opposite." A shocking rule of life, but in many cases a wise one among the children of the shameless!

"When we consider the condition of the children," said one of the earlier reports of the Vennel School, "and what would become of them if there was no kind heart to feel for them, or helping hand extended to deliver them from the fearful misery in which parental neglect has placed them, we have no hesitation in saying that it is not only in accordance with the spirit of Christianity, but it is wise policy to provide for them the means of instruction and godly upbringing, so that society may not in future suffer from the crimes of the children as it is now suffering from the profligacy of the parents. Therefore we gladly admit such children to this school."

The Vennel is, in short, a public school for the very poor, only a very small proportion of the scholars belonging to the parish in which it is situated; and it contains about half of those children in Edinburgh with which the School Board confesses itself unable to deal. It is undenominational, and unsectarian. Very few of the parents are now, or ever have been, connected with any church. All are welcome within the means at the manager's disposal. The children generally come recommended by missionaries and district visitors, or by other ladies and gentlemen who know their wants; sometimes the parents apply. The circumstances of each case are carefully and personally inquired into, and only to seemingly fit subjects is the charity extended.

It is a day school, not a boarding school. The child must have a home of some sort to go to at night, and though it may come in rags it must come with clean hands and face. A strange provision it may be thought, but a necessary one, and one with important consequences. "Often," said the master to us the other day, "children come at first filthily dirty, so dirty that I cannot put them with the rest. I send them home with a message. Next day they come just as bad. Again I send them home. Next day they come again, just as bad, for some of the people we have to deal with hardly know the true colour of their skin; then I take the child home and see the person who has sent him or her, and I explain the difference between cleanliness and dirt. The woman is frequently surprised at my making a fuss about so little, but finding I am in other respects a fairly reasonable man she makes an effort to oblige me. Next time the child comes with a fraction of the dirt taken off. That is a great step; it shows something has been attempted. Then I have him or her well washed and made to look tolerably decent. When the child gets back at night looking better than ever before, the mother is astonished and delighted, and next morning does her best to send out her son or daughter cleaned up to my standard of excellence. That is the next step. The next is when the mother—as is often the case—becomes ashamed of being dirtier than her child, and takes to cleaning herself. There are many homes, I can assure you, which have been quite reformed by our insisting on the children coming here clean. It has led to a general removal of dirt from all the faces of the family!"

In short, the physical improvement effected is in every respect most gratifying. Poor little things come to the school whose appearance, owing to want and neglect, is such as to excite the intensest pity, but soon the regular and abundant supply of wholesome food, and the habits of cleanliness, tell their tale. The joy and vigour of childhood return, the faces assume a healthy glow, and the sports and amusements of youth give pleasure. In many cases the character of the youngsters is very debased, as appears but too plainly from their revolting language. But as they mingle with the others they catch the tone of the school, and an alteration is soon observable, so that in a short time they learn to hear with aversion the language with which their lips were familiar. Among them are some whose irregular attendance or incorrigible conduct has caused their expulsion from other schools. A few of them will not submit to the wholesome restraints of discipline; but the great bulk are effectually subdued and become regular and diligent pupils, the reform being effected not by punishment, but by the influence of companionship on the faculty of imitation.

The children have two meals a day—breakfast of porridge and milk at a quarter to eight in the morning, and dinner between twelve and one, the parents being expected to give them any additional food they require, although in many cases they get nothing at home. They are dismissed at four o'clock, except on Saturdays, when they go home after dinner. On Sunday there is but one meal—the dinner. The range of teaching extends from the simple lessons of the infant school to the fifth standard in the Government Code, the school being dependent on the Government grants for efficiency and on private subscriptions. It is managed by the minister and kirk-session of New Greyfriars parish church; and the staff consists of a head master, an infant mistress, a sewing mistress, an assistant, a cook and cleaner, and three pupil teachers. The girls get instruction in sewing and knitting one hour each day, they have also to help the cook in preparing the food, and keep the school-rooms clean; every week there is a class in cookery and domestic management; every day there is for all an hour's religious instruction. The children are looked after not only in school and at meals but in the playground, so that they are always well in hand. The playground is well known to artists as being a favourite spot from which to sketch the castle of Edinburgh.

The buildings are seldom empty, as a visitor soon discovers. Besides the day school there is evening school. On Sundays there is a children's service, beside school and school-teachers' prayer meeting. Once a week a clothing society meets to make and distribute clothes, both new and re-made, from parcels of cast-off garments sent by friends. And there is an evening sewing class in which girls are taught to make and mend their own dresses brought for alteration and repair.

The Vennel is in fact a centre of usefulness, a moral reformatory, whose influence it is a worthy object of charity to extend. It is a feeding school to which few of the objections to feeding schools hold good. Let the reader go and see for himself, inquire into individual cases, and say how otherwise he would treat them. The children are fed wholesomely, and treated kindly, and hence not only come willingly and regularly, but give healthy brainwork to their studies; they receive a practical up-bringing in the best of ways; and the good example that is set them they take home.

W. J. GORDON.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE.

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XXXIX.—AN UNDERSTANDING.

MURIEL did not understand Roy's letter, though she was glad indeed to receive it, glad both of the assurance it contained at the close, and of the hints with which it began. She did not know what he meant by the expression "who I really am," nor by many of the other phrases he used: but she saw that there had been some secret kept from him and from others for his sake, which explained all that had perplexed them before.

She resolved that she would ask Marcus what it meant upon the first opportunity, and keep her counsel until she had done that. Marcus had not as yet spoken a single word to the Kynastons as to Roy's true parentage, or the real claim these relatives had upon him. He was reluctant to speak upon a subject that his step-mother had so much wished kept secret, and although it was plain that Roy knew a good deal now, he could not be certain how much had been told him, and he preferred to keep silence until he should be assured on that point. He was not fond of half truths; unless he felt at liberty to tell the whole story, he would rather not say a word, and if Roy had not confided in these most intimate friends of his, Marcus determined that he would not speak.

Roy might be glad, when he visited his old home, or returned there for good, as it was possible he might, that his secret was a secret still; and nothing was said by the elder brother that might tend to divulge it.

But when Muriel put Roy's letter into his hands, and looking up at him in her steady, fearless fashion, asked him to explain it all: when he read what the boy had written, and saw that he wished for no concealment, and had accepted the full truth and his own consequent position with so much of unconscious bravery and heroism, then, indeed, he felt as if a load was lifted from his heart; he understood Roy's feelings and state of mind as he had never done before. It was not hurt pride but genuine humility that had kept him from complaining to Marcus, not pique, but a strong sense of duty which had led him to accept so willingly the strange life to which he had been introduced, and settle himself down in a new home. Roy was showing himself in new colours, and it was very plain that the reason for this was that he had at last really enlisted under a Banner that had heretofore been his rather in name than in fact. Marcus drew a long breath as he handed the letter back to Muriel.

"Will you explain it, please?" she asked. "I do not understand, though he thinks I do."

And Marcus did explain, told her the whole story from beginning to end, as he had heard it from Mrs. Stratford on her death-bed, coupled with the charge she had laid upon him respecting Roy. It was a relief to him to tell it, and a relief that the one who heard it first from him should be the one of all others who had trusted him most, whilst she had perhaps loved Roy best. He could speak to Muriel more freely than to any of her family, and she listened with undivided attention.

"I think I understand everything now, Marcus. It was her wish for Roy to stay always at home under your care, lest these relations should want to take him away, as they have done."

"Yes; she fancied he would be safer with me. She was nervously timid about him. She was afraid of his going out into the world, lest he should hear the story of his father's disgrace, and be looked down upon as a swindler's son. She wanted him to know nothing of his past, until at least he was of age, and could withstand any attempt on the part of his guardian to control his actions. She was afraid of those Edingtons, afraid of their moral and religious influence, as acting injuriously upon him if he were brought into contact with them. She was afraid, too, of their grasping, selfish covetousness, and left her fortune to me, though to all practical purposes I only hold it in trust for Roy, and if she had told me earlier what she had done I should have got it so settled in her will. However, although there has been undoubtedly some pain and misunderstanding, which I was unable to explain away without betraying trust, I do not think any real harm has been done. That letter of Roy's shows that he is made of sterner stuff than his mother (let us still call her so) feared. Let us hope that instead of succumbing to evil influences, he is himself bearing witness to the truth in a household where such witness is sorely needed, and standing to his colours like a true soldier. Muriel, I am happier about him than I have been for weeks, for I begin to see that what he says is true, that it was enervating him to live quite so shielded a life as his. He needed scope to show the metal of which he is made. I am proud of our boy, and I am convinced now that he will be a better, braver, and stronger man, for this trial of his manhood and his faith than if he had never been called upon to meet it. I will not forget his mother's charge. I will do all I can to smooth his path and bring him back if he will come; but I do not now think that this affair is a matter for regret. He has come out nobly, and I am proud of him."

Muriel's eyes were shining with a proud happy light. She was thinking that somebody else was coming out nobly too.

"Dear Roy," she said softly; and added, "Marcus, may I tell them at home—tell them everything?"

"I shall be grateful, if you will. It has been easier for me to tell the tale to you, Muriel."

She understood him, and her fair face glowed.

"And what shall you do about Roy, now?" she asked to avert attention from herself.

"I must try and find out from him if his health is suffering at all. If it is, I shall feel justified in interfering. Lee thought he would want care and watching during the winter months, and I have great doubts whether he will get either one or the other there. I have no legal power over him, but a strong moral one. I shall question him closely about himself, and if I am not satisfied, I shall take steps to see what change can be made. The Edingtons may not be well disposed people, but at least they will be answerable to reason. I am only surprised they keep him with them, as there is so little to be gained by the charge. I have been afraid to send him or them any money, lest it should act as an inducement to detain him there, and his own readiness to do as they wish makes it a little more difficult for me to interfere. But I shall wait and watch, and see what can be done. I do not intend Roy to remain at Windmill House indefinitely, if I can help it."

A glad smile beamed over Muriel's face. She did not like to think of Roy's being there too long, though perhaps he had learned some lessons that he hardly would have done at home.

"I think you will be able to accomplish anything you set your mind on, Marcus," she said with a sort of glad confidence, "and I know you will always do what is kind and right."

He looked at her a moment, and then looked away; strong man that he was he was afraid to trust himself just at that moment. The rush of feeling that came over him must be calmed and stemmed; and yet after all why should he not speak? Did he not love her with every fibre of his being, and was not the trust she reposed in him possibly something akin to love? Had they not known each other all their lives? What was there to wait for? He looked at her and met her sweet, serious gaze. There was something in her calm, childlike simplicity that stilled the tumult within him. The only outward sign of agitation that he showed was by a concentration of purpose expressed in the lines of his face, and in the luminous glance of his eye that was rather fine, and made Muriel marvel within herself how any one could distrust a man who could look like that.

"Muriel," he said, and his voice was low and clear, with a vibration of tone that thrilled her, she knew not why, "how am I to thank you for that?"

"For what, Marcus?"

"For all you have said—for the trust you have had in me when other people doubted."

"You need not thank me, Marcus. Indeed, I could not help it. You know we were always friends from the time I was a little tiny girl and you were so kind to me."

He smiled down at her as she stood before him, yet his face was rather pale.

"You have a good memory, Muriel. Do you remember what you used to promise me in those days?"

Her eyes were raised fearlessly to his, but they drooped a little before his intent gaze, and the colour rose softly in her cheeks.

"What, Marcus?"

"That you would love me always, and never change; and that when I had grown up to be a man and came back to claim you, I should find you waiting for me, the same little loving Muriel as ever? Have you forgotten it? I never have. I have thought of it many times when I have been far away—more since I have been near you again."

He paused, but her eyes were hidden. Yet she did not turn away from him, as he stood before her in the little woodland path in which they had met. Her sweet face glowed with soft colour, her lips trembled a little.

"Muriel, you say you trust me—you think Roy's future is safe with me. Can you extend that trust? Can you give me something else as well? Muriel, my darling, can you trust me with your future—with yourself?"

She looked up then; for one brief moment their eyes met; he read in that glance the glad, happy surrender of herself.

"Yes, Marcus," she answered very softly and simply, and laid both her hands trustingly in his.

CHAPTER XL.—THE GREAT-UNCLE.

After the first introduction of Roy into his study, Andrew Edington made no objections to his coming there as often as he pleased. Odd as it seemed to the boy, it was quite looked upon by the other two as a matter of course that the study should become the living-room of the house whilst there was so small a party at home, and the arrangement suited him very well, as it saved him the necessity of going up and down stairs, and also gave him access to a very fair library as well as plenty of quiet and leisure for study.

He studied other things besides books. He was interested from the first in the old man, his great-uncle. He often found his attention straying away from the open page before him to the bowed white head opposite, and he wondered what thoughts were working there, and what had been the history of this strange, silent companion, who had been so long making up his mind even to see the ward he had decided to take into his own keeping. Roy was aware that he was often furtively watched, that a pair of luminous dark eyes was often fastened upon him with intent concentration of gaze, but for the first two or three days very few words passed between the oddly assorted couple, and Roy's talking was all done at the hours when Joan came to bear them company. But Joan had a busy time before her, directing the careless, untrained maid how to clean the rooms more thoroughly than they ever could be cleaned when the family was at home, and getting through some "kitchen mysteries," as Roy termed them, in the way of curing, salting, and pickling, which always fell to her lot, and which could be better done when there was less cooking wanted than usual. Now and then Roy would hobble down to her in the lower regions, to watch proceedings and make believe to help, and if the sun shone, he would take a turn in the garden before returning to his quarters upstairs; but the weather was for the most part wet and cold, and the fireside had irresistible attraction.

Now Roy was by nature talkative and sociable, and it was not an easy thing for him to sit silent, hour after hour, when there was anybody in the room with him to be talked to. Moreover he was just now enjoying a good deal the reprieve from his exertions on behalf of refractory and ungrateful pupils, and his spirits, which had been somewhat depressed of late, were recovering their normal state of elastic buoyancy. He had the secret of happiness within him now, and everything about him seemed touched with an indescribable halo. He was curious, too, about his own past, about the family history of which he knew but the bare outline. He had grown used to the knowledge that had once seemed so unutterably painful, and he could think of it and of his own position without any of the morbid shrinking that had oppressed him at first.

But it was not on family matters that the silence was first broken, or the first advance to friendship made. Roy had been brought up to all the little instinctive courtesies unknown to the inmates of Windmill House, and he could not sit still to watch an old man lifting about heavy volumes, getting them out or putting them away, without rising to help him, and though Andrew Edington stared at him at first, and seemed hardly to understand what he meant by his attentions, he did not repel them, and sometimes they had a little talk about one of the books in question, in which the old man evinced a good deal of taste and scholarship, both a little rusty from disuse, but showing that his time had not been altogether wasted, although there had been little aim or object in the studies and researches he had prosecuted.

It was a treat to Roy, however, to hold intellectual conversation with anybody. He had hardly been aware how much he had missed the companionship of cultivated minds till he began to converse with his great-uncle, and look up out-of-the-way bits of information for him, from one or another of the ponderous tomes of his curiously-assorted library. Andrew Edington, though slightly failing both in body and mind in some respects, kept his intellectual faculties still unimpaired, and great was Joan's astonishment when she first found her father and Roy engrossed in some discussion to her altogether unintelligible, but which was carried on with great animation on both sides, as well as with visible pleasure. This was not the first time that she found them similarly employed, for the ice once broken was not allowed to form again, and one thing led to another, till there were few questions of interest untouched upon between uncle and nephew, and Roy had no diffidence in speaking openly, or asking any question that came into his head.

He heard the whole story of his father's ambitious and successful career, successful until the crash that brought the whole erection of his colossal fortune tumbling to the ground. Somehow the old man was able to speak of this catastrophe without any bitterness now; he sat opposite to Roy, looking at him in the intent way to which the lad had now grown used, and talked of the loss of the looked-for fortune with a calmness that almost amounted to indifference. Had Joan been present, she would have been greatly astonished, but these talks of the past took place in her absence.

Then the old man would in his turn take to be questioner, and would ask Roy his history, and listen with great interest and attention. Sometimes he half apologised for the interest he evinced.

"I loved your father once—he was like a son to me—much more so than Roger has been. Roger takes after his mother's family; Hubert was always more to me, and you are very like him. Sometimes as you sit there, I think that it is Hubert come back again. I wish it were—I was very harsh to him once; I should like to hear him say that he forgave me. Go on, boy, tell me more about yourself. I like to hear it all. I am glad that Hubert's child has had a happy life. Alicia was always a good woman. I am glad I gave you to her."

"I owe you a great debt of gratitude, sir, for the gift; she was the best and kindest of mothers that ever a boy had."

"Yes, yés, I can believe it; but she is dead now, and you belong to us. You don't want to leave me, do you, Roy? You don't want to go back to Marcus Stratford? He is no relation of yours, you know."

"I know he is not, and I have no claim upon him, except that we have always been like brothers, and I know he would give me a home with him if I were to ask it; but I shall be guided by your wishes on the point, sir. You are my guardian and my kinsman, and I am quite ready to do as you require. Only I see that your means are narrow, and I do not like to feel myself a burden upon you, and I have nothing of my own, as I dare say you know, with which I can repay your hospitality;" and he proceeded to tell him all about the provisions of his mother's will, explaining his own dependent position, and his knowledge that his future prospects lay in the hands of Marcus Stratford—in his assurance that his interests should never be overlooked.

Andrew Edington listened with keen attention to this revelation which meant much more to him than it did to Roy; but he saw at once that it might alter Roger's course of action considerably if it were to come to his ears. He knew that his son was virtual master of the house, and that it was really his doing that the boy had been brought there at all. What would happen were he to discover that his prize was no prize after all? Was it not possible that he might at once reconsider the advisability of restoring the boy to his old home? The old man barely understood the working of his son's mind, but he thought this highly probable, and he was suddenly afraid of losing Roy. Somehow life had begun to look different to him since the boy had became an inmate of that lonely room of his.

"Don't tell Roger what you have told me—about Alicia's will, I mean. Don't let him know, I don't wish it."

"Doesn't he know? I fancied he did," was Roy's answer, somewhat surprised, "I fancied Marcus had explained, or that he had heard somehow. He told me there was something strange and that I had better find it out. I don't think it strange at all now; but I believe your son knows."

"Well then, you need say nothing about it. It is my wish that you do not. I am your guardian. Roger has nothing to do with you. He has no claim to meddle with your affairs."

Roy was ready enough to admit this truth. He did not like Roger, and had no wish to enter into any discussions with him. It was much pleasanter having dealings with his uncle, of whom he was beginning to get fond.

This study became a very pleasant place of resort to him now, and a sort of haven of refuge of which he stood in some need, for he was anything but well, harassed by a cough that had an ugly sound about it; and he was little fitted to bear the change from the luxurious life at the Hermitage to the harder and sterner régime that characterised Windmill House. The other rooms were so cold, and the corridors so draughty that it was an effort to him to leave the snug warmth of the study to go to his own room at nights or to take the small amount of exercise for which he felt fit. He was pretty well and bright just as long as he could sit quietly by the fire enjoying his book or a chat with his uncle; but any exertion brought on fits of coughing that tired him out, and left him good-for-nothing, and he looked forward with some dread to the return of the rest of the family when he might presumably be expected to resume his former habits and his former occupations. But on one of these points he was speedily relieved.

He was looking frail and ill enough one evening to rouse Joan's attention. She knew that he had a bad cold that she could not cure by her best endeavours, but she was not experienced enough to be seriously uneasy, though she did not lack for sound common-sense.

"One thing, Roy," she said in her decisive way, "you don't have anything more to do with teaching those great unruly boys until your cough is quite gone. You are not fit for it."

"But what will Mrs. Edington say?"

"Caroline is not your mistress, Roy, nor is Roger your guardian. Father, is it your wish that Roy works himself to death over Archie and Dick, trying to knock some learning into their heads, as he has been doing before?"

The old man looked up sharply, his brows slightly contracting.

"Certainly not. Roy will continue to remain with me in my study. I like to have him, and I have a right to claim him, if I choose. Understand Roy, that this is your room still, when the rest come back. I am not going to have you made a victim to those children of Roger's."

Roy looked up gratefully, though he could not help smiling at the indifference of the grandfather for his grandchildren; but he was getting used to that state of affairs at Windmill House.

"Thank you very much, sir," he answered, you may be sure I shall avail myself of your kind permission."

"And do get rid of that horrid cough," said Joan, "I can't think why it doesn't go."

"I'll try," he answered with a bright smile, "I'm sure I don't want its company any longer."

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE REFORMATION.

V.

AT the time of the massacre of Saint Bartholomew, Paris had about eighty churches and sixteen convents. These churches were served by hundreds of priests, each of whom was bound to read his breviary and to learn from it the lesson for the day. If he had to preach, the church had there put into his mouth the thoughts he was to inculcate. The last day of the massacre was John the Baptist's day, and the lesson in the Paris breviary, was a homily from Chrysostom, teaching that the real offence of the Martyr was that he maintained the light of virtue in the presence of vice. Referring to Herod and Herodias, "the king" it said "had not the heart to put that light out," but "that wicked and miserable woman compelled it to be done." The lesson went on to say, and here there was a striking change from the singular to the plural, unnecessary as applied only to the murder of the Baptist: "All they that since have dwelt in land or sea, both who then lived, now live, or shall live hereafter, both have known, and shall know clearly these wicked tragedies, both that of their lewdness, and that of their blood-guiltiness, and no time shall be able to wipe out the remembrance of them."

Says the great historian of France, speaking of the man who, in 1572, played the part of the Parisian Herod: "Whatever care they took to surround and deceive him, he had felt without doubt the great and universal hatred which would pursue him for ever. He had by the massacre dispersed through the whole world, missionaries of eternal hatred. An unanimous cry, even in his lifetime, already began against his memory, a cry horribly shrill, like a piercing shriek in his ear."

THE RUE DES PRÊTRES, NEAR THE SEINE, WHERE ST. BARTHOLOMEW COMMENCED.

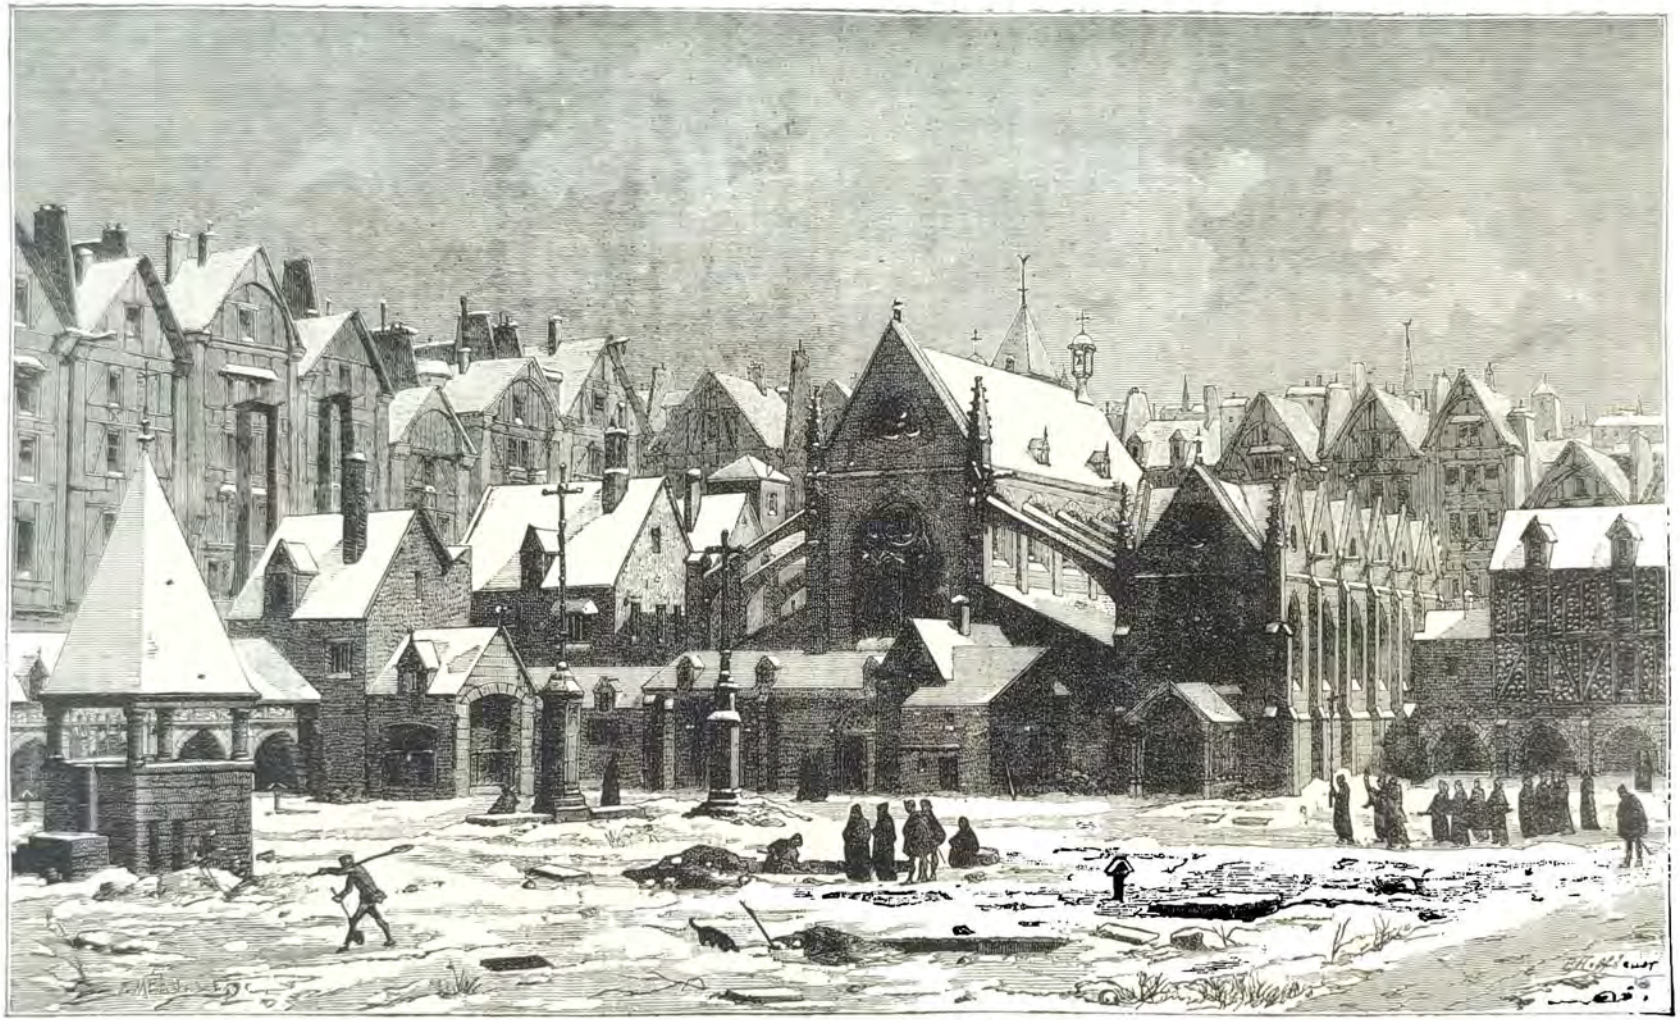
In Floréal of the year II. (May 1792) the representatives of the people of France placed the following inscription on the spot supposed to be that from which Charles IX. fired on the Huguenots: "It is from this window that the infamous Charles IX. of execrable memory, fired on the people with a carbine."

PONT NOTRE-DAME, WHERE A NUMBER OF THE WEALTHIER PROTESTANTS LIVED, AND A CHIEF SCENE IN THE MASSACRE.

Yes, the Church even in its most corrupt forms, is taught of God, but "hearing it hears and understands not." "Lessons for the day," who has ever believed this word? Who listens, listens as for any day? To take the church at its word, and to believe the lesson is for the day, and contains the "daily bread" so often prayed for, this would bring God too near.

Into what blindness, the Huguenots themselves had fallen, at least the nobility who placed themselves at their head. Coligny himself, led by worldly policy, Jeanne d'Albret, dazzled by the prospect of an alliance with the royal family, forgot that virtue and vice could never be one; that the cause of justice and that of injustice must ever be totally opposed: that if Jehoshaphat would ally himself with the house of Ahab, it would end in the destruction of all his children. Both these noble souls were taken before the



THE CEMETERY AND CHURCH OF THE HOLY INNOCENTS IN THE SIXTEENTH CENTURY—

TO-DAY THE SQUARE DES INNOCENTS, RUE ST. DENIS.

Here 1100 bodies of Huguenots who fell in the Massacre of St. Bartholomew were buried. Up to recent years this place was the Marché des Innocents.

massacre began; like Jehoshaphat, they did not live to see the havoc the Athaliah of their day was about to make of the poor little flock they had led into the shambles.

But the Heavenly Guide did not leave the hare-brained Huguenot nobles without many warnings. As they were so lost in the follies of a court life, a warning came in that way. On the very eve of the massacre, a masquerade was performed at the Louvre for their amusement, entitled "The Mystery of the Three Worlds." Hell was shown with its devils, paradise with its nymphs. The Huguenot princes try to enter this Mohammedan heaven; the king and his brothers, holding them at bay, finally drive them, pike in hand, to the brink of hell, when the devils seize them. Then the Valois dance with the nymphs. But after a time the Bourbons get loose and the struggle recommences. But this time the sulphureous stench from the bottomless pit so overpowers actors and audience that all fly, and nothing remains but emptiness, a stink, dying lights, overturned chairs, and the confused débris of a demon-like revel.

But "seeing they saw but did not perceive." With so many noblemen among them, so many learned men, such great artists, numbering in fact in their ranks nearly every one noted for virtue, ability, or culture, the Huguenots entertained but little sympathy for the people, whom they called, pauvres idiotes populaires. This unhappy contempt for the people suffering from ignorance and corrupted by their oppressors was returned by a fear and a hatred which the Catholic leaders could at any time work up to fanaticism.

The wedding, which the populace on the verge of homicidal madness, called les noces vermeilles, took place on a scaffold in the Parvis of Notre-Dame. When the Parisians saw Henry of Navarre, whose conscience was so easy, refuse to enter their cathedral, but during the service walk about with Coligny and other Huguenot lords, they were ready to credit the stories afloat that the Protestants were hatching a scheme for the murder of all the good Catholics in Paris.

Massacre was in the air, and perhaps in the minds and hearts of not a few; but they were not Huguenots. Living among themselves, or connected with Catholics who did not share the popular dislike, with the exception of a clear-sighted man here and there, they had no conception of the horror close at hand.

St. Germain l'Auxerrois, a dark mediæval church still faces the Louvre, and in its neighbourhood all the scenes of the first act of the bloody drama were played. From a house in the precincts of the church, owned by a clerical follower of the Guises, the shot was fired which wounded Coligny, as on the 22nd of August he was walking home from a council at the Louvre, to dine at his house close by in the Rue des Fosses St. Germain l'Auxerrois. The whole neighbourhood is now altered, and the Hôtel de Ponthieu taken down, but the spot where it stood is about No. 140 Rue de Rivoli.

To this little sombre hotel the king hastened, the queen-mother and her son Henry quickly following. Ambrose Paré,[1] one of the greatest surgeons of the age, and a Huguenot, had taken off the wounded finger, and the admiral lay calmly on his bed. But all around the chamber, and on every floor below, were numbers of Huguenot gentlemen in whose eyes the royal plotters saw accusation and vengeance. Catherine and Anjou hurry the king away, and so bait him in the coach, that he tells them that Coligny had warned him of their schemes, whereon they determine to get rid of the admiral at once.

The king wished, as Herod, to save the man he revered. Charles IX. had genius, and was the best man the house of Valois produced, but his brain was diseased, and his madness took a sanguinary turn. The extreme mental torture to which the conspirators put him on this unhappy day brought on an access of fury, and after having resisted for hours, Charles suddenly gave way and went beyond them all. Never was the path of crime more precipitate. Guise and Anjou push Catherine, and all three the king, who, once overthrown, drags them much farther than they ever intended, the Guisards and the populace going beyond the utmost their own leaders ever schemed.

The atrocities of the Revolution were as nothing to what followed; the worst massacres of that period were confined to the prisons, this massacre was all over the city. The human heart breaks at the recital; it is not bearable; and one marvels what explanation can be given if not demoniacal possession. The Pont Notre-Dame, where the richer Huguenots resided, was specially selected for the massacre, and here Anjou, afterwards King of France, presided at the executions.[2] Legend has, perhaps, crept in, and the horrors which took place at one of the houses on this bridge may be the blood-red dream of some terrified Huguenot.

It was a piteous sight to see the river—the bodies floating up and down with every turn of the tide, hacked, stabbed and brutally mutilated, heaping themselves against the islands like so much flotsam and jetsam: no less than 1100 corpses were at last buried by the authorities in the Cimetière des Innocents. Nearly the whole of the Huguenot nobility were destroyed, and the church in Paris almost extinguished. Among the victims were silk-mercers, linen-drapers, ironmongers, button-manufacturers, millers, goldsmiths, booksellers, bookbinders. Of most other trades, at least one instance appears among the lists, necessarily most incomplete; a tailor, an armourer, a barber, a spinner, a gardener, a clockmaker, a shoemaker's family, a mercer's wife. Probably from five to six thousand murders were committed in Paris from the 23rd of August, 1572, until the beginning of October; secret and nightly executions going on for four weeks, special search being made for ministers.

[1] Ambrose Paré is said to have lived in the Rue de l'Hirondelle, which ancient street, dating from 1179, and much of which is now gone, formerly extended from the Pont St. Michel to the Rue Git le Cœur. It was in the part now suppressed in face of the Fontaine de St. Michel, and about the spot where in this meeting-place of so many omnibuses and tram-cars the refuge now stands, that this celebrated surgeon had his dwelling-place.

[2] Coqueril's Eglise Reformée de Paris, p. 113.

Booty was a main object; six hundred houses were pillaged. The courtiers were extravagant, and consequently in want of money. Many of the victims were rich, and probably kept their wealth in their own coffers or cellars. At Coligny's hotel, however, they only found 10,000 crowns. In one case they forced a gentleman to give up his estate in exchange for his life, and then murdered him. It was Retz, one of the principal conspirators, who did this, and the victim was Lomenie, lord of Versailles. Eventually this land became royal property, on which Louis XIV. built his huge palace. It is "the Naboth's vineyard" of France. Charles IX.'s share of the plunder was no less than 3,000,000 livres of gold.

Words fail to describe the iniquity. It was simply the kingdom of hell on earth. And yet, instead of being sorrowful, every one combined to glorify their common infamy. The poets wrote odes, and the scribblers published endless pamphlets in its honour; the Pope ordered a Te Deum and sent the golden rose to mark his sense of the French King's extraordinary merit. He, poor creature, still demented, went on the Tuesday to church, and then to the parliament—where, with a sombre grin, he said; "I did it all, I ordered it." On the Thursday the clergy held their festival and proclaimed a jubilee. Meanwhile, O wonder of wonders! a thorn in the cemetery of the Holy Innocents, which for two or three years had been dead, suddenly burst into bud. It is autumn, yet its leaves are green as in springtime, and its blossoms, white and scented as the ever-rejoicing May. Proof most manifest that the Moloch they worshipped approved this doleful business, and all the world pressed to see the Miracle of the Thorn. King, queen-mother, the whole court came, but as the papal nuncio shrewdly observes in his report to the Vatican, if the priests were to say it had been in blossom before the event, they would soon be stoned and thrown into the river. Certainly, if not one of the 30,000 professors of the Black Art then residing in Paris could make a thorn bloom in August they were not so clever as a scientific horticulturist I know who can make all kinds of plants bloom at any time in the year. Even the deluded people seemed to have a shade of doubt, for they insisted on touching the tree to assure themselves it was not magic or enchantment, the work perhaps of the Vaudois sorcerers.

Vaudois, indeed, another example of the way the devil projects his shadow on those he hates!

RICHARD HEATH.

ON TACT.

MANY years ago, I heard for the first time, Stephen Heller's exquisite reverie "Wanderstunden." The chords, linked by single notes, follow in tender dreamy succession, ending in a cadence of mystical sweetness. Then comes a minor strain where the melody loses itself for a time, in plaintive insistance of seeming discords, only to return, ere long, to the lovely rhythm in which the music closes. "Wanderstunden," or "Hours of Wandering," a fitting name, I thought! For the same mood of gladness with an underlying touch of melancholy was evoked in the listener as that which comes to the solitary rambler through some old world forest, with its mystery, its chequered light and shade spreading around him—the breath of the spring, that is half a sigh, caressing his cheek. Transported far, far away from the actual scene, I sat and dreamed on in blissful reverie, while "Wanderstunden" was rendered with sympathetic touch on the piano.

Once again I heard "Wanderstunden." The performer was no tyro, and I composed myself and closed my eyes in expectant delight, only to open them abruptly at hearing her lead off in a brisk, decided style, emphasising each chord with vigour. Crash, crash, went the melody, and the cadence at the close of a phrase exploded like three pistol shots! This might be a March of the Grenadier Guards, or a mimic Review, but nothing more. "Hours of Wandering" with their unutterable thoughts, their quiet joy, their mystic reverie! the very idea was absurd! And yet it was the same music, the same piano, and the performer was possessed of equal musical training, giving her as much correctness in time and mechanism as the other. But—what a difference!

The difference lay in the way of touching the keys. In the touch of the first player there was sympathy, appreciation, expression; in the touch of the second, there was nothing of the sort. Both performances were correct, but the former alone was worthy the name of music.

This illustration will serve to explain the true meaning of Tact. For, indeed, it is nothing else but "Touch," in another form, and with wider significance. The derivation that would refer it to the Greek word meaning "to arrange," whence come Tactics and its compounds, is rejected by the best authorities. Hensleigh Wedgwood, and Skeat, both derive it from the Latin tactus, from tango, I touch; while the latter defines it "Peculiar skill, delicate handling."

"Tact" is not to be found in the folio edition of Johnson's Dictionary, dated 1786. In the enlarged edition, by Rev. H. J. Todd, it is explained as follows:

"TACT, touch, an old word, long disused but of late revived in the secondary sense of touch as a masterly or eminent effort, and the power of exciting the affections."

To illustrate its former use, an extract is given from Ross's Microcosm, dated 1652.

"Of all creatures the sense of tact is most exquisite in man, because his body is most temperate; but tact consisteth in the temper of the prime qualities."

Whatever this may mean, the word is evidently used in the sense of physical touch. But it has been "of late revived" to express something different.

The history of words is as suggestive in its way as the history of human beings. Why do we need this term that Dr. Johnson and his contemporaries were able to do without?

The nineteenth century is pre-eminently a critical century. To the question: "What is done?" a second is generally added: "How is it done?" and both must be answered satisfactorily, if the result is to be deemed a success. Our forefathers talked much about the "Roast Beef of Old England," but modern society does not esteem plainly roasted meats very highly apart from recherché sauces, delicate serving, and dainty accompaniments of flowers, glass and silver. Women think more of the cut and fashion of a gown than of the material from which it is made.

And hearers too, ask not only what a preacher says, but how he says it? The most excellent truths, the most elaborate arguments, if expressed at great length and in a prosy ponderous style, now fail to produce any effect save that of weariness.

In short, the "way of doing things" has come of late years to be held of great consequence. And, although the critical tendency has its danger, it is on the whole a wise reform in opinion that attaches more importance to manner than of yore. So this word "Tact" has come into usage, to signify that skill which has always existed in civilised society, but is now recognised in its true light—the art of "delicate touch" in a moral as distinguished from a physical sense.

Even as the musician who has a sympathetic touch, and he alone, can do justice to the theme and the instrument, so the man or woman with tact is alone fit to evoke full response from the character of another. Thus to the foolish vexatious courtiers Rosencrantz and Guildenstern, Hamlet says, after he has bidden Guildenstern play upon the pipe, and received the answer, "I know no touch of it, my lord!"

"Why, look you now, how unworthy a thing you make of me! You would play upon me; you would seem to know my stops; you would pluck out the heart of my mystery; you would sound me from my lowest note to the top of my compass: and there is much music, excellent voice, in this little organ; yet cannot you make it speak. Do you think that I am easier to be played on than a pipe? Call me what instrument you will, though you can fret me, you cannot play upon me."

Fortunately, while the musician's touch is, as a rule, acquired only after long practice, tact is often intuitive, and if not intuitive, can be learned by sympathetic observation. Yet truth compels us to acknowledge that some of the best and kindest of people seem to have no conception of it, and are continually, by its lack, failing to succeed with their fellow creatures, very much to their own surprise!

One of the most piteous things within ordinary observation, is the blundering way in which grown-up people try to play on the delicately strung instrument of a child's soul. It is enough to make one cry out in dismay to hear the marred music which the unskilled, though conscientious performer draws from that "little organ" which has, nevertheless "much music, excellent voice." We do not dwell on the terrible discords, or the dumbness, that may result from absolutely ignorant, careless, or cruel handling—it would be too painful, and is beside the mark. No, these tactless good people are thoroughly well acquainted, in theory, with the way to train a child; they can quote treatises on education, just as the performer without a touch may be well versed in scales and exercises, and know all about the "mécanique" of the art.

"It is never too young for a child to begin to learn obedience." Yes, but it is not necessary to continually invite a conflict of wills before the tiny infant has learned the self-control that is a matter of gentle and gradual training. Diversion will do as well as direct thwarting in nine cases out of ten. Many of the faults of very young children drop off with growth; occasion for their exercise being avoided, self-control becomes gradually more and more of a habit, to the exclusion of infantile passion and self-will. But, on the other hand, the constant inviting to a struggle, keeps these failings alive and vigorous, by bringing them into violent exercise, even though the grown-up person who fights with the baby achieve a victory every time in the unequal contest.

There is a well-known law in the history of the race that any limb or muscle never exercised, gradually loses its power, even to the extinction of life itself. Something of this is true with regard to character. A young child of average disposition, kept by tact from continually manifesting self-will and temper, gradually ceases to be wilful and passionate, and gladly conforms his little nature to that of the wise and loving parent. Of course this cannot be said of all children; yet there are no cases where tact will not make the work of education more easy and pleasant. The musician's touch, gentle, yet firm, tenderly sympathetic yet not irresolute, is here a specially fit emblem of this priceless moral touch which men call tact.

The mother who possesses it, says: "Do" this, rather than "Do not do" the other. She allures to virtue rather than dissuades from wrong-doing. She does not magnify small faults, nor call the restless inquisitive lad "naughty," at every turn, because he is full of energy that demands occupation; but she presents interests and work to engross his powers.

Many a child through being perpetually called "naughty" has ended in becoming so in good earnest, and experience and observation have confirmed me in the belief, heretical though it may seem, that tactless, unintelligent handling "spoils" more children than over-indulgence.

Not only with the children is tact all important; it preserves the happiness of married life. However deep and true the affection of a wedded pair may be, they are sure to need this magic touch in their daily intercourse when the years go on and the strain and stress of life become severe. The kindest, most devoted of wives may drive her tired husband to distraction by dwelling on mutual worries in an unfortunate tone or at an inappropiate moment; while he on his part may unwittingly add "the last straw" to her domestic burden by ill-timed remarks of a disconsolate nature. If, for instance, a mother is anxious about the health of her children, and is trying nevertheless to keep a bright face before her husband, it is in the last degree exasperating to be told in an important manner that a son or daughter is looking extremely ill—and that she "really ought to see to it!" Similar illustrations will suggest themselves to every wife or husband, but one wise rule for those who wish to study tact in domestic intercourse is this—to avoid discouraging speeches in all seasons of weariness or anxiety. There is no measuring the power of kind and cheering words.

Friendship, too, requires delicate handling. Tact—the delicate moral touch—is as necessary to preserve its bloom, as a delicate physical touch is necessary to preserve the bloom of a peach. Once brushed away, the tender grace cannot be restored. A blundering repetition of some remark never intended to be repeated; a clumsy jest—fault finding of too unsympathetic a tone—and the unwitting tactless one is left to exclaim, "Alas, how easily things go wrong!

* * * * *

And there follows a mist, and a weeping rain,
And the world is never the same again!

Less serious, and more amusing to the onlookers at least, are the consequences of want of tact in ordinary social intercourse. Revenge is usually prompt and severe.

"Things one would rather have left unsaid" by Mr. du Maurier, are very entertaining, but happy is the man or woman who has never had to turn red and utter an exclamation in private at the recollection of some such unlucky remark.

"Consider taste in its relation with polite society, and you have tact," says a French author—M. de Pontmartin.

There is, however, a spurious kind of tact, respecting which a word of protest must be raised. The art of delicately flattering foibles, and fostering small vanities in other people for the sake of "getting on well" with them is, of course, unworthy of any honest person; least of all does it become those who march under the banner of Christ. It is by no means unknown in society, although it can hardly be called a special failing of the Anglo-Saxon character. Rebecca Sharpe is its archetype in fiction. Any amount of honest blundering is preferable to the honeyed smoothness which only seeks to please, and cares nothing for truth. Fortunately it is quite possible to avoid anything like insincerity, and yet to allow tact to rule words and conduct.

As an instance of tact that, if not actually untruthful, scarcely merits commendation, one may perhaps quote a remark of Madame de Staël. She was sitting next to a lady of noted beauty, when a gentleman placed himself between them and gallantly, though tactlessly, observed, "I am fortunate to have Wit on the one hand, Beauty on the other." Seeing the involved suggestion that the beautiful lady was stupid, Madame de Staël turned the sting aside, by saying with a smile, "This is the first time I have been called beautiful."

The phrase in which the orator is said to keep or to lose "touch" with his hearers is another illustration of the etymology of "tact." "What is it you want now?" I have heard a bewildered speaker inquire from a restless audience at Exeter Hall. "Do you want another anecdote?" The poor good man had heard his predecessors applauded, and could not understand the people's cries of "Time" and manifest dissatisfaction. He had lost touch of his audience; in other words, he had no tact.

Lord Shaftesbury was once presiding at a hospital dinner, where time was precious. A prosy speaker, who was exasperating the audience by the length and dulness of his remarks, happened, when alluding to the hospital staff, to fall into the interrogative form. "But what shall we say of Dr. M.?" he inquired. Lord Shaftesbury, with ready tact seized the momentary pause to call for "Three times three for Dr. M.!" The company cheered to the echo, and the applause was so continuous that the speaker could not proceed. "It was very kind of you," he said to the Earl afterwards, "very kind; but it was really a pity, for I was just coming to the best part of my speech!"

In the art of consolation, the value of tact is not easily over-estimated. As to the physical sufferer, the touch of nurse or physician must needs be skilled and gentle if it is to be tolerated, so the unhappy must be approached with tact, or the proffered comfort will do more harm than good. The so-called "friends" of the patriarch Job will stand on record to all time as glaring examples of the utter absence of tact; and many a modern sufferer would find it a relief to exclaim to intrusive would-be consolers, "Miserable comforters are ye all!"

It is never wise or kind, for instance, to strive to assuage the grief of a mourner by offering an explanation of the bitter mystery of loss. I have known good tactless people suggest, when a pure young life has been cut short, that its lustre might possibly have been dimmed in future years; or, when an aged and beloved parent has been laid to rest, the tactless comforter represents to the survivor that it is the common and inevitable lot for the old to pass away.

One writes, that 'Other friends remain,'
That 'Loss is common to the race'—
And common is the common-place,
And vacant chaff well meant for grain.

Real unselfish sympathy will usually engender tact, even in the blunt and unrefined when they stand in the sacred presence-chamber of grief; and although it is often hard for the would-be comforter to know what to say, it is at any rate possible to be silent. Other consolation, save the manifestation of sympathy, is best left alone. The verbal assurance from a bystander, "It is all for your good," is worse than worthless. Some day the sufferer may feel it to be true, but until God has taught him the lesson, he does not want to hear it dictated, parrot-like, by those who know nothing of what his misery means.

Tact in all religious work, especially among the poor and uneducated, might well be shown, by illustrations, to be of the utmost importance. But it is enough to end with the general assertion that this skilled wise touch in dealing with others is half the secret of power; and it is a secret not to be despised by the earnest Christian. "Blessed are the peacemakers," is a text of wide application. Surely not only those who heal quarrels come within the sphere of its benediction, but those who by their wise and gentle behaviour prevent the friction and irritation that are adverse to the spirit of Peace.

LILY WATSON.

BIBLE NOTES AND QUERIES.

"Lest there be any . . . profane person, as Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright. For ye know how that afterward, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected: for he found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears."—Heb. xii. 16, 17.

THERE is a prevalent impression from this passage that Esau earnestly endeavoured to repent of his sin, and that his endeavours so to do were in vain. But this is a misconception. Esau did indeed value the birthright which he had formerly despised. But the place of repentance, which he sought with tears and sought in vain, was in the decision of his father. He could not induce Isaac to revoke that patriarchal blessing which he had pronounced upon Jacob. That must stand. "Yea, he shall be blessed." We do not find in Esau any sign of a desire for the repentance of his sin as such. He "hated Jacob because of the blessing wherewith his father blessed him." He followed his hatred towards its extreme result, and his mind was so filled with his wicked project that he could not keep it a secret.

The idea that Esau earnestly but vainly sought repentance of his sin is not only erroneous in fact, but it implies a serious error as to the teaching of Holy Scripture on the subject, since the earnest desire to repent is itself of the nature of repentance.

T. S.

"And there was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle: and the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land. And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we be brethren."—Gen. xiii. 7, 8.

The second clause of the above paragraph breaks the flow of the narrative, and is a parenthesis which does not appear to be explanatory. It is not intimated that the Canaanites and the Perizzites had anything to do with the quarrel between the two sets of herdsmen; why then should they be introduced into the passage? Surely it is to show that a strife between Abram and Lot would have brought dishonour upon the name of the God whom they worshipped. The quarrel between the herdsmen could not but have been known to these two heathen tribes, and had Abraham and Lot lived at variance, that would have been known too. The Lord has in all ages of the world taken note of the effect which the conduct of His worshippers is calculated to produce upon the minds "of them that are without." He visited the sin of David with punishment because he had thereby "given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme." "The word of Jehovah came to Ezekiel, saying, I had pity on My holy name, which the house of Israel had profaned among the heathen whither they went" (Ezek. xxxvi. 21). The Apostle Paul writes of the Jews: "The name of God is blasphemed among the Gentiles through you, as it is written" (Rom. ii. 24). On the other hand: "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven" (Matt. v. 16). And, "Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles; that whereas, they speak against you as evil doers, they may, by your good works which they behold, glorify God in the day of visitation" (1 Pet. ii. 12).

It is in the light of such passages as these that the parenthetical sentence is to be understood, "The Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land."

T. S.

A correspondent, "H. L. J.," has met with sceptics who, in their arguments, always adduce the apparent discrepancy between Exodus xxxiii. 11: "The Lord spake unto Moses face to face," and verse 20: "Thou shalt not see My face; for there shall no man see Me and live." How are the two statements to be reconciled?

Our correspondent suggests that the word for "face" may be different in the two verses. This, however, is not the case, the word being the same. Nor does there seem any real difficulty. The former verse sets forth a close familiar fellowship between Jehovah and His servant; the latter shows that the communion of Moses was still with the Unseen. The one verse does not contradict the other, but only explains it. See also Numbers xii. 8.

NESTA AND PHYLLIS.

III.

PHYLLIS'S last preparations were finished only too soon, of course; and she watched vainly for more than an hour at the sitting-room window of the new lodgings before a cab, heaped with well-known luggage, turned the corner of the road, and she flew downstairs with light feet, and dimmed eyes, and a great lump in her throat.

"My darling little Phyllis! How well you look!"

"Take care, Phyl. Nessie won't stand much squeezing yet."

Phyllis heard her mother and father's voices, she felt their kisses on her face, their arms about her, but she saw no one but Nesta for a while—Nesta, grown thin and white, with all her pretty curls cut short—Nesta, wrapped up in shawls and a veil; but, in spite of all changes, most undoubtedly her own Nesta still.

Phyllis leaped and laughed and cried, but all gently—she was never a rough child. As for Nesta, she could do little more than smile to her sister, till she was got upstairs to the nice large bedroom all ready for her, and set in an armchair beside the bright little fire.

Then—"Oh, my Phyllis!" she said; and Phyllis came and gave her a long, long kiss, after which the little invalid's happy eyes wandered about the room, and her sister, with her hands behind her, stood aside to let her look.

"O Phyllis, what a beauty of a doll!"

"For you, Nessie!"

"Oh! And there are books ——"

"Yours and mine. I wanted to give them all to you, but auntie said that wasn't polite to them. But there are shells —look in this box—all yours! We'll make necklaces. I gathered them all."

Then nurse came in to bring Nesta some soup, and help her to take off her out-of-door things. Nesta was a wonderfully good little patient—so mamma said—and Phyllis was not surprised to hear it. Other people, even big ones, are often cross and discontented when they are not strong, but Nesta was so much of her own happy cheerful self, even in her weakness, that she was a pleasure to those about her; and this sweet, easy temper of hers helped her to get well the faster. She did not murmur now, though her eyes looked rather wistful when Mrs. Elliot took Phyllis away presently, that Nesta might lie down to rest; and she had her reward afterwards in the evening, when she was able to come into the parlour and have tea, and a long examination of the doll and shells.

Mrs. Elliot sat beside her little girls, happy in their happiness, and with much thankfulness of her own; the Miss Bruces had said it was truest kindness to leave the reunited family to themselves on that first night, and Mrs. Elliot did not go to see her sisters until Nesta and Phyllis were in bed.

Yet on this happy night, this ending of a joyous, long-expected day, Phyllis fell asleep in tears. It was not because she was still put in a little room by herself, while nurse had the other bed beside Nesta's, nor was it because her sister could not run about and romp with her as she used to do; Phyllis had been prepared for these things, and she hoped they would last but a little while. She cried because she had a secret from Nesta, something she had not dared to tell her own sister now that they were together again!

They had spoken of the doll, and the new story-books; of aunties, and Laing, and Phyllis's little friends, and many, many other things; but never a word of the good Lord Jesus, who had given them back to each other. And Nesta did not know how much He had become to Phyllis now, and how much she had prayed that He might be the same to Nesta! Phyllis felt sadly alone when she knelt down by her little bed to thank Him, alone when she read the little Bible she had learned to love so much. Oh, Nesta—dear Nesta, who did not know what Phyllis knew!

Phyllis made herself so miserable over her own cowardliness and unkindness in keeping her secret, that she forgot there was One Who shared it with her, and the unfolding of it lay with Him.

Next day things began and went on in much the same fashion. The children had plenty of merry talk together, but mamma, or papa, or nurse, was always present; and Phyllis sometimes thought she had not a chance of saying what she wanted, and sometimes she thought she ought to have found one. And in the midst of her play she was absent-minded at times, and at other times she caught Nesta watching her with an odd tender look that was somehow new.

So the hours passed away until evening came. And then Mrs. Elliot (because, I think, she knew the children would like to be together, without even her, for a little while) proposed that Phyllis should be left to take care of Nesta while the others went for a walk. Nesta had been out in the morning, and she had rested in the afternoon; and now, looking better already, they said, thanks to the air of St. Margaret's, she sat in an armchair by the parlour window, and waved her hand to her father and mother as they went down the street.

The Elliots' lodging did not look out to the restless sea, but to a pleasant stretch of green downs (they call them in Scotland links), lying now before Nesta and Phyllis's eyes with the light of an autumn sunset upon them. Neither of the little girls felt particularly interested in the view, however. Phyllis, with her chin on her hand, and her hand on the window-sill, sat on a low stool and looked out with troubled eyes. Nesta was smiling a little to herself as she leaned back among her cushions; she had some happy thought of her own, and she could not see her sister's face.

"Phyllis."

Phyllis turned round with a start. She had been trying so hard for courage to begin her confession, and at that very moment her trembling lips had almost been forced to say, "Nesta." She waited now in silence, and her sister went on.

"Dear old girl, I've something to tell you."

Why, these were just the very words Phyllis had wanted to say!

"Well," she questioned—"what?"

Nesta looked at her frankly and lovingly with her sweet blue eyes. (When Phyllis had anything particular to say she looked everywhere rather than at the person she was speaking to.)

"It's something new," said Nesta. "I wonder, will you be sorry or glad? Oh, I want you to be glad!"

"I will be, if you are," said Phyllis reproachfully.

"I'm glad," said Nesta, with her happy smile—that smile which made her exactly like her old self, in spite of short-cropped curls and pale cheeks. "Phyllis, I love the Lord Jesus Christ now"—and Nesta's whole heart seemed in her voice and eyes as she added, after a moment's pause—"very much."

The next instant she had to exclaim in a tone of surprise and disappointment—

"Oh, Phyllis, are you sorry?"

For tears were streaming down Phyllis's face, and her voice, when she tried to speak, was choked with great sobs. It was no wonder that poor perplexed little Nesta asked next—

"Oh, dear Phyllis! why are you so sorry?"

"I'm not sorry," Phyllis managed to say at last; "I am glad. This is what I've been wanting so much. This is what I've been praying for so much. But I never thought the Lord Jesus would do it—at least not so soon!"

And then Nesta began to understand a little what Phyllis's trouble was, though she did not know all the great things that had happened to her little sister in that inner life, which even to a child is so much the most important.

Phyllis was crying for very shame because the Lord Jesus had been better than she had ever expected! All these days when she had always prayed for Nesta whenever she had prayed for herself, she had never dreamed of an answer like this. She had feared vexation and disappointment, and divisions between them; and instead of that He had taken their happy love into His own hands, and bound it fast and sure with His love before He gave it back again. Oh, why had not Phyllis trusted Him more? In joy like the joy of heaven itself, this little child of Christ wept and wondered over her own past faithlessness.

And because Phyllis could not speak yet, Nesta told her story first. It was all of talks and reading with mamma in the quiet of the sick-room: she had come to Christ holding her mother's hand; and having come, she would have been willing—if He had willed it—to let Him carry her beyond death's reach in His arms.

"First, it was because I was so ill; and then I wasn't afraid of being ill," said Nesta. "It would have been nice to go where I could see Jesus! But then, He wants me to stay on here a little longer, and, oh, I'm glad to be with you. And I thought mamma would tell you how good He is, as she told me when I was ill."

"But I know it," said Phyllis; and then she added with a great sob of penitence—"a very little!"

"Mamma will tell us more," said Nesta; for there had never been any secrets between her and her mother.

She could not know Phyllis's almost painful gladness, which came of deepest feeling, shut up for so long in her own heart; but the sight of it made Nesta solemn as well as glad, while Nesta's sweet peacefulness began to soothe Phyllis.

The two children sat with clasped hands and talked together in low tones, telling now this thing and now that, as it came into their minds; but their talk was all about the new life they had begun since they parted, the wonders they had to tell each other were those they had found on the heavenly way.

They were only at the beginning of their good things they thought, and they were right, for they had chosen that better part which would never be taken from them, and the new joy which was theirs lasts for evermore.

* * * *

I have little more to tell you about Nesta and Phyllis. They lived on—fun-loving, playful little girls, sheltered in the quiet home of their parents. Nesta got quite strong again in time, and the two went back to school, and once more learned their lessons, and amused themselves, and did everything together. The old dear companionship between them was as close as ever to outward seeming—only the children themselves and their mother knew it was closer.

S. M. GRAY.

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. XI.

The initials give the power by which to overcome the great enemy named in the finals.

1. What man should do when "that which is good" is before him.

2. A man who was one of three truly great heroes, but in the hour of trial was one of four.

3. The prison into which Paul and Silas were cast.

4. That which the birth of Manasseh caused Joseph to forget.

5. That which the lame man at the gate of the temple gave unto Peter and John.

M. A. S. M.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.—p. 192.

1. Shame and fear.—Gen. iii. 8, 10.

2. He built the ark, and was saved from the flood, with all his family.

3. His faith.—Heb. xi. 7.

4. His promptness in preparing to offer up Isaac; because he voluntarily gave up the great blessing which God had bestowed upon him.—Heb. xi. 17.

5. They made an attack upon Hormah, in the south of Canaan, and were utterly routed by its inhabitants.—Num. xiv. 41.

6. See Deut. xxviii.

7. He suffered the people to keep the best of the flocks and herds, on the plea of sacrificing to God.—1 Sam. xv. 15, 21.

8. "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams."—Psalm l. 8, 13; Prov. xv. 8; Hosea vi. 6; Micah vi. 6.

9. 1 Kings xiii. 9, 15, 25.

10. The fifth. It is the first commandment with promise. —Eph. vi. 2.

11. Prov. xxx. 17.

12. They said that if a thing was Corban, i.e. vowed to God, the son would not be culpable in withholding it from his parents.—Mark vi. 11.

13. He became obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XLI.—MILDRED'S MISSION.

MILDRED WOULD LIKE THINGS DONE DIFFERENTLY.

THE Edingtons were away in London nearly a fortnight, and when they returned, it seemed as if the noise and tumult they all made would never subside. Roy's unaccustomed ears were half deafened by the clamour round the tea table that night, for all the children seemed determined to tell him their own individual history, and talked one against the other, till he gave up in despair the attempt to follow, and let them chatter and contradict, and laugh and scold without any clear idea as to what it was all about. The boys did not appear in any way different from their old selves, and their relief at getting back to a place where there was no sense of control or oppression almost counterbalanced their regrets for the amusements left behind.

No. 1778.—MAY 26, 1888. PRICE ONE PENNY.

Their "best behaviour," such as it was, had been enforced upon them during their visit, and now they seemed bent on taking a kind of revenge by the most outrageous noisy insubordination. Mildred, on the other hand, had changed decidedly for the better. Her frock was put on neatly, her collar and cuffs were clean, and her handsome head of hair was dressed in a simple and becoming fashion, instead of hanging round her like a tawny mane. She had just passed the Rubicon of her fancy—she was now fifteen; and although she could not feel that she was altogether grown up, as she had once fondly hoped to be at that age, at least she meant to assume something more of dignity, and this unexpected visit to London and to the cousins there, had given a sort of impetus in the desired direction.

Nellie was also better dressed and neater in appearance than before. She looked brighter and happier, somewhat roused out of her dreamy languid ways. She was however very glad to be home again, not because she had not enjoyed the change after a fashion, but because all the strangeness and bustle and sight-seeing had been rather fatiguing to her, and, as she said, "she wanted so much to see Roy again."

Roy was a capital person to talk to about London, when once the boys had been got rid of, because he had been there himself, and could understand their descriptions, and because he knew how people lived there, and understood all the ways of the house which had seemed so very strange and even fearful to the children, who had been accustomed to the laxity and want of discipline and order that prevailed at their own home; but Mildred openly asserted that she liked the new ways better than the old, and wished they did things differently at Windmill House, whilst Nellie said she had liked them too because everything was so much quieter and gentler, only at first she was always afraid of making awkward blunders.

"There is no style about things here!" said Mildred looking round her with an amusing little air of discontented scorn. "Aunt Joan, you have as much as anybody else to do with the management of things. Can't we do a little differently?"

Joan was in the school-room as well as Roy; a glance that was half a smile flashed between them at Mildred's question.

"I'm afraid I don't know much about style," was the quiet answer. "What is it you want done differently?"

"Oh—everything—" was the somewhat comprehensive answer. "Things are so dreadfully hugger-mugger here. Perhaps you don't understand—you've always been here; but Roy knows, I expect—don't you, Roy?"

He laughed out right then.

"Perhaps I do, Milly; but I don't think it's fair to call poor Aunt Joan over the coals for it."

"Perhaps not. I don't mean that it's her fault, you know," was the answer, half-puzzled and half-condescending. "Whose fault is it, Roy? Mamma says it is because we are poor; but I don't believe that; for one place where we went to tea, I knew the people were quite as poor as we are; but they did not mess about as we do here. Things weren't all anyhow and horrid."

Roy laughed a little again. This mood of Mildred's was new to him and he found it interesting; but she seemed to expect him to answer, and so he said with more of gravity and directness:

"If things were all made to look clean and bright, the rooms, and the windows, and the stairs, and passages, and if the house were kept tidy and the people in it, you would see that everything would have a different look. And then if you would lay the cloth yourself for meals, Milly, and put it on straight, and lay the things in their right places, instead of letting the girl just throw them on anyhow, and if you polished up the glass and the silver yourself, and made it shine a little and put everything straight and accurate, and got a few flowers out of the garden for the table, or even a few sprays of ivy, if there were no flowers, or some bunches of holly, I think you would like the look of it much better. There might not be much 'style,' as you call it, even then, but at least you would have done the best possible with your materials."

Mildred was gazing at him intently.

"I do believe I'll try, Roy," she said. "I've very little to do, and I think I should like trying to make things better about the house. I never knew before how horrid they were. Aunt Joan has had a good clean up whilst we've been away. I should like to try and see if we can't keep things nicer. It would make a difference, I am sure, and I don't care if the boys do laugh. If only they'd behave themselves at table, things really might be better."

"Set them a good example then, Milly," answered Roy, "not now and then but always. Ten to one if you and I and Nellie regularly behave ourselves properly it will have a sort of influence in time."

Mildred flushed a little; she was quite aware now that her own deportment left a good deal to be desired very often.

"You always do behave properly, Roy," was the quick answer, "but then you were properly brought up; you don't know how difficult it is for other people. How you must have hated us all when you came here! You must have thought you had never seen such a crew of savages, I should think."

He smiled without directly answering. Mildred flushed again; but she had plenty of resolution, and she was making up her mind with a good deal of quiet determination.

"There are lots of other things besides style, Milly, that go to make up the happiness or unhappiness of life," he said with a little thoughtful smile. "I have learned some very good lessons here. I do not complain of Windmill House as you do."

Mildred did not understand; but Nellie looked up quickly with a glance half wistful, half comprehending. He answered her by a bright little smile. He was moving slowly towards the door.

"Where are you going?"

"To the study. Have you been to see your grandfather yet? suppose you come with me and tell him all about your visit? I think he would like to hear it."

Mildred stared in astonishment. Nellie looked half frightened.

"We never go there; grandpapa does not like it."

"But he would like to see you again now."

"I don't know," Mildred looked very doubtful. "I don't think he would."

"Suppose you come and try."

Roy knew how his unwonted visit had been received by the old man, even after he had declared it should not take place, and he thought he was sure to be pleased to see the children, and listen to their eager talk; but though they allowed him to take them with him, the visit could not be called a success. The grandfather seemed to have nothing to say to the grandchildren, nor they anything to him. They escaped as quickly as they could after a few perfunctory words had passed between them, leaving Roy feeling a little depressed at the loveless atmosphere of the house. He seemed able to draw out confidence and affection towards himself, but it seemed impossible to get these relatives to understand the meaning of family love and concord.

"We are not like you, Roy," Joan said, with her strange smile, as she noticed the shadow on his face. "Your ways are not our ways, nor ever will be, I am afraid; but you are doing us good. We are not quite what we were once. If you will only stay, perhaps even you will see a change in us at last."

Roy had no intention of going, and he began in some ways to see a very decided change before long. Mildred did not lack for energy, nor for sound, practical sense, and she came home from her visit to another house with very different ideas from those with which she had left it. Roy's words had had the effect of stirring up and giving form to the vague feelings at work within her, and she began to take quite a new part in the household life, and moreover, to enjoy her self-imposed tasks as she had never enjoyed any that had been given to her before to accomplish. She found her aunt very willing to encourage and assist her, and her mother did not oppose her, so long as she asked for no increase of expenditure, whilst Roy was invaluable as a referee, and very ready of resource, and ingenious of expedient when anything had to be contrived. Between his head and her hands, a great deal was effected to redeem the desolate-looking house from that air of neglect and disorder that had been its most marked and most dreary characteristic. Anything than bare and plain it could not be, but at least there was considerably more of comfort in its bareness; and others beside Roy began to see that it was pleasanter to sit down to table when the cloth was clean, and the things were laid properly and tastefully upon it, when the glass was burnished, and the knives and forks and spoons shone with as much brightness as their age and material would permit. Green leaves and scarlet berries or sprigs of purple heather cost nothing, but made a pretty setting to somewhat coarse fare; and even the slovenly servant maids were stirred up by their young mistress's activity, and worked with a better will and with a little more regard for appearances.

If Roger Edington sneered his wife did not.

"It is a very good thing for the girls to get some notion of the proprieties of life. If ever we are to get our daughters provided for they must, in the first instance, be civilised. Mildred was very much admired at my sister's; she is growing a handsome girl, and now that her temper is so much improved, she does herself more justice. Roy is taking to both the girls; I am convinced he will always recognise them as cousins now, whatever happens, and will be willing and wishful to forward their social success. Yes, it is certainly a very good thing that we got him over here—and it may lead to very important results."

It was soon to lead to results for which Mrs. Edington was little prepared.

CHAPTER XLII.—PLANS AND PROJECTS.

MRS. EDINGTON felt some annoyance at the frustration of her favourite scheme of turning Roy into a kind of tutor for her ill-educated and unruly boys; but her father-in-law was firm upon the point, and evidently intended to keep the boy as much as possible in his own study, and even she was forced to admit that he was hardly fit for the task. She was out of patience with him for looking so frail and ill, and could not imagine why he should keep his cough, seeing that he never went out, and had more care taken of him than all the rest of the family put together. Her children never ailed anything, she sometimes said rather pointedly—not even lame Nellie, who had a sort of right to be called delicate—they had been hardily brought up, and they thrived upon bracing treatment. People who had been coddled up all their lives, and never encouraged in hardy, healthful habits were very poor things—no good to themselves or to anybody else.

Roy knew very well against whom these strictures were levelled, and was youthful enough to feel a little ashamed of himself. He had never been good-for-nothing like this before, and he did not see why he should be now; for although Windmill House was not like the Hermitage, still he was kindly treated, and had no real privations to endure. He did not understand why he should be so weak and languid, nor why his fits of homesickness should grow so much more frequent, and so much stronger. He kept up a bright exterior almost always, and he wrote to Marcus in a gay and courageous style; but sometimes it was all he could do not to beg his brother to come and take him away; or, at least, to come and visit him, and let him have the delight of seeing a familiar face, and hearing all the home news without the medium of letters.

But Roy never allowed himself to give way. It seemed to him that, for the present at least, it was his duty to stay where he was, and that there was work for him to do here. Since he had known more of bodily weakness and pain, his mind had deepened and developed rapidly. He began to see that life was a more serious thing than he had once believed it to be. He felt just now that his place was here, and yet he knew that if Marcus were to see him in these surroundings he would be wretchedly uneasy about him; whilst, for his own part, the sight of that familiar face would be certain to raise such a wave of homesickness as might carry him away helplessly, and bring about a change for which he was not yet prepared to wish.

So he kept his own counsel and wrote cheerfully, and Mrs. Edington was satisfied from the frequency with which letters passed between them that there was no lasting coldness between Roy and the master of the Hermitage. She was glad of that on the whole, now that there seemed no probability of her own plans being interfered with. She did not want any break of intimacy with connections that might be of so much use to her and hers. Already she was beginning to hope that when Roy visited at the Hermitage he might rouse in Marcus an interest in his cousins, and various bright possibilities rose up before her, full of probability and of promise. She began to entertain an idea of suggesting a visit from Marcus to Roy; but she shrank from bringing him there whilst the boy looked so ill. He would be certain to accuse them mentally of harshness and mismanagement, and she had a vague consciousness that she had demanded of him, at one time, service that he had not been able to give with impunity.

She was restless and uncomfortable about Roy, and inclined to be angry with him for not getting better; but however sound her arguments might be, they did not do him any good, and his wish to appear stronger than he really was led him sometimes to make greater exertion than was prudent. Roger Edington and his wife both knew how the boy's own mother had died young of some chest ailment, and she was quite disposed to feel anxious and worried about him; but a hideous thought crept into Roger's covetous mind, which was to the effect that if Roy were to die before he came of age, such property as was to be his would pass to his natural heirs—Andrew Edington and his family. He had the grace to be half-ashamed of his thought and did not even name it to his wife; but it rankled in his breast all the same and disposed him to be very resolute in his wish to keep Roy where he was, and to look coldly on his wife's plan of getting Marcus Stratford to come and see the boy.

"He will take him away, if you do," said Roger. "He will make out we are killing him, and we shall be forced to give him up, and he will set him against us and frustrate all your plans. If you had seen the sort of man he is, you would not care to have him here. Plainly, there is something to be gained by the care of the boy, and whatever that is, our claim comes before his."

Caroline Edington assented; she stood somewhat in awe of Marcus Stratford, she hardly knew why; and she did not want to have him come there to take away the prize in such a manner, or to say hard things of their treatment of him. She thought matters had better be left as they were. Roy gave very little trouble in the house, ate no more than a sparrow, and had had a decidedly salutary influence upon her girls. She was quite satisfied with what had been accomplished, only she did wish that he would get well more quickly and not go about looking such a pale shadow of himself.

On that point, however, Roy seemed disposed to be obstinate, although he never complained, and was not supposed to ail anything worse than a cold. He still taught Mildred whenever she cared to learn, and if the boys could be coaxed to write any exercises, or prepare any written work, he would look it over and mark and explain the faults. He let Nellie come to him with her questions and difficulties and took pleasure in making all plain before her; and as the child grew used to finding him in the study, and found out that her grandfather never took the least open notice of their low-toned talks, she came more boldly and frequently, and instead of concealing herself behind one of the curtains, and keeping as still as any mouse for fear of detection, she would creep to a little stool beside Roy's easy chair near the fire, and would talk to him very quietly so as not to disturb the old man, who sat at the table hard by poring over his books.

"Pilgrim's Progress" was now little Nellie's most engrossing study. Roy had read it out loud to both girls on the Sundays after his arrival, and they had listened to it as to an ordinary tale full of vivid interest, but as Mildred said "quite make-believe" like the few fairy stories in their possession. But Nellie had of late got hold of a notion that there was another meaning behind. Bits of the story-book seemed to fit in with bits of the Testament she was reading so earnestly; and Pilgrim's goal—the shining city beyond the river—was very like the city she had always pictured to herself as the place she longed to find, the place Roy had told her did really exist somewhere, and would be open to her if she could but find it. So she entered anew with a deep and concentrated earnestness into Christian's journey and his difficulties and temptations. Some of them she could not very well understand, but there were others into which she was able to enter with a great deal of comprehension. She liked to talk it over with Roy, and to find out what he thought about it all.

"I wish we could do as Christian did," she said one day with a little sigh, for she had had rather a hard day of it: the boys had been cross and unkind and had made her angry, and then she had been sorry, and they had only laughed at her and called her names that were hard to listen to patiently. Her mother had found fault with her for idleness and inattention over her needlework, and had threatened to take away her books, and put a stop to all those talks in the study which seemed to unsettle her for anything else. "I wish we could start right off as Christian did, you and I together, Roy, and leave everything else behind. It would be so much easier, I think, than staying at home and trying to be a Christian here."

Roy smiled as he looked dreamily into the fire.

"Well, I don't know, Nellie. I think I feel more like staying at home. I don't think you and I could make a very good pair of travellers. I think we do our pilgrimage best by the fireside."

But Nellie sighed wistfully.

"I don't know; it seems nicer to do as he did. I don't seem to know how to get rid of my burden here. It feels very heavy to-day."

Roy looked down at the child. Her face was pale and pinched and bore the traces of recent tears—tears of sorrow and anger both. There was depression in her attitude and in every feature. It was easier for Roy to talk now than it had been a few weeks back, his own thoughts dwelt more upon the prospect of that far-off shining city than they had been wont to do. The little pale sorrowful face appealed to him strongly. He must say something to try and lessen the weight of the burden.

"Nellie," he said, "don't you know how to get rid of that?"

"I don't feel as if I know anything to-day."

"It's a very easy way, I think, Nellie. You have only got to go to Jesus with it. He will take it away if you ask Him. He will know that you are in earnest, because He can see into your heart. If He sees that you are sorry, that you want His help never to do so any more, and that you love Him and trust Him, He will do all the rest. You know how Christian's burden rolled off, though he could not unfasten it for himself?"

Nellie's eyes were fixed on Roy's face.

"But how can I go and find Him. I don't know what to do."

"You must pray to Him, Nellie. That's the way to do now. We can't go to Him as people once could, when He lived here; but it's just the same if we go in that way."

The child looked awed; she had heard as much before, but this was bringing it close home.

"But—but—can He—will He hear?"

"You try and find out for yourself."

Nellie's face was very serious, very grave; but an indefined sense of comfort was stealing over her heart.

"When can I ask Him? Can I go to Him now—here—with you close by?" Roy's presence seemed a kind of moral and physical support.

They both glanced at the old man, who with his head upon his hand seemed entirely absorbed in the volume before him on the table.

"Yes, Nellie," answered Roy.

The child knelt down suddenly, burying her face upon the arm of the chair in which he sat. For a long time there was deep silence in the room. Presently she moved and got up; a little flush was on her face and her eyes were shining.

"I do believe He has heard, Roy," she said in a glad whisper. "I do feel so much happier. I think He's going to take the burden right off soon."

ST. JOHN:

APOSTLE, EVANGELIST, AND SEER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

I.—EARLY LIFE AND DISCIPLESHIP.

FEW recorded lives have been richer in their incidents, or more impressive in their contrasts, than the life of John the son of Zebedee. Trained and educated among the hardy rustics of Galilee, he spent his later days beneath soft Ionian skies, amid the effeminate civilisation of Ephesus. In his youth he was won from Jewish narrowness and fanaticism by the voice of the Incarnate Word; in his old age he had to uphold the truth which he thus had learned against the corruptions of Gentile mysticism. It was a strange experience for him who had "leaned on Jesus' bosom" to be called seriously to maintain, half a century afterwards, that Jesus had "come in the flesh!" Equally striking were the contrasts exhibited in his character. In the earlier stages of his discipleship a "son of thunder," he appears in the tranquil evening of his life as the apostle of love; and the seer, to whom beyond all others the realities of the Divine Kingdom were revealed in concrete fiery symbols, is the one who, beyond all others, has sounded the calm spiritual depths of truth. The marvel of the biography is that the character, amid these contrasts, is essentially and profoundly consistent with itself. Superficial observers fail to apprehend this consistency; and attribute, for instance, the Apocalypse and the Fourth Gospel to different authors, sometimes regarding John the Galilean as distinct from either! But a deeper insight helps us to understand how it is still the "Boanerges," who writes that "God is Love, and he who dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God and God in him:" and the divine philosophy which teaches that "in the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God" is kindred to the prophetic soul which descried amid the armies of the heavens a warrior "arrayed in a garment sprinkled with blood, and His name is called the Word of God." This deep underlying consistency we shall have hereafter to illustrate when we come to discuss modern critical hypotheses; at present it is essential to our biographical purpose to assume the current belief of the Church as to the authorship of the Gospel, the Epistles, and the Revelation, all bearing the name of "the disciple whom Jesus loved."

For the biography, the information directly given is but scanty: passages of St. John's life gleam here and there in brilliant light, with more or less shadowy glimpses between. There are scattered hints and indications also, which, without resort to any unsatisfactory expedients of conjectural narrative, we may combine into a consistent whole. Some traditions, on the face of them natural and probable, give us aid not to be despised, and we may take them for what they are worth. The resulting picture may be somewhat different from the popular ideal, derived in some measure from Italian "sacred" art. The true man had more of the hero than of the sentimentalist in his nature, and his character was not only beautiful in its serenity, but sublime in its strength.

The New Testament narratives, with the aid of modern research, have made the lake country of Galilee familiar to us. The ancient territories of Zebulun and Issachar, Asher and Naphtali, were peopled, in hill, upland and valley, by a hardy, home-loving population, intensely, often narrowly, loyal to Judaism, yet daring to stand by the simple faith inculcated in their own synagogues in defiance of the more sophisticated traditionalists of Jerusalem. Judged by the standard of the scribes, they were a race of "unlearned and ignorant men;" and Nazareth was not the only Galilean village out of which honest Nathanaels of the time concluded that no good thing could come. They were also ardently national. Judæa might tamely tolerate the foreign yoke, but Galilee could not submit without a protest; and the rebellion under Judas in the days of the enrolment (A.D. 6. Acts v. 37) was but the outbreak of a spirit never wholly suppressed. The watchword of Judas and his followers was, We have no master but God; and the very children of Galilee must have become familiar with the question: "Whether it was lawful to give tribute to Cæsar or not."

Among these hardy independent northern people, the sons of Zebedee passed their youthful days. Their father, apparently of Bethsaida, the great "fishing-place" at the head of the lake, was a well-to-do master of his craft. His boat appears to have been his own, he had "hired servants,"[1] while his wife was one of those who ministered to Jesus of their substance,[2] and who brought the costly sweet spices to His tomb. No doubt Zebedee and his partners conducted a considerable traffic with Jerusalem, where fish from Galilee was in continual demand. His sons would thus travel between Bethsaida and the metropolis, and John, it appears,[3] had become known to the High Priest Caiaphas; being thus admitted into the most exclusive Jewish society of the capital. Zebedee then was by no means among the poorest; and would be able to give his sons such training as the schools of Bethsaida or the neighbouring city of Capernaum could afford. That he became a disciple of Christ, though nowhere stated, is probable, as he seems without question to have acquiesced in the dedication of his sons to the apostolic life. He probably died some time during our Lord's ministry.

Whatever may have been the case with Zebedee, there is no doubt as to Salome, the mother of the future apostles. Like many a noble woman in ancient and modern times, the wife of Zebedee lives before us in the character of her sons. Among the women of the Gospels, though actually named only in one passage,[1] she stands conspicuous. It is worth while to bring together the three texts which describe her supreme proof of devotion to her Saviour in standing before His Cross.

Matthew xxvii. 55, 56.

"Many women were there . . . among whom was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joses, and the mother of the sons of Zebedee."

Mark xv. 40.

"There were also women beholding from afar: among whom were both Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James the less and of Joses, and Salome."

John xix. 25.

"There were standing by the cross of Jesus His mother, and His mother's sister, Mary the wife of Clopas, and Mary Magdalene."

It is from the comparison of Matthew and Mark that we find "Salome" to have been the name of the mother of the sons of Zebedee. The enumeration given in the Gospel of John appears at first sight more difficult. Who was "Mary the wife of Clopas"? The answer is simple. Clopas is a form of the Hebrew name (חלפי) elsewhere written Alphæus: and "James the less" we know was "the son of Alphæus"[2] "Mary the wife of Clopas" therefore was "the mother of James and Joses" and the three lists are so far identical. John alone mentions the presence of Mary the mother of Jesus (although without giving her name) as well as of "His mother's sister." Some readers associate this latter phrase with "Mary the wife of Clopas," as denoting the same person, so that only three women would be mentioned by John, and there would be the most unlikely circumstance of two Maries in the same family.[3] Far more reasonable is the conclusion which most modern critics uphold, that the evangelist mentions four women, only adding Mary the mother of Jesus to the three mentioned by Matthew and Luke. This then identifies "Salome," "the [1] Mark i. 29.

[2] Luke viii. 3; xxiii. 55; comp. Matt. xxvii. 55, 56.
[3] John xviii. 16.

[1] Mark xv. 40; xvi. 1.
[2] Matt. x. 3.
[3] From this interpretation also has arisen the view, now generally abandoned by good expositors, that the James and Joses here mentioned were the "brethren," i.e. cousins of our Lord.

mother of the sons of Zebedee" with "the sister of our Lord's mother;" and we are led by a process of which every step appears sound, to the conclusion that Salome and Mary were sisters. We may think of them in their young virgin life, as growing side by side in sweet household loveliness beneath the roof of their home in Nazareth. They were descendants of the house of David;[1] a distinction among their neighbours, a source of high and ennobling thought to themselves. Yet as sisters often differ, their characters were unlike. Mary "the handmaid of the Lord" was calm, meditative, serene, loving to "ponder in her heart" the wonders of His truth. Salome was ardent, enthusiastic, ambitious. The spirit of their great ancestor was in them both: in Mary the spirit of the Psalmist, in Salome the spirit of the king.[2] Like the lily and the rose, these sister-flowers grew, until in the marriage of Salome with Zebedee, one of the sisters exchanged the home of Nazareth for the home of Bethsaida.

Those who like to trace a meaning in names may be reminded that Zebedee (Hebrew, Zabdi or Zebadiah) may be rendered "the Bestower," or "Jehovah the Bestower"; while Salome is the lovely word for "Peace." Jehovah bestoweth Peace, may thus without any undue exercise of fancy be taken as the beautiful motto of this Bethsaida home. To this house two sons were born, Jacob the elder, so called after the great ancestor of the nation (James being but an Anglo-Gallic form of the ancient name[3]) and Jochanan, Mercy of God, a name which passing through the Greek and Latin has come to us as John.[4] The disciple whom Jesus loved would be known by the comrades of his youth as "Jochanan bar-Zebadiah."

Among these companions at Bethsaida were two brothers of another house, Andrew and Simon, the sons of Jonah, who himself is called John in some Greek MSS. of the Fourth Gospel, followed in our Revised Version.[5]

The four friends were yet in early youth when the fame of the great preacher of righteousness, John the son of Zechariah, reached and stirred the land. It was but natural that young and ardent Galileans should be attracted by so fervent a herald of righteousness and of the coming doom. They travelled from their home in Bethsaida to the Jordan valley, whither, in the "wilderness," or broad green upland on the eastern side, the multitudes were gathering to listen to the stern Baptist's words. But a change had passed over the tone of that wonderful ministry. The crisis of that ministry was the baptism of Jesus, already past: the prediction that had mingled with the Baptist's call to repentance was fulfilled, the mightier One than he had appeared, and the burden of John's preaching had become the great evangelic message for all time: "Behold, the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." On one day this message had been proclaimed to the multitude; on the next day it was repeated early in the morning, before the crowd could again assemble, to two disciples, who alone seem to have lingered near their great master, intent on learning what further truth he might have to impart. Jesus Himself, as these words were spoken, was passing by. By an impulse, which they themselves could not wholly understand, the two fisher lads from Galilee were drawn to Him who was so pointed out to them. They "followed Jesus." It was the turning-point of their young lives.

It is hard for a true teacher to dismiss beloved and favourite pupils, even to a greater and wiser instructor than himself. We may picture John looking wistfully after the retreating forms of these two disciples, knowing that his work for them was done, and that soon he must altogether retire from the scene. Yet surely such regrets were overpowered by a noble gladness. For, if we rightly understand him, we mark a note of unselfish exultation in his words; "He must increase, but I must decrease." "This my joy therefore is fulfilled."

Of these disciples of John, now hastening to the Great Teacher, only one is specified: "Andrew, Simon Peter's brother": but there can be no reasonable doubt that the other was John, the son of Zebedee and Salome, who, in relating the incident, according to his wont, suppresses the mention of his own name. Short and expressive is the record of the interview that followed. The first words of Jesus to His first disciples were almost a challenge; What seek ye? From the beginning He claims a serious well-considered faith, no mere product of excitement, or fantasy of the moment. To His question the response was by another; frank, ingenuous and simple: Rabbi, where dwellest Thou? Jesus replied by an invitation and a promise, Come, and ye shall see.[1] "They came and saw where He dwelt, and abode with Him that day. It was about the tenth hour."

It is John, we repeat, who thus records his own eventful experience—the method, the scene, the very hour of his birth into a new life. There is something very significant in this apparently casual mention of "the tenth hour." Why, we might ask, should so unimportant a fact be chronicled? The answer is to be sought in a familiar experience. Incidents in our lives which affect our whole career, whether for joy or sorrow, will often photograph themselves upon our memory, with all their surroundings. When we recall them we see again the very room in which we sat; or, it may be, the path in which we walked, while the birds sang overhead. The sights and sounds of nature are, for the moment, around us again as in long past years, an inseparable part of the emotion awakened by the bright or sad remembrance. So John, in his old age, as he relates how he became a disciple of the Christ, seems to behold again, from distant

[1] See Luke i. 32, 69. Our Lord's descent from David was through His mother, although Joseph also was of the royal line, ch. ii. 4; Matt. i. 16.

[2] Compare Mary's Magnificat, Luke i. 46, with Salome's request, Matt. xx. 20.

[3] Greek Ἰάκωβος; Lat. Jacobus; French generally Jacques, but in a twelfth century form Jame. In the East, St. James is still Yakoob.

[4] The name Jochanan appears in the Old Testament no fewer than fourteen times, in the later days of the Hebrew Monarchy, (in E.V. "Johanan" or Jehohanan).

[5] See John i. 42; xxi. 15, 16, 17.

[1] See Revised Version.

Ephesus, the green sward, bright in early spring, with the river rushing through the valley below. He notes half unconsciously the height of the sun in the heavens, and the length of the shadows on the grass; and in recording the day which he and Andrew spent with Jesus, he spontaneously and fondly makes note of the very hour.

According to the best interpreters, it was yet morning,[1] and from the tenth hour (about 10 A.M. according to our computation) these two companions from Bethsaida sat eagerly listening to the Teacher from Nazareth, while their hearts burned within them at His words of truth and life. He can hardly have been personally unknown to either of the young disciples. John was not only His fellow Galilean, but as already shown, His relative. That they addressed him as "Rabbi" argues, besides, some recognition of His superiority. But, like the Baptist their master, they "knew Him not" as the Messiah, the Son of God, the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. Now their eyes were opened, and that day made them His disciples. It was the birthday of the Christian Church, the beginning of Messiah's kingdom upon earth. All that appeared to the outward eye was that two fisher youths were following One of homely mien and garb to some rustic dwelling, to a shepherd's hut, perhaps, lonely in a sheltered spot of the wilderness. Yet, although they knew it not, as they entered that habitation, they had found ingress into the spiritual home which was to be the abode of their souls and the temple of their worship for evermore!

At once they recognised the influence, and each disciple, full of new thoughts and joys, was intent on seeking his brother. Andrew was first successful; for, be it noted, the turn of phrase in the original narrative shows us, not that this was the first thing which Andrew did, but that Andrew's brother was the first to be found; suggesting that both brethren went forth at once upon the quest. James also, no doubt, was sought and found by John; and the fruit of that day's communion with Christ was the gathering of the four from Bethsaida into the number of His disciples.

Here for the present we must leave that little company. A new world had opened to their youthful vision. Already had the words of Jesus, Come, and ye shall see, reached their first fulfilment. No words, indeed, could have been more applicable to these two disciples. As Simon Peter himself long afterwards wrote, knowledge is enfolded in faith.[1] The vision is for those who "come." True insight is attained by following Christ. The words, again, in their mystic depth, might be taken as a motto of St. John's great Epistle to the churches. And when, from another and far off solitude, he beheld in vision the Lamb in the midst of the throne, was there not a reminiscence of the word that first had sent him to the Saviour: "Behold, the LAMB OF GOD."?

[1] See Westcott's Commentary on St. John, in loc., and Excursus, p. 282. There is a paper on the subject in the SUNDAY AT HOME, 1887, p. 189.

[1] See Revised Version, 2 Peter i. 5, 6.

From the Spring to the Sea.

OH, the music of the rills,
How their voice the morning fills,
As they babble of the springtime in the silence of the hills!
Rippling over moss and heather,
Now apart and now together,
With a hope that faileth never, flowing onward full and free,
Flowing ever to the sea.

Plunging headlong down the steep,
Deep is calling unto deep,
But the waters in their tumult still their onward purpose keep,
In the daylight brightly foaming,
Dark and sombre in the gloaming,
Rock and boulder gaily breasting forward still their course must be,
On, unresting, to the sea.

Where the stately iris blows,
Calmly now the streamlet flows,
And the freshness of the valley on its current comes and goes,
Flowers rejoicing taste its fulness,
Thirsty cattle love its coolness,
And the birds above it winging join its undersong of glee,
Always singing of the sea.

Now a river deep and wide,
Busy towns on either side,
And the argosies of nations proudly borne upon its tide!
Quiet now and darkly flowing,
Still the depths are seaward going,
Pausing not for blame or blessing, lingering not by tower or tree,
Onward pressing to the sea.

FALLS OF ST. FEREOL,

On the river St. Lawrence.

So the river of our years
Hastens on through hopes and fears,
Till the rivulet of childhood the eternal ocean nears.
Of its treasure freely giving,
All its life for others living,
Thus alone, in self-surrender, can its course be strong and free
To the splendour of the sea.

Unto Thee, O God, we move,
Grant us still Thy grace to prove,
Till we lose life's straitened yearnings in the fulness of Thy love.
Let our course be in Thy favour;
Guide us, Lord, lest faith should waver!
Thou of life art Source and Giver, keep us pressing on to Thee
As the river to the sea!

MARY ROWLES.

THE DYING HOURS OF THE EMPEROR WILLIAM.

WE give place to the following account of the closing scene in the life of the Emperor William, as of permanent historical interest to our readers. It is translated from the German "Daheim":—

On Thursday, March 5, at five o'clock in the evening, the Court preacher, Dr. Kögel, approached the Emperor's sick-bed, and after a few words of greeting, in which he spoke of the prayerful sympathy of the whole people, he repeated to the august patient the words of Psalm xxiii. 4: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me." Then, Isaiah liv. 10; xliii. 1: "For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but My kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of My peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee." "Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name; thou art Mine." To each of these texts the Emperor answered, "That is beautiful." As the minister continued: "I know that my Redeemer liveth," "Christ is the Resurrection and the Life," he gave his assent, saying, "That is true."

The passages which were repeated to him in the course of the evening were Isaiah xiv. 27: "For the Lord of hosts hath purposed, and who shall disannul it? and His hand is stretched out, and who shall turn it back?" Romans v. 1: "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Matthew xxviii. 20: "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." 1 John i. 7: "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." John i. 29: "Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." Then Romans xiv. 7: "For none of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord: whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's. For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that He might be Lord both of the dead and living."

These sentences were spoken at intervals.

His favourite hymns were repeated to him.

When hence I must betake me
And death at last must meet,
Lord, do not then forsake me,
Thy child with welcome greet.
When terror has bereft me
Of heart and hope, again,
Lord! from my woe uplift me
In virtue of Thy pain.—Paul Gerhardt.

Jesus, Thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are and glorious dress;
In flaming worlds in these arrayed,
With joy shall I lift up my head.—Zinzendorf.

From the hymn, "Commit thou all thy griefs," the last verse was quoted:

Thou seest our weakness, Lord!
Our hearts are known to Thee.
Oh! lift Thou up the sinking hand—
Confirm the feeble knee!
Let us, in life, in death,
Thy steadfast truth declare
And publish with our latest breath
Thy love and guardian care.—Gerhardt.

After the text, "Lord, now lettest Thou Thy servant depart in peace, according to Thy word; for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation," the Grand Duchess of Baden asked her father if he understood it. He answered in the affirmative, and distinctly repeated the last words, "Mine eyes have seen Thy salvation." During one of the intervals, the Emperor said of his own accord, "By His name hath He helped me." Another time he spoke as if he were dreaming, "Let us arrange to have an hour of prayer." After some little time, he said, "I have had a dream, the last solemn service in the cathedral was proceeding." Possibly his own funeral services were present to his mind.

During the night of Friday, at 4 o'clock, Dr. Kögel prayed.

Be Thou my consolation
When death o'ertaketh me;
May Thy death-tribulation
Before mine eyes then be!
I'll on Thee, fondly gazing,
Fix my believing eyes;
While firmly Thee embracing—
He dies well who so dies!—Gerhardt.

His Majesty then joined the Empress in repeating the Lord's Prayer.

When the chaplain repeated Psalm xxvii. 1: "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?" the Grand Duchess of Baden asked the Emperor the question, "Papa, did you understand that?" He replied, "It was beautiful."

The Grand Duchess then asked him, "Do you know that mamma is sitting beside your bed and is holding your hand?" He opened his eyes, and gazed fixedly at her and then closed them never to open them again. His last look was at the Empress.

When it was evident that the end was near, the chaplain blessed the dying man in these words, "The Lord bless thy going out and thy coming in for evermore! Depart in peace! There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God. Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit. Thou hast redeemed me, Thou God of truth."

Then as the Emperor breathed his last and life was extinct, the family knelt down and Dr. Kögel offered prayer in which he thanked the Triune God for the faithfulness He had shown to him in sparing, redeeming, saving and sanctifying him, and for converting his departure from this life into a home-going, and for having made him a blessing to Prussia and the German Empire. He prayed that the comfort of the Holy Spirit might be given to the Empress, the children and grandchildren, and to every member of the Royal House, concluding with these words: "Have mercy upon the Royal House, our people and the fatherland, and fulfil these words to the Emperor at his departure, 'I will bless thee, and thou shalt be a blessing.' Amen."

The Emperor William belongs now to history. We will not seek to anticipate its measured judgments; but the following incidents, illustrative of the personal qualities of the Emperor, reach us from another quarter, and may be of interest to our readers.

Something of singularity, and of special interest for the world at large, surrounds even the dying bed of this man marked out by divine wisdom to be a man among men.

No pencil or paint-brush is needed to make the final scene in his life visible to every eye. We can all see, with a startling vividness, the venerable old "White Beard," as the Italians call him, lying so calmly waiting for the end, on the little narrow iron camp bed, propped up with a pillow. There is no sign of state or magnificence around to take from the simple, solemn majesty of death. The room itself is small, and so plainly furnished that in these luxury-loving days it would generally be pronounced not furnished at all. Its one only adornment is an ordinary sort of small bookcase with glass doors lined with green, such as is a familiar sight in a child's school room. The man dying on the bed there would reach his ninety-first birthday in a very few days, and that bookcase he cherishes, close at hand. Would we know why? Behind the green linings are the little treasures and presents of his boyhood!

It is utterly impossible for any mind to avoid being strangely impressed in one way or other by this closing scene of the wonderful life. It is as though some one or other of Wordsworth's little village ballads had been found winding up the resounding war cries of Homer!

Nearly a century of life, and within its compass the experience of every great vicissitude of which life is capable. Poverty and wealth, dangerous sickness and robust health, the borrowed rags of a peasant and the royal purple; the acclamations of his people and the assassin's bullets; sometimes in the forefront of the most furious and bloody battlefields, and at others leading a most peaceful, homely existence in the quiet German capital.

We recall how, when once we reached Berlin, it was at a time when our English papers told us the city was agitated with some important crisis. To us, fresh from Regent Street and Cheapside, it seemed asleep.

Our coachman nearly stopped his horses once, and with an impressive, upward nod muttered with a certain hushed tone of awe—

"Ach! behind that window there is Count Bismarck. He will not come out."

"Why, no," we said in remonstrance, "how can you expect it? He is ill, we have heard."

The head was flung up, and the whip, in a manner that was wholly significant. Then our driver dropped head and shoulders almost down into the carriage, as he replied in a tone that betrayed some fear lest the sharp ears behind that window, high up above the street, might still hear him—"Ach, ja! ill, you say. He is angry; what you call cross. He says Yes, and the Kaiser says No. But, ja, ja, it will soon come all right. The Kaiser will say, Yes, too. He is good."

As all the world knows, the day came at last, when Bismarck said, "Never, never, as long as we both live will I forsake my honoured and beloved old master."

A fight in childhood for bare liberty and life was followed in manhood by a long and victorious reign, in imperial, unfettered majesty. At the outset of his career there was nearly unanimous opposition to his most cherished schemes; in middle age he met well-nigh general hatred; but his death-bed was watched with universal love and respect, and soothed with the universal brotherhood of sympathy.

His religious belief, imbibed in childhood from his beloved mother, was held firm throughout, as the very fountain of life.

The entire absence of anything whatever in the nature of self-indulgence has already been implied in the picture of the quiet chamber of death. As regards his diet, he was most abstemious and very easily satisfied. He betrayed perhaps a satisfactory little touch of human nature in liking to see himself arrayed in snowy white waistcoats, although, as regards the remainder of his attire, he found old clothes so much more comfortable than new, that those whose office it was to see that he presented an appearance suitable to his position now and again had a little difficulty on this point! His affection for one adjunct of a gentleman's dress was very amusing. He collected walking-sticks to such an extent that at length they were piled up like a pyramid in his bedroom!

It was often said that the Berliners really had no use for clocks and watches when their sovereign was among them. His uniform and punctual habits were a proverb. An anecdote has just reached me from a German pen à propos of this.

Some years ago the Emperor's health failed for a while, and his physicians met in consultation. They were in the very act of recommending him absolute quiet and repose of mind and body, when at the same moment the Wachtparade (military band) passed by the window. The crowds below were calling out the Emperor's name, who at once advanced to the window, in spite of the doctor's remonstrance, with the smiling remark:

"Let me go! I must be at the window. It is noon, and the notice is written down in Baedeker, that I can be seen from the street about this hour!"

With reference to this kindly readiness to show himself, there is another anecdote from the same German pen. The physician, Von Lauer, came to see the Emperor one morning, and found him standing at the window, too preoccupied to acknowledge his greeting, as usual. The doctor stood waiting a welcome in some surprise, till at last his sovereign suddenly turned round and beckoned him forward, remarking in friendly tones:—

"Excuse my apparent distraction, but on looking out, I noticed a peasant whose garb proves him to have come from a long distance to see the Kaiser, and he had his little son with him, whom he was holding up. So you see I was really obliged to stand a good time at the window, to let them have the full pleasure of the sight."

Method, said a writer in the Times, was the secret of his longevity; and whenever he fell ill his physicians used to tremble with apprehension, lest the sudden interruption in his habits of sustaining routine should produce a fatal effect.

To quote other words which personal experience can verify:

"His great age, with the character of his acts, and the deeds of his mighty paladins, had combined to invest him in later years with something like the halo of a mythical hero. It was hard to say whether he was more beloved as a monarch, or as a man. . . It was at once a proof of the love he enjoyed as a man, and of the confidence reposed in him as a ruler, that he could visit no part of his dominions without the certainty of being rained upon by bouquets and begging letters. The suitor, the crippled old soldier, the mother of an erring son, all got their petitions ready, and waited for the coming of the king!"

While staying once at a German hotel, an intelligent young waiter, with whom we held many a conversation, was grumbling over some petty town grievance. But he wound up with a shrug of the shoulders and the remark: "Ah! well, never mind, the Emperor will probably come here some day, and then we shall soon see. Ay! yes; for we shall tell him all about it."

"Tell him about such a thing as this?" "Trouble the Emperor about such matters?" we exclaimed.

Our companion stared in equal amaze at us. "Why, of course, if he comes. And he won't think it a trouble. He will soon see it set right, that is, at any rate, quite certain."

It was at any rate quite certain that our informant believed as much. And so did many others. The following anecdote has just reached me from a German source. No doubt it may be well known to many in England already, but as one of the very last fatherly acts of the good monarch towards the humblest of his people it well deserves to be repeated.

The Emperor William accepted the post of godfather shortly before his death—just a month before. The joiner, Peter Tichy, of Ellgut-Huttchin, and formerly sergeant in a Silesian regiment, had a son on the twenty-first of January—the eighth boy in his family; whereupon Tichy wrote requesting his Emperor to accept the post of godfather. His letter received the following reply:—

"Berlin, February 8, 1888.

"His Majesty, the Emperor and King, will accept the post of godfather to your eighth living son, and will grant that His Majesty's name should be mentioned in the registry and church office. The inclosed thirty marks are for the purchase of a present for the child. By His Majesty's command. Bork, Private Secretary."

Here is another anecdote from the same source; and from also the thoroughly-homely point of view.

The Emperor's favourite cup and saucer, which he had used nearly twenty years, got broken one day. It had been a present from Queen Victoria, and the court-marshal severely reprimanded the man-servant and the butler for the vexatious accident, well knowing how highly the cup was valued by the Emperor. The two servants, in fear of losing their places, assured the court-marshal of their innocence with regard to the breakage, and at the first opportunity tried to prove the same to their royal master. The kind-hearted sovereign, noticing his servants' distress, good-naturedly replied: "Well, well, never mind; I may have broken the cup myself. Yes, indeed, so it may be." The cup was not mentioned again, and the servants kept their places.

Another marked characteristic of the Emperor William, that of putting himself in another person's place or in other words identifying himself with the feelings of others, was well expressed in his way of receiving the pension list one day. The list of those officers, who, through their advanced age were to be pensioned off, was shown to the Emperor. That was well enough; but an accompanying offhand, hard-toned remark was needlessly made:—"Invalids were of no use to the army." The quiet, meaning rebuke followed: "But, my dear sir," replied his Majesty, "in that case, you have to head the list with myself."

Whenever Prince Bismarck insisted upon the dismissal of any functionary from his post, for supposed incapacity of any kind to fulfil the duties, according to the Chancellor's exceptionally high standard, the Emperor invariably softened the blow by a personal letter of thanks for past services, and kind hopes for the future.

The Emperor in the details of ordinary life set an example which the humblest of his subjects might follow with advantage.

FIRST SUNDAY SCHOOL IN LONDON.

THE first Sunday school known to have been established in London was at Surrey Chapel, under the Rev. Rowland Hill. In a funeral sermon on the death of Mr. Kemp, superintendent of Hoxton Sunday school, the Rev. Mr. Harris claimed for him the honour of having established the second Sunday school. At Surrey Chapel there were paid teachers for several years, but it was found that little good was thus done, and teachers voluntered their services as a labour of love. Some of these teachers were men in good positions in life, two of them having high offices in the East India House; and the superintendent, Mr. Burchett, a proctor in Doctors' Commons, gave much money, both in supporting the old schools and in opening new ones in other parts of the Borough.

An effort was also made to gather the children of the very poorest class, into what were called "Fragment Schools," so named from the Scriptural idea, that nothing might be lost. It was an anticipation of the Ragged Schools of later times. It is a remarkable fact, as illustrating the improved state of public opinion now as compared with then, that in 1801 Mr. Hill published "An Apology for Sunday schools," against which violent attacks had been made by the Bishop of Rochester of that day. The last ministerial effort made by Mr. Hill was addressing the Sunday school teachers, on the 2nd April 1833, only eight days before his death. For nearly fifty years he had a meeting of the children at Eastertide in Surrey Chapel.

When we speak of Mr. Hill's being the "first Sunday school in London," and of Mr. Raikes, of Gloucester, having been "the founder of Sunday schools in England," it is only meant that this form of beneficent work was by them in regular and systematic way introduced. There had been Sunday schools in earlier times, when Christian teachers laboured to train other children than those of their own household. The Roman Catholics claim for the devoted Carlo Borromeo precedency in this good work. We know also that catechizing on Sunday was an exercise in which some of the Puritan ministers in the seventeenth century took delight. A most interesting fact is recorded by Scottish ecclesiastical historians, in the narrative of the cruel assassination of the pious carrier, John Brown of Priesthill, one of the Covenanters. Among those who mourned his loss, we are told, were the children and young people whom he had been in the habit of assembling and teaching on Sunday afternoons.

The Message, "So Loved."

A TRUE STORY.

"WHAT ails thee, lad, thou art silent,
And white with the cold and rain:
Hast tired thyself with walking
To Kingston, and back again?

"Come! cheer me with news of Jerry,
I've been by myself all day;
Thou can't have been out for hours,
And then find nothing to say."

"Why, mother," he said, "just fancy, Wherever I've been this night?"
"Nay, lad, for with all my thinking
I never should guess aright."

"Well! listen a bit; and—mother,
Just tell me if all is true;
I've heard in a place of worship
A message that's run me thro'.

"I parted at six with Jerry,
Who'd friends of his own to meet,
So lighting my pipe, I saunter'd
Alone down the empty street.

"I felt but a listless lounger,
With nought to do in my head,
And followed without much caring
Wherever my footsteps led.

"The stormy wind and the downpour,
Were chilly enough and drear;
And thankful I was for refuge
To stand in a shelter near.

"To me, who was out in darkness,
The light from the church within
Seem'd shining warm,—and invited
My courage to enter in.

"I've often laughed at the fellows
Who went to a house of prayer,
But I'll never forget the message
I heard from the preacher there.

"The singing and prayers were ended,
The sermon was half way done;
But while I sat in the shadows,
I wished he had just begun.

"His voice was that clear, persuasive,
I couldn't do aught but heed;
He felt it was grand, I reckon,
The message he had to plead.

"He told us that God 'so loved,'
The hearts in this world below;
'So loved,'—He could not leave us,
Alone in a state of woe.

"I think I had ears to listen
To all that he had to say;
But thoughts of the great, great loving,
Are all that I've brought away.

"'So loved;'—the words had travelled Right down from the heights above;
I buried my face and whispered,
'Lord, teach me about this love!'

"And maybe He stooped to hearken,
For down in my heart it lay,
That message of God so loving
A world that had gone astray.

"I never was much a learner,
But isn't it plain to see;
The Father who lives in heaven
'So loved' both you and me?"

"Ah, lad; but with all thy talking
I seem in a sort of daze;
I did my best in thy training
To teach thee religious ways.

"It may be the preaching yonder
Was put in a better way,
For seldom it was thou listened
To aught that I had to say."

"Ay! mother; but still the message
Came home to me fresh to-night;
It seemed to me all amazing,
When seen in a newer light.

"The preaching of hell and judgment
For all who have done amiss,
Would never, with all the wisdom,
Have broken my heart like this.

"And while I am telling, mother,
The stronger it seems to grow,
Not only that just 'He loved,'
But, loving, He loved us so.

"And ay! he said in the ending—
The message was put so plain;
That we who have been 'so loved,'
Must image it back again"

"My lad;" and the tears were flowing
In streams down the furrowed face;
"It may be that one so loving
Will find for us both a place.

"I'm feared in the daily toiling,
My ear has been turned away,
And time was not found to listen
To all that they had to say.

"But, laddie, I think religion
As seen in the light of love,
Will help us to fight the battle,
And live for the home above."

"Ay, mother; for sure the message
Is making us feel we owe
The best of our life and service
To Him who has 'lovèd so.'

Then down on their knees together
They ventured their hearts to lift
In prayer to Him who "so loved,"
That His was the priceless gift.

Though years have rolled since the message
That night was so richly blest,
The mother, and son, and Jerry
Have found it their truest rest.

And night by night in a city,
To fallen, and poor, and low,
They carry the gospel message
Of Him who hath "lovèd so."

CHARLOTTE MASON.

SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

NO. III.

1. He was a king's counsellor.
2. He joined the king's son in rebelling against his father.
3. The king prayed that God might overturn his plans.
4. If his counsel had been followed, the rebellion might have been successful.
5. It was counteracted by one of the king's friends.
6. To consult him was accounted equal to asking counsel of God.
7. When his counsel was rejected, he hanged himself.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. V.

Reject six of these words, and arrange the rest to form a wise saying.

Stirreth	But	All	Up
None	Covereth	Maketh	Openeth
Loveth	Walketh	On	Strifes
Up	Love	Hatred	Sins

ANSWER TO SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

NO. IX.—p. 224.—"ARISE, SHINE!"—Isa. lx. 1; Eph. v. 14.

A-haziah . . . . . 2 Kings i. 2, 7.
R-euben. . . . . Gen. xxxvii. 29, 30.
I-saiah . . . . . Isa. vi. 11.
S-aul . . . . . Acts ix. 4, 5.
E-lisha . . . . . 2 Kings iv. 8, 13.

S-amuel . . . . . 1 Sam. xv. 19.
H-azael . . . . . 2 Kings viii. 13.
I-saac . . . . . Gen. xxvii. 20.
N-icodemus . . . . . John iii. 9.
E-zra . . . . . Ezra ix. 14.

Monthly Religious Record.

THE discussion on Mohammedanism has not yet died out. It has been taken up at remote points, by those practically acquainted with the subject. Canon Taylor's paper was inserted in a Moslem newspaper at Damascus, and in another at Beyrout. The Moslem editor calls upon the faithful to hear what "the English monk" says about them. Where the Englishman describes Islam as a brotherhood, the editor puts, in a parenthesis, "Would to God it were so"; and where Islam is credited with advantages in the prohibition of gambling, the editor exclaims, "You gamblers, hear this, and may God judge you!"

The veteran Bishop Crowther, writing from the Niger, mentions several causes which conduce to the spread of Mohammedanism. One of these is to be found in the slave-wars. "As the religion sanctions slave-wars and slavery, its professors do not sympathise with the miseries produced by them. They shut their eyes and deaden their feelings to these atrocities, and the gains and profits they reap therefrom are considered their reward as faithful followers of the Prophet, one half the value of slaves and spoils being claimed by the chief, and the other half divided amongst the soldiers to encourage them for future warlike enterprises." Another cause of progress is the sanction of polygamy; a third, the sale of charms; and a fourth the encouragement of works of merit. "If, of the five daily prayers, through unavoidable circumstances, some be omitted, an account of the unsaid prayers is carefully kept, and at convenient times the deficiencies are paid off." Many accidental circumstances have also contributed to the growth of the Mohammedan population; but whereas the Moslems count all conquered tribes as converted, it sometimes takes years for Christian teaching to permeate the mass.

According to the testimony of the Rev. W. Allan, Vicar of St. James's, Bermondsey, who lately inspected the missions in Sierra Leone, the statement that Christian Africans are becoming Mohammedans is quite unfounded. The Rev. O. Moore, a native clergyman, also writes that "the idea concerning the so-called spread of Mohammedanism—that Islam is gaining ground among us, is a delusion altogether. Nothing of the sort has taken place. Mohammedans increase by accessions of fresh Mohammedans from the interior, and not at all from conversions made in Sierra Leone. It is a great mistake to think otherwise."

As regards Central Africa, the testimony of Emin Pasha, as it occurs in his "Letters and Journals," recently published, is worth noting. It is plain that he does not believe in Mohammedanism as actually a civilising agent, and of one district he remarks that after twenty years' dominion, it can scarcely point to ten proselytes.

Other aspects of the subject have been brought under review by Sir William Wilson Hunter, in an admirable paper on the Religions of India, read before the Indian Section of the Society of Arts. His close analysis deals with history, and brings into relief many facts of importance in estimating the different systems. Touching upon social questions, Sir W. W. Hunter remarks, that "Christianity holds out advantages of social organisation not offered by Hinduism or Islam. It provides for the education and moral supervision of its people with a pastoral care which Islam, destitute of a regular priesthood, does not pretend to. It receives the new members into its body with a cordiality and a completeness to which Hinduism is a stranger. . . . On the other hand, the native Christian is exposed to a terrible temptation. Islam is a great teetotal society. Among Hindus, to touch liquor is the sign of low caste. I do not agree with the old Colonel who writes in the newspapers that every Christian servant in India drinks. But it is very sad that the careless, honest observer should so often arrive at this generalisation. I, for one, believe that if Christianity is to be an unmixed blessing in India, it must be Christianity on the basis of total abstinence. This self-imposed restriction would, in India, soon grow into a binding custom, and would raise the Christian communities out of the rank of the liquor-drinking castes." His concluding words were spoken with the authority that attaches only to wide and full knowledge. "Speaking as an Englishman," he said, "I declare my conviction that English missionary enterprise is the highest modern expression of the world-wide national life of our race. I regard it as the spiritual complement of England's instinct for colonial expansion and imperial rule. And I believe that any falling off in England's missionary efforts will be a sure sign of swiftly coming national decay."

THE Church Missionary Society has decided to employ lay evangelists in India. This decision is based on the conviction that, owing not only to the overwhelming numbers of the population of India, but also to the manner in which it is distributed, not so much in large cities and towns as in hundreds of thousands of villages scattered over the whole face of the country, by far the greater part of it lies to this day outside the range of existing missionary agencies; and that if ever the masses of India are to hear the Gospel from the lips of the living preacher, a great extension of evangelistic operations is urgently called for.

THE China Inland Mission has realised its greatest success this last year in the Province of Shan-Si. The work has been carried on largely by native agency. "God has raised up some remarkable native preachers, men of great force of character and singular devotion to the Lord Jesus Christ." In the province of Ho-Nan, which has suffered of late so terribly from the devastation brought by the Yellow River, missionaries have been labouring for ten or eleven years. Much itinerant work has been done; but last year nine men were baptised, and a Christian church organised for the first time. From various other districts come encouraging facts. There are still perils to be braved, and opposition to be encountered. But the general outlook is very encouraging. The Rev. G. Clark tells of preaching to immense audiences, sometimes as many as 4000. It is stated that "a few of as influential men as the empire has produced have embraced Christianity, others are ready to do so, or wish to reap the benefit of its civilizing influences."

FROM Japan come tidings of revival. The increase in all the church of Tokio is reported to be not less than a thousand. Yokohama has also enjoyed a rich blessing; and many of the cities and towns have been roused to interest by the movement.

THE work of the Church Missionary Society has been resumed in Uganda. The Rev. G. Cyril Gordon has taken the place of Mr. Mackay. He had been received by King Mwanga, and reports favourably of the people. Many can read, and are anxious for instruction; but the members of the old "church council" were still in hiding. Bishop Parker, with Rev. R. P. Ashe, Mr. Mackay and other missionaries, had made their way to the south end of the lake. The Bishop was engaged in the exploration of Speke Gulf, in the hope of finding on its shores a suitable site for a new central station.

THE attractive power of the Bible was probably never more conspicuous than now. From South India comes another illustration. "We could mention," says a Wesleyan magazine, "some twenty or thirty places in which Brahmans have formed themselves into sabhas (societies) for the sole purpose of studying the Bible. No missionary has the entrée to their meetings, and their existence is not talked about outside. Yet their questions come to us, sometimes anonymously, always secretly. During the last month the writer of this has sent answers to more than a score such questions—all of them serious, and many of them very acute. They were answers, not to an individual, but to various bodies of Brahmans, and would receive due discussion. Even in the monasteries of this land, and by some of the high-priests of Hinduism, the Sanskrit Bible is to-day a book anxiously studied."

A SERIES of meetings, arranged some time since under the auspices of the Evangelical Alliance, have been held in London for the purpose of testifying to the "Fundamental Truths of the Gospel." The first were held at Exeter Hall, one day being devoted to them. Lord Polwarth was to have presided, but as he was unable to attend, his place was taken by Mr. D. Matheson. At the morning meeting, Canon Girdlestone spoke on "The Inspiration, Authority, and Sufficiency of Scripture." He was followed by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, on "The Unchangeability of the Gospel." Then came the Rev. Canon Fleming, on "The Work of the Holy Spirit." In the afternoon there was a special prayer meeting, at which two addresses were delivered. In the evening, the Rev. E. E. Jenkins resumed the speeches, speaking on "Jesus Christ the Son of God." "As one," he said, "who has visited many countries, and studied many religions, I thankfully affirm that the triumph of the Gospel is its ethical power, and its ethical power is born of its mysteries. Strip it of these, and its glory departs with them." He was followed by the Rev. H. E. G. Moule, on "Jesus Christ the Righteousness of the Believer." In closing, he bore brief, earnest witness to "one profound need of our times." "It is a far-spread need in all sections of the Christian church, one which is fitted to humble and hide the face as we essay to speak of it; a need traceable not to any special doctrinal aberrations, but to the fallen heart of man. I mean the deep, solemn need of a keener, tenderer, profounder sense of sin. I rejoice in the manifold proofs of Christian life at this time, but I must utter my deep conviction that we are not growing, on the whole, in the sense of the sinfulness of sin. And I remember with sad distinctness that most true saying that there has never been a great deviation from Scripture in Church history, but an inadequate sense of the sinfulness of sin has had to do with it." The last speaker was the Rev. Dr. McEwan, who took for his subject, "I believe in the Holy Ghost." A day or two later Kensington Town Hall was the scene of a similar gathering. The Rev. Dr. Angus spoke on "Our Rule of Faith and Practice," making the Scriptures the basis of his review. It is impossible, even in the briefest manner, to analyse these numerous addresses; but one remark of his at the close well deserves to be pondered. "The want of our times," he said, "in the higher department of theology, is the profounder and the simpler study of our Bibles. We often go beyond Scripture in our explanations. We still oftener fall short of it in our beliefs. Let us say all it says, and no more, and let us believe all we say. The result will be clearer light, more reverent knowledge, larger usefulness, and more complete evangelical fellowship." He was followed by the Rev. E. Stuart, who spoke on "Christ the Propitiation." Other speakers were the Rev. W. F. Gooch, on "Truth as related to Spiritual Life"; the Rev. H. W. Webb-Peploe, on "The Consequences of Sin," and the Rev. H. Batchelor, on "Christ's Atoning Work." The next week Mildmay Conference Hall was the place of testimony. Some of the central themes, covering the same ground as at the other meetings, were brought under review by the Rev. W. Park, the Rev. C. B. Symes, the Rev. T. McCullagh, the Rev. Charles A. Fox, the Rev. Charles New, the Rev. C. H. Waller, and the Rev. P. Colborne. A special address was given by Mr. C. H. Spurgeon on "Scripture tested by Experience." A similar series of addresses were also given the same week at the great Assembly Hall, Mile End. The attendance at these various meetings, possibly owing to the severity of the weather, fluctuated considerably, though those addressed by Mr. Spurgeon were crowded. The Rev. G. Stringer Rowe, who came last on the long list of speakers, gave a practical conclusion. "Above all, and in order that our testimony to the truth may be steady and effectual," he said, "we must let that truth have full possession of our own selves. Its sway within our own secret lives must be supreme and undisputed. They who can offer their own personal knowledge and experience in evidence, while their testimony is enforced by the abundance of the fruit of the Spirit in their lives, are rendering the best of all service to the maintenance of the truth; and it is a service as fully within the reach of the least and the feeblest, as of the most gifted."

AMONG the simplest and most helpful agencies at work in Ireland, the Scripture Readers' Society lays claim to sympathetic support. It has suffered severely from the troubled condition of that country. In common with other religious bodies, it has experienced increasing difficulty in realising the necessary funds to maintain its ground. Yet while political and social questions are eagerly debated, the remedial aids which religion affords require not less but rather greater consideration. These constitute an important element in every effort to improve the condition of a people. The Society has a further claim in its non-controversial character. It is conducted on broad, general, and catholic principles; its guide the Bible, and the Bible alone; its object the making wise unto salvation. Its method is the employment of men, unlearned except in one Book, on the same social level as those they are sent to instruct, but lifted above them by union with Christ. "I have had," says an Irish clergyman who appeals for help on its behalf, "one of the agents employed in my parish, a large union containing a mixed population, for the most part poor labourers and cottiers—Irish Church, Presbyterian and Roman Catholics. For the last six years the Scripture Reader has patiently, humbly, but very usefully laboured in this large district, walking daily some ten to twelve miles over hill and bog, country road and rough lane, in summer sunshine, and winter blast, rain and snow, taking the Word of God in his hand from cottage to cottage, reading and praying with the inmates, and rendering such comfort as the occasion or necessity might demand. Not occasionally, but constantly, unsought testimony reaches my ears bearing witness to the faithfulness of the reader and to the comfort and instruction he brings with him as he pursues his quiet labours. These men fill a void that could scarcely be supplied by others, be they ever so highly qualified or intellectually endowed. They understand the wants of those among whom they minister as superiors could not. They are confided in, consulted about matters which the clergyman will never be told, or the cultured, refined lady-visitor troubled with." Cannot some of our readers, who are interested in Ireland, help these men?

ANOTHER step towards Methodist Union has been taken by the special committee appointed at the Wesleyan Conference "to consider and report as to the way by which waste and friction in the actual working of the various sections of the Methodist church may be lessened or prevented, and brotherly feeling promoted." It has been decided to recommend the Conference to receive representatives from, and appoint representatives to, the New Connexion, Primitive Methodist, and Bible Christian Conferences, and the Annual Assembly of the United Methodist Free Church. The Conference is further recommended to empower the Committee of Privileges to take common action with the representatives of the other Methodist bodies where this is thought desirable, and to sanction united meetings for Christian fellowship, interchange of pulpits, and periodical meetings of ministers and lay-representatives of Methodist Churches.

THE Open-Air Mission prepares for its summer campaign by an early anniversary meeting. Sir Arthur Blackwood, K.C.B., presided this year. Mr. Kirkham submitted the thirty-fifth report. Every attempt to tabulate attendance at public worship has only shown that, without open-air preaching, multitudes would never hear the sound of the Gospel. Yet the report pointed out that, whilst the need of such work is now more urgent than ever, the difficulties connected therewith have increased. The operation of the Mission was illustrated by statistics, of which the most striking was the estimate that about three millions of listeners had been gathered during the year. The total receipts for the twelve months had been £1638, and the expenditure, £1633. The Hon. and Rev. Canon Pelham spoke of the work which the Mission had carried on within his district. Addresses were also delivered by Mr. F. A. Bevan, and Dr. Harry Gratton Guinness.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

BY E. EVERETT GREEN, AUTHOR OF "BARBARA'S BROTHERS," ETC.

HER FATHER'S CLUTCH TIGHTENED ON HER ARM.

CHAPTER XLIII.—JOAN'S OPINIONS.

JOAN'S opinions were seldom of much account in the Edington household, and seldom readily advanced; but none the less for that were they pretty clearly defined, and she could enunciate them with some energy when roused to do so.

She was, perhaps, more alive than any one else to the change that was being slowly wrought in Roy, and she was too true a woman not to be prepared to act unselfishly when the call to do so came.

Perhaps no one in the house more valued Roy's presence there than she did. His coming had roused her from that state of apathy into which she was slowly sinking, and had brought her back to a sense of humanity—so to speak—to a consciousness that life was something different from the dull, joyless, worthless thing she had always believed: that she had a part of her own to play in the world, be it ever so small a one, and that however monotonous and sombre the life here might be, it was yet worth living and worth living well, for the sake of another mysterious life which had hitherto been but as a name to Joan, and in which she had had no real living belief.

She began to see, too, that even at Windmill House things could be made somewhat different from what they had been hitherto. A perceptible change had passed over several members of the household; but how would it be if Roy were to leave them? She felt perfectly sure that in such a case things would just sink back to their old level—all the sunshine would die out of her life.

And yet she began to resolve within herself that go he should; she knew that he was failing day by day; she knew that his condition required a skill and care quite beyond their power to give, and she was determined to turn to account the interest and dawning affection she had fancied her father bestowed upon their guest, to induce him to share her fears, and to give his consent to his departure from his present quarters.

She boldly asked her father one day how long he meant to keep Roy with them? She received in reply rather an uneasy glance.

"Till his majority, I suppose."

"Indeed!"—her tone was strange and abrupt. "Do you think he will be with us as long as that? But surely you will let him go home to see his brother before long?"

"Does he wish to do so?"

"I am pretty certain he must."

"Has Marcus Stratford written to ask him?"

"I'm sure I hope he has," answered Joan boldly, repressing some inward struggle. "This place is just killing him."

Her father grasped her suddenly by the arm, and gazed at her with an expression she did not understand.

"Killing him! What do you mean? It is not true—it cannot, shall not be true! Hubert's child! Joan, what do you mean?"

"I mean that he misses all the things he has been used to, which he cannot get here, and that he gets weaker and paler every day. I am sure I should be thankful if his brother would take him away. It is not in the least fit for him to be here."

"But I cannot spare him! I cannot spare him! He shall not go!" cried the old man, with considerable agitation of manner. "I am his lawful guardian. No one can take him away without my consent, and that they shall never have."

Joan looked at him steadily, a grave disapproval in her eyes.

"Father," she said, "what is the good of risking that poor boy's life in order to try to get some advantage out of it for ourselves? I know what Roger wishes, and Caroline too. They have persuaded you that there is something to be gained by taking up the guardianship; but why do you do as they wish? Why can you not be generous and let him go back to the place he will always call home?"

Her father's clutch tightened on her arm, his face was working with an emotion such as she had not seen in him all her life.

"You do not understand," he said in gasps. "It is not what you think. It is not what Roger thinks. I do not want his money. Sometimes I hate the very sound of the word. I want him, the boy himself. I want him to love me, to forgive me. Since he came into it, this house has been different. He brought a blessing with him. If he goes, that will go too, and all will be as it was before. I can't spare him, Joan. I can't spare him, I say. He is Hubert's boy, and Hubert loved me once, and I loved him. He has his eyes and his voice and his smile. When I sit and look at him, it is as if all these miserable years were blotted out, and I was a happy and prosperous man again. God forgive me, I drove poor Hubert to desperation and despair—perhaps to death itself. I must make it up to his boy—I must and will. He shall learn to love me, and to forgive me in his father's name. When he does that, I may, perhaps, be able to die happy. I will not let him go, Joan. I tell you he shall not go!"

Joan listened to this sudden outburst simply dumbfounded. The alternations of sorrow, fierce determination, and wistful affection and regret were inexplicable to her; but she perceived at once that some great change had passed over his feelings of which this sudden outbreak was the first definite indication she had received. She had not been unobservant. She had fancied he had taken a liking to the boy; but she had not been prepared for anything like this.

"Well, father," she said in her blunt, downright way, "if you really care for Roy and his welfare and happiness, you will send him back to his home as quickly as you can. Every day I expect him to break down and take to his bed. I don't know much about illness, but I do know that he will be ill if he stays here much longer. I am very glad you do not have any part or lot in Roger's schemes; but I want to get Roy away from here—that is the only way of showing him real kindness."

"No, no, no!" cried the old man eagerly. "He must not go, he shall not. I want him here. I will take care of him. If he is ill I will nurse him myself, and he shall have all he wants. I cannot spare him yet—not until I have told him all he does not know, and he has taught me what I have forgotten. I know he can. I see it in his face; I hear it when he talks to the child. Alicia's boy is sure to know all about it. I must learn it too. I knew it once; but it has all gone from me now; and I never taught it to you. You are young, you have plenty of time before you; but I am growing old—growing old. I have no time to lose—I have told myself so again and again. Ah! Joan, you don't know how dark it is to be growing old when all the light is hidden away! Is it only hidden, I wonder, or is it extinguished quite?"

Joan's face had softened somewhat as these murmured words fell upon her ear. She began to understand better the change she had observed in her father and the inner workings of his mind. Had she, too, not known a new restlessness and dissatisfaction of late? and had not peace and happiness come at last in some measure in response to the lessons she had received from Roy's boyish teaching? Could it be that her father had shared in part her thoughts and feelings, little as she had suspected it? She began to think it must have been so, and her heart felt softer towards him.

"You asked me once if there were a God in heaven, Joan. Do you remember? I think that question has never been out of my head day or night ever since. Often have I cursed you in my heart for asking it—waking up thoughts and feelings and scruples that I had deemed laid at rest for ever. I do not curse you now. I am glad to be awake—awake from a long, black dream; it is night still around me, dark, lonely night: but there is light somewhere, I believe, and the dawn will come, perhaps,——" He stopped abruptly, for Roy had entered in his slow quiet way, a smile upon his pale face.

"Roy," cried the old man in quick, moved tones, "you do not wish to leave us, do you?"

"No, sir, certainly not," answered the lad, swallowing bravely down the sudden sense of homesickness awakened by the words, "not so long as I am wanted here."

"We all want you," came the answer spoken with a sort of feverish eagerness. "You have done us all good. Joan says you ought to go. She says we shall kill you here. You are not ill, are you, Roy?"

Roy looked across at Joan with a flash in his eyes half of merriment, half of gratitude.

"I am tougher than Joan thinks, sir. I do not think I shall be put out of the way quite so easily. I am not nearly so lame as I was, and if I can get about better perhaps I shall lose my cough too. Don't be alarmed about me, sir; I am very well cared for here. I suppose Joan is tired of having two people to wait on instead of one. She wants to get rid of one troublesome charge."

But the bright glance of his eyes told Joan that he knew better than that, and she smiled back at him, though she shook her head too. But the old man looked much relieved.

"Ah, I thought it must be her fancy—women do have fancies, you know, Roy; but I can't spare you yet. We are so comfortable here together. You can't get cold in a warm room like this. I have lived in it more years than I can count."

Roy reassured him, and took his accustomed seat with the sort of feeling that he would gradually take root there. He had nearly all his meals in the study now with his uncle, for Joan was firm in discountenancing his journey through the draughty passages and up and down the well-like staircase. His lameness was benefited by this exemption, and he submitted the more readily to the regulation because he fancied his guardian liked him to be there. There was still a good deal of reserve about the old man, but it was melting rapidly now.

Joan went away, smiling a little to herself at being set down as a fanciful woman; but she had said her say, and now she must bide her time and watch and wait.

"They will soon see, I am afraid," she said to herself; "and if the worst comes to the worst, I can but write to Marcus Stratford myself. I will do that if every thing else fails."

CHAPTER XLIV.—THE FEAR REALISED.

Things went quietly on at Windmill House for a week or two after that. Christmas time was approaching, taking Roy's thoughts back with almost painful vividness of recollection to other Christmas-seasons, brighter and gayer than this was likely to be; and yet sometimes the boy felt within himself that he had never been so truly happy as he was now, never so confident of the blessedness of this life or the reality of that to come. Christmas brought a new sense of light and joy this year, and he was not altogether sorry that it should fall to his lot to help to brighten Christmas to those who seemed to know so little about its happy message and promises. In reply to an affectionate letter from Marcus, he had steadily declared it his intention to remain where he was for the present, though he hoped soon to pay his brother a visit. Just now he had a bad cold and was shut up indoors, he could not well travel; and he ended up by asking if he might have a box of things sent to him, containing the wherewithal for a Christmas-tree for his cousins, with a gift suitable to the advanced years of the grown-up members of the household also. Marcus answered that appeal in the generous fashion natural to him, only too glad to have the chance of doing something to please the boy—glad that he should ask for what he wanted in the frank way habitual to him of old. Muriel and he laid their heads together, and the result was that such a box was dispatched to Windmill House, as would have raised a perfect tumult had not Roy stipulated with Joan beforehand for absolute secrecy; and he and she did all the unpacking and arranging, no one else in the house being aware that anything unusual was on foot.

Joan stood amazed at the contents of the box, as one after another the packages were unfastened and laid out on the floor. She had never seen anything like such profusion before. The pantry, where the work of excavation went on, became like Aladdin's cave to her.

Roy was greatly delighted, and touched too by his brother's kindly generosity, as well as by the many tokens of goodwill showered upon himself; for each one of the Kynastons had packed up a present for him, and there seemed no end to the treasures of all descriptions that were unearthed from that box.

Joan obtained a tree and smuggled it into an upper room, and to her share fell chiefly the decoration of the shrub, for Roy was soon missed if he absented himself long from the study, and he was anxious that no suspicions should be aroused. Moreover, he was not strong enough to stand about, and when once he had put Joan into the way of doing the work, she proved much quicker and cleverer at it than himself.

Roy had seen many Christmas-trees in his life before, but perhaps he had never before enjoyed one quite so much as this. The astonishment and delight of his cousins was so unbounded and so loudly expressed; he saw such rapturous pleasure on every face, heard it in every tone of their voices, that he was more than rewarded for all he had done and contrived, and only wished that Marcus and Muriel could see it all. His own happiness was enhanced by the news that had only reached him lately of the engagement between those two, and Muriel's letter of almost sisterly love was very sweet, especially as it was coupled with a decided hint that it would not be long before they had him amongst them again.

However, for the present he was content enough to be amongst his cousins, bringing home to them in some fashion a Christmas brightness and love which that household had never known before.

Joan had watched him somewhat anxiously all that day, for she was afraid he was doing too much for his strength. She paid him a visit at night, as she sometimes did, to see if he were inclined to sleep quietly, or to bring him some soothing drink if his cough seemed likely to disturb him. He began almost to expect these nightly visitations, and he was wide awake to night and very bright, and made her sit down and indulge in a good long chat, telling her about former Christmas-tides and talking about his mother and how she used to pass the day. Joan was in a thoughtful mood, and the talk took a somewhat grave turn, as it often did between those two; but she would not stay long, for she thought the boy looked feverish, and wanted him to settle to sleep. But Roy slept little that night, and awoke weaker than usual; but for that and several other days he managed to get up and about, as far at least as the study; but it was only putting off the evil day—staving off till the last moment the inevitable collapse which he knew must come sooner or later. He was forced at last to take to his bed, though for some days he did not seem very ill, and enjoyed having the girls in to read to him or to talk. But he became rapidly worse as time passed on, and Mrs. Edington grew slightly nervous and kept the children away, not from fear of infection exactly, but because she did not consider a sick room the place for them; and, indeed, Roy soon grew too ill to be able to do with their society or their talk. How ill he was none of these relatives of his knew, for they were quite inexperienced in such matters, and were half disposed to consider everything as accounted for by a theory of bad, feverish cold. Roger was moodily indifferent, grudging expense, without daring to remonstrate; Joan was too actively busy with nursing and cooking to have overmuch time for thought, whilst Andrew Edington took up his position beside the sick boy, and hardly left him night or day.

This to Joan was the most curious phase of all. To see her father watching over Roy as if he were his only or best-loved child was strange indeed, and still more strange was it to watch the quick development of mutual understanding between them.

In her presence they hardly ever talked; indeed, at no time had Roy much strength or breath for conversation; but whilst at first he had seemed inclined to be burdened and oppressed by the presence of his great uncle beside him, he gradually began to turn to him naturally for anything he wanted. When most weary and restless with fever or pain, it was Andrew Edington's voice that soothed him best; and the old man would read to him hour after hour in low even tones that had much of depth and mellowness in them, until the boy would drop asleep lulled into peaceful forgetfulness.

It was the Bible that the old man always took up on these occasions. It was the only book to hand when he had first tried the experiment of reading aloud to the restless, wakeful boy, and no change had been suggested by either of them. Joan would often steal in at nights to see how her patient fared, to hear the steady voice still reading on and on, and sometimes she would sit down in a shadowy corner and listen too, with bated breath and folded hands.

Now and then when the boy slept and the old man had ceased to read, she would hear him murmur to himself words that had most deeply impressed him.

"Come unto Me—I will in no wise cast him out—Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also—Lay up treasure in heaven—Covetousness which is idolatry—My God shall supply all your need."

Broken words like these often fell from her father's lips, showing Joan whither his thoughts were tending. She had travelled too lately over the same road not to feel a deep and keen sympathy for and with him; and once in the darkness of the winter's night, when he was sitting with the well-worn book before him, and she had stolen in, as it were unawares, the barrier of an almost life-long reserve melted away she knew not how nor why; and she knelt down at her father's feet, weeping as she had not wept since her far-off childhood.

The old man evinced no surprise at this sudden outbreak of emotion. He laid his hand gently on Joan's head, and stroked her hair with a tender hand. He had changed so much of late days that she was not surprised at his caress. It seemed to her as if this could not be the same father she had half-feared, half-pitied for so many long years, but the one she dimly remembered in far-off days, who had held her on his knee sometimes, and let her prattle to him, or had heard her repeat her simple lessons, and sing the childish hymns her mother used to teach her. The past seemed to return upon her, making the present less strange. She leaned her head against his shoulder, and felt eased by the tears that flowed.

"Why do you weep, my child?" he asked, "is it because you have not found the way we are both seeking? Shall we seek it now together?"

"Jesus Christ is the way, dear father," answered Joan, checking her tears. "I know, I feel that it is so; and He is always to be found if only our sins will let us go to Him. I know that much; I have felt it myself, and Roy has told me so. Only it is so hard always to have faith. But, indeed, I believe—I am sure it is all true. Is it so to you, dear father?"

"It is coming back, Joan; it is coming back—that old sense of rest that I drove away and shut out of my heart for years. God be thanked, it is coming back now. I think I have laid down my burden at the foot of the cross. I trust I shall never take it up again. It has been a sore, a heavy burden all these years, though I never knew it till now. Pray for me, Joan, that it may not return, for the cherished sin of a lifetime, indulged as mine has been, is not cast away without a terrible wrench. Pray for me, child, pray earnestly, for the battle is harder for me than it is for you."

And Joan still knelt beside her father, a strange mingling of awe and reverence and pitying love rising up within her. No more passed in words between them for Roy moved uneasily, and they feared to disturb his precarious rest; but from that time forward a deep bond of sympathy drew Joan and her father together, and the girl felt by instinct that the dreary, sordid life at Windmill House was over for her for ever. Things would never be quite as they had been after that night.

TALITHA CUMI.

ST. MARK v. 41.

BY THE REV. HUGH MACMILLAN, D.D., LL.D.

MY text is a peculiar one. It is a phrase in a language that very few can understand—a language that is no more spoken. But it is as significant as a fossil in the rock, as a fly in amber. It is for the sake of that significance that it has been preserved. St. Mark is the only one of the evangelists who describes the personal look and feeling of our Lord, and treasures up the very words which He uttered. He alone tells us that Jesus surnamed James and John the sons of Zebedee Boanerges. He alone records the word Ephphatha with which Jesus opened the closed ears and mouth of the deaf and dumb man. He alone mentions the Corban, or the consecrated temple gift, which our Lord condemned on account of the perversion of it by the selfish Pharisees. He alone informs us that in the Garden of Gethsemane Jesus said "Abba, Father, all things are possible unto Thee." And he alone has preserved the very word Talitha cumi, which Jesus made use of when He raised the daughter of Jairus from the dead. All these peculiar words belong to the Aramaic language, and are quite different from the words of the Hebrew language in which the Old Testament was written, and from the words of the Greek language in which the New Testament was written. They are a proof to us that our Lord in the ordinary intercourse of life employed, as was natural, the common vernacular tongue of the people. The words in question fastened themselves, because of their wonderful graphic force and suggestiveness, to the memory of the Apostle Peter who was present when they were spoken, and he told them to his friend and kinsman Mark, who in turn has recorded them in his Gospel for our edification.

The smallest things connected with Jesus are unspeakably precious to us. And surely it is a delightful feeling, for which we cannot be too grateful, that, owing to the thoughtfulness of Mark, our own lips can utter the very sounds which the lips that spake as never man spake uttered. Almost everything associated with our Lord's sojourn on earth has perished. The exact localities connected with the striking incidents of His pilgrimage can no longer be identified. There is not a spot of ground in Palestine which the visitor can be sure that the sacred feet had trodden it. The home in which He lived; the cross on which He died; the grave in which He lay: all these relics of His earthly existence have disappeared for ever, because of the proneness of man to cleave to some visible object of worship, and to pay that adoration to the thing which is due only to Him by whom all things were created, and who is the same yesterday, to-day and forever. But amid the universal wreck of the material symbols of our religion, it is a cause of thankfulness that some of the identical Aramaic words of Jesus have been saved to us. They seem to bring Him nearer to us than the ordinary Greek words of the Gospel in the original, or the common English words of our own translation. It is a bond of communion between us such as nothing else that is merely physical could form. Like a lock of hair from a beloved head that has disappeared in the dust, they make Him very real to us; and we seem to know Him once more as it were anew after the flesh.

Our English translation of the Aramaic phrase "Talitha cumi" conveys but little of the depth of tenderness of the original. It sounds formal and cold. If it were rendered "My little lamb, awake," it would come much nearer the meaning of the original. And its beauty is greatly enhanced when we know that it was the common term of endearment with which loving Syrian mothers awoke their children from an unusually prolonged sleep. It was therefore a household word—a term belonging to the nursery—to the innermost circle of home. And so regarded, it has several most important and touching lessons to teach us. We are told in Eastern story that a single word, "sesame," opened the door of a cave which contained a vast amount of treasure in gold and jewels, so the single phrase Talitha cumi has power to unlock a rich storehouse of most instructive and comforting thought.

1. In the first place it tells us that not by some unpronounceable magic formula—some strange unknown words does Christ raise the dead, but by the common familiar words used in the home. How different was the conduct of Christ from that of a mere magician or wonder-worker! Had He been such, He would have invested His visit to the room of the little dead girl with all the pomp of circumstance, and all the mystery of supernatural power. He would have waved His magic wand majestically. He would have uttered some unknown incantation, pronounced some solemn-sounding unintelligible charm. Everything that He would have said and done on such an occasion would have been said and done for effect. He would have spoken and acted in such a way as to appeal most powerfully to the excited imagination of those around Him. It has always been in this manner that those who pretended to possess supernatural power have acted. They concealed their want of power by a laborious assumption of it, by an exaggeration of what they supposed to be its signs and evidences, by loud noise and self-assertion, by the use of artificial and unnatural means. But truth is always eminently simple and natural; and He who had all power in earth and heaven acted with the simplicity and naturalness which ever distinguishes the real from the false. He came into the hushed shaded room, where the dead lay, quietly and gently as any ordinary mourner would have done. He gazed upon the young face—so fair, so pathetic in its statue-like stillness—so well-known and yet so unknown, with deep human sympathy, touched with a fellow-feeling of our sorrow. He took the thin, wasted, pulseless hand in His own; and as the child's mother would have done had the little maid been asleep too long, and some household task were awaiting her, He used the old familiar word which she had often heard and said Talitha cumi, "My little lamb, awake!" I think we can see in the very use of that word itself, that the evangelist was describing a real and not a fictitious incident. No human imagination could have invented it. It is a touch of nature which must have been described from life. It is far easier to believe that the miracle happened than to believe that any one could have put into the lips of Jesus falsely, on such an occasion, a term which would have been utterly foreign to the whole conception of a supposititious miracle. Magicians have always used incomprehensible terms, things most remote from ordinary human uses. Physicians have alway written their prescriptions in a strange unknown tongue. The art of healing and the art of magic have always enshrouded themselves with mystery. But it was not so with the Great Physician—with the Great Magician of our salvation. He was always entirely simple and natural. In the humblest form He appeared unto men, and in the homeliest words He spoke unto them. He uttered His sublimest discourses in the ordinary speech of the people. They were not set forms of speech, but the spontaneous outgrowths of the occasion; and the common people heard Him gladly. He raised the dead to life by the familiar greeting of a mother to her sleeping child.

And are not souls raised from spiritual death still by words as simple and familiar as those which our Lord used in the case of the daughter of Jairus? Has He not clothed His gospel in a form so plain and easy, that the most ignorant can understand it? It is not by some elaborate and learned discourse that human beings are usually converted, but by some little familiar phrase, some common gospel truth which they have heard all their life, but which all at once comes home with special power to their souls, and seems to them altogether new. If believers will look back upon their first experience they will almost universally acknowledge that they were savingly impressed, not by a large and general survey of Divine truth, but by some isolated text, some simple familiar statement. They did not know all that might be learned about Christ; they knew only this one thing that they were sinners, and that Jesus was able and willing to save them. More knowledge of Him came afterwards, through fellowship and communion with Him, through growth in grace and study of His word and works; but from some simple familiar saying of His came at first the power which renewed their heart and changed their destiny.

In the quaint old phraseology of our forefathers, the herbs which possessed healing properties were called "simples." They were not plants from far countries with unknown virtues and learned names, but the common herbs of the field which every child knew, whose names were familiar to all, which every old woman could use. And is not the gospel; are not all things that heal the mind, the heart and the soul as well as the body "simples," which every one knows, which the most ignorant can use? The gospel works its greatest marvels by speaking in the plainest words of the love of Jesus, of the sense of sin, of the atoning blood, of the power of the Spirit. The most miserable sinner, whose darkened soul can hardly understand the ordinary terms of correct human language, can find in the gospel of Jesus Christ, what will speak to him "as his mother's caresses once did in his childhood, and as nothing has ever spoken to him since." He who took up little children in His arms and blessed them, who used the mother's act and the mother's word, in raising from the dead the little maid, said "Except ye be converted and become as little children, ye cannot enter the kingdom of heaven." The late celebrated Dr. Cæsar Malan, of Geneva, was fond of saying, that his conversion to the Lord Jesus might with propriety be compared to a mother rousing an infant from sleep with a kiss.

2. In the second place, the Talitha cumi of the text tells us that in the wonderful waking after the sleep of death there will be nothing strange or startling. There was nothing strange or startling in the raising of the daughter of Jairus from the dead. We are struck with its extraordinary quietness, and naturalness. Christ made use of the common household phrase of endearment to awaken her. His mighty resurrection power was conveyed in the form of the ordinary household call. The mother's love had formerly roused her child from sleep; and now it is made the mightiest power in the universe, to call the dead to life. We see in the restoration of the little maid the power of infinite gentleness, the magic of infinite love. The child awoke amid the old familiar circumstances of home, surrounded by father and mother and all the dear associations of her life. She took up and reunited the vital thread where it had been broken off. Her sun—as in an Arctic summer—just dipped for a short time below the horizon, and then rose again unchanged. And is not this an expressive type to us, of what shall happen when our Lord at the last day raises to life the dead who fall asleep in Him?

We are apt to think of that time as an awful crisis in the history of the universe. We are accustomed to dwell in imagination upon its tremendous phenomena. We think of the penetrating, world-resounding call, the summons irresistible of the angelic trumpeters, rousing mankind from their graves and marshalling them in ranks before the great white throne. We hear the loud shout with which Christ shall descend from heaven; we see the dark golden-edged clouds, which will form His chariot of triumph; we behold the rending of the rocks that concealed within their iron walls some long-forgotten human dust, the yawning of the ocean depths when the sea shall give up its dead. We picture to our imaginations a terrible scene of supernatural power and human terror and unearthly tumult. We dwell upon the awful features of the scene until they take exclusive possession of our minds.

It is true, indeed, that such terror-inspiring scenes will be enacted at the last day. We cannot possibly exaggerate the awful majesty and grandeur of the outward circumstances and the moral significance of the occasion. Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor can the heart of man conceive what will then be transacted upon the stage of the world. But there is another side of the picture which we must not lose sight of.

We are familiar with the twofold aspect in which the Bible often represents the same person or thing. It calls Jesus the Lamb of God, and the Lion of the Tribe of Judah. He is the Prince of Peace, and He came not to bring peace, but a sword. It compares the kingdom of heaven to the quiet gradual growing of the seed to the blade, and from the blade to the full corn in the ear, and it says that the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force. These are not contradictions, but only two aspects of the same person or thing; the reverse and obverse side of the same shield of faith, both of which are equally true. And in accordance with this Scripture practice, the raising of the dead at the last day, may be described on one side as a tremendous crisis, in which every physical and spiritual phenomenon which can excite and awe the imagination is employed as the imagery of the terrific scene; and on the other side it may be described in terms as quiet, and simple, and natural, as those which would be employed to describe an ordinary awakening from sleep now.

The last day will come as a thief in the night with noiseless step. It will break like any other morning upon the common works and ways of the world, and shall find men buying and selling, eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage. It will come as Christ Himself came, without observation. And as Christ touched the bier of the widow of Nain's son, and the procession which was carrying him to his grave, stood still, so will He touch the great bier of humanity, and the vast funeral procession of the world, which has been going on unceasingly since the first death outside the walls of Eden, will be arrested for ever; and as He raised the daughter of Jairus from her brief death-sleep by the quiet familiar Talitha cumi of household love, so will He raise the dead who have fallen asleep in Him, by the gentle call of heavenly affection which He so often addressed to them; and as He delivered the young man of Nain to his mother, so will He deliver all the loved and lost to the arms of their beloved for evermore. He Himself is our resurrection and life; and by the touch of the hand and the sound of the voice of Him who Himself was dead, will the dead be raised.

It is the same Spirit that quickened our dead souls, that shall quicken our mortal bodies. It is the same touch that opened our blind eyes, and unsealed our silent tongue, and cured the leprosy of our souls that shall break the spell of death. It is the very same voice that called us to follow Him here in newness of life, that will call us to the resurrection life that shall never end. There will be nothing strange or new in the means of the resurrection; there will be nothing unknown or unfamiliar in the mode of existence which it will open up. Heaven will be a recollection; the restitution of all things. It is this very mortal that shall put on immortality. It is the self-same nature we have here, those very attributes and energies which constitute our humanity, that are to emerge, unaffected by the transition, from the dark river, and wear on the farther shore the glories of immortality.

An eminent saint said when dying, "How sweet to die in the midst of the love of God, and the love of wife and children." And dying thus surrounded by all that we love most on earth, we shall awake from the dead surrounded in the same manner. The old familiar love that blessed us here will greet us in the realms beyond. The daughter of Jairus, like all who were raised again to life within the confines of this world, was restored to the family circle. The means that restored her, was the familiar Talitha cumi of a mother's love. When she opened her eyes she found father and mother around her bed as they had been when she fell asleep. We can see in this fact an earnest and type of what shall be the mode of life in the world beyond; an assurance that God will begin our resurrection life, as He began our life here on earth, among those we have known and loved, and in the bosom of the family circle. The Talitha cumi of the wonderful miracle teaches us that it is love that quickens the dead soul; that it is love that quickens the mortal body. It is love that builds the earthly home; it is love that builds the heavenly home. And the highest conception we can form of heaven is not glorified material pomp, or glorified intellectual triumph, but glorified affection. The sympathies and affections are the primal and the most indestructible elements of our nature, that which we have nearest God, and likest God. God is love; and love is love for evermore.

And the practical lesson for us here and now, to be derived from the deep significance of Christ's Talitha cumi is, that we should make our family ties so loyal and so sacred that they will keep all our beloved ones whether dead or living eternally ours, and bind us irrevocably to a life to come. Jesus took the common watch-word of love, with which a Syrian mother woke her sleeping child, and He made it the link of love, as it were, between this life and the life beyond. What a Divine meaning He put into it by so using it! What a Divine power He gave to it; just as He multiplied a few barley loaves and fishes into a feast for thousands, or changed the water of the marriage feast into wine! And so He can by His grace give an equally profound significance to all the ties of family life which bind us together, to all the words of love which pass between us, and to all the homely experiences we share together. He can link them with immortality. He can make them the means of raising us into a purer, a more unselfish, a more heavenly life.

Our earthly love in His higher love will endure for evermore. If the human nature in Christ was intended to bring the Divine more close to us, we may be sure that God draws nearer to us and manifests Himself more freely to us in the gentle tendernesses of home than in any other way. How often do the loving ministries of a daughter become as a benediction of heaven to her parents! How often does the cradle of the sleeping infant become as a Bethel-revelation to the soul of the mother! How often does the child at the altar of the mother's knee, comprehend the mysteries of godliness, the atonement and mediation and self-sacrifice of infinite love! How often do parents understand, through the training of their children, their own filial relation to God in a way in which they could not otherwise have realized it! Love indeed holds the key of all the creeds. Let us seek then through Christ dwelling in our heart, through Christ abiding in our home, to sanctify all these affections, to make them channels of grace, through which the life-blood of religion may flow from soul to soul. And so the voice that shall raise us all from the dead at last, and deliver all the members of the family to one another for ever, will be the very same voice which had cheered our sorrows and strengthened our hearts for every duty in this world; the very same Talitha cumi which was the familiar voice of love that called us to our household tasks while we lived on earth. And the life which we shall live hereafter will be but the continuation of the life we lead here; and the home to which we are going will be only the counterpart and completion of the home on earth.

The power in the familiar Talitha cumi of the miracle is an instructive lesson to us that similar power may be given to the humblest and most familiar things, to become means of quickening to our souls. We are waiting, many of us, it may be, for striking providences, startling events, more arresting appeals, more extraordinary displays of Divine power. But God is continually teaching us that there is sufficient power in the common-place experiences of our daily life, in the familiar truths of the gospel which we have heard from our childhood, in the means of grace which we are enjoying every Sabbath, to convert us to newness of life, if only we give earnest heed to them, and fervently ask God to bless them to us. We can make old, worn-out words, from which all meaning has departed by sheer repetition, at once new and striking and full of precious significance by making them experimentally our own, by living them. No phrase can be more common-place than the simple gospel formula: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved;" and yet it may become to us at once, if we only act upon it, what Talitha cumi was to the daughter of Jairus—a new and living truth—a means of raising us from a death in sin to newness of life, and a link connecting this perishing life with the life everlasting in heaven.

In June Time.

O GOD, Thy thoughts of love appear
In this fair noontide of the year,—
The sunny height, the sapphire sea,
The grass with dew and daisies pearled,—
Yea, all the happy summer world
Is full of beauty and of Thee!

From the hid treasures of the skies
The clouds, Thy chariots, bring supplies
And on Thine errands come and go;
The winds Thy guiding word obey,
And at Thy bidding, day by day,
Breathe gladness o'er the earth below.

THE FIRSTLING OF THE FLOCK.

The lambs, whose days in play are spent,
The cattle drowsy with content,
The insect, soaring but to fall,
Whose little life, at dawn begun,
Will vanish ere the setting sun,—
Thy faithfulness is over all.

Thine is the softness of the showers,
The tender springing of the flowers
That mark the brightness of Thy ways;
The birds that in Thy courts are fed,
To render for their daily bread
The ceaseless ministry of praise

For Thee all lovely things unclose,
The secret foldings of the rose,
Obedient, widen and increase:
The earth that on Thy bounty lives
For usury her fulness gives,
Thou makest all her borders peace.

So let Thy life in us abound,
From Thee alone our fruit is found,
O may Thy love, as summer free,
Each virtue quicken and control,
That in the June-time of the soul
We may grow beautiful for Thee!

MARY ROWLES.

HOSPITAL NURSES

IN LONDON AND ON THE CONTINENT.

BY MRS. BREWER.

CHAPTER I.

So kind, so duteous, diligent,
So tender over his occasions, true,
So feat, so nurse-like.
Ask God to give thee skill in comfort's art
That thou mayst consecrated be and set apart
Unto a life of sympathy;
For heavy is the weight of woe in every heart,
And comforters are needed much of Christ-like touch.
—Shakespeare's Cymbeline, iv. 5.

NO person old enough to remember the state of our hospitals at the period in which our Queen began her reign can fail to notice the improvement which has taken place both in the buildings, in the sanitary arrangements, and in the nurses during the years that have followed.

I say nothing of the doctors, for they have always been enthusiastic and devoted to their art, making the best of the materials placed at their disposal. I do not deny that medical students were wild and reckless, but they loved their art as much then as now, and thought no self-denial too great, if by it they could restore the sick under their care.

I remember, in the old days, when I was permitted to learn something of hospital life, seeing a medical student brought out of one of the men's wards in a dead faint—I thought he was really dead, he looked so white and still. On inquiry, I found that about eleven o'clock on the previous night, while he was amusing himself with other students in the shop, as it was called, a nurse came shuffling in to say that a man in her ward was bleeding to death from an artery. This young student was by the man's side in a moment, and, nothing being ready to hand, as there would be in these days, he put his two fingers on the wound, and by pressure staunched the blood. The house-surgeon coming into the ward shortly after, approved of what was being done, but warned the student that he must continue his position for hours, and by no means relax the pressure on the wound. There he sat the whole night, resolutely obeying orders, till, as I have said, he was brought out in the early morning in a faint. By this mastery over self the man's life was saved, and such acts were, and are, by no means of rare occurrence.

But it is not of the doctors I would speak, but rather of the improvement in hospital management, which has been so gradual and sure that we have scarcely noticed it. Yet light and dark, sweet and bitter, youth and old age are not greater contrasts than the hospitals and nurses of fifty years ago and now.

Surely those uneducated, self-indulgent women who waddled about the wards smelling of spirits, whom Dickens, with his clearness of vision and able pen, has handed down to posterity as the embodiment of coarseness and self-indulgence, could never have developed into these high-bred, self-denying, courteous women, whose very presence is a comfort to the patients, and whose kind word and gentle touch soothe the pain and cheer the long hours of suffering!

No, it could not be; the former class of nurses would never have submitted to the severe training which these ladies have undergone, nor could they have borne the constant strain over self which marks the hospital nurse of to-day.

All is not perfect yet, however great the improvement. There are still nurses and nurses, still some whose manners are not over-refined and whose hearts might be more tender. The best of nurses believe there is much still to learn as well as unlearn, but of one thing we may be quite sure, viz. that the evils arising from education, refinement, and self mastery will be infinitely less disastrous to the patients than those arising from ignorance and want of self-control.

In hospitals, as in other places, a period of change is always uncomfortable; we have not moved thoroughly out of the old grooves, nor do we know the new paths; we do not like our old guides, and have not become familiar with the new ones.

It is painful to think of the sufferings of patients both before and during the transition—of the filth and dirt of the beds, and of the cruel way in which the old class of nurses resented any complaints made by the poor sick people.

Even as short a time back as fifteen years my help was asked for a person who had been a hospital nurse, but who, not approving of the changes going on, desired domestic service. She was a tall, respectable-looking woman, with thin lips, however, and eyes that would not look straight at you. I was instrumental in getting her a good situation, but how do you think she lost it? By boasting that while she was nurse she punished any complaints made of her neglect to the doctors by putting scalding poultices on to the half-healed wounds of those who had made the complaints. I mention this merely to show the class of women often installed in our hospitals during the period of change.

The matrons too were very different people half a century ago; knowing nothing of the dignity of their calling; having favourites among the medical students and nurses; ruling tyrannically and therefore unjustly. And as to teaching or giving lectures to the nurses, such a thing was never heard of, nor would one in a hundred have been capable of it.

One might produce instances without number of incapacity and neglect among the nurses; but it is unnecessary, as all are agreed that previous to Miss Nightingale's time, and the efforts she made to remedy the evils existing in the hospitals, the nursing was the weak point and the obstacle to all improvement.

The nurses, previous to her time, were an ill-paid class of workers, for the hospitals could afford but little in the way of wages. Neither had the authorities considered it necessary that a nurse should prepare herself for the office by special training. Each went to her work in ignorance of what was demanded of her, the clever ones picking up knowledge as they went along; the others, unconscious that any responsibility rested upon them, learnt experience from their own blunders. No wonder the death-rate was high under such circumstances. Blundering, careless, rough, incompetent people, were scarcely fit to be entrusted with the lives of their fellow creatures.

Most of us have noticed that in public institutions, as in our families, the management often goes on for years in a slipshod careless manner, till suddenly something out of the usual every-day occurrences pulls us up as it were, and impresses upon our minds the necessity of a change, if we would avoid ruin.

Just so was it in hospital nursing. The Crimean war showed the rottenness of the old system, and the person who gave the warning and pointed to better things was Florence Nightingale.

It is scarcely necessary to speak to English people of the service this lady rendered them in tending their sick and wounded soldiers in the military hospitals on the Bosphorus and at Balaclava; nor of the public subscription raised on her return as a proof of England's appreciation of the work done by her.

The large sum of money thus subscribed, the English people placed at the disposal of Florence Nightingale to enable her to establish an institution for the training, sustenance, and protection of nurses and hospital attendants, knowing that she would value this opportunity more than any gift they could offer her personally.

She, poor lady, utterly broken down in health from her heavy work in the Crimea, was unable to do more at the time than assist with her advice the council appointed to carry out her wishes.

The money was invested in the English funds and produced an annual income of between one and two thousand a year.

In the year 1859, finding herself quite unequal to active work, she made over the entire control of the fund to the council, merely suggesting and advising the course to be pursued.

Her first strongly-expressed desire was to afford a thoroughly practical and scientific training to women desirous of working as hospital nurses.

This was a step in the right direction, and not a dissenting voice was heard, for all were aware that on the nurses in hospitals a large number of cases were dependent for successful treatment.

Not to go too much into detail, it was decided that St. Thomas's Hospital was well suited to carry out Florence Nightingale's scheme, and an agreement was entered into with the hospital authorities in the spring of 1860. The arrangements were that at first fifteen probationer-nurses, of ages between twenty-five and thirty-five should be received into the hospital for a year's training; that they should be provided with board and separate lodging in the hospital under the charge of a sister, and should receive instruction in the wards from the superintending sisters, the matron, and the resident medical officer, all of whom were to receive remuneration from the fund for so doing.

The first fifteen probationers were admitted on the 24th June, 1860.

From that time to this, no one has seriously disputed the right of an educated woman to act as nurse in any capacity, provided she is capable of performing the duties.

Miss Lückes[1] in her admirable book on hospital sisters, touching on this subject, says: "The advance of everything connected with nursing, its very creation as a recognised profession for women, is of comparatively recent growth, and its present hopeful condition has not been achieved without much difficulty."

[1] Matron of the London Hospital.

This Nightingale Fund and its application to the training of nurses constituted a great advance.

It was available at the moment when the rottenness of the old system had been laid bare, and while it was fresh in the memory of the nation.

Every one was interested in it, and felt that here was a beginning of better things; and as it had been brought about by each individual subscriber to the Nightingale Fund, the whole nation felt a certain pride in it.

That Miss Nightingale, a fragile woman, delicately nurtured, should have devoted herself heart and soul to the work of nursing our soldiers on the battlefields, touched the hearts of our women and maidens, and pointed out to many a one among them a career of usefulness.

Several came forward at once to enrol their names as disciples of Florence Nightingale, women and girls, whose lives up to that time had been void and without an object on which to expend their wealth of love, tenderness, and watchful care.

There was plenty of material in the land of which to form good nurses, but up to this time there had been nothing to attract it.

The result of Miss Nightingale's work is that to-day we have a band of 15,000 trained nurses —or under training—working in our England alone; women who are giving themselves up to their duties with thoroughness and devotion, and undergoing the most severe training willingly and cheerfully that they may the better discharge the duties of the office they have undertaken.

The Queen's resolve to devote the remaining 70,000*l.* of the Women's Jubilee Offering, to the benefit of nurses and nurses' institutions, is one of the many proofs of her Majesty's clear-sightedness where the welfare of her people is concerned. She does a double good in thus applying the fund; she recognises the unwearying devotion and self-sacrifice of our hospital nurses, and the untold advantages which the sick, both rich and poor, derive from their skill and labour; and she proves how earnestly she sympathises with them, and how greatly she desires to be of use to them who can think so little of and for themselves.

This is not the first time she has shown an interest in the nurses and their noble calling. It was but a few years ago she instituted a badge to be worn by those nurses who should in any way distinguish themselves. It was at the Queen's suggestion too that Lady Dufferin established an association in India for training women to nurse and tend Indian women.

I have spoken of the training necessary for the nurses. We outsiders can form no idea of the severity of it, mentally and physically. It is quite beyond the power of some probationers to continue it, however much they may love the work.

In going over the Homes and Hospitals of this metropolis, one cannot fail to learn that for the nurse and her duties there is no such thing as a trifle.

"Nothing is trifling," forms the text over and over again of the matrons' lectures and the sisters' teaching. Let me give you one or two of the instructions dealing with so-called trifles.

"Look upon anything which has soiled the fingers as a possible source of contagion or infection to others and to yourself."

"Look upon a hang-nail, or crack, or scratch, or pin-puncture, as likely to prove a poison-nest to others and to self—even more than an open wound or sore."

"Before going into foul places take a little fresh milk."

You see the instruction is not as in former days to take a stimulant before going into foul places. Fortunately one of the discoveries of later years is that alcohol is not necessary for health; a little fresh milk, proper nourishment, and fresh air whenever opportunity offers, preserves the health and renders the temper more even.

The effect produced by intemperance upon the constitution is striking in the wards of hospitals.

Ever since the establishment of the Nightingale Home in St. Thomas's, it has been the ambition of every good hospital, to be in itself a training-school for nurses, and to possess a home for their comfort and accommodation.

That great things are required of our hospital nurses, and that the standard placed in their midst is a very high one, is apparent from the various lectures and addresses given by the matrons and medical men of hospitals.

Mrs. Scharlieb holds on high her standard upon which she writes in clear hand those qualities she considers absolutely requisite for a good nurse, viz., obedience, thoroughness, truth, courage, gentleness, humility, and sacrifice.

Florence Nightingale's opinion of what a nurse should be is worth noticing. Her standard is high indeed, and her writing stands out in clear bold characters.

"A really good nurse must needs be of the highest class of character.

"1. She must be chaste in the sense of the Sermon on the Mount. It should be quite impossible for the most unchaste person to utter even an immodest jest in her presence.

"2. She must be sober in spirit as well as in drink, and temperate in all things.

"3. Honest, not accepting the most trifling fee or bribe from patients or their friends.

"4. Truthful, which includes memory to remember truly, and power of expression to tell truly what has been observed.

"5. Trustworthy to carry out directions intelligently and perfectly unseen as well as seen.

"6. Punctual to a second and orderly to a hair.

"7. Quiet, yet quick; quick, without hurry; gentle, without slowness; discreet, without self-importance.

"8. Cheerful and hopeful, not allowing either herself or patient to be discouraged.

"9. Cleanly to the point of exquisiteness.

"10. Self-forgetting, but thinking always of her patients.

"11. Kind, but never emotional."

This lady mounts, therefore, on her standard for nurses: Chastity, sobriety, honesty, truthfulness, trustworthiness, punctuality, quietness, cheerfulness, cleanliness, self-forgetfulness, kindness.

Miss Lückes again inculcates in her lectures the necessity of importing into hospital life all the sweet home-virtues that make family-life so admirable. She inculcates constant thought for others, method in the arrangement of work, forethought to meet the expected incidents of the day, and readiness to bear the brunt of the unexpected, cheerfulness and sweet temper to allay the friction which is so apt to arise between even good workers; courtesy to stray visitors of whatever position and however inopportune their visits may be; and she specially points out that a hard unsympathetic person is most unfit for the work of hospital-nurse, which office she considers to be essentially adapted to women, whose characteristics are womanly, women whose sweetness and tenderness are rooted in great strength of character.

We can see how all these ladies striving with one object must produce a high class of workers, and we no longer wonder at the improvement which has taken place in hospital management and nursing.[1]

OLD MANNERS AND NEW.

IN the time of our great grandfathers and great grandmothers, young people (so we read in books) used to bow or curtsy when they came into the presence of their parents, and boys and girls called their fathers "Sir," and their mothers "Ma'am," and did not sit down till they were told, and did not speak till they were spoken to.

We smile at such things. "How stiff and formal and constrained!" we cry, and there are none perhaps who would quite wish such things back again. Yet have we not gone too far the other way?

See that youth lolling in an easy chair, the easiest in the room. He is at home for the holidays. He has got hold, it appears, of an amusing book—"a jolly book," he calls it—and he sits with his head far back, with one leg crossed over the other, and one foot high in air. His mother comes in, but he takes no notice; he does not speak or move; she must get a chair where she can find one, and as he has got the best, she must be content with the second best. And yet he is not a bad boy, and he truly loves his mother. But such is the way of the world now. We have got to the other extreme, at least it is to be hoped so. If we must have one extreme or the other, the old extreme is better than the new.

But we need have neither. A few years ago, things were better than they are now. The old stiffness was gone, but the new carelessness had not yet come. There was as much freedom and ease as now but more respect and reverence. The old upright chair was seen no more, and girls were not scolded if they did but touch the back of the chair with their shoulders; but school-boys did not loll in easy-chairs, and a foot cocked up in the air would have been thought very bad manners indeed.

The young in general have changed their manner to the old. Surely a youth in his teens ought not to speak to an old man—old enough to be his grandfather—as if he were quite his equal; and surely a venerable old lady, justly respected by those nearer her own age, ought to meet with very great deference from each lively young miss who comes into her society. "Sir," and "Madam," among equals are quite out of date; but if the words be gone, the respectful feeling should not be lost.

This want of reverence for elders, whether parents or not, is seen all the more clearly by contrast. For all young people do not fall into this fault; there are still many who are quite respectful, both in feeling and in manner; and the difference between them and others is striking.

Much may be done by early training. A child early taught good manners does not easily lose them; and if the young have been accustomed from their first days to treat their parents and elders with respect, it becomes a habit with them to do so. The fault of the present day is not wholly in the young themselves; their parents, in many cases, have been to blame.

Manners are of less importance than principles; but they are not to be neglected. There is a right and a wrong about everything. Besides, disrespectful manners and self-indulgent habits, though only outside things, are apt to affect the mind and character. "Be courteous" comes amidst the most important exhortations (1 Pet. iii. 8). Honouring father and mother (one of the commandments of God) extends to every part of a son or daughter's conduct—to speech and manner, as well as to practical obedience, and kindness, and help. And when the young are told to submit themselves to their elders, this means to be submissive in everything—in small things as well as great, in speech and manner as well as in giving up their will. Jesus went down with His parents to Nazareth, "and was subject unto them." How? Was it not in everything? And it is in everything that He is the great example of young and old.

[1] The papers on hospitals, which we published last year, were necessarily limited to a few representative institutions. A correspondent calls attention to a phrase in the one on "The National Hospital for the Paralysed and Epileptic," which seems to ignore the existence of the "Hospital for Epilepsy and Paralysis and other Diseases of the Nervous System." We regret that so useful a hospital should have been overlooked.—Ed. S. H.

F. B.

Things New and Old.

A Word to the Wise.—The following letter reaches us from Canada: "I write to ask you kindly to mention that three missionaries in Japan would be glad to get such magazines as yours sent to them for use amongst their hearers, many of whom are learning English and are much pleased to get religious books or papers in that language—postage is cheap, considering the long distance. One of the missionaries writes that a fine Sabbath school has been started as the result of a package of Sabbath school papers which had been sent from America. Infidels are spreading their evil literature, and it behoves Christians to be on the alert to counteract their work. Below are the names of those who will gladly distribute books or papers where they will do much good:—Rev. C. Eby, D.D., 18, Kasumi Clio, Ayabu Tokyo, Japan;—Rev. F. A. Cassidy, Shidguoka, Japan; and—Rev. H. Loomis, Yokohama, Japan. The two former are Methodists, the latter a Presbyterian, but all are united in anxiety for the welfare of the Japanese.—L. D. Sterling."

[We earnestly call the attention of our readers to this mode of usefulness. There are hundreds of Christian workers in many remote places to whom the magazines, if sent regularly, would be most welcome. They would not only, as we often hear, help to relieve many a lonely hour, but supply stimulus and information, and contribute to the clearer knowledge of Christian truth in places where the opportunities of instruction are now few.]

Putting the Cart before the Horse.—If you will persist in putting the cart before the horse, how can you go forward? If you were better you would believe; but you must believe first or you cannot be better. Surely you know that Jesus Christ did not come into the world to save the righteous but sinners. The only question is, Are you a sinner? If you are not, the Gospel can do you no good; but if you are a sinner, and feel your need of mercy, Jesus says, 'Come unto Me, and I will give you rest.' He does not invite you, to raise your desires and then to disappoint them. I doubt not but if you thought I could save, you could depend upon my good will. He both can, and He has promised He will.—Letters of the Rev. John Newton.

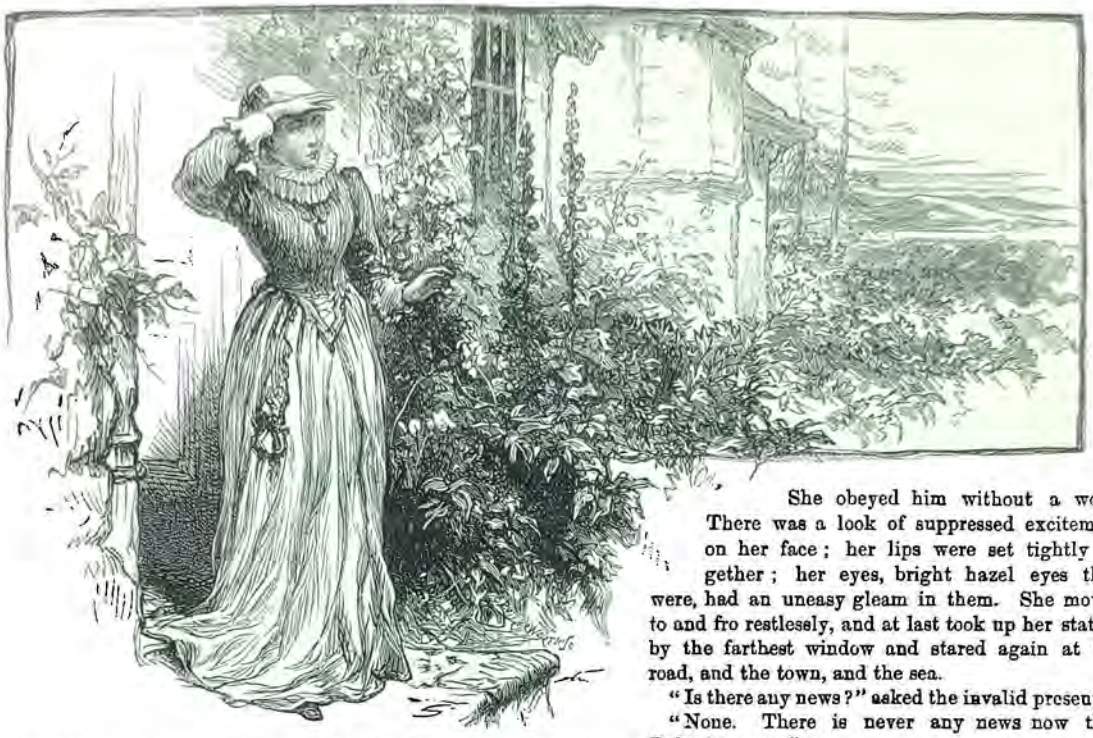
George III. and the Sabbath.—When the Marquis Wellesley, the Duke of Wellington's brother, went to India as Governor-General, he found that the English community, civil and military, had thrown off almost every restraint of religion. In fact, it was a common saying in those days that every Englishman left his Christianity behind when he rounded the Cape of Good Hope. As the Marquis believed religion to be the best safeguard of law and order, he resolved to throw the whole weight of his government on the side of decent observance on Sunday. After he had been a few months in the country, he issued a Proclamation, forbidding horse-racing, and other sports out of keeping with the Christian Sabbath. He spoke plainly of these amusements on that day, as being contrary at once to English customs and to the ordinances of the Protestant religion. He ordered all magistrates, and officers in command of stations to prohibit such practices; and he announced that any one disregarding his order should forfeit the protection of Government, and be sent back forthwith to Europe. It was from the good influence of George III. that Lord Wellesley took his ideas of what an English Sunday ought to be, or, at least, what it ought not to be—a day of reckless and profane revelry, such as we are now threatened with in England. George III. had not been many months on the throne before he abolished the Sunday levées and the Court entertainments which had been the usage in the time of George II. In the first Proclamation made by the good king "against the vice and immorality," he referred to the desecration of the Lord's day, by those who ought to set a better example to the nation. In his biography many incidents are recorded which show the strong feeling he had on this point all through his life. On one occasion, when the palace at Kew was being repaired, the king missed a workman with whom he had sometimes held communication on religious subjects, as was his custom on meeting with persons like-minded, in every rank of life. On hearing that the man had been dismissed because he refused to work on Sunday, the king was greatly offended, and commanded that he should be at once restored; saying, "the man who respects the law of God is the man for me; let him be sent for."

Faith Healing.—We hear much in the present day of faith healing, of cures wrought by relics or at the shrines of saints, by pretended agencies and imaginary forces, mesmeric, odylic or other, by healing virtue emanating from particular persons to other people, all of which, in various ways, demonstrate the marvellous influence exerted by mind on body. Without questioning the power of that kind of faith that can remove mountains, there can be no doubt that a large proportion of reputed faith-cures are fallacious, and will not stand the scrutiny of competent investigation. But no thoughtful and experienced physician can doubt that through mental influence of some kind, not only are the normal functions of the body, but also diseased actions, controlled, and sometimes even life preserved. Such influence is most frequently seen in connexion with mental and nervous diseases of a functional character, though sometimes of long standing and to ordinary observers of a serious and irremediable nature. "It is therefore quite conceivable," as Bishop Temple has observed, "that many of our Lord's miracles of healing may have been the result of this power of mind over body." "It is possible that they may be due not to an interference with the uniformity of nature, but to a superiority in His mental power to the similar power possessed by other men." That there is considerable difference in the power which different men possess in controlling the actions of their own bodies, in enduring pain, in resisting depressing and exhausting influences and even the progress of disease, there can be no question; nor that there is a similar difference in the degree of mental power which different men can exert over the bodies of other men. But even if we should suppose that the cures of disease by our Lord were thus wrought, they would be scarcely less miraculous. For His miracles of healing were wrought on forms of disease and in ways that do not admit of explanation by any such exercise of mental power as we possess. The power that could arrest disease of a mortal character and recall to life by a word spoken at a distance, and that could raise the dead to life, was a spiritual force of a different order from that possessed by any mesmerist, magician, or mortal man.—Sir Risdon Bennet on Diseases of the Bible.

IN THE DAYS OF THE GREAT ARMADA.

BY CRONA TEMPLE.

CHAPTER I.



SHE HEARD THE LOW DISTANT SOUND, AND KNEW WHAT IT MEANT.

JUST outside the town of Exmouth, there stood three hundred years ago—and it may be standing still in virtue of its strong walls and solid workmanship—a low-built, wide-roofed house, from whose windows one might see the whole beautiful width of the harbour on one side, and on the other the sweeping stretches of hill-side and valley, which make the county of Devon one of the loveliest in England.

A girl of about eighteen, tall and straight as the hollyhock stems beside her, was standing on the doorstep, shading her eyes with her hand, and peering down the hollow-way that led towards the town.

There was no one to be seen along the road; no one coming up the path through the spears of the rye that filled with its silvery rustling waves the fields beyond the road. The girl's foot tapped the ground impatiently as she waited and watched, and her left hand nervously broke the twigs of a cluster-rose that showered down petals from its open-eyed snowy flowers upon her hair.

"Doris!" it was a faint and rather tremulous voice that called through the open door. "Doris!"

She turned, lingeringly, and entered a room—a long low oak-lined room—where a man sat within the wide chimney arch. Logs burned brightly on the hearth, and it was hot July weather, a mantle was folded across his shoulders, and a rug wrapped his knees, but he shivered as he said, "Doris, you must close the door, my child; I feel chilly."

She obeyed him without a word. There was a look of suppressed excitement on her face; her lips were set tightly together; her eyes, bright hazel eyes they were, had an uneasy gleam in them. She moved to and fro restlessly, and at last took up her station by the farthest window and stared again at the road, and the town, and the sea.

"Is there any news?" asked the invalid presently.

"None. There is never any news now that Robert is gone."

"Dear Doris, it is natural that you should take anxious thought for Robert; but you should remember that, as it is a man's part to go forth to danger and to fighting for the honour of his country and his sovereign, for the safety of his home and his dear ones, for the defence of the right and true faith; it is a woman's part to cheer him and to help him, to bid him God-speed, and to hearten him by her ready self-sacrifice and courage. Robert will do his part—you and I are confident of that, Doris—and it remains for you, my child, to do yours."

"Oh, it is so easy—so easy to talk!"

"And you think that I can only talk?" he said, and a sad little smile crossed the pale patient face. "Doris, in the stormy times before you were born ——"

She turned suddenly and ran to him, kneeling beside him, and hiding her face against his arm. "Forgive me," she sobbed; "I know it—oh, I know it. I know what you did, and how you suffered long ago, and I am not worthy to be your child. But you see, my father, it is the uncertainty, the suspense, and the silence, and the waiting that are worse to bear than pain."

He smoothed her hair with his thin fingers caressingly. His heart ached for the girl. He knew, none better! what the misery of the "waiting time" can be.

"Where is Earle?" he asked, after a pause.

Earle was Doris's brother, a lad of fourteen, the merriest, most mischief-loving boy on all the shores of Exe. He had gone down to the town for news, and Doris said so in answer to her father's question.

"It is hard to know what share to believe of the reports which do come," the sick man said with a sigh. "Doris, child, stir the fire; this ague-fit has hard hold of me to-day. There—that will do; come here once more, and let me feel your warm soft touch. Tell me, how long is it since Robert left us?"

"It was Wednesday night, father; and to-day is Sunday."

"Wednesday night. There have been uneasy tales floating in the wind for twelve months or more; this alarm may pass as former ones have done."

"Father," and the girl's eyes flashed as she looked full at him, "every month, every day, brings the end nearer; the gathering forces that are arming against us will strike at last, and the King of Spain is not likely to strike feebly or uncertainly when his chosen time arrives. And what can we do against such might as his?"

"My girl is eloquent!" he answered. "Who has taught you all this, Doris? Did Robert?"

"Robert? No. Robert is sure that we shall beat off anything and everything that can be sent against us; he talks of Agincourt where the French out-numbered us by five to one, and of Crecy where the archers stood their ground against enormous odds; and he laughs at the idea of that huge army in Flanders, and the hoards which King Philip has collected on board his war-ships. No, my father, it is not Robert, but you yourself that have made me see the peril that is closing about England now."

"Doris!"

"Do you think me deaf, father, or indifferent? Have I not heard you speak of the times of your own youth when the land from Scotland to the sea here was bound, as it were, hand and foot, and delivered over by Queen Mary to this same Spanish Philip and his priestly crew? Do I not know, my father, what you endured in those dark days for conscience' sake? What has been done once can be done again. Our ships may fight while a spar or plank of them can swim; but what can a handful do against a multitude? What can Robert, and men like Robert, do against the Invincible Armada?"

"You remember many things, my child, but one thing you forget. The battle is not always to the strong, the race is not always to the swift. Our God will help us in our need. We fight for our open Bibles, for our pure worship, we fight to keep—— Hark, Doris! what sound is that?"

The soft evening sunlight came in at the open casement, with the twitter of the swallows in the eaves, the gentle monotone of the rustle of the breeze. One might hear, too, the distant stir of the town floating upwards on the air, and perhaps the long rush and wash of the tide rising against the shingle of the shore. It was the quietest hour of the summer-day, a Sunday evening-time, the season for peace and rest.

"Listen, Doris!"

She heard it now, the low distant sound—a mere moan and murmur of a sound—and she knew as well as her father did what it meant.

It was the hoarse voice of the Spanish cannon thundering at England's "wooden walls." It was the first shout of defiance of the Invincible Armada!

Then swift steps came up the field path, and Earle rushed headlong in.

"The Spanish fleet is come, it is round the Start!" he cried. "Father, I must go! Let me go! Dan Lavin's sloop is being got to sea—they have put the two old culverins on board, and the shot guns from the fort; they are calling out for volunteers, so I just came to get your cutlass, father, and my great clasp-knife, and, father, just to say good-bye—good-bye to you and Doris."

He looked so brave and handsome standing there before them; his eyes—they were the very counterparts of Doris's eyes—shining like stars, his fair hair flung back from his forehead, and his whole face and figure full of enthusiasm. And the falter in his voice struck on their ears like a knell as he said, "Good-bye, good-bye to you and Doris."

"Earle, my son, Earle, you are too young, too young, to bear a man's part in this struggle! and I, God help me! am a wreck, a useless log! No, my boy, other hands must be stretched out for England now; the Clatworthys can do nothing."

The sick man bowed his head with a groan. It was a bitter thing for him to say such a word as that.

The boy came close to his father's chair, and his manner suddenly took to itself such pride and calmness that Doris looked at him amazed. Was this Earle, her heedless, careless, graceless, brother Earle?

He laid his hand, a strong and steady hand it was, upon his father's shoulder, and his tones were clear and quiet as he said: "I am only a boy, but even a boy's service may be of value. I remember always how my forefathers lived and fought for honour and for freedom. You, too, my father, have done your part. Is it not my turn now? Do not say that we Clatworthys can do nothing. It is not true. The old race has not perished yet."

And so the father blessed him and bade him go. Could he refuse to do so? But the words of blessing died away, inarticulate, and the hand that lay on the sunny curls shook as if palsied. Earle was his only son, the last of the old line, the pride of his heart, the gayest, happiest creature that ever entered that room where the sick man passed his weary days. And Earle was going out in Lavin's sloop, going to help, if so it might be, to beat off the formidable array that was threatening the destruction of England.

"My son," he whispered, "may the God that helped David of old help thee now. . . . Doris, give the boy my Psalter—my marked book——"

But Doris was kneeling at the window—weeping, and Earle was gone. And again, from the far distance, came the heavy booming of the guns.

SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. V.

In the Scriptures we find prophecies of different kinds; we will take first those which were speedily fulfilled.

1. One which was given to Noah?
2. One given to Barak?
3. One delivered to Eli?
4. Two delivered to Jeroboam by the same prophet at different times?
5. Two delivered by Elijah against Ahab and Jezebel? Find also the manner in which the last two reached their fulfilment?
6. One delivered to Ahaz by Isaiah?
7. Two delivered by Isaiah to Hezekiah, one respecting his own rescue from his foes, and another respecting the utter overthrow of his posterity?
8. Two delivered by Daniel to two different kings?
9. To whom did Jeremiah say, "This year thou shalt die"?
10. Jeremiah foretold the destruction of a king of Judah, and of a king of Egypt?
11. Give an example from the Old Testament and one from the New, of men refusing to believe what was prophesied about them?
12. In the Acts of the Apostles two such prophecies are recorded, one respecting a famine, the other respecting the Apostle Paul. They were uttered by the same man at different times?

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XLV.—FRANK TO THE RESCUE.

THE MISER'S DAUGHTER.

MARCUS had been thoroughly uncomfortable about Roy ever since he had heard of the bad cold which was confining him to the house. Knowing as he did that the boy would want a good deal of care if he were to get through the winter without an illness, he was made decidedly uneasy by the information; and had not his own hands been very full at the time, as they must always be, when a rich man and a large landowner is desirous of keeping Christmas in the "good old style," as it is familiarly termed, he would have started at once, for Windmill House, to see with his own eyes what was going on there, and judge for himself of Roy's condition. This visit was, however, impossible just at this juncture. He had to content himself by sending off everything he thought would please the boy and add to his comfort; but he was resolved not to delay long in the accomplishment of his scheme, and when once the press of business was over, he would go across and see if he could not get Roy home again to be properly looked after, as he did not believe these Edingtons would ever have power or will to care for him.

But before that day had come, before he was free from the many claims upon his time, that Christmas and the New Year always bring to a man in his position, he received a letter from Joan Edington that changed the aspect of affairs somewhat, and precipitated the action he had contemplated.

Marcus knew very little about the Edingtons individually, and he was not sure whether Joan was Roger's wife, daughter or sister. Roy's letters spoke of cousins in a vague sort of way, and his brother had guessed that he had fraternised somewhat with the junior members of the household. He still felt a very considerable distrust of the elder generation, and decided that Joan did not belong to that one. Her letter was stilted and formal, as though she was little used to correspondence.

"Dear Sir,—I am writing to you, because no one else is likely to do so, to tell you that Roy is ill. I think you ought to know. I believe if he could be taken away from here he would be better, for we don't understand illness much in this house, and they won't have a doctor, because the one in Thorne is ill himself, and it would cost too much to have any one over from a distance. They don't think him very ill, but I do, and I wish you would send the Mr. Lee, Roy talks about, to see him, and to get him away if he can be moved. They would listen to a doctor more than to you, and they would be more likely to be frightened, and do what he said. They might think you had a reason, and not let him go, and it might excite Roy too much to see you, for he is very weak. We shall be very sorry to lose him, and I hope you will let him come and see us again; but I don't think he will get better here, and I believe he would if you had him, so I hope you will send Mr. Lee, and get him taken away.
—Yours truly,

"Joan Edington."

With this letter in his hand, and anxiety and fear at heart, Marcus started off to see his friend the doctor, who had spoken a good deal about Roy since his departure, and had prognosticated danger to him from a change of residence, unless he could be certain of the care in the new house that he had always received at the Hermitage. He had been vexed and puzzled at the way in which the boy had given up the Brighton visit so specially ordered, and had settled himself down with relations about whom nobody knew anything at all, and he had been still more perplexed at Marcus's assent to the strange plan, knowing his fondness for his brother, and his solicitude for his welfare. Now, however, he heard the whole story, learned for the first time that Marcus had no power to control Roy's actions, or to summon him back—none at least, unless the boy had appealed to him to do so, and had brought to light some reason to justify his appeal. Frank heard everything now from first to last, and as he had never liked what he had seen of Roger Edington, he was prepared to take the worst possible view of him, and of his father, and he was pretty certain that Marcus shared his distrust and antipathy.

"I'll go," he said. "I understand the whole business, and I'll get the boy away. I believe for once I shall manage a diplomatic negotiation better than you. I'm a doctor, too, and, as that girl says, that point will go a long way; and if they've got the boy ill in their house, and have no medical aid for him, I can say a few scathing things that will frighten them and bring them to their bearings. It won't excite Roy so much to see me, and you may be of more use at this end to get things ready for us. I'm not very busy, luckily; I can spare a few days very well. I'll go across at once and see what I can accomplish. Strikes me there has been a game at cross purposes somewhere, and I'll see if I can't get all put right. I wonder who will be the tougher to deal with, the old man or that fellow we saw here."

"The old man is the real guardian. I believe he is a curious character—something of a miser."

"The other fellow had a covetous cast of countenance. I always thought so, though I knew nothing about him. Well, I'll do what I can. I am armed with full facts, am I not? You have told me everything."

"Everything. I know it's safe with you. Of course, we don't want it canvassed in the neighbourhood. Only the Kynastons have been told the whole history, beside yourself."

"All right. I'll not betray trust. Poor lad, it has been a hard lesson for him to learn, I'll be bound; and he has evidently taken the blow like a man and been very plucky over it all. We'll rescue him all the same for that. He sha'n't be left there much longer."

Frank Lee started for Thorne the next day, and arrived there about two o'clock. He made some inquiries at the inn where he put up, as to what kind of a reputation the Edingtons bore in the place, and he heard nothing to shake the impression he had previously formed for himself. He was told that Roger Edington's office was in the town, and that he was generally to be found there, and thither accordingly he bent his steps, thinking perhaps that it would be best to face his foes separately, and crush one before he attacked another. There was, however, nothing inimical in the manner in which he greeted Roger Edington when ushered into his office.

"I have come to inquire after my ex-patient, Roy, Mr. Edington," said Frank in straightforward business-like fashion. "I hear he is ill again, and should rather like to have a look at him—as a friend you know—and see how he is going on. He is rather a delicate lad, and that accident pulled him down a good bit."

Medical attendance gratis was not to be despised.

and Roger Edington's face looked a little less sharp and suspicious, but he was not certain that he liked this visit altogether.

"You can see him, of course, if you care to walk across. I don't myself think he ails more than a bad cold with some fever about it."

"He keeps to his bed?"

"He has done so for the past few days."

"It strikes me, you know, Mr. Edington," said Frank, seating himself easily upon the corner of the table, "that this air of yours is a good deal too strong for him. He is not used to it—you lie high here, and the winds sweep across that moorland like a knife—enough to cut one in two. That boy's lungs are not in a state to stand that kind of thing. It strikes me you will have to send him back to the Hermitage for the spring months."

Roger's face looked dark and suspicious.

"Marcus Stratford is quite willing to take charge of the boy, he says. Indeed he is of opinion that it is hardly fair, all things considered, that you should have the charge of him and the expense of his maintenance. He will never be able to repay you—he has not a penny of his own, and will not come into anything at his majority, save a couple of thousand, left him in trust by Mr. Stratford. You have your own family to look after, and you are not a wealthy man. Now Marcus is very well off, and he feels also bound in honour to look after Roy. So if you feel the charge of him at any time heavy, you can relieve yourself of it very easily."

Frank did not look at his companion as he spoke, but he felt he had made an impression.

"I do not quite understand you. Roy will inherit his mother's—that is Alicia Stratford's fortune, in due course. He almost told me as much himself."

"If he did so it was under a misapprehension. He was not Mrs. Stratford's own son, and she has not treated him as such. Her step-son inherits everything. But as I have before said, he has a fine sense of honour, and if Roy were to be without friends in the world, or if you were to find the burden of his maintenance fall too heavily upon you, I am sure he will relieve you of the charge. At any rate he is anxious about him now, and if it is thought advisable to send him back to his old home, he will be very glad to take him in, and do what he can to forward his recovery. Shall you be willing to let him go under such circumstances?"

Roger's reply was spoken in a low, sullen tone.

"You can do as you choose. It is nothing to me. You will have to settle it with my father. I doubt if he will part with the boy."

"We will see about that. I will step across to see him and the boy, with your permission, sir. Good afternoon."

Frank went his way, confident that he had made an impression. As he passed through the street, he observed a woman in a long cloak coming out of a chemist's shop. Something in her face, or air, or manner arrested his attention. He looked keenly at her a moment and then went into the shop where a lad was lounging behind the counter.

"Can you tell me the name of the lady who just went out?" he asked.

"That one? Why, that's Miss Joan Edington," replied the lad with a grin. "The old miser's daughter."

CHAPTER XLVI.—FRANK'S VICTORY.

"MISS JOAN EDINGTON—may I introduce myself to you in rather a summary fashion? I have come in answer to your letter. I am Francis Lee, the doctor who attended Roy during his illness in the spring."

Joan had started on being addressed by a stranger in the streets of Thorne; but now she looked up eagerly.

"Oh, have you come to take him away?"

"I hope so. I am convinced by all I hear that he ought to be at home. How is he? How did this begin?"

"He has had a cough ever since he has been here, and you know our way of living is not like what he has been accustomed to. He never complained; but he could not get on with our food, and though I do what I can for him I am not clever at invalid cookery, and he hardly eats enough to keep him alive. I don't think he has been unhappy with us exactly—not at least for long. Once he was told something that made him rather wretched; but he soon seemed to get over that."

"I understand," said Frank, observing her slight hesitation of manner. "I know all about it."

"Do you? Well he got over that and settled down—and we did so like having him, the house was quite different. He was so good to us all and the girls adore him; but Caroline, that is Roger's wife, you know, made him teach the boys. They are horrid boys, and it was much too much for him, and did him harm, I think; and he got weaker, and his cough wouldn't get better, and I was certain he was going to get ill. I did everything I could to persuade father to let him go; but he wouldn't. I don't know if he will spare him now. You can't guess how bent he is on keeping him always with us."

Frank's face was rather grim.

"I'll see if I can't find a way of persuading him," he said. "You will help me, perhaps. You do not want to keep him?"

She looked up at him with the clear steady gaze that he had seen once before. He remarked to himself that there was something rather fine in the pose of her head, in the tranquillity of her features, and in the dark fearless eyes.

"I will do everything for his sake; but you do not know how I shall miss him."

"You have been nursing him yourself?"

"Yes, at least I have done as much as I could. I do not understand much about nursing. We are never ill, the rest of us; but I have taken as much care of him as I could."

"It is something to know that," said Frank, kindly, beginning to like his companion a great deal better than he had ever expected to like any of these "Edington people," as he mentally called them, lumping them all together as one crew. As they walked rapidly across the moor, he asked her more questions, listened with a sense of respect to her brief, sensible, straightforward answers. He wondered how she came to be so different from the rest of her family, and was glad for Roy's sake that she had been there. Evidently no one else sympathised with her—all the rest were bent on keeping their prisoner.

"Is he still lame? Can he get about at all?" was his next quick question.

"Yes, pretty well, until he was ill. He got on much better for keeping quiet in the study and not moving about the house. I think his foot is almost well, but that doesn't make him better in himself, as I hoped it would once; and his cough is so bad. Every day we hope he will be better, but he is not a bit, that I can see. He is quite clear headed now, but so dreadfully weak. Roger is afraid to have a doctor, lest—well never mind why—and father because he is afraid they will take Roy away from us; but he cannot always hold out, now that you are here I am sure all will be right."

Frank was not certain that he shared this confidence, but it was something to learn that the boy had been nursed by this cousin of his, who plainly lacked neither sense nor good will. The men might be harsh and tyrannical enough—he nerved himself for a battle royal with the guardian, who evidently did not intend his captive to escape him—but at least he had not lacked a woman's kindly ministrations, and that in itself was much. He hardly spoke all the rest of the way, and Joan on her side was equally silent. He was fulminating thunders of medical wrath to launch at the head of the miserable old miser, who was playing so dastardly a part, and he was so engrossed in his own thoughts that he hardly heeded the approach to the dismal house, and only awoke to a sense of its desolation when absolutely following his guide into the cold stone hall, and up the bare, echoing staircase.

She opened a door and led him into the room where Roy lay; and the young man stopped still for a moment, so surprised was he by what he saw. The room indeed was bare and comfortless to his eyes, but it was warm with the pleasant glow of a wood fire, and white, and worn, and ill as Roy evidently was, his face was nevertheless very bright and peaceful; but what astonished Frank most was the presence at the bedside of a white-headed old man, who held Roy's hand in his, and gazed at him from time to time with tender solicitude. He held an open Bible on his knee, from which he had evidently been reading. Was this the stern, tyrannical old miser for whom he had been preparing such threatenings and warnings?

"Frank!" cried Roy joyfully, "oh, Frank, is it really you? Where is Marcus?"

"At home, old chap, where I hope soon to see you. I encountered Miss Edington in the town; so I came over here to have a look at you. Marcus wasn't satisfied about that cold, and asked me to look you up whilst I was here. Your cousin brought me across with her. You've run down the hill a bit since I saw you last. I expect this moorland air is too strong for you this time of year. Is this your guardian, Mr. Edington?"

"At your service, sir," answered the old man rising and bowing with something of old-fashioned courtliness. "I thank you for coming to look after our boy. He does not get on as fast as we should like to see him; but I trust you may put us in the way of setting him up again. Our air is very fine, no one has ever been ill in this house before."

The old man spoke with a sort of nervous deprecation of manner, and glanced at Roy, who smiled back reassuringly.

"All right, uncle," he said, "we'll manage something to suit every one," and as the old man half reluctantly left the room at a sign from his daughter, his first eager words of delight at seeing a familiar face were blended with assurances of his kind treatment at the hands of his kinsfolk.

"I know it all looks horrid to you, Frank, but you can't think how good they are to me, Joan, and the old man particularly. It was different at first—rather—but they grudge me nothing now; and the old fellow is so fond of me, I can't make it out, it's quite pathetic. He's losing his memory a bit, and keeps thinking I'm my father, and he asks me to teach him things just like a little child. I suppose the hard life he has led has aged him prematurely, for he isn't really so very old. I don't know what he will do if you want to move me away, I don't think he'll ever consent."

But here a fit of coughing interrupted Roy, and left him so exhausted that he could only lie quite passive, and let the doctor make his examination in uninterrupted silence.

A specimen of Windmill House cookery next came up, at which Frank Lee turned up his nose in mute contempt. One thing was plain to him, that he must get Roy away from this place as quickly as possible. Whatever the will of these strange people might be, the power to give him what was absolutely essential to his present condition was hopelessly lacking.

"Look here, Roy," he said, "I take you home as soon as ever it can be arranged. I will settle it with these people, don't you let that bother you. Go you must, and unless you are wonderfully changed from what you were you will be thankful enough to be at the Hermitage under Marcus's care once again."

A quick flush rose in Roy's cheeks; a bright, wistful light in his eyes.

"Marcus is not—angry?"

"Angry? No! only in a fever to have you home again. You like the idea, eh, Roy?"

"I am afraid to think how much. Oh, Frank, you don't know how I sometimes long for home and for Marcus! But I want to do right, and if my place is here ——"

"It is no such thing. Your place will be nowhere if you stay here much longer. Don't you bother your head over anything. I will settle it all. If these people really care for you in their odd way they will be as anxious as any one for you to move when I have explained the real state of the case."

Roy looked flushed, eager, anxious, he was more excited than Frank liked to see him.

"They will let me go, perhaps, but they will miss me—perhaps things will go back and be as they were before, and the children will be sorry; though Joan and her father will really miss me most. You don't understand things, Frank; and I can't explain; but I have a sort of feeling as if I oughtn't to go away and leave them altogether, just for my own happiness. I believe I was sent here for a purpose—I wonder if I ought to go?"

"I am very sure of it, old chap, and I can't have you worrying your head like this. Look here, will it satisfy you, if I settle for the old man and his daughter to accompany you to the Hermitage? Then you would get what you want, and they would not altogether lose sight of you."

A bright light sprang to Roy's eyes.

"Oh, if you could!" he cried, "that would be best of all! But Marcus——"

"Oh, I'll make it right with Marcus. All you've got to do is to lie still and keep quiet."

Roy heaved a great sigh; such advice was only too welcome, for he was very, very weak.

"Go and settle it then, there's a good fellow, and come and let me know. I should like to show Joan my own dear home."

Whilst Frank Lee was gone on his errand, Roy lay very still, his eyes closed, his lips slightly smiling, his heart very full of thankful happy thoughts. He was passing in review before his mental vision the events of the past six months and tracing out, as he could do in retrospect, the good that had come to him and to others from events that seemed at the outset so strangely hard and unpromising. His lips moved as if in prayer, half-remembered words and phrases formed upon them.

"It is good for me that I have been in trouble, to have learned the lovingkindness of the Lord. I will rejoice in the Lord my God, for of Him only cometh salvation."

"I have settled it all quite easily, Roy," said Frank Lee coming back, "and that cousin of yours, Joan, is made of the right kind of stuff, and no mistake. You are to return to the Hermitage as soon as it can be managed, and she and her father are to go with you. Now are you satisfied?"

"Yes, indeed, I am. I couldn't imagine anything more perfectly satisfactory," and in his mind he very well knew that when he should be able to tell Marcus and Muriel the whole story, the children would soon find that they were not forgotten, but that they were to share in the general amnesty and good will. Just at present they must be content to wait.

EARLY MISSION WORK IN IRELAND.

BY E. J. WHATELY.

II.

PATRICK was followed by a succession of eminent Irish Christian teachers, about whom a good deal of legendary tradition has grown up, but of whose existence there can be no rational doubt. It would take too much time and space to enumerate all those of whom there are records. They include several namesakes of St. Patrick himself (which is not surprising, the Latin name being a favourite one).

One eminent female saint, Brigida, or Bride, was partly a contemporary of St. Patrick, and was foundress of a large monastery at Kildare. The town probably derived its name from this monastery, "Kildare" signifying "the church of the oak tree," from a large oak which grew close to the building.

Brigida seems to have been strongly imbued with the monastic and ascetic notions which were now growing in the church; but she loved the study of the Scriptures, and spread them actively; and from her biography it seems clear she held none of the distinctive Romish doctrines. She spent all her life in Ireland, and died in the third decade of the sixth century.

Finnian, of Clonard, in Meath, and his namesake of Moville, in Down, flourished a little later, and both were renowned as Christian teachers.

We hear, also, of two St. Kierans, and many more who need not be mentioned more particularly. The famous Kevin, hero of the legend of Glendalough, which is the subject of Moore's well-known poem, lived at this time, and appears really to have dwelt at one period with some of his monastic disciples near the "lake of the gloomy shore," which is associated with his name.

But the most remarkable Irish teacher of the age succeeding St. Patrick, and one on whom his mantle seems to have emphatically fallen, was the celebrated Columba, or "Columb-Kill" (Columba of the churches), as he was frequently called, from the number of churches he had founded.

He was born in 521, in the county of Donegal, of a branch of the royal family of Ireland; in very early youth he gave evidence of decided piety, and his parents took care to place him under teachers who could fitly prepare him for the ministry. As soon as his education was completed, he entered on the active labours which he continued through life. At first these were in his own country; but he was a thorough missionary at heart. He began soon to turn a pitying eye to regions still unvisited by the Gospel—and these were not far to seek.

The narrow strait between Ireland, or Scotia, as it was then called (the name of Scots being then generally given to the Irish), had only to be crossed to bring the traveller into a country which lay in utter heathen darkness—the Western Highlands of Scotland, then called the land of the Picts.

Thither Columba repaired with some companions about the middle of the sixth century. The difficulties to be met with and the hardships to be encountered were probably such as now would be only paralleled in the wilds of Central Africa or the most savage of the isles at the Antipodes; but Columba met all bravely and perseveringly, and in the course of a few years the greater part of the Pict or Highland kingdom was brought to the knowledge of the Gospel.

No reliable particulars are known of this wonderful missionary work. Columba's headquarters were in the small Western Isle of Iona, which is now often called Icolmkill, or, Island of Columba of the Churches, in his memory. The island was given him, it appears, by a kinsman of his own, king of an Irish colony, established in the West Highlands.

Here Columba gathered a band of disciples around him, and founded a monastery, which became illustrious from the numerous missionary teachers it sent forth. It should be noted that monasteries then were not what they afterwards became; in those wild times a community was often necessary for the sake of protection, and they were in fact colleges, industrial institutions, and charitable asylums united. The monks were not at first bound by any vows, and were always engaged in active labours with the hands as well as the head. No other schools, indeed, existed at all; and they promoted useful manual labour as well as learning. Still there were seeds of evil in these institutions which in later times became apparent, though as yet they were not perceived.

Columba had a stronger attachment to the monastic life as such, and to personal austerities in daily life, than we should sympathise with in our days; but the foundation of his teaching was sound. He claimed no merit for personal self-discipline, and his animating principle seems to have been a child-like loving trust in God, filling him with an inward peace which shone in his cheerful, genial demeanour. His character was a beautiful one—loving, tender, indulgent towards others while rigid to himself. He was eminently a man of prayer; every circumstance and every occupation of daily life, however trifling, gave him occasion to lift up his heart to God, and he never undertook anything without laying it before the Lord. The smallest daily comforts were occasions of thanksgiving, and the service of God was not looked on as something set apart for stated hours or days, but bound up in every act of life.

He was a diligent student and teacher of the Scriptures. On the Saturday before his death, which took place at Iona in 597, he told a confidential attendant that he had a strong conviction that this "Sabbath day" (as in those early days the last day of the week was commonly called) was the last he should spend on earth, and that the Lord Jesus Christ was calling him to Himself.

Ascending the hill above the monastery, he solemnly blessed the community, and then retired to his cell to continue his occupation of copying out the Psalter—a very needful work in times when printing was unknown. He stopped at the end of the tenth verse of the 34th Psalm, "They that seek the Lord shall not want any good thing," and observed that another must finish the work. He then took a short rest, and repaired to the church. A midnight service was to be held there; and when the monks came in, they found him at prayer, but evidently sinking. He raised his hand to bless them, and soon after passed calmly away in the midst of his brethren and disciples.

He left many to follow in his steps. Iona continued for several centuries the chief centre of work for all the Irish and Scottish Christians, who belonged to his followers. His disciples and successors were animated by his spirit; and most particularly was this shown in their burning missionary zeal.

In later times this missionary spirit died altogether out of the Christian church (except among the Waldenses and, somewhat later, the Moravians), and was scarcely revived till the beginning of the present century. But in those early times, the church, though already imbued with many errors and superstitions, was animated by a much more healthful and right feeling respecting missions to the ignorant and unbelieving than was known for many ages later. The conviction that they had a message from Christ to deliver, that the good tidings of salvation through Him must be taken to all who were ignorant of it, was the leading principle of their lives. Particularly was this shown among the holy men who at this period flourished in Ireland and West Scotland: Aidan, a monk of Iona, was sent at the request of the Christian king Oswald to work in Northumberland. He chose the little isle of Lindisfarne as his headquarters, and established a monastery there like that of Iona. Oswald, an earnest and zealous Christian, worked with Aidan, even interpreting for him when he was speaking to those ignorant of his language. Eventually Aidan recovered the whole kingdom of Northumberland (including a much larger district than our modern county of that name) from Paganism, and the college at Lindisfarne became so eminent that the English in the north country sent their sons to be instructed by the Irish teacher.

Meanwhile, events had been occurring in England which had a powerful influence on the Irish and Scottish churches. The invasion of the Saxons in the fifth century, as before observed, had driven the British Christians into exile and plunged the greatest part of England into Paganism; but in the sixth century, the monk Augustine was sent from Rome, by Pope Gregory the Great, at the head of a band of missionary associates, to preach Christianity to the Anglo-Saxons, beginning in the kingdom of Kent, and through his means a considerable portion of the Heptarchy was brought at least to profess Christianity.

It has been the custom to regard Augustine as emphatically the Apostle of England; but it must be kept in mind that he was only the first missionary to the Anglo-Saxons, and that even they were only in part influenced through the teaching of himself and his companions. The British church had flourished and laboured for many centuries previously, and it was through British and Irish teachers, as we shall presently see, that a very considerable part of the Heptarchy was actually Christianized. This British church, now driven into Wales and Cornwall, was still an important body, and claimed to be the representative and lineal descendant of the church founded in the apostolic age, nearly 500 years earlier.

There was also a great difference between the Saxon church founded by Augustine and the British, Scottish and Irish churches. These last, though ready to hold friendly intercourse with the church in Rome whenever circumstances permitted, looked on themselves as a completely independent and separate body, as much so as the churches of Ephesus, Laodicea and Sardis, &c., in the apostolic days; not separate as a hostile body, but as an independent one, as kingdoms separate, but on friendly terms nevertheless.

Augustine, on the other hand, held that there could be but one visible church, and that was the Roman See. To Rome he was completely devoted, and he was determined that all the churches in the British Isles should be subject to his supreme control as representative of the Pope.

This was the main point on which the British, Irish, and Scotch on one side, and the Saxon churches on the other, were divided; there were also some minor differences in their practice which we should most of us look on as of very trifling importance, and not worth disputing about, but for which both parties contended as if they had concerned the foundations of the faith. The principal of these were, the time of celebrating Easter, which had been altered at Rome, in consequence of some advance in astronomical knowledge—the mode of performing the rite of baptism, and the manner in which the tonsure was cut on the heads of those ordained.

In these matters Augustine and the Italian monks insisted on absolute compliance. Had they followed the apostolic commands to be gentle, humble and courteous in their demeanour, the parties might possibly have come to an understanding; but the haughty and contemptuous bearing of the Roman clergy increased the mutual bitterness. When the two parties met in council to decide on the matter in question, the British bishops consulted first with an aged man of eminent piety. He told them that they would know if Augustine was truly a man of God by observing if his demeanour was meek and humble, according to the command of the Lord, or proud and lofty. They then agreed that the test they would make, should be, whether Augustine would rise from his seat to welcome them as Christian brethren, according to the natural rules of courtesy, or remain sitting, as if claiming to be a spiritual king.

Augustine kept his seat when they entered. It was but a trifling matter, but it was, in this case, certainly an index of the spirit in which he carried on the whole controversy. The bitterness with which he attacked the British Bishops was so great that it led to the suspicion (probably unfounded) that he had been the instigator of a furious attack on them in Wales by the heathen Saxons, in which 1200 monks of Bangor, besides multitudes of other persons, were slaughtered in cold blood.

For many years the controversy was kept up, and much vehemence and bitterness displayed on both sides. Still it is evident that the peculiar doctrines of the modern Romish Church were more readily embraced by the party of Augustine and his followers than by the British, Scottish and Irish churches; and these last were very long before they altogether succumbed to the spiritual dominion of Rome.

In Northumberland there was a powerful party on each side. Part of that kingdom had first been instructed by Roman missionaries in the time of King Edwin, whose wife had been the daughter of Ethelbert, of Kent, and had been trained under Augustine. When King Oswald, the friend and patron of Aidan, had been killed in battle, his brother Oswy, himself a warm adherent of the Irish missionaries, succeeded to the throne; but his wife was a Kentish princess, and, like her predecessor the wife of Edwin, was zealous for the Roman customs in which she had been brought up. There was consequently a division in the court and royal family as well as in the country; and this led to renewed and painful disputes.

Meanwhile, the excellent Aidan, to whose character Bede, though an adherent of the Romish party, bears the warmest testimony, had passed away to his rest, and was succeeded by Finnian, also from Iona, whose labours, not only in Northumbria, but in the country beyond it, were so abundant that the result was the conversion to Christianity of the whole kingdom of Mercia, which included all of what we now call the Midland and North Western Counties of England. This shows how incorrect it is to ascribe to Augustine and his followers the evangelisation even of the whole Heptarchy. Finnian was succeeded by another monk of Iona, named Colman, who worked steadily in the steps of his predecessor.

Before very long, Northumbria submitted to the Roman rule; but the British and Irish churches still continued to maintain their independence for a considerable time.

Meanwhile, Iona was still the centre of missionary work, and the Irish teachers there began now to turn their eyes to the continent of Europe.

THE "GROTTE DE HAM.'

A PARABLE OF NATURE.

THE ENTRANCE TO THE GROTTO.

IT was an August morning. The air was hot and still, and the sun, from a cloudless sky, was pouring a flood of brilliancy over the pretty Belgian landscape: green woods and golden harvest-fields busy with reapers—opening glades and sunny meadow-lands—curious rugged little hills, looking as if they had one day long ago rushed up into the meadows and become petrified there—but all alike glowing in the quiet heat of that harvest morning.

A motley group, representing many nationalities, was gathering round the little village inn, for this was the starting-point for the day's excursion into—or rather, through—one of the famed grottos or caverns which pierce these curious volcanic hills.

There was half an hour to spare. Many were leisurely examining the views and plans of the cave, which were fastened against the wall of the house. Some had laid aside their ordinary outer dress, and arrayed themselves in loose linen garments provided for whoever chose to use them. Friends were welcoming friends, and strangers making acquaintance one with another, at least for the day.

When all had arrived at the rendezvous, the guide started, we following—at first in groups or singly—over an open, scarcely-defined, grassy road; then entering a low wood of copse and undergrowth skirting the hillside, the path so narrowed that for some way we had to walk in Indian file. The heat was scorching; for the trees were too low for shadow, and the sun was overhead.

At last, a halt! and the sight before us was a curious one. A bright, sparkling little river—which we had crossed up among the hills, in our wanderings, some days before, and which had for many a mile meandered joyously along, singing its sunny way through many a wooded valley and rocky glen—now, with one gurgling leap out of the sunshine, disappeared into the black yawning mouth of a great cavern just below us, and was seen no more. It seemed but a weird and pitiful ending to its rippling joyous course.

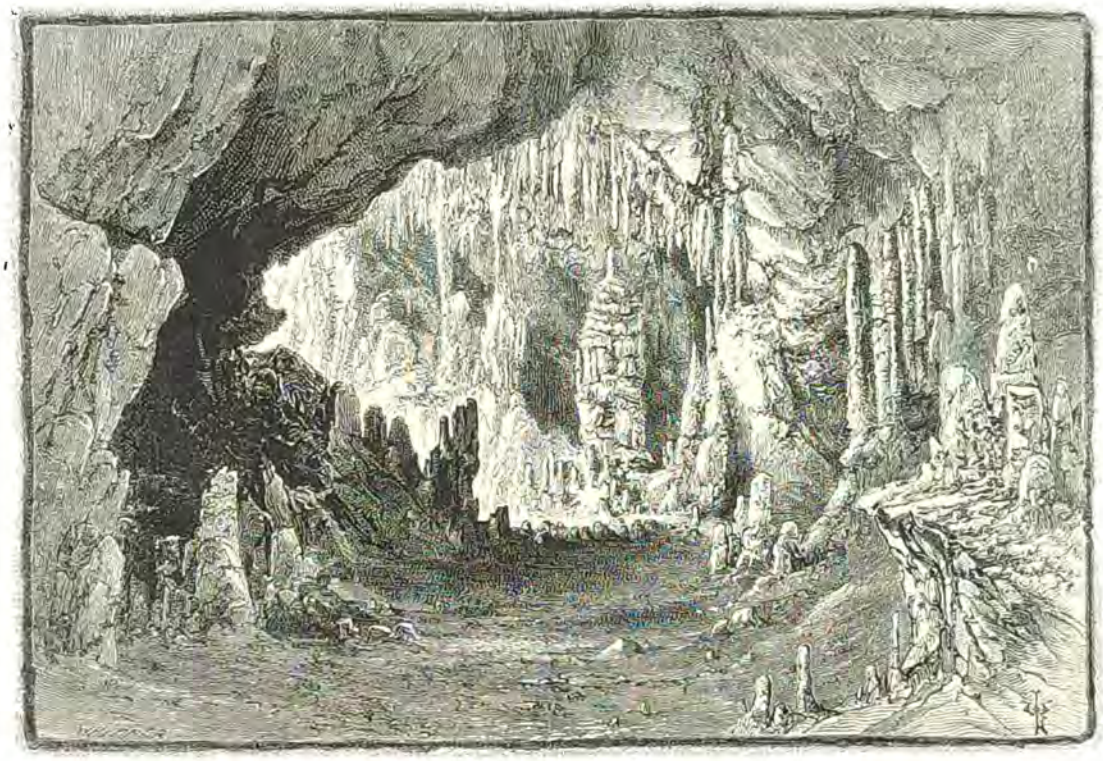
But the guide went on, and now the path ascended the hillside through copse and bramble till a smooth green plateau was reached, surrounded by low trees, and behind it the arched entrance of another and larger cavern. It was the one we sought, and we rested in its grateful shadow.

It was a quaint, fresh picture. The dark, jagged, rock archway, with huge boulders scattered around. Behind—all blackness; before us—the grassy slope dotted with resting wayfarers; and beyond—a smiling landscape lying asleep in the almost mist of the noonday heat.



INTERIOR OF THE GROTTO.

By the cavern mouth a number of children, boys and girls, with garments short and girt, were waiting in expectant silence. Each carried a double lantern, firmly fastened, and burning brightly; and as soon as the guide gave the order to advance, and divided the party into sets of three abreast, a child with the shining lamp noiselessly took his or her place before each group, and their ministry, as well as the march, began. Three long hours underground, in the heart of these curious hills.

An uneven, narrow path—if such the trodden way might be called—led into the darkness (for in a moment every ray of daylight was gone); sometimes dry and strong; sometimes through pools formed by the water-drip from above; now ascending rough steps in the rock, and again suddenly descending a slippery path between the blocks. Here deep chasms seemed to yawn at our very side, and there the rocks so closed in that, with bent head, only one at a time could we feel our way through the tunnel; and the sharp call of the little lightbearer was needed—"Attention aux têtes," or "Attention aux pieds."

The guide bore his torch in front, but the party was large, and it was well that those behind had the light of the children's lanterns. And they were needed, truly! The child, being of small stature, held the lamp down close to the ground before us, so that each step was lit up; and having a double light, the foothold also on either side.

At one place the voices seemed to echo and reverberate. We were passing through a vast and lofty chamber in the rock, so vast that when the guide ascended on the broken blocks with his torch aflame, or, as at one time, lit up a clear lime light, we could scarcely realize the depth below, any more than the height of the great rock dome above us.

But for a long part of the way, especially nearer the entrance, the great interest to all was in the wondrous forms of exquisite beauty on either side revealed by the passing lights; stalactites and stalagmites, which frequently almost met, forming pillars like alabaster, supporting the cavern roof. Some of these took the form of cathedral towers and spires of wonderful workmanship. Some were like statues; some like candelabra shining with beautiful prismatic colours; and tasselled wreathen work overhead; all sorts of forms and patterns which had the appearance of white or tinted marbles where the smoky flame of the lamps had not darkened or discoloured them.

As we drew near to the end of the march, we halted again in a vaulted chamber, where the floor was more even, and where refreshment and few seats were provided for all who chose. The little bearers set down their lamps, and they, as we, rested a while, the flickering torchlight curiously illumining the rock edges and the moving figures of the party, while scarcely doing more than making darkness visible. And while we rested, the weird and changeful mysteries of the past way were fully talked over, with many a wonder as to what, and where, and how would come the end.

We moved on, and surely and silently the children filled their appointed places. A bridge crossed what seemed to be a lake of inky water, and then the path descended by a curious tortuous broken stairway of rock to a lower level. Here we entered a wider chamber than any we had passed before, while the flapping of wings of scores of huge bats hanging on to the rocky roof, added to the ghostliness of the place. A whispered word was passed back from one to another, "The River!" There was no sound of water—not a gleam of daylight. But our march had stopped. The first group had touched the brink, and the flickering torch of the guide held high aloft was clearly reflected in the still, mirror-like black water.

THE EXIT FROM THE GROTTO.

It was a river! But it flowed so silently, so stealthily, so slowly, it scarce seemed to flow at all; and by the rocky edge, on its bosom, three barges were moored. Very quietly, by torchlight, the first was filled, and with the guide himself at the prow, it floated off, and, like a phantom boat, disappeared silently round a jutting neck of rock.

The second followed. Every lamp was now extinguished. They were needed no more. One torch remained. But when the last of the party, and the children, had embarked, as we floated off to follow in the wake of the other boats, and not a sound was heard but the soft even splash of the oars, the torch was dipped in the water, and for a moment we were in utter blackness of darkness.

Only for a moment. We too rounded the rock, and now a faint, pale, bluish quivering light seemed to awake within the cavern, like the dreamiest, fairest, softest moonlight, touching and beautifying every jagged corner, the still water throwing back the strange etherial reflection, and on its bosom the barges lying in their deep shadows. Another angle of rock hid the first barge from sight, when a sort of muffled cry seemed to break from every lip. Was it of wonder or of joy? The second passed round, and they too with bated breath echoed the sound. But how describe the scene which burst on us as we in our turn rounded the barrier?

The cavern journey was over. Before us was the great arch of frowning rock which formed its outlet; but the appearance of shadowy moonlight had passed into a burst of richer glow. The opening chamber was filled with the clear day, and on flowed the river out from the darkness into light. And beyond, it was like a sheet of golden glory, tempered only by the reflection of the deep azure of the cloudless sky which looked lovingly down on it, and broken by the waving shadows of the full-leaved trees which bent across from either side, and interlaced above.

The banks of either side were green as an emerald, and from one to the other, beyond the trees, was spanned a slight rustic bridge.

Under this—away—away, we saw not where, rippled and glittered the freed and glorified little river. While the travellers, expressing thanks to the child light-bearers who had guided their steps through the long dark cavern, passed over the simple bridgeway, one by one, out too in the golden unshadowed sunlight.

And the stream which flowed on in its beautiful gladness, was the little river we had seen before up among the hills and in the valleys, watering and refreshing tree and flower and ripening corn; singing when nothing but rocks were round its way, and making melody when no human ear was there to hear. The same little river we saw in the morning sucked down, as it were, into the darkness of the earth. And it was so; but after awhile, we know not how, or by what way it came, bearing the barges on its bosom, it flowed out into the light again, calmer perhaps, but glorified with the gold and blue and emerald through which it carolled on its freed and gladsome way.

Is there no parable here? Is there not a wealth of parable?

Have we never watched, or crossed, a life, bright and joyous, self-forgetting, watering and refreshing all beside it—a life of melody and music and song? And one day it stopped, and passed away from before us; and our faith failed, for we thought we should see it no more for ever. But—and shall this not be so, as the parabolic teaching of this day's journey has it?—afterward, when that life has gone from sight for "a little," it shall flow out once more—calmer, gladder, glorified—into the everlasting light for ever; and the triple rays will meet in perfection over and upon it. The gold of faith having been tried and purified, now changed to sight; the deep and heavenly blue of love made perfect, and the soft sweet emerald of hope fulfilled.

And, surely, as we ourselves that August day could not have realised the mystery and beauty around us, nor have gone through the dark and often perilous way unguided, may we not learn how, in a higher and holier sense, we must closely follow the Guide who ever goes before His people, explaining and opening up in His light wondrous reaches of nature and grace? Our every step lit up by that wondrous double lamp, which is "the lamp to the feet and the light to the paths,"—"pondering the path of our feet that all our ways may be ordered aright."

And shall we not look forward, not only to the reflected, changeful glimmer we may see from out the darkness here, but to the full burst of light without a shadow, save the sweet shadowings of rest from "the tree of life on either side of the river," as we, brought out by His own redeeming and leading presence, come safely to "the other side"?

And do the children not speak to us in parables too? Carrying their lamps trimmed and lighted, and going on most obtrusively and cheerily and watchfully, holding their lanterns so low that the foot of those they watch cannot stumble—wearying not all along the way—fulfilling their little child-like ministry till the darkness is over, and their lamps are needed no more at all?

Truly we all need more and more the child-heart, to which only the heavenly Guide entrusts the bearing of these wondrous lamps through the dark ways of earth, "till the day break, and the shadows flee away."

Thy Word is a light unto my feet,
And a lamp unto my path.

Holding forth the Word of Life!

AFTER.

Light after darkness, gain after loss,
Strength after weakness, crown after cross;
Sweet after bitter, hope after fears,
Home after wandering, praise after tears.

Sheaves after sowing, sun after rain,
Sight after mystery, peace after pain;
Joy after sorrow, calm after blast,
Rest after weariness, sweet rest at last.

Near after distant, gleam after gloom,
Love after loneliness, life after tomb;
After long agony, rapture of bliss,
Right was the pathway, leading to this!

—Frances Ridley Havergal.

THE PROBLEM OF THE POOR.

THE NEW GUTHRIE SCHOOL.

ABOUT two years after Dr. Robertson began the daily feeding of the children in the Vennel, Dr. Guthrie started the Edinburgh Original Ragged Industrial Schools in which the children are both boarded and lodged. Many have heard how at Anstruther, Chalmers's birthplace, "an old obscure, decayed burgh on the shore of the Firth of Forth" Guthrie met with the portrait of Pounds. "Going on to the inn I found the room covered with pictures of shepherdesses with their crooks, and tars in holiday attire, not very interesting. But above the chimney-piece there stood a large print more respectable than its neighbours, which a skipper, the captain of one of the few ships that trade between the town and England, had probably brought there. It represented a cobbler's room; the cobbler was there himself, spectacles on nose, an old shoe between his knees, the massive forehead and firm mouth expressing great determination of character, and below his bushy eyebrows benevolence gleamed out on a number of poor, ragged boys and girls, who stood at their lessons round him. My curiosity was excited, and on the inscription I read how this man, John Pounds, a cobbler in Portsmouth, taking pity on the poor ragged children, left by ministers, and magistrates, and ladies and gentlemen to run the streets, had, like a good shepherd, gathered in the wretched outcasts; how he had brought them to God and the world, and how, while earning his bread by the sweat of his brow, he had rescued from misery and saved to society not less than five hundred of these children."

From this chance meeting with the picture in the Fifeshire inn, dated Dr. Guthrie's splendid work for the poor children of Edinburgh, of which Ramsay Lane was so long the centre. Last April the house in Ramsay Lane was deserted, and the boys' school removed to the new buildings at Liberton, a plain substantial stone pile on a particularly breezy site, contrasting favourably with the old quarters that have been so often described. Here things are very different to what they used to be, and the management has every chance of showing its efficiency. As we walk through the cheerful, well-lighted, well-ventilated rooms, and learn the uses to which they are put, and the steps by which the various details have come to be as they are, we cannot help recognising the teaching of years of experience in dealing with a by no means easy subject.

The original object of the school was to reclaim the neglected or profligate children of Edinburgh by affording them the benefit of a good common and Christian education, and training them to habits of regular industry, so as to enable them to earn an honest livelihood. The classes of children for which it was not intended were those who were regularly attending day school, those whose parents were earning a regular income and able to pay for their children's education, and those who were receiving or were entitled to receive support and education from the Parochial Board. Under the new arrangements, however, much of this has been altered, and the basis considerably widened. On the other hand, in the latest of the school reports it is pointed out that the children now received are of a lower type in physique and intellect than those of ten years ago, although the average age of admission is the same. The reason given for this somewhat unexpected state of things is the increased tendency of parents to overstate their children's ages when brought before the magistrates, and the somewhat pardonable weakness of the magistrates in consulting the boys' wishes and sending them off to a training ship instead of a land school. On the training ships only strong, well-developed lads are received; so that the school has to put up with the more weakly and less capable youngsters. This is not always to its satisfaction; but it does its best with them, and its best is quite a superior best.

The day's work at Liberton lasts from six in the morning till eight at night. The boys are all roused at six, or shortly afterwards, and have to get their beds made and bedrooms tidy before eight. Pleasant the dormitories look with their bright walls and pitch-pine fittings, and the iron bedsteads, sixty in each, in double row, every bed clean and trim under its blue quilt, and commanded by the sliding window in the door panel. From eight to half-past breakfast is served, followed by a quarter of an hour in which to tidy away, and a quarter of an hour for family worship. Then from nine to twelve the first division are in the schoolroom, while the second division go to the workrooms. There are two hundred boys in all, of ages ranging from six to fourteen, sent by magistrates' order from Edinburgh under the fourteenth section of the Industrial Schools Act, the school being now a "licensed" one with the private subscriptions helped by a Government grant.

When a boy is admitted he is given a warm bath and well washed with carbolic soap. Then, his old clothes being taken away and burnt, he has to don the uniform provided. Afterwards, when he has a bath, he joins with half-a-dozen others in a large tank holding a thousand gallons heated by steam. In the lavatory, where the boy in many cases has his first experience of hot water, is the washing apparatus now approved by her Majesty's Government. It consists of a trough-like sink into which half-a-dozen taps run in a row. No basin or bowls are allowed, boys being taught to wash like the Arabs in the Sahara from the stream as it flows from the tap, the idea being that by this means alone can the boy be sure of washing in fresh water!

Every boy has two weekday suits and a Sabbath suit. We inspect the pigeon-holes in which the clothes, not in wear, or in the wash, or in the mending-room, are stored—every pile with a number and a Bible on the top. In the corner of the room is "the Sabbath collar box," containing collars for all—every second Sunday being honoured with a clean one. The great sight at Liberton, however, is the stores. The dietary is a liberal one. For breakfast each boy has five ounces of oatmeal and three quarterns of buttermilk, sound, sour, and healthy. For dinner on Sunday, Tuesday and Friday, each has two ounces of beef without bone, and four and a half ounces of peas in pea soup; on Monday and Thursday two ounces of beef, potatoes, and two and a half ounces of barley and peas in broth; and on Wednesday and Saturday, lentil soup, the bigger boys having eight ounces of bread and the younger ones seven ounces. For supper on Monday, Wednesday and Thursday the boys have porridge and milk, and on Sunday, Tuesday, Friday and Saturday, bread and coffee. On all days and at all times there is practically no limit to the soup, broth and porridge on which the boys are encouraged to feed. The backbone of the bill of fare is the porridge; the oatmeal bin is consequently colossal, and the copper in which the porridge is made holds a hundred gallons at a time.

Dinner takes place every day at a quarter-past one, the interval between it and school being occupied with walking exercise or drill. By two o'clock dinner is over and all cleared away and the boys return to school or industrial work, the school division of the morning becoming the work division of the afternoon. School is over at five, and the boys who have attended it then join the lads at work and continue with them till supper-time at a quarter to six.

The industrial work has many branches. There is first the laundry where the boys do the week's wash for the school, finishing up on Thursday afternoon, no matter what may be the bill or the weather. Then there is the joiner's shop where a certain proportion are taught to work in wood, and have, as a matter of fact, made all the sheds and greenhouses we see in the new grounds. Then there is the tailoring department where the clothes are made for the boys in school and the boys leaving school, besides the repairs which run into large numbers. Then there is the shoemaker's shop where the boots are made and repaired—a particularly busy place as may be guessed, for Liberton rejoices in one of those grand inventions for leather grinding, a concrete playground on which it is possible to get through a pair of soles in a fortnight. These three departments, carpentering, tailoring and shoemaking, show an estimated profit in a year of £90, besides which the boys do the washing as we have seen, help the cook, and do their own bedmaking and wash their rooms out twice a week. Nay, more, they are going to grow their own vegetables, and learn practical gardening on the acre and a quarter of ground set apart for the purpose. Many of the boys will doubtless go to the Colonies; they could not have a better school for the life they wish to lead than this piece of waste in which the art of agriculture must be learnt from its very rudiments. A tougher piece of soil on which to begin operations could not easily be found; a farm in the wilderness will be a garden to it! However, here the boys are busily at work under the gardener's cheery superintendence, setting the stout heart to the stony brae under the best of circumstances, for true friends are looking on and ready to help them when they show signs of failing.

What with industrial work and book work, and religious work in the evenings, the day is well filled in, but time is found for play and recreation; and cricket and football—especially football—flourish exceedingly. Then "outings" are numerous; the "Doctor's boys" are favourites everywhere, and the shows and circuses would fail in an opportunity for advertisement if they did not invite "the school" to a free seat; Dr. Cumming, of Kinellan, who in the last twenty-three years has had twelve hundred children of the Edinburgh Industrial Schools taught to swim has always an excursion for them to some place of amusement; Fettes' College too, gives "Guthrie's" an annual treat; so that the boys are by no means "immured and left to melancholy.'

And then they give much time to music, and possess that great institution, a band. The shoemaker is the bandmaster, and the janitor is the pipemaster, and between them the boys are kept up to quite an enviable standard of efficiency. That we may judge for ourselves the pipers are ordered out. Those who have heard the pipes murdered in a city street have no idea of their true powers and tone. Get them away from echoing walls, on a hill top such as that at Liberton, and play them as they should be played, as these lads play them, and the effect is very different. The drone becomes musical, and the squeaks and squeals that riot in their strength, and play leap-frog with each other are here under control and chastened into musical sounds, rising and falling in true cadence, with due regard to time and purity. It is astonishing how well the little fellows play—eight of them, with two little little drummers and a bigger big drummer, who rejoices in a wonderful overhead flourish which he doubtless considers impressive. Like little men they swing along with the true Highland stride and bearing, proud as the proudest in their waving tartan streamers, and voicing each note firmly and clear with not an accent wrong. The pipers trained in the school are well-known at many concert halls north and south of the Tweed; they have even been heard at South Kensington; and they have always won prizes. When they leave the school they generally join the Highland regiments of the army—the bulk of the boys being apprenticed to trades. Some of them, many of them, join the Scots Guards. A letter is shown us, in which a lad who has just left and joined the Guards, writes of his first experiences in his new home. The letter is, unintentionally, an excellent testimonial.

"For the first few days" says the youthful warrior, "I did so much miss my porridge in the morning, that I could not blow my pipes!"

Dr. Guthrie's good work for the Edinburgh poor was not confined to the boys. In Leith Walk the original Ragged Industrial School for girls still continues its usefulness. Instead of carpentering, tailoring and shoemaking, the girls, about ninety in number, are there carefully trained in domestic service from which, unhappily, so many of them strive to escape as soon as they are left to themselves.

On somewhat similar lines to the Guthrie School is the Edinburgh United Industrial School in Blackfriars Street, off the Canongate, founded in 1847. Here one hundred and twenty boys, and about forty girls are done the best with; the boys are taught brushmaking, carpentering, turning, tailoring and shoemaking, and the girls the washing, sewing, cooking and cleaning, most likely to be useful to them in after life. As at Guthrie's, when they have passed out, something is done to continue the influence for good which it has been endeavoured to exercise on them at school, but the need of increased effort in this direction is only too apparent. We have seen how well the Industrial brigade does its work with its straitened means; there is room in Edinburgh for tenfold such work amongst both boys and girls. And as it is in Edinburgh so is it in all our cities and centres of population.

W. J. GORDON.

Things New and Old.

ORPHANS AT NAZARETH.—A letter of an unexpected and gratifying kind was received not long ago by the Secretary of the Infant Orphan Asylum at Wanstead. The writer, after describing her experiences as a teacher in England and on the continent, and latterly as a hospital nurse, tells how she applied for employment to the Society for French Education in the East. Two days after her application, a telegram came announcing the death of the Lady Superintendent at Nazareth. She was appointed, and went out the next month. The old scenes at Wanstead came to her memory, and she wrote out of the fulness of her heart:—"It is a busy life: there are one hundred orphan children in the house, and only two ladies, a government teacher, and myself. I see now that my life at the Infant Orphan Asylum had some meaning, though I used to wonder how it could have fitted me for my life work. Please remember me to Miss W——. It was in the babies' class that I first learned 'the old, old story,' from her teaching and her life." This is but one of many instances of the important positions held by those who were trained at Wanstead Asylum, but there is a romantic interest in the fact of one of the English girls having come to have charge of a hundred orphans at Nazareth.

PROGRESS AND ITS RESPONSIBILITIES.—The Speaker of the House of Commons presiding at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, at Warwick, said that in reading the last report of the Society he had been struck with the romantic interest which attached to its work in distant lands. After alluding to the difficulties attending the translation of the Scriptures into some foreign tongues, the right hon. gentleman said they were told of the responsibility attached to empire. He accepted that to the fullest degree. Our Empire had expanded, and was expanding in a marvellous way, and the responsibility of disseminating the Bible went hand in hand with an extended Empire. When her Majesty came to the Throne, in 1837, she ruled over 130,000,000 of subjects; in 1887 she ruled over 300,000,000. In 1837 the extent of her Empire was 2,000,000 square miles; in 1887 that 2,000,000 had expanded into 8,000,000 square miles. In the United Kingdom there were 10,000,000 more subjects than there were in 1837. That was the increase which it had pleased God to bestow upon her Empire during fifty years of her Majesty's reign; and the observation he would make from that was, What must be the responsibility of a nation whose Empire had increased at that enormous ratio, and which promised to become the dominant race of the globe!—Standard.

The Crosswort.

IN sunny hours of gracious May,
When birds are singing all the day,
And flowers unfold their fair array
As Nature orders;
By woodside and by hedgerow green,
Amid the pink and blue is seen
A lavish growth of yellow sheen
In beds and borders.

Its crowded blooms viewed from afar,
Each shining like a tiny star
Up the tall stem, so numerous are,
It seems all golden:
Its leaves make crosses tier on tier,
Cross-like its blossoms all appear:
To faithful eyes its drift was clear
In centuries olden.

For one design alone it grew,
To lift the Cross before men's view,
And every leaf and bloom was true
To this one duty;
Lily and rose the crown might claim:
The cross should give one flower its name,
One flower should ask no other fame,
No other beauty.

It clusters round the traveller's feet,
The while its fragrance honey-sweet
Climbs up, the grateful sense to greet
With sudden pleasure:
And as its colour you behold,
You own the cross is finest gold,
A gift unmeasured and untold—
A countless treasure.

To flowers that by the wayside grow
Full many a happy thought I owe;
But the sweet crosswort's golden glow
I hail with wonder.
Heaven's dearest, richest sign I see;
What better "sermon" can there be
In any "stone" or flower or tree,
The blue sky under?

RICHARD WILTON.

IN THE DAYS OF THE GREAT ARMADA.

CHAPTER II.

THOMAS CLATWORTHY had had an adventurous life. His childhood was passed in the restless times which followed the death of King Henry VIII., when the freedom for which men had sighed and prayed was dawning, in fitful uncertainty, upon the land. The tyrannical edicts of the imperious, headstrong king were unsafe ground for any man to build upon; it was hard to determine what was the "State religion," harder still to know how to shape one's life and doctrine so as to keep clear of outward trouble.

Down in the quiet Devon fields the Clatworthys—a family of yeomen who were proud to till their own ground, and mind their own business—tried to serve God in the way that seemed His way; praying to Him, and to His crucified Son without the interference of priests and saints, and reading His Holy Word in the familiar English tongue, the language which made it their own possession instead of a difficult and darkened thing only to be interpreted by the learned.

They were simple folk, these Clatworthys; the father had that silent decision of character which might, in some circumstances, slip down into obstinacy; the mother was a stately reserved woman, proud of her housekeeping, proud of her husband, and proud—although she would never have hinted as much to the children—of her lads and lassies, Tom, and Martin, Sampson, and the twins—Dorcas and pretty Doris.

But the comfort that filled the old house on the hill above the Exe was soon rudely disturbed. The days of quiet work and honest service passed away as a dream, and terrible times of trial and danger followed.

Queen Mary Tudor reigned in England, the daughter of the haughty Henry and the injured Spanish Princess Katherine of Aragon. Mary herself had suffered keenly in her young days; insults of every kind had been heaped on her by her own father, and a score of times it seemed certain that she, like so many other highborn and royal persons, would be sent to the scaffold by his command. To her mind the Protestant religion was the beginning of all her troubles, for if Henry had not broken with the Pope on account of her mother's divorce she imagined that the country would still be in the bosom of the Roman Church. She forgot, or she did not know, that the true light that lighteth every man was shining on the world, that the scales were falling from men's eyes; that it was not King Henry's wickedness, but the mercy of the God of Truth, that had set England free from the sordid chains of Rome.

In the first year of her reign Mary married her kinsman, Philip, prince and heir of Spain; a man whose gloomy bigotry, and vicious character has left marks on the history of Europe which time has not yet effaced. The poor queen had never, hitherto, found any one to love. Her girlhood had been more miserable than words can tell—her womanhood just one long struggle against illness and misery. Now she was a queen, a wife; surely, she must have thought, happiness had dawned at length for her.

But the way to earn that happiness, she was told, was by obeying in all things the voice of her church, and submitting herself and her kingdom to Philip, whose devotion to his Roman faith was the passion of his life.

Protestantism must be stamped out of England, so the Pope and Philip declared: and the luckless Mary set her signature to death warrants that desolated her country throughout its length and breadth.

And it was not only death that was hurled forth by the infamous men Gardiner and Bonner, to whom was committed the task of "purging England from heresy." Persecutions of all kinds raged; men, women, even young children were tortured and imprisoned, and brutally put to all manner of pain to force them to deny their faith. The "Holy Inquisition," a court of tribunal from whose decisions there was no appeal, was established, and it did its terrible work most terribly.

The home where the Clatworthys lived was quickly desolated. The father was seized, and hailed to Exeter.

"Is it true that you read the Bible on Sundays to your household and your labourers?" demanded the judge.

"It is true I have not read God's Word to them as diligently as I ought," was the undaunted reply, "but if further life be given to me here, I will amend that fault by the reading of it aloud on week-days also."

What could be done with so sturdy a heretic as this but send him to the stake?

Mistress Clatworthy was stretched on the rack to force her to bear witness against her husband; while Doris, gentle delicate Doris died of pain and grief, while in the murderous hands of the persecutors. Thomas and his young brothers had their share of trials to endure; but they were young and strong, and torture did not kill them, while they were reckoned as of too slight importance to be worth the final fiery trial. When Queen Mary's death put an end to this horrible work, they were set free, and returned to the old house on the hill. Their father and mother were dead, and their sweet sister Doris. The farm had been ravaged, the house ransacked: they were ruined. So they took Dorcas, their remaining sister, to safe shelter, and they scattered themselves; seeking work wherever toiling hands could earn their daily bread.

Martin and Sampson wandered far, and their names were lost, as was easily done in those times of rare and slow communication, but the elder brother Thomas had greatly prospered. Not at first, for it is always hard for a penniless lad to plant his foot on the lowest rung of the ladder; but the honest endurance inherited from his father, won a way for him at last. He earned enough to buy the old home back again, and there he brought his wife, and there Doris—another Doris, called after her martyred aunt—was born, and Earle his son.

A few years after the trouble of his later life fell on him. His wife and he were crossing the estuary of the river in an open boat on one of these warm summer afternoons when the very air seemed to be filled and dilated with the heat: a sudden thunder-storm burst over them, and in the furious squall, their boat was capsized. Clatworthy was a powerful swimmer, and fought hard to save the life dearer to him than his own. But the waves beat and buffeted him until his bewildered brain only knew that he was drowning.

Yet he was tossed upon the shore with the life yet in him. His wife's body was never found.

For weeks he lay between life and death, and then at last some measure of strength returned. He was not to die yet; but for all his life he must exist as a helpless invalid,—dependent, crippled, shivering with ague or racked by nervous pain.

A hard fate? "Nay, dear," he would say gently, as Doris hung over him in an agony of pity, "we have no rightful measure of things down here. I have thanked our Father for what we call His good things, shall I not accept what seems to be evil at his hands? Perchance it may turn out to be the best when all is reckoned up."

SCRIPTURE ENIGMA.

ON THE HEROINES OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

NO. XII.

Thou hast breathed thy last, and the hands of those Who lov'd thee—tender, compassionate one—
Have busied themselves in the last sad rites.
Cold, still, thou liest; thy work is done;
But hark! The sobbing and mourning cease!
A silence falls on the listening air;
Then borne aloft as on angels' wings,
There rises to heaven a fervent prayer.
And lo! to the dead cheeks comes a flush,
To the gentle eyes, a sweet, glad light;
And power for good to the busy limbs;
While back, once more to the house of night,
The king of terrors now takes his flight.

1. Thou art true to thy God, man greatly belov'd!
   At the risk of thy life hath thy faith been prov'd.
2. The Pharisee gave no anointing, no kiss,
   But the penitent makes His feet fragrant with this.
3. The slenderest staff in God's servant's true hand,
   Brings judgments and plagues on a great heathen land.
4. Full scant was his food, a mere sustenance bare,
   His clothing rough fashion'd, was made of this hair.
5. Thou art eloquent, preacher of God's Holy Word!
   Thou art mighty in Scriptures: the might of the Lord.
6. Ah! meddlesome Horonite—when wilt thou cease
   To hinder the builders? Go! Leave them in peace.

M. E. R.

HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. VI.

Reject seven of the words in this figure, and form a Scripture text with the remainder.

Lord	Name	Is	Lord
How	The	More	And
All	O	Our	Excellent
Of	His	Earth	Mouth
Thy	In	Many	Thou

SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. IV.

1. It alludes to greatness, power, riches and wisdom, but none of these words are mentioned.

2. One of the characters named is mentioned in an earlier book in the Bible in the same verse with the grandson of Methusaleh.

3. The same person is also mentioned by our Lord.

4. The other character in the verse is mentioned in seven books of the Bible.

5. It is recorded that one worshipped the other.

6. Both of them for a while had no companion but animals.

7. Neither the birth nor death of either are recorded.

8. The one who gave gifts soon lost all he possessed.

9. The one who received them was twice condemned to death.

10. The verse describes the fulfilment of a promise.

11. Two high offices are mentioned in it.

12. It contains the name of a great city, the first one mentioned after the flood.

13. It contains thirty-six words, three being proper names.

L. T.

ANSWER TO HIDDEN TEXT.

NO. IV.—p. 224.

Behold, God is mine helper.—Psa. liv. 4.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS.

NO. I.—p. 240.—ABIATHAR.

1. 1 Sam. xxi. 7.
2. 1 Sam. xxii. 9
3. 1 Sam. xxii. 9, 10.
4. 1 Sam. xxii. 16.
5. 1 Sam. xxii. 17, 18.
6. Psalm lii.

NO. II.—p. 288.—AHAZIAH.

(1) 2 Chron. xx. 35; (2) 1 Kings xxii. 52; (3) 2 Chron. xxii. 9; (4) 1 Kings xvi. 23, 24; (5) 33, 34; (6) 2 Kings i. 9-12; (7) 2 Chron. xx. 31, 32, 35-37; (8) 2 Kings i. 2, 6, 16; (9) 15; (10) 16; (11) 1 Kings xxi. 27; (12) 2 Kings i. 2, 5; (13) 2, 17.

ANSWERS TO SCRIPTURE QUESTIONS.

NO. IV.—p. 270.

1. It was a large enclosure formed by curtains and pillars, open to the sky. Within it was a smaller one; covered with drapery above as well as at the side.

2. In the open part the altar of burnt offering, and the laver. In the closed part the altar of incense, the candlestick and table of shewbread. Also inside the veil, the ark.

3. (a) Joshua vi. 24; Judges xviii. 31; (b) 1 Kings i. 39; Ex. xxix. 42; (c) Ex. xxv. 8; Num. iii. 28; Heb. ix. 1; (d) 1 Sam. i. 9; Psa. v. 7.

4. Num. ix. 15; xvii. 7. It was so called because it was a constant witness to the presence of God among the people.

5. Stephen (Acts vii. 44).

6. Tent of meeting (Ex. xxxiii. 7), because there God spoke with Moses.

7. At Shiloh (Joshua xviii. 1; Jer. vii. 12).

8. Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 21).

9. To Jerusalem; by David (2 Sam. vi. 17).

10. The Ark of God dwelleth within curtains (2 Sam. vii. 2). He showed his desire to build a temple for God.

11. Because he had been a man of war.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

PARIS AT THE TIME OF THE REFORMATION.

VI.

After C. H. Muller.] "BARABBAS." [Paris Salon, 1878.

THE only Huguenots in Paris who did not perish during these awful days of August, 1572, were those who found shelter in the houses of Catholic friends, or who fled into the monasteries of the Cordeliers, or of the Jacobins, as the Dominicans were called in Paris, from the fact that their principal house was in the Rue St. Jacques.

The Dominicans were strongly opposed to the Jesuits; that they then, the traditional watch-dogs of heresy, should on this occasion have played the part of its protectors, plainly indicates what influence chiefly dominated in Parisian religion at the time of the massacre. Of Augier's Jesuit Catechism no less than 38,000 copies were sold in Paris in the course of eight years.

The apparent guides of the populace, however, were the parochial clergy, who became perfectly furious in their preaching now that the popular religion seemed in danger by the death of the Duke of Alençon, leaving only the life of the king between a Protestant and the crown. The religion they taught their flocks may be judged of, not only by this horrible taste for wholesale murder, but by the nature of its manifestations at this time. Processions went about the streets composed of people, barefooted, and with nothing on but a thin garment. On one occasion a procession went from Paris to Henri III. in which the incidents of the Via Dolorosa were burlesqued; on another, the altars of Paris each bore a wax effigy of the king, which, during thirty-nine hours' prayers, was pierced thirty-nine times and at the fortieth hour stabbed to the heart.

Projected by "The Tiger of France," the famous League was now adopted in Paris. Three priests and a layman met, it is said, at the College de Fortet—the house in which Calvin had lodged, and there started its organisation in Paris. It came at length to be governed by a secret council of Sixteen, one for every district. Each became a centre in his own locality; in a short time the trades were dominated, and finally the municipality.

Paris now began to rage like a boiling sea, and while the court was the scene of murders and adulteries, duels, masquerades, penances, orgies, and religious processions, the citizens were conspiring, oath-taking, stacking arms in sacristies and shops, and keeping their enthusiasm at boiling point by constant attendance at furious sermons.

These latter so alarmed the king that he arrested two of the preachers, but an émeute took place and he released them. All in vain; the conspiracy became so formidable that he surrounded Paris with troops. The Sixteen then sent for the leader to whom their oath was taken: Henry of Guise, the murderer of Coligny, whom they intended to make King of France.

He came, and the insurrection broke out. As from some subterraneous kingdom, pale haggard figures came forth, endowed with a strange passionate strength. Appearing first in the Place Maubert, they, seem, as it were, the avengers of the innumerable victims who in that Golgotha had yielded their spirits to God. Human souls turned into furies by ages of cruelty and injustice; their dreaded forms will return again when another age concludes and will herald the end of the Bourbons, as now they herald that of the Valois. They upheave the paving stones, they build barricades. The insurrectionary lava spreads, it flows over the bridges into the city, and into the town. From dirty narrow lanes, from deep, dark houses, from dingy shops, from dank churches, from doleful convents, burst forth, armed with halbards and arquebuses, a motley crowd of citizens and artizans, priests, monks, and the wild horde who seem to have ascended from the sewers. The people throw up the windows, and amidst the shouting, rise prayers and curses, strangely intermingled. The king's Swiss mercenaries are beaten, and then the populace led by preachers and students seize the Arsenal, the Chatelet, and the Hotel de Ville. Intoxicated with victory, they set off to seek "brother Henry" at the Louvre. But the king had flown, he and his companions being fired upon from the walls of Paris as they fled out of the Porte St. Honoré, which was close to the Louvre. Seventeen years before a king of France had fired on his people, now the people fire on the king.

He fled to Blois, where he summoned the States General. Refused supplies, dominated by Guise, who kept him a prisoner in his palace, in his utter misery and ruin, having degraded himself in every way, a lurid light seemed to brighten up Henry's mind, and a strange force to strengthen his will. He plotted successfully the murder of Guise, and had him assassinated at the door of the private cabinet where he had enticed him. He had even gone with him to communion the day before. Every detail of the tragedy has been preserved to the minutest act of the victim on that vengeful morning. It is the historical pendant to the murder of Coligny. This same Guise had killed his victim, as he himself was killed, early in the morning. Treachery was repaid by treachery, brutal outrage by brutal outrage. As he had kicked the venerable head of the great Huguenot captain, so now his fellow-conspirator kicked his head.

The foregoing history had evolved its natural result; the two forces of evil had at last met, and were mutually destructive. The Valois slew the Guise, and the Guise slew the Valois. Henry's plot was so successful, that he had not only entrapped the Duke of Guise, but his brother, the Cardinal of Guise, a still more formidable character. He hesitated a little before he assassinated a prince of the church, but the deed was done much to the victim's surprise.

Paris, however, was lost to Henry, it was thoroughly Guisard, and the League ruled by terrorism. An ignorant monk was worked up by all the wicked arts prevailing to assassinate the king, August 1st, 1588. Henry III. died the next day. The last of the Valois, he was succeeded by the first of the Bourbons. Henry of Navarre, a relapsed Huguenot, became king of France. But not of Paris. The soul of that city dwelt in a woman. The Duchess of Montpensier carried her mother, wife of the second Duke of Guise, to the church of the Cordeliers where the old lady made a speech to the people from the steps of the altar. Besides this she had the mother of the regicide monk up from the country, and the old peasant was lodged at her house and treated as if she were the Virgin Mary.

What had become of the little remnant of Huguenots who still breathed under the corpses of their brethren? With that indomitable courage, characteristic of all that really lives, it no sooner felt that the hand of slaughter was stayed than it began to raise its head. No assembly was permitted within two leagues of Paris, and then only of ten persons, nevertheless the faithful met within the walls secretly and celebrated the Lord's Supper. And this they did, prepared at any moment to be discovered and probably massacred on the spot. On Easter Day, 1581, such an event actually took place, and fourteen persons were then and there murdered. In 1584 another secret communion was being held just under the walls of the Abbey of Geneviève. The assembly seemed to have escaped in time, but the porter and a schoolmaster present were banished the kingdom for nine years.

Amongst the persons killed on Easter Day, 1581, was a President in the chamber of requests of Parliament, who had presented a petition to Henry III., praying for the free exercise of the religion in every part of the kingdom. The king listened graciously, and only remarked that he was greatly astonished at the audacity of such a demand.

But the Huguenots were without doubt deeply read in the Old Testament, and had entered into the spirit of the ancient people of God, whose faith in their future was most assured at the moment their cause seemed irretrievably lost. In the spirit of Jeremiah, who, when the Chaldeans were inevitably advancing to the capture of Jerusalem, bought a field in Anathoth, certain that under a righteous ruler its people would once again dwell in safety, Beranger de Portal, general of the Finances in Languedoc, not very long after the massacre, left a part of his fortune for the good and maintenance of the church in Paris.

One of the few Huguenots in Paris who escaped at the time of the massacre was the famous potter, Bernard Palissy. Whether he owed this to Catherine de Medici's special protection, or to what is more probable, his lodging outside the walls of Paris, cannot be said: he was not killed, and lived on some seventeen years, during which he made a museum and gave science lectures in Paris, to which all the men interested in such inquiries came. But in these last troublous times he was imprisoned in the Bastille and there found his fellow-sufferers to be two most innocent young women, named Radegonde and Claude Foucault. Palissy was eighty years of age, and his iron frame was at last broken down by privation. Henry III., who had enough of the Valois in him to shrink from being instrumental in the murder of a great artist, visited Bernard in prison. My good man, said he, you have served my mother and myself for forty years, and we have allowed you to live in your religion amidst the faggots and the massacres. Now I am so pressed by the followers of Guise and my own people that, against my own wish, I have been obliged to put you in prison, and I shall be obliged to abandon you into the hands of your enemies, who will burn you, if you are not converted. The old Huguenot proudly replied, "I am ready to give my life for the glory of God and the preservation of my honour. You have told me that you pity me, but for my part, I pity you, for you have used the words 'I am constrained.' This is not royal language, nor such as even you, together with all who constrain you, the Guisards and your people, will ever be able to force out of me; for I know how to die."

What could be done with such men and women? They went on burning and hanging them right up to the year in which they saw their city surrounded by an army led by a relapsed heretic. On the 14th March, 1590, after the battle of Ivry, Henry of Navarre approached Paris, and in a very short time had so closely invested the city that nothing could come in or out of its gates. In ten or twelve days the artizans began to suffer hunger, whereupon a proclamation was made that all who had food for two months, should bring the surplus, and sell it in the market under pain of confiscation of all they possessed. Notwithstanding this, bread was sold at five sols tournois; and when it was exhausted the people had to live on herbs and roots. In a few days the hunger was so great that 7000 or 8000 persons died. A meeting was then called at the Palais to decide what should be done, and it was agreed that the clergy must keep the poor for a fortnight, their objection being entirely overruled by the Duke of Nemours the Guisard Governor of Paris. The Jesuits asked for special exemption, upon which the provost of the trades exclaimed, "Is your life worth more than ours?"

The clergy now sent round the city asking the poor to give up all their cats and dogs, which, having obtained, they killed a great number, and, cooking the bodies in cauldrons, they dealt them out to the people. The fortnight over, starvation stared Paris in the face, there were nothing but cries and lamentations, and the people ran to the priests, and demanded the skins of their dogs and cats, that they might extract what nourishment they could out of them. The priests sold them 3000 skins for 1000 francs, but the difficulty was to get them home, for the starving people in the streets set on the purchasers and tore the skins from them.

Some parts of the city had become a desert. This was especially the case with the University. Cattle were stalled in the class-rooms, the country people having come in from the suburbs. The shops were mostly closed, and there were no carts nor horses in the streets. This part of Paris always so lively was almost a solitude. Such was the extremity to which the city was reduced that the relics were packed up, the ancient jewels of the crown disappeared, the stocks at the Hôtel de Ville were rapidly redeemed, all was desolation! Ten thousand persons died in Paris in the space of three months.

Meanwhile strange stories filled the air, mythical, perhaps, but certainly born of the horrors of the time.

The governor going out of his house one morning was met by a man who said: "Don't go into that street, for I have seen a woman there half-dead with a serpent round her neck." The Duke de Nemours sent for a Jesuit and a Cordelier, and asked them to tell him what the appearance of such venomous beasts indicated.

"By my faith, monsieur," cried a chambermaid who was in the room at the time, "I believe it is a judgment of God, and that these evil beasts will come to eat us in your house." The governor ordered the woman to go away, and then Panigrolle, the cordelier, said, "It seems to me, sir, these things are an illusion, and that the devil tries to frighten us, and to make us abandon the siege, and that by this means the wicked heretics will enter in. Which is best, to be devoured by these beasts, or to allow this? The reliance we have on your honour will not allow us to believe that you will commit such a cowardly act, nor the other great lords either, who are in this city and keep it for the King of Spain, who we hope will quickly come to our relief."

But though the clergy, well provisioned to stand even a twelve months' siege, preached indomitable resistance, the people who were rapidly dying could no longer endure it. Stories sometimes humorous, sometimes frightful, but all only too natural, filled the air.

A cousin of the provost was dying, the doctor prescribed the brain of a dog. But where was it to be got? The Duchess of Montpensier had one, the provost of the trades went and boldly asked her to give it up to save the life of his relative. "Monsieur," she replied, "if you will ask anything else in my power I will give it, but I must reserve my little dog, lest I myself come into a like necessity; I pray you excuse me to your cousin and tell him not to take it ill." The man died the following night.

But what finally determined the leaders to give in, was a horrible story of a rich woman whose children having died of famine, she kept the bodies and told her servant to cook them for food. Unable to taste this shocking provision herself, she soon died, and her executors examining the house came on the remains.

The richer and more influential citizens were, it is said, much affected by this story, and urged the leaders to capitulate, which at last they brought themselves to admit was inevitable; and two ecclesiastics—the Cardinal de Gondi and the Archbishop of Lyons—were sent to treat with the relapsed heretic, who finally came to terms. In 1594, Henry IV. entered Paris, its king not only by hereditary right, but by the old brute law of conquest.

RICHARD HEATH.

Royal Gifts.

LINES SUGGESTED BY F. R. HAVERGAL'S CONSECRATION HYMN.

WHEN I asked that life might be Consecrated, Lord, to Thee,—
When I rendered heart and will,
Hands and feet obedient still,
Passing moments, busy days,
Spoken word, and song of praise,
Gold and silver, treasure-store,
Love abounding more and more,—
Thou didst condescend to take
All I gave for Jesus' sake;
But returned, in bounty free,
Priceless, royal gifts to me.

Take My grace (I heard Thee say),
Grace sufficient for thy day;
Take My promise, firmly stand,
None shall pluck thee from My hand;
Take My pardon, I alone
Can for all thy sin atone;
Take My peace, and let it reign,
Enmity has all been slain.

Take My will and let Me choose,
"No good thing" can I refuse;
Take My hand, to guide thy way,
Keep beside Me day by day;
Take My strength, for thine will fail
When thy fiercest foes assail;
Take My light in darkness drear,
I am with thee, do not fear.

Take My word and keep it stored,
Lest thou sin against thy Lord;
Take My law, and let it be Dearer far than gold to thee;
Take My Spirit whom I send,
Comforting, sustaining Friend;
Take My wisdom, not thine own,
Never dare to walk alone.

Take My Cross and bravely bear,
Drink My cup, My sorrow share;
Take My yoke, and learn of Me
Meekness and humility;
Take My joy and let it shine
In thy face with light divine;
Take My message to the sad,
Tell them I can make them glad.

Take My little lambs and feed,
Ministering to all their need;
Take My sheep and guide their way,
Fold the wanderers when they stray;
Take My brethren, all I see
Done to them is done to Me;
Take My poor and give them bread,
Feed them as you have been fed.

Take My chastisements, but know
Whom I love I chasten so;
Take My Name, nor fear to own
Thou art Mine, and Mine alone;
Take My everlasting love,
Soon I'll call thee home above;
Then, set free from sin and strife,
Take My gift—eternal life.

LUCY TAYLOR.

For as the Earth
bringeth forth her bud and as the Garden
causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord God will cause
Righteousness and Praise to spring forth before all the Nations.
Isaiah LXI. II.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XLVII.—MAKING READY.

BY the next morning's post Marcus received the following letter:—

"My dear Stratford,—I have on the whole done better than we anticipated. Not only have I seen the boy, but I have made arrangements to transport him home as quickly as it can be arranged. He is ill—very ill—but we must move him at all risks from this house where he cannot get any of the comforts his condition absolutely requires. He is not fit for railway travelling. You must send a carriage for him. The place is thirty-eight miles by road, but there are several towns on the way where you can get a change of horses. Don't come yourself; any extra excitement must be avoided, as in his weak state it might be dangerous. I shall stay and bring him safe home, and there will not be room in the carriage for you. This brings me to the strangest part of my story, and to a liberty I have taken with your name, for which I must excuse myself as best I can. In brief, then, I have invited old Mr. Edington and his daughter Joan to accompany Roy to the Hermitage. In an odd fashion of their own, which I cannot attempt to fathom, they are exceedingly attached to him, as he is to them. To the girl he, in a sense, owes his life, as without the care she has taken of him all this while, he must inevitably have sunk; whilst the old man, who seems to be suffering from a certain mental decay, which has caused him to lay on one side much of his former miserliness, is attached to the boy with a sort of dog-like affection very curious to witness. Had it not been, however, for Roy's own sake, I should never taken upon myself to invite them to your house; but, as it is, I found that to do so was the only way to avoid an excitement and agitation of conflicting feelings very injurious to him. That Roger is an ill-conditioned brute; but he does not interfere now; I settled him pretty quickly. His wife is some degrees better, but nothing to boast of. She has the sense to see that the boy must go, though she talks still as if this place would be his home. They have a crew of queer children, two particularly unruly boys, and a pair of girls much more respectable, both of whom seem to be fond of Roy and look very black at me for taking him away. The younger one has some spinal malady, which I believe could be cured if only she were under proper treatment. However, I need not trouble you with more details. Most likely you will be surprised by this letter, but you will act promptly upon it I have no doubt. I shall expect to see your carriage in Thorne on Monday evening, and next day if the weather is not prohibitive, we will bring the boy home. I shall try to be at the Hermitage at or before dusk, as he must not be exposed to the night air. I hope I have acted in all things to your satisfaction.—Yours truly,

"FRANK LEE."

Marcus read this letter twice through, and then went to the stables to give his orders to the coachman, and to the housekeeper to arrange for the reception of the sick boy, and the comfort of his journey. There was no lack of invalid appliances in that house, and by ten o'clock the carriage had started, all fitted up ready to transport the patient, and to lessen any discomforts incident to a long day's drive. Then Marcus went off to the Kynaston's house, to lay before Muriel and her mother the curious letter he had received, and to ask their assistance in the unlooked-for emergency.

"Our good Frank seems to forget altogether that there is no lady at the Hermitage to receive Miss Edington. Mrs. Kynaston, I must appeal to you, as my oldest friend, to get me out of the difficulty. Could you not come up with one or two of your daughters to stay a few days, and help to welcome Roy, and make our guests at home? I know it is a good deal to ask, with your large family and many ties; but you see my predicament, and I am confident you will help me out of the scrape young Lee has got me into. I do not in the least grudge receiving these people. If they have been good to Roy I shall be only too glad to welcome them; but I cannot do so unless you will help me, as I feel sure that you will."

Nobody ever appealed in vain to Mrs. Kynaston's kindly good-will or neighbourly offices; she acceded with prompt alacrity.

"To be sure I will, and bring Muriel and Lilias with me if you would like. We must make things cheerful for poor Roy, and Muriel has always been a sort of elder sister to him. If he wants nursing and looking after, women always come in useful, and of course there must be somebody to play hostess to Miss Edington. I will certainly come; I shall quite enjoy it; but it seems a curious thing for these people, against whom we have all been crying out so indignantly, to be coming as your guests to the Hermitage."

Marcus smiled at these words as if the thought were not new to him.

"Exactly so, it does seem strange; but I suppose one must take it as a sort of lesson that it is never wise to condemn people wholesale, without knowledge of character and circumstance. From what I had heard I should have imagined that there was absolutely nothing to be said in favour of that old miser and his family, but here they are spoken of as lavishing real consideration and kindness on Roy, and acting as his true friends. I confess I am perplexed by it all, but the puzzle will soon be solved. I must return now to set on foot my preparations. It is very pleasant to think what a houseful we shall be to-morrow."

Quite an excitement pervaded the little place during the hours that followed. Muriel was able to sympathise heartily with her little sister's delight in the prospect of Roy's speedy return and the visit to the Hermitage. They had stayed there sometimes in Mrs. Stratford's life-time, and loved the house almost as their own; but now it had a new charm for Muriel as her future home, and she knew that this thought was in Marcus's mind as he bid her and her mother welcome the next day on their arrival.

Little Lilias danced about like a sprite, ran in and out of the rooms, helped Muriel to arrange the flowers in Roy's, and to put those finishing touches of which women's hands alone seem capable.

"Poor, poor Roy!" the child would pause to say, "shut up in a horrid old place, with nasty, horrid people! Oh, how glad he will be to get home!"

And Muriel, though checking the freedom of her little sister's speech, felt that it would be a difficult matter to look upon these relatives of Roy's with friendly eyes.

"Roy will be pleased to find you here," said Marcus, taking her hand in his as he watched the approach of evening from the mullioned window in the hall. "As he said in his letter, you have always been like a sister. You will let him be a brother still, will you not, Muriel? though he is not so near to me as we once thought? You will let this be a home to him still when you reign here, as soon, I hope, you may?"

The soft colour mantled her face, a happy light shone in her eyes as she returned the look he bent on her.

"I think you need not ask that, Marcus. Dear Roy! he has always seemed like one of my own boys, only I think I know him almost better, for he has confided in me more than they have."

"And you will soon come to us, Muriel, to make this house a home for us both, as it has never been since our mother died? Muriel, my darling, I want you. I want your aid and counsel in a hundred different ways, in the carrying out of my plans and projects, in the work I have vowed in my heart to do. It is not good to have to work alone. I want a coadjutor in all things. A man is only half a man, I always think, until he has found his better half."

The words, spoken half-tenderly, half-playfully, brought the rosy flush back to Muriel's face, yet she looked at him with frank, glad confidence.

"I like to think of sharing your work, Marcus," she said simply.

"I know you do; and I know how well you will do it. I have learned more than one lesson from you already, Muriel. It is good to have you here now, to welcome our dear boy home. I can hardly believe he has been away all these months. I wonder if he will be changed much."

"I think the change in one way will be what we shall like to see. I want so much to hear all his history; letters tell so little. Marcus, I feel that I should like to be kind to those two poor girls who were so sorry to lose him. You know we were sure that he was fond of his little cousins, by what he said from time to time, and by his wanting to make them a tree at Christmas. I think they must have had a strange, dull life of it in that lonely house. Wouldn't it be nice sometimes to have them here, and show them what other children do? I wonder if mother would ask them. That poor little girl who is a cripple—I should so like her to have proper attention. When Roy comes we must hear all about them. I think there is nothing so sweet as making other people happy."

Marcus's smile was very bright and full of comprehension; he laid his hand caressingly on her shoulder.

"When you come here for good, Muriel—when this is in very truth your home, you shall indulge that propensity to your heart's content. I think as we shall be so very happy ourselves, that it will be incumbent upon us to make others happy as far as we can. As for these children you shall settle it all with Roy. He will tell you what you want to know, and you shall have carte blanche to carry out all your plans. If any of these people have been good to Roy, I shall be only too glad to let him repay the benefit in any way he thinks best."

"And you would be good to the children in any case, I know," answered Muriel, with a quick, bright, upward glance, "without any prompting at all. And here comes the carriage at last—now we shall have our boy back!"

CHAPTER XLVIII.—ROY'S RETURN.

"MARCUS! Marcus! Oh, Marcus! I can hardly believe I am really home again!"

Roy's hazel eyes were shining with strange brilliance, his thin white face was flushed with the excitement of happiness. He was lying in the hall before a blazing fire of pine logs, to rest for a short time before his transport upstairs. His wasted appearance was a shock to them all, but his overflowing happiness was infectious, and drove the anxious look from their faces.

"Oh, Marcus, the dear old place—Muriel, you are delightful to come and welcome me back. Ah, you can't guess how lovely everything looks—I can hardly believe it is the same. Oh, I shall be well here in no time. Frank, don't scowl at me, I must talk sometimes! Muriel, do go and say a few kind words to Joan there. She must feel so strange, and she has been so good to me."

The old man was seated in an armchair on the other side of the fire, and was dozing already in the warm glow it diffused, tired out by the long day's driving. His daughter stood behind his chair, very upright and almost defiant in her attitude. Her dark eyes took in everything that passed, and were full of the light of distrustful astonishment. She felt herself an alien, almost a savage, amid all the strange luxury with which she was surrounded, and although several people had shaken hands with both her and her father with apparent cordiality, she felt that they were neither of them welcome, and her pride rose up in revolt. She wished she had never come; she did not like to feel so conscious of a great gulf dividing them from those about them; she felt half-jealous of Roy's visible happiness at being at home once more.

As she was thus thinking she was aroused by the sound of a gentle voice beside her.

"Shall I show you your room, Miss Edington? You must be feeling quite tired after your long journey, and Roy ought to keep quiet Mr. Lee says. It is a pity to disturb your father, but I think we had better some of us leave the hall. So many people must excite him."

Muriel's face expressed a gentle interest and good-will that put the other at her ease at the first glance. She, at least, was no enemy, she did not regard them with repugnance. Joan followed in silence up the wide, softly-carpeted stairs, down a dim corridor, open doors disclosing glimpses of cosy, fire-lit rooms,—until they reached the apartment at the end, a large, handsome bedroom with carved oak furniture and rich hangings, and a large fire burning on the hearth. Muriel ushered her guest in saying,

"This is your room, I hope you will be comfortable. May I help you off with your cloak? My little sister will bring us some tea directly. I thought it would be pleasant to have it here together, if you don't mind. I want to hear about Roy, and I think you know most about him. You have been nursing him, have you not?"

Joan stood up very straight before the fire and looked full into Muriel's eyes.

"I want to tell you that neither my father nor I had anything to do with bringing Roy to our house. It was Roger's doing; Roger's and Caroline's. They thought it would be of use to them in some way to have him there. It is a miserable kind of story—at least, I think so. Only we grew to love him; and my father was so afraid of losing him that he would not let me write to his friends when he was ill, till I told him he might die for want of proper care. He gave way then, and you have got Roy back again; but I am sorry we have come too; for I am quite sure you must hate us."

Muriel looked at Joan and her feeling towards her began to warm.

"Please do not say that," she said with a frank, sweet smile. "I should like us to be friends now, because you are Roy's cousin and you have been very good to him. I want to know about him, and about yourself; won't you sit down? and we can have a nice comfortable talk together."

Joan allowed herself to be settled in an easy chair, and Lilias trotted backwards and forwards bringing in the paraphernalia of tea. Joan suddenly with one of her rare impulses took the child in her arms and pressed passionate kisses upon the wondering little face. Then releasing her she turned to Muriel, and with an odd break in her voice, said, "It is so long since I saw a child look like that. Children are not children really unless they are happy, and loved and cared for."

Muriel understood and looked her sympathy; she signed to Lilias to leave them, and then, when they were alone together, she got her strange companion, little by little, into talk, and before she left her she had pretty well learned the story of her strange life, and all other feelings were merged in those of compassion and sympathy. It was a relief to Joan to talk to another girl, near to her in age, although she had never done such a thing in her life before. Muriel's interest was simply expressed and unaffected, and drew out unwonted confidences, and something of a new warmth and happiness gathered about Joan's heart, as she felt the contrast between the pleasant family life and the old isolation of her lot.

"I like her so much," said Muriel to Roy, as she visited him that night before going to bed. He was in his old room, surrounded by the familiar objects endeared to him by a thousand tender associations, and though very weak and tired after the long day of excitement and fatigue, was not as exhausted as Frank Lee had feared, and was responding encouragingly already to the new treatment instituted.

Marcus was with him, of course, though the old uncle, who had been sitting beside him part of the evening, had been persuaded to seek a good night's repose in his own room. Roy's eyes were very bright as he held out his hands to Muriel.

"I am so glad!" he said, "so glad about everything; so very, very glad that you are going to be my sister, Muriel."

She kissed him and went away, not permitting him to talk, but the boy was almost too happy to settle to rest. He had so much to tell to Marcus—so much to explain that he could not be silent long; and in the quiet hours of the night the whole story came out, the whole story of his inner and outer life, ever since the death of his mother had roused him to think about his own position and wish to be rich and prosperous; down to the present moment, when having passed through many new experiences, he had come back again to the old home to find it more of a home than ever.

The story was of deep interest to Marcus, as giving to him an insight into Roy's character greater then he had ever known before. He had always hoped that in the day of trial the boy would prove that the right soldier-stuff was in him; but he had never been so fully satisfied of this as when listening to his simply told narrative, and hearing how much of good had come out of trial and pain and sorrow.

"I am proud of you, my boy," he said at last, when all had been told once and again. "I think we need not be sorry for what has happened. If you have suffered, it has been worth it."

"Oh, yes, indeed!" was the eager answer. "It was just as you said, Marcus; I trusted in things that were not strong enough, and when they failed me I had to go where real help was to be had, I might never have learned to but for that. Yes, I am very glad. I can see love in everything now—and I am so very happy!"

That was the burden of Roy's speech for many days to come; and, as happiness is the best of tonics and the most potent of medicines, and as in addition he had the most tender and skilful care bestowed upon him, he made rapid advance almost from the first, and astonished Frank Lee and others by the vigour with which he was able to battle against the insidious disease that threatened him, and to respond alike to treatment and feeding.

After Marcus, Muriel was most in demand with him during these early days of his return. He wanted to tell her everything about himself and about his cousins, and the quick and ready sympathy she showed, and the eagerness with which she entered into all his plans was as good as medicine to him and a great deal pleasanter.

He was much gratified to find that she really liked Joan, though finding her "a little difficult to get on with." He was very anxious to save her from a return to the old dead-alive life that threatened her; but he could not see any way by which it could be avoided.

"She is treated almost like a servant there by Roger and his wife. She has no end of drudgery to do, and nobody ever thanks her for doing it. I never guessed at first how nice she really was, or how high principled, or what thoughts she had in her head that she never talked about. She loved my mother, too, when she was a little girl, and she was good to me too from the first for her sake. When I think how she might have treated me—seeing who I am, that her dreary life is all the result of what my father did—I cannot thank her enough for being so good to me. You don't know what a strange house it was, or you would understand better the difference her kindness made. Mildred and Nellie were always fond of me from the first, and we had some very nice times together; but it is to Joan that I owe so very much. I do wish I could do something to repay her, but I don't see how. I suppose she will have to go back to Windmill House, and if she does I am afraid everything will be just as bad as ever."

Muriel looked full of sympathy, but saw no way of escape from the difficulty. She had made Roy happy by talking of inviting Mildred and Nellie on a visit to their house, but Joan was a more difficult person to deal with.

"Perhaps something will turn up some day," she said; "things do sometimes, you know; I am sure I wish anything would, for I do not think that either she or her father really wish to go back to Windmill House again."

TALES OF THE SERPENT.

A SUBJECT at present occupying not a little of the attention of eminent oriental and other antiquarian scholars, is the supposition, long indulged in, that the serpent once held a prominent position in the religions of the peoples of almost every country of the world. Go where we may we discover traces of the serpent thus associated. The myths and traditions of the countries are full of it, and the monumental records every where represent it, indeed, so much is this the case, that the association is now recognised as an established fact. Were we wanting in other evidence, the existing religious rites and ceremonies, practised by the aboriginal tribes of some out-of-the-way corners of the globe, far apart from each other, would alone testify how widespread, how universal, was the faith in the serpent.

Among some nations it would seem to have been worshipped as Supreme God, with others it was simply included as one of a multifarious animal Pantheon. In some cases, it was a mere symbol or material representative of a god, or a good or evil principle. Strange as it appears at the present day that man should fall down and worship the serpent, the phase of the faith, which seemingly everywhere prevailed, is to us equally odd and inexplicable. Had the serpent-worship of the ancients arisen out of their awe and wonder at its power of almost unlimited fasting, at its rejuvenescence in the casting of its skin, its longevity suggesting immortality, at the mysterious power with which some are endued, to cause instant death and destruction, we would have been better able to understand it. We all know that uncivilised people, unable to comprehend strange phenomena around them, invariably take to worshipping the unknown powers, in the desire to propitiate them, thinking thus to avert any evil, with which the powers might overtake them. But no such thing as fear lies at the root of serpent worship. All the world over the serpent was regarded with love and admiration, rather than terror. It was the bestower of health, good fortune, wisdom, the foreteller of future events: in a word, it was the bringer of every blessing. Thus the brazen serpent in the wilderness of Sinai was an emblem of renewed health and strength. So, too, Æsculapius, the Grecian god of medicine, was, it is said, originally a serpent.

Though the worship of the serpent was in no sense the religion of the Jews, it largely prevailed among the pre-existing nations, with whom the Jews were located, and the Jews succumbed to the baleful influence. We learn that they preserved and worshipped the brazen serpent of Moses until the time of Hezekiah, who destroyed the image and its attendant sacred groves and high places, in fact did all in his power to extirpate serpent worship from among his people.[1] There is not the slightest allusion, not the barest hint as to its existence during the intermediate period between the reigns of Moses and Hezekiah, a period of more than seven centuries, unless it be one in the Apocrypha, "They worship

[1] See 2 Kings xviii. 4.

From the Painting in the Luxembourg.] [P. C. Comte.

HENRI III. AND THE DUKE OF GUISE MEETING AT THE CHÂTEAU DE BLOIS.

BEFORE GOING TOGETHER TO COMMUNION AT THE CHURCH OF ST. SAUVEUR, DEC. 22, 1588—(See Page 370).

serpents void of reason" (Wisdom xi. 15), in curious contrast to the New Testament expression, "Be ye wise as serpents." Nor does the Bible or the Talmud afford any indication of serpent-worship cropping up again after Hezekiah had abolished it. Yet we can hardly believe it was thoroughly eradicated, or faith in the serpent would not be found as one of the tenets of the Ophites, Gnostics and Nicolaitans, sects of the early converts to Christianity. The grossness of the idolatry of the Ophites is well exhibited in Ephiphanius's description of the ceremonies attending their celebration of the Lord's Supper. "They keep a living snake in a chest," he says, "and at the time of the mysteries, entice him out by placing bread before him. The door being opened, he issues forth, and having ascended the table, folds himself above the bread. This they call a perfect sacrifice. They not only break and distribute this among the votaries, but whosoever wishes it may kiss the serpent. This the wretched people call the Eucharist. They conclude the ceremonies by singing a hymn through him to the Supreme Father," whom the serpent in paradise had made known to men.

On Tyrian coins and cylinders is to be seen a sacred tree, and round its trunk the serpent is coiled, a small stone altar stands on either side, and from the angles of the base of each, serpents issue. Sometimes the serpent entwines, not the tree, but the stone, while the Tyrian Hercules is depicted triumphing over another serpent. As the author Sanchoniatho says, dragons and serpents were deities among the Phœnicians. They called them the good demons, a name the Egyptians applied to Cneph, a god, usually represented on their monuments as a serpent with the legs of a man, though at other times its lower extremities are serpentine, its head the head of a hawk generally, but sometimes a lion.

In Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia and Persia, serpent worship was likewise in the ascendant. Hea or Hoa, the third person in the Babylonian Trinity of great gods, may be considered as the serpent deity, and the supreme Babylonian god, Bel, was adored under the form of a serpent. The whole story may be read in the Apocryphal book "Bel and the Dragon." The incidents there recorded, which led to the destruction both of the image of Bel, and the serpent itself, are so life-like that we can hardly entertain doubt as to the genuineness of the narrative. In Persia the serpent was adopted as the symbol of Ahriman, the evil principle, somewhat analogous to our Christian Satan. There are two celebrated statues which once adorned the magnificent temple of Belus in Babylon. One of these represents Rhea accompanied by two immense images of serpents; the other Juno, who stands with her right hand on a serpent's head. Like many other people the Persians have a traditional dynasty of serpent kings, half human, half serpentine. Theirs lasted, they say, for a thousand years. One of the monarchs, Zohak, is represented as a man in all that but from each shoulder a large serpent rises. The food of this monster was the brains of two young men, captives sacrificed daily. Zohak, it is recorded, was overthrown by Feridum, or as he is called in the Zend-avesta, Thrataonia, the slayer of the three-headed serpent, Dahaka, the creator of Ahriman, the evil principle.

But it was in India, on the Continent, and in Ceylon, that this ancient worship attained its fullest development. Far back as we can grope in Indian history we discover the people kneeling to the living serpent-god. We find temples, which, from their own intrinsic evidence, can hardly have been erected with object other than the celebration of its rites and ceremonies. Take up almost any early native writing and you come upon prayers addressed to mythical serpents, inhabiting the heavens, the skies, the clouds or the waters, and tales concerning the mythical Naga or serpent races of people, and Naga dynasties of kings. Every day since the examination for traces of serpent worship was instituted in India fresh evidences for its existence have been brought to light. Disregarded monuments, long ago discovered, when re-examined with this purpose in view, betoken serpent worship on every side. Who were these Nagas or serpent races and kings, so abundantly depicted on the Indian monuments, as well as so frequently alluded to in the early Hindu writings, it is somewhat difficult to determine. It is believed that the aboriginal, or non-Aryan tribes, which inhabited India previous to the incursion of the Aryans or Hindus,—the Dasyus as the Hindus termed them—were serpent worshippers pure and simple, and that the fertile imagination of the Hindu poets, confounding these worshippers with their object of worship, dubbed them a Naga, or serpent race. That this explanation is the correct one is borne out by the fact that the Nagas are always represented as retaining a portion of their human attributes and interference in mundane matters. The Hindus quickly overcame the Dasyus, and drove them back into the hills and forests, and there, beyond the cultivated plains, the sparse remnant of this primitive people may still be found to the present day. The monuments of that time of course depict the serpent in a considerably different guise. It appears in Shiva's hand, twisted round his neck, and in his hair, but it is no longer an object of worship. As might be expected, the god of the conquered serpent-worship is represented as doing homage to Shiva, the god of the new conquering religion, and in this subordinate position adds to the power and triumph of the destroyer. At the later date, when Buddhism was introduced, serpent-worship was entirely renounced by Buddha. But it is the opinion of the most eminent authorities on the subject that, though the worship of the serpent was repressed, the conversion of the people to Hinduism and Buddhism was exceedingly imperfect, and that below the surface of the nominal religions of the country serpent worship prevailed, and even now, after the lapse of more than four thousand years, prevails to an extent not hitherto suspected.

At Manipur there is to this day a serpent of peculiar species, called Pa-Kung-ba, and from it the royal family claim descent. At certain times it is the object of curious religious ceremonies. A priestess coaxes it out from its abode on to a cushion, and then begin the formalities. If the serpent appears large it indicates displeasure, and vice versa. Another equally wonderful serpent has been worshipped at Sumbulpore, according to tradition, from time immemorial, and it was still alive in 1836, when Major Kittoe saw it, who states that its diameter was at least two feet. It is said to issue from its cave every seventh day, to devour a goat, provided for it by its worshippers. The living serpent is also worshipped at the time of the Nag Panchamee, a famous Indian festival. When the festival day arrives, a number of men are delegated to go to the jungle and catch certain poisonous snakes, called Nagakuli. These they place in earthen pots or covered bamboo baskets, they feed them with milk, of which all serpents are exceedingly fond, and then they worship them. When the festival is over the serpents are set free again. In some parts of Southern India, the snakes are brought to the houses of the natives, by the Saupeli, or snake charmers. In other places, the worshippers, having bathed and daubed their foreheads with red paint, go to a lonely spot where the serpents are kept, or which they are known to frequent. The sacred stones, usual in such places, and the serpent huts they ornament with streaks of vermilion and ground turmeric. Offerings of garlands of flowers strung on white thread, and ghee are made to the stones and huts, and prayers and invocations are offered to the local spirits and the serpents. Should the serpents drink the milk presented, it is the best of omens, and the patience with which the natives will sit watching for this result is almost incredible to the European.

A Hindoo will do anything rather than destroy a snake. Should one obstruct his path, he turns aside. In the event of one being killed in a village, a piece of copper is placed in its mouth, and its body is burned with offerings to avert the evil. Some Brahmans invariably have a serpent's skin in their sacred books.

There is a celebrated temple, called Buran Deva, in Chattisgarh, the only image sculptured on the walls of which is the image of the cobra. In the great temples at Madura and Seringham are golden statues of seven-headed Nagas, richly jewelled and under a canopy, and in Ceylon the entrances to all the larger temples are guarded by wardens with serpent hoods. The great serpent temple of Nakhon Vat, in Cambodia, is perhaps the most wonderful of all. Every angle of the roof, every cornice of every entablature, every balustrade is impressed with the image of the serpent and it alone, some with crests only, some with crests and apparent feathers. Nothing but serpents, serpents everywhere. The arrangements and construction of the temple all tell the same tale, the worship of the serpent.

In the city of Benares, there is a famous serpent well—the Nagkuan—where the Nag or serpent is worshipped by immense numbers of persons once a year, on two succeeding days, by the women on the first day, the men on the second. Both offer sacrifices to the well and to Nageswar, the serpent god. There is an image of three serpents in a niche in the wall of the stairs, and a serpent crawls over another image on the floor. At Canara, in Southern India, stone images of Nagas are kept under the shade of the Peepul tree for purpose of worship. But perhaps the most famous of all serpent sculptures are those of the recently discovered Topes or Stupæ, of Sanchi and Amravati. Just a word as to these Topes. They are simply a later form of the tumulus or cairn, which were raised in so many countries over the graves of the dead. The Tope of India was, however, not the mark of a last resting-place, but a tower to commemorate some special event, such as Buddha's performance of a miracle. They consist of a solid circular pyramid of brick or stone, surrounded by rails, and guarded by wonderful gateways. On both rails and gateways are innumerable representations of serpents and Nagas in all the situations I have described.

In one of the Vedas the earth is addressed as the "Sarpa rajni," or the Queen of the Serpents. The Mahabharata, one of the Hindu sacred books, opens with a curse on the serpent, and goes on to give an account of the origin and various exploits of the Naga races. The sequel to the story is called the "Joy of the Snake World." The following is one of its legends, an example of many such. Buddha fell in love with the serpent king's daughter, near Peshawar, whom he married, and, having killed her father, reigned in his stead. The lady used constantly to have a nine-headed snake appearing at the back of her neck. One night, while she was asleep, Buddha cut it off, but with the unfortunate result of rendering her blind.

The Grecian myths present the serpent in a twofold light; the earliest as a monster vanquished by their heroes; while in the later ones the serpent is an oracle, and also a healing and a guardian god. Apollo is no sooner born than he kills the celebrated serpent, Python; Hercules, while yet in his cradle, squeezes two monster serpents to death; Cadmus slays a serpent, and sowing its teeth raised armed men. The Argonauts have to overcome a dragon ere they obtain the Golden Fleece, just as Hercules slays the many-headed Hydra, who sleeps before the golden apples in the garden of the Hesperides. There is a marble sculpture of this, the eleventh labour of Hercules, at Florence, where the Hydra, like the Indian Nagas, is serpentine only from the waist downwards. Doubtless all these myths are, in fabled form, the history of the Greek's destruction of the earlier serpent-worshipping races. There were serpent oracles at Delphi, and at Epidaurus. In Ovid's "Metamorphoses" we are introduced to an embassy sent from Rome to Greece to bring back the Epidaurian serpent. It was received with divine honours by the Roman citizens.

Coming down to later times we find that at Luçon, in France, a curious ceremony was enacted as late as 1869. A hollow column of wicker-work, filled with combustible materials, was raised to a height of sixty feet. Green foliage was artistically arranged about the column, and beautiful flowers and shrubs around the base. A procession of the clergy and young people in holiday dress marched up to the erection, and round and round about it, chanting as they walked. The column was set on fire, and a number of serpents were thrown on the column, while their vain endeavours to escape, and final destruction in the flames, were received with dancing and manifestations of joy by the onlookers.

Says Erasmus Stella: "In Sarmatia they at length arrived at such a pitch of wickedness that they worshipped serpents." Jerome of Prague, in the fifteenth century, saw the people offer sacrifices to serpents, and in Livonia of the fairest captives. Serpents were gods of the Poles as late as 1386. Superstitions as to their infallibility lingered among the peasantry and among the Lapps and Finns until 1555. A curious substratum of serpent tradition permeates Scandinavian ideas of cosmogony and theosophy.

The Welsh triads tell the story of a sainted woman, Keyna, the daughter of a Welsh king, who changed the serpent and serpent worshippers, who refused to permit her to reside among them, into the stones of the well-known Welsh circles. On the eastern coast of Scotland are numerous representations of the serpent on the Megalithic monuments.

The Aztec tribes of Mexico, when discovered by the Spaniards, employed the serpent largely as a sacred symbol. The name of their supreme god, Tezcatlipoca, signifies literally the Sun Serpent, and Tonacacihua, his wife, the female serpent or female Sun. Their great temple and the circuit round it were called respectively Coatlan, the Serpent Place, and Coatepantli, or the Circuit of Snakes. One of the Spanish conquerors alludes to a sacred serpent kept in a room strewn with feathers, and fed with the sacrificial offerings and with dogs' meat. The reverence paid by the various tribes of the North American Indians to the rattle-snake is worthy of mention. The Mohicans address it as their grandfather; it is their guardian, which warns them by its rattle of coming danger.

Serpent worship exists to the present day among some of the tribes of Africa, in some out-of-the-way nooks in Australia, and in many of the islands of Oceania, notably in the Fiji Isles.

It is the supreme deity of the African tribe known as the Whidans; they call it Danh-gbwe, and esteem it "the supreme bliss and general good." One thousand women dedicate themselves to its service, these are the Danh-si, who are marked with its image. Nothing will induce the aborigines of Australia to disclose to the white man the rites with which they worship their serpent god. Report has placed human sacrifices and cannibalism among the number.

A LIBRARY FOR THE BLIND.

A LIBRARY for the blind is truly an interesting and suggestive sight. The one we are specially invited to inspect, is singularly so, because it tends to prove the fact that an individual can move a multitude by perseverance in a particular cause. Miss Arnold, its honorary secretary,—herself blind from her birth,—has been the mainspring and stay of this lending library, and we cannot inspect it without admiration, astonishment, and thankfulness. She would qualify the assertion that the work is hers, by pointing out the kind ladies, old and young, who lend their eyes and hands to aid her; but we think it simplifies the matter to state that, to the life-long prayers of one born blind, and to her intense desire to benefit her fellow-sufferers, is mainly due the foundation of what promises to be a beneficent institution.

Begun, in 1882, in a lodging where its foundress lived, it has enlarged its borders to a whole house, which she is ambitious enough to hope will eventually be lined with book-shelves. At present, the large double rooms on the ground floor alone are so lined, the rest of the house being otherwise utilized to aid in defraying its rent. But here are seventy strong book-shelves, filled from floor to ceiling with works printed in those strange hieroglyphics which the sighted sadly wonder at, and the blind read by that miraculous gift of touch, or feeling. Most of these books are in what is called the Braille type, but there are also many in that of Moon and Lucas, the holy bible being printed in each for the benefit of such as may be better schooled in one than another. Here are forty volumes of the sacred book, in Braille, presented by the British and Foreign Bible Society, which would alone help one to realise in some degree the arduous nature of the work of printing for the blind. A book which, by sight, may be read in one volume, large or small, is subdivided into forty big parts for finger reading. A Mudie's circulating library cart would scarcely hold them. Yet the floor is covered with parcels neatly enveloped in brown paper, ready for transmission to all parts of the United Kingdom, for this is sending day.

The blind owe a debt of gratitude to the originator of the Parcels Post, who, together with the blind Postmaster-General, Prof. Fawcett, began a postal service without which these packages could scarcely be forwarded. As it is, the expense of carriage is frequently too heavy to be defrayed by the poorer members, sixpence, ninepence, or sometimes even a shilling being an impossibility. A special Carriage Fund is therefore started, which enables the parcel sent to be prepaid, which must again be prepaid by the receiver when returned. But some kindly spirits have such sympathy with suffering humanity, that they have undertaken a particular case, and the fortunate individual receives his coveted literature gratis. A penny a week is the subscription to this our Library, and there are souls so overflowing with charity that they undertake this payment as well as the carriage!

Members who reside in London change their books once a week on a given day. They usually come in person, either with or without guides, and the young lady who kindly devotes her afternoon in giving out the books has enough to do. Let us be thankful that the young ladies of this busy age find so many useful occupations. Several are literally "eyes to the blind" in this room, for they keep accounts, pack parcels, and do endless odds and ends which the Secretary could not accomplish unaided: albeit, she can do most things, from printing books, correcting type, and teaching, to using a sewing machine. And all this feminine energy, both in principal and aids, is voluntary.

Many people delight in helping on institutions where there is no "paid officialism," as it is called. We hope they will take the lending library for the blind under their especial consideration. They certainly would if they could read the list of books, and learn how long the blind have been craving for intellectual food. "We want books, both instructive and amusing," was their cry, and now, thanks, first to M. Braille, and secondly to the zeal of the industriously benevolent, they have them. Braille invented the new method, and individual perseverance worked upon it. Of the hundreds of volumes on the shelves before us, numbers have been printed, letter by letter, by friends. They have not been stereotyped, and each volume has been filled, separately, by matter printed or pricked by people interested in the condition of the blind. If funds increase, this will be made a remunerative occupation for the blind themselves. Many of them are skilful printers, and might be paid so much a sheet for printing new books, or replacing those worn out by constant use.

As it is, friends do the work, and it is needful to see the Primer, in order to estimate its difficulty. A new alphabet, "signs and wonders" must be learnt; one may almost say, a new language. It is like a missionary in a strange land, learning the dialect of an unknown tongue. But christian perseverance masters most obstacles, and the fact of adding another book to the restricted library of the blind must be sufficient reward.

Here we see Shakespeare, Macaulay, Dickens, Scott, Milton, Tennyson, Longfellow, and a dozen other well-known authors, placed at the disposal of a class so long restricted to a portion, only, of the scriptures. One female member who was educated at a blind school, and is now seventy years of age, writes enthusiastically. All these years she had but one book in her possession—the Second Book of Kings. She read and re-read it—knew it by heart, in short. Now a new world has opened before her, and at three score years and ten, she begins to realize what, hitherto, has been dreamy ideality.

A new world! This is what they all say. Gentle and simple alike praise God for opening out this literary arcana to the eyes hitherto closed. An aged clergyman, a young diplomatist and others blinded by untoward circumstances, have learnt to read the Braille type, and are enabled to forget awhile their affliction in the works they loved when sighted. For here are books suited to all ages and estates. History, biography, the classics, science, are all represented; and fiction holds its own. There are endless stories, short and well chosen; we count 118 on the list—each in one volume—which is refreshing after the fifteen volumes of "The Old Curiosity Shop." "We want amusing reading, as well as serious," was the cry, and here it is. We hope the readers are grateful to the ladies constantly employed in supplying their demand. Miss Arnold has as many as fifteen at a time writing for her, and she reads and corrects every book before it is placed in the Library: for compositors are not always faultless. Of the twenty-three volumes of Green's "Shorter History of the English People," half were pricked by ladies. Much is said of the strong-mindedness, fastness and various short-comings of the sex, but individuals do a vast amount of good, notwithstanding.

There are at present 113 members to whom books are regularly sent, besides several blind schools which gladly avail themselves of them. The well-to-do of these members pay ten shillings a year; but the income does not, naturally, suffice to maintain the library, and annual subscriptions are solicited from externs interested in the blind, who can nominate a member in consideration of the stereotyped guinea. Two of the aforesaid hard-working and unselfish members of the fair sex help to pay the rent, and a third who was instrumental in laying the foundation of the library, continues to aid in its maintenance.

Unfortunately, many of the volumes are nearly worn out, and money will not replace them. Few of the books are stereotyped, and it takes a long time for one pair of hands to prick the contents of a big book. They look respectable enough outside in their uniform of dark blue American cloth, and white title-badge; but the constant passing of the fingers over the raised lettering within, defaces and disfigures it. While examining, we espy a type-writer stowed away on one of the shelves, and are told that it is for sale. The librarians are open to an offer for it.

Much is being done to make the blind independent, but much has still to be accomplished. We have been to monster teas [1] where five or six hundred were regaled, and have learnt how hard it is for them to make a livelihood, and how the small pensions only serve to eke it out. Now, the Normal College for the Blind and other efforts, will help to give them hope and self-reliance.

"I think we shall never fall back into the state of languor and want of energy natural to us, since we have books. All my life I have hoped and prayed for such a library as this, and now I pray for its support and enlargement," says the secretary.

[1] Vide SUNDAY AT HOME. "A Blind Tea Party," and "The Normal College."

These words are echoed mutely, by many letters received almost daily, from one of which we venture to make one or two extracts. The writer begins by regrets that he can no longer subscribe to the library as he has only two and sixpence a week to live on, and he finds the postage of the books beyond his means. "I have found them very interesting and instructive; they have enlightened me on several subjects which I should otherwise have been ignorant on, so I very much regret giving them up. I never saw the least ray of light as I remember, and I have lost my right hand as well, so I am consequently dependent upon the parish, and they say if I cannot do on half-a-crown a week I must come into the house." This poor fellow has been placed on the free list; but he is only one of many who cannot afford the carriage of the books, yet pine for the recreation they alone contribute. This our library is still in its infancy, but we hope the "benevolent public" will help on its growth to maturity; and in order to do so effectually, they should pay it a visit, and hear its mainstay speak for herself. She would fain see the whole house filled with books, and doubtless it will be so in the course of years, if subscribers, printers and readers increase as rapidly as is desired. It is situated at 114 Belsize Road, N.W., where the blind and the sighted are equally welcome guests.

ANNE BEALE.

IN THE DAYS OF THE GREAT ARMADA.

CHAPTER III.

APPROACH OF THE ARMADA.

DANIEL LAVIN'S sloop was not the only vessel that was being hurried to sea that July Sunday evening, as the Spanish fleet came slowly up the channel.

For weeks, aye, for months past, men's minds had been full, and their tongues busy, with reports of what Philip was doing; and noblemen and gentlemen, down to the humblest squire who owned money or could command "a following," were bracing themselves for defence. Ships were fitted out at private charges, volunteers were pressing forward to man them, and from end to end of England there was but one resolve—to beat off the invader or to die in the attempt.

Some few Englishmen there were who yet clung to the rule of Rome; and to them this threatened subjugation of their country was the only way—a dreadful and sorrowful way, it is true—but the only way of restoring England to the bosom of the Catholic Church. Others there were who while not Protestant, yet preferred their country to the Popedom.

Mary of Scotland, the Roman Catholic heiress of the throne, was dead, and her son James was of the Reformed Faith. Pope Sixtus V. had issued a proclamation absolving the subjects of Elizabeth from all allegiance to her rule, and formally assigning the kingdom to Philip of Spain "as lineal descendant of the Plantagenets." There was also a blasphemous promise that whosoever should help the cause of the Church of God by the conquest of England and destruction of heresy, they should have indulgence for former sins, and remission from scores of years of the pains and terrors of purgatory.

It was, therefore, not only a foreign foe that the country was preparing to resist; men were making ready to strike for all things most precious to them—for freedom, for faith, for very existence itself.

It is difficult to realise now, in these days of stability and peace, what our forefathers felt and feared three hundred years ago. They had no regular army; their coasts were practically undefended; their navy, twenty-eight sail all told, was composed of ships small and few indeed compared with the enormous flotilla which was being prepared in the ports of Spain, Sicily, Naples, Portugal, and the Netherlands. The sailors serving with the fleet did not exceed fifteen thousand men.

But if their danger was great their hearts were dauntless. It was not only Doris's lover, young Robert Bulteel, who believed that England would prove herself victorious, no matter what force King Philip might bring!

And the bravest heart in England was that of Elizabeth, that "lion-like woman" who, despite her faults—and her faults were many—had a courage equal to that of any man. She was not in the least dismayed, the danger only roused her daring soul. She knew her cause was righteous, and she knew also that her people would be true to her and to themselves.

She was not disappointed!

The enthusiasm through the land was boundless. The small navy was almost trebled in those few months by private enterprise and generosity. The queen sent to the city of London to ask what contingent of ships and men could be furnished to meet this direful need. The Lord Mayor asked what force the city was expected to furnish.

"Five thousand men, and fifteen ships," was the royal reply.

After two days of deliberation the Londoners offered ten thousand men-at-arms and thirty well-found vessels; and upon the equipment of this force they spared no care or cost.

But if the preparations had been enthusiastic the thrill that ran through the south country when it was known that the Armada was actually in British waters made every heart beat high as with the stir of victory.

An old writer, Camden, tells how the Spanish fleet came on, "the ships with lofty turrets like castles, in front like a half-moon, the wings thereof spreading out about the length of seven miles, sailing very slowly, though with full sails, the winds being, as it were, tired with carrying them, and the ocean groaning under the weight of them."

And in truth it was the mightiest fleet that at that time had ever swept the ocean—one hundred and fifty huge galleons and men-of-war, having on board twenty-nine thousand men, soldiers, sailors, and galley-slaves. And on the sea-coast of the Netherlands there waited, as was well known, the Duke of Parma, with an army of forty thousand men, ready to fling himself on the shores of Essex as soon as the Spaniards should make good their landing; and then at one blow should be decided the fall and fortunes of England.

The wind blew free and fair, and the crisp waves of the Channel rolled gaily in the sun as the proud array came onwards. One Hemming, a freebooter—a pirate, if all the truth were told—caught sight of their blazoned sails and streaming flags, and he made haste with the news to Plymouth Bay.

At Plymouth were the English captains, the High Admiral, Lord Howard of Effingham, Drake, and Hawkins, and Frobisher, men who had already measured their wits and their stout swords against Spain. They listened to Hemming's eager tale with a grim smile on their lips. They were glad this uncertainty was over at last; they were glad to know that the foe was really in sight.

Over and over again has the story been told of their cool courage and good hope. Poets have sung, and authors written about the little knot of men on Plymouth Hoe that sunny day in July; painters have tried to show the semblance of their intrepid faces and gallant bearing, and men's hearts have been stirred from that day until now, the space of full three hundred years, by the memory of those brave sailors and true men.

NEWS OF THE ARMADA.

"There needs be no hurry," said Sir Francis Drake. "They come, do they? Let them pass on; we will harry them in the rear. We have fair winds and God's favour."

And surely never was the great Name of God invoked in a juster cause than that for which England struck that day!

Stately and tall showed the Spanish ships as they rose and rolled on the running sea. They were crowded with the flower and chivalry of the South. There was scarcely a noble house in Aragon or Castile, in Genoa or Savoy, that had not sent sons or scions upon this quest of glory—and more than glory! for was it not the cause of Holy Church itself? Highborn ladies had sewed those silken banners, priests had blessed them, kings and princes had watched them hoisted to the wind. And there could be no doubt, no doubt at all, but that those sacred standards would presently wave over the realm of England, and over the humbled head of its heretic queen.

In the teeth of the south breeze Lord Howard's little fleet was towed and manœuvred clear of the bay. A shout went up from the English as they sighted their foe from the tops of the Admiral's ship, the "Ark-Raleigh." There was no fear in those gallant hearts, the sight of the odds against them, terrific as those odds were, only roused within them every grain of pluck and valour they possessed. The yards were squared; the canvas every stitch of it was set, and like hounds set free from the leash the small ships rushed forward in chase of their prey.

CHAPTER IV.

On board the Ark-Raleigh was Robert Bulteel.

He was a man worthy of Doris, judging by the look of him, as he stood by the taffrail with folded arms watching the pace at which they were gaining on the Spaniards. He was square-built and wide-chested, with frank grey piercing eyes, and a broad strong forehead, a strong man altogether; one who had mastered life's hardest lesson, that of obedience and reverence, and had thereby grown but the stronger and more fit to rule.

Thomas Clatworthy had been doubtful as to the wisdom of allowing him to try to win Doris for his wife; the girl was young, too young, he said; and the Clatworthys, though simple yeoman-folk, had always been of note and repute in the Exe valley. Doris might naturally look higher—though he, her father, ought not to make that remark; and certainly there was nothing to be said against Robert himself; he was honourable as the day-light, Master Clatworthy acknowledged; but still it would be a comfortable thing to know who a man's father had been, and what sort of blood ran in his veins, if that man was to marry Doris.

For Robert Bulteel was a stranger. He had been brought as a child to Exmouth by an old man—a curious old man—who was reputed by the superstitious to deal in magic and charms, but who lived inoffensively enough by dressing skins and stitching them into the wallets which every traveller and horseman required in those days. After his death, the lad Robert had earned his bread on board first one and then another of the little trading vessels that carried merchandise between England and Flanders; or it might be, as a greater adventure, found their way into the Mediterranean, whence, if they were fortunate, they returned with cargoes rich enough to make ample amends for the risks they had run.

Robert did not come empty handed when he asked Clatworthy to give him his Doris. He had prospered wonderfully, and had won his way upwards until he owned part—but a small part truly—of the craft in which he sailed. And it was not only his prosperity that induced Master Clatworthy to give his consent. Doris loved him; and the father could not bear to see those sweet eyes of hers sad with tears.

So Robert and Doris were betrothed. "You must wait," said Clatworthy, "wait awhile until you know better what are life's meanings. She is so young, Robert; and as for thee, thou hast yet to learn that success, aye, even happiness itself, is not the best at which we can aim. God rules the small as well as the great; think reverently of Him, Robert, and He will teach thee things which as yet thou hast not known the need of knowing."

His words fell on their ears as the rain falls on the smooth shore-stones. They were so happy that they indeed "felt no need" of those higher things of which he spoke.

Then came the rumours of danger, the news of the arming of that huge force that was to overwhelm the land. Not a trader crossed the seas, but brought back word of the terrible engines of destruction that were being forged to hurl death and doom on England. The harbours of Spain were choked with war-like stores, the ports of the Mediterranean were busy with the building of the war-ships that were to bear them. On every side could be heard and seen the preparations for the "Invincible Armada."

It was no time to think of love or marriage. And Robert Bulteel unclasped Doris's hands from about his neck and bade her take heart of grace. He laughed as he kissed away her tears of distress, saying she was not fit to be a seaman's wife if she shook and shivered over sorrow that might never come. "I have joined the Admiral's ship," he said. "It is worth something to tread the same decks with such a bold true man as is Lord Howard of Effingham! Look up, sweet-heart, and give me joy! I am going to fight side by side with heroes, and may end in being a hero myself—who knows?"

GOOD-BYE.

He was a hero already in poor Doris's opinion; but she did not say so for the reason that her bitter crying made all speech most difficult just then. And so he left her, and took his way to Plymouth, where the Ark-Raleigh was getting her powder on board at the quay beneath the Hoe.

And now, on the 22nd of July, the moment of action had come. The time for snatching at reports and vague stories was past; here in the British seas was the great fleet; here before their eyes were the fighting-ships and galleons of Spain.

SCRIPTURE VERSE.

NO. V.

1. It contains the account of one sad event, and refers to another.
2. A city is mentioned to which a king afterwards rode attended by a prophet.
3. Four persons are mentioned in it, two of them twice over; one is a servant.
4. Two of them died violent deaths.
5. One afterwards lived at Lo-debar, and was deceived by his servant.
6. Another was deceived by his daughter.
7. Another once spoke these words: "The Lord wrought a great salvation for all Israel; thou sawest it and didst rejoice."
8. One of those mentioned is a woman, but her name is not given.
9. Three are related to each other.
10. The age of one is given.
11. An infirmity is mentioned.
12. The incident recorded in the verse is not of the same date as the rest of the chapter.
13. The chapter contains mention of the deaths of five persons; none are named in the verse.
14. A child is mentioned.
15. The verse contains fifty-nine words, six being proper names, and consists of three complete sentences.

L. T.

THE SUNDAY AT HOME

O DAY MOST CALM, MOST BRIGHT! . . .
THE WEEK WERE DARK BUT FOR THY LIGHT.—Herbert.

MARCUS STRATFORD'S CHARGE;

OR, ROY'S TEMPTATION.

CHAPTER XLIX.—A DREAM REALISED.

A SOLITARY WALK.

SOME days later Joan Edington, still a guest at the Hermitage, was taking a solitary walk one sunny, spring-like morning.

Roy, who had been for a short time in a somewhat critical state, had taken a very decided turn for the better; the anxiety about his condition was now sensibly lessened, and perfect recovery was spoken of with cheerful assurance.

Glad and thankful as Joan was for this improvement, her heart was heavy that morning as she pursued her solitary way, for it had begun to be apparent to her that she and her father could not prolong much longer this pleasant visit to Roy's home. They had come there under peculiar circumstances, and Joan was afraid to think how much she had enjoyed it; but she was dimly aware that the longer they stayed, the harder would be the wrench at the other end, and she resolved to speak to her father that very day about a return to their gloomy home.

Yet how she shrank from the thought of going back to the life of Windmill House, and the society of her brother Roger and his wife! She felt as if she had been years away from that desolate place, and she was beginning to realise that life could be something different from what she had hitherto imagined it to be. She had been with Muriel to her Sunday-school the previous day, had accompanied her on many of her expeditions to the cottages of the sick and poor during the past week, and had gained a number of new impressions, many of which were very strange to her. Longings and aspirations only half understood were beginning to rise within her, and she felt as if she should be slowly stifled if she went back to the old dreary life of selfish monotony. Her father had taken with marvellous ease to the ways of this new household. He seemed quietly to slip back into them, as if the past fifteen years had not existed for him, and, except that he was very silent, and never mingled willingly in general conversation, there was little to distinguish the silver-headed old man from any other of his age and standing, save perhaps the old-fashioned cut of his coat, and the old-fashioned courtesy of his manners. He spent much of his time in Roy's room, or else in quiet talks with Mrs. Kynaston, who took the old man upon her mind, and soon found out that she really liked him. She made him walk with her in the garden on sunny afternoons, and beguiled him into talk about the days of his youth, when his life had been full of healthy interests, and the demon of avarice had no deep hold upon his heart. Talk of this kind did him good, and Mrs. Kynaston knew enough of his later history to point the moral with a plainness that would have been unbecoming in a younger person. He would catch her meaning quickly, and assent with an ever-increasing readiness. She really believed him sincere in what he said, and Joan had never seen him so content since she could remember.

She paused at the outskirts of the rustic village through which she had passed, and contrasted the peaceful ever-varying beauty of the undulating, wooded landscape before her with the desolation of Abbot's Heath, a deep-drawn sigh escaping from her. A few paces away to the left, in a compact little garden of its own, stood a low little thatched house, rather above the rank of a mere cottage, yet without any pretentiousness or assumption about it. It was empty, a board in the garden announced that it was to let, and Joan's face grew wistful as she pictured to herself what life might be like in some sweet home-like place such as this.

"A penny for your thoughts, Miss Edington," said a voice from behind; and, turning quickly, Joan found herself confronted by the young doctor, who had grown to be quite friendly since their first odd meeting not so very many days ago.

"I was thinking how pleasant it would be to live there," answered Joan in her direct fashion, as she turned away; and a pleased half-eager look sprang into Frank's eyes.

"You had better try the experiment practically, Miss Joan,"—he often called her so, as if the shorter name pleased his ear better. "It would be a capital thing for both of you to come and live in a warmer place than that exposed heath—a little more society would be pleasant too. It's a capital idea of yours. You should speak to your father."

Joan smiled in a way that spoke more emphatically than her words.

"It would not be any use. It is quite out of the question, save as a pleasant dream."

"Why?"

"For one thing, we could not afford it."

The simplicity of the answer, and the absence of all false shame, gave Frank confidence to speak.

"You might manage to do something to get over that difficulty," he said. "Workers are wanted in this place. It is one of those scattered parishes that one clergyman cannot work single-handed, and Marcus Stratford is organising many schemes for the benefit of the people. I know he wants a capable woman here as deaconess, sick-nurse, Bible-woman—I don't exactly know what the name would be; but some one to visit the poor in their homes, tend the sick, and inquire into cases of want and misery. Why shouldn't such work suit you? Your past life has fitted you to endure more fatigue and hardship than many ladies could, and your knowledge of straitened circumstances, and the necessity of studying ways and means, would stand you in good stead. Think of it, Miss Joan; I can give you an excellent character as nurse, and I believe the life would suit you, and you it."

A flush had slowly stolen into Joan's face, and a light into her eyes.

"If I could only feel myself fit!"

"You would like it then?"

"Nothing better."

Quietly as she spoke, he heard the ring of earnestness in her voice, and felt that an unwonted enthusiasm was kindling within her.

"What is the rent of that house?" she asked abruptly.

"If you were to accept the position I have suggested, you would have it rent free, and a small salary as well. Marcus Stratford owns it; he would be delighted to let you have it for such a purpose."

Joan walked on rapidly, her mind evidently at work on the same subject. Presently she broke out:

"I am very ignorant—not fit to teach others. I should never succeed in such work."

"You cannot tell till you try. I should say, from my observation, that you would do it well. It is better to have too humble than too exalted an idea of one's powers; and experience is the best of teachers."

Joan hardly spoke again all the way home; but when she reached the house she went straightway in search of her father. He was alone in his room, and looked up at her approach with a smile that he had only learned of late.

"Father," she began abruptly, "do you want to go back to Windmill House?"

A startled, troubled look crossed his face.

"Windmill House! Go back? No, Joan. Why should we go back there? We are happy here, we were never happy there. I do not wish to return."

"Nor I, father. I cannot bear the thought; but we cannot stay on here much longer, We must make some plans for the future," and then, unable to restrain her eagerness any longer, she laid before him the suggestion just made to her and begged his consent to it in vehement words.

"We should be so happy together there, dear father; and you do not know how I long to be useful. I would never let you feel neglected, but I do begin to want to do more, to mix with other people, to help them and comfort them. I never could be as other women are. I could not do what they do—go into society, take a place in life such as Miss Kynaston will do, for which she is so fitted; but I feel as if I need not be quite shut out from every one. I believe I could help the sick and the poor and the wretched, because I have known what dreary hopelessness was like before the light came to drive it away. Dear father, do let me try; do let us see if we cannot live in some little place here, and let me work to keep us. I should be so happy, and I think I could make you happy too."

The old man seemed stirred by her words out of the dreamy state into which he after fell.

"Stay, my child," he said, putting his hand up to his head. "I do not know that there will be any necessity for you to work for a living. I have been saving money all these long years, and now it must have reached a considerable sum. I was never quite ruined by that crash. Something was saved, and Alicia was very generous and made up some of the loss; and there was your mother's money too. But I had set my heart on making a grand fortune and finding myself a millionaire, and when that crash came it seemed to take all the life out of me. I set to work then to hoard and scrape and save for myself, and I have been doing so these fifteen or sixteen years. Once it seemed the only pleasure I had; but these last months the pleasure has gone away. I should like to end my days differently, and try to atone a little for the past. Joan, there must be ten or twelve thousand pounds by this time. Roger shall have half, and Windmill House to live in, if he likes; and you and I will live upon the rest in some quiet home of our own here. You need not toil to earn your living. You shall live as an Edington ought to do, in comfort if not in luxury."

Joan's eyes were shining with a strange light; her hands were closely locked together.

"And work for love instead of money," she cried. "Oh, father, how I shall enjoy doing that! I did not want to sell my services, I wanted to give them; but I could not see the way. If things are as you say, I can offer myself to help in the work they want done, and that will be, oh, so much happier for me! I could not do as other women do; I shall never be like them, never feel and speak and think as they do; but I could help the poor and the unhappy and the sick, because I have been lonely and wretched and poor myself. I was shown the way out of the darkness. I want now to try and show it to others."

"And so you shall, my child, so you shall. In God's mercy this black cloud that has hung over us so long has rolled away. We will try and show our thankfulness to Him by taking such steps as shall prevent its ever coming back. If we give our lives into His keeping, I do not think we shall have anything to fear."

CHAPTER L.—THE NEW HOME.

"JOAN, dear, I wish you joy."

Joan was standing on the threshold of her new home, a flush of happiness upon her face, a light of hope fulfilled shining in her eyes, and Muriel stood beside her, proud and glad and full of sympathy, the first guest beneath her new friend's roof.

Only two or three weeks had passed since father and daughter had first broached to one another their mutual wish to return no more to Windmill House, but to commence a new and fuller life elsewhere, yet so much energy had Joan displayed, and so much assistance had she received from sympathising friends, that in quite a short time such simple furniture as the cottage home required had been purchased and brought in, a neat handy servant girl had been engaged, and Joan for the first time in her life found herself mistress of a place she could without mockery call "home."

Old Andrew Edington, who had aroused himself to something of his old energy in arranging the division of his property, which he had made over to his two children (with an uncalculating generosity oddly at variance with his past greed and miserliness), had quickly relapsed into the state of placid contentment and docility that had grown so much upon him of late, and Joan had conducted everything with characteristic decision and singleness of purpose, anxious to get her father into a home of his own as quickly as possible, before he should have taken root too deeply at the Hermitage, where he seemed now to feel completely at home. Joan was shrewd enough to see that their presence there was something of an embarrassment to their host, and a means of detaining Mrs. Kynaston from her own family, so that the moment her father's sanction to her plan had been obtained, she set on foot her preparations; and the house being in perfect repair inside and out, a quite short time proved sufficient for the purchase and transport of the simple furniture and fittings that were regarded by Joan as quite luxurious and beautiful. Her native taste, dwarfed and stunted in the past, began to rear its head at last, and showed itself in a sort of graceful severity that was very characteristic, and suited both herself and her dwelling to a nicety. Plain and simple as it all was, it was not in the least like the abode of a common person, for Joan, although inclined to repudiate the attempt to dub herself a "lady," was a gentlewoman to her heart's core, and everything about her testified to this, and bore the stamp of her somewhat marked individuality.

Muriel noted all these things at once, for though she had assisted at the choice and purchase of most of the household goods, Joan had declined all assistance save that of her servant in the final arrangement of her house.

"How pretty and homelike it all looks, Joan! Now take me all over, please; it is so nice to feel that we are really to be neighbours—that we are to have your help in all the plans we are making together."

"I am so happy, I cannot always believe it is not a dream, and that I shall wake to find myself in Windmill House again," answered Joan, who was in one of her expansive moods, once so rare, but commoner now with the few people in whom she confided. "Yes, let me show you everything. This is father's parlour on this side. I dare say he is asleep; he sleeps a great deal now, but you can look round, we shall not wake him; and here is my room, this side, where we have our meals, and where I shall do my work when I want to make a spread. The kitchens are capital; it is all small, but so compact and comfortable. Jane is a merry, willing girl, quite a friend already; upstairs you see is father's room over his parlour, and I have the little one behind, because I like to be near him—he sometimes wanders in his sleep, and seems inclined to get up. I am more comfortable to be close at hand. The other room is for a visitor, if ever we have one"—Joan paused for a moment with her hand on the door, an odd little smile upon her face; but then she turned away and went on with her description of domestic arrangements. "Jane sleeps over the kitchen. If you had ever seen Windmill House you would understand why it all seems so homelike here. When I wake in the morning and hear the birds twittering in the ivy, and see the shadows of the trees on the blind, and remember where I am, I feel so happy I do not know how to be thankful enough."

"You will show your happiness by sharing it with others," said Muriel, as she looked out of the little latticed windows, the colour deepening in her own face. "That is just as I often feel myself—as if I did not know how to be grateful enough for all the gladness and peace; and then I hope and pray that I may be able to do something to show it by teaching, and ministering to, and raising those who have little happiness of their own in this world. I always feel as if that must be the work He wishes us to do in giving so much to us, and Marcus feels just as I do, and you, too, Joan, I think; I am so glad we have you to help us. We want help, and friends are so much better than strangers. Marcus is coming soon to see you and your father, and to arrange about getting the garden properly stocked and put in order. We do so hope you will be comfortable here; you cannot think how grateful he feels to you for giving your time and strength and skill to our poor people. I do hope you will be very happy, Joan."

"I am quite sure I shall be," was the quiet answer, and Joan's eyes were shining with strange brightness and intensity. "And it is not for any one to thank me. I feel as if I could not be grateful enough for all that has been done for us"—they were in the little parlour now, and Joan was looking out of the window, turning slightly away from her companion. "Muriel, did you know that I went home yesterday for a long day—to Windmill House, I mean?"

"Did you, Joan? No, I did not know."

"I felt I ought to do so. I wanted some things from there, and I wished to explain, if I could, why it was we had left them. I did not want them to feel hurt. I am glad now that I went."

"Were they angry at your leaving?"

"I hardly know; Roger has been glad to have his portion of father's money paid over to him, and I think Caroline is not altogether sorry not to have the charge of him in his old age. They have got rather different ideas now about the future; they have decided to sell Windmill House—it is much too big for them, and he has heard of a doctor who wants to buy it if he can get it reasonably, for a sort of asylum for mad people. They mean to take a smaller house in Thorne, so that the boys can go regularly to school; it will be much better for them all, and I think the different things that have happened lately have roused them all up. The old life does not quite satisfy any of us now."

"And what do the little girls think of all?"

Joan was smiling in a subdued fashion.

"The girls never liked Windmill House, and they liked it less than ever when they lost Roy; they were quite in despair when they understood that father had renounced the guardianship, and that he was never coming back; but things have turned out better for them too. The London aunt they visited before Christmas has written to suggest that Mildred, who is near in age to her two eldest daughters, shall spend the next six months with them so as to share her cousin's educational advantages. She is wild with delight at the idea, for she was happy there before, and got on very well with her relations; as for little Nellie, I had my own plans about her. Mr. Lee was kind enough to examine her carefully before he left, when he came to fetch Roy, and he says that he is almost certain he can cure her, if he can have her under his own care for a twelvemonth. So I got father's consent to my plan, and then her parents', and I brought her home with me yesterday. She is asleep now in our spare room, tired out by all the excitement and fatigue of yesterday and to-day; but she will wake up by tea-time and you will see her. Dear little Nellie, I don't think I ever knew before how fond I was of her; it will be so pleasant to have her here to look after father a little when I am out. She is not afraid of him now, and she knows more about his books than I do, and will be delighted to keep his library in order, and wait upon him or read to him. We are to have all the books sent here. Roger does not value them, and even though father may not read so much now as he used, he will like to see the familiar things about him. I am going to have his room all lined with shelves, and he will feel quite at home when he has his library here."

Muriel's interest in this recital was great, and she knew how pleased Roy would be to hear such pleasant news. The fear that Mildred and Nellie would miss him and be unhappy had been his great trouble, and now he would be proportionately glad to hear what good times were in store for both. And whilst she was saying so to Joan, the door opened and admitted the little fair-haired lame girl.

Nellie looked rather shy at the stranger, but Muriel had a way with children that none of them could resist, and an invitation to come and see Roy next day and play with Lilias in the garden if fine enough, brought smiles of timid delight to the child's face. She was very happy and busy helping Joan to get the tea, and carrying grandpapa's cup backwards and forwards; and it was plain to Muriel that the tonic she most needed was the restful kind of happiness that life in this new home would ensure for her.

Marcus came to fetch Muriel home, bringing an excellent account of Roy. He was pleased and surprised at the addition to the household, and listened with interest to Joan's story. He made friends with the little new-comer almost as fast as Muriel had done, and when the guests had departed, and Joan and her little niece stood at the door watching them disappear in the clear, bright February twilight, the child looked up at her with a gravely questioning face and asked:

"Aunt Joan, what is it makes all the people here so kind and nice? Is it because they live in such a pretty place?"

Joan did not answer immediately, and Nellie continued:

"Roy was just the same, and everybody here seems like him. Do you think we shall get nice too, Aunt Joan, now that we have come to live here near them?"

Joan stooped suddenly and gathered the child in her arms—a most unwonted sign of feeling:

"We will try, Nellie, to grow like them; but I do not think that just being in the place will do it—we must try to serve the same Master that they do."

A sweet serious glance of comprehension shot from the child's eyes.

"I know, Aunt Joan," she said in a whisper. "I should like to do that too."

ST. JOHN:

APOSTLE, EVANGELIST, AND SEER.

BY THE REV. S. G. GREEN, D.D.

II.—THE APOSTOLIC CALL: "BOANERGES."

THE distance from Bethabara, or "Bethany beyond the Jordan," where the sons of Zebedee and the sons of Jonas had become disciples of Christ, to Cana of Galilee, where we next meet that happy group, is between fifty and sixty miles—a journey to the pedestrian of twenty hours. With the unconscious minuteness of an eye-witness, the evangelist observes that it was on "the third day" when the travellers arrived at Cana, and were called to the marriage feast, where the mother of Jesus was already before them. Their party had been increased on the way by Philip of Bethsaida, and by Nathanael, or Bartholomew, himself an inhabitant of Cana.

By the presence of Mary at the feast, and by the prominent part she assumed, it would appear that the wedding was that of some near connection; but of this there is no certainty. Joseph, her husband, was probably dead: his name has ceased to appear in the narrative. That John himself was the bridegroom was an early tradition, mentioned by Jerome; mediæval writers adding, with characteristic monkish blindness to the significance of the miracle, that the young disciple, on beholding it, renounced the newly-formed tie, and devoted himself to an ascetic life! Such fancies we may disregard: there is enough, however, in the graphic narrative to show the keen observation and interest of an actual and deeply interested witness. That Jesus and His disciples were invited as guests after their arrival, not that they had been invited beforehand and went to Cana on that account, seems to be intimated in the form of the word employed.[1] An unexpected addition of six or seven persons to the party would moreover explain the failure of the wine.

The record of the miracle is closed by a remark which occurs several times in one form or another throughout this Gospel—"His disciples believed in Him,"—not only indicating the purpose of the biography, to set forth the Divine greatness of the Redeemer, but with almost unconscious autobiographic touch evincing the writer's presence and interest in the scene. We are all apt to describe occurrences in which we have been actual observers by their effect upon our own minds; and so this repeated statement in the Fourth Gospel, in connection with critical periods of the Saviour's ministry, has been rightly taken as among the strong although indirect evidences of the Johannine authorship.

Which of "the disciples" accompanied Jesus and His mother from Cana to Capernaum[2] we have no means of knowing. John was undoubtedly one of them, Andrew is thought to have been another. The party was most probably broken up; our Lord had as yet given no definite call to apostleship. Those who would now remain by His side were those who felt some special attraction of His love, or to whom some special opportunity of accompanying Him was given. But it seems to us impossible not to feel that in the notice of our Lord's visit to Jerusalem (John iii.), and in the account of His return to Galilee through Samaria again to Cana, we have the narrative of an eye-witness.

[1] Not pluperfect, "had been called," but aorist, ἐκλήθη, "was called." See the critical Commentaries.

[2] "They continued there not many days" (John ii. 12). There was nothing special in this visit; nothing seemed to come of it; it appears to be mentioned only in continuance, so to speak, of the writer's journal.

This period of our Lord's life indeed is too often passed over almost unnoticed by readers of the Gospel history. It was in reality one of the highest importance, not only from its separate incidents—Christ's self-revelation at the Passover in Jerusalem, the cleansing of the Temple, and the dialogue with Nicodemus—but because it contains glimpses of an extended Judæan ministry, implied, though not actually described, in the other Gospels. Thus Matthew (ch. iv. 25) speaks of multitudes of people that followed Jesus (into Galilee) "from Jerusalem and from Judæa," and records (ch. viii. 10, 12) a contrast instituted by Christ Himself between the faith shown by the centurion of Capernaum, and the unbelief with which He had met "in Israel.[1]" There is in Luke iv. 44 a remarkably various reading: "He preached in the synagogues of Judæa" instead of Galilee; an alteration admitted, though with some doubt, by Westcott and Hort, and placed in the margin of our Revised Version as at least worthy of attention. But we need not press this: it is evident from our Lord's mournful appeal to Jerusalem—"How often would I have gathered thee!"—that He had laboured much among the Jews, although for the most part in vain. That the evangelist (Matthew), who records the words, has said nothing of the ministry to which they refer, is only an indirect proof of truthfulness; and St. John supplies the missing link.

Through these eight or nine months at least,[2] which intervened between that Passover and the imprisonment of the Baptist, the young son of Zebedee was an assiduous attendant upon Jesus. He was in Jerusalem when Nicodemus came to Jesus by night, and may have been present at the interview, in which the Lord's deep and mystic utterances would so well harmonise with the character of his own mind. He accompanied the Master from Jerusalem into the country districts of Judæa, where for a time, like John the forerunner, the disciples of Jesus baptized into the coming kingdom. There John the Baptist was also still labouring, having retired from the Jordan to Aenon near to Salim with its many watercourses—probably in a Samaritan valley to the east of Sychar; whence his last beautiful utterances—his "swan song," as they have been called—would easily reach his former disciple, and are given by him with a deep and solemn commentary, in which the aged evangelist gives his own attestation to the words with which his first teacher in the Jordan wilderness had closed his ministry, once again emphatically witnessing to the Christ of God.[1]

It was now time to return into Galilee, and John was still an attendant upon the Saviour. The charming narrative of the interview with the woman of Samaria plainly contains the reminiscences of an actor in the scene. "Upon this came His disciples; and they marvelled that He was speaking with a woman; yet no man said, What seekest Thou? or, Why speakest Thou with her? So the woman left her water-pot," etc. Here is more than a fine dramatic propriety:—it is a living picture, familiar to the writer's memory and thought, recalled, as an old man recalls the past. So is it to the end of this unequalled story. The narrator gives again an almost unconscious note of time. Jesus abode in Sychar "two days;" then went, to receive at first a welcome in Galilee, and again at Cana to work a miracle, "at the seventh hour."

Here, as we read the story, the disciples left Jesus for a while. John and Andrew returned to Bethsaida, to their boats and nets on the Galilæan lake. The great Baptist was now imprisoned in the fortress by the Dead Sea shore, where his life was soon to end. The time had come for Jesus to enter upon a second period of His ministry, more general, more sustained than the former, with a larger company of followers and fellow-workers. In Galilee, He now first repeats the warning summons, which John had uttered on the banks of Jordan, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Then followed the call to permanent apostleship of those who were already His disciples, the sons of Jonas and the sons of Zebedee.

Every rule of historical interpretation requires us to distinguish between the call of John and his comrades as described by Matthew, Mark and Luke, from that narrated in the Fourth Gospel. Nor indeed need we spend a word on what seems so obvious, but for the endeavour of some critics to find a discrepancy in the accounts. Thus a commentator so learned and generally so candid as Dr. Meyer, writes that the account in the first three Gospels "of the call of the two pairs of brothers is utterly irreconcilable with that of John as to place, time, and circumstances; and the usual explanations resorted to—that what is here recorded was only a preliminary call, or only a social union with Christ, or only the gathering together of the first believers, but not their call—fall to the ground at once when we see how the narrative (in the Fourth Gospel) proceeds, for according to it 'the disciples' are with Jesus, and remain with Him." Dr. Meyer's argument is plainly inconclusive. In John's language "the disciples" may well mean, as we have assumed above, those who had been called and who associated themselves with Him rather by spontaneous

[1] It is however possible that this was merely the contrast between the Gentile and the Jew.

[2] See John iv. 35: "There are yet four months, and then cometh harvest." If this is to be taken as referring to the actual time of year, it was in December or January. But it is probable that the words were used in a general proverbial sense: "From seed-time and harvest there are four months," in which case they tell us nothing as to the time of year.

[1] John iii. 27–30 are the words of the Baptist. Verses 31–36 seem to be the comment of the evangelist.

attraction than by any formal designation. Afterwards John speaks of "the twelve" (vi. 67), which is the more significant as no account of the choice of the apostles has been given in this Gospel. It is one of those many instances in which the narrative of the other three is presupposed. And again, it is not to be thought that a writer with the first three Gospels before him would have deliberately given another and "irreconcilable" account of the same transaction. We therefore regard the two as altogether distinct. The former call was in the valley of the Jordan, the latter by the sea of Galilee; the two were separated by an interval of at least eight months; the former was introductory to Christ's ministry in Judæa, contemporaneous with that of John the Baptist; the latter was preparatory to His more extended ministry which had Galilee for its principal scene, and which began only when the forerunner was cast into prison. And may we not add, as further evidence, that this second call, by Gennesaret, was not the summons of an unknown master—that, at His first word, the disciples left all and followed Him? They gladly complied, not as drawn by the magic of a resistless word, but as already His, in heart and life.

This twofold call has its counterpart among ourselves. The summons that first touches the heart and wakens it to faith, is the Saviour's Come, and ye shall see. So the disciple is won, and it becomes his choicest delight to follow the Master in every way of appointed service; to behold His glory, as at Cana, to listen to His words, as at Sychar, or else to remember Him in the ordinary and lowly duties of life, as at the Galilæan lake. This is the position of all who know Him. But to some, chosen out of the rest, there comes the call to higher and more constant service. To His Come, and ye shall see is added the thrilling, all-constraining word, Follow Me. The disciple becomes the apostle; or, to translate the thought into terms of our ordinary life, the youthful Christian, filled with an earnest and noble desire, recognises in this desire the voice of Jesus, Go forth and be My minister and witness among men. Gennesaret is finally forsaken—the boats, the fishing-nets, the comrades; and the minister of the church, the missionary of the Cross, henceforth lays his life on the altar of holy service.

The history of John now becomes that of his Master and his fellow disciples. Soon the number of the twelve is completed; in every list of whom the two sons of Zebedee and the two sons of Jonas occupy, although in varying order, the foremost place.[1] On the former pair of brothers Jesus confers the title of Boanerges, "Sons of Thunder"[2]—a surname that gives an interesting glimpse into their natural temperament. For we cannot understand it as resting on anything merely superficial, such as "a deep-toned peculiarity of voice." Rather does it denote an intensity of character, possibly not unmixed with gloom, and ready on occasion to flash forth with uncontrolled energy. John the Baptist was a "lamp that burneth and shineth"—heat and light duly blended, and shedding a constant radiance; in his namesake we should rather look for revelations of hidden power, bursting forth in sudden glow, sometimes to illuminate, sometimes to scathe. It was a "son of thunder" whose spirit breathes and burns in the Apocalypse. And even in the ministry of Christ there was need of repressing the exuberant ardour of these young souls which more than once threatened to fall into fanatic intolerance—"Master, we saw one casting out demons in Thy name, and we forbad him, because he followeth not with us." It is John who speaks, forgetting for the moment how Joshua in the old time[1] had in like manner tried to silence the voice of unauthorised prophets in the camp, and had been reproved. It was exactly, we feel, what a John would do, in eager loyalty to his Master, leading to an impatience of everything, however good and true, which did not seem to bear His impress. And so it was to John that the simple, sublime lesson of tolerance first was given: "Forbid him not, for he that is not against us is for us."

With an indignation, again, which might seem to have a better excuse, James and John are for calling down fire from heaven to consume the Samaritan villagers who had driven the Son of Man and His companions from their doors. The sons of thunder stand here revealed, in the spirit and power of Elijah! But again, the Saviour rebuked the zeal which even for His sake would do harm to men, and through the sons of Zebedee taught to His professed people a lesson which it would have been well if they had laid to heart in ages to come! Is it not with a sense of grateful delight that we read in the record of John's missionary work in after days, that he himself, with his companion Peter, preached the gospel in many villages of the Samaritans?[2]

The appeal to Jesus for an exalted place in His kingdom, in which James and John once more appear in the narrative, is hardly to be classed with the foregoing illustrations of their character. Rather does it seem a sudden outburst of desire, aroused by the mysterious announcement of coming sorrow and glory. It was associated, we must not forget, with the most solemn words in which our Lord had spoken of His agony. In its very ambition there breathed a noble faith; and there is no reason to doubt that the brothers were intelligently sincere when they said We can, in answer to the question whether they could "drink of the cup and be baptized with the baptism" of the Son of Man. Matthew and Mark both narrate the incident; and the former evangelist throws some light upon it by recording that it was the mother of Zebedee's children who made the request for her sons. In the fact that she prompted it, we may see in it rather the longing of the mother's heart for her children's greatness

[1] Matthew and Luke. — Mark and Acts.
Peter — Peter
Andrew — James
James — John
John — Andrew

[2] In correct Hebrew B'ney-regesh; the o inserted after the fashion of the broad Galilæan pronunciation.

[1] See Numbers xi. 28, 29. [2] Acts viii. 25.

than any further revelation of the spirit of Boanerges. There was something better in it, after all, than in Peter's blunt enquiry, made not long before, "Behold, we have left all and followed Thee; what then shall we have?" And once more, through the sons of Zebedee, come to us immortal words: "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many."

If the mistakes of the Apostle John are those of a Boanerges, they help us at the same time to understand the secret of the calm which pervaded his later writings. It is the calm of a profound intensity. In the stillness and glory of a summer's day there is the balance of electric forces, which on occasion display themselves in the darkness and majesty of the storm. The greatest natures can be tranquil and serene; and the indignation which, like a thunder-peal, denounces "the liars" that deny the Father and the Son, is akin to the deep and solemn sweetness of the great announcement that God is Love.

LAST HOURS.

